OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

FUNDING

The House resumed from Monday, March 19, consideration of the motion Mr. Keyes:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reinstating funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I rise today in this debate because I believe the government is doing the right thing in controlling our spending to reduce the national deficit. Contributions from all participating parties in the country are needed in this very important and vital exercise.

There is really nothing new about the principle of charging a nominal fee for exchanged information. This is a practice that has been carried on for ages within various government departments and agencies. It is not at all unusual for one department to charge for the services of another department.

Indeed, the proceedings in this House as produced in Hansard, the draft bills of legislation passed by the House, The Canada Gazette and other government publications are all produced at a cost and some of these costs are recovered by the users.

Therefore the products of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety are, without question, valuable and essential to all of Canada and are definitely in demand by other nations. There is obviously a need for these products, and that is why we are witnessing this debate in the House.

We agree that the information on occupational health and safety is of value to all the partners and to their constituents, whether they be individuals and unions concerned about occupational hazards, employers requiring information on toxic chemicals, governments and standard setting bodies developing or interpreting legislation, or other parties that might be interested in information on environmental pollutants, for example.

All this costs money to produce. It costs money to produce, package and distribute information products, and that is an unavoidable fact of life. In the past, however, these costs have been borne principally by only one of the partners in the arrangement. That creates a very stressful burden and an unfair situation. Therefore, if all the other partners are interested in continuing to provide these information services to Canadians, then they must devote some serious time and consideration to devising ways and means of paying for them and creating a more equitable situation.

This government is dedicated to building a constructive partnership among labour, business and governments. We believe that process will be ever more important as Canadians strive to address the challenges brought on by rapidly changing economic and social conditions that we are going through both at home and abroad.

At every opportunity we promote and facilitate active and vibrant partnerships among labour, business and governments as we develop public policy and pursue economic development. Together in this partnership we can and we must move forward in addressing the economic and social challenges that we share. However, shared responsibility and accountability must go hand in hand with that co-operative effort and that co-operative approach to decision making on national issues.

Since its creation in 1978 the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has been provided with financial support to get itself established and to develop a variety of useful information services on matters of occupational health and safety. The federal government is only one of the many partners that share in the control of and in the direction that the centre takes.

The other partners are also the principal beneficiaries of the products of the centre. The government, by this decision, is simply asking the other partners to accept a more equitable portion of the funding responsibility for the products that the centre has produced. They will be paying more only for the packaging and the distribution costs of the products they use. I do not think that is unreasonable; it is quite fair.

• (1310)

In the past the system has not been quite so fair. The federal government's jurisdiction in occupational health and safety embraces only one-tenth of the Canadian labour force or approximately one million workers, yet the federal government pays the majority of the centre's funding.

By contrast, the total membership of the Canadian Labour Congress is more than double the number of people in the federal jurisdiction. It seems to me that it is time that we found a more equitable cost sharing system.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has provided workers, unions, employers, governments and individuals alike with the necessary tools to protect their immediate health and safety needs, but we must remember that in turn they have been provided with the economic tools necessary to gain efficiency in the Canadian market-place. We agree and we recognize this point. We also agree that it is important that individuals, unions and small businesses have ready access to inexpensive information as it pertains to health and safety.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has been the focal point for tripartite co-operation, innovation and effective information sharing since its inception in 1978. We agree that it is an essential and unique component of a national information system developed by Canadians to protect the lives and the health of workers and to sustain a viable economy through partnership.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to speak today on the motion placed before this House by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Like my colleague I am very concerned about the decision of the federal government to withdraw funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. The government should abandon this move and indicate as soon as possible that it will continue to provide the centre with federal funding.

There is no question as to the importance and value of the centre. It is a vital component in the protection of Canadian workers. The centre is renowned for the quality and magnitude of information and services it has on matters which relate to occupational health and safety in Canada and internationally.

The mandate of the centre involves the promotion of health and safety in the workplace and considers both the physical and mental health of workers. The centre has provided services which, as everyone will agree, have played an integral role in making the Canadian workplace safer and the economy more productive.

By having this excellent centre workers are that much closer to avoiding the far too many accidents which render them unable to work or worse. The occurrence of serious injury or death from job related accidents must be prevented. The centre has endeavoured, with recognizable success, to do just that since its inception in 1978.

Given the important role the centre has played, it is truly unconscionable that the federal government has decided to withdraw all of its funding to the centre by April 1991. The government provides the entire core budget funding for the centre. The total withdrawal of these funds will certainly have a negative impact upon the centre and its operations.

The money which has been given to the centre in the last 12 years by the federal government was money well spent. The centre has an annual budget usually between $8 million and $12 million. This works out to about $1 per worker per year. This is not too much if one considers that the lives and the working conditions of Canadians are at stake here.

The Minister of Labour stated in this House on April 28 of last year: "Work accidents entail direct and indirect costs of about $17.5 billion a year". The minister went on to say that this is, in his own words, "a very heavy burden on this nation". I agree it is a very heavy burden, yet this minister and his government have decided to withdraw the main source of funding for the centre completely. They want to turn it into a full cost recovery enterprise with no assistance at all from the federal government.

The government has informed the centre that it is to recover 15 per cent of its budget in 1989–90, 50 per cent in 1990–91, and 100 per cent in 1991–92. This plan was devised by the government unilaterally, without any consultation with the centre. The government is clearly showing its true colours here. It is are not worried about the centre and it is not overly concerned with occupational health and safety. Instead, its mind is focused on the money it will save.

The government must realize that it cannot address the deficit it has managed to accumulate due to its economic mismanagement with the money it gets from cutting the centre's funding. Far from it.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has earned its keep. It is no coincidence that since the centre has been in existence, the work accident rate in Canada has gone from 1 in 8 to 1 in 10. The centre can be attributed to having had an impact in the reduction of this rate. The centre has consistently and effectively provided a wide range of up to date, preventive accident and health information and it has paid off.

The services provided by the centre have come to be relied upon by both labour and management groups across the country. As well, a multitude of health and safety organizations, educational institutions, professional groups and all levels of government have benefited from using the centre's resources. We have a need in Canada for such a centre, a centre devoted to the health and safety of Canadian workers.

The Minister of Labour has also pointed out in this House that in 1987, 894 Canadians died at work and 25 million person days were lost due to work accidents and occupational injuries or diseases. We should remember as well the $17.5 billion which we have to pay as a result.

Why then does the centre have to lose all of its financial support from the federal government and go it alone? Why does the centre's research and operations have to be put in jeopardy along with the welfare of the Canadian worker? Does the government actually believe that the money could be best spent elsewhere or used in vain attempts at deficit reduction? No, the total withdrawal of funding will only serve to inhibit the centre in maintaining its respected and valued contribution to occupational health and safety in Canada.

On February 5, when this motion was being debated in the House, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour stated, and I quote:

> As a result of receiving government funding only—although it had a good reputation and did a good job—I think that a lot of people did not know what the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety did. There are a lot of school boards and fire departments and so on which did not know.

The hon. member went on to say:

> Were we really spreading the word? As a result of not having to worry about where the funding comes from there may have been a less than an adequate job done on that.

I can tell the hon. member that in my riding of Stormont—Dundas, the Stormont—Dundas—Glengarry public school board is well aware of the centre and its work. In fact, the legislative committee of this school board believes that the centre has "Proved to be a valuable resource tool for educators both for educational purposes and for the implementation of the provisions of various acts". The board also supports the Metropolitan Toronto School Board in its efforts to have the centre's federal funding maintained.

In a letter to the Minister of Labour, dated March 7, 1990, the Stormont—Dundas and Glengarry County Board of Education stated: "This board of education has relied upon information provided through the centre and was distressed to note the withdrawal of funding by the federal government and the goal of effecting 100 per cent of cost recovery by 1991–1992". The board goes on to state: "We urge you and your colleagues to look further at funding for the centre and its activities in light of legislation such as the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System, which legislation leads directly to a further rise in the real number of enquiries for all categories of users of the centre".

The board concludes its letter by stating that it: "Urges the federal government to reconsider its position relative to funding of the centre".

With regard to the parliamentary secretary's second observation, I believe that the word has indeed been spread about. The centre is well known throughout Canada and the rest of the world. A number of the centre's users are themselves located outside of Canada. It has a well respected reputation both in Europe and in the United States.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour is wrong to suggest that as the centre did not have to worry about where its funding was coming from, it may have done a less than adequate job of spreading the word. This is simply not an accurate assessment.

I do think that the real concern now is that without secured funding the centre may have to worry a great deal about its fiscal state rather than devote its full attention to the goals of preserving the lives of workers. This would be a truly tragic event but it need not be the case.

In conclusion, the government must realize that the most prudent course of action to pursue would be to continue providing the centre with full funding. In the final analysis, the health and safety of Canadian workers and the high costs both in human and fiscal terms far outweigh the amount of funding the centre currently receives from the federal government.

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Madam Speaker, hon. members, I wish to assure you that the CCOHS will continue to be a useful, impartial and financially viable source of information on occupational health and safety in Canada. I also wish to tell hon. members that the government's decision concerning CCOHS funding is not an attempt to privatize the Centre, because that would destroy this unique three-way partnership and the unbiased nature of what the CCOHS produces.

The purpose of the government's decision is quite simply to help the CCOHS be more self-financing by recovering a larger share of its production costs.

Further to the statement by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Keyes), I would like to say clearly that no one is suggesting having workers pay fees for this essential information on occupational health and safety or charging for information requested over the toll-free telephone lines. The CCOHS will continue to apply its policy of free access to information. The cost recovery principle simply means getting back the costs of editing, processing and distributing the information, and not the cost of the information itself.

It is therefore essential that individuals, unions and small businesses have easy access to inexpensive information on what must be done to protect their health and safety.

The centre has been a focus for tripartite co-operation, innovation and efficient information sharing since it was established in 1978. It is an essential and unique component of the national information system Canadians have developed to protect the lives and safety of workers and support a strong economy based on partnership.

Because of demographic changes and the resulting shortage of new workers and skilled workers in certain areas, some corporations are becoming increasingly competitive in their bid to attract the best workers, emphasizing factors such as high-quality workplaces and health and safety aspects. Social changes, including a change in attitudes to the environment, have made employers more aware of their social responsibilities, including those relating to the health and well-being of their employees.

I am convinced that the time and energy spent on trying to change the government's decision and condemning the phasing-out of the centre should be directed towards finding constructive ways of financing the centre.

In view of the present state of the economy in this country, it is imperative to reduce the deficit and increase productivity and efficiency. The latter is also necessary if we are to compete effectively on international markets. In fact, all levels of government in this country have found it necessary to cut back on a number of services and programs.

The April 1989 cabinet decision on the budget was that the centre should become financially more self-sufficient over the next three years for the information services provided to the users of the centre. This decision was based on the fiscal restraints confronting the government but also on the basis of the apparent financial maturity on the centre. Since a few years ago, the centre has been recovering some of the costs of producing its information products. The 1989 decision meant that the centre should broaden its base of coast recovery. The costs are those associated with the costs of packaging and distributing these information products that are meant to be recovered, not the costs of information itself.

I may remind hon. members that cost recovery is not a new principle, nor is it confined to the federal government. It is a matter of good business practice within the public sector.

Of course, someone has to pay for the cost of producing, packaging and distributing the centre's products. However, one partner has been paying the lion's share of these costs, which are considerable. Consequently, if the other partners wish to continue to provide this information service, they will have seriously to consider ways of paying for that service.

As you know, Madam Speaker, the government is committed to establishing a constructive partnership with the labour movement and the business community, a process which will become more important than ever as Canadians strive to face up to the challenges of rapid social and economic changes in Canada and abroad. We are taking every opportunity to promote and favour an active and dynamic partnership between labour, business and the state in managing public funds and pursuing economic development.

Together with our partners, we can and must deal with common economic and social problems. However, responsibility and accountability go hand in hand with co-operation in national decision-making.

This government intends to establish the CCOHS on a solid footing while strengthening the impartiality and distinctiveness of its activities.

The provision of information services essential to Canadian workers, which is the main objective of the CCOHS mandate, would not be threatened by the commercial aspects of other operations.

The corporate plan confirms the possibility of ensuring the Centre's financial self-sufficiency within a few years, as the government has decided.

Madam Speaker, all economic sectors must participate in the national effort and join forces to reduce the deficit.

In the last few years, our government has taken often difficult and sometimes unpopular measures to eliminate unnecessary expenses and adopted a more efficient method of managing public funds. We must all adjust our priorities and allocate scarce resources in the most efficient manner possible. To a large extent, this government has succeeded in limiting public expenditures and will continue to do so.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise to support the hon. member for Hamilton West in his private member's motion calling for the reinstatement of funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

When the centre was developed this funding was established as tripartite funding. I think it is important that we remember that the principle for this, just as the principle for unemployment insurance was designed to be a tripartite principle, was to ensure that all of the players were involved in both making decisions and paying for the process.

There are 26,000 inquiries a year made at this centre. That means that this centre is highly regarded in international circles, in terms of the service that it offers to Canada and to other countries in occupational health and safety. The government, having withdrawn the funding and suggesting that, in fact, this centre begin to charge fees for services, makes it the only health care agency and institution in this country that would be operating on the principle of user fees.

Imagine working with other international and national centres for occupational health and safety, gathering information that the other centres have discovered, then bringing it back to Canada and selling it for a user's fee. I would expect that many of the organizations that provide us the information would find it rather shocking that their information is being sold in Canada to possibly the highest bidder.

Today, hundreds of new chemicals are introduced into the workplace, almost daily. Men and women are going to work every day and in many cases have little or no idea of the kinds of things that they will be exposed to and the long-range effects that those substances will have on their health. There are 863 deaths a year in Canada and 20,000 disabled workers a year. That is shocking in a nation that has so much to offer.

It is shocking for the government to say that it is not going to protect those workers and that it has no responsibility to those workers in the workplace. Workers depend on the government to care about them. Workers have a right to believe that this government will take care of their safety, as they go out every day and build the wealth of this nation.

For example, the CCOHS has become a world leader in knowing what the impact is of pesticides on our environment. Only today on CBC Radio it was announced that household pesticides, which many of us treat quite indifferently and feel are quite innocuous, even in the tiniest amount can affect people with allergies, from a sniffle to death. This is something we have only learned. Yet this government thinks we should be abandoning our commitment in the workplace.

My father worked for 40 years at Cominco in Trail in a zinc and lead non-ferrous smelter which was, for many years, the largest in the world. He worked in the zinc plant machine shop. It was a dirty hole. People are taken on tours there and they cannot get out fast enough. It is full of dirt, dust, lead and asbestos. Neither he nor his colleagues were aware of what these conditions would do to them, what would be the impact of these conditions in their 40 years of working life in their retirement.

Well, let me tell you what kind of retirement it led to. It led to emphysema. It led to my father not being able to walk to the end of the street without having to stop and catch his breath. It led to my father not being able to garden. I have seen my father lying on the lawn pulling weeds because his breath is cut off and could not bend.

That is the kind of protection that workers have a right to receive. It is protection that our mothers and fathers did not have, and that our children must have.

There is no excuse not to spend $10 million today when we will spend millions and millions of dollars tomorrow trying to remedy the carnage that is happening in the workplace.

I am a printer. I started my apprenticeship in the hot metal days of the printing industry. When I was an apprentice only 20 years ago we were encouraged to take calcium pills and to drink plenty of milk because there was lead in the room. Hot metal days in the printing industry meant that lead was used, as it still is in some shops. It turns out that that was the absolute worst thing that we could have done for our health. If had not been for research and the seriousness of the impact of lead exposure, we never would have known that.

I do not want my children to come out of the workplace full of carcinogens and chemicals that nobody has bothered to label or even to have considered as a serious health effect. I do not believe that any member in the Chamber would want their children exposed to that.

It is important for us to think about the thousands and thousands of Canadian workers who have died from asbestosis which comprised a large portion of the last generation of workers. We can find little excuse for not reinstating the funding.

Privatization of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is not the answer. I do not want to cast aspersions on any researcher, past or present, but I do want to say that it has been proven over and over again, particularly in the United States, that research can be bought. It is absolutely vital to workers in Canada that the research going on at this centre be clearly above any possibility of having been bought by industry.

One of the main concerns of every Canadian right now is the environment and our concern for the environment has to begin in our workplaces. The protection of our workers has to be one of the first key steps to the protection of the environment, our children, and our future.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I have been eagerly awaiting this debate on the motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West.

The fact that the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is in his riding is very important, not only to that hon. member but to all Members of Parliament.

The Centre plays an important role in the lives of thousands of workers of Canada. Its mandate is far more than the promotion of health and safety in the workplace, though it is reasonable to assume that the physical and mental health of working people constitutes the major part of the centre's concerns and activities.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety also acts as a bridge between all levels of government, labour and management, particularly when standards must be established, maintained or up-graded in the areas of health and safety. Over the years, the centre has accumulated a wealth of information and statistics which it shares with any organization involved in the areas of occupational health and safety. In fact, any Canadian has access to information which he or she needs to ensure that they work in a safe environment.

The health of Canadians has been a major concern for the Liberals and, indeed, all Members of Parliament, but it was the Liberals who introduced many social programs and the universality of these programs to Canada.

Safety at work, which guarantees health, is an extension of the medicare and health programs initiated by the Liberals. Much has been done by the centre, but the directors would be the first to agree that much still remains to be done.

Canada does not fare well on the international scene as far as occupational health and safety are concerned. In fact, we stand first among the five major industrial countries, including the United States, Great Britain, West Germany and Japan with regard to fatalities in construction, mining and quarrying. We are second for manufacturing and railway accidents. After heart disease and cancer, occupational death ranks third in the leading causes of mortality among Canadians. Such statistics warrant our attention and our continued vigilance.

The Minister of Labour stated in the House of Commons on April 28, 1989 that 894 Canadians died at work in 1987, and 25 million person-days were lost in that same year due to work accidents and occupational injuries or diseases. These accidents represent costs, direct and indirect, of $17.5 billion a year, and that is almost the same amount that this government was trying to borrow just last week on the borrowing bill. What a waste of health, productivity and time.

Statistics gathered by the centre tell us that 39 per cent of job injuries are due to illegal working conditions, and another 24 per cent is attributable to legal but unsafe conditions. The common denominator is consistently one of lack of information by both the employers and the employees.

Since the centre started operation 10 years ago, the work accident rate has gone from one worker in 8 to one worker in 10, which is a decrease of 17 per cent. Such progress did not just happen. It was the result of a concentrated effort by the centre to providing preventative information, by raising the level of consciousness, by establishing solid ties with all levels of government on this issue of occupational health and safety in Canada.

In 1988-89, the centre responded to 26,000 inquiries on its toll-free line, 54,000 new records were added in that same year to their electronic services, which consists of 50 data bases. This service was used by approximately 1,200 Canadian organizations which called on the system 40,000 times. A total of 350,000 publications on health and safety were distributed in the year 1988-89, and the involvement of the centre has been consistent, efficient and has improved under the guidance of a caring board of governors.

In their day-to-day work, the centre reports it has received total national and international co-operation, particularly with its American counterpart, the U.S. National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health. There has been a strong exchange of information and data bases, without charge, in the spirit of co-operation and mutual interest. It follows that the centre has attained an excellent reputation, both at home and abroad, for providing high quality information, a fact of which we should all be proud.

The primary recipients of the centre's work and activities have been, and should remain, Canadian workers and employers. This was an objective which this centre set for itself, and records show that 73 per cent of all inquiries have come from these two groups.

Much attention has been paid to health in recent years, with a great deal of it centring on prevention. Records have shown that where money has been spent on the prevention of accidents and disease, we have reaped immeasurable benefits. We have learned about better and more adequate nutrition, and we have successfully brought an awareness of accident prevention through various programs aimed at curbing drinking and driving. We have heeded the message and donned walking shoes, skates and skis, all aimed at a more balanced and healthy life.

One what of the tremendous achievements made in the area of research and in the successful rate of transplants, surgeries and rehabilitation programs. All this points to an interest in health and an appreciation for health in all its forms.

Industrial health and safety is an important facet of our plans for a future without accidents, disabilities and surely, without fatalities.

The Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has played a major role and would like to continue its work. It was therefore with a great deal of consternation that I learned that the government had plans which would substantially affect the centre's ability to carry out its outstanding work.

The centre is being asked to survive for two years without government funding. Such budget cuts show a flagrant disregard for Canadians and are only another item we can add to the long list of cutbacks Canadians are being asked to accept by this inept government.

We are told to go and find the money somewhere else. This is more or less what the Minister of Labour told the board of governors of the centre. Without being specific the minister felt there were "many ways in which the centre could become self-financing within the next few years". However, the minister should have known that the fund raising options left to the centre are few, not many, as he indicated.

Throughout Canada there is a search for these funds for great causes. This is one of the causes. But it seems there is a proliferation of people trying to collect money, whether it be for universities or for other drives, like the Cat-Scan as is being considered in my riding. I believe the return on the moneys spent at the centre for the prevention of accidents would benefit all Canadians and save the government and, therefore, the Canadian taxpayers a great deal of money.

Fund raising is time consuming. Much-needed staff would have to be deployed to set up fund raising programs. The difficulty would be compounded by the fact that so many cutbacks have been made to essential services.

We have reason to wonder what type of fund raising can be carried out? The Liberal Party clearly saw the funding of the centre as a responsibility of the central government, and this party still does.

When the establishment of the centre was discussed in the House in 1978 the then Minister of Labour, the Hon. John Munro, clearly explained that the centre was to be financed by the federal government. Is the government now asking the Canadian people to accept another broken promise? Is the government taking chances with the health of Canadians due to its poor management of revenues? The answer to both question is, unfortunately, yes.

I urge the government to weigh the implications of the proposed cuts to the centre against the benefits of continued financial support to an organization which brings a vital service to Canadian workers, their families and employers which in the process enhances our image abroad and enhances health here in our own country.

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Madam Speaker, the business plan for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has one basic objective: financial self-sufficiency. To achieve this goal, the plan considers the present context of occupational health and safety in Canada and suggests the following strategies:

The centre's financial strategy must stress its basic mandate which consists in promoting occupational health and safety, not pursuing related objectives. The centre's activities produce positive results within the next few years and not focus on new objectives. The centre must concentrate on a few initiatives likely to produce revenue and only proceed with new initiatives as resources permit. The centre must take advantage of its unique combination of technical expertise in occupational health and safety and information technology.

A major component of the centre's short term strategy must be to develop existing markets for products and services. The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety must also develop products and services connected with those aspects of its mandate that are safety-related and develop the market for these services which is apparently more lucrative than for health-related services. The centre must be considered as a truly national organization in order to increase penetration of markets in all regions of this country. According to its terms of reference, the centre must primarily respond to the needs of Canadian workers. However, if it can increase sales of its products outside Canada, it will be able to finance its domestic activities. The centre must offer a package of products and services in order to provide for a stable source of financing that does not depend on individual sales. Furthermore, the centre should not create extensive marketing services but make use of its special relationship with other organizations and associations as well as existing distribution channels.

To sum up, the strategies of the centre's business plan are concerned with the products and information services that can be offered by means of compact disc technology. The plan suggests developing existing markets and finding new outlets for existing products. It also emphasizes marketing of safety-related products, suggests offering service packages, where possible, and recommends marketing these through existing marketing channels and through special arrangements with other organizations and associations.

Madam Speaker, it is essential that the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety have a sound, long-term financial base. The Centre's corporate plan established by its board of directors sets forth several strategies to make the Centre self-financing on a businesslike basis in the near future. The plan also contains recommendations on financing the costs of developing products and markets for the Centre, as well as present and future capital costs, and on certain structural changes.

These strategies were based on the principle that they should follow the methods generally accepted in the private sector. Therefore, if the Centre is to operate as a business, it must finance itself like a business, and that is what this government intends. Of course, the Liberals and New Democrats are not used to a concept like "self-financing".

The corporate plan confirms the government's decision that it is quite possible for the Centre to be financially self-supporting within a few years.

Madam Speaker, to further demonstrate this government's commitment to occupational health and safety in Canada and also to assure hon. members, users of the Centre's services and especially employees of the Centre that it will continue to fulfil its important mandate and carry out its activities, the minister has already approached Treasury Board to obtain the funds required for this interim financing. However, the actual amount will depend on a detailed analysis of the implementation plan, in accordance with the government's cost-recovery policy.

The corporate plan states the overall strategies that the Centre must pursue to reach the goal of financial self-sufficiency, but the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety will still have to do a lot of thorough, detailed planning to implement it and include it in the multi-year operational plan to be presented by September 30 of this year.

Madam Speaker, I said that the government intends to put the Centre on a solid foundation and at the same time to strengthen the Centre's impartiality and unique character.

The minister has therefore asked Treasury Board for authorization to lay a solid financial foundation for the Centre and to give it the financial tools it needs to manage its income and expenses properly.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, in the few minutes remaining I would like to take the opportunity to put a few comments on the record on this motion that we are debating today. I will read the motion into the record:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reinstating funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

It is important to follow up on the debate on this particular motion. I want to pay credit to our critic who has visited this centre and has invested a considerable amount of his personal time in following this issue. The member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke has put a personal commitment into concerns of this country about occupational health and safety. This is a concern that is directly related to an industry in my area in our province, namely, the forest industry, in which many people are injured.

In Canada alone, some 20,000 people per year are disabled. One thousand workers a year die on the job in the forest industry. It is an incredible situation that in this country we can have 1,000 people a year dying on the job. It proves just how important a centre like this is to assemble the information and material, and to give information to workers, employers and government bodies so that they are aware of the importance, danger and the kind of information that is required when workers are dealing with hazardous situations and dangerous chemicals.

The reason this motion is being debated is because of this crazy corporate agenda that the Conservative party is pursuing. It is trying to find a model way to privatize this centre. The point we have to make is that that the government has an important role to play in moderating and being the objective viewer in these instances.

There must be a stop to theses attempts by the Conservative Party to allow its corporate friends to have their way in all aspects of our life. We hope the government will listen, support and ensure that the funding continues so that this centre can continue on a permanent basis.

I mentioned the hard work that my colleague the member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke has done in this particular area. In just the minute I have before you call us to order, I want to read the last paragraph of a petition that he has been circulating into the record because it sums up exactly the concerns that we have. The petition states that the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has achieved an unrivalled, international reputation as Canada's national centre for workplace health and safety. The petition concludes:

> Therefore, the undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to restore the position and status of the centre as it was at the beginning of 1988, according to the centre's statute, and to reverse any moves that detract from the statutes of the centre as a public corporation with the objective spelled out in Section 5 of the legislation.

Madam Speaker, that is important. I hope the government listens for once.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to statements by members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

LAW OF THE SEA

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I rise today to remind the House of an important conference that took place last October, from October 16 to 18, in Copenhagen where representatives of this Parliament and all parties met with representatives of eastern and western Europe, to consider the future of the world's oceans, particularly those directly related to our countries.

At that time, we declared in the final statement the vital importance of the seas and the oceans for the survival of the earth, and the significance of the oceans for the global environment, the survival of species and the maintenance of biological diversity.

Madam Speaker, you will know that in 1982 we concluded an historic agreement on the Law of the Sea. By 1984 some 159 nations had signed this particular treaty. Unfortunately, in the last six years, less than 40 countries have ratified it. It needs 60 countries in order to come into full effect one year later.

Since Canada has the longest coastline in the world—some 150,000 statute miles extending on three oceans—I would urge all members of this Parliament and Canadians to finally endorse and ratify a convention so important to the future of life in this country and on this planet.

CANADIAN CANCER SOCIETY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, April is cancer month in Canada.

Members of the House are wearing daffodils today to help launch the Canadian Cancer Society's yearly campaign. This year the goal is $41 million.

The backbone of this great society is its 300,000 dedicated volunteers, working throughout Canada in large and small communities. They help in spreading the public education message that is so valuably needed. They help comfort cancer patients in so many ways, and are the driving force behind the society's fund–raising activities.

The Canadian Cancer Society funds its research projects through its affiliate, the National Cancer Institution. It will spend more than $32 million this year alone.

This research covers many aspects, including the cause, prevention, early detection, responsiveness, as well as improving the quality of life for all cancer patients in Canada.

There are very few families in Canada who have not experienced the tragedies of this terrible disease.

I thank you, Madam Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to speak on this subject today. I thank the students from Ashbury College who are here today to assist. I thank the people from Ottawa in the Cancer Society, and thank you Debbie.

ACQUISITION OF A FIREARM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Today, I would like to draw the attention of the House to what I found when I happened to compare what it says on the driver's license renewal form and the firearms acquisition application form.

Surprising though it may seem, to buy a gun one doesn't have to provide a medical record or state any diseases or functional impairments, as one is asked to do when applying for renewal of one's drivers licence.

Madam Speaker, I think there is something definitely wrong here which can have very dangerous consequences.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Madam Speaker, over the past year it has become obvious that violence is a severe problem on the Miramichi and elsewhere.

Violence is a learned behaviour that often begins when a youngster sees a woman assaulted in the home, or is a victim of violence at the hands of a man or woman who has been a victim. The common result of that lesson is more violence.

Women make up the majority of victims, but men are not immune. For men, the odds are that one in four women who will be assaulted will include your mother, your wife, your girlfriend, your sister or your daughter. Some 40,000 New Brunswick women will be assaulted this year, sometimes repeatedly.

The Miramichi Anti-Violence Committee wants to send a clear message to men and women alike that violence is never justified in resolving a dispute. No woman deserves to be hit. No man is justified in hitting a woman.

We want to send a message to society at large that violence against women is not a women's issue. It touches us all. It must no longer be tolerated.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, last Tuesday we witnessed members of the government vote one by one to defeat a private member's proposal for a children's bill of rights.

Last Friday, an Ontario judge ordered the eviction of a two year old child and her family because her crying, while teething, annoyed her neighbours. Any mother who has walked the floor with a teething child will be shocked by this ruling.

What is worse is that the judge ruled that because the parents did not do anything about it, they are out, because for them to stay would be unfair to neighbours.

What would the judge have had the parents do, gag the baby, or drug the baby? Surely, Madam Speaker, you would agree that if we react to a child in so much pain that she is screaming by casting her from us, by throwing her out of her home, then indeed Canada is a society that desperately needs a children's bill of rights, and soon.

This government claims to have embraced the UN Declaration on the Rights of the Child. Surely, these rights must extend to a child who is crying in pain.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH CENTRE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, the International Development Research Centre, better known as the IDRC, is well known to all of us.

It has recently published a new document entitled, The Global Research Agenda: A South–North Perspective. It is the first in a series of opinion documents produced on global issues of international development of concern to all Canadians.

This particular document points out the direction of scientific effort needed to solve world problems such as the precarious state of the environment, population growth, the debt crisis, the drug menace, all of which threaten peace and security.

Through support for research, IDRC assists developing countries in creating their own long–term solutions to pressing development problems.

On the occasion of its twentieth anniversary, IDRC has published this book to share some of the knowledge it has gained over the years of forging international research and scientific links.

The president has kindly made sure that there are enough copies for all members of the House. I strongly encourage that each member read this timely document.

NATIONAL AIDS STRATEGY

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, on April 7, 1989, the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated: "AIDS is a problem that respects no national borders."

The spread of this disease is not waiting for a national AIDS strategy, but its victims have been waiting for a long, long time.

Back in November, 1989, The Toronto Star reported that one in every 394 women who gave birth in Montreal early this year was carrying the virus that causes AIDS.

According to the latest update from the Federal Centre for AIDS, Canada has 51 cases of children less than 15 years of age who have AIDS.

Over 2,000 individuals have fallen prey to this lethal disease. How many more must fall victim to a government that lacks the political will to move effectively and urgently?

The delaying of a national AIDS strategy and the lack of a commitment by the Government of Canada is causing us to lose valuable time.

While we lose time, Canadian families are losing loved ones. Recently in Atlantic Canada, individuals from the four Atlantic provinces came together in a conference called the Atlantic Network on AIDS. There was a consensus reached at that particular conference that the Government of Canada must show some real leadership in fighting this lethal disease.

I urge the minister and the Prime Minister to take their responsibilities seriously and move forward with a national AIDS strategy immediately.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise to applaud the measures announced Friday by the Minister of Agriculture to assist the incomes of Canadian farmers this year.

In order to especially address the serious cash flow problems in the grains and oilseeds sector, the federal government has committed $500 million which, when matched by the provinces, will address the projected shortfall in farm income this year.

Agriculture is a shared federal–provincial jurisdiction. The federal government will work with the provinces to design the best approach in each province, consistent with the four pillars of the Growing Together strategy. The assistance must be delivered in ways that are production neutral, environmentally sustainable and lead into the transition toward a long–term comprehensive farm safety net.

These measures are further tangible proof of this government's ongoing commitment to stand behind Canadian producers.

YUKON LAND CLAIM AGREEMENT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I wish to applaud the settlement of the Yukon First Nations land claim.

Many people have put their lives and their hearts into these negotiations on behalf of their people. In fact, in 1905, Chief Jim Boss first advocated the justice of a land claim in the Yukon. Negotiations which have settled this claim have taken place over the last 17 years.

Yesterday, in celebration of the claim, I was pleased to see three members who came down to Ottawa in 1973 to advocate that land claim. They were the respected Indian elder Elijah Smith, the creator of the Yukon Native Brotherhood, Judy Gingell, the Chair of the Council of Yukon Indians and Sam Johnston, the present Speaker of the Yukon Legislature.

I also congratulate the Yukon territorial government, the federal government and the work of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in reaching this settlement which is a model of consensus making.

In celebrating this, I would urge the minister to continue his strong work on behalf of the Dene–Métis claims so that we can have true justice for land claims in the north of Canada.

FATHER RUFINO NICCACCI

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to share with the House a glorious moment in the life of our country that occurred last night in Toronto.

Over 700 members of the Canadian Italian and Jewish communities in Toronto, with many others packed a hall to honour the memory of a Franciscan monk, Father Rufino Niccacci of Assisi, Italy who, during the Nazi holocaust in Italy, helped to save thousands of Jews from destruction. His success owed much to the support of the entire population of Assisi, who also risked their lives to shield and protect fellow citizens whose only offence was to be Jewish.

Here in Canada decades later, we reflected on the watchword of Father Rufino Niccacci drawn from the Bible: "I am my brother's keeper" and we committed ourselves to struggle against discrimination and racism. We launched and funded a new joint committee to take up this mission.

The beautiful face of multiculturalism was radiant in Toronto last night.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, this past weekend marked the expiry of the FRDA between the federal government and my province of British Columbia.

Across Canada these agreements represent the largest environmental rehabilitation program ever undertaken, as well as one of the finest examples of the benefits of federal–provincial co–operation.

Moreover, the agreement represents thousands of jobs, not just jobs for today but jobs for future generations.

On behalf of the people of British Columbia I am stating emphatically that although the agreement has expired, we must not allow the FRDA initiative to die. The original agreement accomplished a lot. The new agreement that we must negotiate will do likewise.

Few government initiatives are as essential for both environmental and economic reasons. We must insist on the early renewal of this agreement.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, the Conservative government's plan to tax every service we receive from the time we are born until we die demonstrates that this government does not care about the people of this country or what they are going through.

The proposed goods and services tax will be applied to the cost of funeral arrangements. It will have a dramatic impact on the bereaved citizens of Canada.

The effect of the GST on such services as the prepaid funeral arrangement will cause an administrative nightmare for those in the funeral business.

Funeral services should be considered a final extension of the health care services in this country and should, therefore, remain tax exempt.

A government tax should not be imposed on the cost of having one's loved one taken away from them.

The government is demonstrating a total lack of appreciation for the sensitivity toward people that must be constantly practised by those in the funeral business.

Once again, this government has demonstrated a lack of respect for the people of this country, those who are alive as well as those who have deceased.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, in Rouyn-Noranda on April 10 and 11, this year, an important event will take place and I am referring to the international symposium on grass ensilage. The purpose of the symposium is to discuss all aspects of ensilage, a modern technology that has played an important role of in the development of agriculture in Eastern Canada. There will be discussions on preserving ensilage and on livestock performance in relation to ensilage processing. Some of our foremost researchers from North America and Europe will be heard during this conference.

In addition to farmers in Abitibi—Témiscamingue and Northern Ontario, participants will include farmers from Eastern Canada, agronomists, technicians, veterinarians, researchers, university experts and farm input distributors.

Congratulations to the agri-food research council of Abitibi—Témiscamingue for deciding to organize this type of prestige event in Abitibi—Témiscamingue!

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, slowly and relentlessly we see the whole manifestation of the so-called free trade agreement with the United States and Canada unfold.

Part of the plot is now more evident than ever before. The United States decision to enter unilateral negotiations with Mexico for a free trade agreement with that country places Canada between a rock and a hard place.

This government has given up all the leverage it had in the control of our resources. Now, with access by the United States to a Mexico free trade agreement, we will not be in a position to protect what is left of Canadian industry.

This country's economy and control of its resources are at peril.

I ask the government to either come clean on this deal and tell us whether or not it is in a trilateral agreement with Mexico, or cancel the free trade agreement with the United States before it is too late.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

I want to ask the government questions about the crises it is failing to deal with in two key sectors of our economy—agriculture and the fishery.

So far, the government has failed to come up with any meaningful plan of action for the fishery. Last Friday, it came up with a totally inadequate plan of financial help for our farmers, but only if it was matched by the provinces themselves.

Even Conservative Premier Devine of Saskatchewan could not accept this. He said his province could not afford to pay any more and that it alone needed $500 million just so its farmers could get their seed into the ground this spring.

When is the government going to recognize the crisis in agriculture and come up with a truly meaningful plan for our farmers, something that will help them survive and contribute to our economy?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the government has recognized the problem in agriculture and the problem in the fisheries.

With respect to the problem in agriculture, there was an announcement made by the Deputy Prime Minister last week that up to $500 million would be available to provide assistance to farmers in 1990, contingent on provincial participation.

Why provincial participation? Because the provinces, of course, share constitutional jurisdiction over agriculture with the Government of Canada.

I would like to point out to the Leader of the Opposition something he may not know. In 1988–89, the total federal spending on agriculture was almost two and a half times that of all the provinces combined. Thus there can be no argument that we are not doing our share in helping to meet the needs of the agricultural sector, particularly when we recognize the financial difficulties that face the Government of Canada as it faces the provinces. Unfortunately, our position is even a more stringent one than theirs when you look at the proportion of our revenue that goes to service the debt.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister in his answer for the government totally overlooks the fact that in the coming year, realized net incomes are forecast to drop 54 per cent in Alberta, 87 per cent in Manitoba and 101 per cent in Saskatchewan.

Under these circumstances where does the minister think the provinces in question, especially Saskatchewan, are going to get the funds to match the federal offer?

What he is saying is totally unrealistic and overlooks the federal role in the matter, especially with the international causes of some of these problems.

I want to give the minister a chance to see if he can do any better when it comes to an answer to a question about the fisheries.

In its throne speech of April 3, 1989—one year ago tomorrow—the government pledged to reduce predatory overfishing. Yet, whenever the issue of foreign overfishing has come up in the past year, whether it is caused by the Americans, the Portuguese or the French, the government has totally failed to accept the fact that foreign overfishing has anything to do with the crisis in the east coast fishery.

In the just released report commissioned by the government, Dr. Harris states: "Given the near desperate state of the inshore fishery along the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador, there should be no question of foreign allocations". Dr. Harris went on to say:

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member please put his question?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): "All foreign overfishing within the 200-mile zone should be terminated at the earliest possible date and there should be an immediate reduction in the level of foreign overfishing".

Does the government accept that recommendation? If not, why not? If yes, why will the government not announce today an end to all foreign overfishing in Canadian waters?

• (1420)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, where is the member for Gander—Twillingate when the members need him?

This was a two-sided question. With respect to agriculture, the problems are not caused just by an international trade war, although that is certainly one of the causes. The causes of the problem include drought, debt, increased costs, prices continuing before trend lines, and the like. The Government of Canada is prepared to be flexible with respect to how the $500 million it is allocating can be spent and for what programs it can be used.

With respect to the question of the fishery, the present Government of Canada recognized before Mr. Harris was even appointed the problem we had from overfishing in the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, particularly by the European Community.

Mr. Robichaud: What have you done about it?

Mr. Crosbie: What we have done about it is lead a vigorous international campaign that had quite substantial results. Last fall, at the meeting of NAFO—

Mr. Robichaud: And they're still overfishing.

Mr. Crosbie: That campaign is being continued. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and I are visiting the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the European Community in Ireland on Wednesday for a meeting on this very subject.

On Thursday, we will be visiting Brussels where we are going to meet with Commissioner Morin, the Fisheries Commissioner of the European Community.

We are keeping the pressure on. We hope to see further improvements with respect to foreign overfishing.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has been good enough to list a number of the causes for the crisis in Canadian agriculture. It is too bad he did not mention another major cause—high interest rates caused directly by this government's support of the policy of the Bank of Canada.

The minister is also telling us about the very interesting foreign trip he is going to take. I hope he enjoys himself, at least when he is in Ireland. But I want to ask him in particular why the government does not take steps to end foreign overfishing in waters that are clearly Canadian.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in his report, Mr. Harris said that all foreign fishing activity should be stopped as soon as possible and that overfishing by foreign fleets should be terminated immediately.

Mr. Speaker, does the minister accept Mr. Harris' analysis and especially recommendation No. 6? If so, will he take the necessary action today?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the House is lucky that the hon. member does not have the Encyclopaedia Britannica with him or he would be reading that.

With respect to the question of interest rates, the hon. gentleman has probably got the greatest length of service in the House of any of us. In every year he served in government, he supported a government that supported the Bank of Canada. Through the years when interest rates when to 22 per cent and 23 per cent that hon. gentleman supported the Bank of Canada and supported the then Liberal government. Why does he come forward with such a hypocritical question, Mr. Speaker, when we are carrying on a tradition he started?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a similar question dealing with the farm issue and the totally pitiful response the government made on Friday.

Mr. Speaker: This exchange has gone on for quite a long time. I would ask the hon. member to be as direct as he can.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not realize that the government has already cut close to $10 billion in transfer payments to the western provinces?

Does he not realize that agriculture is clearly a federal responsibility because of the international situation?

Does he not realize the program announced on Friday is going to discriminate against the smaller prairie provinces because they simply cannot afford the matching grants? Therefore in the western provinces the family farm will go down the tubes. Does the government not recognize that basic reality about the situation in western Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know the House realizes by now that simple statements by the hon. gentleman opposite does not mean that they are factually correct. The statement alleged to be factual in that preamble was certainly not correct.

Does the hon. gentleman realize that the western provinces, for example, have a very favourable financial position with respect to servicing debt as compared to the Government of Canada, and that 35 cents out of every revenue dollar of the Government of Canada we cannot control? That goes in paying interest, mostly on the debt that the hon. gentleman racked up while he was here with the last government. This is in comparison to the position in Saskatchewan where I believe they pay around 9 cents of the revenue dollar to service their debt. In Alberta it is 8 cents per revenue dollar, and so on.

Despite this, the government spent two and one–half times more than all the provinces combined in agriculture in the year 1988–89. Does the hon. gentleman realize that? Does he realize that provinces have equal responsibility with the Government of Canada in the field of agriculture and that we are going forward with another offer which we hope they will match? We are prepared to be flexible, and we are waiting for their response.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to point out to the minister these realities. Thirty per cent of western Canadian farmers are in danger of losing their farms. Farm income in 1990, according to StatsCanada, in Manitoba alone will drop by 75 per cent. In Saskatchewan there will be an 85 per cent drop. In Alberta there will be a 66 per cent drop. The farmers cannot face that kind of situation without federal aid.

I want to ask the government this. Why is it in the interests of the Tory government to defend the ill-begotten designs of the Minister of Finance rather than defending the western Canadian farmer as it should?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this government is defending the interests of every person who lives in Canada by trying to save this country's credit and financial resources and by trying to get flexibility and strength back for the future. We are doing that by still continuing to meet the needs of the farmers with this $500 million offer and other offers that will be made in connection with the fishery in the next few days.

That is what we are attempting to do while the hon. gentleman opposite has not got one constructive suggestion to put forward.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of women.

Once again, the government is trying to silence the voices of legitimate protest in this country. It is trying to make sure that the normal exercise of democracy cannot take place.

This morning in St. John's, Newfoundland, approximately 25 women were arrested. What were they arrested for? For trying to send a fax to the Secretary of State to protest the cuts to women's centres. They simply wanted to express their views.

I ask the minister who is responsible, I will remind her, for the status of women, will she press for these charges to be dropped against these women who are simply standing up for their rights?

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to set the record straight on this incident that happened this morning.

We are aware that in the last few days of last week there were demonstrations within the Secretary of State office in St. John's. Those persons left on the weekend.

In order to secure the documents within our Secretary of State office, as well as to service the public, the Secretary of State hired two additional security people, one for the outside and one for the inside of the office.

This morning about 25 women came into that office in spite of the security being there. They came into the office. They occupied the office. The security people asked them to leave. They did not leave. The security people asked the police to come and speak to the demonstrators in the Secretary of State office.

I wish to clarify that the police spoke to those 25 women and told them of the repercussions if they did not leave the office. They did not leave the office. They said they would leave, the police left, and then the lawyer for those women advised them what should happen.

What happened is that they were arrested and released—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should proceed. The hon. member for Yukon.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. The fact is that these women were peacefully trying to send a letter.

An Hon. Member: Fire the guards and spend the money.

Ms. McLaughlin: Obviously the Minister responsible for the Status of Women refuses to drop the charges against these women.

Now my question for the minister is on another subject. The pattern is very clear: demonstrators are arrested on the Hill, native people's communications programs are ended, debate on the GST in Parliament is interrupted and Canadian women are ignored. Is the minister prepared to assume her responsibilities in Cabinet and fight to restore the programs for the women of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my hon. colleague would not be condoning anyone breaking the law under any circumstances.

What I would like to bring to her attention is that my colleague, the Secretary of State, last week advised this House that a special allocation of project funding had been made available to the provinces of Newfoundland and British Columbia whose senior officials went to Newfoundland last week and met with officials of the women's centres to assist them in deciding on how they wished to proceed. The money is there. It is available for the women's centres if they wish to take advantage of it.

I would also like to point out to my hon. colleague that this government has undertaken considerable efforts for the women of Newfoundland. Just a few months ago the government opened a women's enterprise centre in St. John's, Newfoundland with the support of $800,000 from the Atlantic Opportunities Agency. That is an example of the variety of ways in which we can support services for women in Newfoundland and across this country.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

I think the minister has her priorities mixed up. Next she will be sending in the army against the women of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women at the time of the budget cuts said that they would be "potentially devastating". Surely, if the minister is willing to listen to the women of Canada, they are saying that they are devastating now. These are services for battered women, for women with family problems, to assist women to get into the job market. They are essential services.

Will the minister reinstate core funding for these women's centres? She knows that project funding alone cannot keep these centres going and that it is core funding we are talking about.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to get the record straight. First, the women's program of the Secretary of State is a limited program to fund advocacy and education activities of women's organizations. It is not designed to support services for women. Very clearly, in the terms of reference for the women's program, it says it does not fund services for women.

In terms of the services for women in the provinces of Ontario, the province of Manitoba, and to a great degree the province of Quebec, it is the provincial government which bears that responsibility, using 50–cent dollars under the Canada Assistance Plan. We should be working as the province of British Columbia, my colleague has said, on a task force to look at the appropriate way, a better funded way, in which to provide services for women in the provinces of British Columbia and Newfoundland where the provincial governments have not picked up this aspect.

I am prepared to work with them, I hope that they will as well, to ensure that these services can be provided for.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the acting minister of fisheries, the acting Prime Minister, in his latest of many acting roles.

He will be aware that the very first recommendation of the Harris panel on northern cod suggests that as a matter of urgency there ought to be an immediate reduction in fishing mortality and that the effects of that recommendation would be to bring the catch effort down as low as 87,000 metric tons by 1992, as compared to 197,000 now.

If the government is prepared to endorse and implement that recommendation, what does it have in mind in so far as the terrible conditions that will prevail for the fishermen and plant workers involved? What initiatives will be taken to protect these people if that recommendation is implemented?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has stated that he shares the view of Dr. Harris and his panel that the northern cod stock is in decline and that unless steps are taken the whole fishery will be affected.

He has also stated that the total allowable catch with respect to northern cod will remain this year at 197,000 tonnes, which is a 69,000 tonne reduction as compared to two years ago. The minister will have to make a decision this coming fall with respect to what reduction may be necessary for purposes of conservation in view of the present situation. He will have to make that decision this fall in light of the information that is then available, including information that will be made available from expanded and increased research efforts out on the fishing grounds, to try to get more and better information on just state of the fish stocks.

I can only say that the minister understands the seriousness of the situation and will be making a very careful decision based on all information available next fall with respect to the year 1990–91. With respect to those affected by any such decision, there is already a $130 million program in effect. I will not go into the details, but the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will be announcing further steps to assist those who are having difficulties as a result of this situation within the next week or so.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, also in the same report Dr. Harris and his people recommend that the government seek international agreement to permit Canada's management of the fish stocks on the entire Canadian continental shelf and, failing that, take unilateral action to acquire management rights.

This is the latest group. Last week it was the Fisheries Council. The Liberal caucus has been saying it to the minister for many months in this House and outside. The minister's good buddy, Dick Cashin, and the union have been saying it for a year or two as well.

How many times has the government to be told of the wisdom of taking this particular action? Would it finally take the advice of Dr. Harris, get on with the job, and get the foreigners out of the way so we can have some fish for our own people?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that is a very simplistic question. He also knows that the government that preceded ours and was in office for some 20 years, a very long period of time, took the position that it could not take unilateral action to extend jurisdiction, even to extend the 12–mile limit and certainly not to go beyond 200.

Unilateral action on our part would not be observed by other nations of the world. It would be completely useless and, not only that, extremely damaging to Canada. We are pursuing all avenues available to us under international law, including conferring with other coastal states to see if we can have recognized in international law the rights of the coastal state over straddling stocks.

We are going to have a renewed, reinvigorated and expanded campaign to try to persuade Spain, Portugal and the European Community to observe the NAFO quotas this year. That is a continuing campaign. There are two meetings this week to pursue that.

We are going to continue with all means at our disposal to see that these objectives are realized, both the ones that Dr. Harris wants and that we want.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for fisheries, or I should say who is still answering for fisheries.

The Harris report talks of extending fishing zones and foreign overfishing, but also mentions things the government could do now like banning fishing during the spawning period, better surveillance and protection and, most important of all, improved and increased scientific effort on northern cod.

Is the government prepared to act immediately, not next fall or next year, but immediately on these recommendations of the Harris report?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was on Friday and over the weekend and is today and will be tomorrow, when I will be accompanying him, consulting with members of the industry, with those involved in the fisheries unions that represent the workers, and with provincial governments and advising them of what steps we now propose to take. Within the next few days he will be announcing the concrete steps the government is to take in connection with the Harris report recommendations.

I think this will be action that any reasonable member of this House will support and will realize should go a long way in meeting this problem. These actions will certainly include greatly expanded acquisition of facilities, efforts and expenditures with reference to scientific research off the east coast of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, we are still hearing lots of words—big words with little meaning. We are told that consultation is still going on but nevertheless, the government has long known about a crisis in the Atlantic, even if the Prime Minister denied it.

All those concerned with the fishery agree that the government must act right away, that it must do something!

Mr. Masse: Lying words!

Mr. Robichaud: So why does the minister hesitate to tell us this very day what they are prepared to do? Why are they reluctant to mention the billion-dollar aid program the fishermen were promised? Where is this program?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to observe the inconsistent ways in which the hon. gentleman approaches the problem.

The Harris report was made public last Friday. Today is Monday. If the government acted now without any consultation whatsoever with provincial premiers, fisheries ministers, the industry and the unions, the opposition would be in a state of outrage and high dudgeon, and of course the media would report that fact.

We are taking a couple of days to advise all these groups of the actions that we have decided to take and what our program is to be. There will be a public announcement within a few days. We are just observing proper courtesies in giving people that we are dealing with in the four Atlantic provinces a chance to give us their reaction to what we propose to do. At that time the announcement will be made.

If we did not do that, the hon. gentleman would be up claiming that we were not consulting with the provinces.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister for International Trade.

In response to the crisis in the Atlantic fishery, we have seen this government just refuse to put up any new money to save these communities. We have heard a lot about the $130 million, but we all know that was money which was previously allocated to the Atlantic region.

We have seen too, just today, that the government will not reduce the TAC to save the fishery resource. We have seen that it does not want to take unilateral action to take jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Bank. We wonder what the government is going to do with the Harris report.

Let me ask the minister about another recommendation from the Harris report and other reports which suggest that communities should share the pain of the Atlantic and that we do this by community quotas for the fishery.

National Sea has closed its operations in Canso and is attempting to move its trawlers elsewhere. Is the minister prepared to reconsider the refusal to examine community based quotas in light of the support extended by these recent reports and the needs of communities like Canso?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the question of community quotas is one that has been examined in the past. It was examined, for example, by Mr. Michael Kirby when he was appointed by the last government to examine the fishery.

Mr. Michael Kirby in that report, in published speeches made in the last month or so and in newspaper articles has pointed out that economically it would be suicide for the east coast fishery if we were to have a system of community quotas. This is the advice that we have received from the experts who have studied the subject, including Mr. Michael Kirby.

We will, of course, continue to examine that issue to see if there is any variation on that suggestion that could be carried out. With respect to wondering what the government is doing, there is a $130 million program. It is not money that was already previously assigned to Atlantic Canada. That is simply 100 per cent incorrect.

It is money under the POWA program, the program for older workers, that was never assigned before. It is money for a program leading up to the POWA program for those aged 50 to 54, a new program unheard of in Canada before. It is a community development fund when there was never any community development fund before in the fishing industry of Canada. That is all money that was not assigned to Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I guess the answer to that Harris recommendation is no as well.

Atlantic Canadians are not just waiting for the $130 million. They are waiting for resources to save their communities. I wonder whether this government is going to accept any of the 29 Harris recommendations. For example, is it going to accept the recommendation that more resources are needed for surveillance and enforcement or are we just going to have to sit and then get another no answer? Atlantic Canadians want action. They do not want more talk.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is a little premature in urging immediate action. The report was made public last Friday. The minister is in the process of consulting interested parties today. The minister will be making an announcement in the next few days.

With reference to the question of whether we are going to put more resources into scientific investigation, enforcement and surveillance, I can put the hon. gentleman's mind at rest now. The answer is yes, y–e–s. The hon. gentleman will now be able to sleep tonight.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. One year ago the government cut $500 million out of the budget of the Department of Agriculture. Last month it cut $441 million out of the Agriculture estimates.

The government has known since November that it would need to have a special program for western farmers to assist in their cash flow problems. The program announced last Friday by the Minister of Agriculture requires federal–provincial funding. Can the Acting Prime Minister assure western farmers that these funds will be paid before the end of the month?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, ongoing negotiations with officials are taking place all this week. When the ministers return this weekend we are hopeful that we can put together a package and have a response to the farmers of Canada.

At least by tabling and putting our $500 million on the table, it has sent a very strong signal to the farmers. I know the farmers in Ontario, the area I represent, feel quite positive that the federal government is supporting them. I know there is confidence out there already. I am quite sure an agreement will be reached with the provinces very quickly.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, last year the government cancelled the interest–free portion of the advance payments program. Last Friday it announced that FCC interest rates will go up to 14.25 per cent. These are interest rates beyond all reason. Last Friday the government stated in that announcement that there would be billions of dollars of assistance through the prairie grain advance payments program.

Can the Acting Prime Minister or the Acting Minister of Agriculture clarify if the interest-free portion of the prairie grain advance payments program is going to be reinstated so that farmers will be able to stay on their farms and have funds to plant a crop this spring.

• (1450)

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government is not going to reintroduce the interest-free portion of the advance payments program.

An Hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Cardiff: There is no shame in doing that. We have come out with much better programs that meet the needs of farmers of today. The programs that were announced last Friday show that this government is responding to the needs of farmers in Canada, more than any other government. We are not ashamed of that at all.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

This government is escalating its war on women, it is escalating its war on democracy.

In Newfoundland, thousands of women are being thrown out of work as fish plants close. Their families are disintegrating because of the disintegration of the fishing industry. Their communities are falling apart around them. They are turning to women's centres to help keep body and soul together and to keep their sanity.

Will the minister urge her government to apologize to the women of St. John's, Newfoundland?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): First of all, I am surprised that the hon. member would be discussing this. I understand there were a few incidents at the Liberal leadership forum in Winnipeg where the Liberal party did not seem too interested in hearing the voices of opposition.

I really think it is important. Certainly there is a right to legitimate protest. But when demonstrators come into a government office and after a reasonable period of time, after a number of requests, refuse to leave and therefore impede the progress of proper government business, obviously some actions have to be taken.

Why I am most surprised at the member asking is that last week the Secretary of State said in this House that he sent his officials to Newfoundland to work with the women's centres of Newfoundland to assist them in providing project funding which will enable them for a period of time to continue with their services until they can find other resources, and to work with the province. There will be an appropriate funding agency for the ongoing services of women.

We are making every effort. We are making efforts such as the opening of the Women's Enterprise Centre in St. John's, Newfoundland.

I think the hon. member should be applauding those efforts we are making on behalf of women of this country.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister has absolutely no idea how pompous and condescending she looks to the women out there.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will put her question.

Mrs. Catterall: Will the minister apologize for her attitude? Will she insist on the restoration of funding to women's centres? Will she stop defending a government that is doing battle against women?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Perhaps the member has not listened. Time and time again I have told the member of the programs and the work of this government in support of women, in support of the project funding for women's centres and women's organizations and the money that is available to assist with family violence right across this country. The women from the Canadian Jobs Strategy Program assists women in training and finding a job. The member is not interested in listening to that. We are the government that is finding long term, real solutions to these fundamental programs to assist women in this country.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Agriculture, whoever that might be.

Seeding is going to start any day now. Farmers were expecting a federal aid package which would put cash in their hand to help pay for the fuel, fertilizer and the seed. Instead, last Friday they received notice of another costly hike in Farm Credit Corporation interest rates and a farm aid package that is conditional on sharing with the provinces. That process of sharing with the provinces is going to take a lot of negotiation.

Does the government have a time frame within which it will complete the negotiations with the provinces, or does it intend to let the farmers hang out to dry while it and its counterparts in the provinces bicker and quarrel?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention of delaying this any longer than possible. The quicker we can reach an agreement with the provinces, the quicker the dollars will be in the producers' hands. As I said earlier, negotiations and discussions are taking place with officials all this week and we are hopeful that there will be an early resolve and an agreement.

I want to remind the hon. member of what our minister said earlier, that agriculture is a shared responsibility. It is as difficult for us to raise funds as it is for the provinces. That is why we are asking the provinces to share in helping the farmers of this great country.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, this is an emergency and the time needs to be as short as possible, not as long as possible. What does the government intend to do if it does not reach a cost-sharing agreement with one of the provinces? Does the government simply leave those farmers out to dry?

Only an hour ago in Saskatchewan the Minister of Agriculture and all the farm leaders indicated that they sincerely believe that this is a federal responsibility and that they should not have to put up money.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, it is a shared responsibility. We intend to be successful in our negotiations. If you go into negotiations with the thought that you are going to fail, you will fail, but we are not going to fail.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, last week in this House I asked the Minister of Transport two specific questions about Pearson International Airport, one about the security system in place and the other about the crowding in the skies.

We were told, at that time, and I quote: "The system at Pearson is working and it is working safety". Three days later, the Canadian Aviation Safety Board came out with a report which says, and I quote: "Urgent ministerial attention is required to correct 48 identified deficiencies at Pearson International Airport, to ensure the safe separation of aircraft". Which position is correct?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the Canadian Aviation Safety Board's report. We have been studying it carefully. Many of the deficiencies which they reported on have already been activated. We have hired and are training some 360 air traffic controllers. We have doubled the training capacity to 312 since 1988. We have been rehiring former controllers and retirees and taking other measures to make sure that the Canadian skies are safe.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the same minister. We hear a lot about air traffic controllers. In 1985 there were 1,893 air traffic controllers employed in Canada. On January 1, 1990, there were only 1,500 .That is in a period of time when these people opposite had administration of this government.

Point of Order

In that same report it states that the unsafe conditions that from time to time develop to the point where there is a real risk of collision are cause for continuing concern. Will the minister forgo the 90 day clause in studying these 48 recommendations that CASB has introduced and has said needed the minister's immediate attention? Will the minister implement them as his predecessor implemented very good recommendations made by CASB during his term as Minister of Transport?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would encourage my hon. friend, who I know is quite serious in his question, not to confuse the 90-day period within which we have to report to the House with the time frame for taking action. Action has been taken on several of those recommendations. We think they were helpful recommendations and we are working to improve safety in the air. I maintain, I repeat, and I assure my friend that the skies are safe.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister will know that the March 31 deadline for the Dene-Métis claims has come and gone. The Dene-Métis chief negotiator was clearly prepared to initial the deal, with the full knowledge that a majority of the Dene-Métis support this claim. However, when the time came, Mr. David Osborne, the federal negotiator refused to have the agreement initialled. Will the minister explain why the federal negotiator has taken this decision after pushing 20 some odd years for completion of this claim?

• (1500)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the Western Arctic for her question. I want to tell all members of the House how proud we are that the Council of Yukon Indians early yesterday morning was able to conclude an historic agreement, a piece of unfinished business of some 120 years duration.

I think some members of this House can take some pride and some credit for the contribution they made toward this successful outcome. It is a model for the conclusion we seek with all native communities of Canada and in particular the Dene Métis of the western Arctic.

In regard to the specific question of the hon. member, I will be meeting our negotiator later today. I have already undertaken to meet the executive of the Dene Métis. I can tell members of this House that after nine hours over the deadline and having come to a point of hopefully being able to initial some of the substantive elements of the agreement, at that point, at 9 a.m. yesterday morning, a group among the leaders of the Dene Métis said they could not support this agreement. As a result the agreement would not give the certainty that all parties need to ensure final agreement. It was on that basis that our negotiator decided to our great disappointment that this agreement could not be concluded.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, given that it is unlikely that such a deal will ever be able to be renegotiated by the Dene Métis if this claim is taken off the table, will the minister assure the House and the people of the Northwest Territories that this government will not take the Dene Métis claim off the table at least until the Dene Métis have had an opportunity to review, and perhaps approve and initial this agreement at an upcoming Dene Métis joint assembly.

I appeal on behalf of the Dene Métis for another opportunity. Let's not waste the $38 million investment on negotiations to date and an opportunity to do the right thing.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for the Western Arctic, the Government of the Northwest Territories, the Dene Métis people, and indeed, all of the people of Canada would want to see this important accord reached. I am sure the hon. member does not want to be pessimistic. I know that she shares the hope that we will successfully find a way to conclude this agreement. Until I am debriefed by the negotiator and have had a chance to discuss these matters further with my colleagues, I cannot make any undertakings as to where this matter might lead.

MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On March 30, 1990 the hon. member for Kamloops rose on a point of order to express his concern about the procedural acceptability of the finance committee's report on Bill C–62, the goods and services tax bill.

The hon. member recalled that on March 21, the actions of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, the hon. member for Mississauga South, were raised in the House as a possible breach of privilege. These were dealt with by the Chair in the ruling of March 26.

The hon. member indicated that since the committee's report and evidence was now formally before the House this was the appropriate time to challenge the procedural acceptability of the report which he alleges is based on irregular proceedings.

In his comments the hon. member for Kamloops addressed a number of serious issues. Many other hon. members from both sides of the House also presented strong arguments on different aspects of the situation. As your Speaker, I am aware of the deep concern surrounding this matter and the events which transpired in the finance committee on the night of March 20, 1990.

One side of the House argues that while the opposition has the right to oppose, the government has the right and indeed the responsibility to govern and to advance its legislative agenda. From that perspective the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader contended that the chairman of the finance committee had the obligation to maintain order by ending an opposition filibuster and so permitting the committee to consider and vote on each clause of the bill and to report the bill back to the House as it had been mandated to do.

The other side of the House argues that the majority has the right to govern, but that right is not absolutely unfettered. As the hon. member for Kamloops and others have argued, through the rules it has adopted for the conduct of business, the House itself places certain limitations on the right of the majority and so ensures that the rights of the minority are protected. They contend that certain actions taken by the chairman of the finance committee were in violation of these established rules and that the report of the committee should therefore be ruled procedurally irreceivable thus firmly establishing a precedent whereby committee chairman cannot make arbitrary rulings.

Point of Order

Your Speaker is acutely aware of the sensitive nature of the questions raised by this case and of the message which this ruling will send to other committees, both in this Parliament and future Parliaments.

I ask hon. members to bear with me as I give you the perspective of the Chair on the procedural implications of the case before us.

First, a comment which I made in my ruling on March 26 at page 9756 of Hansard bears repeating:

> The Speaker has often informed the House that matters and procedural issues that arise in committee ought to be settled in committee unless the committee reports them first to the House. I have, however, said to the House that this practice is not an absolute one and that in very serious and special circumstances the Speaker may have to pronounce on a committee matter without the committee having reported to the House.

[English]

For the record I wish to indicate that the finance committee has not reported on an alleged breach of privilege or on some other irregularity. It simply reported Bill C–62 with amendments.

The Chair must again reiterate that under normal circumstances the House is only seized with matters occurring in committees when those matters are reported to the House. I refer hon. members to Citation 76 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition and to illustrate this practice to the report of the Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Committee tabled on April 28, 1987.

However, as I explained on March 26, 1990, the Chair is prepared to deal with extraordinary situations which may occur in committees without a formal report on the occurrence.

First, let us deal with the primary practical issue the Chair is being asked to resolve, namely, whether or not the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on Bill C–62 is receivable. I have carefully reviewed the arguments presented by the hon. member for Kamloops and the comments made by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands and the hon. member for Edmonton East. I have examined as well a ruling referred to by the Hon. Member for Kamloops, a ruling which was made some 70 years ago pertaining to the authority of the Speaker to go back to the proceedings of a committee in order to judge whether a report is in order. On July 1,

> The point of order as to the proceedings in the committee should be raised in the committee. The House is only seized of the proceedings of the committee from the report that it gets from the committee. There is no reference in the report whatever to any question having been raised in committee. Therefore, my ruling is that it is not competent for this House to go back to the report which is in its possession. The report of the committee is regular on its face. I therefore rule that the point of order is not well taken and that we are governed by the report of the committee as it appears before us.

I reflected at length on the Speaker's right to reach back beyond the report to the House and to the actual proceedings of the committee, and like Speaker Rhodes, I have concluded that it is not competent for the Chair to do so on a report whose regularity is not itself in question. It is important for hon. members and the viewing public to note that none of the complaints raised focus on the report of the committee per se. In the present case no one has complained that the amendments or the bill were not passed on majority votes.

Despite pressing invitations to do so by hon. members aggrieved by the events in the committee, the Chair must resist the temptation to go behind the report and ascertain whether or not other procedures were questionable. This would only invite a deterioration of the long-standing practice that committees are masters of their own proceedings. It would place the Speaker in the untenable position of standing in appeal to any decision of a chairman of standing, special and legislative committees, particularly in cases of high controversy and vigorous political debate like this one. This is not foreseen in our rules nor does our practice anywhere provide such a role for the Speaker. That being said I can only repeat the position I took on March 26.

Like the Speaker, a chairman is the servant of the body that elected him or her. The Chairman is accountable to the committee, and that committee should be the usual venue where his or her conduct is pronounced upon.

That is the tradition of the Canadian House of Commons. If I am to respect that tradition, I should therefore avoid any comment on the conduct of the hon. member for Mississauga South and let the committee deal further with the matter if it so desires.

• (1510)

[English]

The majority of the committee has decided not to report its dilemma to the House and I cannot substitute my judgment for theirs.

However, on the matter of whether this case constitutes a precedent, I want to be perfectly clear. Norman Wilding and Phillip Laundy's work entitled, An Encyclopaedia of Parliament, defines a precedent as:

> A previous decision by the Chair, or a well-established procedure or usage which serves as an authority or guide when a similar point or circumstance arises in Parliament.

In the ruling of March 26, I addressed the question of whether a 1984 incident in the justice and legal affairs committee constituted a precedent in the following manner, and I quote:

> What occurred was the series of events and decisions made by a majority in a committee. Neither this House nor the Speaker gave the incidents any value whatsoever in procedural terms. One must exercise caution in attaching guiding procedural flags to such incidents and happenings.

The same reasoning applies to the present case. The majority of members in a standing committee supported a decision of the chairman. The ensuing controversy which continues to preoccupy the House and your Speaker cannot lead us to describe this incident as a "well established procedure." If the current rules do not adequately provide for the consideration of business, then of course, hon. members know that there are avenues available for reviewing those rules and recommending changes.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice this morning that I wanted to rise at the earliest opportunity to bring to the attention of the House what I consider to be a very important precedent set here last Friday.

An historical event occurred in the House late in the afternoon on Friday which, in my view, had a serious effect on the privileges of members of the House.

I want to bring forth four arguments which I hope will convince you, Mr. Speaker, of the importance of the incident and possibly the remedy one could envisage or expect to correct the situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there are four points I wish to raise. First, this question of privilege affects all members of this House. I want Friday's opposition day to be instated because by asking for a quorum, the government breached the rights of members in debate, as far as I am concerned. Second, I not only want reinstatement of the first day of our spring supply period, 10 days that we as the opposition, are given under the Standing Orders to consider supply but I also want reinstatement of the votes to which we are entitled during those periods, since we are starting a new period provided by the government.

Mr. Speaker, in my comments I also want to consider the motion to instate the supply proceedings, a motion that, when moved at the beginning of a session, is not debatable but votable. In this case, we would introduce a new order, and I think I have a pretty good case that will convince the hon. member and the Chair to reinstate the votes. Lastly, I intend to put forward arguments regarding the powers of the committees of Parliament, the committees of this House, which at this moment have, or rather had, votes for consideration—the Estimates that were referred to various committees. This afternoon, for instance, a sub-committee on fitness and amateur sport of the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women is supposed to meet at four o'clock. I think it might be better for the committee not to consider the order of reference of this department's Estimates.

What happened Friday? Well, hon. members may have noticed that usually the Order Paper and Notice Paper, under Orders of the Day, contains a heading which reads: "Government Orders—Supply Proceedings. Consideration of the Business of Supply by the President of the Treasury Board ".

Friday, Mr. Speaker, was an opposition day—in the course of the year, the opposition has 25 days to consider a question of its own choosing—but under Government Orders. The government gives us 25 days; last Friday was the first day of the spring period. If it had been Monday the 26th, Mr. Speaker, I would have been a lot happier, because in that case, the government would probably have lost a lot more than just the order of reference or the "Consideration of the Business of Supply". They would have lost the very substantial amounts of money they need for government operations. Better luck next time, as they say.

Friday, the House was considering an opposition motion on the environment. I will read it since I seconded it, Mr. Speaker. The motion concerned the environment and "condemned the government for its lack of sincere commitment to the environment and for its vacuous discussion paper which completely fails to offer the concrete action that Canadians would like to see implemented".

I would refer hon. members to the motion itself which was moved by Ms. Copps of Hamilton and seconded by your humble servant.

So, the debate started in the course of the day, as usual, and there were several points of order, which of course prevented members from speaking to the motion. However, late that afternoon, we moved that the House not adjourn at the usual time but continue to debate the motion beyond the normal time of adjournment. This motion was moved by the hon. member for Chambly.

Since there were not 15 members in the House who objected to the motion, it was carried. Mr. Speaker, we practically had a whole day at our disposal, which meant that members could make speeches on this important motion which, as I said before, dealt with the environment.

At 4.30 p.m. or thereabouts, and I refer hon. members to page 1477 of the Votes and Proceedings for Friday, March 30, 1990:

> The attention of the Speaker having been drawn to the want of a quorum.

That was done by the government whip who, I should think, is intelligent enough to know what he was doing—in fact I know he is intelligent. It may be that working with the new leader, the government House leader, he too has developed a one-track mind about putting an end to the debate and muzzling members.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, calling for a quorum meant that members had to be counted. Quorum is at least 20 members, but there were not that many in the House. The bells rang for 15 minutes and still there were only 14 members, Mr. Speaker, including 13 from the opposition. No government member and no Cabinet minister were there.

Mr. Speaker, I will leave it to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands to point out that we have now recorded in the Votes and Proceedings the fact that none of the Cabinet ministers was in attendance. They were not in the House.

An Hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Gauthier: Indeed I will let the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands make that point, Mr. Speaker, because he is the one who now and then tries to convince the government that it should always have a minister in the House, particularly on a day when we are debating sypply, or authority for the government to spend money, which is subject to the approval of the House of Commons. After all, the government cannot spend money without the agreement of the House. The government introduces a supply motion in the House and seeks authority to spend money.

I will leave that argument to my colleague from Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Speaker, I want to get back to the argument about restoring the opposition day.

• (1520)

You know, Mr. Speaker, that Standing Order 67(1)(p) provides— Excuse me, I am getting a little ahead of myself.

We ask that the opposition day be restored, Mr. Speaker, because the government itself interrupted debate; the government itself stopped proceedings by asking for a quorum count; the government itself, by not appearing here in the House for the debate or the quorum count, caused them to be too few members in the House to continue the debate.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the business of supply, or the budget estimates, is to present Parliament with the government's budget and non-budget proposals for the coming fiscal year. By forcing adjournment of the House and of the debate on the business of supply, the government's chief whip has overridden the Order Paper and Notice Paper. Furthermore, we think that the government whip has prevented consideration of supply for the time being under a motion made in April 1989, you will recall, at the beginning of the second session of this Parliament by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret), who moved, "That the House consider the business of supply—" I will quote the English version of Hansard which I have in front of me.

[English]

At page 5 of House of Commons Debates, April 3, 1989, Business of Supply, moved by Mr. de Cotret, President of the Treasury Board:

> Mr. Speaker, I move, in accordance with Standing Order 81,
> That the House at its next sitting consider the business of supply.

The motion was agreed to and then there was a motion to adjourn by the then House Leader.

That is a continuing motion which stands on our Order Paper and allows for the supply proceedings which give the government the appropriations it needs to administer the country.

I believe, on the one hand, that the government by invoking quorum lost that item and also by its own doing caused that the day was lost to the opposition and therefore the privileges of all members to debate that motion were, in my view, breached by the government.

I want to refer to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, Fourth Edition at page 217 in reference to quorum.

> "(2) Whenever the speaker adjourns the house for want of a quorum, the time of the adjournment and the names of the members then present, shall be inserted in the Journal,"

That has been done, Mr. Speaker. It continues:

> Accordingly when the attention of the Speaker has been called to the fact that there is no quorum present, he will proceed at once to count the house, and if there are not twenty members present, including himself, the clerk will take down the names, and the Speaker will then adjourn the house without a question first put until the usual hour on the next sitting day (m).

It continues at page 218:

Which is the quorum call:

> —will always supersede any question that is before the house; and if an order of the day for supply, or for the reading or committal of a bill, be under consideration at the time, and there is no quorum present,—

And I repeat those words: "if an order of the day for supply", which was Friday last, Mr. Speaker, we find that it says in the Order Paper, "Supply Proceedings":

> —the house must be asked at a subsequent sitting to revive the question that may have lapsed in this way (p).

In searching out the precedents one has to go into history because, as I said previously, there is no precedent that I know of with regard to the government's actions of asking for a quorum and nullifying a day of the Opposition and therefore nullifying the supply proceedings.

It is interesting that I found a precedent and I want to remind Your Honour that this deals with a bill, not with a supply motion. There may be a difference. This deals with a supply motion of July 3, 1917 and Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I want to read from extracts of that debate because I find it most interesting and very enlightening.

There was a debate on a proposed motion by Sir Robert Borden for the second reading of a bill. It was an amendment proposed by Mr. Barrette. The argument reads at page 2877 of Hansard of July 3, 1917 that Sir Robert Borden moved, seconded by Mr. Cochrane:

> That the order of the day for "resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Robert Borden for the second reading of Bill No. 75, an Act respecting Military Service, the amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto, and the amendment to the amendment by Mr. Barrette," having lapsed by reason of the House being declared adjourned for want of a quorum on the 29th ultimo, when the said order was under consideration be revived and placed on the Order Paper for consideration this day.

They were trying to correct a similar event in 1917, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: Another Tory government.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, another Tory government.

Mr. Pugsley raised a point of order:

> No notice of this motion has been made by word of mouth, nor does it appear upon the Order Paper that this motion would be moved. I would submit, therefore, that it cannot be passed except by the unanimous consent of the House. I feel myself personally constrained to raise an objection to the motion and to urge that the rules of the House should be adhered to.

It made sense, Mr. Speaker. In order to reinstate that proposal dealing with supply, the government, which forgot to keep a quorum wanted to possibly play games with the House, did not want a quorum to embarrass the members of the House.

On Friday there was no Conservative member present in the House. The Conservatives all disappeared somewhere in the fog. It was snowing outside. There was a heck of a storm. I guess they wanted to get home and they left.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a wilful, knowingly—

An Hon. Member: A dirty trick.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, a dirty trick. It may be a dirty trick. I think the member is right. It was to embarrass the hon. member who had the floor.

Having been the authors of their own plot to embarrass by calling quorum we are faced with a government led by a House Leader who thinks nothing of imposing closure 35 times since the government came to power.

This is a form of gagging debate, a form of shutting up the members. The government called for a quorum and then members scrammed out of the House to make sure there was not a quorum.

There were 13 members of the opposition and the Speaker in the House. But not one single Tory member, not one, two, or three. Half a dozen would have been enough. They did not show up. They were gone, they were hiding purposely. Therefore, they should be punished. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, you should rule that that day was lost by their own planning and deed, and therefore should be restored to the House of Commons and to the Opposition. It should be restored to the Liberals because it was our day that was lost.

We will argue to the second point that the government has an obligation to restore the proceedings.

• (1530)

We report to this House through certain arrangements; certain proceedings are in place to make sure that these are orderly. The first job of the Speaker is to maintain order. There are standing committees of the House looking at the Estimates until the end of June. These people, seriously enough, are doing a job for Parliament. They are looking into every department's estimates, making sure that they are clearly and seriously examined by the people of Canada through their elected representatives and also making sure that the government, which has to bring in specific amounts of money for specific purposes, does not possibly get away with some expenditure which would not be approved by Parliament.

Having said that, we are trying to argue that the House must now be apprised of a procedure, a procedure which I admit has not existed. We looked for a precedent and there was none. There was no time, in my research, that a government under the British parliamentary system voted down, by not being in the House, its own estimates. I cannot find one. I looked all weekend. As a matter of fact, I never read so much Bourinot and other authors. I could not find one example of a government wilfully, knowingly not being in the House to keep quorum on its day and letting the thing lapse. The Estimates have lapsed in our opinion so they have to be restored.

How do you do it, Mr. Speaker? There has to be a motion put to the House to restore what was done by the President of the Treasury Board on April 3, 1989. There has to be a restoration motion for leave that this House at its next sitting consider or continue to sit on the business of supply. I will leave it to the experts as to what the wording should be, but we need a restoration motion.

They will say: "The motion is going to be votable, because all motions have to be put to a vote, and it is not debatable". I want to argue that point. My friend from Kingston and the Islands will also argue, possibly more convincingly than I, because he is a lawyer of great repute and knows the finer points of the law. I would like to make some common sense arguments to this point.

The government has to restore that order and has to bring it into the House, and we in this House will want to debate that motion. Why do I say that we want to debate the motion? Let us go back to Standing Order 81(1) which states:

> At the commencement of each session, the House shall designate, by motion, a continuing Order of the Day for the consideration of the business of supply.

It is common practice that the House is asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

We go on to look at Standing Order 81(2).

I will read it in French:

> On any day or days appointed for the consideration of any business under the provisions of this Standing Order, that order of business shall have precedence over all other government business in such sitting or sittings.

This is very important, Mr. Speaker. It means that opposition days have precedence over all other government business.

The importance of the business of supply is pointed out in Standing Order 81(2). They are given precedence over all other government business.

The government must give us 25 days a year pursuant to our Standing Orders. It does not have a choice. The day is designated not by us but by the government. We pick the subject but the government appoints the day.

In England, a Friday only counts as half a day as it is too short. Here when we get a Friday, it is considered a regular day of debate. We, on this side of the House, have difficulty finding three or four speakers for an important debate because the government is intent on trying to waste the time of the House.

It is totally unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, that this government is attempting not only to kill the time of the House but also to deprive us of our right to speak in this House. And it is for this reason that you should seriously consider the precedent of giving back to the opposition its allotted day.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a few Standing Orders which, in my opinion, support restoring this item as well as debating the motion proposed by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret).

Mr. Speaker, I bring to your attention Standing Order 67(1) which talks about debatable motions.

The following motions—there are several of them, going from (a) to (p)—are debatable, and I quote:

> Every motion:
> (a) standing on the order of proceedings for the day, except as otherwise provided in these Standing Orders;

We know all about these, and I will dispense with them, but I wish to come to the very last type of motion which is debatable:

> (p) such other motion, made upon Routine Proceedings, as may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the House, the maintenance of its authority, the appointment——

This is the part which I wish to emphasize:

—or conduct of its officers, the management of its business, the arrangement of its proceedings—

[English]

The management of its business, the arrangement of its proceedings, that is the key. The management of its business deals specifically with how we manage our business in this House. We know—it is established—that there are days when the opposition controls the subject matter of the debate. There is a standing order that allows the opposition 25 days.

In today's Order Paper and Notice Paper, Mr. Speaker, you will find no supply proceedings, none. They have been taken out. Why? It is because they lost that item on Friday. There are no more supply proceedings. There is no more consideration of the business of supply as moved by the President of the Treasury Board.

That is not orderly conduct. We will not give this government the supply that it requires to administer this country, unless it comes to Parliament, unless it goes to committees, and discusses with us and tells us specifically what it is needed for. There is no more in our Order Paper any supply proceedings. Its members wiped them out completely. In other words, we are going to have a government which will do whatever it likes. We will not accept that.

Having dealt with that point which I think is a convincing one, Mr. Speaker, if you want order, and the standing order is very clear, you must debate. Not only must we know why they did it, we will give them a chance to tell us why they did it on Friday. Why did they walk out on the Parliament of Canada? Why did they walk out on the people of Canada? Why would they not stay in the House here until we adjourned? Why would they not debate the motion that was before us on Friday? That is what we want to know. We will give them a chance to debate that motion in due course. I repeat that Standing Order 67(1)(p) states that this motion is debatable when it concerns the management of the House's business. That I think is convincing enough.

As far as I am concerned they have to restore the motion. We should debate the motion, and we will vote on that motion. In my view those are the three steps that this government must take now, that it has by its own incompetence failed to follow the normal procedure of keeping in the House a sufficient number of members to debate important issues.

Mr. Barrett: I hope it is just incompetence.

Mr. Gauthier: I will not impute motives, but I do think that there was an element of incompetence in there.

My fourth point deals with the committees. At the beginning of February the committees of the House received what we call the blue book, the Estimates. These estimates are chapter and verse the expenditure plans of the government and are sent to committees for perusal and study. We have a great number of committees which sit. As I said previously, we had one at four o'clock that would meet on the Estimates put to it by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I submit to you that since we have at this time no supply proceedings in the House we could hardly have supply proceedings before committees.

Mr. Milliken: Or anywhere else.

Mr. Gauthier: Or anywhere else, for that matter. Having said that, I would like to ask you again, Mr. Speaker, to put out a directive to committees that until the Estimates have been restored by the government and the consideration of the business of supply has been put back on our Order Paper as an important part of our proceedings, then it is in my view absolutely contrary to practice that the committees sit on Estimates which do not exist, unless they want to talk about something else.

They cannot, in my view, talk about Estimates without having to explain how they can argue they are before the House and therefore "we do not mind that because we had them before and there was a reference made some months ago and we will go on that". It was not any of our doing. It was the doing of the government itself that ruined the day for committees, ruined the day for Parliament, and ruined the day for all of us who believe that the environment is an important subject.

I could go on for some time explaining to you, Mr. Speaker, and reviewing the precedents in Beauchesne's, Erskine May and Bourinot, but I know you would not want me to continue. There are members in the House who want to add to the debate today and bring out some other points. Having said that, I want to make it clear that in our view the order for reconsideration, reinstalla-tion, or restoration of the Estimates and supply has to be made.

[Translation]

—time presses, Mr. Speaker! Time presses, because this government which is well-known for its procrastination and foot dragging on a great many issues could wait a long time. I should like to make the point that if this was a minority government, it would be compelled to go to the people on this issue. It would be compelled to go to the people on this issue because it would have lost the confidence of—

Mr. Barrett: Today!

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, today! It would be compelled to go to the people today because a minority government, when faced with a situation such as this, would have no choice but to go to the people and ask them to confirm its mandate, because the incompetence of this move is absolutely historical. Well, if there is one thing which we have retained from the British system of Parliament, it is that the people will accept to pay taxes only if they can examine on what the money will be spent. And that is what we are dealing with today. We are dealing with the whole system of monitoring government spending, a time-honoured and well-established system which I feel, on the basis of my research, had never been foiled before as it is now by such an incompetent government.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that it is important, in my opinion, firstly to restore Opposition days, and secondly to restore the votes. Perhaps I should comment on this, because you ruled last week that, as the Opposition, we had no more vote until the end of June. As this will be an altogether new period, perhaps the government should be penalized and compelled to vote on an Opposition motion blaming it for its incompetence and inability to properly conduct the business of the House.

Third, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the motion should be debated in the House because it deals with the organization of our business. And fourth, I suggest that Parliamentary committees which are sitting today should not deal with the Estimates before them as long as the business of supply has not been restored.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, and I support very strongly the points that he made in a very thoughtful presentation.

Like many others, I was surprised this morning when we noticed on the Notice Paper that there was no notice of motion. Having totally botched up Friday, we at least thought the government, perhaps, was setting up for a prorogation. Of course, we recognize that the motion we were debating is introduced at the beginning of the session of Parliament and, if the government had decided to abandon the motion, was this a sign that the government was intending to prorogue and start all over? That of course would be the easy way out of this dilemma, but assuming that that might not be the case, with the government at 17 per cent in the polls, we thought then that the government would move a notice that it would be reintroducing the motion.

My hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier said that he searched around for precedents and was unable to find one. The closest I could come was going back to Bourinot's, fourth edition, on page 422, where it stated:

> If the order of the House to go into committee of supply should become "a lapsed order" in consequence of "a count out," it will be necessary to revive it by giving notice of a motion for that purpose. In 1877, the committee in the English Commons lapsed in this way, and the leader of the government subsequently gave notice of a motion to set it up in the usual words—"That this House will on—resolve itself—"

In other words, back in 1877 was the last time this fiasco occurred.

Just to put what we are talking about into some context, on Friday we were debating on a government day of supply. It was the government's day, and when we are dealing with supply it is expected, based on usual convention, that the government will keep a sufficient number of members in the Chamber so that we will at least have a quorum.

During the time when points were being raised by hon. members on the issue on which you have just ruled, Mr. Speaker, in terms of the inadmissibility of the finance committee's report, government members from time to time stood up and indicated they were anxious to conclude these representations to get on with what they described as one of the more important issues of the day. We concur that on environmental issues, I do not suppose we could choose a more appropriate day to debate a topic, and we should be doing a lot more of that. So the government indicated it was anxious to get into the debate.

The hon. member for Chambly suggested that we extend the hours to allow more members a chance to speak on a topic that you would have enjoyed being part of yourself, Mr. Speaker, if you were sitting in the House and able to participate in this very appropriate debate where some eloquent and useful speeches were made. Lo and behold, out of the blue comes the government Whip calling for a quorum. The result was that we signed at the table. There were six Liberals and six New Democrats. This was a Liberal opposition day and there were no Conservatives, except the Speaker who signed in. As a result the whole matter collapsed.

We were surprised at that time. I remember discussions being carried on as to what this meant, because it had not happened before that on a government supply day the government decided to curtail debate prematurely. The government was in a sense superseding the order of the day, the consideration of supply. The House is no longer giving consideration to giving the government money. What the government did was no accident. It was a determined effort to conclude the day prematurely.

Mr. Milliken: To gag the opposition.

Mr. Riis: We can talk about gagging the opposition. We have seen enough of this with 34 closures of one kind or another. We could not believe on this issue that we would see this because of the implications. It is not that we are surprised at some use of closure. This unfortunately has now become a pattern, but the fact is that this would completely offset the whole government program of supply. I believe this is a question of confidence, a question of privilege as my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, indicated. It certainly demonstrates a lack of competence on the part of the government.

• (1550)

What do we do? Can the question that we expected on the Order Paper today be put again? The convention of this House is that the same questions cannot be put continuously. At the beginning of the session on April 3, 1989 the question was put and it stated:

> That the House at its next sitting consider the business of supply.

That motion no longer stands. Can we reinstate it and go back and readdress ourselves to the same motion? The convention of this House is that that is not the usual procedure. That is why I say perhaps prorogation is the most obvious answer to this dilemma.

I simply want to add our support to the very thoughtful points put forward by the hon. member from Vanier. There are further points that other members want to add. I simply want to summarize by asking these questions. Is it possible that the same question can be put twice in one session of Parliament? Is it not the responsibility of the government for maintaining quorum when we are dealing with government supply? It seems to me that those two matters are pretty straightforward and should not be abused in the rather silly and trivial way that we saw here last Friday.

I do want to suggest that at this point the House has lost its prime role, and that is the granting of supply. What is our role in this procedure now? We have no motion before us and if, Mr. Speaker, you allow the government to put the motion which it should have put today, if it was going to, then at least we should debate that motion and we should vote on that motion. There is no question of that in my mind.

I can only assume that the government did not know what it was doing on Friday and has been caught in a very embarrassing situation. Its incompetence is obvious. The precedents are simply unavailable unless we go back to the 1877 precedent in Westminster, which indicates just how sloppy the government has been in dealing with its business.

If the government is not prepared to consider prorogation, then I say we look forward to debating the motion when it comes forward again. We would hope that the government would not simply try to slip it through without debate, as we did at the beginning of the session, because now the whole terms of reference of how we proceed with government supply obviously has been dramatically changed.

Privilege

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with the real intent here, the opposition has succeeded in wasting 52 minutes of the House's time. I will not waste a lot of time, but I think it is useful to put the events of Friday in a little perspective. Indeed it was an allotted day. Indeed it was an opposition day. It started at ten o'clock on Friday with an hour's debate interrupted for Question Period and Routine Proceedings.

At twelve o'clock, the New Democratic Party raised a point of order to which the Chair ruled early, a point of order that had no merit, as the Chair pointed out, but a point of order through which its members managed to waste two hours of time. It being an opposition day, there was some concern expressed about the fact that two hours out of a four-hour debate on Friday basically halved the time allotted to the Liberal Party for its very important motion.

We discussed on this side whether in fact we might extend hours to recover those two hours for the Liberal Party. In fact, it turned out that the New Democratic Party extended the hours, something that we could have stopped with 15 members and we did not. Given that two hours of the Liberal's opposition day was wasted by the New Democrats, recovering those two hours from three o'clock until five o'clock seemed appropriate.

At five o'clock, two hours after the normal hour of adjournment, when people have made other plans to go home, including the staff here and so on, my colleague, the Whip, raised a quorum count. I heard earlier about how vitally committed and involved all opposition were in this issue, yet they did not have sufficient members here to reflect that vitality. I heard my colleague, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, say that he wants a little common sense here in terms of what approach. Let us look at what happened on Friday. The Liberal Party, which was due four hours of debate on its motion, received four hours of debate on its motion. The effect of having the two hours at the end rather than at the appropriate time made a little difference: there would be a little more overtime, a little more costly for the taxpayers to handle it that way but perhaps not unreasonable for the Liberal Party to get what was due it in view of the games the New Democratic Party was playing.

To suggest somehow that a great robbery was committed flies in the face of what happened. The opposition was due four hours of debate on a non-votable motion. That is exactly what it received. There was no one deprived of any right whatsoever, except perhaps some members of the staff were deprived of the right to complete their day a little earlier than they did. Even then approaches were made to ask how long did they wanted to debate. The leader of the New Democratic Party said that they had several speakers who were anxious, implying that they would run until exhaustion.

I maintain that the actions of our Whip were in fact very responsible. The day came out as it was planned. There were four hours of debate on the motion of the Liberal Party. It was terminated at a reasonable time so that the overtime bill of the House of Commons was not too extensive and the staff and members were able to go home.

Now the question comes. That is common sense, common sense says you look at it: no damage was done to anybody. In fact people were made whole as a result of the damage potentially inflicted on that day by the New Democratic Party point of order.

However, let us look in fact at the substance in terms of precedents. Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 287, reflects the Bourinot's citation that the House leader of the Liberal Party raised and refers to a quorum call by stating:

> A "count-out" will always supersede any question that is before the House. If an Order of the Day for the reading or committal of a bill be under consideration at the time, and there is no quorum present, the House must be asked at a subsequent sitting to revive the question that may have lapsed in the way.

It is very clear. The precedent is there. It is no big deal.

Mr. Milliken: This is not a bill. That says "a bill".

Mr. Andre: Or motion.

Mr. Milliken: A bill. Read it.

Mr. Andre: It is the same thing.

Mr. Gauthier: No, there is a difference.

Mr. Andre: It is the same thing, and at the point of motions today I intend to move in fact that the order for consideration of business supply be reinstated, as provided in the Standing Orders. Nothing has happened to the government of this country. No one has been denied a cheque. Nothing has happened. On Friday, after a four-hour opposition day, terminated by quorum because the New Democrats would not act responsibly and say when it might be, we used the only vehicle available. Otherwise we would have been faced with another waste of time and money for the public.

Mr. Barrett: You have other means.

Mr. Andre: There is that former premier over there barking about decorum and how to operate in this House. He should tell; I think you should get your pillow and blanket and have another nap.

Mr. Barrett: That's fine. You should read the rules.

Mr. Andre: The question implied was that somehow between Friday at five o'clock and this time today, because the motion is not there on the Order Paper, something terrible has happened. Somehow people are not getting paid or what have you. I would remind the House of one precedent when the Liberal government of the day introduced a Throne Speech on October 23, 1969 and did not put the business of supply on the Order Paper until nine sitting days later, so for nine sitting days the business of supply was not on the Order Paper.

I do not recall what horrible things happened during that period, but given that there will not be even one sitting day, provided of course we get to motions this day—and if we do not then there will be one sitting day, but so what—nothing will have happened. In reality the citations of Beauchesne and the citations from Bourinot that were raised clearly point out that all that needs to happen is a restoration of the motion.

• (1600)

We have the previous precedent where a Liberal government operated for nine sitting days without such a motion on the paper. What happened on Friday was that a four hour opposition day for the Liberal party really happened. They got all of the time they would have had on a normal day without the shenanigans that went on. Given all of that, I see no reason why in fact we cannot proceed in an orderly, expeditious way with the rest of the business this day. Hopefully in future we can decide matters of House business in a more civilized, mature manner, rather than this kind of ongoing guerrilla warfare, which benefits nobody I might add.

Mr. Speaker: I will give some indication of how I want to proceed.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, I think, has a point to make. I think the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier referred to his desire to raise on one aspect of the argument. I will hear him shortly.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Your Honour, the two issues I wanted to deal with are specifically the question of attendance in the House on Friday afternoon and, second, the issue of whether or not the motion that the government House leader indicates he would like to propose, that is to revive the business of supply on the Order Paper, is debatable.

If I could deal with the first. I think I have cited to Your Honour previously the relevant provisions in Bourinot dealing with the business of supply and its importance in dealing with the business of the House of Commons. I quote again from the fourth edition, page 415:

> One of the principal purposes of the House of Commons is the consideration and criticism of the estimates and the taxes required to meet the public expenditures and the committees of supply and ways and means are the parliamentary machinery through which the house chiefly exercises these political and constitutional functions.

As I have indicated, although the words have changed and we no longer have a committee of supply, nevertheless the business of supply as established under Standing Order 81(1) is one of the principal businesses of the House of Commons of Canada, and that is still the case.

What we have here is a situation where the government, having commenced the business of supply this session, on April 3 as indicated in the speech by my friend from Ottawa—Vanier, has now lost the business of supply. It has fumbled the ball on the principal item of government business. It all amounts to an absolute scandal and, frankly, I suggest an abuse of the process of this House.

I want to turn to the situation that existed on Friday afternoon. I know that Your Honour will be aware, no doubt, that frequently in the course of this session and indeed throughout this Parliament, I have stood on questions of privilege or points of order to point out the fact that during debate on government business, members of the government are absent in their entirety from this House.

There are 38 or 39 cabinet ministers who sit in this House of Commons. I have raised at least 15 times the number of times that members of the government have failed to attend to their business in this House during a discussion of government business. I did not want to go back through the Hansards and root out all the dates and pages, but I could if Your Honour would like to have that list.

I know that the Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole is appalled. Quite often when I raise this, he says that it is not fair to comment on the presence or absence of members from this House. Well, on Friday, we have a record of who was here.

Mr. Andre: After the normal hour of adjournment.

Mr. Milliken: While the House was still sitting, discussing government business, the following members whose names were taken down as being present, were said to be present. I read from the Votes and Proceedings for Friday: Mr. Paproski, Messrs. Anawak, Assad, Barrett, Benjamin and Boudria; Ms. Clancy, Messrs. Edmonston, Gauthier, LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso), MacWilliam, McCurdy, Murphy and Riis.

Mr. Gauthier: Not one single minister.

Mr. Andre: How about Milliken?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Milliken was not here at that time.

Mr. Gauthier: I sent him home, because he had to go to Kingston. He had to drive in a storm.

Mr. Andre: Everybody else has to stay here.

An Hon. Member: That is right, he sat at home—

Mr. Speaker: It has been very well explained to the Chair what happened. I do not know that there is anything more to be gained, in terms of argument, going over the members who were or were not here at the time.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, what I am trying to point out is that the points of order I have been raising on these occasions in fact have additional validity because on Friday we have a record of the fact that not a single minister of the Crown was present during a discussion of government business. I am told it is out of order to raise that point in the course of debate and yet here we have a recorded note in the Votes and Proceedings of this House, it will go in the Journals, that there was not a single minister of the Crown present during the discussion of government business. I say to Your Honour that that in itself constitutes a contempt of the House and it is a continuing contempt unlike the one that was used as a gimmick by the chief Government Whip.

What is the Whip's function? It is to ensure that members attend the House. That is the Whip's principal function and on Friday afternoon we had the spectacle of the government Whip rising in this House and saying that he did not see a quorum. Was he here for the quorum count? Where did he go? Did he go out in the snowstorm and get lost? He disappeared in the 15 minutes the bells rang. He disappeared. I suggest, Your Honour, that he had a duty to be here and to be counted as part of that quorum.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the government has used this quorum rule in the course of its own business, in its discussion of the most important single item of business it has to deal with in this House, the business of supply, which it treats with such contempt I may say, to then use those rules to advantage to try to cut off opposition debate. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is an unfair form of closure. It is a misuse and misapplication of those rules.

I want to turn, Sir, to the question of reinstatement because as my friend from Ottawa—Vanier has argued, the government now must move to reinstate this, failing which I suggest the proper course is for the government to prorogue this session and start off with a new Speech from the Throne. I could give the government House leader a bit of friendly advice, and that is that he include in this Speech from the Throne a request for supply since there was not one in the last Speech from the Throne. He may have heard me argue that last April.

While Your Honour held that it was not a requirement in that speech, I suggest Your Honour may have considered the fact that this House had already adopted a motion at that time for the consideration of the business of supply because that motion, as my friend from Ottawa—Vanier has pointed out, was carried on April 3, 1989.

That motion has been lost. I suggest that perhaps Your Honour would want to look at the possibility of reviving the business of supply in this House in light of the fact that there was no request for supply in the Speech from the Throne at the beginning of the session. I invite Your Honour to take another look at that particular item in light of the fact that this business of supply has now been lost and there is not a continuing item or order of the day for consideration of the business of supply on the Order Paper.

The rule respecting debatable acceptability of motions is found in Standing Order 67(1)(p), as my friend from Ottawa—Vanier has already indicated. The words of the Standing Order are clear:

> 67.(1) The following motions are debatable:
> (p) such other motion, made upon Routine Proceedings, as may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the House, the maintenance of its authority, the appointment or conduct of its officers, the management of its business,—

And the business of supply I submit, Your Honour, is a principal business of this House:

> —the arrangement of its proceedings, the correctness of its records, the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meeting or adjournment.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that in the precedent, cited by my friend from Ottawa—Vanier, in 1917 in the course of the argument being advanced by the then hon. member for Saint John, the Speaker indicated that the motion to reinstate this particular bill on the Order Paper does not "permit of debate". But I suggest to Your Honour that that matter was not argued before the Speaker at that time. He simply made the ruling in the course of argument. He did not hear argument on that point. He simply made the statement. I suggest that it is not a good precedent for dealing with this item.

I would acknowledge that at the beginning of a session the motion for designating an order for the business of supply is not normally debated, but under Standing Order 67(1)(p) I submit that it is a matter now, if it was not before, of management of the House business because the government is changing that motion. It has botched the business. It now has to reinstitute that business.

I suggest, therefore, this motion is debatable, and I hope when the government House leader moves it, he will afford us the opportunity to debate the motion before it is put to a vote in this House. I submit that the provisions of Standing Order 67, which specify which motions are to be debatable, clearly cover this situation. I invite Your Honour to so rule.

I should also say in my submission that the government has, as indicated by my hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier, blundered by its use of this quorum rule. It ought not to have proceeded in the way that it has. As a result, in my submission, it has lost the Opposition Day that was held, since the matter was not closed off and the motion was not determined.

That debate also, when the motion for reinstatement of the business of supply, if adopted by this House—I would not want to presume that because perhaps the Conservative members may not be here for that vote either—if it does not carry, I would invite Your Honour to put the motion that was under discussion on Friday and which was not adjourned back on the Order Paper under the business of supply as another Opposition Day so that we can proceed to discuss again that motion concerning the environment.

Perhaps on this occasion, the Minister of the Environment could be present to discuss that very important motion along with some of the other ministers of the Crown who were so conspicuously absent on Friday afternoon.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be brief, but I want to be clear on events as I recall them.

I was present that day, and I am one of those who has his name on the sheet that is signed—a memorable occasion it was, indeed. Perhaps it will not happen for another 100 years. It was remarkable. It was even more remarkable to hear the government House leader's comments suggesting that the government was magnanimous in granting more time because it believed a part of the opposition was wasting time.

When my colleague, the member for Chambly, made the motion to extend the hours, government members argued against his motion but did not have enough members here to stop his motion from passing. So the House leader's attempt to rewrite history is not only futile, but it compounds the government's embarrassment. Far be it from me to contribute to that. What the government could have done, simply and in order, was to have any one of their back-benchers or the Whip stand up in his place during that debate and move adjournment of that debate.

Then the government could have trotted out its members, supported its own motion, ended the opposition's debate if it determined it was a filibuster, or for whatever reason, and we would have been out of here with no mess. What happened was that the government members were not in attendance to the House in sufficient numbers to stop the opposition from doing anything it wanted.

What would the government have done if the opposition had taken advantage of it, called its troops back in and kept the place going all weekend, or moved its own motion? Lord knows, you were no longer capable of running the place.

I want to point out Standing Order 15—

Mr. Andre: Is this relevant?

Mr. Barrett: Standing Order 15 is relevant.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 15 may be. I would like to hear about it.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I want to be specific, and I was moving as quickly as I could to be specific.

Standing Order 15 commands the members to be in attendance in this Chamber. My colleague, the member for Kingston and the Islands, pointed out that the government Whip came in, called for a quorum count and then departed. He initiated the action. He initiated the call for the quorum, then we never saw him again.

So, Mr. Speaker, I ask for your ruling on whether or not, under Standing Order 15, a member who initiates a call for a quorum should attend to respond to his own initiative. He did not. We were shocked. I was shocked.

I have witnessed a lot of bizarre things in my life in the chambers that I have sat in, but I have never witnessed the disappearance—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: I am sure you have.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I am listening to the hon. member, but is that any more unusual, really, than on a Private Members' Bill, insistence on a vote and then people not showing up to vote for it? It seems to me that it falls into the realm of tactics, and what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, I suppose.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I am thankful for your intervention with that proposition. Certainly, what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, but we have no precedent for a call on quorum. None.

If one thought that the government had actually thought out what it is was doing—and I hope to goodness it had done it by accident—it was using quorum deliberately as another form of closure and that is shocking. I do not want to make that accusation but if you carry the analogy as you suggest, Mr. Speaker, quorum is different. Quorum means cessation of the sitting for the day and that is what happened.

I also point out clearly that if the government in its wisdom had wanted to close it there was nothing in the rules to stop it from moving adjournment of that debate.

I want to address myself very briefly to the argument proposed by the other members about the end of the supply motion. I understand the quandary, but for the life of me, to witness the government House leader suggesting that he can just come into the Chamber and wave another supply motion, as if somehow he can pull another supply motion out of the thin blue air—or thick blue air, considering it is Tory air—is incomprehensible.

My colleagues suggest we need a prorogation. That is up to the Chair to decide. One of my colleagues suggests we need another Throne Speech. That is up to the Chair to decide. It is up to the Chair to decide a whole range of things, but for the government House leader to come in and say he can simply trip a little supply motion in again because they messed it up on Friday is absurd.

If there is a method to bring supply back in, I am sure in your wisdom, Sir, you will find it. We must understand that to keep form and precedent we must lose a day. We must reinstate the day lost to my colleagues in the Liberal party. We must debate the supply motion again. The government House leader may want to work out a deal. Sometimes these things happen in Parliament.

I have known them to happen on occasion. The House has no knowledge of those things. If the governments wants to do that, that is fair enough, but for the life of me I cannot see how the government can ask us to rewrite the rules when it threw away everything by calling quorum on Friday. It deliberately did not show up.

Mr. Cooper: And you did, in great hordes.

Mr. Barrett: Well, Mr. Speaker, can you imagine explaining this to anybody outside? The government is prepared to govern but it is not prepared. I think I have made my point.

Mr. Speaker: I think trying to explain this to anybody outside will be somewhat difficult. I accept the hon. member's admonishment.

I have listened to argument. We have one precedent. That is the only one I have been able to find in listening to the arguments. During this afternoon I am going to have to look at it. I think I can return with a ruling on all these points by tomorrow morning, but it is going to take a little time. Accordingly, I will reserve.

Mr. Barrett: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On the basis of your reservation, you would not entertain a motion of supply, would you, until you have made your decision?

Mr. Speaker: We are going to proceed to Routine Proceedings. I will see what will happen at that time.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's responses to 84 petitions.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-293, an act to amend the Hazardous Products Act (expanded polystyrene container).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank one of the parliamentary interns, Mr. Denis St. Martin, for his assistance in preparing this private members' bill.

The purpose of the bill is to prohibit in any building of the Government of Canada the use of containers made in whole or in part of expanded polystyrene, which I guess is the fancy name for foam cups or foam eating utensils and so on.

The reason for this is twofold: One, of course, is the CFCs and their relationship to global warming and the ozone shield, but perhaps more important is the matter of waste disposal. You are well aware, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is one of the world's most wasteful countries when it comes to municipal waste and the treatment of that waste. I believe this would go a long way in terms of a model where the Government of Canada would take the initiative and prohibit the use of foam cups as one way to keep down the voluminous landfills that we are struggling with in almost every municipality in the country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-294, an act to change the name of the Electoral District of Brampton—Malton.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chadwick: Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House today to introduce a private members' bill. The purpose of this bill is to change the name of the electoral district of Brampton—Malton to better reflect the communities that make up that district. Should the bill pass, the name of Brampton—Malton would become Bramalea—Gore—Malton. Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Routine Proceedings

SUPPLY

REDESIGNATION OF MOTION

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): As indicated previously, Mr. Speaker, my intention at this point in time is to move to restore the business of supply by way of a motion. I move:

> That a continuing Order for the Day for the consideration of business of Supply in the name of the President of the Treasury Board be redesignated.

I heard your admonition, Mr. Speaker, in terms of seeking time to judge on the question of privilege, as I understood it when it was first raised. If it were a point of order, it should not have been heard at the time it was heard. Normally, a point of order about this thing should only be heard when the position is made. It was raised as a question of privilege prior to the commencement of Routine Proceedings and I do not know how the orderliness of this comes to bear on a question of privilege that was raised.

Mr. Riis: Are you on a point of order?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, having gone through almost an hour and a half in terms of a question of privilege and what privileges were hurt by this, in view of your admonition I certainly would delay for a day, acknowledging though, that on this basis, committees of the House will not be able to sit, whereas they could, in considering estimates. People who have made plans and tried to be accommodating will have those plans disrupted—

Mr. Milliken: Because of your bungling.

Mr. Andre: —and there may be an unnecessary waste of taxpayer's funds. But if in fact that is desirable, I would await your judgment.

Mr. Milliken: You should have thought of that Friday afternoon when you pulled your troops.

Mr. Andre: There is the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands again saying that after extended hours into the evening, when he is back in Kingston everybody else should be here.

Mr. Speaker: We have heard argument and there was perhaps some re-argument there. The hon. minister is letting his motion stand. I have indicated to hon. members that there were complicated and novel arguments put forward. I think I will be able to be here certainly by the opening of House business tomorrow to make a ruling and I think that is where the matter should remain.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, if I may, just one other matter very quickly. I do not want to cloud this particular point.

I would not like to see remain as a precedent the situation where a point of order could be as anticipatory as this one, if in fact it was a point of order. The House leader of the Liberal party rose on a question of privilege as I heard him. A question of privilege must be raised at a particular time.

Can you, under a question of privilege, argue a point of order and thereby anticipate something that might happen later on, which seems to have happened here. They seem to have argued a point of order. We are waiting for a judgment. That has precluded me from commencing that which I could have commenced if in fact the motion might be put and it's having dealt with might have been challenged on a point of order.

Now we have this situation. We are into a season where, until we get our Easter break, we are likely to see more of this. I would like to make the point that I will object in future if this process is to be viewed as some sort of precedent for again wasting the time of the House.

Mr. Gauthier: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have been well known to give equal time to the opposition. Stick around, Mr. Minister, I have a few things to tell you.

Mr. Andre: I listened for 45 minutes. I am late for a bunch of appointments.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to re-argue the point.

Mr. Gauthier: I do not want to re-argue the point, but I want to make a couple of points about those that have been made by the government House leader, before he walked out of here, which I do not think should stand unchallenged.

First of all, I did raise a question of privilege in this House. The privilege of the members of the House in debate, in my view, and I argued that point maybe not as eloquently as I should have, but I did my best to make the point that our privileges had indeed been infringed in debate on Friday when the government, by its own wilful and negligent incompetence, did something to prevent members of this House who had not spoken in debate, who signed the book but wanted to speak in debate. It prevented them from speaking. I think that is contemptuous of the House.

The government House leader should be in his office right now looking at TV. I want to make sure that there is remedial action taken to prevent that bunch of incompetents from repeating the same thing. If he is going to call members of the House all kinds of names, he can be called an incompetent also. The government has incinerated its own supply day. It went up the chimney like smoke and ashes. Members of the government have ashes all over their faces right now, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I seek some clarification. The government House leader put the motion. Can you describe for us the status of that motion at the moment, in your mind?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the motion is in front of us. He made it quite clear, given the admonition I gave before, that he was co–operating with the Chair.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order.

Are the committees no longer valid for today since the supply motion is not in front of us?

Mr. Speaker: I am not going to rule on that right now. I think that is a matter committee chairpersons will have to take into account.

I am making it very clear that I am not ruling on that at the moment. It goes to the very points that I have undertaken to look at very carefully tonight and return to the House tomorrow.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR ROYAL PARDON FOR ANNETTE PROULX

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I tabled last week in this House a petition signed by more than 8,000 people. I am tabling today another petition from another 8,000 or so people asking that royal clemency be granted immediately to Annette Proulx. It is clear in my mind and in that of all Canadians that this old lady who has spent the last 11 years in prison has paid her debt to society, that she is no threat to society and that she has suffered enough.

I therefore urge my colleagues in this House to support my request, and my colleagues from the Privy Council who are members of the inner committee that will decide on this case to let their heart speak and grant Mrs. Annette Proulx the royal pardon she has requested.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is indeed an honour and a pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is from all the members of the Kamloops and District Labour Council who have signed a petition in opposition to the goods and services tax.

They point out in some detail that any tax that taxes everything from coffins, to diapers, to home heating fuels, to haircuts, to books, periodicals, magazines and newspapers ought not to proceed. They are asking the Parliament of Canada to do whatever is possible to bring the government to its senses and to go back to the drawingboard and start all over with something that is meaningful and fair.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have another petition to present on another matter.

The petitioners point out to us that one–sixth of all Canadian children live in poverty and that although the over–all child population has fallen by almost 4 per cent, the number of children living in poverty has actually increased by 13.4 per cent between 1980 and 1986.

The petitioners are asking members to support motion M–254 which proposed a comprehensive bill of rights for children. In a sense, this petition is now outdated because the government voted against having a bill of rights for children in Canada.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise today to present a petition from Lebel–sur–Quévillon, in the province of Quebec, further to the recommendations of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

Lebel-sur-Quévillon is undoubtedly an isolated community. Thus, the petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation unfair, discriminatory and inefficient for the purpose of the northern tax benefits plan. It encourages neither settlement nor resource development in the North.

[English]

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition objecting to the government's plan to scuttle or privatize the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

The petitioners point out that the CCOHS has achieved an unrivalled international reputation as Canada's national centre for workplace health and safety. They point out further that CCOHS has provided high quality, impartial and free information on health and safety matters to the Canadian public for the past 10 years.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to restore the position and status of CCOHS as it was at the beginning of 1988 according to the statute, and to reverse any moves that detract from the status of the centre as a public corporation with objects spelled out in Section 5 of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety Act.

The petition is signed by some 59 persons from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Appended to it are the signatures of a further 13,552 people from right across Canada.

VIOLENT CRIMES

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition with approximately 1,000 names on it. The petitioners call on the government to pass legislation establishing mandatory minimum sentences for all violent crimes which would apply uniformly to all regions of Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the duty and honour to present a petition today from residents of the central interior of British Columbia who are concerned about the grief and suffering tax, as it is known in B.C. They are calling on the government not to proceed with the measure and to bring in a fair tax.

I know they join with me in wishing that the federal and the B.C. finance ministers would come clean on the secret meetings that they have been having on trying to find a way to implement the GST.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36 I have a petition to present. It is from a couple of hundred of my constituents, who object to the government's attempt for the first time in our history to impose a tax on books and print materials, therefore putting up a barrier to the accessibility of the printed word, one of the cornerstones of our democratic way of life.

I am pleased to present this petition on behalf of my constituents, these Canadian citizens.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, question No. 238 will be answered today.

[Text]

SHOAL LAKE

Question No. 238—Mr. Harvard:

> Does the government propose to take any action in developing a Shoal Lake management plan and, if so (a) what action (b) what opportunity will be given to concerned parties, such as the WPG, the Native bands and the cottage associations, to participate in the development of the plan?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): There is no intention, at present, to develop a Federal Management Plan for Shoal Lake, since this is primarily a provincial responsibility. Environment Canada stands ready to assist in the process of a plan development as far as resources will allow and as requested by the Provinces.

ADDITIONAL BACKGROUND INFORMATION

Planning with regard to Shoal Lake is proceeding on several fronts and at various levels of government. The provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, jointly, are preparing a Shoal Lake Management Planning Strategy and the federal government was invited to send participants to a workshop on the subject which was held at Kenora, Ontario on February 20, 1990. Three people from the Inland Waters Directorate of Environment Canada attended the workshop. Indian Affairs and Northern Development also was represented.

A Tripartite Agreement regarding Shoal Lake was signed by the Shoal Lake Indian Band #40, the Province of Manitoba, and the City of Winnipeg on June 30, 1989. Included in this Agreement is the requirement for the Band to develop an Environmental Management Plan. Negotiations currently are under way between the Band and Indian and Northern Affairs Canada regarding federal assistance in carrying out the Band responsibilities under the Agreement, including the Environmental Management Plan. These negotiations will culminate in "The Shoal Lake Band #40 / Canada Agreement Respecting the Economy and the Environment". This is the federal agreement required under the terms of the Tripartite Agreement.

A third area of concern at Shoal Lake is proposed Consolidated Professor Gold Mine of Steven's Inland in the lake. There has been a request for FEARO involvement in this proposal, but by letter of December 1989 to the Honourable Glen Cummings, M.L.A., the Minister stated that the EARP will not be applied to the proposed gold mine. This mining proposal would be covered by the Ontario / Manitoba Shoal Lake Management Planning Strategy.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I ask that all remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it agreed?

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990–91

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, March 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–65, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Saint–Boniface (Mr. Duhamel).

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint–Boniface): Madam Speaker, when I took the floor last week on this motion, I indicated that by looking carefully at a person's actions, we could establish that person's values and priorities. We could do the same with the government.

If we consider their actions, if we look at what they are doing and what they intend to do, we could try, and I think we could, in fact, establish a very clear picture of their values, beliefs and priorities.

Now suppose we quickly identify this government's actions. I indicated that they cut transfer payments on health care. Who is affected by these cutbacks? Seniors who need care, and the sick and the handicapped. I also pointed out that they cut transfer payments for education. And who is affected by these cuts? Young people and mature students who go to university and college.

We talked about their infamous clawback which has a direct impact on seniors and families. What does this tell us about their priorities and values? Hon. members will recall that before and during the election campaign, there was talk of setting up daycare centres. What was done? Nothing, absolutely nothing.

Mr. Corbeil: Bill C–21 is blocked in the Senate!

Mr. Duhamel: And of course they try to put the blame on the Senate. When you are weak and don't have the guts to do what you promise, you blame somebody else. That is also one of this government's values, and it certainly says a lot about this government. When you can't do what you promise, when you don't have the guts to do it, when you don't intend to do it, you put the blame on somebody else. You are like a little boy who takes a cookie and says: It isn't my fault, Mom, my brother told me to take it.

What did they say about VIA Rail? They said they would support it. They cut funding back by half. Who was affected? More than 2,700 people, which means more than 2,700 families. Unemployment insurance is another interesting point. Some ministers were falling over themselves to say that they had no intention of touching this program, and what is happening now? Bill C-21—You know exactly what is going on.

Mr. Corbeil: Bill C-21 is still blocked in the Senate.

Mr. Duhamel: Thank God! We have a Senate that is trying to protect Canadians.

In addition to all that, they cut programs for women, native people, new Canadians and multiculturalism and veterans. Yes, programs for training and retraining too. We were told that we would have the best programs in the world! They were cut. They spent $4.50 per person on the literacy program annually. Some investment in the five million Canadians who need help! Big deal! They promised to double spending on research and development. But they are slipping: there is less than before. We invest less than half what countries like Japan, the United States, Germany and France do, even if we exclude military R&D. Student aid has not changed since 1984. Not only has it not changed since 1984, but they imposed an administrative fee on the poor students who need help. They removed the subsidies for academic publications. They will impose a tax, the GST, the goods and services tax, which will hurt education.

[English]

I want to reiterate the point I was trying to make. If you look at the actions of an individual or a government, then you can determine what their beliefs, their values, their priorities are. Look at the actions of this government. The use of phrases such as "sacred trust" have no meaning any more. We have heard it so often.

Let us talk about the accord that is getting national headlines. It has now deteriorated to the point where it pits region against region and person against person. It has not at all evolved. It is not going to evolve for a long, long time, because the process has been deficient.

Let us talk about the deficit. Members of the government like to brag that they are such wonderful managers. Yet the deficit is no smaller than it was, and the debt has almost doubled during the last five years. Is that good management? Frankly, my definition of good management is very different from that.

The people in this country are frightened. When you become frightened and you worry about your future you are less tolerant, less generous and less patient than you would have been. This is what is happening to Canadians throughout this nation.

What would have happened if the government had told the truth when it went to the polls? What would have happened to the members? They would never have been elected.

Just imagine the Prime Minister standing up and saying: "I shall raise taxes 31 times, and I shall impose a goods and services tax, and I shall ensure that your taxation is at record levels".

What would have happened if the Prime Minister had said as well: "There will be no improvement on the deficit or the debt". What would have happened if he had added: "I have changed my mind. I did say in the book, Where I Stand, that I wanted to spend more on research and development, but I will not raise the expenditures for research and development".

What would have happened if he had said: "I will claw back old age security and family allowances, of course, as a little bonus".

What would have happened if he had said: "I will not introduce any day care program. I have decided against that too". He might have added, if he had told the truth: "And I will cut VIA Rail. I will just cut it in half initially because I think it would be too brutal to take it all away. And, as a little bonus, later on I will cut native programs, and I will cut programs for new Canadians, and I will cut funding for women's groups. Finally, I will cut education and health". Those are the statements he would have had to make if he had told the truth.

Is it any wonder that they find themselves at 17 per cent in the polls? Someone told me this morning that the Communist party of East Germany was at 15 per cent in the polls. Frankly, if the government continues to topple as it has, then it will even sink lower than the East German Communist party.

It is rather interesting to look at The Toronto Star of March 29, 1990. The results of a Gallup poll with respect to the budget showed that 70 per cent of Canadians say that the budget will not help, while 63 per cent of Canadians say that the budget will hurt Canadians.

This is a government that obviously condones the massive increases in salary given to the Governor of the Bank of Canada. We have heard the defence given by the Prime Minister. How would you feel if you were a single parent out there? How would you feel if you were among the 3.5 million to five million poor Canadians if you saw those kinds of increases given to someone who is already well paid?

On the campaign trail we know that the Conservatives are really Liberals. Canadians know what they are really like, and they are not going to forget. I say to all Canadians, let us look at their actions and we can then determine their values and their priorities.

Finally, I say this not to offend, but to point out that there are dramatic, distinct differences between political parties. One of the ways of trying to determine that is by looking not at what they say, primarily, but at what they do.

Mr. Corbeil: That is what we want to be judged on.

Mr. Duhamel: I want to remind all Canadians that there are some members opposite who obviously are slighted by what I have said. I do not blame them. I would be embarrassed to be part of a government that undertakes the kinds of reductions that I have just identified in health, education, veterans programs, women's programs and native programs.

How could you possibly sit there and chuckle and snort and heckle? I would hold my head down. I would go home after dark on weekends because I think it would be much more appropriate than to do so during the daytime.

[Translation]

As I just said, Madam Speaker, I have no intention to slight my colleagues on the government side. I simply want to try to point out that there are differences, big differences between political parties, and the way to appreciate that is to examine what they do. So they went ahead and slashed various programs for women and native people, programs on multiculturalism, health and education, programs for seniors and families, programs on unemployment insurance when they promised they would not touch them, programs on retraining, research and development and what all else, and this is indeed a good indication of what motivates them, what drives them, what makes them react.

I find it interesting for example to see some of my colleagues who continue to laugh—

Mr. Corbeil: That is what you did for 20 years.

Mr. Duhamel: —who continue to laugh at what I am saying. That is because they lack the courage to rise and ask questions—

Mr. Hudon: Just you wait!

Mr. Duhamel: —and to argue and prove that what I am saying is wrong. Indeed I am looking forward to entertaining their questions.

Madam Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to share my views with the House.

• (1650)

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): I have a question for my colleague. A moment ago he said something that gave me a start. I want to remind him that during the previous session the government had introduced a day care bill which was duly passed by the House. When I pointed out that the legislation had been stalled by the Senate not long after, he replied: You always have to blame somebody else. That is what did happen. The program did not necessarily have the wholehearted support of the Liberal Party, but the bill did make it through the House and was rejected by the other place. And that is not the only example.

A few minutes ago my colleague said something about training programs—

[English]

Mr. Speller: It wasn't turned down by the Senate.

[Translation]

Mr. Hudon: You breaking wind, or what? What is going on?

Mr. Duhamel: The question! Ask your question, I can hardly wait to answer!

Mr. Hudon: Sure, tell your colleague to let me speak and stop breaking wind just so I can complete my question.

As it happens, Bill C-21 which is still under consideration includes a provision to transfer funds for better training programs. We are not necessarily saying they were cut off. The money is there. That is how I interpret Bill C-21. This is not the first time the other place—Take Bill C-22 on drugs, patents and what have you, it made four or five return trips between the two Houses, but we finally enacted the legislation. With respect to free trade we even had to go through an election before we managed to get it through. My colleague should not belittle the role of the Senate or of the other House because it is now systematically blocking a measure which the government has every right to adopt, particularly when taken in the context of budget expenditures and increases.

Madam Speaker, I want to tell you that between 1980 and 1985 the percentages of budget increases were 3.7, 11.9, 10.3, 5.8 and 8.9. Since the new government took over, the increases in real federal expenditures were 2.2, 0.4, 2.6, 2.3 and 2.2. This country simply has to be put back on the right track. I agree with my colleague that there have been cut-backs in various sectors or various fields. But I must remind him that we did not cut back in education. The provinces may have received somewhat less than they expected to get, but there was an increase in some budgets or in the transfers made to the provinces.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint-Boniface): Concerning the daycare centres, Madam Speaker, I am going to try and deal in turn with each and every point. If it is true that the bill died in the Senate, it is also true that if the government had really wanted to, it could have introduced a new bill during this session. It should not try, therefore, to blame this on another level of government. It is well aware that it could have done so. But it did not really want to do so for lack of courage and should not therefore try to pass the buck.

Now, concerning Bill C-21, which is now before the Senate, you have not yet recognized—perhaps if you did, I could accept that—that workers and employers will have to foot the bill for many of these training and re-training programs, and that the government has withdrawn its participation almost entirely from the training and re-training area. That is something you are not saying! Beside that, the Prime Minister had claimed that his government would have the best programs in the world. Ask any worker, any employer, any Canadian man or woman whether you had the very best programs in the world. It is not true! That is going a little bit too far.

You mentioned that your expenditures had increased by 2 or 1 per cent. Listen, I do not know where you got your data, because in 1984, you had $70 million in revenue and you have now over $120 billion. What have you done with our money, the money of Canadian men and women? Where have you spent it all?

You have not recognized either that you had doubled the endebtment, but you did indeed.

Mr. Corbeil: How about the interests on the debt?

Mr. Duhamel: I made a little calculation, and I should like you to make the same, and if I am wrong, I will stand up in the House and apologize. But I made a little calculation, and if you use the interest on the debt which existed in 1984, you will realize that you spent more, Sir.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I am glad that my colleague from St. Boniface raised the matter of legislation brought forward by the government since the election, because I am convinced in my own mind as well, that if the people had been told what the government was going to do to VIA Rail, it would have been trashed in the 1988 election.

If the people had been told about the details of the GST, the government would not have been re-elected. If the people had been told about the UIC legislation, it would not have had a hope in the 1988 election. If the people of Canada had been told about the proposed cuts in transfer payments to the provinces, it would not have won the 1988 election. I think that my friend for St. Boniface has made some very good points.

I feel that the government has behaved so badly, so irresponsibly and so undemocratically since the 1988 election that it has lost all moral authority to govern the country. I want to ask my friend from St. Boniface whether he shares that feeling.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I wish to thank my colleague. First, I am absolutely delighted that he understood the points that I made. I am extremely suspicious that my colleagues opposite also understood them, but they did did not want to admit it. I am quite convinced that that is true.

Yes, the government has lost the moral authority to govern. It has lost the confidence of the people. Fewer than 20 per cent of Canadians have confidence in this government. If you take the next five Canadians that you meet and there is a part of one who has some confidence in you the other four and a little bit will have no confidence in you. The government has lost the moral will to survive. It does not have the moral authority to govern.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I rise today in support of Bill C-65, the Borrowing Authority Act for 1990-91. This is the bill which authorizes the government to borrow funds to meet its financial obligations for the coming year.

Bill C-65 will also permit the government to deal with the necessary foreign exchange transactions. The amount covered by this bill is $25.5 billion.

As hon. members are aware, the deficit projection for the 1990-91 fiscal year is $28.5 billion. That leaves a $3 billion difference which I will explain to you.

There is $7.5 billion available to the government from non-budgetary sources. One such source is from the repayments of loans advanced to the Public Service Superannuation Account in the past years which brings the borrowing requirement down to $21 billion. However, the government must have the flexibility to conduct its foreign exchange transactions. This will require a reserve of $3 billion, which is the same amount as was required last year.

In addition, the government requires a further $1.5 billion to cover foreign exchange fund earnings. While these earnings show up in the public accounts as revenue, they are not available for operating purposes since the funds are retained in the exchange fund account.

While government would obviously prefer not to have to borrow at all, this reduced requirement for the coming year is a reflection of the progress that is being made in rationalizing the economy. In fact, this year's financial requirement represents 3.1 per cent of Gross Domestic Product and that is down from 6.7 per cent in previous years.

This progress will continue. By 1994-95, the government's borrowing requirements will be reduced to zero. Indeed, the government predicts a billion dollar surplus for that year at which point bonds and treasury bills be begin to be repaid.

Therefore, this bill should be viewed in context with the government's over-all thrust to deal with the deficit and the debt. The budgetary measures that were announced by the finance minister in February are a key step in that over-all strategy.

The budget stressed that to achieve our potential for economic growth and job creation we must build on the solid fiscal progress that we have been making since 1984. By doing this, we will gain the kind of greater flexibility and independence of action that we need to meet the priorities of Canadians and the government.

To get the deficit down and to restore a better fiscal balance, we are working very diligently to reduce our expenditures, and that is a vital component of the exercise. The growth of spending on all government programs and services has been kept well below the growth of the economy and even below the rate of inflation. The money used to meet the costs of running the internal operations of government has been reduced from $17.5 billion in 1984 to $16.8 billion today. That is in spite of a larger workload, and I think that that shows real progress.

The Public Service has also been reduced by 12,000. In fact, it is the same size today that it was in 1973 and that is despite a 20 per cent increase in population. That shows real progress and real commitment to rationalizing our economy.

In December, the President of the Treasury Board announced further steps to help us eliminate waste, to improve efficiency, and to save another $1.4 billion over the next four years. In doing this, we have imposed a freeze on federal government construction in Ottawa, for example. We have introduced travel restrictions and we are amalgamating or closing some government agencies. We will continue to reduce waste and inefficiency in government operation in the years ahead.

The February budget reported on our progress in achieving and increasing an operating surplus. When we first came to office, the federal government was spending $16 billion more on programs—everything except interest costs—than it collected in revenues. In other words, we had an operating deficit. Today, instead of an operating deficit, we have a surplus. The amount by which revenues exceed program spending is $9 billion. That is a turnaround of $25 billion in just five years. With tight discipline and good management, program spending has been dropped from 19.5 per cent of the economy in 1984 to 16 per cent this year. That is its lowest level in 20 years.

The deficit problem that we faced when we came to office was not just a question of too much spending. As the share of national income, federal revenues had been falling since the mid–1970s. This happened for a number of reasons, including the growth in special tax breaks and flaws in the federal sales tax, that is the old manufacturing sales tax which we are about to replace. We eliminated those tax breaks, we closed tax loopholes, and we increased revenues. As a result of these measures, we have brought about a fundamental structural change in the balance of spending and revenues. It is important to note that 70 per cent of this progress results from our expenditure restraint programs.

Our progress towards a better fiscal balance has not come easily. It has been a hard–earned task. We have all felt the impact of the measures needed to protect and strengthen our future, there is no doubt about that. Many Canadians have had to face difficult adjustments during this period of time. But the economic pay–off has been considerable and continues to be considerable. The economy has enjoyed several years—in fact, seven to be exact—of expansion. Employment has grown steadily over this time and grown strongly. After–tax incomes have gone up. Economic opportunities have been increased and poverty has been reduced in the very best way possible, through the creation of more jobs for Canadians, and that is the best way to reduce poverty.

Our national debt, which was $200 billion when we took office in 1984, has grown, we admit, to $350 billion this year, of which more than 80 per cent consists of the compound interest on the original $200 billion. That demonstrates how important it is to get off the treadmill of borrowing money to pay interest on the past debt, and it helps explain why the deficit is still at $30 billion in spite of the reduction in our spending and the actions we have taken to increase revenues over the past five years. It is not easy to reverse a deficit of $200 billion.

The budget set out, however, an expenditure control plan that will ensure that our operating surplus continues to grow. It will allow us to get off the treadmill of debt. However, that means that we must reduce the burden of the rapidly growing interest payments. To do this, we must deal firmly with the greatest single threat to our continued fiscal and economic progress and that is high inflation.

After seven years of strong economic growth, the economy has exceeded its productivity capacity. This has fuelled inflation and the current slowing of the economy is helping to ease the strain, but the underlying inflationary pressures remain far too high. We must lower inflation as quickly as possible to enable interest rates to come down. That way we can put the economy back on a sustainable path of expansion and make even further and more necessary progress on that deficit.

The prospects for lower inflation and interest rates depend on keeping our costs under control. Responsible price and wage behaviour will ensure that the demands we make on the economy are within its capacity to grow and to produce income. Federal government wage increases have been below the inflation rate and below the pace of wage increases in the private sector since 1984. The budget reaffirmed the government's commitment to this kind of wage restraint.

There simply are no shortcuts to solving our economic and fiscal problems and there is absolutely no magic wand that we can wave to lower interest rates. What we must do is deal with the causes and not with the symptoms. Experience shows us that interest rates are a symptom and that inflation is indeed the cause.

The measures announced in the budget will help to ease inflationary pressures and create a better climate for lower interest rates. This, in turn, will help to reduce the deficit in the years ahead. Lower inflation and interest rates and lower deficits will be mutually reinforcing and lead to a return of a strong and sustained growth pattern in the country.

Together with the measures announced in December, the expenditure restraint measures in the budget will produce savings of $3 billion in 1990–91 and almost $4 billion in the following year. Total expenditure savings of over $19 billion will be achieved over the next five years. As a result, the budget makes it possible to restore the deficit to its downward track, without an increase in taxes. Taxes will not go up.

The deficit will be reduced to $28.5 billion in 1990–91 and cut in half to $14 billion by 1993–94. By the following year, the deficit will be further reduced to $10 billion. The operating surplus of revenues over program spending will, at that point, reach $31 billion. Program spending will fall to 14.2 per cent of national income. That will be the lowest level since the late 1960s. The burden of debt will be reduced as the national debt shrinks relative to national income. The government will begin to be able to pay down its bonds and its treasury bills.

Our economic plan and the firm actions that we have taken in the budget as part of that plan have brought in a clear prospect of lower inflation and a steadily declining deficit. They will help ensure that the government's fiscal position in the 1990s can support the programs that Canadians value most. By persevering, we will attain the greatest control over our destiny and a greater ability to devote our resources to investments in a rising standard of living and a better quality of life for all Canadians.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to question my colleague.

I know that the economy is being discussed at many of the Liberal delegate selection meetings and I wonder if my hon. friend who is from Winnipeg South would be prepared to comment on the delegate selection meeting which took place yesterday. There has been an awful thing happen, Madam Speaker, and I know that you would share my dismay at this. The Liberal delegate selection meetings are stamping out freedom of speech. I am glad my hon. friend is here, because, according to a newspaper report, one Liberal MP, who happens to be in the House today, said:

> "It is anything but a clean act," grumbled John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James). "Look at this. It's a public forum. It's democracy—at least it's supposed to be."

My hon. friend is from Winnipeg and would have seen this deplorable thing happen in her own city. I am sure it is something that all Manitobans must be dismayed by and probably they will be leaving the party in droves. There are not many there, but they would be a drove if they all got together. I wonder if my hon. friend has any comments, within the context of the debate of course, about the dismay in which my hon. friend from Winnipeg—St. James finds himself.

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. friend, the minister, for his question. In fact, I did watch the debate yesterday. I was a little surprised at the lack of a clear-cut alternative that was presented by the opposition to any of the financial or fiscal measures that were put forward as questions by the moderator. In fact, when the questions were posed to all the members, there was a great deal of conflict over just what they would do in order to deal with the economic situation in Canada. Some were in favour of the GST. Some admitted that the GST had to go ahead because otherwise they did not have any alternative at all.

All agreed, I think, that the federal sales tax had to go. In fact, nobody had a clear-cut plan. One of the members thought perhaps a single tax was a good idea, but there was no clear-cut plan to deal with the economy or to deal with the fiscal problems of the country. Certainly, none of them had any idea at all and no concrete suggestion to make about how they might be able to bring down the deficit and deal with the debt. They did not get into anything half as complex as the question of interest rates because, unfortunately, I think the interest rates were a little over their head.

I must say that I was very surprised at the lack of plan, the lack of thinking, the lack of program shown by the Liberal leadership candidates and I think that bodes very badly for the future of the country.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South, in her usual eloquent way, has indicated that she has never had any suggestions from this side about reducing the deficit. I need only remind her of my suggestions that she fire half the cabinet. We have got too large a cabinet and we would save millions by doing that. She could also fire a lot of the parliamentary secretaries and arrange for government advertising to be cut. This profligate government that she supports is spending $14 million advertising the goods and services tax and Canadians do not want the tax. It is trying to convince them by generous hand-outs of money that that is a wise expenditure. Also, the government is spending over $300 million to set up this tax. Does she not think that is wasteful?

The hon. member stands in the House today and says that we never make suggestions on how to save money. We have said scrap this tax and save $300 million; scrap the advertising campaign on this tax and the other government advertising and save another $100 million; cut the cabinet in half and we would save probably another $100 million. Yet the member sits here day after day and says we never make any suggestions.

In addition, my hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood has proposed an alternative tax. We never hear any discussion about the single tax from the other side.

In light of that fact, first, will she apologize to the House for suggesting that we on this side have never made suggestions?

Second, I would like her to comment on another matter. She cited all these figures about deficit reduction. I wish I had the quote here at my fingertips and, had I known she was going to spout such nonsense, I would have brought it with me. In 1985 the Minister of Finance predicted that this year the deficit for the budgetary operations of the government would be $14 billion or $15 billion. Now it is $30 billion. Does she not feel that it is time this government got out and made way for one that can manage the country, instead of one that mismanages the way this one does?

Mrs. Dobbie: Well, Madam Speaker, listening to the numbers that came from my hon. friend across the way, I can certainly understand why he is not the finance critic. It demonstrates his total lack of understanding of how the finances of the country work. He tends to think one can find $100 million here and $100 million there. That is the kind of thinking that got us into so much trouble in the first place. They used $100 million to spend here, $100 million to spend there and $100 million in another place. The next thing we knew the country was in hock up to its ears.

In addition to that, the hon. member has made a comment in the House several times that somehow or other we should not spend money on information programs to inform the Canadian public about what the government is doing and what the government plans to do. That may have been the method of governing the country used by the Liberals in their term of office. It was a period of fear, a period of secrecy, and a period of the right hand not knowing what the left hand was doing.

This government is an open government, and we think it is important that Canadians not only know what we are doing, but understand what we are doing. We take the time and make the effort to ensure that there is ample room for debate and discussion, informed debate and informed discussion.

Information campaigns cost money. That is true. But I think it is extremely important and a very good investment that Canadians be informed of the business of the government so that they can make their appropriate assessments on the polling day that will surely come when we will see the Liberal opposition once more go down to defeat.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, just let me say in response to what the hon. Minister of Transport said a few moments ago that the Liberal Party respects individuality. The Liberal Party is not a monolith and the Liberal Party believes in not muzzling people when they have a point of view. If hotel security staff or people who are in charge of security make what some people believe to be a mistake, do you know what? We are allowed to comment on that. That is all I would say to that remark. As long as the Liberal Party stands for democracy, openness, and fairness, it will behave exactly like that.

I have a question for the hon. member from Winnipeg South. She asked us a moment ago: "Do you have a clear, well-defined plan?" The government has said that and asked that so many times, I want to throw it back to the hon. member from Winnipeg South. In the last five years the government has raised the debt of the country by over 100 percent; from $170 billion to $360 billion. Talk about a giant leap! Talk about a quantum leap! I want to ask the hon. member from Winnipeg South whether that sprung from a well-defined, clear plan?

Where was the plan to raise our debt over 100 per cent, over $100 billion? It is a debt that is now costing the taxpayer, every year, about $39 billion in interest charges. Where was your plan? If you have it, produce it.

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows very well that the debt was out of control when this government took over in 1984. It is very difficult to turn a trend around that has been entrenched in the country by the Liberals for over a period of 20 years or 30 years. I think that in the last five years the government has made remarkable progress in trying to return this economy to something that is rational and that will put more dollars in the pockets of Canadians, more choices in the pockets of Canadians, more jobs out there for Canadians, and more opportunities for business people.

We were going backward before. Now at least our plans are putting us in the place where we can progress forward.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, we have heard a great example which reminded me of the deceased British philosopher, Bertrand Russell. When asked one day about economists, he said he knew of only two economists in the world who understood the intricacies of international monetary economic systems. But, he said, unfortunately, they disagree on the solutions. I guess like statistics and like economists, the more figures and the more economists you can have.

I would ask a fundamental question. Is it the conventional wisdom of the day if one were to ask an economist or people who discuss economics—we hear a lot about inflation—how would we define inflation? Conventional wisdom tells us that inflation, in very common terms, is too many dollars going after too few goods. Does anybody in the country feel that there is a lack of goods on the market? Does anybody feel there are too many dollars on the market after these goods? It is incredible that we can live in a highly technical society and yet pay homage to a myth. It is incredible that this myth can continue. We talk about inflation, but do we really know any more what brings it about? I doubt it.

I hear economists discussing how the economy works. One thing I grant to most economists is that they are experts at explaining where they went wrong once the damage is done.

When it comes to the budget, the average Canadian undoubtedly finds the whole budget process a confusing mass—I will not say mess—of information. Basically we want to know how much we are going to have to pay and, if the occasion ever arose, how much less. Most people do not have the time or the inclination to study the whole budgetary process. It is a complicated, highly complex system, to say the least. Even at that there are many factors that come into play. Of course, there are what we call political considerations. There are interest groups represented by some form of lobby to put forward an argument or favour. Big business interests are taken seriously because it is concerned that we have a strong economy; at least that has always been its line.

What is the role of the majority of the Canadian taxpayers or working Canadians? Where is the input from the backbone of the country, the middle class? Most people refer to themselves as part of the middle class. There are some who feel they are part of the middle class, but with the difficulties of the last years we find there are more people joining the ranks of the less fortunate, to say the least. The government claims to be very sensitive to the concerns of the middle class, which is obviously the backbone of the country and very essential in the democratic process. But, if that fundamental sector of our society is no longer effective, or that the input has been reduced to the point that it is no longer significant, the question is: Where is this whole philosophy we have in the country for many years which distinguishes us from many countries, that we want to be our brother's keeper? Although most members of the House belong to the middle class, we would have to say that our input is decreasing year by year.

For the last I do not know how many years, we have had unbelievable deficits in the country. We have this government that came into power more than five years ago which was going to solve the whole problem of the deficit. Obviously we have seen the results. It more than doubled it over the past years.

Nevertheless, government members claimed that they had the solution to reduce it. Time is running out for them and they have begun to realize it. What emerges on the scene is a totally new form of taxation, the GST. Obviously, they did not tell the electorate before the election of 1988.

I would not want to repeat it here as it is obvious that we know what Canadians think of the GST. I see the hon. minister responsible for tourism. I get floods of mail every week telling me that the GST is going to be disastrous for the tourist industry in the country. That is only one of the victims on the horizon and obviously we are going to hear more from these people in the future.

Madam Speaker, governments have priorities. The issues most often raised by this government lately include the environment, sustainable development, deficit reduction—which is why they came up with the GST—and finally research and development.

The other day on television, I saw a scientist, whose name I forget, who is a member of the association for the advancement of research in Canada. He was explaining that our country's future was based on research and development. And since Canadians' education level is higher than the global average, our future definitely depends on R & D. However, the amounts allocated to research and development are getting smaller with each budget. If we compare our Gross National Product with that of countries such as Japan, the United States and even France, we see that we are not doing enough. And it is disturbing since we live in a world where innovations, inventions and technologies are introduced at an increasingly rapid pace. We must remain at the leading edge of progress.

I remember the National Research Council's previous director, Dr. Larkin Kerwin, a former dean of Laval University. He tried for a few years to demonstrate that Canada's future well-being lay in the field of research and development.

I am obviously not an expert in this area but there are so many articles and books on technological development that we cannot help but realize that R & D will be the backbone of our country's economic health in the years to come. However, very little money is being spent on research and development.

Of course, the Liberal Party of Canada went through difficult years because the recession forced us to practice deficit financing, but we have had time to think the situation over and in retrospect we now realize we can come up with programs that definitely will save the nation from the impending recession.

So, essentially, Madam Speaker, when the middle class have fewer opportunities to influence government decisions, economic stagnation is here to stay. If we choose to leave the interests of all Canadians in the hands of pressure groups, don't expect miracles. A simple look at the tax system that has been around these last 20 years, shows that increasingly the middle class have been forced to pay more than their fair share. You don't have to be an economist to realize that reform is needed in that area. I believe the introduction of the GST especially, which has brought more Canadians under the same cause than anything else over these last few years, will inevitably force us to launch an in-depth reform of our tax system, and this will be the beginning of a new era in Canada where the economic system will reflect the aspirations of all Canadians.

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-62

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I wish to indicate on a point of order that agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2) with respect to the allocation of time to the report stage and third reading of Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allowing a specified number of days, or a day, for the consideration and disposal of both stages of the said bill.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, we have just seen another example of the government's absolute obsession with imposing upon the House a continuous gag of closure, of time allocation.

I submit, Madam Speaker, that that notice just given to you is completely out of order. Debate on report stage has not even started. You can hardly talk about time allocation when the government has not even called Bill C-62.

I submit that that is the utmost of incompetence. I reserve the right to make comments at the appropriate time when the bill does come before the House. I also submit that at this time that notice is completely unacceptable, irreceivable or whatever other word I could use to tell you, Madam Speaker, that it is out of order.

MESURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke-Centre): That Bill C-65, an Act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I would like to make two points on matters that were raised. First, I would like to comment on a matter raised earlier by the hon. member for Saint-Boniface when he suggested concerning the debt, that revenues were increasing. I was not referring to revenues at all, I was referring to the percentage of federal expenditures that were going to debt servicing. Of course revenues will increase. But let us not confuse the issue. Of course revenues increase, but a larger proportion are going to debt servicing.

I heard my colleague say earlier in his comments: "You neglected the debt. It is increasing at an incredible rate". I agree. But if we look at the technical papers that were prepared along with the budget—you can believe it or not—but a debt keeps increasing if you don't pay it off. And when we have 30, 40 or 20, 10 or even a single dollar's worth of deficit in a financial year, obviously we are not paying off our debt.

Madam Speaker, I think Canadians should understand—I think they understand, but I get the impression that the economists opposite don't understand—that when we took over, we inherited a debt of 200 billion. Obviously we haven't paid off a cent, because every year, we have a deficit although it is declining annually.

When you don't pay off a debt, the interest piles up. The interest alone on those $200 billion will have added up to $150 billion in 1990? Meanwhile, the debt keeps piling up. It doesn't need us to increase. We have done our share by bringing the deficit up to 30 billion. However, we are no longer adding to the deficit because we now have a balanced budget. And so the debt will stop piling up.

We have a balanced budget that will meet the demands of our regular expenditures. All we have to do is find a way in our Budget to pay for your expenditures which in the course of time have accumulated to reach the sum of $350 billion.

Mr. Duhamel: Tell us about the last four years.

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): We reduced your debt.

Mr. Duhamel: Not true!

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): You don't understanding a thing!

Mr. Duhamel: Look who's talking!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre would like to make a few comments.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): The hon. member is spouting figures right and left, and here are a few figures that give a very clear picture of how you operate.

Compared with 1984-85, income tax, for all practical purposes, has increased by more than 3 per cent.

An Hon. Member: Personal income tax!

Mr. Assad: That, while corporate taxes have gone down. It seems to me it is pretty clear how you intend to finance this country's debt!

Mr. Michel Champagne (Champlain): I would like to ask my colleague a question, because he raises the subject of companies that pay less tax than they should.

Is it not true that in 1984, when the Conservative government took power, there were tax loopholes whereby individuals could buy boats outside the country, for example, or 200,000 Canadian companies paid no income tax? We have cut down those loopholes very significantly, so as to restore a much better balance.

Madam Speaker, it cannot be said today, as in 1984, that many Canadian companies pay no income tax, because if you compare the Conservative and Liberal records, if I may be a little bit partisan, you realize that far fewer companies can escape taxation with the system that now exists.

Secondly, for my colleague from Manitoba who does not seem to understand, the federal government's budget now shows a surplus of revenue over expenditures—we are not talking about the debt, but about the difference between income and outgo. Compare that to 1984, when we inherited a $ 16-billion deficit. In addition to paying the debt, we had to borrow to pay for the Liberals' programs, because they spent more than they took in.

Now, Madam Speaker, it is completely different. We take in more than we spend and that is sound management. It will enable us in the short term to balance the budget and thus bring total spending under control. We have done more than our share for this cause, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): I am quite tempted to challenge my hon. friend opposite. In absolute figures, you will see that, expressed in dollars—because it is the money that counts—the loopholes were greater and more numerous during your first four years in power then they had been previously.

Check the absolute figures.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, I wish simply to ask my hon. friend to comment on the impact the GST is likely to have on the tourist industry. I believe he is the Liberal party critic in this area and I wish to congratulate him on his speech. I should like him to comment on the GST and its impact on the tourist industry.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): As I said earlier, Madam Speaker, I have received a great many letters from companies in the United States which organize package tours indicating that because of the GST, there will be a lot fewer organized trips to this country generally, and Quebec especially, because most tourists come from the Northeastern part of the United States.

Since the hon. Minister of State (Small businesses and Tourism) is here today and has probably received quite a number of similar letters, I wish to let him know that the companies are asking him at least to allow them to claim the full reimbursement of the GST. It is one of the suggestions, but if this cannot be done, the American companies which are bringing thousands of tourists to Canada generally and especially the Province of Quebec will see their business reduced by as much as between 10 and 20 per cent. That is one of the comments concerning the danger of the GST. All the organizations who are dealing with tourism in Canada realize that the number of tourists in this country will go down because of the GST.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment my hon. colleague on his reasoned approach to this debate. We all know of his long years of studying tax reform.

I think that one of the reasons we are losing our competitive edge in this country is that there is a general feeling the current system is not treating people fairly.

The member talked about tax reform in his speech. Would he expand a little on the extent to which we need to go through comprehensive reform in order to get a competitive feeling and a sense of fairness in our economy so we can generate more dollars to help reduce this deficit?

Mr. Assad: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. This is a subject which can go on and on.

In public life we often mention that not only does a government have to be considered above board and honest, but it must give the perception of being so.

If anything in a democracy should be fair and equitable, it is the tax system. Do Canadian people perceive the tax system as being fair and equitable? Far from it. We see more and more Canadians coming to grips with the fact that the whole system is completely out of kilter.

Of course there is no magic formula. The hon. member came up with a single tax into which people have looked, and all we have to do is go back and take some inspiration from the Carter commission.

I met a professor from the University of Ottawa the other day who told me that we could be inspired because the principles are basic and can be used to transform and bring back a tax system which is fair and equitable.

I want hon. members to realize today that I do not blame them. The problem has increased over the last 20 years and no political party can be blamed. The fact of the matter is that we need a total reform.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, the government recognizes the seriousness of the large and growing public debt. Since 1984 it has taken action to bring the debt problem under control. The record shows that significant progress has been made. The government has been significantly restrained. Waste and inefficiency in government operations have been greatly reduced. The government has taken comprehensive action to close tax loopholes, reduce tax expenditures, reform the income tax system and, with the proposed sales tax reform, move to a secure and fair sales tax base.

As a result of these expenditure actions and revenue measures, the deficit in 1989–1990 has declined by almost $8 billion from its peak in 1984–85 of $38.3 billion. This represents a reduction of 45 per cent in the deficit to the Gross Domestic Product ratio. In other words, while the debt itself is increasing, the ratio of the Gross Domestic Product of this country to the deficit is shrinking. It has done so in the past five years by some 45 per cent.

The growth of the debt has slowed dramatically and is now roughly in line with the growth of the economy's output of goods and services. Behind these improvements in the government's deficit are even more significant changes in the ongoing structures of government spending and revenues.

The government now has a $9 billion operating surplus. The cost of government programs are more than completely financed by ongoing government revenues. This was not the case five years ago when program spending then exceeded some $16 billion. In other words, five years ago for the government to implement the programs it provided for Canadian people, it borrowed some $16 billion on an annual basis.

What we have today is an $8 billion surplus in that regard and that is money that can be used for diminishing the debt. As time goes on and that surplus grows—it has the potential to grow to some $30 to $33 billion over the next four years—the capacity of the government to shrink that debt will be ever increasing.

The government acted to convert the $16 billion operating deficit to a $9 billion operating surplus, a turnaround of some $25 billion in just five years. Relative to the Gross Domestic Product, 70 per cent of this improvement in the operating balance has been achieved by expenditure restraints brought about by the present government. Although substantial progress has been made, the task is certainly not yet complete.

The enormous build up of debt over the last 20 years means that we are on a treadmill dominated by growth in public debt and debt servicing. With an annual deficit of some $30 billion, interest costs increase by $3 billion each year just to service that debt. This means the operating surplus has improved by $3 billion each year just to keep the over–all deficit from rising. This problem is compounded by the vulnerability of the government's fiscal situation to increases in interest rates.

Exposure to interest rate developments was dramatically illustrated in late 1988 and through 1989. With the economy at capacity and inflation pressures mounting, higher than anticipated interest rates added about $6.5 billion to public debt charges in 1989–90, relative to the fiscal framework projected in the February 1988 budget.

In response, the April 1989 budget introduced substantial expenditure reductions and revenue measures. With the action in that budget, the government was able to set out a fiscal framework designed to deal with Canada's fiscal problem.

Since April 1989 inflation pressures have proved to be more strongly entrenched than expected. This has resulted in interest rates remaining higher than expected. Further fiscal action has been necessary to hold the fiscal framework set out in the April 1989 budget.

The substantial expenditure actions in the February 1990 budget together with measures announced by the President of the Treasury Board in December reinforce the momentum of earlier measures. They ensure the goals of the April 1989 budget will be reached. What could only be aimed at in the medium term five years ago is increasingly within reach today.

The deficit will be cut by more than half to $14 billion in 1993–1994. The following year it is predicted to fall to $10 billion or about 1 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product, the lowest level in 25 years. Financial requirements will be in surplus by 1994–1995, allowing the government to begin paying back the debt it previously borrowed on capital markets. The burden of the debt will be falling. The debt to Gross Domestic Product ratio stabilizes in 1991–1992 and declines thereafter, the first decline since 1974–75.

In short, the fiscal environment required for sustained, non-inflationary, economic growth will be firmly in place.

I would like to speak to members of the opposition parties for a few moments, Madam Speaker, if I might. During the course of this debate in this Parliament and the previous Parliament they had a tendency to blame the Government of Canada for a debt situation for which they must bear the greatest burden for it being there in the first place. While recognizing the seriousness of the debt, they have been the same persons who have blindly criticized every cut the Government of Canada has made. They are the very same members of Parliament who have advocated that every imaginable, worth-while project for this country be put in place.

You cannot legitimately face the Canadian people and argue both dimensions of that argument. You cannot make claims as to the seriousness of the debt and that the deficit must come down, while at the same time argue that every worth-while program should be funded to its optimum. It would be nice if there were such a magic solution, if all Canadians in their businesses, families, homes, or in the operation of government could sit and think of what is good, nice, enjoyable and would bring pleasure and security, and then irrespective of the cost put forward some scheme that we spend that amount of money.

There is an isolation of two groups of people in Canada: the NDP and the Liberals. They are the only ones who have the luxury of being able to advocate the wonderfulness of expending on everything, while never having to bear the responsibility for its payment. They also have the luxury of coming before Parliament when there is a borrowing authority bill before it to criticize the debt and say it should not be there, when it is that very debt itself which has over a period of two Parliaments and beyond, through a history of Liberal governments, has been the very structural reason for this problem in the first place. Canadians are not blind to the fact that this problem arises because of a history of irresponsibility toward the financial management of our country. This situation is somewhat analogous to turning the Queen Mary around in the Battle River.

We have a significant problem that has momentum. Short of cancelling 12 government departments, there is no fast turnaround except to work our way out of this problem. The primary engine of doing so, though it will require some increase in revenues and curtailing of expenditures which we have done, the prime opportunity for Canada to work its way out of this is by economic expansion. Because we have had an average 20 per cent economic growth over a period of some five years, we are now put into a situation where the debt vis-à-vis the question of the Gross Domestic Product has actually fallen by 45 per cent.

It is because of the growth and intention for continued growth, as well as trade policies and structured tax policies that we are bringing into place, that this country can now see the light at the end of the tunnel. We are on track, and what we need now is the stability to carry this program to its logical conclusion so that Canadians in all parts of the country can rid themselves of the debt given to us by previous governments and reinforced by the New Democratic Party who loves to spend.

The size of the New Democratic Party gives it the luxury to imagine all those nice things and advocate that it would do them if it were in government. At the same time it has the privilege of being able to say that the debt is too high and should be cut without ever offering an option of how it can spend more and cut the debt faster. It is something that can only exist in the mind of an opposition party member.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on the previous speaker's argument for a restructuring of the tax system. I do not think there is any doubt that that is necessary.

I know, having just returned from my riding, that the opposition to the goods and services tax initiative is very widespread. No amount of beating the drum about concern for the deficit will bring about support for that initiative. Small business operators in my constituency are outraged that this is the way the government is trying to address the deficit concern. I was able to tell them—and perhaps the hon. member would like to comment—that program funding has been less than government expenditure over the last two years.

The real problem is interest rates and relates to this government's mismanagement of the fiscal house of this country. The government should have the courage to talk about the interest rate policy and to address the outrage, the obscenity of high interest rates and how they are affecting the small business community in my constituency and elsewhere. It is the small business operation that creates jobs in our country. It is the small business operator that creates wealth.

How does the hon. member respond to the analysis that high interest rates are making the debt grow rather than program financing?

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, I concur with the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands when she recognizes, as do most of us in this House, that small business is the engine of our society and will certainly make Canada grow, both in terms of the amount of generation of wealth for the country and in terms of the number of persons employed. It is not the large business sector which does that.

However, I do want to respond to two parts of her question. First, the GST. I strongly support the goods and services tax because I believe that it is a far more fair method of taxation than the present manufacturers' sales tax.

I would like to give the hon. member an example from an area very near me of a person who builds luxury motor homes. He buys the frame and the engine and pays the manufacturers' sales taxes on it under today's system. He buys the shell of a motor home, pays the manufacturer's sales tax and installs it. He buys the carpet, the cabinetry, the television set, the telephone, the radios, the couches, the swivel chairs, the tables, and virtually everything else that goes into it, and on every item pays a manufacturer's sales tax. The person adds up all of those costs, puts on his portion of profit and then, because he is deemed to have remanufactured, now must add on a manufacturer's sales tax.

Can the hon. member tell me how that helps Canadian small business persons in a competitive world? Does that not mean that more manufactured products are going to be made in the United States? Is it not the reason why we are trying to get from under the flood of imported products coming into our country by changing a high tax at the manufacturing level that cascades through to all of those various levels from there on, through transportation, through wholesale to retail. It increases the tax and then arrives for the people of Canada to pay in a hidden way. It limits our capacity to export and increases the potential for import products. I ask the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands to defend that to the small business person as an appropriate way of doing business.

The hon. member also made a comment about interest rates. Let us take a look at the question of interest rates. We have, in this country, this year a living example of what happens with interest rates. It would be very nice to be able to flick our fingers and phone up the Governor of the Bank of Canada and say: "Lower the interest rates" by some percentage, 1 per cent, four per cent, 10 per cent, or whatever the NDP would choose as a nice number. The NDP might like to have no interest rates, no cost on capital at all.

However, the NDP should bear in mind that the Governor of the Bank of Canada tried that once already this year. He lowered the rate by a quarter of a per cent and within a week the run on the dollar was unbelievable. It cost this country a couple of billion dollars to shore up the dollar because of the run on the dollar. What is the situation with members of the NDP? They ignore that incident that took place within the last 60 days. They do not bear in mind some response to the extent to which Canada is beyond its capacity to pay. It is not only the federal government that is borrowing, but provincial governments, municipal governments, plus Canadians themselves.

We are one of the biggest debtor nations, on a per capita basis, anywhere in the world. Canadians go out and borrow. In 1988 we had one of the most extensive high borrowing years we have ever had in our history. That was all Canadians, not just governments. In 1989, it was 27 per cent higher than in 1988, which was a record year.

What would the hon. member do in the face of that? She would lower interest rates, which would mean that the borrowing would go on until we became like Argentina and Brazil, until we have inflation rates like they have of 100 per cent, 300 per cent and 500 per cent. Then let her go home to her small business people and say that's good for them. Let her go to the senior citizens and say that's good for them. "You people here on fixed incomes, that is just good for you, because it does not matter that we have inflation rates of several hundred per cent. We have low interest rates."

That might be all right for the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands. I think that is a very cruel and inappropriate way to put forward a financial policy for the Government of Canada, where there are so many people on fixed incomes, the indigent, the elderly, those who do not have the capacity to take advantage of inflationary factors and have the opportunity to put them in a position that she would advocate for them. I would resist such a policy.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I rise today with some trepidation, having listened to my hon. friend from Alberta. I was worried before I got up, now I am almost in a panic because of what he said. I feel exactly the opposite. Let me clear the air before I even begin my commentary by replying to the hon. member's suggestion that we do not have any alternatives as New Democrats as to how to raise additional revenues. I will tell the hon. member the following.

I did not hear him in his speech today say that we Conservatives like the idea of corporations not paying income tax. I did not hear him say that there were 69,000 profitable corporations in this country not paying any income tax at all. I did not hear him say that in the last year while personal taxes went up for Canadians by 16 per cent, corporate taxes went up only by 9 per cent, to say nothing about the additional excise taxes that people have to pay.

I did not hear him say that perhaps it is time for Canada to join the rest of the world with some kind of a wealth tax. We are one of the few countries in the entire western world that does not have some kind of wealth tax so that when you inherit $10 million, you should pay some tax. I did not hear anything about that. No.

All I heard was that he believes we should put the GST into place so that no matter how regressive, cruel and brutal it is on people, they should pay more because they are not going to touch the corporations.

Canadians are asking why Brascan, with profits in excess of $200 million last year, paid not a penny in income tax, when people working for a living in Red Deer, Lethbridge or High River will have to pay as much as $2,000 extra because of the goods and services tax. Why does he not explain that?

I have this very uncanny feeling that the government is softening us up for the big blow, a poll tax. They are looking at Margaret Thatcher and they are saying that Margaret Thatcher jammed this goods and services tax in and now the next one is to put a poll tax on. I read the reports from the Fraser Institute, which is the bible for the Conservative Party of Canada. They are advocating a poll tax for Canada. They are saying that every single Canadian, regardless of their level of income or where they live should be paying a poll tax, just like the old Chinese head tax of years ago which we abhor in principle.

That is what is coming, just as sure as we are standing here. That will be in next year's budget, I suppose. Because if there is some way to move the financial responsibility of providing for Canada from the wealthy, the privileged and the large corporations down on to the backs of working people, that is what this government wants to do and a poll tax is an excellent way to do that. Look at Margaret Thatcher. There is a rebellion in the streets in London.

In Canada there is not a rebellion in the streets yet. But Canadians are just beginning now to realize that to stop the goods and services tax, they do not have to defeat the Tory government. All that is necessary is a handful of Conservative back-benchers who have the guts and gumption to represent their constituents in this House and vote against the goods and services tax like their constituents are asking them to do.

My hon. friend from Alberta would have to look under a lot of rocks out there to find people who support this goods and services tax. The Conservative back-benchers are all decent individuals, but something happens when they get together in here. They lose any sense, compassion, thoughtfulness and caring. They listen to the Minister of Finance from Bay Street where everybody is doing fine. They have large incomes, the lobbyists have large incomes, and he is surrounded by public servants whose incomes are in excess of $100,000 a year. They are all comfortable. Everybody is working. Their spouses are all doing well. He never gets out to meet normal people. I do not know if the Minister of Finance knows any normal person.

However, let me tell my hon. friend from Alberta about an experience that I had only two weeks ago. I went up the North Thompson River and stopped in at a ranch. I was surprised to see a "For Sale" sign on the gate. Perhaps one of the saddest days of my life occurred that afternoon. This was a ranch well known to the area, third generation on the land. They had carved out of some pretty rugged country a profitable cattle operation.

I drove up to the ranch house, knocked on the door and was invited in. I looked into the faces of some of the saddest people I have ever seen. Here was the mother and the father working probably 18 hours a day, seven days a week, to try to keep that ranch going. They had three kids, one teenager and the others were perhaps around eight and ten. They were working after school. They would work all weekend month after month after month to try to keep this small cattle operation going.

They told me that because of the high interest rates of this government, they had to pay interest rates of 15 and 16 per cent. They said: "Nelson, you cannot keep an agricultural operation going with interest rates at 14, 15, 16 or higher per cent." As my hon. friend says, you cannot keep anything going at those rates.

Yet the rates keep going up. This past week we have reached a point where we have the highest rate since 1982. My Conservative friends opposite ought to be remembering what it was like around here in 1981 and 1982. They were on their high horses in here then. Something happens to Tory brains when they cross this floor. I can remember day after day, ranting and raving and screaming at Allan MacEachen or Marc Lalonde, how horrible they were because the rates had gone up to 10 per cent, and then 11, 12 and 13 per cent. They are higher than that now.

What do I hear from the Conservative benches? I hear nothing, absolutely nothing, rather than that they support this high interest rate policy that is driving not only these ranch families into bankruptcy where they have lost not what they have put into it, but what their grandparents put into that land. They have lost three generations of work because of this government's high interest rate policy. It is a sad day.

We walked out to the farm gate. Here was a pretty rugged individual, and by the time our conversation finished, his eyes were bleary, nearly in tears, because of what he had to do. He could not provide for his family, in spite of working literally day and night for months. Not because of any inadequacy in management, not because of any problem in terms of their desire and willingness to work, but because of this government's high interest rate policy.

They sit there glumly and say: "Aren't we wonderful?". I cannot imagine a single Conservative being elected from the prairies next time. There is an abandonment of the prairies in terms of the farm community. Hundreds and hundreds of farms are for sale, or bankrupt. People are saying: "We are not going bankrupt, we are just walking out. We cannot meet our debt loads." What do we get from this government? It is laughable: a program to make it easier to leave your farm. That is what we get. Not a debt moratorium. No, nothing like that. Not any serious effort at debt restructuring, but a program to get out of agriculture and turn it all over to agri-business. That is the goal now. It is an abandonment of the family farm, the family ranch in this country. It is a very serious situation.

Two Friday's ago, my hon. friend, the member for Mission—Coquitlam, had before this House a private members' initiative for a bill of rights for children. Over the last number of weeks she put together with others a very thoughtful presentation that there are many signs in our country that perhaps people do not respect children. We just saw it today in the news. A family was being evicted because of the nuisance of a child crying.

We see massive cut-backs in social housing, where this could not occur. The saddest day for many of us was when the motion came to establish a child's bill of rights, where we would recognize that young children in our country have some rights. Granted, our colleagues and friends, the Liberals voted in favour of this. As a block, the New Democrats voted in favour of it. It was a private members' day. We voted row by row because individuals were supposed to be counted. But no, the Conservative government laid on a whip and said: "Every Tory member in this place must vote against a children's bill of rights."

Can you imagine what kind of a signal that sends to this country, Madam Speaker? The government could have supported and ignored the legislation, but they voted against it. They stood in their places, dozens and dozens of Conservative members voting against Canada establishing a children's bill of rights. No wonder the people of this country are becoming cynical with this government.

Why would we be surprised? In the budget presentation the Conservative members got on their feet and were applauding when the Minister of Finance said: "Do you know how we are going to save money? We are going to cut back and make veterans who are lying sick in hospitals pay more for their room and board". How low and mean and nasty can you get? The conservatives clapped and applauded that initiative to hit the veterans. Of all the people in this country, those who are lying in a hospital bed are told that they have to pay more now.

That is only the beginning. Without any hesitation, we can afford spending $40 million a day on our defence, but we cannot afford women's shelters. We have to close them down. We asked the Minister responsible for the Status of Women whether she would intervene. No, she thinks this is a good idea. We cannot afford women's shelters across this country. What kind of a country are we coming to?

When people come to Canada, becoming a Canadian citizen means certain things. For example, it means you can have a pension when you retire. But this government has just changed the rules. They said that only some people can now qualify for pensions. If you have worked your life and have set aside money and have prepared yourself for your retirement years so you have some income, you are not going to get a Canada Pension. If you can prove that you have a certain income, you do not get Canada Pension any more. A fundamental principle of what it means to be a Canadian is that when you retire after contributing to the development of the greatest country in the world, you are entitled to Canada Pension. But this government says: "No you are not".

Another element of our citizenship is something we call family allowance for every child, whether they are from western Canada or eastern Canada, whether they live in Quebec or Manitoba, whether they are wealthy or poor, francophone or anglophone. The government is now saying that no, not everybody in this country gets family allowance any more. So, thousands and thousands of families who would normally be eligible for family allowance, are no longer eligible. It is the Conservative view of the world.

That is just the beginning. Do we not recall the promises and promises of a few years ago that we would have a child care program in this country. We are one of the few western countries now that does not have a comprehensive child care program. And do we have that? Nary a word. No child care.

The other day we saw cuts to post-secondary education. The increases that would normally be going to develop Canada's most valuable resource, our young people, will be capped. Then a fee is going to be added, so a student in need of a loan will be charged a user fee now. A student may say: " that is okay, because normally I go and work in a Challenge '90 program in the summer. I will use one of the federal government's SEED programs so at least I will have a summer job and I will save and scrimp for my education." The government says: "Hold it. That is off now." There have been massive cuts to that.

The government does not want to support young people preparing for their education. "We do not want to make it easy to get a student loan. We are going to establish a user fee. We do not want to continue to invest, as we have, in colleges, vocational schools, universities and technical colleges." What kind of a government is this that is failing to recognize that our most important resource is not oil, codfish or coal. It is our young people, and they are being abandoned by this government.

Do you recall the day, Madam Speaker, when the minister responsible for native people thought he had a great idea. Rather than encourage native young people to go to university, college, vocational school or technical school to develop the necessary skills to enable native people to provide the necessary financial and social and economic infrastructure for their people, he limited again the opportunity for native young people for post-secondary educational opportunities. What kind of investment in the future is that?

Today, of course, we reminded ourselves of the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The government thought that it was time that we took off hundreds of thousands of people off the unemployment insurance rolls. We should make it a lot more difficult for people to qualify so that people who live in Newfoundland would have a more difficult time qualifying and that we should take money from the unemployed, the people who need the money the most, to provide money for retraining. When hundreds of thousands of people are taken from the unemployment insurance support program in this country, what kind of signal does that send to people in the have not areas of Canada where regional development programs have been cut back?

My hon. friend from Prince George—Bulkley Valley for months and months has been asking the Minister of Forestry where are those forestry agreements. We know what we require to sustain one of the most important natural resources in this country. We need something like $1 billion over the next number of years to develop reforestation and silviculture to ensure that that resource stays in place for future generations. There is tremendous opportunity in employment.

Even setting aside the tens of thousands of jobs that could be generated, the fact is that we cannot keep cutting down trees and not replanting them, considering that our forest exports are our number one export commodity by far. Does this government look ahead and say that it is time that we invested in this critical resource. It is time that we provided for silviculture programs and reforestation and provided employment for literally tens of thousands of people. No, we must cut back.

I was going to talk about the small business sector because the Minister of State for Small Business was in the House a minute ago. We recognize that about 96 per cent of the new jobs in Canada will be created by the small business sector. What is it that we are doing to assist and encourage the small business sector? What programs are in place to encourage and support small business in Canada? Have there been any new initiatives? No, there have not. Have there been any old initiatives? No, there are not. Only the GST is going to make it a logistical paperwork nightmare. My hon. friend says it is going to make small business persons bureaucrats and tax collectors. They are being asked to be federal government tax collectors now with no compensation whatsoever.

My hon. friend from Alberta talks a lot about the debt. When the Conservatives came into office in 1984 the national debt was $160 billion. One gets the impression that the Conservatives were actually worried about that and took steps to reduce it. Today the debt is $351.6 billion. That is virtually a doubling of the debt in their short period in office. This idea of blaming something that happened in this country years ago sounds like a worn-out record. People do not believe that the reason that the Conservatives have doubled the debt is because of the Liberals. Granted, there was a point there because of the corporate loopholes that the Liberal government brought in, particularly Mr. Turner. It was possible for Brascan, Confederation Life, Xerox of Canada, and Power Corporation to pay no income tax last year. In fact, I could list 69,000 corporations. Why is it that my Conservative friends opposite do not explain why they feel to have 69,000 profitable corporations paying no tax at all is a good idea. I never hear them explaining that.

In conclusion, the government is stating that we must reduce the debt and the deficit, that we must impose a goods and services tax on the people of Canada, and yet keep in place a tax system so that Brascan, Confederation Life and Xerox Canada, just those three, with profits in excess of $400 million paid no income tax whatsoever. Does that not put it into perspective. This government says one thing to its corporate privileged friends and for the rest of Canada acts in a very big brother way and says: "We know what is best for you. In the end you will understand that increasing taxes like the goods and services tax so that each Canadian family will pay probably $2,000 more taxes next year is a good idea". No wonder that the people of Canada have become so cynical and, as reflected in the polls, only 17 per cent of the people of Canada support this government and that is dropping.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, just a short question for my hon. friend. Is my hon. friend for or against the loss carried forward provisions in the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Riis: That is an interesting question: "Is my hon. friend for or against". We recognize, Madam Speaker, that from time to time and particularly on certain kinds of businesses that carried forward losses makes good planning.

But do we really need to help Brascan? Is Brascan in that kind of financial difficulty? Is Xerox Canada in that kind of difficulty?

Mr. Lewis: For or against?

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend asks me to be more precise. Let me be more precise. If you are a farmer, and I am thinking particularly of some of the farmers with large farms who would qualify in the corporate sector in places like southern Saskatchewan who have lost their crops because of drought, who have suffered real serious difficulties, yes carrying forward some of those losses makes sense.

Mr. Lewis: Just farmers?

Mr. Riis: No, I am not saying just farmers. I am using that as an example. I say I cannot accept the notion that Power Corporation, Nova Corporation, General Motors, the Royal Bank of Canada and the Bank of Montreal some years pay no income tax whatsoever. That I cannot accept.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I think that sometimes the hon. member puts a light on businessmen in this country that does them a disservice. Being a former business person from downtown Toronto, I know hundreds of people who work on Bay Street and do the best they can to be good corporate citizens. They read the Income Tax Act as it is and take advantage of the legal preferences and options that they have to reduce their tax base. Of course, we have developed this tax loss over the years as instruments of creating employment.

I should tell my friend that not only small businessmen are opposed to the GST. I have not found very many large corporations which support the GST. I think it is very important that we do not taint all big businessmen in this country as being for the GST because in fact they are not.

I have been working hard on some constructive alternative to this GST because we do have a deficit and debt problem for which all of us directly or indirectly have a responsibility. My question to him as a senior member of the New Democratic Party is, has he looked at one of the possible options called the single tax? I would be interested to hear his views on it and if he has any positive remarks or even his negative remarks as to how it could be improved so that we could constructively advance this debate.

Mr. Riis: Yes, I have read the hon. member's book on the single tax and I think he makes a good point. I want to clarify one thing.

When I say that there are companies like the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Bank of Canada that in some years pay no income tax, that is not because they are doing anything wrong themselves. They are following the rules that the government provides for them. It is the government that is responsible for the fact that some of these large corporations pay no income tax. It has nothing to do with them. They are just following the rules that the government provides for them.

The point the hon. member makes that there are large companies that are not in support of the goods and services tax is a point that ought to be made. His book on the single tax as an alternative to the goods and services tax reminds me of the work we put into it as a political party, coming up with alternatives as well. I take him very seriously when he says that he felt an obligation to provide an alternative for consideration.

We too thought it was appropriate that if we are going to criticize the government's goods and services tax, we should provide an alternative. And we have. We submitted a paper as part of the finance committee and laid out in a very clear way a number of alternative steps that would generate the same amount of money for the national treasury as the goods and services tax.

His single tax has merit. I do not want to say more than that. However, it has serious problems in terms of being regressive in some ways, but that is not to say they could not be overcome as well by using refundable tax credits and other tax mechanisms. I will at least give him credit for providing an alternative.

Could he respond to my question as to what he thinks about the New Democrats five major alternatives to the goods and services tax. We have provided alternatives. I do not remember any from the Liberals with the exception of the hon. member's text that he circulated some weeks ago.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, it is not often that I express disappointment in a speech in the House, but I was disappointed because the speech of member of the New Democratic Party, on the whole, basically did two things. First, it outlined how he would like to have more spending when the debate before Parliament today is on the borrowing bill. That party wants to do more spending.

Second, I presume it is either tremendously out of character or it was an accident, but he gave a long list of unbelievable misstatements. I just want to set the record straight on a few of them. He says that members on the government side are not representing their constituents because they favour the goods and services tax. I want him to know that by and large my constituency is an agricultural farming constituency. One of the principles of the goods and services tax is to take the cost of taxation out of the cost of doing business. Therefore, farm input costs will decrease by 2 per cent. Those are the farmers we are serving. This is an advantage to them because the tax is removed from operating costs. The hon. member, by his position, defends more taxation for farm producers.

He stated that there have not been any initiatives for business development under the present government. Well, what is ACOA? What is the Atlantic opportunities company? What is the western diversification office? One thousand new projects have been started by the western diversification office.

Under the previous Liberal government, such an office would have been headquartered in Ottawa. It is not. It is headquartered in Edmonton with branch offices in Regina, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Ottawa. There is a very small one in Ottawa for the deputy minister and few very close staff. But 1,000 new projects have been developed.

Ask anyone who has any relationship at all to that organization. There are very favourable comments from those who have approached the western diversification office. And I speak of that rather than ACOA because that is the one with which I am most familiar.

Yet the member stands in Parliament and says there are no initiatives and no old initiatives by this government when in fact 1,000 new projects have been started.

Then he talked about something which absolutely shell-shocked me, Madam Speaker. It is a trick of the NDP. He talks about a poll tax. Scare tactics. With respect to the goods and services tax, he knows we included in the economic statement of November 20, 1984, the first fall we were in office, a full statement of what we needed to do. We stated that getting rid of the manufacturers' sales tax was one of our objectives.

In subsequent statements and budgets we talked about the need to revise that tax. Throughout even the last election there was a stated indication—although I know it was overshadowed by the the free trade debate and the free trade issue—that we were going to change to a goods and services tax.

He cannot find one reference by any one of us in the government that we would ever bring in a poll tax. Yet he has the audacity to stand up in Parliament and scare Canadians. What a despicable thing for him to do. He says, without one shred of evidence or a bit of logic, but simply to scare people and to accuse members, that we are going to introduce something that we have no intention of doing. So I say to the hon. member, stand up and defend your credibility.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I must interrupt the hon. member. The time for questions and comments have expired. A short comment from the member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, we are now facing the spectre of a goods and services tax. I find it quite astonishing that the hon. member says that his constituents support the goods and services tax.

Mr. Malone: I didn't say that.

Mr. Riis: I wonder if we could make a wager here in terms of our seats. I would challenge him when he says that the farm community of his constituency supports the goods and services tax and that they are going to be winners.

Why do we talk about the poll tax? I remember distinctly that we struggled in a federal election campaign not long ago. I cannot remember Conservative members across the country saying that if they were elected they would impose a 7 per cent or 9 per cent goods and services tax on the people of Canada. The hon. member for Mississauga South said it and he was pooh-poohed by the Minister of Finance and the leader of the party, saying he was not speaking for the government.

In closing, I simply say that I look to the Conservative think tanks to see what ideas that they might come up with. When I see the Fraser Institute advocating a poll tax, and when I see cabinet ministers and the Social Credit government in British Columbia, good Conservative members, saying they believe that this is the route to go, I become very concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Beauharois—Salaberry.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I always wonder when taking part in and listening closely to debates in this House if hon. members are talking for an audience in the Gallery or on TV or just for the sake of having something afterword to stuff in their bulk mailings.

We hear all kinds of things. We hear for example that we will not be re-elected, we only have 17 per cent support. Well, as far as I can remember, Madam Speaker, in our first mandate I think we went down to 22, 23 per cent, I wont argue on one percentage—

Mr. Gauthier: You bought the election after that!

Mr. Hudon: No. We even went down to something like 12 per cent in Quebec. The most important survey is done five minutes before the election. From 57 Conservative members in Quebec, we went to 62 Conservative members in Quebec.

When people are asked: Do you support the GST or not? This is tantamount to asking people: Are you for or against taxes? Of course people will say: "No, I oppose that". But when it comes down to understanding how the system will work, everything will become much more interesting. So referring to 17 per cent does not make much sense in my view.

And if hon. members from the NPD from time to time lecture on those horrible tax loopholes, how come, Madam Speaker, when came the time to vote on the flow—through shares, one of the largest tax loopholes ever in support of the mining industry—I am on complete agreement as to that—how come they supported it when we wanted to repeal it?

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): They even had an emergency debate on that.

Mr. Hudon: Indeed, Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Champlain suggests they even had an emergency debate on that. They are not listening because they are referring to the children's Bill of Rights. The children's Bill of rights was not enacted last week, we already have trouble enough maintaining a consistent position right now on the Canadian Charter of rights and freedoms and finding out what it implies. Before referring to a second charter, let us first implement the first one. And if they are so bright as to lecture us on the children's Bill of rights and develop a consistent position on it, Madam Speaker, why don't they develop a consistent and lasting position on Meech Lake? We can come up with new principles.

Same thing with the GST. So far I have given about 45 conferences on this tax without feeling any strong opposition to it except from groups that have not met with me. There is a case pending against the GST in the Beauharnois—Salaberry riding. It is happening everywhere. They are using the bishop of Valleyfield's paper, which he is sending everywhere, to mobilize people against the GST. They have taken over every golden age club I have met with one after the other. It is obvious. We will not ask people what they think. I will not ask my relatives whether they are for or against taxes. Everybody is against taxes. But it is not what they want to do. They do not really want a debate on the GST. They only want a bunch of signatures they can slam down on the Member's desk three weeks later saying: "See, your people are dead set against the tax." When did you ever give me the chance to defend myself and explain this project? Never. But we will not talk about that. Inconsistencies are not hard to find. I am anxious to see my colleagues from the Liberal Party.

I remember a debate that took place in Quebec during a referendum, a famous speech by the then Prime Minister Trudeau who talked about a "yes" that meant "no" and a "no" that meant "yes". Vote for the party and we will repatriate the Constitution in an honourable manner. We are putting our heads on the line. They even talked about the economic spin-offs from the F-18 contract that night. Yes, Quebec would get everything. Then the Conservative government came to power and gave the F-18 maintenance contract to Canadair in Quebec. Yesterday, in Winnipeg, their future leader according to the polls—because they apparently believe in polls—their future leader from Quebec said it was horrible that Winnipeg did not get the F-18 maintenance contract. What will he tell Quebecers in his last mandate?

It is easy enough to tell. I am only trying to show that if you spit in the air, it will soon hit you in the face. I can not wait to hear what he will have to say in Quebec about the F-18 maintenance contract. I am also anxious to see the New Democrats go to Quebec with their inconsistent position regarding Meech Lake, because our consistent position in the debate on the GST and the budget is defendable. I told them: " Do not bother asking people if they are for or against taxes. They are against. Do not ask a government if it would rather risk its neck by proposing nothing. It will not like that."

Two budgets ago, when we had the same grocery list as our colleagues opposite, I went to buy a pack of cigarettes in Valleyfield—maybe it is not a good example to use—

Mr. Gauthier: Smoking is bad for your health!

Mr. Hudon: Smoking is indeed very bad for your health. A woman came up to me and said: "What a bunch of smart alecs you Conservatives are, raising taxes on cigarettes".

Mr. Gauthier: And she was right.

Mr. Hudon: I told her: "Yes, you're right. We are as unoriginal as our predecessors because we came up more or less with the same grocery list: gasoline, cigarettes and booze". And I added: "But the tax on cigarettes is the best you can dream of: when you don't want to pay it, you just don't smoke"!

We failed to explain clearly that the GST is a consumption tax. It stands to reason that low-income people consume less and spend less. Madam Speaker, the less we spend the lower the tax we pay. Members on the other side fail to point out that households earning $30,000 or less will be entitled to refunds because we want to help people whose family income falls within that range. The tax system stems from a cultural and historical evolution which dates back to a good many years. Madam Speaker, do you know why the manufacturer's tax came into being 75 years ago? At the time it was one way to tax rich people because all the others made whatever they needed for themselves. The idea was to tax the rich. Someone asked: What do rich people do with their money? They buy manufactured goods. So, that is what we will tax. If I were prime minister of a Moslem country I would tax pigs and European clothing because they are banned by religion.

A government does the same thing. At the time they wanted to tax rich people and manufactured goods, but what do rich people do with their money these days, Madam Speaker? They do not buy more goods, they use services.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 6.45 p.m., pursuant to the order made Thursday, March 29, 1990 according to Standing Order 78, it is my duty to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading of the Bill presently before the House.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I am wondering if the hon. member for Miramichi might reconsider his decision to vote. I think he came into the Chamber a bit late. He is an experienced member. In the best interests of the House, it might be best if he were to reconsider his decision.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne: Madam Speaker, when I came into the House my Whip was still standing. However, I am in your hands.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, technically all members of the House should hear the question before they vote. That is the only technicality that must be addressed.

If he or she heard the question, then he or she can vote. That is the only technical argument that one puts in relation to a vote.

Members must be seated before the vote starts so that there can be order in this place. I do not think there was any disorder caused by the hon. member for Miramichi. If he heard the question, then I cannot argue with him.

Mr. Dionne: Madam Speaker, I did indeed hear the question put.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition raised a question of privilege relating to events of Friday, March 30, 1990, a day designated as the first allotted day of the supply period ending June 30, 1990 under Standing Order 81(17).

The hon. member argued that the privileges of opposition members had been breached by the call for quorum made by the chief government Whip. Since this had resulted in a count-out, the Acting Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 29(3), had declared the House adjourned. By count-out I mean there were not enough members in the House to provide a quorum.

The result, in the view of the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition, denied opposition members the right to debate the motion on an environmental action plan and so infringed their privileges. The hon. member seeks redress through the redesignation of a first allotted day for the current supply period.

The Chair will first deal with this key question. The provisions regarding quorum have been in existence since 1867. Standing Order 29(3), in place since 1982, provides additionally for a 15-minute bell to summon members. It reads as follows:

> If, during a sitting of the House, the attention of the Speaker is drawn to the lack of a quorum, the Speaker shall, upon determining that a quorum is lacking, order the bells to ring for no longer than fifteen minutes; thereupon a count of the Members present shall be taken, and if a quorum is still lacking, the Speaker shall adjourn the House until the next sitting day.

On Friday last, as the Votes and Proceedings indicate, no government members were present for the count. Faced with a count-out, the Acting Speaker declared the House adjourned.

The Chair has carefully reviewed the events of March 30, and it has noted that Orders of the Day were reached and debate duly begun on the opposition motion. Later, under the provisions of Standing Order 26(1), the House continued to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment to consider the business before it. In other words, it was moved that the House sit beyond three o'clock that afternoon and that was sustained, so debate was continuing past the ordinary hour of adjournment which was three o'clock. That motion did not come from the government side; it came from the opposition side.

The hon. House leader of the Official Opposition argues that the quorum call by the chief government Whip truncated the debate and effectively robbed the opposition of its allotted day. However, under the circumstances, it is difficult for the Chair to conclude that the government must bear the sole responsibility for the House adjourning for want of a quorum.

It has often been argued that allotted days are a fundamental right of the opposition minorities in the House, offering a specific forum for debate on their concerns. If one accepts, as your Speaker does, that this perspective is accurate, then one is also left to conclude that the opposition must not only accept but would carefully guard the need to maintain a quorum for debate on its items of business.

The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca commented vigorously about the consequences of government members not responding to the quorum bells. As I said yesterday, this falls into the realm of tactics. I think I also added that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Arguably, if it so wished, the government could have marshalled 15 members to rise in their places and oppose the extension of the sitting. This it did not do. The invocation of Standing Order 29(3) may have ended the debate earlier than the opposition might have wished, but its effect on the government side is not without considerable consequence as well.

Hon. members who had planned to speak on the motion may well be disappointed that this proved impossible, but a review of the circumstances offers no evidence that their rights were in any way interfered with or their privileges breached.

Let us turn now to the consequences of the count-out, namely the dropping of the continuing order for supply from the Order Paper.

The authorities are clear on this subject. Bourinot's fourth edition states at page 218:

> A "count out" will always supersede any question that is before the House; and if an order of the day for supply, or for the reading or committal of a bill, be under consideration at the time, and there is no quorum present, the House must be asked at a subsequent sitting to revive the question that may have lapsed in this way.

The hon. House leader for the Official Opposition cites Standing Order 82(1) which reads:

> At the commencement of each session, the House shall designate, by motion, a continuing Order of the Day for the consideration of the business of supply.

• (1110)

He goes on to contend that the loss of the continuing order carries dire consequences, namely the loss of all supply proceedings in this session, and that reinstatement of that order will re-establish the number of votable opposition motions available to the parties in opposition.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier also raised with the Chair the status of the business of supply now before various standing committees of the House, I am referring to the Estimates for fiscal year 1990-91. He claimed that since the continuing order for supply was no longer on the order paper, standing committees no longer have the authority to continue consideration of Budget votes, at least not until the continuing order is reinstated. I must say the hon. member argued his case very convincingly. However, the Chair has great difficulty in accepting his statements.

It is true there are no precedents for this situation, but I fail to see how the loss of the continuing order for supply could erase previous decisions by the House to adopt interim supply or refer consideration of the Estimates to its committees. However, the fact remains that the House does not at this time have any mechanism for considering supply proceedings until a continuing order is reinstated on the order paper.

[English]

The Chair agrees with hon. members that a continuing order must be redesignated, but I do not see how last Friday's events could have simply erased the decisions the House has made to date on supply in this session. I refer hon. members to the document, Status of Bills and Motions, where pages 59 through 66 list the business of supply already considered by the House. I would note, in particular, the decisions of February 22, 1990, No. 31 on page 64 of the Status, referring the Main Estimates, 1990-1991 to standing committees where they are now under consideration.

The authorities are clear on the consequences of reviving a dropped order. I quote from Erskine May, twenty-first edition at page 315:

> If on such an order of the day procedure has been commenced and interrupted, the proceeding thus revived is set down for resumption at the position indicated by the last decision of the House entered upon the Votes and Proceedings.

I would therefore rule that once the order for supply has been re-established, the business of supply will resume at the point of the last House decision; namely awaiting the second allotted day in the current period to be designated. As far as the number of votable motions are concerned, we are also at the same point we were last Friday. There remain no more votable motions available in the current supply calendar.

Next, I would like to deal with the fourth and final point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. Put simply, he asks if the motion of the minister for the redesignation of the permanent order of supply is a debatable motion, pursuant to Standing Order 67(1), which reads as follows:

> (p) such other motion, made upon Routine Proceedings, as may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the House, the maintenance of its authority, the appointment or conduct of its officers, the management of its business, the arrangement of its proceedings, the correctness of its records, the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meetings or adjournment.

The argument of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier was supported by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who further argued that a July 3, 1917 precedent was not applicable because it dealt with reinstatement of a bill at second reading stage. He also claimed that Standing Order 67(1)(p) is the operative mechanism to reinstate the supply proceedings ordered by way of notice and debate.

The July 3, 1917 case was indeed about a bill being reinstated and the Speaker did rule based on a quote of May's twelfth edition, page 219, that the motion did not require notice and was not subject to debate. Following this precedent there are others: Wednesday, March 12, 1919 and August 1, 1956, to mention only two. The latter is important because the House had just reviewed in 1955, the equivalent of Standing Order 67(1)(p), which was essentially worded the same as it is today. Yet a superseded order was reinstated on August 1, 1956, without debate or notice. It was not treated as the equivalent of Standing Order 67(1)(p).

I should also deal with the points of the hon. member for Kamloops who argued that a lapsed order for supply should be considered as a matter of confidence. On that point I shall only say that a lapsed order is not a decision of substance by the House. It is only the consequence of the House not having appointed a day for consideration of such an order. Furthermore, the motion before the House last Friday was due to expire without question put pursuant to Standing Order 81(17). It is therefore difficult to invoke the usual convention of a lost decision in the House on a matter of confidence.

The hon. member also referred to page 422 of Bourinot's fourth edition which refers to a lapsed order in committee of supply. Bourinot states clearly that this would require notice of a motion for the House to resolve itself into committee again. This reference relates to the 19th century British practice. The Chair has however found a more recent case in Canadian practice.

On June 9, 1938, an identical situation developed in committee of supply and the reinstatement for the House to resolve itself back into committee was brought forward on June 10, 1938, that is the next day, without debate or notice and no objection was taken. In any case, the whole supply process was completely revamped in the 1968 reform and the committee of supply was abolished. The present case is unique in our procedure and can only be treated as just another dropped or superseded order as the Chair can find no basis in logic, convention or common sense to treat it any differently.

In summary then, the Chair has found that the quorum call initiated by the government which resulted in the House adjourning for lack of quorum on an opposition day does not constitute a breach of the privileges of this House. Furthermore, the motion for the redesignation of the continuing order for supply does not require notice, is not subject to debate and can be moved forthwith by the minister.

I want to say something in this regard. Yesterday when the House reached motions, I had indicated by way of a comment earlier that at that point I invited the hon. House leader to respect the difficulties that we were in because it would have required me to make an immediate order on a complex series of points. The House leader courteously did that. But we had reached motions, and I now find that we have to deal with it on the basis as if the House leader was dealing with motions. If the House leader wishes to, I would invite him to move his motion now, because the delay is due to the fact that the Chair had to ask the indulgence of the House to reserve for the ruling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Two hon. members, the minister and the House leader of the New Democratic Party are both rising on a point of order. The hon. minister.

Yesterday, in my anxiety to make sure that the opposition was forewarned as soon as possible, one of my colleagues put forward notice under Standing Order 78(3), on advice that it was appropriate. That now seems to be the subject of question. Since I do not intend to proceed with the motion under Standing Order 78(3) today, it is really academic, and I will ensure that prior to it being moved, unless the opposition prepares to co–operate under Standing Order 78(1) or 78(2), I will provide the appropriate notice.

If that is a point of order, I just want to make sure that there is no dispute on this side of the House.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this is a disappointment. I had a long procedural argument and stayed awake most of the night writing it. I am disappointed that I will not have a chance to make it. The government gave notice yesterday. It was inappropriate and a highly unusual turn of events. I thought it was actually a decision that the government had made, but I take the word of the Government House Leader that it was a mistake and the government should not have done what it did yesterday. We will wait to see what it will do later today.

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rose in my place yesterday after the Minister of State for Small Businesses gave notice to the House, as recorded in yesterday's Hansard at page 10102. At that time I did make the point that the notice of motion was, in my view, not in order and should not be accepted by the Chair. Of course, Mr. Speaker I do not have to put the arguments to you since the government recognized how weak a case it had.

Mr. Andre: Sit down!

Mr. Gauthier: Maybe I will sit down, but I would like to make sure that the House leader of the government stops being so scornful of this House and treating us with disdain. I wish he had a little more—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that if there needs to be an argument, it could be carried on elsewhere.

The point of order was raised by the minister. The minister has withdrawn the notice. The House leader for the New Democratic Party and the House leader for the Official Opposition have commented on it and that is where it remains.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: We are now in Orders of the Day on Bill C–62. I must advise the House that I have certain rulings to make with respect to motions by way of amendment, which were filed up to the close of the Notice Paper at seven o'clock last night.

There are 90 motions in amendment set down on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act. I have reviewed the motions and am now ready to make a ruling.

As hon. members will note, there are 68 motions in amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Gloucester which seek to delete a separate clause of the bill, including the Schedule and the Title.

The effect of debating these motions, as I commented upon in a similar situation with respect to Bill C–20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act on October 10, 1989, is that the House will be virtually proceeding through a repetition of the second reading debate. This manner of proceeding during the report stage causes the Chair serious concern.

Both Mr. Speaker Francis and I have expressed strong reservations about this procedure, and here I refer all hon. members to the debates of June 14, 1984 at pages 4680 and 4681, and of October 10, 1989 at pages 4464 and 4465.

Therefore, I should advise the House that in this instance while all such amendments will be debated and put to a vote, in a future circumstance the Chair may apply more vigorously the Speaker's power of selection of motions in amendment in strict accordance with Standing Order 76(5).

I regret that because of the short period of time between seven o'clock last night and this morning, the usual consultation on these motions has not been able to take place. That is nobody's fault. The fact that it has not taken place takes nothing away from a practice which we have been following now for quite some time and which I think is a very satisfactory practice as far as all hon. members are concerned and also a practice which makes it far more easy for the Speaker and the assistance I receive from the Table to deal with these things.

I ask hon. members to excuse the fact that we have not been able to consult since last night. As I say, that is nobody's fault, but it takes nothing away from our intention to consult as much as possible in all cases where it is possible.

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85 and 90 standing in the name of the hon. member for Gloucester will be grouped for debate, and a vote on Motion No. 90 will apply to all the remaining motions in this group.

Motions Nos. 12 and 13, standing in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 14, 15 and 16, standing in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, are admissible and will be grouped for debate but voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 17 and 20, standing in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, are in order. They will be debated together but voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 18, 21, 22, 23 and 24, standing in the names of the hon. members for Yorkton—Melville and Mississauga West, are acceptable and will be debated together but voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 19 and 86, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga West, are in order. They will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 19 being applied to Motion No. 86.

• (1250)

Motion Nos. 25, 26, 27, 28, 29 and 30, standing in the names of the hon. members for Yorkton—Melville and Gloucester, are admissible. They will be grouped for debate but voted upon separately.

Motion Nos. 37, 38 and 56, standing in the names of the hon. members for Gloucester and Mississauga West, are acceptable. They will be debated together but voted upon separately.

Motion No. 88, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ontario is in order. It will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion Nos. 87 and 89, standing in the names of the hon. members for Yorkton—Melville and Gloucester, are acceptable and will be grouped for debate but voted upon separately.

Just so that all hon. members understand the effect of grouping the numerous motions of the hon. member for Gloucester into a single debate and a single vote, I want to say that those particular amendments seek to delete seriatim a number of sections in the bill itself.

As I mentioned earlier, the effect is that it literally means that we would have a debate and a vote on each one which would amount to a repetition of second reading debate.

I want to point out that this ruling does not limit debate in a significant way with respect to report stage. I have done some careful calculations and under this ruling there will be eleven debates and 26 votes plus the final vote at report stage for concurrence. If one looks at the grouping there will be just under two hours of debating time for every member in the House, if that should be the will of the House. I am pointing that out because this ruling does not cut down on debate. I think that it properly deals with a certain kind of amendment, an amendment to delete clause after clause after clause. It puts it all in one debate for one vote for the reasons that I have expressed.

I hope the hon. member for Gloucester will accept my ruling and co-operate with the Chair.

I will now put motions No. 1 to 11, 31-36, 39-55, 57-85 and 90 to the House. The motions are moved by the hon. member for Gloucester and seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of Order.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to question your ruling in any way. I understand that consultations did not take place between the Table and the movers of the amendments. Therefore, I have to accept that there were circumstances which, in my language, would be abnormal in the sense that normally the person tabling a series of amendments, such as the member for Gloucester, would have been consulted as to the grouping of all the proposed amendments into one vote. There not being a common thread, the argument could have been made at that time that indeed individual and separate votes on every one of those amendments was in order.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would take it that your admonition that we do not argue this point at this time would be for this occasion only. I do it with great hesitation, asking the Chair that perhaps on another occasion we could use the arguments that we would like to put forth whereby every one of those amendments is a substantive amendment and does not reflect on the principle of the bill, but rather that we object strongly to the clauses of this bill and would like to debate them and eliminate them one after the other.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, you have notice of my intention to rise of this point at a later date.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier raises a point which is certainly not unexpected under the circumstances. I want to make it very clear to hon. members that I have made a ruling, but having said that, it is the right of hon. members at any time in the future to raise matters of order with the Chair. This is some indication of my thinking on the matter.

I say to the hon. member for Gloucester that I am sorry that there was not a chance for consultation but in this case, there wasn't. Hon. members know also that all table officers and the Chair were very busily engaged yesterday and last night on not just this matter but others. I will not say anything more than that.

If the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier wants to raise this matter at another time, of course he is completely free to do so. I thank him for recognizing that when a ruling is made, he has to accept that. This is an example that can be used in discussion at another time and I would certainly not in any way make it impossible for the matter to be raised.

The hon. member knows that these are not always easy decisions to make, especially with a bill which is very contentious and I am aware of that. It is why I pointed out to hon. members that, at least at the moment, it would be very hard to say that there will not be very extensive debating time at report stage.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): On a similar point of order, Mr. Speaker. The concern that we have is that in this case Your Honour has indicated there could not be consultations. We have not had an opportunity to make comments or submissions to Your Honour before the ruling was made. I recognize that it has been handed down. However, the difficulty we face is that the ruling that has now been made becomes a precedent along with others that have occurred in this matter. It seems the difficulty is that had each of the members of the opposition put forward one of the amendments to delete a clause and posted 77 different amendments by 77 different members instead of all from one, perhaps the grouping for debate would not have been as severe as it has been.

I just want to make it clear that while we cannot challenge Your Honour's ruling, and do not do so, we in fact accept it, but in future we would not want it to be regarded as a precedent that we are accepting in light of the fact that we did not have an opportunity to make submissions in advance of that ruling concerning which items might or might not be in the various groupings.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and all members a moment ago, any time members want to rise on a matter of order in which they question or wish to consult with the Speaker, or make recommendations to the Speaker and through the Speaker to other members of the House, that is a perfectly normal practice here. I am not going to preclude that.

I also point out that the House has the power to change the standing orders and I refer specifically to Standing Order 76(5). Those standing orders give very strong powers of selection of motions to the Speaker. That is where the authority is given to me by all members of the House. If members want to change that, that is a matter for members to consider.

I thank the hon. member for his intervention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the just released discussion paper, The Green Plan, is the first attempt of the Minister of the Environment to consult the public after failing to obtain approval for his environmental agenda, drafted in secrecy and rejected earlier this year.

The discussion paper ignores Tory budget cuts to environmental protection, research on alternative and renewable sources of energy, research on toxicology, wildlife, et cetera.

The paper lacks substance, lacks a sense of urgency, and lacks political will. It is the product of a cabinet constantly being dragged into the environment debate but not really committed to change.

The paper raises yesterday's questions which set back the environmental agenda by several years. Because of all this, Canadians should come forward, ask the relevant questions and help formulate the difficult answers. Then it will be the minister's task to prove that this government wants to act on the protection of the environment and implementation of sustainable development.

Clearly it has been left to Canadians to define the real environmental agenda.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake companion resolution is a laudable initiative.

The accord itself, even with its imperfections, may also deserve broader support, except for one item: the distinct society clause.

The distinct society clause or phrase is found in a clause without definition or parameters. We must conclude therefore that it may be interpreted in a variety of ways.

Canadians have expressed their concern about the ambiguous distinct society clause. A paragraph in the preamble establishing some parameters provided by the Supreme Court of Canada would address those concerns whether before or at an agreed extension to the June 23 deadline.

Most would agree that a whole Canada is in everyone's best interest. Flexibility, compromise and tolerance are parts of the Canadian way. I am confident that Canadians, as in the past, will rise above their problems for the good of all and for the good of this great country, Canada.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, representatives of the Lithuanian Parliament are visiting Moscow today. President Landsbergis acknowledges that the re-establishment of their independence presents constitutional problems for the Soviet Union.

Some people are of the view that Canada should not be putting pressure on Mikhail Gorbachev over the Lithuanian situation. However, as President Landsbergis asks, are the democratic nations willing to sell Lithuania to the Soviet Union once more?

How should Canada respond? As a first step we could give Lithuania diplomatic recognition. Remember the Soviet Union has admitted Lithuania was incorporated into the U.S.S.R. illegally, and Canada has never accepted Lithuania's annexation.

The historic events which have occurred over the past year have been breathtaking. Country after country have turned their backs on communism and are now struggling to build a democratic government.

Now is the time for Canada to stand firmly beside our friends in Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia to ensure their dreams of independence are realized.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon and later this week, hon. members will vote on Bill C-62, the famous goods and services tax bill.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edmonston: If the bill is passed, this tax will be the biggest and most unfair tax grab in Canada's history. Nearly 80 per cent of Canadians in this country are opposed to this tax.

An Hon. Member: That's not true!

Mr. Edmonston: Canadians believe, and rightly so, that this tax will result in higher taxes, higher inflation and interest rates, and an increase in the unemployment rate, especially in Quebec.

We urge all Quebecers to call their respective Conservative members, those so-called defenders of Quebec, and tell them to vote against this tax grab, Mr. Speaker.

I would also ask the members for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine), Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead (Mr. Gérin), Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) and Verdun—Saint-Paul (Mr. Chartrand) to have the courage to act according to their principles and vote against this unfair sales tax.

An Hon. Member: Call them now!

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the emperor of Canada Post has new clothes: 27,000 uniforms to be precise. The problem is that the emperor does not have to wear these clothes himself, only his subjects do.

Mind you, there is hope. Some of the emperor's disciples have now been heard wishing that they too could have the company pay for 100 per cent of their wardrobe. Maybe that wish should be granted. Maybe the emperor should require that all his managers wear the uniform. After all what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, as my colleagues from Newfoundland would say.

There is also a problem with the style of the emperor's new clothes which the wearers say are ill fitting, impractical and unsafe. "Not so", says the emperor's designers, "the style is easy to understand and easy to wear". Does that reflect the corporation's opinion of the employee?

Finally there is the matter of the emperor's diminishing loyalty to the Crown. Why does the uniform no longer carry either the name or the flag of the country? Has the emperor sought the approval of cabinet for this matter? Has cabinet even considered the issue?

In these trying times one only wishes the emperor the wisdom of Solomon and the patience of Job, both qualities which he lacks.

BERGEN CONFERENCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Bergen Conference of European and North American States will take place from May 8 to May 16, 1990. The conference is a major step in a process that started with the publication of the Brundtland Report, leading up to the UN conference on environment and development in 1992. Canada has been a staunch supporter of the Bergen Conference.

Environment Canada will be the Canadian government's main participant at this Conference. The delegation will be headed by the Hon. Lucien Bouchard and will include both government representatives and representatives of non-governmental sectors.

To promote full participation by Canada's youth, about $60,000 was allocated to bring young people from all parts of the country together to prepare a Canadian youth action plan and send five representatives to the Bergen Conference.

MURPHY AVIATION

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Murphy Aviation of Chilliwack is a five year old company that is making itself known world-wide. Doubling its gross annually for the past three years, Murphy delivered 120-plus aircraft kits in 1989. Ninety per cent of Murphy's business is exported to over 18 countries including Japan, France, the United Kingdom and Australia.

Murphy builds only the best by employing the best. In fact former de Havilland aeronautical engineer, the legendary Richard Hiscock, is helping Murphy develop a new, all metal, three seater high wing aircraft called a Rebel.

The Rebel will use a Rotax engine built in Austria by a Bombardier subsidiary. Employing 20 people, Murphy is an example of what a small company can achieve through dedication and hard work.

Murphy Aviation is building a solid future for itself, for Chilliwack and for Canada. Indeed, Murphy Aviation is yet another of the many success stories from the riding of Fraser Valley East.

It was my pleasure to attend its open house and I say: "Congratulations, keep up the good job".

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise once again in protest of the GST.

Before me I have over 5,000 petitions collected by the Toronto Real Estate Board. The goods and services tax affects the real estate industry in a number of very profound ways.

First, in Willowdale the average price of a home will go up over $10,000 because of this tax. When we have over 20,000 homeless in Toronto and 200,000 homeless in Canada, this is going in the wrong direction.

Second, many small and medium sized real estate firms will have to go out of business because of the tax burden on their operations.

• (1410)

Third, agents are going to be asked to collect the tax on top of their commissions. Customers will refuse to pay it. Agents are going to lose.

It is one more example of the protest of Canadians and why this unfair tax must be abolished.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, very soon members of this House will be voting on the hated goods and services tax. Close to 80 per cent of Canadians across the country oppose the tax, but the government has chosen not to listen to the people.

Only 21 of 167 Conservative MPs need to vote with the combined opposition parties to defeat the tax, so we are urging Canadians across the country to phone their Conservative members of Parliament and tell them to vote against the GST.

In my province of Alberta people opposed to the GST could call Murray Dorin in Edmonton Northwest at 454-1220. They could call Scott Thorkelson in Edmonton—Strathcona at 439-8900. They could call Jack Shields in Athabasca at 743-2498. They could call Ken Hughes in Macleod at 938-5005. They could call Brian O'Kurley in Elk Island at 467-4944. They could call Walter Van De Walle in St. Albert at 459-8413. They could call Doug Fee in Red Deer at 342-7222—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's calls have expired.

CANADIAN CANCER SOCIETY

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, every year thousands of Canadians give a few hours of their time to help the Canadian Cancer Society in its April fund raising campaign. More than 90 cents of every dollar raised goes to cancer research, patient services and public education.

When the Canadian Cancer Society volunteer calls, please give generously. Cancer can be beaten.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, hon. members and government members opposite may truly wonder who is listening and via which medium as Parliament debates the issues that concern the future of Canada. The answer has implications for policy affecting Toronto specifically and Canada's growing ethnocultural communities in general.

In a Neilsen survey for November, CFMT-TV, a multilingual TV station which reaches some 25 per cent of all Toronto area households, that is 495,085 of them, was found to be the main source of news for all Canadians.

For example, 70 per cent of all Italo-Canadians watch the station; 85 per cent of all Portuguese Canadians in the metro area and 60 per cent of all Chinese Canadians also watch. Together, for the minister's information, all of those nationalities represent some 50 per cent of metro inhabitants.

I recommend to the Minister of Communications and his colleagues in cabinet that they read the Neilsen graphs and start putting social and cultural policies in the larger context. I might advise the ministers that there is a different world out there, and it is time the government woke up to that reality as it considers constitutional and other changes.

FISHERIES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, lobster fishermen along the north shore of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick from Shediac to Malagash have asked the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to increase the carapace size of lobsters from two and one-quarter inches to two and five-eighths inches this year and then another one-eighth inch again next year.

This action is a conservation measure and would allow lobsters to grow longer, resulting in a better fishery. The fishermen and processors in the three ports of Pugwash, Wallace and Malagash are so determined to see this policy implemented that all have voluntarily agreed to restrict their own catches to the increased size.

If the fishermen are prepared to take this action, I respectfully request that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans address their proposal and change the policy to reflect the wishes of the industry.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, soon members of Parliament will be voting on the goods and services tax. If passed, this tax would bring in the biggest and most unfair tax haul in Canadian history.

Close to 80 per cent of Canadians across this country oppose this tax, but only 21 of the 167 Conservative MPs need to vote with the combined opposition parties to defeat this tax and stop the GST.

Several Conservatives have already said they cannot support the GST, and we are urging Canadians across the country to phone their Conservative member of Parliament.

I call on the following Conservative members of Parliament to have the courage to stand up to their constituents and oppose this unjust tax. The hon. member for Okanagan—Centre at 776-3337, Cariboo—Chilcotin at 392-2626, Fraser Valley East at 792-3311, Delta at 946-7858, from the Fraser Valley West constituency at 856-0878, and others; from Wild Rose at 948-3737, from Edmonton South East—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

CLUB ACADIEN DE SEPT-ÎLES

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, the Club Acadien de Sept-Îles is celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary this year, and 1990 is thus an important milestone in the history of the Acadian community in Sept-Îles.

The organization, founded 25 years ago by Acadians who settled in Sept-Îles in the early 50s, has been actively involved in the economic, social and religious life of our city and the entire region.

The Club Acadien de Sept-Îles has been very active in ways that have helped make Sept-Îles a very attractive community and a wonderful place to live.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask all members of this House, and especially the Acadians among them, to join me in paying tribute to the Acadian community of Sept-Îles on this important occasion.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment.

In his discussion framework on the environment, which he published last week, the minister said: "Responding to the problem of global warming will be a formidable challenge—If we wait for all the answers, we will no doubt be too late."

Yet, in Alberta yesterday, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that the government had agreed to drop national targets for cutting air pollution, and further, that Ottawa had no intention of penalizing provinces that were responsible for high levels of greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide.

How could he allow the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to agree to drop national commitments and targets for cutting air pollution, and if he has done that, does it not mean that he and the government as a whole think that his exercise in considering changes in the environmental policy of this country is nothing more than a sham and a public relations exercise?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition should read more carefully the communiqué that was released yesterday by the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The first thing that he must note in this communiqué is that the ministers have decided that we must pursue, on a national and provincial level, the reduction of CO_2 emissions through as tough measures as possible.

They have also decided that this problem must be put into the context of the international scene. I agree completely with that. No definitive solution will be brought forward on this without the full agreement of everyone involved in this pollution.

Canada will not give up its leadership role on this, and this government strongly feels that we must not exclude the possibility of going as far as making unilateral commitments if it can help with the development of an international convention.

Canada is very serious and we will never make a commitment without being sure that it will be fulfilled. Canada makes commitments when she can fulfil them. The way to do it is to define beforehand the right means of achieving the commitment.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that in 1988 his government made an international commitment to cut greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide by 20 per cent by the year 2005.

Does the government still maintain this international commitment? If so, how can it do it without having targets in this country for cutting air pollution?

• (1420)

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is very important on such a major issue not to distort the facts. Canada never made any commitment at the Toronto conference and no country in the world made a commitment like this. We still have to wait for one country to make the commitment. It is a very serious commitment and we will do it together.

As the hon. member knows, there will be a very important international conference in Brazil in 1992. This will be the forum where Canada will lead the world in signing an international convention on climate change.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Environment seems to have been contradicted not only by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but also by the Minister of Finance.

Last week, the Minister of Environment stated on television that he had secured from his government for his Green Plan "a spending commitment". Yet, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance stated last Friday that the amount to be allocated had not yet been determined.

I therefore ask the minister who is telling the truth? He who stated that the amount to be allocated has already been set, or the Minister of Finance who stated that there is no such commitment? Who is telling the truth about this?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I note that the Leader of the Opposition is reading his questions, but that he does not read the replies he gets to his questions.

An Hon. Member: There has been no reply!

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): If the Leader of the Opposition will only refer to the reply given by the Minister of Finance, he will see that the Minister stated first that a portion of this year's budgetary reserves will be allocated to the action plan and that it is large enough to allow us by next fall to submit to the Canadian people a five-year plan which will be the first of its kind in the history of Canada by its scope and global nature. Moreover, the minister added that he wanted to maintain some flexibility in the funds already allocated, so that the consultation may be truly meaningful, and I hope that, if Canadians participate fully in this consultation, we will be able then, if necessary, to adjust the resources already allocated on the basis of the newly expressed needs.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The government has always claimed that one of the benefits of the GST would be its visibility. Now, could the Minister of Finance admit today that there is no clause in Bill C-62 that would compel a retailer to provide a receipt or a bill indicating clearly that the consumer had truly paid the 7 per cent goods and services tax on the item or service purchased?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, our position on this is quite clear. The proposal that we have put forward is that the retailer should include the tax in the price on the shelf, on the tag on the jacket, or whatever, but at the checkout counter when the money is paid, the amount should be broken down as between the GST paid and the price of the article being purchased.

We have also made provision so that the cost of point of sale equipment, cash registers, things like this, will be reduced by 20 per cent in its after-tax value to encourage retailers to put themselves in a position where they can comply with that type of proposal.

I also ask the hon. member to consider this: The essence of the amendments that he has made to the bill is to scrap the bill.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What does that do? That gets us right back to a tax which today is totally invisible. The hon. member does not know, and no one can tell from the price of a product, how much the tax is on any particular product, but there is tax on everything that we buy today. The clear position of the hon. member's party is to go back to a totally hidden tax, quite contrary to the position that he is fostering right now.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. Major suppliers of cash registers and point of sale equipment have made it very clear that the proposal put forward by the government is going to cause a chaotic situation for retailers as well as consumers in Canada.

In view of the fact that people who know small business best were still saying as late as last night that this is going to be an administrative nightmare, will the minister not recognize that the government's proposal is in fact going to create an administrative nightmare for small business and consumers in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that. I do accept the fact that there will be some increased compliance burden on the part of small business, that there will be some adjustments to be made as they understand the nature of the tax and how it affects the cost of their purchases and the pricing of their products. Once they achieve an understanding of this, the operation of the tax is simple to comply with.

I would also encourage the hon. member to reflect on what he said in his first question and to ask himself as well as his leader why the Liberal party is advocating a return to a tax that is so deeply hidden that no one in this country knows the amount of federal sales tax they are paying in the price of any product today. Why does the Liberal party want a hidden tax? Why do they want to return to that and try to fool Canadians that there is no tax in the price of a product today, when he knows perfectly well there is.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. We talked earlier about the international agreement that was made in 1988 to reduce carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent by the year 2005. Everyone was going to give this serious consideration. The minister's own report released this weekend says: "Canada is the world's fourth largest producer of carbon dioxide on a per capita basis".

Clearly, Canada has a responsibility to show some leadership rather than simply saying "Yes, we will think globally, but we won't do anything locally."

Other countries have made the commitment to take some leadership on this issue and cut emissions now. They include countries like Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. Will the minister commit himself and his government to set targets now for a 20 per cent CO_2 reduction by the year 2005?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think that we must straighten out the fact which has been expressed in the question. The Toronto conference in 1988 did not conclude with an agreement. It was an international conference which issued a report recommending that countries of the world make a commitment to reduce the emission of CO_2 by 20 per cent by the year 2005.

Since then all the countries of the world have been trying to define how it can be achieved. Canada is at the forefront of those countries.

While we were in Norway a few months ago we strongly supported and actually led a statement agreeing that we must stabilize the level of CO_2 emissions by the year 2000 at the 1988 level. People know that Canada is probably one of the most advanced countries in this objective. Canada must make a commitment, but the only way to achieve a real result would be to do it through an international convention because Canada accounts for only 2 per cent of the CO_2 problem of the world.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. The only way to do something is to do it, and that is what Canadians are asking of this government.

What this government has been good at is studying studies. In fact, after the 1988 conference and that recommendation, the former energy minister did commission a study from DPA Consulting to study CO_2 emission and targeting.

It its report to the government, DPA Consulting said that by setting that objective of a 20 per cent reduction by the year 2005 we could not only save the environment, we could save money, some $100 billion in those years as a result of reducing carbon dioxide. That is $4,000 for every man, woman and child.

It does not need to be studied yet again. It is quite clear that we have to do something now. When is he going to set targets? When is he going to meet this objective?

• (1430)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon member's question, when she puts forward the DPA consultants' report, I think it is important to take a look at what the Minister of the Environment has said about the 1988 conference which is absolutely correct.

What happened after 1988 was that energy ministers established a task force for the purpose of determining how we could meet or move toward that 20 per cent target from the point of view of the energy portfolios, provincially and territorially on the one hand, and federally on the other.

The DPA consultants' study was a study commissioned by the task force set up by provincial and federal energy ministers. At yesterday's meeting in Kananaskis the task force clearly reported to the ministers that it did not agree with the DPA consultants' study. It does not believe that that target can be met in the manner in which DPA has put it forward.

The task force gave us indications of how we could move toward the 20 per cent target. That is why the Minister of the Environment and others of us are going to get into the consultation, which is the route to go as opposed to one which is based simply on an illogical approach, something which the hon. member so often puts forward.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary is for the Minister of the Environment. The Minister came up yesterday with the idea for a new tax, an environmental tax as he called it. My question is for the Minister who is looking for money. How much did he spend last week to have his news conference on his Green Plan broadcasted via satellite?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The minister may want to respond.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the question would better be dealt with at another level than the House of Commons. I will gladly disclose all the information that might be required on that subject. There is nothing to hide. We are most willing to do that. I would point out, however, that the leader of the New Democratic Party neglected a very important aspect of our plan. Consultation has just started—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be given a chance to answer the question, if I may. The consultation process that has just begun is crucial. I believe this whole House should support a process that will give our country its first five-year environmental action plan. And we will be the first country in the world to have one. I urge the leader of the New Democratic Party to give us her support.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Commissioner of Official Languages tabled his report in the House today.

In the annual report the Commissioner gives the government failing grades on its application of the new official language law. The government put up no information program. It co-ordinated no campaign. It did nothing to counter the divisive misinformation spread by certain groups and individuals in this country.

This government has failed to communicate to Canadians the objectives and provisions of linguistic reform.

I ask the Prime Minister to show some firm leadership on this issue, to instruct his ministers to stand in their places—20 months after the adoption by this House of an official language law—and give it regulations. For God's sake, let us have some courage and do what we have to do here in this House.

[Translation]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows perfectly well, Bill C-72 provides for a special and complex process. It provides for consultation with minority groups, and I can inform the House that most of these consultations have taken place. They have indicated the need for some changes in the draft regulations submitted to these groups. These changes are now being made. Once the consultation process is complete, the government will decide when the draft regulations will be tabled in the House.

Finally, I can say that this government is deeply committed to this process. Our purpose in tabling the regulations on C-72 will be to adopt official languages regulations that are fair and equitable for all Canadians.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Commissioner of Official Languages stressed the inertia of federal departments and agencies. They are stuck between the new legislation and 20 years' worth of obsolete guidelines.

Mr. Speaker, I put this question to the President of the Treasury Board for the fourth time this year. Considering the lack of leadership afflicting federal departments and agencies today, leadership that is the responsibility of the minister, as employer but also as minister responsible for official languages, will the minister have the courage to table his regulations very shortly, since, as we know, the consultation process is complete?

I also want to know, since he claims he is still consulting, who he is consulting with? With his American friends?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, any inertia was caused by our colleagues opposite who, for 19 years, failed to take any action at all.

Mr. Speaker, since Bill C-72 was passed, in addition to the consultations on the regulations to be tabled in this House, Treasury Board introduced for Crown corporations operating under a memorandum of agreement the same system that applied to departments. As far as the department are concerned, at the time, four memoranda of agreement were in force; we negotiated 25.

I would like to quote what the Commissioner of Official Languages said on page 53 of his report. He said, and I quote: "Greater than the increase in the number of bilingual positions and more indicative of the capacity of the Public Service to serve the public in both languages is the increase in the number of bilingual employees in both relative and absolute terms".

The ratio of bilingual employees rose from 28 per cent in 1984 to 33 per cent in 1989, and this is something the government can be proud of.

TOURISM

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for tourism. Package tour organizers in the northeastern United States warn us of the harmful effects the GST will have on the Canadian tourism industry and more particularly on Quebec, where tourism is the fourth largest industry.

If the minister understands the threat the GST poses for tourism, what does he intend to do to help this industry now?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to tell the hon. member that most of what he has asked for has already been done as of the end of last week.

If the hon. member will read the bill, which has been reported from the committee, he will see there have been changes made exactly as he suggests. I support those changes. It will be good for the tourism industry and good for the Province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister explain that, since the tour operators are critical of your proposed rebate system? What do you intend to do to rectify the situation now?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, this is how the rebate system should work. I hope it will be put in place this way and that it can be accommodated under the legislation as it has been reported.

When a group tour is organized the entrepreneurs of the tour will be able to apply for a rebate of the GST on behalf of the clients on the tour, thus making the whole process easier. This will make the GST not a problem for the clients.

This is a streamlining of the rebate system for which I have fought in the last two or three months. The Minister of Finance supports it. The finance committee of the House supports it. I hope the hon. member will support it too.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

I have in my hand a copy of a letter written to John Bulloch from the Sweda Cash Register Company. It is addressed "Dear John".

• (1440)

Mr. Nystrom: The letter explains that there is no way the cash registers of the country will be ready by January 1, 1991 for collecting the GST. It states in part: "We sincerely believe that this will result in a chaotic situation with retailers, who we firmly believe will be unable to collect the GST under the prevailing circumstances".

In light of the fact that there will be cash register and consumer chaos, is the minister in a position to stand up in the House today and admit that there is no way that he can meet the deadline of January 1, 1991, that he has come to his senses and that he will withdraw the GST bill now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it might occur to the hon. member that one of the reasons why there might possibly be difficulty in companies meeting the demands is because business has been so good for the small business community that it has been ordering so many of these cash registers it is difficult for the cash register companies to meet this extraordinary demand.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I know the hon. member is quite aware that we have put forward two proposals already for streamlined accounting to help the small business community in meeting the requirements of the GST.

My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has at least one other proposal for streamlined accounting under consideration.

These will be in place to assist the small business community in meeting the requirements of the GST. I believe that this and a number of other things that I have talked about before in this House demonstrate quite clearly our sensitivity to the concerns of the small business community, as it approaches the requirements of the GST in January, 1991.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): If I may, Mr. Speaker, I will send a copy of the letter to the minister to help educate him on the problems with cash registers, if I can have a Page bring that to the Minister of Finance.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in the province of Quebec, the Prime Minister's home province, Michel Décary, who works with Mr. Bullock, told the Quebec Finance Minister that the GST is a real nightmare for small and medium-sized businesses because the cash registers will not be converted in time to handle two separate taxes.

Mr. Speaker, my question is: Given this serious problem, how will Canadians know exactly what tax they will pay with the GST? Does the Minister of Finance have an answer to this important question for all Canadians this afternoon?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand the attitude of many people in the small business community. They would prefer not to make changes. People can understand people who would prefer not to make changes.

When we look at the benefits that are going to be brought forward by the introduction of the goods and services tax, we see how it will help businesses which are competing today, and how it will put those businesses on a level playing field with the imports with which they compete. Canadian businesses are now paying one-third more tax than the imports that they are competing with.

These are the clear benefits that are in place. While there may be some difficulties as the small business community encounters that need for change, once that change is behind it the benefits are going to be very, very clear.

We have put in place a payment of up to $1,000 which will pay small businesses to help them get over this transitional hurdle. We have also put in place the small business streamlined accounting. As well, we are making it less of a requirement for them to make the payments of the taxes than we are for big business. There are a number of ways in which we have helped the small business community—

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. I have two points concerning gun control legislation.

First, why the delay? After the recent tragedy at the École Polytechnique in Montreal I thought we would have seen legislation passed or entered in this House very quickly.

Second, can the minister assure members of the House that the process of applying for a licence for a firearm will be much more rigorous and thorough in order to help prevent a massacre such as occurred in Montreal?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I will confess to the House to having had prior notice of the question, but I am sure the House will agree that it is an excellent question.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I would also assure the House that the hon. member has asked it based on his own very sincere interest in this particular issue.

I am pleased to advise him that I am finalizing my discussions on this matter. The government will introduce legislation as soon as possible. That legislation will recognize the principle that the hon. member addressed, that is, measures to promote greater safety and responsibility in the acquisition of firearms.

I look forward to the support of all members of the House when this legislation is brought forward.

TRADE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last weekend the Prime Minister indicated he would support moves by Mexico to strike a free-trade deal with the United States. He also said recently that he would not be shocked by the eventual creation of a North American free-trade zone including Mexico and that such a zone could materialize in the next decade. My question is this: Does the Prime Minister intend to involve Canada in a process to create this free-trade zone with the United States and Mexico? Yes or no?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should have read carefully my speech as reported in today's paper. The article in The Globe and Mail says that:

[English]

> Prime Minister Brian Mulroney yesterday offered warm words of encouragement for new Mexican trade initiatives but stopped just short of formally backing a free-trade deal between Mexico and the United States.

I indicated yesterday in Montreal, as I have indicated in other circumstances, that I believe the best way for developing countries to achieve prosperity and social justice is to be given the opportunity to enhance their trade, to have greater access to rich and dynamic markets and to have a greater facility to develop national wealth by trading internationally. Greater trade abroad creates jobs at home.

I believe that unless you adopt that kind of philosophy the rich continue to get richer and the poor stagnate.

I am very surprised to see that my hon. friend from the Liberal party would do anything other than encourage the Government of Canada, which is encouraging as best we can the Government of Mexico and others, to seek more liberalized trading arrangements with their partners and around the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not answer my question. I want to know whether or not he supports Mexico's initiative?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Mexican government does not need Canada's support. It may decide to initiate a dialogue with the Americans or the Brazilians. As far as I know, however, they have not entered into negotiations with their southern or their northern neighbours. I told Mexicans I would not be surprised to see a country such as theirs seek more liberalized trading arrangements with their neighbours to the north or the south. It seems only normal that a developing country like Mexico would be studying that possibility, since the G-7 countries have described the Canada-United-States free-trade agreement as a model for the whole world. If that is the case, the Mexicans could benefit from it, much to their credit.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the acting Minister of Fisheries.

In view of the extraordinary gap in the maritime surveillance off Canada's coastline—the longest in the world—and particularly in light of Recommendation 22 of the Harris report regarding the provision of additional resources to undertake this task, could the minister inform the House precisely what action he plans to redress this serious deficiency?

• (1450)

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, permit me to answer on behalf of the Minister of Fisheries who is, as the hon. member will know, on the east coast consulting on precisely these matters.

As I understand it there has just been a contract signed with a private sector firm in St. John's, Newfoundland. It is a contract which will result in the doubling of the hours that will be contributed to surveillance. Much better technology will be employed. Our capacity to know what goes on off the east coast will be much, much improved.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I know about that, and I thank the hon. minister for refreshing my memory.

That does not even make up for the 1,400 hours that the trackers are going to lose. That is a drop in the bucket.

You can have good science, good laws, good regulations and all the resources in the world, but unless there is proper and sufficient surveillance, monitoring and control of the fish stocks we are fighting a losing war.

The fishermen, the scientists, the bureaucrats and the task forces are all telling him, as we and the world are telling him, there is a need for real action now by this government to control over-fishing. The question is when is the minister going to get on with it?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just admitted that his memory had to be refreshed about the contract that was just signed.

The trackers covered roughly 1,700 hours of tracking. The new contract will cover 3,815 hours of tracking. There will be 33 new additional jobs contributed to this particular activity. There will be new technology. For instance, the Litton V-5 search radar which is the latest development in the world will be employed in this particular exercise.

What else does the hon. member want us to do? He is, as usual, way behind the times.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): In French?

Some Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. My question today is about free trade.

[English]

That is the end of that.

My question is for the Prime Minister about his statements concerning the signing of a free trade agreement between Mexico and the United States. It is one thing to speak, Mr. Prime Minister, of Mexico–United States negotiations outside the context of the agreement we have between Canada and the United States, but the fact is that 43 per cent of Mexico's trade with the United States is parallel to commodities that trade between Canada and the United States.

Mexico will pay $1.60 an hour and have access to U.S. markets. Canada pays $12 or $14 an hour and will lose out.

What work have you done to ensure that our wage base will be secure here in Canada?

[Translation]

Some Hon. Members: In French!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I wish to thank again the member from British Columbia and to congratulate him wholeheartedly for an impressive linguistic achievement. I also have a word of warning for the newly elected leader of the NDP: "Watch out. He is learning fast!" My sincere congratulations to the member for his initiative.

[English]

My hon. friend knows full well, of course, that Canadian interests are protected by the rules of origin provisions our arrangements with the United States.

Should Mexico seek to negotiate a freer trade or a free trade agreement with the United States, obviously this conceivably could have an impact on trade with Canada. That is something that we would monitor very carefully.

However, our fundamental position is that it is clearly in the interests of a developing country like Mexico to seek to increase its own national wealth and the well-being of its citizens to take it out of a degree of poverty to a greater stage of development and prosperity through greater trade.

One of the ways of doing that is through free trade with its neighbours. I do not think those of us on either side of the House would be offended if Mexico sought to do that. Indeed, I know my hon. friend would want to encourage Mexico to do more of it.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I applaud the Prime Minister's position on being concerned about Mexico's poverty. But the problems of Mexico's poverty should not be solved at the expense of Canadian workers and Canadian businessmen.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Barrett: The fact is, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that unless the government is prepared to defend Canadian workers, what is the use of being the government? The government's position should be supporting Canadians.

What studies has the Canadian government done that evaluate the impact of a successful conclusion of a free trade agreement between Mexico and the United States, and its impact on the Canadian market? Mr. Hartt already suggests that five times the amount of trade is taking place—

Mr. Speaker: The question is: What study has been done? Perhaps the minister wants to respond.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was, as I am sure the House and the country were, dismayed by some of the earlier comments by my hon. friend. The socialists always talk a better game about social justice than they ever deliver.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I do not think that it is in keeping with the spirit of Coldwell or Tommy Douglas for the member from British Columbia to be talking about Canadians being worried about—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: Baloney! You're selling out Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Yesterday, the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba pointed out just how impossible—some would say "phoney"—the federal government's program of assistance to farmers is in that the federal government is demanding $100 million from the province of Manitoba when its entire agriculture budget is only $85 million.

I wonder why the government has designed a program that cannot help farmers because it has demanded an impossible amount of support and assistance from the provincial governments. I wonder why the government is doing this.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) and Minister of State (Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am a little bit surprised by the remarks of the hon. member. Our government has put about $20 billion over the last several years into agriculture. It has done a lot for farmers in Canada.

After two days of discussion on the future of agriculture last week, the Minister of Agriculture put $500 million on the table. Given that agriculture is a shared responsibility in the country, we think that the federal government has done a lot for farmers over the last several years.

Point of Order

We share the burden and we think that the provinces should put in a lot more money, and share with us for the benefit of the farmers.

I think it is a fair offer. It is on the table. We are waiting for an answer from the provinces. We think it is possible for the provinces and the federal government to do something together.

• (1500)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, farmers in southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba had a worse drought last summer than the previous year. They have been waiting for six months for action. All they have been getting is federal–provincial wrangling for months. When is the minister going to actually send cheques to farmers who want to put in a crop this spring? When is that going to happen?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) and Minister of State (Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade answered those questions yesterday.

Over the last two years we have put almost $8 billion into agriculture. During the same period of time, the three provinces put only $1.4 billion into agriculture. I don't think it is an equal share.

We have put the money aside and it is there. We are flexible. We are awaiting an answer from the provinces, I think the money is there. This represents a strong commitment by the federal government for Canadian farmers.

SENATE AMENDMENTS TO BILL C–21

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence I would like to take this opportunity to raise points of order respecting a message from the Senate with regard to Bill C–21. I would like to present to you arguments as to why the message from the Senate is inappropriate and seek the Chair's guidance in formulating a motion for a return message to the Senate.

Over several centuries of parliamentary rule a clear division of powers and responsibilities has emerged concerning the roles of each House in a bicameral system. These responsibilities have been documented in publications, Erskine May and Beauchesne to name just two. The division of responsibilities is also laid out in sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act and in Standing Orders 79 and 80 of this House which go back to 1967. I would refer hon. members and the Chair to my statement of March 12, 1990 in this House on this subject.

I would also like to add to that statement today and ask you to rule that amendments 5(a) and (b), 7 and 9 in the message from the other place are out of order because they differ in one way or another with the specific conditions laid out in the royal recommendation of Bill C–21, and because they infringe upon the financial initiative of the Crown. As I stated on March 12, 1990, I believe there are several other of their proposed amendments which also do this, but I will leave that to your consideration. I would also like to comment on the propriety of the Senate's amendments.

In particular, as the Speaker knows a major principle of Bill C–21 is to shift to full financing of the UI program through employer/employee contributions. The Senate amendments, particularly 7 and 9, would negate this principle and put the funding onus back on the general taxpayer to approximately the same degree as in the statute that Bill C–21 seeks to change.

Had these amendments come from a member of this House, I am sure that citation 698(5) of Beauchesne's sixth edition would have been invoked to rule them inadmissible. They are clearly contrary to that principle of the bill.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, is it logical for the Senate to ask this House by way of acquiescence to its message that which the House could not do directly? I would suggest no, but I would appreciate the Chair's observation. Would the Senate amendments be in order if they were proposed in our House? I do not believe they would. Would it be proper for this House to accept amendments from the Senate which would not be acceptable if they came from members of this House? Should not the Speaker rule these out of order on that basis?

Another point, Mr. Speaker, on which your views are solicited has to do with the fact that Bill C–21 arose from the budget of April 27, 1989. Starting on page 12 of the budget speech, the minister described the UI changes which contribute "$1.9 billion to deficit reduction in the first full year". I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that is not an insignificant sum.

Since Confederation and indeed before the manner in which the government's fiscal program is presented to the House has been through a budget address. The address lays out the government's expenditure plans and the means by which these plans are to be financed. Our Standing Orders prescribe six days of debate and that a motion be put asking the House to support the budget. This confidence motion is important because it gives the government the authority to proceed immediately with the fiscal plans in the budget even though many of these may require legislative change. It is on the strength of the budget address, the formal procedure, the vote of confidence, that a lot of action is initiated, and indeed taxes are collected immediately with the expectation that the legislation will catch up later.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that in 1979 the first act of a new government of a different political party was to pass a bill from the budget of the previous government prior to 1979. Indeed, in 1984 ironically one of the first acts of our government was to bring in a PGRT bill which was part of a budget of a previous government. However such is the strength, and I say this only to emphasize that such is the nature of a budget and the confidence motion that comes with it. To tamper with that or to reverse that somehow in another place is to tamper with the very fundamental purposes and powers of this body.

I would submit that the Senate amendments to Bill C–21 undermine in a significant way the budget of April 27 in which this House has expressed its confidence. If I am correct in this assertion, does it not put a further obstacle to the acceptability by this House of the Senate message? That is, could the House express confidence in a budget and then accept Senate originated changes which undermine that same budget without in essence revoking the previously given confidence? Putting it another way, if Bill C–21 were to be defeated in this House of Commons, a claim would be made that the government had lost the confidence of the House.

For the Senate to insist upon amendments that essentially undo or negate the principles of Bill C–21 is to ask the House to vote non–confidence in the government, an inappropriate request from the Senate. Governments must have the confidence of the House but surely not necessarily that of the Senate. Indeed it is the confidence of the House and only the House.

I wish to quote one paragraph from an authority, R. McGregor Dawson in The Government of Canada, at page 212 of the fifth edition where it states:

> The British North America Act requires that any measure for the spending of public funds can be considered by the House of Commons (where it must also originate) only after it has been first recommended by a message from the governor general, and by constitutional usage such a message can be transmitted to the House only through a cabinet minister. Custom and the standing orders of the House have established a companion principle that any proposal for the imposition of tax must also be made by a member of the cabinet. These two rules have been further reinforced by the practice, implied in the standing orders, that no amendment to increase taxes or appropriations can be made except upon the motion of a minister, although any member may move to have any tax or appropriation reduced or struck out. All the above principles have been derived from long English practice, and collectively they place the cabinet in a position where its responsibility in all financial matters is complete and ineluctable.

In addition to those arguments, as noted previously, Bill C–21 has a royal recommendation. I might remind hon. members that it is the parliamentary law clerk, not the government, that decides whether legislation requires a royal recommendation. If members are not aware I would refer them to Beauchesne's sixth edition, page 61, citation 225.(4), where it states that the law clerk's duties include the examination of:

> —all government legislative proposals prior to their introduction to determine whether they entail an expenditure of public moneys; if they are found to do so, then drafts the Royal Recommendation for inclusion with the proposal.

The parliamentary law clerk affixed the royal recommendation to Bill C–21. That is not an issue for debate. It is very clear that a bill which represents a $2 billion impact on the deficit could hardly be considered not to require a royal recommendation.

Members of this House must then ask themselves what kind of amendments can be made to a bill that already has a royal recommendation. For this answer one need only refer to Beauchesne's sixth edition, page 183, citation 596, where it states:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the Royal Recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of the charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

Point of Order

> In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown not only if it increases the amount but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

• (1510)

I would then refer the Speaker to Beauchesne's sixth edition, page 185, citation 604, which states:

> Amendments to bills are out of order if they attempt to substitute an alternative scheme to that proposed with the Royal Recommendation.

I would also refer you, Mr. Speaker, to rulings by past speakers on this issue, in particular The Selected Decisions of Speaker Lamoureux, published in 1985, which contains a number of references in this area on pages 457, 459, 463–64, 466, 469, 473–74, 477–481, and 483. Specifically, I draw your attention to page 479—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the minister is trying to do here, but we are trying to keep track of his statement.

I wonder if he would agree to tabling that statement so that we could all read it correctly, or slow down his delivery so we can receive the translation and the quotations that he is giving us today.

We had no notice of this, Mr. Speaker, and we take exception to him reading it into the record as fast as he can.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has heard the comment from the other side of the House. I am not so sure that it is up to the Chair to say how fast or slow a member might speak. I take it as a courteous request to make it easier for the opposition to follow the argument, and of course I am in the minister's hands. I am sure that he would want to comply.

Mr. Andre: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, if I were speaking too rapidly it was only so as not to take up too much time of the House. Of course I will table the document. The hon. member knew that. He did not have to stand to make that known.

Mr. Gauthier: I did not know anything about it. Keep to the truth.

Mr. Andre: Well, Mr. Speaker, he knew as much about it as I knew about his point of order yesterday, to which I listened for 45 minutes.

Mr. Gauthier: Here we are again mixing apples and oranges.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can help the House. The minister is giving a detailed and careful argument on a matter of some considerable importance to this place. I would like him to continue because I am listening as carefully as I can.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I draw attention to page 479 of this publication which deals with the Speaker's ruling on February 5, 1973 concerning amendments proposed to Bill C–124, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

During that procedural discussion the Speaker was asked to rule on whether amendments were acceptable if they have as their effect an alteration of the royal recommendation or if they constitute a rejection of the bill.

The Speaker ruled that the motions in question are out of order because they change the objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications of the royal recommendation. He said that amendments are only in order if they fall within terms of the resolution.

I would also draw the Speaker's attention to the publication, Selective Decisions of Speaker James Jerome, published in 1983. I would draw your attention to pages 114, 118, 119, 120–121, and 123. Specifically, pages 119 and 120 deal with amendments proposed to Bill C–69, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the Speaker's ruling on December 15, 1975. The issues discussed concern whether amendments can be made that involve the expenditure of money not sanctioned by the royal recommendation. In the ruling Speaker Jerome ruled these amendments out of order because they infringed on the financial initiative of the Crown and because the expenditures proposed were not provided for in the royal recommendation.

Before I proceed to explain why amendments 5(a) and (b), 7 and 9 relate to these rulings, I would like to point out that several initiatives in Bill C–21 were provided for in the budget speech and papers presented by the Minister of Finance, as I have indicated. In my speech of March 12, 1990 I referred directly to the budget speech so I will not quote from it now. However, again Beauchesne's and Erskine May state that the most important parts of ways and means is the budget speech.

Mr. Speaker, I would also refer you to the so-called Gladstone amendment of 1866, to the Standing Order of the British House of Commons and to the ninth report of the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance tabled in the Senate on February 13, 1990 concerning the Senate's traditional treatment of legislation with royal recommendations.

Beauchesne's goes on to state in Citation 974:

> The Minister of Finance presents the House of Commons with a budget statement by moving a motion "That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government—"

This House divided positively on this motion in 1989 thus approving the financial provisions set out in that budget to fix UI premium rates for three years and to modify the financial provisions of the act.

Attempts to modify these provisions as amendments 7 and 9 do are a clear attempt by the other place to change budgetary policy. As we know, budgetary policy is the sole prerogative of the Crown and the House of Commons. To allow the other place to dictate this policy through amendments 7 and 9 would be a clear breach of our responsibilities as elected members of Parliament. The additional costs to the Consolidated Revenue Fund resulting in a change in the 1989 budget as proposed by the other place would exceed $1.75 billion annually.

Amendments 5(a) and (b) are contrary to the royal recommendation because they propose to substitute an alternate scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation.

Clause 22 of Bill C-21 designs a penalty system for people who quit their jobs without just cause by imposing a penalty of seven to twelve weeks.

Amendments 5(a) and (b) propose a different and more expensive—over $350 million—scheme than that provided for in the royal recommendation. For this reason 5(a) and (b) should be ruled out of order.

Amendment 7 attempts to design Consolidated Revenue Fund participation for a new version of regionally extended benefits which would exceed $1.5 billion annually. This amount is out of order for two reasons. First, it provides for an alternate scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation. Second, it infringes on the financial initiative of the Crown by establishing payment from the CRF which was explicitly withdrawn in the 1989 budget approved by this House.

Amendment 9 also attempts to design Consolidated Revenue Fund participation for the payment of fishing benefits which exceed $250 million annually. This amendment is out of order for two reasons. First, it provides for an alternate scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation. Second, it infringes on the financial initiative of the Crown by establishing payments with the CRF which were withdrawn from the 1989 budget approved by the House.

It is the duty of members to protect the rights and responsibilities accorded to this House, not only by the Constitution Act and our Standing Orders, but by centuries of parliamentary procedure and rulings which have given financial responsibility to the House of Commons.

It is incumbent upon us, the elected representatives of the people, to ensure that the nation's finances are guarded by the people's representatives, by members of Parliament who must seek again the support of an elected body, not by appointed people.

I have listed some of the parliamentary rulings. I would urge all members to abide by their responsibilities and recognize that what is being asked of us is trampling on the traditions and responsibilities of this House.

I would like to refer the House to citation 620 of Beauchesne's sixth edition which talks about amendments to a tax act. In fact, what we are talking about here, taxes applied to employees and employers for the purposes of funding UI, are taxes in a real sense which represents billions of dollars to those paying their tax.

I quote citation 620(2):

> (2) This method involves more than just a question of agreement. It involves a question of the privileges of the House which have been enshrined in Standing Order 80. But if the House, in its wisdom, feels that the circumstances are such that it should waive its asserted privileges it does so, in effect, by suspending Standing order 80. Therefore, unless a motion proposes to suspend Standing Order 80, it would require the unanimous consent of the House to pass the amendments which are proposed.

• (1520)

With that citation we are in a situation that, in fact, were we to want to accept the amendments of the Senate, they would have to be preceded by a motion to suspend Standing Order 80, which as the Chair knows has been in place since 1867, and flows directly from the Constitution, Sections 53 and 54.

I recognize and clearly do not expect a ruling in immediate short order, Mr. Speaker, but I would appreciate the guidance of the Chair in this regard. I am reminded and encouraged by rereading the decisions of the Chair in respect to Bill C-103 of July 1988 wherein the Speaker was moved to acknowledge that the Senate's alterations to that bill were in fact infringing on the privileges of this House.

It is incumbent upon us to recognize that these amendments infringe on the privileges of this House. We must defend these hard-won privileges. While the Senate, the other place, takes its authority from Section 17 of the Constitution which says there will be a Parliament consisting of the Governor General, the Senate and the House of Commons we know that by long centuries of tradition the Governor General, not being elected, does not not exercise that authority. The Senate not being elected ought not to be trodding on the authorities of this House of Commons. It is up to the House of Commons to defend our responsibilities and our authorities.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this debate has been put forward by the government House leader without notice, by the way. If that is the way he wants to operate in the House from now on, we will take that as notice and we will comply with that kind of bad precedent. I just want to make sure that the minister, who has called a meeting of the House Leaders for 3.15 p.m., will not have a meeting all by himself somewhere and will wait for this debate to be over, at which time we will meet with him to discuss the House business for the coming week.

The question arises, of course, as to why the minister did not make this argument on March 12 last, when this House debated for some time the message from the Senate dealing with Bill C-21. At the time, if you look at the record, Mr. Speaker, you will see that the minister did not invoke the arguments that he has put to you today, but rather accepted one amendment fully, and three in principle, and then passed a message on to the Senate.

I believe that the minister, Mr. Speaker, by asking you a very great number of hypothetical questions, and also constitutional questions, is putting the Chair in a very difficult situation. What the Speaker has to do now is to rule on hypothetical questions, which I hope you will not, Mr. Speaker, and on constitutional questions, which are not the prerogative of the Chair.

Therefore, why did the government not bring these arguments to us on March 12? Because they are trying to play funny games with the House. This new House leader that we have today is known as the bully around here. He bullies people around, he thinks that he is going to get his way, that he will accomplish everything by having his way.

Mr. Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. minister.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, it may be personal privilege. I have a relatively thick skin. I sat here for 45 minutes yesterday and listened to the hon. member abuse me. But I do not understand what the personal abuse he hurls toward me has to do with the constitutional questions I am asking the House to address. I wish the hon. member would address that constitutional question: does he believe in democracy or does he not?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has risen on a point of order, and as far as everything I have heard so far is concerned, he is certainly in order to do so. He has presented an argument in some detail to such an extent that the appropriate members on the opposition side have naturally asked for a copy of the argument. I understand that.

The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier is properly replying and there may be other things that could be said in another place. What I need is argument directed to the matters that are raised and that are before us. Without that, I cannot be of very much assistance to the House. I would ask all hon. members to keep that in mind.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I will keep those remarks in mind and try to address the various points quickly and, I hope, with clarity so that members of the House will understand that indeed I made some valid arguments on March 12 last which I would like members to return to in dealing with some of the specifics dealing with Bill C-21.

I still think that hypothetical questions and constitutional questions are not the responsibility of the Chair and I would refer the minister to the experts in his department to address those questions and maybe give us some advice and he could come into the House and read for us again.

I do not think that the arguments raised by—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could interrupt the hon. member for just a moment. Generally speaking, the proposition put by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier that it is not for the Chair to decide a constitutional question is at least prima facie valid.

The argument put by the hon. minister may well contain matters which are procedural and the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier may very well want to distinguish between those that might be procedural and those that he might argue ought not to be within the purview of the Speaker. But there may be a mix of things in this debate. I hope that assists the hon. member a little bit.

Mr. Gauthier: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for those remarks. I recognize that procedural questions are indeed to be discussed and can be raised in this House. My only point is that constitutional questions per se are not in the purview of the Chair.

The government, or the minister speaking for the government, is trying to bail out of a difficult situation, a difficult conundrum they got themselves into on Bill C–21. We all know that as of now the procedure is that the Senate has had the bill before it, studied it, looked at it seriously, referred it back to this House with a message recommending some nine amendments. Three of those amendments were accepted by the government and sent back with a message to the Senate. We know now that another message is back here. We have it on the Order Paper and that is the situation in regard to Bill C–21.

What the government is attempting to do today is try to muddy the waters and come back and argue that the first message received by this House was indeed not acceptable and should not have been received. We will argue, Mr. Speaker, that that of course is nonsense and that the government in alleging such things, is behind the times and trying to again catch up to the facts of the procedures of this House.

I may refer to debate in the Senate during my remarks. I hope the House will bear with me, because there has been a study made by the Senate of these amendments and a ruling made by the Chair, the Speaker of the Senate, on February 20, 1990 which members would probably like to read and inspire themselves with.

It has been alleged by this government that the Senate actions with respect to Bill C–21 are constitutionally and procedurally unsound. That is exactly what we have been told today by the minister. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that these charges are without foundation in either fact or law. Ignoring precedent, dismissing authorities is nothing more than an attempt to divert all attention from the wilful inadequacies of the legislation itself, that is, Bill C–21.

• (1530)

In my comments to this House on March 12, I related historical background as to why this side of the House, the Liberal caucus, believes that these amendments were in order.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in 1867 there were those in this country who opposed the establishment of the Senate. They wanted a Parliament constituted strictly on the basis of representation by population. Those persons, we will recall, were mostly from Canada West, which is now Ontario, my province. Fortunately, they did not prevail. They did not win their argument. Other provinces refused to agree, and rightly so, Mr. Speaker, to a Parliament in which they would be in a minority situation and where Ontario would have the upper hand.

Those of us who come from Central Canada, as we say today, must recognize, however, that members of the House of Commons are elected and have a most important role to perform, and also that there is another Chamber, the Senate, which has an important role as well, which is to review and perhaps rethink the legislation referred to it. One could call this the Senate's right to provide a second opinion on all legislation considered and passed by this House.

Mr. Speaker, I, for one, believe that an elected Senate would probably be more effective. It is a view that is shared by many Liberal members. However, until we do have Senate reform, and as long as the present situation prevails, we must allow the Senate, whatever the government's big guns may have to say about it, to perform the task assigned to it by our Constitution.

Point of Order

Mr. Speaker, I am getting to my question. Are the amendments put before this House by the Senate of Canada unacceptable because they contravene our Standing Orders, as the minister said earlier?

Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 80(1) to which the minister referred was used by him to argue that these amendments contravene our Standing Orders. He also made use of the constitutional argument—sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867. I could not find anybody in the Senate who said: We accepted Standing Order 80(1) of the House of Commons. This particular standing order should not concern the Senate, Mr. Speaker, and why should it?

Mr. Speaker, to make myself clear, I will read the Standing Order which says, and I quote:

> All aids and supplies granted to the Sovereign by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies—

And the Standing Order goes on, Mr. Speaker.

I want to stress the term "aids and supplies" because this is an important part of the point I am trying to make. I argued this point on March 12. I will do it again today, because the Prime Minister failed to understand what the point was.

Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 80(1) goes on as follows:

> U.C. bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, the question we have to answer is whether Bill C–21 deals with aids and supplies as described in Standing Order 80(1). In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there is no connection with 80(1)—in other words, with aids and supplies. We need not revive the old argument between the House of Commons and the Senate about whether Standing Order 80(1) prevails here. As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, 80(1) is not a rule of the Senate but a Standing Order of the House of Commons, and I fail to see how it can be used to argue that Bill C–21 and the Senate's amendments to the bill are concerned with aids and supplies.

Mr. Speaker, if we refer to such authorities as Erskine May, for example, we conclude that there are two categories of public expenditures. It is important that people understand that public expenditures are those paid directly from the appropriations voted every year by Parliament. What happened today, Mr. Speaker, was that the House voted to restore the appropriations to the government for public expenditures. And then we have ways and means motions, Mr. Speaker, and as you know every year the government introduces ways and means motions to seek authority to allocate funds.

Then we have expenditures paid directly from the public treasury. That is the second category. Expenditures payable with funds authorized by Parliament are those approved each year through appropriation legislation introduced in the House on a regular basis. Expenditures paid by the treasury are called legislative expenditures. Mr. Speaker, those are the ones we are talking about in Bill C–21. This has nothing to do with the old argument as to whether supply and appropriations are involved, but with legislative measures which entail expenditures, with the royal recommendation, of course.

History tells us that the Crown was expected to pay public service expenses with revenue from its assets. When it was found that such a revenue source was not quite enough the Crown asked Parliament for supply and appropriations, or additional funds to meet annual needs. Our Standing Order 81 refers to the supply bill.

At Westminster, supply and appropriation bills with a Royal recommendation are introduced by the Speaker of the House of Commons. We have the same thing in Canada. A bill must carry the Royal recommendation to be called a legislative expenditures measure. That being said, let us examine the other kinds of outlays which I called legislative expenditures. They are not introduced through a supply bill nor are they covered under Standing Orders concerning supply proceedings.

Prior to 1968 they were introduced through financial resolutions before a committee of the whole House. Such resolutions were recommended to the House by the Governor General and, in 1968, the preliminary stage of the resolution was eliminated in Canada. Ever since the Royal recommendation has been sent to the House in the manner prescribed in Standing Order 79(2).

Bill C–21 was introduced with a royal recommendation, pursuant to Standing Order 79(2), and not upon the presentation of a message, pursuant to Standing Order

79(3). I believe it would be useful for me to read Standing Order 79(2) and Standing Order 79(3):

> (2) The message and recommendation of the Governor General in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

End of Standing Order 79(2).

Standing Order 79(3) reads as follows:

> (3) When estimates are brought in, the message from the Governor General shall be presented to and read by the Speaker in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest the House should recognize that Bill C–21 is not a supply bill. Definitely, in this case, Standing Order 79(2) and Standing Order 79(3) apply, and not Standing Order 81.

Having said that, let us deal now with the Constitutional issue which the minister raised again today. Are the amendments which the Senate proposed out of order by virtue of Sections 53 and 54 of our Constitutional Act, 1867? Mr. Speaker, I remind all hon. members that Bill C–21 was a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act adopted in 1970 and 1972. I remind them also that the bill which became the Unemployment Insurance Act was Bill C–229 which was read the first time on March 10, 1971. That is the legislation which Bill C–21 meant to amend. The amounts were duly allocated under a recommendation of the Governor General.

Whoever examines the amendments which the Senate made to Bill C–21 realizes that a member of this House could have presented each of these amendments as an amendment to Bill C–229 of 1971. That is a fact, Mr. Speaker. None of the amendments proposed to the various clauses of Bill C–21 seeks to increase or change the amount or purpose of an allocation in a way which would affect the royal recommendation of March 10, 1971. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that none of the proposed amendments seeks to increase or change the amount or purpose of an allocation in a way that would affect the royal commission of March 10, 1971. Why, then, is the minister getting so excited? Well, he wishes to make a point.

Mr. Speaker, it follows that the amendments which the Senate proposed to Bill C–21 are not inconsistent with the royal recommendation; quite the opposite. If Bill C–229, in 1971, was in order when it was passed on March 10, 1971, we believe that the same holds for the Senate's amendments that are before the House today, in 1990, because they in no way contravene the allocation of funds provided for in the original bill.

Mr. Speaker, since all the provisions of Bill C–21 could have been presented in 1971 as amendments to Bill C–229, the original legislation, we must wonder why Bill C–21 had the royal recommendation when it was presented to the House of Commons on June 1, 1989, as we know. We wonder why. I know that my colleague from Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Milliken) has already addressed this question, but he will certainly repeat his arguments once again.

On February 5, 1990, when the committee asked officials what clauses of Bill C–21 required a royal recommendation, the officials, this government's advisers, said—In other words, when asked why it was necessary to obtain or include a royal recommendation in the bill, these officials replied that neither the Employment and Immigration Commission nor the Department of Justice had determined which provisions of this legislation required a royal recommendation.

It has not been clearly shown either in committee or in this House, Mr. Speaker, that certain clauses require a royal recommendation. They knew of none at the committee stage and we know of none today either. Since no clause that the Senate proposes amending, Mr. Speaker, requires a royal recommendation, we conclude that the royal recommendation of June 1, 1989 is unnecessary, at least as far as these clauses are concerned. That is the line of reasoning on which the Senate justifies the validity of the proposed amendments.

That is what the Speaker of the Senate based his decision on, Mr. Speaker. He cited Erskine May in his ruling that the amendments in question were in order and that they imposed no additional charge on the public treasury.

Unlike a money bill, Bill C–21 reduces the charges on the public treasury. It is therefore in order.

Point of Order

Mr. Speaker, I now want to touch on—I could deal with it at length, but I will let my colleagues in this House do so. I will let them go into each of the proposed amendments and how they have been handled by the government.

[English]

I would like to use some arguments that the minister has given us today in this House and at other times, concerning Bill C-21. The minister claimed that Senate amendments to Bill C-21 violated Standing Order 80(1).

An Hon. Member: The House didn't agree.

Mr. Gauthier: I did not say that the House didn't agree. I said the Senate is not bound by it. You should listen, Mr. Minister, to what I am saying. I will repeat it again for the minister, because I think he missed the point. I repeat Standing Order 80(1).

> All aids and supplies granted to the Sovereign by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

Standing Order 80 (1), is a unilateral declaration by this House of Commons which has absolutely, as I said earlier in my remarks, no effect on the Senate. The Senate has never accepted, does not have to accept, does not have to deal with Standing Order 80 (1). It does not have to accept the proposition that this Standing Order limits the authority or powers in any way.

Furthermore, Standing Order 80 (1) has absolutely no relevance to the matter at hand since Bill C-21, has nothing whatsoever to do with aids and supplies as I just finished explaining. The term "aids and supplies" refers to the process whereby the government presents and then has approved by the House of Commons its estimates. God knows the Tories have had a large majority so they get their way all the time, and they should not be unhappy about that, but they seem to take it out on us all the time. I want to tell them that aids and supplies, in our interpretation, means aids and supplies, and refers to the process whereby the government presents and then has approved by the House of Commons its estimates which then form part of the appropriation bill.

I do not have to remind the House that last Friday this government pulled the rug out from under its own feet on supply, moved quorum on debate on an opposition day, and lost the procedure for supply in this House.

I would like to have before me the article written by Marjorie Nichols. I think it would be worth reading into the record to make the point. We thought it was a rather dumb thing to do.

Mr. Andre: Not as dumb as you, Gauthier.

Mr. Milliken: It was a waste of authority as well.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to keep in mind the Speaker's comment a little earlier. These are complicated matters. There will be other matters of debate. Whatever was in one article or in another is not something that helps me answer the question that is being posed.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I needed a rest from standing like this. I needed to sit down—he's always been a sucker for a left anyway.

In the 1989-1990 Estimates, Part II, page 62, there is summary of expenditures of the Department of Employment and Immigration. The summary shows which expenditures must be approved by Parliament. Under the sub-heading "Employment and Insurance Program", approval for operating expenditures was requested under Vote 5, and approval for grants and contributions was requested under Vote 10. But four items including the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance account in the amount of $2.660 billion, and government contributions in respect to fishermen's benefits in the amount of $286 million, required no vote. These are statutory expenditures and were included in the Estimates for information purposes only.

I think I should remind the House that the purpose of estimates is to present to Parliament the budgetary and non-budgetary expenditure proposals of the government for the next fiscal year. These estimates include votes, which Parliament is asked to approve through appropriation acts, as well as other items called statutory items, for which the required expenditures have already been approved through existing legislation and are included only for information purposes. This is from Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 484, page 169.

The reason for this is that the statutory obligations continue unchanged for the life of the Unemployment Insurance Act. They need not be confirmed year after year. In the 1989–90 fiscal year the federal government contributed almost $3 billion to the unemployment insurance account. Parliament was not asked to approve these expenditures. Parliament was not asked to agree to spend funds for this purpose. Parliament gave its approval when the program was established and that approval is continuous.

When the estimates are approved by Parliament the resulting appropriation bill or supply bill, as it is also called, is introduced. It does not contain the statutory expenditures. Citation 509(1) of Beauchesne's at page 173 states:

> The concurrence by the House of the Estimates is an Order of the House to bring in a bill, known as the Appropriation Bill—

Consequently, Parliament is not asked to approve annually either directly or indirectly these statutory expenditures or for that matter other statutory expenditures such as family allowances or old age security payments. Parliament is, however, asked to approve non-statutory expenditures such as the operating budgets of departments, including the operating budget of the Department of Employment and Immigration.

As I just mentioned, Mr. Speaker, it does so by first agreeing to the appropriation vote in the Estimates. This is what is commonly referred to as granting supply, in other words agreeing to the government's plan of how it intends to spend money.

Parliament then passes an appropriation bill which makes good the supply. It sounds like a very reasonable, well understood system. By approving the appropriation of money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, Parliament is accomplishing its duty. Without an appropriation bill the government would have its spending plan approved but no money to put it into effect.

Mr. Baker: Right on.

Mr. Gauthier: It is these non-statutory expenditures which Parliament approves, which include votes on the Estimates and the appropriation bill, that constitute aids and supply. I just referred to the definition of that. I can repeat it again if the minister wants to hear it. I see he has left the House, Mr. Speaker. I guess he does not have an interest in this matter and he just wants to go out—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is an experienced and leading member of this place and knows that whether a minister left, or whether a minister stayed, or whether one of his colleagues went, or whether he stayed is not an appropriate comment. I want him to continue to address, as he is quite capable of doing of course, the exact points that I have to decide.

Mr. Gauthier: I accept again, Mr. Speaker, but in a debate you would expect the other person to be there when you are speaking and I would like to make that point, very clear. I say this in all kindness. I do not want to—

Mr. Epp: What kindness?

Mr. Gauthier: From the bottom of my heart where it should be on the left side of centre.

Mr. Speaker: It may be from the bottom of the heart but how deep down did you dig?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I would point out to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier that the parliamentary secretary is here and I am sure that he is listening carefully to the learned remarks of our friend.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that and I like that person very much.

Mr. Cooper: Thanks. You just got my pay cut!

Mr. Gauthier: As I was saying, it is these non-statutory expenditures which Parliament approves through its vote on the estimates and the appropriation bill that constitutes aids and supplies.

The government requests, of course, the aid of Parliament in meeting its day-to-day operating expenses, and Parliament usually agrees to supply the necessary funds. In fact when an appropriation bill is passed by the House of Commons and Senate, the Speaker of the House of Commons addresses in the Senate Chamber the hon. the Deputy of the Governor General at the time of Royal Assent as follows:

> May it please Your Honour, the Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

These are from Senate Debates, June 19, 1989, page 459, concerning Bill C-35. Very, very impressive statement.

> May it please Your Honour, the Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

This form of address is used exclusively for appropriation bills. It is used to complete the aids and supplies process. It would of course not be used at the time of Royal Assent on Bill C-21. It could not be because Bill C-21 is not a bill of aids and supplies.

In arguing that the Senate was butchering—the word the minister used—Standing Order 80, the new Government House Leader exhibited a profound misunderstanding of not only the supply process of Parliament, but also the very nature of Bill C-21.

This bill calls for the reduction—I underline that word, the reduction—of expenditures. It asks Parliament to allow the government to end existing statutory expenditures, eliminating existing expenditures. It does not grant aids and supplies. That is our interpretation of what aids and supplies means.

Now I want to come back to an argument that I made a few minutes ago about the constitutional argument that was put to you today by the minister and to which I said to you, Mr. Speaker, that I did not think it was your responsibility to act as constitutional adviser to the minister.

The hon. minister charged that Section 53 of the Constitution Act of 1867 prohibits the Senate from amending money bills. Mr. Speaker, you will find that statement at page 96.

An Hon. Member: Stuff and nonsense!

Mr. Gauthier: He is wrong, wrong, wrong. In fact he had been contradicted by his own actions in dealing with the Senate amendments on Bill C-21. Section 53 of our Constitution states:

> Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Commons.

The minister claims it is axiomatic that if the Senate amends such a bill the bill does not originate in the House of Commons. That was the argument he used on March 12. Unfortunately, the only thing that is axiomatic or self-evident about this proposition is that it flies in the face of the commonly accepted meaning of the word "originate". And I may get the dictionary later on if he comes into the House and read it to him again as to what the word originate means.

The Concise Oxford Dictionary defines "originate" as: Give origin to, initiate, cause to begin. It defines its root "origin" as: derivation, beginning or rising or coming from something, starting-point. The word "originate" implies a beginning, not an end. It describes a starting point. Then it must run its course.

Bill C-21 originated in the House of Commons. We all know that. It was an amendment to the original existing legislation. It was amended in the House of Commons and passed by the House of Commons. Mr. Speaker, you understand and will recognize some lengthy and very constructive debate on the part of the opposition, but with the usual closure motions and appropriation of time that the government invokes all the time. This is the thirty-fifth time the government has done it in this Parliament. We are getting to the point now where the cynicism is such that we expect the government to do it every day.

I would not be surprised if it did so on this matter. I would not be surprised if it did it on Bill C-62, the GST bill. I would not be surprised if it did it on the abortion bill. I would not be surprised if it did it on everything before the House, because it has got into the habit of doing it so much. It is now past the stage of something which was used exceptionally and is now used commonly all the time.

Bill C-61 originated in the House of Commons. It went to the Senate, was amended and passed. The requirements of section 53 of our Constitution of 1867 in our opinion were indeed met.

It is interesting that when the minister concluded his argument on Bill C-21 he said that it was a money bill and that section 53 of The Constitution Act, 1867 prohibited the Senate from making any amendments to money bills, and he moved the following motion:

> That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees with amendments 4(a) made by the Senate to Bill C-21—

Although the message then goes on to raise a constitutional objection concerning other Senate amendments, the fact remains that the government House leader and the House itself accepted, without demur or reservation, a Senate amendment to a bill which the government claims is a money bill.

They cannot have it both ways. The minister's declaration that section 53 prohibits the Senate from amending money bills rings hollow in view of his own request that the House of Commons support one of the Senate's amendments. There has to be something lacking in his judgment.

I want to refer to section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, House of Commons Standing Order 79, and the royal recommendation. As with the analysis of the supply process and of money bills, the minister displayed a total lack of understanding about the royal recommendation process.

In his remarks before the House of Commons he alleged that the Senate had passed amendments that went beyond the terms of the royal recommendation attached to Bill C–21 and that in doing so had acted contrary to the requirements of section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and House of Commons Standing Order 79.

There is simply no truth in this charge. I will show you why. I want to read section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867 for the minister who is out there laughing at this issue which we consider to be very serious and most important. I am going to be nice to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867 reads as follows:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

Mr. Speaker, that is clear.

Standing Order 79 which incorporates and adds section 54, reads as follows:

> (1) This House—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could just excuse the Chair for a moment.

First, I want to let the hon. member know that I think I have the points he is making thoroughly secured in my mind. If there are some other references the hon. member would like to make in wrapping up, I would certainly want to hear them. But I do not think that it needs to take the time of the House, or my time, in reading sections from the Constitution Act or from the Standing Orders. If a point needs to be made on one of them, I think it may be sufficient just to draw my attention to the Standing Order or to the section which I will of course look at and read in any event.

Mr. Gauthier: I take your admonition seriously. I was just trying to instruct the people out there who are listening to us and give them the opportunity to understand what the process is all about.

The minister's speech, by stating Standing Order 79(1) means nothing to people out there listening. I think they understand English or French, and I am trying to read the Standing Orders in order to help them better understand what this place is all about.

Mr. Speaker: I would point out to the hon. member and other hon. members that ultimately it would be for me to make sure they understand what we are doing. It might not always be that easy.

I am asking the hon. member to close off his remarks as soon as he can.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I will refer to the Standing Orders by their number, and you can get them out of the book and read them yourself.

Standing Order 79 incorporates and adds to section 54 of our Constitution, 1867. A royal recommendation is required if a bill appropriates money. Bill C–21 carried a royal recommendation. The minister claimed that clauses 2, subparagraphs (1), (9), 14(1), 19(2), 20 and 50(1) of Bill C–21 imposed a charge on public funds. The Senate did not amend Clauses 2(1), (9), 14(1), 19(2) and 50(1). These clauses remain unchanged. It did amend clause 20 but far from increasing a charge it reduced it by restricting the development use provisions of the bill.

As will be described, a royal recommendation is not necessary if a charge is being reduced. We all know that.

The minister also claimed that the Senate amendment which would maintain a certain level of government contributions to the UI account required a royal recommendation. This claim discloses a total and indeed a comprehensive lack of understanding of the royal recommendation process.

Point of Order

The Unemployment Insurance Act requires the government to pay for all regionally extended benefits. Clause 52 of Bill C–21 would eliminate completely the government's contribution. The Senate rejected this proposal. In its place it substituted an amendment which would reduce government contributions by 50 per cent. The minister claims it is absurd. Those are his own words, that it is absurd to argue that this Senate amendment does not require a royal recommendation. In point of fact, the absurdity lies in arguing that an amendment which reduces expenditures requires a royal recommendation.

The royal recommendation attached to Bill C–21 reads as follows:

> Her Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled an act—

The provisions of Bill C–21 which are in dispute propose to reduce or eliminate existing statutory expenditures. The Senate amendment to clause 52 of the bill would also reduce existing statutory expenditures but by a lesser amount.

To argue that a royal recommendation from the Governor General is necessary when existing expenditures are being reduced would lead to the following absurdity—and I am using the House leader's words own words. I want to read how absurd it would sound:

> Her Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the reduction of public expenditures under the circumstances—

That would make no sense. No such royal recommendation has ever been proposed. I do not think that any government, even a House leader as incompetent as that one, would even think of doing that.

I could go on to quote Erskine May, twentieth edition, at page 716, but keeping in mind your remarks that you do not want me to quote extensively, I hope these will be appended to the speech that I am making, as if read.

That is why the Speaker of the Senate, ruled in order the amendments now before the House of Commons, on the grounds that amendments to reduce or maintain existing charges did not require a royal recommendation. As authority, he cited Erskine May. The minister did not call upon the Speaker of the House of Commons to rule on these amendments at the time of debate on March 12, knowing, and undoubtedly he did, that they were in fact procedurally proper. What he is doing today by asking you to rule on them is asking you to pull him out of his conundrum. Instead, he chose at that time to present a series of convoluted arguments which, if accepted, would require rewriting the Constitution of this country, the Standing Orders of this House and the authorities, Erskine May, Beauchesne, and many other experts in the field which we use commonly in this House. You would have to rewrite the whole book to please that minister.

I want to conclude my remarks. I know you will be happy to hear that I am going to conclude on an up note. I hope to be able to be a little more positive than the minister.

The minister claims that the Senate is prohibited from making any amendments to the so–called "money bills". He ignores precedent and the authorities. I would like to quote some of those. Appendix 1 of Beauchesne's provides the form to be used in the House of Commons for moving various motions. We use those every day. In the fifth edition at page 282, Form No. 47, which is entitled "Agreeing with Senate Amendments to Money Bills". That is the wording used of the proposed amendment.

The Senate has never agreed with the contention that it is prohibited from making any amendments to money bills, and this position is recognized not only in Beauchesne's, but even in the procedural publications prepared by the House of Commons itself.

Précis of Procedures, second edition, 1987, which was prepared by the House of Commons Table Research Branch and published under the authority of the Clerk of the House of Commons, recognizes the procedure concerning the "reconsideration by the House of any amendments" made by the Senate to taxation bills, bills which have been preceded by a Ways and Means motion; in other words, money bills.

The truth is described in Dawson's The Government of Canada, sixth edition, 1987, when dealing with a claim of the House of Commons concerning the lack of authority by the Senate over money bills because of Standing Order 80. Mr. Speaker, I beg your patience and indulgence. I have to read it because it is very important and it ends my remarks. The author is Dawson, The Government of Canada, sixth edition, 1987 and I quote:

> It is a fair statement that almost the only attention the Senate has given to this grand assertion is to ignore it. On the theoretical side the Senate has argued that if the constitution was intended to limit the Senate's power over money bills once initiated, it would say so. The Senate has insisted further that it could not discharge its functions as a guardian of provincial or regional rights if it had no power over money bills. What is more important is that the Senate has repeatedly amended bills that contained money clauses, and also bills that dealt exclusively with finance, including income tax bills. The Commons has accepted Senate amendments to money bills, usually adding a futile claim that its acquiescence must not be considered a precedent. The Senate could, if practice is any guide, amend a money bill out of all recognition, so that in effect the bill was rejected.

In its amendment to Bill C-21, the Senate has taken a much more moderate course of action than I just described.

I know there are other members in this House who would like to address this issue, explain the impact of the procedure before us and go on to explain why we should indeed accept the message of the Senate and pass it.

Having taken the time of the House, I apologize if at times I was repetitive. I do think, Mr. Speaker, that given the fact that we were given no notice of this debate today, the minister not having thought to give us prior notice of at least a half an hour, or even an hour, we will continue to debate this motion in due course. When we get to the substantive message, whenever it is called, I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if I may comment further on this process.

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-62

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, because this particular point of order may be carried on for some while, I wish to indicate that agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) and 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time to the report stage and third reading of Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act, and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Time Allocation

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allowing a specified number of days or a day for the consideration and disposal at both stages of the said bill.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): We have another example of either—I do not want to use the word "arrogance", I am trying to find another word. Mr. Speaker, it is not debate. It is a point of order and it is a good one.

The debate on Bill C-62 at report stage has not started. It has not started yet. The order was called by the House at one o'clock and the House adjourned at one o'clock. I submit that the notice given is not in order because the debate has not started. Just calling the order does not mean the debate has started. There has been nobody in this House that has addressed this issue as of now and I maintain——that the whole process is biased, it is the only word I can think of, because neither the House nor the committee has had a chance to study the bill. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this point of order is extremely serious and that once again the government is making a mistake because it wants to push it, to bully it through and do things its own way regardless of the Standing Orders of the House.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I have been in the House for over an hour listening to my normally eloquent and concise friend on a point of order for an hour.

As the Speaker knows, the order was called this morning. The minister made an intervention on this point of order of 20 minutes. The hon. member chose to go on for 60 minutes and if that is what he chooses to do, that is fine. At the same time it is very clear that the debate was called today. The order was called. The debate has started. If the opposition chooses to speak 60 minutes on a point of order, that is their option. The other option is to continue with Orders of the Day.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, your patience is being tested quite severely today.

Point of Order

I want to lend my voice of support to my hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier's intervention. I want to remind you of a comment you made in this House on December 15, 1988 when you spoke some very thoughtful and guiding words for this moment. I quote from page 78 of Hansard: the following:

> After a very careful consideration of this point, I am more persuaded by the weight of precedent and practice. Taking into consideration the gravity of the measure to be invoked and the necessity of protecting the rights of the minority, it is my feeling and decision that the intention of the Standing Order as drafted and as it has been applied is to allow a majority to impose closure only after debate on the question has begun. This is to ensure that such debate is not unfairly or prematurely curtailed. In this instance, debate on the motion had clearly not begun when the Hon. Minister served notice.

Mr. Speaker, that was your comment in December of last year. Obviously the debate has not commenced. The debate has not begun. If we are to be consistent in this House, the government House Leader has to learn to accept the fact that while he is anxious to invoke closure or time allocation, he must at least wait until we have begun to debate this stage of the legislation. I know he finds that difficult, but surely to goodness he should at least allow the debate to commence even for a few minutes before he invokes closure and muzzles Parliament.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the order was called this morning. We did have a vote moving to Orders of the Day. The order was called—

An Hon. Member: There was no debate.

Mr. Cooper: Orders of the Day were called. The debate started. It was very clear. If all members had listened very carefully they would know that everything was started. We are now in the time slot where that debate is on the floor of the House. If members choose to debate that particular issue or if they choose to go on at great length on a point of order on another subject, that is their option. However, Mr. Speaker, I think it is very clear that in fact the order has been called for debate and the notice of motion, as presented by the Minister of Finance, is acceptable to the House and is totally in order.

An Hon. Member: It is not.

Mr. Cooper: Certainly, it is.

Mr. Speaker: I will check the record and come back to the House and clarify this matter.

The hon. member for Kamloops may want to rise on the other matter we were discussing.

BILL C-21

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, indeed, I do want to rise on this other matter.

I think the position of the New Democratic Party vis-à-vis the Senate is well known. Unlike the other two political parties in this House our view of the Senate and its role is well known. We do not believe it has any place as presently constituted in a democratic society. As a matter of fact, I think you would look long and hard to find a Parliament anywhere in the world of unelected representatives that have acted in the way we have seen the present Senate. I just make that point at the outset.

I listened with interest to the government House leader's remarks. I regret the fact that he did not circulate his notes ahead of time. I know we do not necessarily do this, but this is not a normal discussion. This is not a normal intervention. What we are doing here is questioning the very basis of the Canadian parliamentary system, whether or not the Senate of Canada has the right to amend legislation successfully passed through the House of Commons.

The government has already accepted certain amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21. Now to say the Senate has no right to amend the legislation seems to be inconsistent. That alone puts the comments of the government House Leader in the appropriate context, that while I appreciate his concern and frustration the logic seems rather loose.

Since the government has refused to allow the people of Canada to be heard on bills such as Bill C-21 the Senate has taken it upon themselves to hear from the people of Canada through extensive hearings and report back on the findings obtained after listening to the people of Canada.

I think what we are also discussing here is a future implication. With the clawback legislation the government has abandoned the universality of our pension system and our family allowance system. I wonder if the Senate would not feel similarly in that hearings ought to be held on this major change to public policy in these areas.

Or when the the goods and services tax goes to the Senate—God forbid that it ever makes it to the Senate—again, would they not feel an obligation to do what the government refused to do, hold hearings in the province of Quebec. This is almost pitiful when you think that the government says they are interested in public participation and yet not a single day was set aside for hearings in one of the largest provinces in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary rises on a point of order.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the hon. member with great care and although he is making an interesting intervention as to what the Senate may or may not like to do on any number of bills, I do not see that it has any relevance to the point of order before us which deals specifically with whether or not the Senate has the right to amend financial bills. It has been clearly demonstrated that Bill C-21 is that type of bill.

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend was out of the House when I commented that the government, I understand, has already accepted certain amendments. Having already accepted certain amendments, now seems to be a rather awkward time to be suggesting that they ought not to accept any further amendments. I sense some weakness in the logic of that approach.

However, I suppose technically one could say that the Senate does possess the right under the Constitution Act to do what it has done. Whether it has the ethical right to do that is another question. It seems to me that it places you, Mr. Speaker, in a very, very difficult situation. From time to time all of us in this House probably question the things that are done in the Senate. We doubt the wisdom of some of the judgments made. But surely it is not the role of the Speaker of the House of Commons to comment on the messages received from the Senate.

I submit that the Senate can send any message to the House of Commons it wants and then it is up to the House of Commons to decide how it is to reply. Surely it ought not to be left to the Speaker to decide what comments from the Senate are appropriate and others that are perhaps not appropriate.

Point of Order

I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the issue before us today has far-reaching implications in terms of the future role of the upper House. Since we did not have an opportunity to reflect on the very thoughtful comments of the government House leader—and similarly I might say the very thoughtful comments offered by the member for Ottawa—Vanier—and considering the implications of the decisions that you, Mr. Speaker, are being asked to rule upon, that we set this aside and return, perhaps tomorrow, after members have had an opportunity to reflect clearly on the very thoughtful presentations made by both sides and add more suggestions for Your Honour to consider.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops. Over the evening or at least following the House today other hon. members may want to assist the Speaker further. I know the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands may wish to. But in the interest of the accommodation of the House, it seems to me that the hon. member for Kamloops has made a very sensible suggestion.

Copies of the hon. House leader's argument which was carefully put together and is well referenced can be in the hands of hon. members and I shall return to the House at a time appropriate to hon. members and we will complete the debate. It does not have to be decided this afternoon and hon. members would know why I would not decide it this afternoon in any event.

I am going to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops which I think is helpful to the House and we shall see to other matters.

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-62—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: While I am on my feet, I think I should refer to the hon. Minister of Finance's intervention in giving notice of time allocation and the objection taken to that a few minutes ago.

Objection has been taken on the basis that the matter was not before the House. Some reference was made to an earlier precedent. If the hon. member goes back and takes a careful look at that precedent and what I said, we were not even at Orders of the Day. In this case, we got to Orders of the Day. I gave a long ruling on the motions that are now before the House at report stage and following that ruling there was some discussion. It is true that the hon. member for Gloucester was not on his feet on debate, but I think I would be stretching things a very long way indeed if I should rule today that the House was not seized of the Order of the Day. I do not think I can go that far. I have to accept the notice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Comox—Alberni, Low-Level Flights; the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, Fisheries; the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, External Affairs.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): As put by the Speaker today, I have motions 1 to 90. Shall I dispense.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-62 be amended by deleting Clause 1.

That Bill C-62 be amended by deleting Clause 7.

That Bill C-62 be amended by deleting Clause 7.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if we could ask the House leader for the opposition just what is gained by this, because what is becoming very clear to me is the significance and the wisdom of time allocation. The opposition have put forward all these motions, they force upon you this need to waste the time of the House reading the 90 motions one by one, using up the time that they would normally take to speak to these amendments. Clearly it is never the intention of either the opposition parties to debate this bill. They simply want to waste time.

So I would be interested in understanding what their position is and why they are forcing this upon you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I have to respond because the Minister of Finance seems to be a reasonable man. He will understand that at report stage it is the right of any member to table amendments. We have some 90 amendments before the House. For the sake of understanding what is going on, and for the sake of Canadians watching TV today, we should read those amendments so that they know what we are talking about.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to point out that unfortunately my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, will be out of the House temporarily. Perhaps you could indicate another member as a seconder of the motion until such time as he returns. I would be willing to do that myself, or perhaps another colleague.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the amendments proposed to Bill C-62, I want to point out that we want to be very consistent in this. As was indicated in the minority report prepared by the Liberal party when the technical documents were considered by the finance committee, we stated that no amount of tinkering or changing some of the details of the GST would make it acceptable.

Certainly, our experience in listening to literally the hundreds of people who came before the committee, both as individuals and as representing companies or organizations, indicated that, in fact, that was the case. Without exception, although some people might come before the committee supporting the principle of the goods and services tax, they certainly did not support the proposal that is presently before the House.

What is very interesting in all of this is that the government has taken the approach that it believes the tax will be good for people and that people simply do not understand it. That is a debate that will undoubtedly go on across the country as we continue to consider this particular piece of legislation.

I feel that the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, senior citizens in this country and university students will be more than able to defend themselves and explain why they are so concerned about the goods and services tax.

Canadians must recognize that the argument being made is that the present federal sales tax is a very difficult tax to administer, it has a lot of leakage and we are not getting as much money out of it as we should. Of course, the government moved it from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent during the time it has been the government in this country. So, if it was a silent killer of jobs back in 1984, it has become a very effective killer of jobs in 1990.

Beyond that, the point that has to be made is that whenever we discuss the issue of the federal sales tax, which has been in effect for some 60 to 70 years, the Minister of Finance and other members of government talk about visibility. So I would like to restrict my comments today to three or four issues that were made issues by the government itself.

The government came forward with its technical documents in August of last year. In the documents surrounding the draft legislation that was made available to us last fall the government said that most important in dealing with this new tax policy was that it should be visible, that it should be integrated with the provinces, that it should be fair and that it should be revenue neutral.

As I have indicated many times before, one of the strategies taken by the government is that anybody who does not support its tax does not understand it, or prefers the existing federal sales tax, or does not have an alternative. The government has had six years to work on an alternative and it has produced one that has 80 per cent of Canadians against it. I would not think that the Minister of Finance or anyone else would be pushing too hard to have other people come up with specific alternatives when in fact the government after six years, has so miserably failed. The reason that the government has failed is because it has not consulted with Canadians. It has not consulted with the provinces. There were discussions at the officials level with provinces, and then last April, after having met with finance ministers here in Ottawa, indicating, I am told, that at some point there would be further discussions and negotiations, the Minister of Finance unilaterally, within a matter of couple of weeks, stated that he was going to go ahead on his own and that the federal government would install a tax at the federal level unilaterally.

The Minister of Finance has a tendency sometimes, and certainly I do not take it as a personal affront, to use some pretty strong language. He has accused people of weaselling out.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He didn't like that word. He is getting a little sensitive.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The Minister of Finance is right. I did not like that. But I was prepared for it because the Minister of Finance, as you well know, in November of 1988, called the leader of the Liberal Party at that time, a liar, a coward, and all kinds of things in discussing the goods and services tax. What I think is important is to now look at the four principles that the Minister of Finance and the government have put forth.

First of all, visibility. Bill C–62 is a bill which undoubtedly will have further amendments to it because the government members of the committee have proposed amendments and probably some members of the House may have some amendments.

If you look at clause 223, you will find that "visibility" is not at all guaranteed. All that is said in Clause 223 at page 128 of the bill is:

> 223. (1) Where a registrant makes a taxable supply, the registrant shall indicate to the recipient, either in prescribed manner or in the invoice or receipt issues to—

The "prescribed manner" is the interesting point because when we questioned the officials of the Department of Finance, they said that we were quite correct, that there would be no way for an individual to know that they had paid the goods and services tax unless they did the calculation themselves.

The example I would give is of a Canadian consumer going into a corner store. Many items in that corner store will be subject to provincial sales tax. Many will be subject to federal sales tax, but under no circumstances will that store ever be able to equip itself with the system that is adequate to break out the different taxes on the individual items. One can imagine the kind of nightmare that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and others have been talking about.

We have this criteria of visibility not being met. To be fair, it will be met in some instances. However, we were basically told about signs, but we do not know how large the signs would be, where they would have to be placed, whether they would be bilingual, all the kinds of the questions people will want to know who will have to administer the tax and collect it for the government.

Another aspect is revenue neutrality. The chairman of the finance committee was very honest. At about the same time the Minister of Finance was calling other people names during the election campaign, the member for Mississauga South was saying that at 9 per cent the federal sales tax might raise anywhere from $8 billion to $14 billion in extra revenue. Now, of course, with the tax at 7 per cent, probably that figure is around $4 billion or 5 billion.

Do Canadians really believe that a government would undertake a tax policy that has seen the government plummet in the polls to a rating of about 17 per cent across the country; that it would hire 4,000 or 5,000 new tax collectors to administer the bill; that it would get involved in all the kinds of problems that Canadians are pointing out to them on a daily basis, unless there was some secret agenda?

Revenue neutrality is the one area I think we need to examine. If we look at the experience in other countries, the Government of Canada is convinced that although it is going to suffer some short term pain it believes that once it gets the system in place, that probably there will be a few extra dollars in the pot and that it will be able to sweeten that pot come next election.

In other words, the hidden windfall revenue that could conceivably be collected by this allegedly revenue neutral tax would then be used to try to bail it out. It either is revenue neutral or it is not. That is why the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the CFIB and others have said if there is any moneys extra that accrue to government they should be used to directly pay down the deficit as opposed to playing games with electoral promises come the next election.

Another area that was very important was the area of fairness. The government said that any goods and services tax or retail sales tax would have to be fair. It has tried to put forward figures indicating that people earning $30,000 or less a year in terms of family unit would be better off under the goods and services tax.

Those numbers have been challenged by reputed people in the area of economics in this country such as Neil Brook's study, the study for global economics. The credits are not fully indexed. This is where the fairness element has not been met. The Minister of Finance says we can trust the government because from time to time it will adjust those credits to make sure they are fair.

Let us review what the Minister of Finance and the government were saying themselves, not what the opposition was saying. Specific undertakings of the government were that the tax would be visible. It is not visible. It can be visible but it does not have to be visible. Another undertaking was that it will be fair where credits are not indexed; that it will be revenue neutral where there is no guarantee of that because experience elsewhere showed us other things.

We come to the last point and that is integration. One of the things that the Minister of Finance of the government said had to happen with this goods and services tax is that there had to be provincial participation. The provinces as recently as last weekend said no to an integrated national sales tax system.

I submit that the reason we have had to proceed on the basis we have, of eliminating the bill in its entirety, is because the tax is not visible as was promised by the government. It is not fair as was promised by the government because credits are not indexed. It is not integrated with provincial retail tax collection systems because the provinces have refused to do it. There is absolutely no guarantee that it will be revenue neutral.

I believe that the government should take the advice of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, all of whom in various ways and the minister well knows, support the principle of this tax, but say that because of the nature of the problems he faces and the kind of bill he has brought forward, the tax should be withdrawn.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it has been an interesting afternoon waiting to have a chance to speak about this bad legislation, Bill C–62.

We have some 80 amendments before us this afternoon. I see the Minister of Finance here and I understand there have been some discussions both by himself and the Minister of the Environment and cabinet regarding the convenience of using environmental concerns in Canada by stalling the Minister of Environment's five–year plan until the fall. They know from the polling and the tracking of the polling in the last few years that Canadians are prepared to pay higher taxes and higher costs to clean up the environment for clean drinking water, to clean up the atmosphere, to clean up toxic and hazardous waste, dumpsites, and to clean up the Great Lakes.

There are many areas where Canadians are prepared to pay higher taxes and higher costs. There is a Machiavellian nature to the timing of thisof this bill. This fall the $14 million in advertising on the GST really gets rolling and this so–called double window of public consultation will take place in April and May and June and with provincial and territorial governments, leading to the Minister of the Environment's plan in the fall.

The hope of the Minister of Finance and the government is to try to meld the two issues, the desire of Canadians to clean up the environment with the unpopularity of the GST, by trying to squeak them through with some greater degree of public support into next January. I think that plan is likely to fail because certainly people in the environment community have recognized very quickly the ridiculousness of the position in which the Minister of the Environment has placed himself and the Conservative government. Let us take a look, Mr. Speaker, at the key reasons for the unpopularity of the GST in Bill C–62. I will come back obviously on another occasion dealing with the broader aspects of the debate that we had here last fall, which was to have a GTS instead of a GST, a green tax system, something that has been looked at by economists who have some understanding of the gravity of the globe's plight. Unfortunately nobody on the front benches of this government seem to have any understanding of it whatsoever, whether it is the plight of the ozone or in terms of greenhouse warming.

We see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources sitting here today after his recent meetings in Kananaskis. We on this side of the House recognize that he has absolutely no understanding of the severity of the problems of carbon dioxide and methane and CFCs and other greenhouse gases on the atmosphere. It is a very flat earth approach to simply say: "Well, we will wait until 1992. We will wait till Brazil or we will wait until 1995 or we will wait till the year 2000". It is the famous shell game.

Let us look at the impact of Bill C–62, the Conservative plan, in terms of people's income, comparing the GST and income tax burdens needed to raise the $18.5 billion the Minister says he needs. This would come from one-earner couples with two children. With an income of $20,000 the GST would take $695 while under income tax it would take $70. For an income of $30,000, $1,405 from the GST, $747 from income tax, about half. At $45,000 it would be $2,475 under the GST, $2,303 under the income tax system.

Mr. McDermid: What does the MST take from them now?

Mr. Fulton: They are pretty sensitive, Mr. Speaker. Sixty thousand dollars income, it would be $3,115 under the GST, $3,953 under income tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Minister of Finance on a point of order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I just wanted to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you recognize this, that this is terribly, terribly misleading. They do not point out the fact that there is existing sales tax that is already being paid and they do not point out that there is a GST credit that reduces the amount of GST net that the individual taxpayer pays. This is terribly misleading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is a point of debate. The hon. member for Skeena has the floor. The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, that really was not a point of order and I hope that the member for Skeena will have the time added to his time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The member for Skeena always has the time added to his time. The hon. member for Skeena has the floor for two minutes.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to tell the Minister of Finance where the statistics I am using come from. They come from the finance department's statistics that were provided to the finance committee.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is not the whole story.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance says that the whole story is not being given out.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Half truths.

Mr. Fulton: Half truths the Minister of Finance says. Well, we know that the GST is not even half truth. We know exactly where it is coming from because the whole plan is to divert more capital into the hands of the very rich in this country. We know that 5 per cent of Canadians now control 50 per cent of the wealth in the country and that the Minister of Finance's most famous remark was there are not enough millionaires in Canada. Well, the GST is designed to try to make a few more of his friends millionaires.

Let us take a look at someone with an income of $100,000. The GST would be $4,875 whereas income tax would be $8,155. So what does this mean? It means that a working poor family with an income of $20,000 will pay 10 times more in taxes, $695 versus $70, if the money is raised through the GST instead of income tax. The wealthy family on the other hand with an income of $100,000 will pay 40 per cent less through the GST than they would pay through income taxes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member would have had three and a half minutes remaining in his debate. I will give him four minutes when we come back with Bill C–62.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—SENATE BILLS

EASTERN SYNOD OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo) moved that Bill S–11, an act to restructure the Eastern Canada Synod of the Lutheran Church in America under the name of the Eastern Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, if Your Honour were to ask, there might be unanimous disposition on the part of the House to allow this bill to be dealt with in Committee of the Whole rather than go to a legislative committee, if the hon. member wishes to do so, so that the bill can be dealt with in all stages today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent? The hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will commence debate and then we will go into Committee of the Whole.

On debate, the hon. member for Waterloo.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and members of the New Democratic Party for their collaboration.

Bill S-11 reflects a movement toward strengthening and uniting the Lutheran Church in Canada. It will not only advance the important work of Lutherans here in Canada, but also around the world through the Lutheran World Federation Service. It extends its services in co-operation with CIDA and other agencies in international development assistance around the world, as seen most recently in the independent Namibia where it has been involved in education and health care for many years.

As the member of Parliament for Waterloo, I am pleased to represent an area with a large Lutheran presence, including administrative offices and the Waterloo Lutheran Seminary. Founded by the 16th century German Protestant reformer, Martin Luther, the Lutheran Church has significant membership and support across Canada and across the United States. I am especially proud of the contributions the Lutherans have made, not only to the communities of Waterloo region, but to the development of Canada.

Today, as a Presbyterian supporting Bill S-11, which was introduced in the other place by my fellow Presbyterian, Senator Heath MacQuarrie, I speak on behalf of the Eastern Synod of the Lutheran Evangelical Church in Canada, the petitioners of this bill. The Eastern Synod represents those members who live in the province of Ontario, east of 86 degrees longitude, and in the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland.

The bill allows the Eastern Canada Synod of the Lutheran Church in America to restructure under the name of the "Eastern Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada".

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada was formally organized in 1986 as a merger of the Lutheran Church of America, Canada section, and the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada. The Eastern Synod is the legal successor to the previous Eastern Canada Synod of the Lutheran Church in America. As such, it includes all congregations but one in Geraldton of the former Eastern Canada Synod congregations and several congregations of the former Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada.

The Eastern Synod will thus continue in the tradition of Lutheran jurisdictions in these provinces, which began with the 1884 Charter of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Canada. This body merged with the Synod of Nova Scotia in 1962, to become the Eastern Canada Synod of the Lutheran Church in America.

Bishop William Huras notes that an earlier merger in 1925 united the Synod of Central Canada, organized in 1909, to serve English speaking congregations with the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Canada, retaining the original charter of the latter. Both of these bodies served the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Lutheran congregations and jurisdictional units preceded these chartered bodies. For example, Zion Lutheran Church in Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, was founded in 1772 and St. Peter's Cambridge in Waterloo region was founded in 1834. The first Lutheran congregation in Ontario was founded by United Empire Loyalists in 1784 in what is now Riverside Heights, Ontario.

The Eastern Synod will be the latest Lutheran jurisdiction in a noble line of Lutheran communities in this part of Canada, serving in six provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I commend to you this very helpful and useful evolution of a fine group of Christian people across Canada.

Consultations have taken place as was mentioned a moment ago, and I believe there is now a disposition to give this bill second and third readings. I think we might proceed, as appropriate, to pass this bill through all stages.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, considered in committee, reported and concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read the third time? By unanimous consent, now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McLean moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I just want to commend the hon. member for his efforts in bringing this bill before the House.

I know that the petition for the bill was late and it was referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections where the committee recommended to the House that the fees in respect of this bill be waived and that the late petition also be waived so that the bill could proceed.

I know that the member has been diligent in his pursuit of the cause of this church in assisting with this bill. I want to say to Your Honour that we are happy to be able to assist him today by agreeing to have the bill passed through all stages on this occasion.

• (1710)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too want to say that we are pleased to move Bill S–11 through all stages today.

I commend the hon. member on the initiative that he has taken. We had to make special provisions to enable this private bill to proceed. I must say, as a member of the Lutheran Church for my entire life, having been baptized and confirmed in the Lutheran Church, that I am pleased to see this initiative.

I want to say that this process would provide a good model for us to follow on a regular basis. There has been the co–operation of all three political parties in ensuring that this legislation not only would proceed through some very difficult moments but proceed expeditiously with full co–operation. This demonstrates clearly that when members of Parliament work together toward a common cause incredible things can happen in a very short time.

I simply want to say that I am pleased to support this initiative on behalf of my party. I thank the hon. member for the initiative that he has taken to make this possible.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

LOW–LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, on March 7, just a few weeks ago, I asked the Prime Minister a question concerning the low–level test flight facility at Goose Bay, Labrador. When I asked the minister the question I indicated that I had read press reports that he had exhibited some skepticism as to whether NATO would approve this low–level test flight base at Goose Bay.

I asked the Prime Minister, rather than leaving the decision up to NATO, whether he would not do the right thing on his own accord and on account of the people of Canada and cancel the low–level test flight base as an initiative of the Canadian government as opposed to waiting passively to have NATO cancel the base.

The Prime Minister at that time gave me a flippant answer, an offhand kind of answer in which he accused me and the NDP of being against the creation of thousands of jobs in Newfoundland and Labrador.

We want to see jobs created in Newfoundland and Labrador. We believe that some of the things that this government has done over the last little while, such as its mismanagement of the fisheries and its elimination of some of the regional development programs that were designed to assist some of the problem areas in Canada, have actually destroyed jobs in some parts of the country including Newfoundland and Labrador. It is really the failure of this government and its policies that have required those jobs to be created.

We in this party, and I believe most Canadians, do not want to see are jobs created in Newfoundland and Labrador at the expense of the Innu people and the environment in Labrador. We do not want to see jobs created at the expense of destroying the way of life of those people or undermining of the very underpinnings of their culture.

We feel that there is every justification for Canada to withdraw its support from the Labrador base.

For example, Mr. Speaker, you have probably seen the environmental impact statement that was done by the Department of National Defence. It has been dismissed as shallow, as biased and as bad science by virtually every scientist and every competent analyst who has read it. The environmental impact statement done in support of the Goose Bay testing program has been completely dismissed. We hope that the federal Minister of the Environment will come down, dismiss the report and cancel the base.

Virtually every native nation in this country now finds itself in conflict with the federal government over environmental issues. The Innu is one group. They are now in court in Toronto arguing that this base violates their aboriginal rights, their human rights, and even their rights under international covenants to protect their human rights and their rights to maintain their own culture.

The Barriere Algonguin people are now in court in Quebec because environmental developments in Quebec in the forest industry have progressed without consultation with those people. We would hope that Canada would do the right thing there as well by taking intervener status in the courts against the Government of Quebec to make sure that the Barriere Algonguin people are consulted before their lands are desecrated by clear-cut logging.

The same is true in James Bay. You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that just a few days ago the Cree and the Inuit from James Bay came to the steps of the Parliament Buildings here in Ottawa to protest the kinds of developments that are taking place in James Bay. The James Bay project which threatens to destroy their livelihood, flood their traplines, poison the fish and destroy their communities is being expanded.

Unfortunately, Canada is not listening to the arguments made by the James Bay Cree and Inuit. Canada is not listening to their arguments because rather than coming to Parliament to make their case, they feel that they now have to go to the United States to make a case to the people who will be buying Quebec hydro under long-term contracts. Those people, in preference to the people of Canada, tend to lend a sympathetic ear to the concerns of the James Bay Cree.

As Max Yalden has pointed out in his report, Canada can no longer ignore the pleas that are being made by the native people. We can no longer treat native people in areas of economic development as if their lands were not owned by them and as if they were non people who do not occupy lands.

We can no longer treat aboriginal lands as if they are empty and open for development. We are going to have to treat those people as if they have rights to occupy the lands on which they live and as if they have the right to be consulted and their consent sought before those lands are developed in such a way as to destroy their communities, their livelihoods, their lives and their health.

This is the concern that I have to the response that the Prime Minister gave on March 7. You cannot treat these problems flippantly and without the kind of seriousness that they deserve.

Native people are not taking it any more from the people of Canada and from the Government of Canada. They are now taking their case to the courts where they are being successful in demonstrating that Canada ignores their human and aboriginal rights, their very right to live with the same level of health and the same standard of living as other Canadians.

There is not only that, they are taking their case to international courts, to the United Nations and international human rights commissions. They are being successful in international bodies. This is becoming an embarrassment to Canada, as it should be an embarrassment to Canada in the way we treat our native citizens.

I believe that Canada could be doing the right thing on the Innu issue in Goose Bay on its own initiative by cancelling the Goose Bay project. We know that it will not stand up to the environmental test. It does not stand up to the human rights test. It does not stand up to the test of fairness which should be the test that this government uses in all its decisions with respect to aboriginal people.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in 1990, NATO identified a requirement for a NATO tactical fighter centre. This centre, when established, will be used for training allied air forces.

Two sites are presently under review, Goose Bay and Konya, Turkey.

Any decision not to build the centre would be taken by members of the Alliance, and no such decision has occurred.

Canada continues, therefore, to work toward the goal of establishing the centre at Goose Bay. We also continue to discuss our interests with parties opposed to the establishment of the centre in Canada.

I want to say once again to assure this House that any decision to establish the centre at Goose Bay is subject to the government's ruling on the environmental panel's recommendations and the over-all terms and conditions proposed by NATO.

• (1720)

In 1984, when the Government of Canada proposed Goose Bay as a possible site for the centre, the government began the environmental assessment review process. The first of two phases has been completed with the publication of the environmental impact statement.

This study was released for public review, and full hearings will be conducted in the affected communities of Labrador and northeastern Quebec. The panel may also wish to hold hearings in major centres in eastern Canada before recommendations are made to the federal government.

I would also point out that the establishment of a NATO tactical fighter centre at Goose Bay would, as the Prime Minister said, create new jobs for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador. It would be of great economic benefit.

As I said earlier, no decision has been taken by NATO not to proceed with the establishment of the centre.

The Government of Canada will continue with the environmental assessment process to determine the feasibility of establishing a NATO tactical fighter centre at Goose Bay.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I may add that when we made our offer in 1984, we were serious about it. Today, people tend to criticize government studies. In fact, we are damned if we do and damned if we don't.

Mr. Speaker, I met many groups, including one that did not want to take part in the task force because it wanted to sell its study instead of giving it away.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, on March 26, 1990, I rose in this House to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to intervene to help Leonid and Natalia Stonov. They have been waiting for almost 12 years to get their exit visas to leave the U.S.S.R. and go to Israel.

They first applied to leave in 1979, almost 12 years ago. They last applied in 1988. At that time were not only turned down again but were told: "Do not apply for at least another four years".

The reason for the latest refusal in 1988 was that Leonid possesses state secrets. Mr. Stonov was a herbologist. He has not practised his profession in over 10 years. How could he possibly possess, at this stage, state secrets that would worry the U.S.S.R.?

Even Mr. Gorbachev has stated that, in most cases, the state secrecy rule should not apply beyond five years. How could the Stonov's case possibly be an exception to that statement by Mr. Gorbachev?

On Sunday, March 25, 1990, I met with Natalia Stonov at Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Willowdale. She was in Canada on a visitor's visa. The Stonovs have been adopted by the Congregation of Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

On that morning we contacted Leonid Stonov in Moscow. It was thrilling to talk to him.

Leonid is one of the leading members of the Refusnik community in Moscow. Perhaps that is why he has been treated so cruelly for over 10 years.

He and Natalia, who is a physician, have both been stripped of their academic degrees and were once arrested for parasitic behaviour. In other words, they were unemployed.

While I want to condemn the Soviet authorities for their treatment of individuals such as the Stonovs, there are hundreds of Refusniks like them.

It is time that the Soviet Union totally lived up to its human rights obligations. How can it possibly be planning to host an international conference on human rights next year, 1991, in Moscow when these cruel abuses continue?

There is an urgent need to deal humanely and compassionately with these long-term Refusniks. On the other hand, I compliment Mr. Gorbachev for his introduction of glasnost which means more openness and perestroika which means restructuring.

From a human rights standpoint, and to be fair, the record must show that an incredible number of Jews have received exit visas in recent years.

Let the record show that in 1986, when I was elected chairman of the Canadian Parliamentary Group for Soviet Jewry, only 914 Jews obtained exit visas.

I led a small all-party delegation to the U.S.S.R. in 1987. We met with more than 150 Refusniks and with several Soviet officials. There were some positive signals but the climate was rigid and uncompromising. Glasnost had been announced and Mr. Gorbachev was obviously insisting that changes must be made. In 1987, more than 8,000 Jews received exit visas. In 1988, the number climbed to more than 18,000, and last year, 1989, more than 70,000 Jews obtained their exit visas.

While glasnost has brought some progress on human rights, it has also revealed a dark side. With more openness in letters to the editors in newspapers, on TV and in books, many people are fanning the flames of anti-Semitic behaviour. This is a most regrettable and despicable development. Because of the vile nature of these anti-Semitic fanatics, many thousands more Jews now want to leave the U.S.S.R. Jews have become the scapegoats of perestroika.

However, increasingly the way to the Jewish state is blocked. After 23 years of a diplomatic stalemate, no direct flights between Israel and the Soviet Union exist. The only way for Soviet Jews to reach Israel is to disembark at some airport in Europe and then arrange a direct flight to Tel Aviv. Hungarian Airlines recently cancelled its Moscow-Budapest-Tel Aviv flights due to threats from Arab terrorists.

Last week, over 200 members of the U.S. Congress signed a letter to His Excellency Yuriy Dubinin, ambassador of the Soviet Union in Washington. In the letter, they said that they were appalled and dismayed to learn that the Government of the Soviet Union had rejected an appeal from President George Bush and Secretary Baker to permit direct flights for Soviet Jews from Moscow to Israel.

I call upon the Canadian government to work with other democratic governments in the east and the west to help arrange for direct flights from the U.S.S.R. to Israel. The backlog of Soviet Jews with exit visas waiting to leave the U.S.S.R. is in the tens of thousands. This is a human rights time bomb.

In summary, there are three issues that we as Canadian parliamentarians must solve. We cannot solve these issues ourselves. We need the support of other democratic countries.

First, we must continue to pressure the Soviet authorities to deal quickly and compassionately with individual Refusnik cases such as the Stonovs. Let us not have the large volume of Jews receiving their exit visas overshadow the cruel plight of individual Refusniks such as the Stonovs.

Secondly, a way must be found to arrange for direct flights from the U.S.S.R. to Israel.

Third, leaders of the western world must speak up about the ugly consequences of unbridled anti-Semitism.

These are awesome challenges, but this should not deter men and women of good faith to tackle these challenges with all their energy and resources.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this chance to respond to the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville. Since he and I both were elected here in 1984 I have heard him rise in the House of Commons on countless occasions to speak on behalf of individuals who are in the Soviet Union seeking refuge and freedom in the west and this afternoon it is just one more of those cases. In responding to him, I will very briefly make some general observations and address the specific case he has raised.

The broad context, of course, is that the condition of Soviet Jews has been improving considerably recently with greater opportunities for cultural and religious expression within the U.S.S.R. As well, there are relaxed restrictions on emigration. To that, we should also make note of the fact that a new Soviet draft law on emigration is currently under consideration. It will offer some hope of easing further the circumstances under which exit visas are obtained.

One very worrisome trend to which the hon. member referred directly is the continuing reality of anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. There are a variety of cultural and historic reasons for this. The tragic reality is that this continues to be a potent force in Russian life to this very day.

• (1730)

The Government of Canada notes that and also notes, with regret, that although emigration thresholds for Soviet Jews have risen considerably in recent times, there are still many Refusnik families waiting for permission to leave the U.S.S.R. Among those families is the particular case of Dr. Stonov to which the member has referred to again today.

I would like to assure the member, through you Mr. Speaker, that the Government of Canada will continue to press the Soviet authorities on these remaining cases. We have been doing that. We have had very good success rates.

Specifically, I should report to the House that a senior official of the Department of External Affairs recently met with Dr. Stonov's wife, Natalia Stonov. She presented that official with a petition concerning her husband's status, a petition that was addressed to the Soviet authorities. Mrs. Stonov was assured that the petition would be conveyed by us to the appropriate Soviet authorities, through the Canadian Embassy in Moscow.

Our Ambassador continues to work with diligence and as a matter of priority on these matters, reflecting the policy of the Mulroney government on these issues. Such cases are followed up with the priority that we feel that they most assuredly merit.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, on October 18, 1989 at page 4810 of Hansard the former Minister of Fisheries, on behalf of the federal government, expressed confidence that the 10 to 20 per cent direct export of salmon and herring could be effectively monitored in terms of conservation needs and management requirements.

On February 22, 1990 the Minister for International Trade and not the Minister of Fisheries announced that an agreement had been reached with the U.S. on the free trade act panel report which concluded that direct access by the U.S. to between 10 per cent and 20 per cent of our salmon and herring caught off the B.C. coast could be provided and still ensure that management needs could be met. It would appear that only the federal ministers of the government believed in this absurd proposition.

There are a number of points which could be touched upon in the course of the proceedings.

First, the agreement reached between Canada and the U.S. will allow for the direct export of 20 per cent of the salmon and herring catch in the first year of a four-year agreement with that increasing to 25 per cent in the years 1991 to 1993. At that time, the entire issue will be subjected to a review.

According to Carla Hills, the U.S. trade representative, this agreement is an interim arrangement only. In so far as the U.S. is concerned, the issue is not settled. It could well be that Canada has provided the U.S. with the precedents it requires to gain full access to our salmon and herring stocks by exceeding the limits recommended by the free trade act panel ruling.

Second, it must be kept in mind that what the U.S. objected to last spring was that landing requirements would impede access to salmon and herring. What the "at sea landing regulations" brought into effect on February 22 actually accomplished is merely to transfer the application of the landing regulations from a shore-based to a sea-based facility.

Third, the former minister told the House on June 14, 1989, as reported at page 3014 of Hansard that the imposition of landing regulations would not likely result in job losses. Obviously the minister has failed to read assessments made by and for his department.

In an April, 1989 background document on the landing requirements there appeared the following: "The revocation of the export restrictions could result in the export of large quantities of unprocessed fish. This will affect the raw material supply for processors".

In June, 1989 a document entitled "Vision 2000" prepared by the Pacific Coast Advisory Group contained the following: "The impact of the removal of export restrictions on salmon and herring is as yet uncertain. It could result in a significant increase in the export of unprocessed fish to the U.S. with loss of jobs in the Canadian processing sector".

Fourth, in the official press release of March 9, the Regional Director of Fisheries and Oceans in Vancouver stated that "100 per cent of the at-sea exports will be subject to exactly the same controls as are in force at shore-based landing stations" and that "all vessels engaging in at-sea exports must have a departmental representative on board at all times".

At page 7 of a document entitled Implementation Plan for the Negotiated Settlement for the Free Trade Act Panel Report dated March 7, 1990 there is found the following: "While most packers will be sampled several times during the fishing season, sampling will not always be done in every fishery or at every loading station on an individual packer". This document was not distributed with the press release referred to earlier.

At page 41 of the actual FTA Panel Report of October 1989, the following observation was made with respect to the possibilities of error: "the risk of error cannot be excluded when part of the population is not available for sampling, and the risk increases with the size of the missing part. The panel agreed that at some percentage that risk would become too large to be acceptable".

Fifth, on the same day the new at-sea landing regulations were brought into force March 9, the Department of External Affairs approved 107 export permits for the shipment of unprocessed herring to the U.S. for freezing before shipment back to Canada for further processing. That was late on a Friday afternoon.

The issue arose as to whether consultations between DFO and External Affairs had taken place prior to the issuance of these permits. Those questions have still not been answered, although asked twice in this Chamber.

The question arises as to when these consultations took place, if at all, and whether the information provided regionally reflected the intention of External Affairs to grant the export permits.

Sixth, as recently as this past weekend the issue of the possible export of unprocessed herring became an issue. According to news reports, some 17 containers of unprocessed herring were supposedly destined for Japan. According to a telex from DFO to the industry on March 20: "Frozen round herring that contains roe will not be approved for export to other than the U.S.A. by External Affairs".

The question becomes whether there will be any effort to use the vehicle of export permits to eventually circumvent even the extremely weak regulations now in place.

In conclusion, the tragedy is that the maximum damage the U.S. industry originally sought back in 1988 was $5 million. What this government has managed to do is place in jeopardy a $900 million industry which employs more than 8,000 plant workers.

The evidence is clear from the minister's own department that the export of unprocessed fish will result in the loss of product for Canadian processors which translates into a loss of jobs for British Columbians.

In the Vision 2000 document there appears the following: "The costs of Pacific fisheries management will have declined to 70 per cent of the level of the mid-1980s and will be totally recovered from the industry in increased fees and royalties and other user-pay or devolution arrangements by the year 2010".

The agreement reached in February on salmon and herring ensures that the role of the federal Department of Fisheries is well on the road to becoming irrelevant in terms of management.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. In my reply, I will concentrate on the herring roe he mentioned earlier, to explain how the system works.

Effective March 9, 1990, according to our export and import licensing legislation, an export licence will be required for all exports of unprocessed herring roe. This was consequential on an agreement negotiated under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and the purpose is to fully protect Canada's ability to preserve and manage its herring roe stocks.

Under the Free Trade Agreement, exports of unprocessed herring roe to the United States are allowed if the herring is given additional processing or is meant for domestic consumption. This will help to ensure that herring processing which, I may add, is very labour intensive, is maintained in Canada, thus preserving Canadian jobs.

For the best quality roe, the herring must be frozen as soon as possible after it is caught within 72 hours.

The best way to freeze herring to ensure of the herring roe of the best quality is to use the individual quick freezing process. Facilities in British Columbia have an individual quick freezing capacity of 4,000 tons a day, including 2,600 tons coming from the lower mainland and the rest from Prince Rupert. In 1990, the total allowable catches or TAC, for herring are set at 30,769 tons.

The implementation of this new measure resulted last year in two special request. First, British Columbia processors wanted to be allowed, in cases of overabundance of fish, to export their herrings to the United States to use their individual quick freezing facilities; these herrings would be returned later on to Canada for roe extraction. This year, this exercise was allowed to help the industry adjust its operations for the future.

Second, there was the case of a British Columbia exporter who wanted to send unprocessed herring roe directly to Japan. The exporter was advised that the government had no intention of approving the export of herring roe to any country except the United States, and again provided if some conditions would be met.

Effective March 30, 1990, 127 licences were issued, including 83 to allow herring roe to be quick frozen in the United States and then returned to Canada to be processed, 21 of which were used for a total of 357 tons. As to the process of herring roe in the United States, 44 licences were issued, 22 of which were used for a total of 325 tons. Therefore, it is not likely, that herring roe export levels will change dramatically before the end of the current fishing season.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Commissioner of Official Languages submitted his annual report to us. To everyone's surprise and great disappointment, he does not mention the city of Sault Ste. Marie, which nevertheless attracted a lot of attention earlier this year, and which I have denounced publicly.

I would point out to him that since 1987, about fifty Ontario municipalities have openly proclaimed themselves unilingual English. This is horrible! However, he does not mention that in his report.

Although the Commissioner is not a prophet, he could certainly have felt, like many French Canadians, this great linguistic malaise that exists in Canada and is rampant in some towns and cities, but he did not even see fit to mention it in his preliminary remarks.

A city or town like Sault Ste. Marie which declares itself to be unilingual English needlessly humiliates its French minority. Groups like APEC, the Alliance for the Preservation of English in Canada, a reactionary association that feeds on the fears and prejudices of past centuries, now seem to be spreading across Canada. There is also the COR (Confederation of Regions) Party, which like all the others propagates racist, anti-French ideas that are dangerous for our democracy.

We will probably have to wait until next year, Mr. Speaker, to know the extent of this concern. All I hope is that it will not be too late.

4-H NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP SEMINAR

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this week Ottawa is playing host to Canada's 4-H delegates during their National Citizenship Seminar.

These young people from across our country will be discussing Canadian government systems, their rights and responsibilities as citizens, and they will be learning about each other.

All members should be proud of these young adults who were selected as delegates for their outstanding achievements in their local and provincial 4-H activities. I am proud that several of these exceptional young Canadians are from Prince Edward Island.

Head, heart, hands and health is the 4-H motto. This great national organization provides young people with the opportunity to develop both leadership and life skills and, in doing so, contribute to the well-being of our communities.

On behalf of all members of the House, I commend these young people for their accomplishments to date and wish them every success in their future endeavours.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, very soon members of this House will be voting on the goods and services tax. Close to 80 per cent of Canadians oppose the tax, but the government has chosen not to listen.

Only 21 of the 167 Conservative MPs need to vote with the combined opposition parties to defeat the tax, so we are urging Canadians across the country to phone their Conservative members of Parliament and tell them to vote against the GST.

In Atlantic Canada, Canadians can phone the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants at 542-5737; the member for South Shore at 543-5141; the member for Halifax West at 865-9194; the member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury at 458-8046; the member for St. John's East at 739-0802; the member for Fundy—Royal at 433-4040; or the member for Carleton—Charlotte at 466-3670.

LE GALA DES GRANDS QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, this evening, the second Gala des Grands Québécois will take place in Quebec City, organized by the Chambre de commerce et de l'industrie du Québec métropolitain.

On behalf of my colleagues from the Quebec City region, I wish to pay tribute to three famous people who will receive the title of Grand Québécois this evening: painter Jean-Paul Lemieux, businessman Jacques Morisset and Senator Renaude Lapointe, who in their respective careers have always been an honour to Quebec City and the general area.

Mr. Speaker, they will join Senator Jean-Marie Poitras, author Roger Lemelin and Father Georges-Henri Lévesque, who last year became the first members of the Académie des Grands Québécois.

Speaking on behalf of the residents of the Quebec City region and especially those of Montmorency—Orléans, I want to thank these three laureates for their outstanding contribution to the economic, social, cultural life of our beautiful region.

YUKON LAND CLAIMS AGREEMENT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, last week the government announced it had approved the agreement in principle for the largest comprehensive aboriginal claim in Canada. This is the claim of the 17,000 Inuit of the central and eastern Arctic.

The elements of this deal were arrived at by the negotiating parties last December. In February, the agreement in principle was approved by the Inuit negotiators. Last week's approval by the federal cabinet is another major step toward a final agreement.

• (1410)

The Inuit negotiators who persevered over the past 14 years of negotiations deserve our thanks and congratulations.

A formal signing ceremony is planned for late April or early May, in Igloolik, to which the Prime Minister has been invited. I urge the Prime Minister to accept this invitation.

I also encourage the government to keep the door open for the Dene and Métis in the western Arctic. Justice requires a continued commitment to the fair settlement of both the Inuit and the Dene-Métis claims.

REFUGEE RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, April 4 is Refugee Rights Day when Canadians from coast to coast celebrate the Supreme Court of Canada's decision five years ago today that every person in Canada who claims to be a refugee has the right to an oral hearing.

Ever since that day this government has tried to get around that decision, the UN Convention on Refugee Status and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It refused the quick and fair method for deciding refugee status asked for by Rabbi Plaut, all Canadian churches, Canadian labour, the parliamentary committee on labour, employment and immigration and every independent witness who testified on Bill C-55.

Instead, the government created a tangled, slow and unfair system that has built up a backlog of 21,000 claimants since January 1989 whose cases have not yet been decided.

Now, desperate because 1,900 of this year's claimants are waiting in Newfoundland for decisions, this government imposes still more transit visa restrictions on international travellers through Gander and Mirabel.

On behalf of all Canadians who help real refugees, I call on this government to stop stalling and enact the quick and fair system Canadians asked for.

PARLIAMENTARY FORUM ON GLOBAL CLIMATE CHANGE

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Forum on Global Climate Change will begin here on Monday, April 23. This is a unique effort of eight standing committees of this House. For the first time committees have joined together to organize a group of expert witnesses who can give a rounded view on a problem of common interest. The forum will form part of a study of the environmental aspects of each committee's field of interest.

The eight organizing committees are delighted that you, Mr. Speaker, with your well-known interest in the environment, will be the opening speaker of the plenary session to begin at 10.30 on Monday, April 23.

As this forum progresses with joint meetings of the participating committees, which will each have chosen a major speaker, I believe parliamentarians and the public will become much better informed with a balanced view on climate change.

Our special proceedings will undoubtedly become excellent reference material on this topic.

I want to thank the many people on all sides of this House who have worked to make this Parliamentary Forum on Global Climate Change a reality.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have hundreds of letters here from my constituents urging the Government of Canada to demonstrate support for the Lithuanian people by recognizing the newly-elected government of the Republic of Lithuania. I will ask a page to deliver these to the Secretary of State for External Affairs directly.

Tonight, the Baltic Federation in Canada in conjunction with a committee of parliamentarians is holding its eighteenth annual Baltic evening. This event is a very special event as, historically, the Baltic peoples have held a very special place in the hearts of Canadians.

Tonight's Baltic evening, however, will be unprecedented in its historic significance since, among the guests, we will have the honour of hosting the first democratically elected Vice-President of the Republic of Lithuania in fifty years, Professor Bronius Kuzmickas.

On behalf of all Canadians to whom democracy is fundamental and human rights are non-negotiable, I say to Mr. Kuzmickas whom I had the pleasure of meeting in Lithuania: Welcome to Canada. We are very proud to have you on Canadian soil.

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the U.S. Senate witnessed an historic vote when the vast majority of its members passed a new clean air bill.

The bill concentrates on three specific areas: urban pollution, toxic emissions and acid rain. More specifically, I may say that an annual reduction of ten million tons in sulphur dioxide emissions meets the expectations of and is a response to pressure by the Canadian government on U.S. authorities. All Canadians have reason to rejoice, now that our U.S. neighbours have taken this giant step to protect the environment.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the major contribution made by Senator George Mitchell, who has always been Canada's staunchest ally in our fight against acid rain. The door is now wide open for negotiations on a bilateral agreement on acid rain, a plan dear to the heart of the Prime Minister of Canada.

CLEAN AIR ACT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, today I am sure all members of the House will want to join me in congratulating the United States Senate in passing the Clean Air Act last evening by a vote of 89 to 11.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I would like to commend Senator George Mitchell, the U.S. senate majority House leader, for guiding through the legislation and for fulfilling his commitment to get the bill passed. This bill will provide significant reductions in acid rain crossing into Canada.

I might say that I had the privilege of extending my congratulations by telephone this morning to Senator Mitchell.

We are now hoping that the House of Representatives will introduce and pass this important legislation in order that it can become law this year and we can all breathe a little easier on both sides of the 49th parallel with cleaner air.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Yesterday after Question Period the Minister of the Environment said outside the House that Canada's energy ministers were being "too timid" about slashing carbon dioxide emissions. The environment minister went on to say: "We must be bolder".

Does the minister of energy agree with his colleague the Minister of the Environment? If so, will he today stop being timid and take bold steps to set targets to reduce air pollution in Canada?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, first, the hon. member talks about being too timid. If that accusation is valid for me, I imagine it is valid for some other people in this House, too.

I want to get directly to the question that the hon. member asked since it is a serious and important question.

After the Toronto conference energy ministers over the two-year period since 1988 looked clearly at what a 20 per cent reduction of CO_2 emissions, plus all growth, either industrial or through the use of private motor fuels, would mean in terms of the ability of Canadians to meet the target presented at the Toronto conference for the years between 1988 and 2005.

The first point that has to be made is that that would be a reduction of between 44 per cent and 50 per cent. That is the base line from which we would have to start.

The task force that we commissioned as ministers of energy released a report publicly which states in part: "It is believed that achievement of a 20 per cent reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by 2005 could cause significant economic dislocation and would likely require significant changes in lifestyle."

Some hon. members: Table it.

Mr. Epp: It has been made public. I can send hon. members a copy any time they want one.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we could proceed to the second question and the minister could continue.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on March 10, 1989, over a year ago, the Prime Minister and 23 other heads of government signed the Declaration of The Hague which states:

> Today, the very conditions of life on our planet are threatened by severe attacks to which the earth's atmosphere is subjected.

If the Minister of the Environment said yesterday that energy ministers, including his own colleague, were being "too timid" about slashing carbon dioxide emissions and that "we must be bolder", what is he going to do to protect his own credibility to get his colleague to act in this matter? Or, does he disagree both with him and with his Prime Minister?

• (1420)

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I never said the word "timid"; never, never in my life.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): We all know that not one of my colleagues is timid. They are all bold and courageous.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): At least they are not timid with me.

What I said is that I hope Canada will be at the forefront of the fight against pollution and CO_2 emissions.

We will have a very good opportunity during the next month to test to what extent Canadians are willing to accept the radical changes that are needed to reach the targets we would like to set.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the journalists who reported his comments will be happy to release their transcripts of what they heard him say.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, yesterday, according to the newspapers, the minister said that the statement by the Energy ministers had some positive aspects, including the need for continuing the fight against emissions, but, he said, we must do more. If that is his position, what specific recommendations does he have today for his government? And if he doesn't want to give us his recommendations, how can we take him seriously on a subject that is so important to the future of this country?

[English]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think that this government will be the first in the history of Canada to set targets in terms of CO_2 reduction.

The decisions we have to make will have to be taken by 1992, at least, when the other countries of the world, led for the most part by Canada, will enter into an international convention to deal with climate change. If it is possible, we should do it earlier. I say "if possible" because we are dealing with possibilities here.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the acting Prime Minister.

For months we on this side of the House have been telling the government that it is not doing enough to promote the Official Languages Act and that that failure is a direct cause of much of the language tension in this country.

More specifically, we have demanded that the regulations relating to the Official Languages Act, passed 21 months ago in this House, be tabled. Still we have no regulations and no action.

This morning in an interview on radio station CHEZ-106 the Commissioner of Official Languages, D'Iberville Fortier, also criticized the government's slowness in acting. In fact the commissioner has threatened to resign in order to protest the absolute lack of action by this government.

Will the Prime Minister or the acting Prime Minister tell this House that he finally accepts the fact that the government has failed in this dossier and that it is a part of a major problem in this country that has to be addressed and resolved soon?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the situation with respect to official languages in this country. I had a chance to consult with the commissioner just a few days ago, before he released his report. We had a frank chat about it.

As I mentioned yesterday in answer to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, Bill C-72 imposes a rather complex and rather special process for consultation. This process has been gone through, after the first project of regulations was prepared. Obviously, if you are going to have consultations, the net presumption is that you are going to listen to the people you consult with.

Thus a second project was prepared. The next round of consultations will be getting under way very shortly with the major players, including the Commissioner of Official Languages.

This is very important. It is the first reform in 19 years. We want it to be meaningful. We want it to be well accepted, fair and equitable for all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we phoned all the agencies today. Consultations have taken place and have now been completed, but I will get back to that later.

I would like to say to the minister that the Prime Minister of this country said the Commissioner of Official Languages was an impartial, sensitive and objective observer of language questions in this country. The Commissioner said on radio, yesterday or this morning, that it was as if the government were afraid to implement its own legislation which received practically unanimous support in the House two years ago. Considering these statements, does the minister responsible intend to table the regulations today or at least issue a statement with an action plan setting forth the Conservative Government's commitment to promoting official languages in this country?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the action plan was already included in Bill C–72. The action plan is being implemented. The government's commitment is firm, and at the appropriate time, after full consultation with the parties concerned, we shall table the regulations in the House, in such a way that they are fair and equitable for all Canadians and are accepted by all linguistic communities in this country.

LOW–LEVEL FLIGHTS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The Innu are once again before the courts. They are asking for an injunction to stop low–level flights.

The minister is aware that these flights are considered to be hazardous to the people of Labrador and to the environment. Will the minister finally demonstrate he is truly convinced that it is imporant to protect the environment and will he intervene to put a stop to these low–level flights?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I will respond to that question. Obviously I cannot comment on a case that is before the courts.

As the hon. member knows, with respect to the proposed NATO flight training centre, we have indicated that no plans would proceed until there has been a full environmental review and that we would abide by the decisions of that review.

With respect to the existing low–level flights which are going on at Goose Bay, that comes about as a result of agreements which have been signed with our allies going back a number of years. We have agreed to introduce mitigative measures, to introduce monitoring to ensure that we avoid areas with wildlife or with people and to ensure that that activity is carried out in a very responsible manner.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Will the minister co–operate with his colleagues, since environmental issues require joint action from different ministries? If the minister is serious about the environment then he should undertake to do this.

I want to raise another matter with the minister. In his discussion paper tabled last week there are several paragraphs on the Arctic.

We know from many other studies that have occurred before that the Arctic has been largely ignored and that, for example, two–thirds of the children on Broughton Island are suffering from unsafe levels of PCBs in their blood. We need action on the environment now, and we need action in the north.

For example, Inco has offered to assist the Soviet Union to reduce pollution. PCBs are a serious source of pollution in the Arctic. Since we have an international agreement with 17 countries, I am asking the minister if he will move now to discuss with these western countries changing the agreement on transferring technology to the Soviet Union so that we can deal with these serious Arctic problems?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the New Democratic Party can see this consultation document is quite complete and sweeping in its scope. The Arctic has been dealt with in the consultation document.

The consultation process will allow us to put different options before Canadians concerning a comprehensive Arctic policy. As we know, the Prime Minister signed agreements with the Soviet Union during his last visit to that country, so we are heading in the right direction concerning the Arctic.

I admit we have much more to do. I hope we will have the support of Canadians to do it at the end of the consultation process.

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister will certainly have the support of Arctic Canadians, but there have been many recommendations on which he should act now.

I would raise an issue on CO_2 emissions and the lack of action by this government. Yesterday, we saw the Senate in the United States at least taking some direct action on SO_2 emissions, and in fact the member of Parliament for Parry Sound congratulating the Senate on doing that.

The minister knows full well that global warming will have extreme consequences in the Arctic. When will the minister take some leadership for Canada on the CO_2 emissions and in setting those targets by 2005?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I wish the leader of the New Democratic Party would recognize the tremendous role that Canada has played in bringing the United States to this vote.

We all know that the acid rain issue was never raised in any meeting between the President of the United States and the former Prime Minister. Prime Minister Mulroney made it happen, and we should be proud of that as a country. As Canadians, this should be the day we enjoy it and be proud of it.

As far as CO_2 emissions are concerned, we all know that Canada is at the forefront of countries fighting this pollution problem. We have made commitments on this. The consultation process will give Canadians the opportunity to tell us what they will be ready to pay for and what they will be ready to accept in terms of radical changes. I trust that it will be a joint enterprise.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. At a time when language tensions are escalating in this country, the government has done nothing to implement Bill C-72, which was passed by this House 20 months ago to promote bilingualism and to deal with such issues.

In August, 1989 the President of the Treasury Board told this House that regulations relating to the Official Languages Act would be tabled before the end of last year. This morning, the media reported that the minister now has said that they would be tabled some time after June 23. When after June 23? What year?

I want to ask the Prime Minister or the Acting Prime Minister, will he give us a date when these regulations will be tabled and we can deal with these issues in this country?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to answer my hon. colleague's allegation that I mentioned June 23 as any kind of a date relating to the regulations. Never, never.

Mr. Gauthier: You said that and we have you on tape.

Mr. de Cotret: I would like to have a copy, because I never said that.

The regulations will be tabled in this House as soon as the process set out and agreed to by all members of the House who voted for Bill C-72 is fully completed. They are well on the way. We have worked assiduously to complete the regulations, to go through the consultation process, to revise the regulations as a result of the consultations and to finalize those consultations as of now.

As soon as those are finalized, we will be tabling the regulations in this House.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, if the government is doing such a great job, why is the Commissioner of Official Languages threatening to quit his job?

We have contacted the different language associations in this country, and they have stated that they have already consulted with the government.

The Commissioner of Official Languages said that 80 per cent of federal institutions are not applying the 1988 Official Languages Act. He said: "Who is to blame when you are listening to a symphony and it is poorly played? You can say that the conductor has an important role in this."

Once again I want to ask the minister when will he table the regulations? Can he give us an exact date when he will table these regulations, considering that the consultations have already taken place? What is holding him up? Who is he afraid of?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, certainly not the opposition.

It is very simple, the regulations will be completed as soon as the process set out in Bill C-72 is fully completed.

Mr. Allmand: It is already 20 months.

Mr. de Cotret: We have wasted no efforts to complete that process. That process is still on-going. We are following the law, which may be a strange concept to some people opposite. We are following Bill C-72 and we will table the regulations as soon as the process is completed.

TAXATION

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Finance told Canadians that they were not legally required to repay old age pension funds and family allowance funds because the clawback scheme that the government has put forward has still not been passed by Parliament.

Subsequently, the Department of National Revenue has stated that it will calculate what would be due and withhold refunds.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance today who has it right? Are those people obliged to pay those amounts now or is the Department of National Revenue going to get its way and withhold the funds?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as with any budgetary provisions, obviously the taxpayer has the right to file a notice of objection at which time the payment would be assessed. When and if the provision becomes law and receives Royal Assent, then there has to be a re-assessment and the tax-back provision would come into effect.

The taxpayer has a choice. But as I stated yesterday, we urge Canadians to comply with the provisions that are stated in the Ways and Means motion in order to prevent the ensuing confusion that may take place at a later date. As of today and before Royal Assent is given, the taxpayer has the option to file a notice of objection or comply with the Ways and Means motion which is currently on the books.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. A number of people in Alberta, people generally, the premier, the treasurer of that province all oppose the goods and services tax because they are very much aware of what kind of havoc the GST will bring to Alberta. The Government of Alberta has produced a study showing that the impact on Albertans will be very, very serious.

Will the Minister of Finance admit to Albertans that, in fact, his goods and services tax is going to fuel inflation in that province as well as across the country, maintain high interest rates in Canada, and reduce consumer spending in Alberta and across the nation? Will he come clean with Albertans today?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have come clean with Albertans. I have said precisely what our analysis shows the impact will be in the province of Alberta. Alberta will benefit from the replacement of the manufacturers' sales tax with the goods and services tax to a greater extent than any other province in the country: close to 3 per cent in terms of increased income.

I have made the point, as my hon. friend has heard me say, that Albertans today are paying $685 for every man, woman and child through the manufacturers' sales tax. That has hardly changed as a result of the replacement of that tax with the goods and services tax.

It is very hard to understand the impact that the Alberta government says the GST will have on consumer spending. Where the impact will be felt will be because of the fact that Albertans are major exporters and that is where the GST will benefit their economy. Albertans will benefit because the cost of capital or the cost of a new oil well or a new pulp and paper plant will drop in price and also because the Alberta economy will benefit from opportunities to expand and diversify as a result of the combination of the federal sales tax being replaced by the goods and services tax and the free trade agreement.

HEALTH

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Health. It has been revealed this week that the Department of Health has secretly commissioned further studies into the Meme breast implant. Yet the official position of the department remains that of the Kerrigan report that women should not worry.

Given that the government-commissioned Kerrigan report has been widely discredited, even called a plagiary by one leading researcher in the field, will the minister finally admit that his department has been misleading Canadian women on the safety of this implant, and will he withdraw this dangerous product from the marketplace until it is proven safe?

• (1440)

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it would take more time than I have to correct all the inaccuracies in the hon. member's question. Let me, however, indicate a number of things to him.

First, we have not commissioned secret reports. A number of researchers have come to us to make proposals for research that they would like to do, which we have agreed to finance, and I think it is appropriate that we should do that. We have not had concerns which led us to commission reports.

Second, one of the reports that the member claims to be commissioned, which is being done by the Ottawa Heart Institute, is looking at all aspects of polyurethane in implants in Canada. It is not simply looking at the Meme breast implant.

Third, there have been some 12,000 Meme breast implants sold in Canada since 1984. The incidence of failure among the Meme is considerably lower than the failure rate among other breast implants. That should be a matter of which the hon. gentleman should be aware.

Additionally, there is a good deal of question about research that was alleged to have discredited the Meme when the hon. member gave his press conference earlier in the week.

I would like to make a proposal to the hon. member. Instead of going out and making false allegations, if the hon. member would like to have the facts, I would be pleased to have arranged for him a full briefing by officials within the department to give him the appropriate information so that he would have the information before making his allegations, instead of making his allegations first and seeking information after.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, both studies in the United States and in Canada show that this implant deteriorates within the body and produces carcinogenic products which then are distributed throughout the woman's body. There is no necessity to keep this product on the market while it is being investigated, none whatsoever.

Remembering that there are 60 cases in the United States and more than one in Canada in which this issue is being raised because of the safety of the product, what is more important to the minister: the profits of a distributor and a handful of plastic surgeons, or the safety and health of Canadian women?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the approach that is being taken by the hon. member is irresponsible. What he does is to frighten women and he does so in a way that is totally irresponsible because he has not taken the effort to get the information before making these allegations.

The House will recall that a minute ago I simply offered to the hon. member to give him a full briefing in this matter. He did not indicate his willingness to take up the briefing. I would indicate to him as well that the University of Florida study to which he refers has been largely discredited. He would have known that if he had bothered to check his facts first.

I would like to repeat that invitation to him. I will make the invitation as well to our colleague from Winnipeg North who, unlike the hon. gentleman, has been responsible in seeking information first before making false allegations.

ACID RAIN

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In light of the legislation passed last night in the United States Senate by a majority of 89 to 11, I am sure the minister is gratified and I would hope that his ministry will now be pursuing in every way with his provincial counterparts to ensure that we are doing everything within our power to control acid rain as soon as possible.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right and we all know his interest on this great issue for Canada.

As a matter of fact, this vote moves us much closer to the opening of formal negotiations with the Americans. During last year, on many occasions, U.S. and Canadian officials have met to set up the framework and the essential elements of what the agreement could contain.

We think that those formal negotiations should begin very soon. We hope that it will be possible to conclude an agreement by the fall.

HEALTH

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Health. I am a woman and I am very concerned about the Meme breast implant.

Why is the Minister of Health placing at risk all women in this country? The American manufacturer of this product has stated that household polyfoam is not designed for implantation within the human body.

Why is the minister not removing this product from the market? Why is he placing the women of this country at great risk?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that I am threatening the health of all the women in this country. That sort of an exaggeration does no credit to the hon. member.

Mr. Dionne: Why don't you turn your collar around?

Mr. Beatty: If the hon. member will pay attention—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Get back on your tricycle.

Mr. Beatty: —the goal of all hon. members in the House, irrespective of which side of the House they sit on, should be to ensure the safety of all Canadians and not falsely create fear among Canadians. As a consequence, I would invite the hon. member to have a full briefing with regard to this, to receive the information first before making false allegations of this nature.

For example, if the hon. member is referring to the University of Florida study, which was referred to by another hon. member earlier, any plastic subjected to very high temperatures, which do not exist in the human body, will break down into carcinogens. The University of Florida study has been discredited.

If hon. members on any side of the House would like to have the facts, I again repeat the offer to make the facts available to them. I would invite them, before making false allegations which unnecessarily frighten people, to get the facts.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, these are not my points of view. The points of view I am stating today come from research scientists in the minister's own health department, top scientists who have resigned because of this issue.

If I may be so bold, I wonder if this was something that was going to be implanted into the male body, would he be as concerned today?

This product is not being implanted in any Ottawa-Carleton hospital today. It is recognized in the Ottawa-Carleton region as a danger to women. Why, Mr. Minister, can you not remove this product from the market until it has been safely tested?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member indicates is that nothing will convince her that the implant is safe.

She suggested that somehow there is a matter of discrimination here, that if men were involved this product would be off the market, but because it involves women it is on the market. That sort of an allegation brings no credit to the hon. member at all.

The hon. member will know that Dr. Keon from Ottawa is studying the uses of polyurethane, not simply as it relates to breast implants but the degradation of all polyurethane used in implants. Polyurethane is used in a whole range of medical devices, used in both men and women. The health and safety of every Canadian, male or female, is essential to us.

The hon. member says that members of my department have resigned. I would welcome the names of those members of my department. I am aware of one case where there has been a resignation of an individual.

I can tell the hon. member that the advice received by the Medical Devices Branch within my department is that the Meme breast implant is believed to be at least as safe as any other implant. Statistics show that the failure rate among the Meme breast implants is considerably lower than among every other silicone breast implant.

If we were to follow the hon. member's suggestion, we would be saying that we would withdraw a device with a lower failure rate than the other ones, and would require women in the interim to have implants which have a higher failure rate. She would be the first one to complain if we were to do that.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. When she commissioned the Canadian Labour Market Productivity Centre Task Forces on Labour Force Development Strategy some months ago, she said she would heed the recommendations of those task forces.

When the task forces submitted their report a couple of days ago, they emphasized in no less than four separate recommendations that the unemployment insurance account be used exclusively for income maintenance and income supplement.

In light of that, will the minister now reconsider her own recommendation that $800 million be used from the unemployment insurance account for training purposes, and will she accept instead her own committee's recommendation?

• (1450)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of recommendations in the report that was received this week. I think that it is going to be very helpful to us in setting up our training strategy which we plan to implement as soon as we get Bill C-21.

As I explained to some of the people who represented the Labour Management Productivity Centre, I am prepared to take into account all of their recommendations. Clearly this is a difficult one for us, given our present financial situation, as I do not have other resources at the moment for the kinds of training and the other recommendations that they are making.

I do want to thank them for the very hard work that they have done, because I believe it is going to be very helpful to us as soon as we get Bill C-21.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, those same task forces take into consideration the financial dilemma that the minister finds herself in and they propose two alternatives for funding for training. In fact, what they suggest for her consideration are tax credit incentives for employers who engage in training, or that a payroll tax on all employers with a rebate for those who engage in training be implemented.

Which of these two will the minister consider as an alternative to taking funds that her task force says should be used exclusively—and I stress exclusively—for income supplement and income maintenance?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we will of course be looking at all of the recommendations and I will have a response to the report in due course.

I am very interested in the hon. member's question, because I would like to know what the position of the Liberal party is on this issue. It is very interesting, Mr. Speaker, that the member for LaSalle who is running for the leadership of this party said that he thought the Senate should drop their opposition to this bill. He said: "I think what they should do is drop their opposition to the unemployment bill".

Is that the hon. member's position, the Liberal party's position, the leader's position, the Senate's position? Who has a position in the Liberal party?

CHEMICAL WEAPONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister, whoever that might be. It has to do with the heightened concern around the world about the spread and the use of chemical weapons as a result of the Iraqi threat against Israel the other day and the well-known fact that these chemicals are being stockpiled in various places by various nations.

I want to ask the government whether it intends to show more leadership on this issue. Specifically, does it intend to use its seat on the Security Council of the United Nations to provoke new international momentum with respect to a total ban on chemical weapons and an international context in which nations which threaten not only to possess but to use these kinds of weapons are brought to heel?

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is extremely timely. The statement by President Hussein in relation to chemical weapons is one that the Government of Canada condemns as being of an extremely bellicose nature in an area that is already tense and it in no way advances the cause of peace.

I would like to raise two points in answer to the hon. member's specific question. First, Canada as a nation does not export to Iraq any equipment, material, chemicals or any substances that could be used in the development of chemical weapons.

Second, in relation to the question of the Security Council, this is a point that I will bring to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because I think the leadership role that Canada can play in this, as the hon. member suggests, is very timely and important and the Government of Canada would like to do that.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of the Environment. As the minister knows, the Department of National Defence developed and tested a number of chemical and biological weapons at Suffield, Alberta and other sites, including one in the province of Quebec.

Since some sites may still be contaminated with deadly agents such as anthrax, and since the Department of National Defence is known to cover up rather than clean up incidents such as this, will the Minister of the Environment undertake an immediate and complete search of all government records to determine and make public the location of such development and testing sites and test these sites for contamination, particularly the anthrax site in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for the Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member that the Department of National Defence is hiring someone to go back over the records of the second world war to see if there is any further information or evidence which could confirm or deny whether field tests of anthrax, for example, took place at either Grosse Isle or at Suffield. We will certainly make whatever information that comes out of this review public.

As I am sure the member is aware, the Department of National Health and Welfare is undertaking investigations this summer in Grosse Isle to determine if there is any evidence of anthrax in that part of the country.

TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday, while the Prime Minister was musing about the benefits of a proposed trade agreement for Mexico with the United States, Canadian workers continued to lose their jobs and Canadian industry continue to move south.

For example, we have the announcement today in the riding of the Minister of Supply and Services just outside of Ottawa, that Speedo Swimwear is moving to Kentucky with 70 jobs being lost; Bright's Wines is closing down a major winery in the Surrey area of British Columbia; the International Packers plant in Saskatoon will have 60 jobs lost because of harassment under the pork restrictions in the United States.

How can we be talking of being sucked into a North American trade agreement when in fact this government provides no adjustment, no support for the Canadian victims of the existing free trade agreement? How can we do that and find ourselves putting our workers in double jeopardy, not only with the Americans but now with the Mexicans?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I can recall the hon. member's attention to what the Prime Minister said yesterday, he did not say we were entering into discussions with the Mexicans and Americans on a North American free trade agreement. He talked positively about the need for freer trade, as is exemplified by our actions in the GATT negotiations now and the negotiations that led to the free trade agreement with the United States.

The hon. member talks about job loss. This is another instance of the hon. member for Etobicoke North saying that every time someone loses his job—every time a sparrow falls—we will blame it on free trade. What must be recalled is that in the first two months of the year, the bottom line is that there have been 64,000 jobs created. There were some 250,000 jobs created bottom line last year.

About four million jobs change hands during the course of a year, some through job loss, some through people moving from one job to another, but because of the significance of that dynamism in our economy, the important thing to look at is the bottom line, and the bottom line is very positive, 64,000 jobs in two months.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the bottom line contained in the minister's own documents tabled in this House at budget time is that there will be 100,000 jobs less this coming year than there were last year. Is that as a result of the free trade agreement? Is that what he is saying is a benefit?

The government commissioned its own study on the auto parts industry which points out that we are already facing intense competition from Mexico and the south-eastern United States. We are in danger of losing close to 80 per cent of our auto parts industry. The government is providing no support for the restructuring of that industry and now it finds itself being drawn into a North American trade agreement.

When is the government going to get a sound policy that will protect the interests of the workers in the auto parts industry and the workers throughout this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the views of the hon. member from Winnipeg–South–Centre on free trade are well known, and I suggest his reaction is no surprise. It has become a fixation and there is no way anybody can change that. However, I beleive people realize the automobile industry right now is going through a period of over–production and under–consumption, and is now in an adjustment period. Clearly, the automobile parts industry also is affected. However, we have now seen since the beginning of this year that a number of laid–off employees have been recalled. Again, I believe this is typical of that industry. Let them blame that on the United States or free trade if they will Mr. Speaker, and I am even amazed that today's rain is not being blamed on the United States.

PRIVILEGE

NOTICE OF TIME ALLOCATION ON BILL C–62

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice of a question of privilege which I believe affects myself and other members of this House. In introducing the question of privilege, I would like to quote form the ruling you made in the House on April 14, 1987, a ruling that you referred to again on March 26, 1990. You said:

> It is essential to our democratic system. The controversial issue should be debated at reasonable length so that every reasonable opportunity shall be available to hear the arguments pro and con and the reasonable delaying tactics should be permissible to enable opponents of a measure to enlist public support for their point of view. Sooner or later every issue must be decided and the decision will be taken by a majority. Rules of procedure protect both the minority and the majority. They are designed to allow the full expression of views on both sides of an issue. They provide the Opposition with a means to delay a decision. They also provide the majority with a means of limiting debate in order to arrive at a decision. This is the kind of balance essential to the procedure of a democratic assembly. Our rules were certainly never designed to permit the total frustration of one side or the other, the total stagnation of debate, or the total paralysis of the system.

Mr. Speaker, I remember the night you made that ruling. You made that ruling at a time when the opposition parties were fighting C–22, the drug legislation. At that time the opposition had totally paralyzed the government's ability to move forward on that legislation.

You, Mr. Speaker, in making that ruling, recognized that you were going beyond the mere written rules of the House, that you were looking at the purpose of debate, at the purpose of the rules. You recognized that you were looking beyond the actual wording. You made a unique ruling on that occasion, a ruling which you yourself, on reflection, had said would come back to haunt the House. It meant that every time there was a legitimate grievance by one side or the other with regard to how the new rules and procedures are being used, you would be appealed to to make a decision.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened carefully to the hon. member, especially because he is referring to a specific order of the Chair. Other members have indicated their wish to rise on a point of order. I may be able to help the House.

I would like the hon. member to tell me exactly what his point of privilege is. What is it somebody has done that is making it impossible for him or others to carry on their duties?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I certainly intend to do that and will be doing so immediately.

Yesterday, when the government rose on notice of motion to limit report stage and third reading on the goods and services legislation, it severely limited the right of each and every member, whether on the government side or on the opposition side, from entering into any real debate on the issues that were before this House.

Mr. Speaker, if I could refer again to your ruling. Yesterday when you grouped the issues for debate you said, as reported at page 10125 of Hansard:

> I want to point out that this ruling does not limit debate in a significant way with respect to report stage. I have done some careful calculations and under this ruling there will be 11 debates and 26 votes plus the final vote at report stage for concurrence.

Mr. Speaker, you go on to say that this may be subject to some other rule of the House. The point is that in your ruling yesterday, you allowed us 11 different debates on the different types of amendments that come before this House.

I would submit that the actions that took place in the finance committee severely limited opposition parties to debate amendments at report stage. You are aware that at that particular finance committee, as a result of the ruling by the Chair, upheld by the majority—we do not doubt that—the opposition parties were limited to one minute per amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I am listening carefully and I recognize a grievance when I hear one. But, in respect of the committee, I have already dealt with that in a ruling. I gather what the hon. member is saying, on behalf of other members in the House and himself, is that the use of time allocation in the report stage of the bill is an abusive process amounting to a breach of the privilege of members. Now, if I am leaping ahead please correct me, but I take it that is the point the hon. member is making.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, it is part of the point that I am trying to make in this House and I think it is a matter of not only what happened in the House yesterday, because even before debate had started, even though Orders of the Day had been called and you had made a ruling over the grouping of the amendments for debate, even before any motion had been moved by an opposition member, the government gave its notice to restrict debate on report stage and third reading. This in itself is abhorrent.

This in itself restricts me and other members in this House from having the ability to discuss the amendments that were proposed, and we know that under the ways that this House works, 10 of those 11 groupings will probably never even be started in debate in this House.

I mentioned the committee stage and the ruling of the chair of the finance committee, because this was also related to the study of this particular piece of legislation. It is my submission that the opposition was never given the opportunity at report stage or in committee to debate this important legislation. We were not given any opportunity whatsoever to have a meaningful debate on each and every one of the amendments that we wish to put forward.

My submission, Mr. Speaker, and it relates to the rules of the House, is that under the rules of the House we are to attend the House. We must assume that we attend the House for a purpose, and part of that purpose is to make motions and to have the ability to debate those motions. If we allow committee chairs to continue to limit debate, in a manner which is completely useless, if we are in a situation where, before debate even starts on report stage and third reading, the government is going to cut off debate, then what is the purpose of a member of Parliament attending the House? What is the purpose of a member of Parliament making motions? What is the purpose of having the opportunity to debate if the government is going to deny that opportunity time after time, at each and every stage of the bill? That is significant to the privileges of each member of the House and it is significant to the privileges of all members of this House.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I intend to respond very quickly and immediately to the point made by the hon. member, not because the hon. member does not put forward a grievance. He does, and he puts it forward with argument and with eloquence, but he is asking me to interfere on the basis that it is privilege.

I do not think that I can do that, at least not under the circumstances. The government, for whatever reason, has decided to follow orders of this place which are placed here as a consequence of the will of the House and to which we are all bound.

• (1510)

Second, as a consequence of the time allocation order, there has to be a vote of this House. That takes authority over other things. I take nothing away from what the hon. member has said. His grievance has been very well put forward, clearly, succinctly, and with some passion, but it is not a question of privilege.

BILL C-21

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the point raised by the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons yesterday concerning Bill C-21. I need some guidance, and I would like the Chair to reflect on the comments I am going to make.

The minister raised a point of order to argue his case against the message of the Senate regarding Bill C-21.

I had some difficulty with the debate yesterday, because to me it seemed highly irregular—

Mr. Speaker: One moment, please.

Point of Order

[English]

I think I indicated yesterday that, accepting the invitation of the hon. member for Kamloops, I was going to put off further argument on that matter until I could consult with all parties, and come back at a time convenient to everybody.

At least one member came to me earlier today and wanted to know if I was going to proceed this afternoon. I said I have no intention of proceeding this afternoon. There is no need, in case anybody feels that they are not yet in a position to argue, to proceed.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier probably does have some points which will be of help to me. I would ask hon. members to concur and to accept the arrangement which we made yesterday. That is where it is going to be. I will come back to all hon. members involved as soon as it is appropriate.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to waste the time of the House. I am just trying to understand the process here, because rules and order of this House is what the Chair is supposed to keep. I understand that. I want to make sure that I understand the same rules.

In view of citation 315 of the fifth edition of Beauchesne, I just want to ask why, yesterday, a point of order was allowed on a decision made by a majority of this House some 20 days ago to return a message to the Senate, which contained an acceptance of one amendment and others in principle.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member alluded to that yesterday. It will be part of my eventual reply. It is part of the argument that takes place as to whether or not the point of order was, under all the circumstances, even in order. I will deal with all that.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, Beauchesne's fifth edition, Citation 315:

> (2) It is irregular to reflect upon, argue against, or in any manner call in question in debate past acts or proceedings of the House,

That is what the minister did yesterday. I ask you to rule on that.

Mr. Speaker: I am not entirely sure the hon. member is right.

There was more than one message from the Senate. I am not going to argue the case of hon. members at the moment. The matter has been put off. I will come back.

All of these arguments can be made, but, as I made very clear yesterday, I am accepting the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops on this matter.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, before this House becomes a scene of another attack on democracy, I move:

That strangers be ordered to withdraw.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has moved a motion. First, I want to say to the hon. member that I think precedent and procedural law are such that it is not appropriate to move that motion unless the hon. member has the floor on debate, and I am so ruling. That does not mean that the hon. member may not move the motion at another time.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with anything else I would like the Chair to inform us which Standing Order says that we must be in debate. Standing Order 14 of this House states:

If any Member takes notice that strangers are present, the Speaker or the Chairman (as the case may be), shall forthwith put the question "That strangers be ordered to withdraw", without permitting any debate or amendment; provided that the Speaker or the Chairman may order the withdrawal of strangers.

That is it. I do not see any reason or need for us to be in debate on this question. I think it is a point of order that could be taken up at any time. I want to have quotations and the Standing Order that says we must be in debate to have that motion.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, obviously before I moved that motion to expel strangers it was well researched. I must say that on a number of occasions in this House, to say nothing of the Mother of Parliament in Britain, it has been used on a point of order. I would say that almost exclusively it has been used in the United Kingdom on a point of order.

As my hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier has indicated, this is not open to discussion. Standing Order 14 reads:

If any Member takes notice that strangers are present, the Speaker or the Chairman (as the case may be), shall forthwith put the question "That strangers be ordered to withdraw", without permitting any debate or amendment; provided that the Speaker or the Chairman may order the withdrawal of strangers.

The critical word is "shall". It is not will, not may, but in fact shall. Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, I can go on at some length both in terms of precedents in our House and particularly in the Mother of Parliament.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is concerned that there may have been an error in the Speaker's ruling and the hon. member for Kamloops is indicating that he wants some clarification as well. Speakers are not infallible. I am going to stand the House down for a few minutes to respond to the concern that has been mentioned. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 3.18 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 3.45 p.m.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I want to thank all members of the House for their courtesy, especially the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the hon. member for Kamloops for allowing me a few minutes to respond to the question put by both hon. members.

The matter arises from a motion put on a point of order by the hon. member for Kamloops at the end of Question Period. That motion is in effect a motion which when the hon. member sees a stranger involves putting the matter to the House. The House would vote as to whether or not the House ought to be cleared. That is, all people in this Chamber whether they are guests or the public or whether they work for the House, other than members of Parliament, would have to clear the House. The House would then move to a secret session.

The ruling I made was that it is not appropriate to move that particular motion on a point of order. At that point both hon. members in a very courteous way asked if I could give them authority to do that.

I have considered the authorities and I would like to share them with hon. members. First, I am referring to Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 234(2):

A Member cannot rise on a point of order to move a motion.

The second citation I wish to bring to the attention of the House is Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 318(2):

A Member cannot rise on a point of order to move a motion—except for a motion that a Member be now heard.

• (1550)

Although Members cannot move motions when recognized on a point of order (Beauchesne, 5th ed., p. 78), if the Chair has not recognized a Member to move a motion "That a Member be now heard"— —and goes on to discuss that particular exception. I have tried to accommodate hon. members and give the reason for the order, and as I have said before, if there are practices here that hon. members do not agree with in terms of our rules and procedures then of course there is a time and place to decide to change them if possible. I think I have to say that the ruling I made must stand.

I want to point out something else. This ruling is on the narrow point as to whether or not the hon. member could move the motion on a point of order. That is all it is. There may be another discussion with respect to what it was the hon. member from Kamloops wanted to do.

I thank hon. members for their courtesy.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEES

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, today I wish to table, in both official languages, the Order in Council announcing recent appointments made by the government.

Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), this Order in Council shall be deemed to have been referred to the standing committees listed in appendix.

[English]

While I am on my feet, I move:

That the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Danis), which was agreed to on the following division:

EXCISE TAX ACT

TIME ALLOCATION—BILL C-62

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House) moved:

> That regarding Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, one day be allotted to the consideration of the report stage and one day to the consideration of third reading stage of the bill; and that fifteen minutes before the end of each of these stages, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this Order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose, respectively, of the report stage and third reading shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did comment on this time allocation motion in our debate yesterday and I would like to repeat what I said at that time because there are a number of more members in the House.

We have been debating Bill C-62 for some while now. We have had a White Paper, a technical paper, draft legislation, consultations and committee hearings. But I think what we found very clearly demonstrated yesterday was when you, Sir, were asked to go through amendment after amendment which said exactly the same thing. It wasted 15 minutes of time of this House, 15 minutes of time which could have been used by a member for a speech on this bill. It became clear as I listened to you reading through these amendments and to the hon. members opposite saying "no" every time you said: "Shall I dispense?", that they had absolutely no intention of wanting to debate or discuss this legislation. What they wanted to do was waste the time of the House. This is exactly the same as what we have heard from the members opposite in the New Democratic Party who have made no secret of their motives here. Their motives are very clear, as has been stated by the House Leader and others in the New Democratic Party, that they will use every means within their control to delay, divert, and obstruct this legislation. That, Mr. Speaker, is so clear, and that is why we had to bring in a motion for time allocation.

• (1640)

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Perhaps you could remind members that it is unparliamentary to call into question the motives of members of parliament, as the Minister of Finance is now doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate, the hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am not calling into question any member's motives; I am just stating very clearly the motive of the members of the New Democratic Party as stated by themselves. It is very clear. I am not imputing motives or questioning motives. It is fundamentally clear that what they want to do is divert this legislation.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Of course we do.

Mr. Gauthier: Scrap the tax.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the members opposite say: "Scrap the tax. Axe the tax". We have every intention of axing the tax. The tax that we are going to axe is a federal sales tax, the manufacturers' sales tax, that has been in place since—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nault: There won't be a Tory left in Alberta.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair on a point of order.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. minister wants to impugn or describe the motives of the New Democratic Party, I ask to defend the interests of the Canadian people, a vast majority of whom oppose this legislation.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have here an outburst by a member from Windsor who is saying that the New Democratic Party is protecting the interests of the Canadian people. Let me ask this hon. member why the New Democrats are in support of a tax which holds back Canadian exports. In Windsor there are many exporters. In southwestern Ontario—

An hon. member: That's not true.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says it is not true. Time and again, the members of the automotive industry, the chemical industry, the other elements of the manufacturing industry, the mining sector, the forest products sector, the basic industries, the strength of our economy, have all said that the existing tax is providing a hidden tax that is holding back their ability to export into other countries and create jobs and economic wealth here in Canada.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): That's not the way to go.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): On the other side, there are people in the economy, Canadian producers who are competing against imports—

Mr. Nault: It's good for tourists too!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —and these companies have to pay one-third more tax than the imports against which they compete. Why is it that the hon. member from Windsor and the member for Broadview—Greenwood persist in supporting a tax that is holding back our economy? It makes no sense for them to do this.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): They want a fair tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Minister of Finance has the floor.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to also draw to the attention of members opposite that there was a royal commission in 1940; there was another study in 1956; there was the Carter Commission in 1966; there was a further report in 1973; and there was a fifth report in 1983. I believe each one of these reports was commissioned or appointed by the Liberal government of the day and each one of these reports has said: "Scrap the tax. Axe the tax. The tax must go".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I was interrupted I was saying that there were five royal commissions or committee reports that all said we should be scrapping the existing manufacturers' sales tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I was delighted to see the members opposite surge to their feet and say: "That is exactly what this government should be doing". I am delighted that the members opposite now are coming to their senses, that they realize that the tax that must be axed is the federal sales tax, which for 65 years has been holding back this economy.

We are committed to bringing in this legislation. That is the essence of the direction that we are going in as a government.

The member for Gloucester yesterday talked about the consistency of the position of the Liberal party. This is a delightful thought to try to consider.

First, he said the existing tax has to go. Shortly after that he changed his tune, possibly because someone in his party got after him. The previous Liberal finance critic was yanked because he talked some sense. The members of the Liberal caucus said he could not stay on in that position. So I guess my friend from Gloucester felt that same heat and changed his position.

What has been perfectly consistent since that time is that there have been no alternatives. There have been no options. There have been no new ideas—

Mr. Mills: That is not right. You know that is not right. How can you say that with a straight face?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Let me complete my thought. There have been no thoughts put forward, no options put forward that represent the position of the Liberal party.

My friend from Broadview—Greenwood has a little book that he has written about tax. We have the position of Mr. Chrétien, who is running for the leadership of the Liberal party, who said: "I would not scrap the GST if it comes in".

Then we have the position of Mr. Martin, the member for LaSalle—Émard who says: "I'll scrap this tax, if we do not have some negotiations going on over here with the provinces". Or he says: "I'll scrap the tax, if there is not an opportunity here to improve the existing tax".

The whole nature of what we are hearing from members of the Liberal party is that they are on a bandwagon. They are political hijackers. They are trying to hijack the political process, because they do not have any options.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): They are trying to jump on the bandwagon. They are trying to get on the bandwagon of opposition, saying: "We are against this tax". That is what they are saying to the Canadian people. Then, when they get crowded a little as to what would happen if we had—God help us—a Liberal party in place, what do we hear from them?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have listened to this drivel for 10 minutes, which I thought that was the maximum amount of time we would have to be exposed to such comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member started at 4.42 p.m. He is finishing at 4.52 p.m.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been interrupted by such thunderous applause from time to time that you have had to extend the time for my speech.

• (1650)

I want to close, if I could, by commenting on what the member for Gloucester said yesterday when he stated that this tax is not visible. I do not know how much more visible the member for Gloucester could want this tax.

Is there anybody in this country who does not know about the 7 per cent GST? Is there anybody in the country who is aware how much existing federal sales tax they pay in the price of a jacket, a coat, a car or in the price of a chocolate bar?

Mr. Riis: How about a haircut?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): No. The existing tax is totally invisible. The 7 per cent tax is a very visible tax.

I have said on many occasions that it is a very democratic tax. Governments in the future will be held far more accountable by the fact that the GST is a visible tax. Canadians understand this tax. They will know that if any government wants to change it in the future, they will be able to punish that government if there is not a good, appropriate reason for it. That is the reason why we on this side feel it is the right way to go.

It is not popular, and we understand that. We were not elected to do the popular things. We were elected to do the things that are right for this country, things that will improve the economy, improve the treatment of senior citizens and low-income people. This is the direction that we feel as a country we should be going in.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to watch the Minister of Finance wriggle around on his goods and services tax. As he was concluding his remarks, the Minister of Finance stated that surely the GST is visible and that everybody in Canada knows that there is going to be a 7 per cent GST because we have talked so much about it. If that were the test, I think that the minister would have to agree that the FST must be visible because he spoke incessantly about it over the last year and one half. If the GST is visible because he has talked about it, certainly the FST has now become visible as well.

The minister is right about the fact that you can punish governments, I understand that. The minister says that governments will be punished if they misuse the GST. The fact is the FST has gone from 9 per cent in 1984 to 13.5 per cent in 1990.

When you look at the 32 tax increases the government has put forward you see that this government has shown great courage with respect to taxation. It makes no difference if it is visible or invisible—it will tax anything that moves.

When you look at the web of deception that is being woven here, Mr. Speaker, and when you listen to the Minister of Finance who answered in the House today a question I put to him by saying that Albertans would be better off under the goods and services tax, imagine what the Minister of Finance and the government are saying to Albertans. While people across that province say no to the GST, and while the government of that province publishes reports indicating the kind of havoc that will be wreaked on Alberta if this tax is put through, the minister, the government and their supporters in the House get up and say: "The tax will be good for Albertans'.

The Minister of Finance talked about royal commissions, reports and studies. I defy the Minister of Finance to produce one report or one study that talked about implementing a goods and services tax, a value-added tax, a business transfer tax or any type of consumer-driven tax that is two-tiered. Never has that been suggested, not only by a royal commission or a study in Canada, but it has never been suggested by anybody in the world.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): What about Liberal support for the multi-stage tax?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice brings up a very good point. The support for the multi-stage tax that was put in place in the committee was for a single tax.

The Minister of Justice should be very careful when she talks about support for various public positions that she has taken. The Minister of Justice is not in a very good position to talk about positions she has supported before, and what she is doing now. I would be more careful of my own position if I were her.

When the Minister of Justice speaks to the women of Canada pretty soon on bills that she is bringing before the House, maybe she will have more to say about switching her position. The Minister of Justice is going to have a short-lived career on the front pages of women's magazines in this country if she keeps this up.

I want to make sure that the people of Canada understand what is taking place here today. We are talking on behalf of Canadians because parliamentarians are going through the same process as the government has imposed on Canadians. It is refusing to listen. If you are against the GST, it is because you do not understand it. But the government will not let you talk about it long enough to make sure that the 20 per cent of Canadians who are left, who do not oppose this tax, will in fact change their minds to make it 100 per cent of Canadians who reject this tax.

I defy any member to go out to Alberta or other parts of the country to see the fear and frustration that Canadians are experiencing over this tax.

One thing that the Conservatives have done as a government is impose time allocation. If this government had been in charge during the French Revolution, it would have made Robespierre look like Peter Rabbit. They pull the guillotine more often than anybody else has in the history of this country.

Some hon. members: Shame!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Not only is the government forcing time allocation to make sure it gets rid of this bill as far as the House of Commons is concerned before Easter, if you are a Conservative and you oppose this bill you are expelled. You are exiled. You cannot as a Conservative be against this bill. They can only control people to a certain extent. Mr. Kindy, Mr. Kilgour, people like that, are expelled.

But what about Don Getty? Is he going to be—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member is to name some member of the House, I hope he will name him by his constituency.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Two Conservative members from Alberta were expelled from their party. Imagine a member representing people in Edmonton or a member representing people in Calgary being expelled.

What would be important to know from the Conservatives is whether Conservatives who oppose the tax are going to be thrown out of the party. I want to know what they are going to do with Don Getty and Dick Johnston. Is the member who was so proud of the expulsion of those two members going to say to Don Getty and Dick Johnston: "We don't want you any more"? No.

This tax goes against Conservative principles.

Mr. Lewis: What principles?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I will explain the principles, since the Minister of Transport asks.

Let me explain the four principles that the Minister of Finance set out in his document last August. In the document written by the Department of Finance and issued under the name of the Minister of Finance, he said that the tax would be integrated, a unified tax. Is it? Of course not. No, it is not integrated because Conservative premiers across the country, like the premiers of Nova Scotia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, say: "No".

I do not know if the government has a national caucus to which premiers are invited or if someone is going to take the opportunity to boot them out as well, but Conservatives do not support the goods and services tax because this particular proposal which has been brought before the House is so flawed that they cannot sell it to their own members.

Mr. Speaker, if you want to see some fear—and you have seen some in a previous incarnation—you must be really concerned about what is happening to anybody who steps out of line. The sign that was put up today states: "Tories beware. Anybody who steps out of line has committed political suicide". That is what they are being told.

The two members from Alberta have been told: "You are to serve as an example. You are expendable". If the word goes out to members of Parliament that they cannot speak their minds without suffering expulsion from the caucus, then you, Mr. Speaker, must be seeing a lot of frustration to your right.

• (1700)

Mr. Lewis: Do you want them?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The hon. Minister of Justice is getting involved before the baseball season begins by doing some bartering here. He might be looking for a trade.

I am sure that the two members in question from Alberta will have all kinds of opportunities to explain to the people of Alberta why they can no longer speak their minds inside the caucus.

The Minister of Finance in his brief speech today talked about tax reform. Six years of government planning has wound up in a sales tax that is opposed by 80 per cent of the Canadian people.

Can you imagine anybody could botching a job to that extent? Some 80 per cent of Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax. The sad thing about all of this is that the government has now got so used to time allocation, to the guillotine, that it does it without compunction. There was a time when this kind of action would raise the ire of Canadians and every member of this House. Now, it is as simple as sitting down to breakfast. The government House leader sits down with the Prime Minister and a few other people and says: "I guess we will muzzle Parliament again today".

Canadians are going to hear a lot more about the GST. Canadians will continue to be against the GST. No matter how many times the government imposes time allocation, it is never going to convince Canadians that this terrible tax is an acceptable one.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I think what the Canadian people should be realizing today is that what we are seeing from the Conservative government across the way is some of the heaviest handed tactics we have seen in the history of this parliamentary democracy. What we are seeing are jack-boot tactics by the Conservative party across the way to impose a tax that over 80 per cent of the Canadian people do not want.

Do you know what the government is allowing? It is allowing only one day on report stage—one day to debate the amendments to the goods and services tax. It is allowing one day to argue this tax that the Canadian people do not want. Then it is going to force it through with a guillotine, with closure.

Then the government is going to allow one day on third and final reading. One day is all we are going to get on the most controversial economic move in the history of this country.

This Conservative government makes C. D. Howe and the pipeline debate look generous in comparison. The Canadian people should be aware of that. This smacks of a fundamental lack of democracy, a fundamental lack of openness on behalf of the Conservative Party of Canada.

Over 80 per cent of the people are opposed to the goods and services tax, a tax on ordinary people across this country that is very unfair. The only way the government is getting it through is by using its majority and forcing it through against the will of Parliament, forcing it through against the will of the people of this country.

Why is it doing that? It is doing it for one simple reason. It is afraid of a revolt on the back-benches of the Conservative party. There is a revolt brewing in the back-benches of that party.

We know that it would take only 21 members of the Conservative party to switch and vote with the opposition and this tax would be killed. We now know that we have two members, the member for Calgary Northeast and the member for Edmonton Southeast who have said they are voting against this bill on third reading.

Do you know what has happened to them? They have been expelled from the Alberta caucus of the Conservative party. That is an outright shame. It is absolutely disgusting.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): What about Willie? Somebody is sitting on Willie Littlechild right now.

Mr. Nystrom: Here are two members who have said they want to speak their mind. They had the courage of their convictions and they said they are going to vote against the GST. What happens to them? They get expelled from the Alberta caucus of the Conservative party. That is absolutely and utterly disgusting and despicable in 1990.

I do not know of any other precedent where a member is expelled from a political caucus in this parliamentary democracy because they happen to speak on behalf of their own constituents, on behalf of their own people.

We know those two members are not alone. In The Toronto Star today there is a report that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin has said that he will also vote against the GST at third and final reading.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: According to Linda Diebel of The Toronto Star the hon. member for Wetaskiwin will be voting against the government at third and final reading. If the hon. member does that, we will not have 21 to go. We only need 17 more Conservative members to stand up and vote on behalf of the people of this country to defeat the GST. Stand up for Canada. Speak on behalf of this country. Stand up for the people of Canada. Show the courage of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin who has said, according to The Toronto Star, that he will vote against the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance and vote for the people of his riding.

Those are three courageous members and I hope the Conservative Party does not throw out the hon. member for Wetaskiwin like they threw out the member from Calgary and the member from Edmonton.

In addition to those three courageous members, the hon. member for Wild Rose has said that she will abstain, that she cannot possibly vote for the GST. I encourage the Canadian people to phone her office and tell her to have the courage of Messrs. Kindy and Kilgour, to have the courage of the member for Wetaskiwin, stand and vote against the GST and represent the people of her riding as these members are representing their ridings.

Those two members have been expelled. The Toronto Star states that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin is now going to vote against the GST. That means if we have 18 more Tories, 18 more brave and courageous souls who will stand and vote against this tax, the tax would be dead. It would be finished. We would axe the tax. We have one Tory tax too many. Let's hit that tax here and now.

If this Tory tax comes in, it will increase inflation in the country, it will increase interest rates—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Wetaskiwin on a point of order.

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear to the House that as far as my vote on the goods and services tax is concerned, I have had an opportunity to discuss it with my constituents and I will be voting in favour of the GST.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Goodbye, Willie, goodbye, Willie!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Although that was not a point of order, I will still recognize the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, if the television cameras in this place could have a little creativity, they would have noticed that before the hon. member for Wetaskiwin rose to speak, the heavy-handed Whip of the Conservative Party went over to his seat and he whispered in his ear. The member for Wetaskiwin then picked up his pencil and made some notes on a piece of paper when the Whip was whispering in his ear. After the Whip went away, so he was off the camera, the member for Wetaskiwin got up in his place and stated that he had consulted with his constituents and will vote for the GST. What hypocrisy! The people of the country should know that.

The member for Wetaskiwin had just said in The Toronto Star, and I quote Linda Diebel: "Tories David Kilgour, Alex Kindy and Willie Littlechild—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Wetaskiwin on a point of order again.

Mr. Littlechild: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I think what is being said is what The Toronto Star may have written, not what I said. Also, with respect to the Whip, he did not slip me a paper nor did he say anything to me as he walked by.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I did not say he slipped him a piece of paper. What happened, if the cameras were creative, the heavy-handed Whip of the Conservative Party went over there and he whispered in his ear. The member for Wetaskiwin took a pad of paper and started to write as the Whip spoke in his ear. Within about half a minute, the member for Wetaskiwin got up in the House and said: "Look, I am listening to my constituents. I have been converted on the road to Damascus. I am listening to my constituents and I am going to vote for the GST".

Is it any wonder why that member is running fourth in the riding of Wetaskiwin? Is it any wonder why the Conservative party is running fourth in the province of Alberta, because they will not listen to the people and are bringing in a tax that people in that province and this country do not want; from the Conservative premier right on down they do not want that tax.

It is inflationary. It is going to drive up interest rates in this country. It is going to drive up the deficit in this country. It is going to cause a loss of jobs in this country. It is going to drive out investment. We know that. We know there are alternatives. We know we could raise the money that we need in this country through the income tax system in ways which would not be inflationary, which would not drive up interest rates, which would not add to the national deficit, which would create jobs, which would stimulate investment.

The Conservative party across the way is breaking faith with the people of this country. It is a breach of the democratic process. It is jackboot tactics pure and simple. It makes C. D. Howe back in the 1950s look like a child in comparison.

How about those members across the way showing some courage and standing up to the Minister of Finance, standing up to the chairman of the finance committee, standing up to the Prime Minister of this country, having the courage of their convictions, representing the people.

There is a revolt in the back bench of that Conservative party and we saw an example today where the member for Wetaskiwin said in the Toronto Star that he would vote against it. The heavy-handed Whip moves in, within seconds he gets up and he has a conversion on the road to Damascus—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest. A point of order, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, without getting into the debate, I think Hansard should show exactly what had happened. I saw the hon. member stand for quite a long time but you were distracted, Mr. Speaker, and did not notice him. This was long before anyone had walked up to him. This is why I want to set the record straight in defence of the hon. member opposite. I am not taking part in any debate but as members of this House, it is our duty to come to the defence of any other member regardless of party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest on debate.

Mr. Nystrom: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It really is not a point of order, it is debate, but I will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville on a very short point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I cannot let that pass. I was speaking when this happened. The member for Wetaskiwin was not on his feet before he was approached by the Deputy Whip—

Mr. Flis: Not true.

Mr. Nystrom: —before the Whip wandered over there. If the cameras were on it would have been plain for the world to see. There was pressure brought on the member on the floor of the House to change his mind and he decided he was going to vote for the GST. The people in this country should know it.

The Liberal party should not be complicit in passing the GST in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. government Whip on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, my name has been brought into this debate by the member. You may notice I did not say hon. member, Mr. Speaker. You heard from the member who rose on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. There is no such thing as "not an hon. member" in this House. Every member in this House is an hon. member.

Mr. Hawkes: I did not in any way, shape or form attempt to influence the statement that the member was about to make. He said it. I said it. It is the pattern in this Chamber to accept people's word.

That hon. member challenged me to a debate on the GST several weeks ago, the member from the NDP. I arranged five different sessions. He has bowed out of every single one of them. I have now accepted his arrangements in Calgary at a union hall, the Carpenters, for this Saturday night, but he has got trouble accepting me arranging a debate in his riding.

We want Canadians to know about this tax. He should come and debate me in his own riding. I am going to debate him in his hall in my riding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam on a point of order.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order and I will try to stick to it.

I sat back here, removed from the fray that has been going on here this afternoon, and watched the deputy Whip approach and discuss something with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. As he left and in the very spot the House leader from my side of the House is standing at this moment, I said to him: "Did you get your message across?" He turned, looked, laughed and said: "Yes."

That was the deputy Whip from the government side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think everybody has pretty well explained what has happened. The Chair is satisfied with what has happened. Therefore let's continue with debate.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I think if ever there was a need to demonstrate why we have this motion before us now to set out the allocation of time on this bill, we have seen it. We have seen the kind of nonsense, frankly, that will come forward. We have seen the kind of tactics and unparliamentary procedure, abuse of Parliament. We have seen from the member who just spoke an attempt to talk about other members and suggest how they may or may not determine their own thinking, and whether or not they may be influenced by others when in fact I have observed him for the last several months, as a member of the finance committee, doing exactly the same kind of thing.

He comes to the committee, makes an arrangement with us, goes back to his caucus, and then comes back and says that he is sorry, but he cannot keep the deal he made yesterday because he has been instructed by his caucus to change his mind. That occurred yesterday at the committee. If I had the transcripts with me I would bring them, but I will do it at an appropriate time.

As a member of the finance committee I want to use this opportunity to explain the reason for this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Essex—Windsor on a point of order.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, as a fellow member of the finance committee I think that when a serious charge such as that is made by a member of an important committee of this House, either the member should be prepared to substantiate such a serious charge or else should withdraw that charge immediately, and I ask the Speaker so to rule.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not really know what the charge is. Would the hon. member for Essex—Windsor please tell me what the charge is.

Mr. Langdon: The charge, which certainly I heard from the member for Edmonton Northwest was that a certain deal had been made by the member for Yorkton—Melville and that subsequently the member for Yorkton—Melville—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I need a transcript to see what happened in committee. What the hon. member talked about happened in committee and we are now in the House of Commons. Therefore the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest has the floor on debate. I cannot rule on what was done in committee.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I am not talking about what took place in committee. It was in fact the member across the way who was talking about what took place in committee. He made a charge in this House as to what took place in committee, a charge which accused my fellow committee member of the finance committee of breaking his word in committee.

That is an extremely serious charge. It cannot be permitted to stand, either without proof or without withdrawal. I simply appeal to this member to withdraw that charge as unworthy of him and unworthy of his party.

• (1720)

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw any charges that anyone might be offended by, which I am not particularly aware of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Fine, the hon. member has withdrawn. On debate, the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest has the floor.

Mr. Dorin: I would like to try to establish why I talked about the committee procedure. For someone to suggest in this House, or anywhere in the country for that matter, that somehow this issue has not received sufficient debate in Parliament or outside Parliament strains the credibility of anyone who might suggest that. I can think of no other issue, perhaps with the exception of the free trade debate in the last Parliament, where there has been a greater degree of debate and discussion in and outside Parliament.

Popularity or lack thereof is one issue, but I believe that no one could suggest that there has been a lack of debate or discussion. I have been a member of the Standing Committee on Finance, which has had this issue on its agenda for at least four years. We have studied it, had extensive hearings, different studies, examinations, and even a foreign visit. There have been changes made along the way to improve it and to meet the concerns some of the people have presented to us.

There is no doubt, in terms of examining all the available information, that the case has been met by any common sense yardstick. Therefore the argument today that more debate in Parliament or in the country would somehow change the dynamics of this issue is unfounded and unwarranted.

In this regard the procedures of the committee on this bill are relevant. In advance of the second reading vote on the bill, given the expectation that the committee would be given responsibility for consideration of the bill, the finance committee agreed on a method of proceeding. That method was endorsed at a planning committee meeting on February 12, with consideration of the bill to continue and commence with meetings with officials from the Department of Finance.

Without complaint, notice, explanation or even courtesy, the official members of that committee from the New Democratic Party abrogated their responsibility as committee members and sent in their stead two other members whose sole purpose, frankly, was to obstruct the proceedings of that committee.

This went on for a considerable period of time until an eventual resolution was reached. Following that, in spite of continued offers and requests by the chairman and myself, that party which is now complaining about lack of opportunity for reasonable debate refused to accept the majority proposal, to present an alternative proposal or to suggest somehow how we might proceed to deal with the business of the committee in a timely manner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Churchill on a point of order.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the member who is speaking tell the truth to the House. He knows that we did make counteroffers, and that was for the committee to travel across this country and hear witnesses from coast to coast to coast in each province and territory. That was offered to the government and it would not listen. We wanted the people to speak. We wanted the people to come to the committee. The hon. member should tell the truth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): What the hon. member is saying is debate. The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest has the floor.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I am relating to you and other members my viewpoint, my opinion, which frankly is the truth. Other members may have their own opinions and may dispute that, but that is up to them.

I think the whole issue casts a negative light on the question of whether or not members are independent members of committees who can make their own decisions or whether they must feel they are going to have—

An hon. member: You are voting independently from your caucus?

Mr. Dorin: Absolutely. I do not need any instructions. I have been involved with this issue for a long time and consistently supported it, going right back to the previous election. In case hon. members wish to know, my election brochures during the last campaign contained a commitment to sales tax reform and moving in this direction. This was included in the documentation that I distributed to every household in my riding. I made that perfectly clear, and I answered questions to that extent during the election campaign.

I find it very strange indeed opponents or opposition members suggest that it is independence when a committee tests the limits of its authority, which is somehow acting in defiance of the government or doing something which is not particularly popular with the minister. When a committee tests its authority in measures that happen to support the government, that is suggested to be autocracy.

It seems to me that opposition members cannot have it both ways. From time to time they have to rise in their places and take a position which may not necessarily always be popular within their own caucus.

Do we see them do that? No, we see them coming in here and participating in their publicly announced and acknowledged tactic to obstruct Parliament, to prevent Parliament from doing its business. The only way we can get on to have any kind of debate at all on this bill—because we know what happened at second reading stage, no debate was allowed because of the tactics of the NDP—is to proceed with this motion, vote this motion, pass it, and move on to time allocation.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of Finance went over the line as far as I was concerned. For many years I have said publicly that for me he is one of the most respected members of this House, so respected that many months ago when we heard that he was going to advance this goods and services tax a group of us got together and tried to come up with a constructive alternative. I must say to all members of this House it is a tough job to come up with a constructive alternative. I believe, as all of us do, that the only way we can advance debate is by coming up with alternatives.

For months a group of us worked together with tax experts from across the country. We even consulted Senators Bradley and Gephardt in the United States, Hall-Rabushka from the Hoover Institute at Stanford, Lyman MacInnis, past president of the Ontario Institute of Chartered Accountants, and Thomas Hodgson, President of Central Guaranty Trust in Toronto, the whiz kid of Bay Street. We got together with the researchers at the Library of Parliament and with Statistics Canada which develops modelling systems, some of those same modelling systems that the Minister of Finance uses in his department.

We came up with a constructive alternative to the goods and services tax. We came up with an alternative that was fairer, simpler, efficient and workable. It was a system where we knew we had to obviate the need for a goods and services tax because of the amount of revenue it was going to bring in. We admitted that the manufacturers' sales tax, the federal sales tax, was not a good thing and in our program we phased it out over three years, not all at once. We knew we had to be revenue neutral. We came up with numbers that would allow us to meet all of those objectives.

We came up with a form, and we called it the single tax, and it is 25 per cent for individuals and 25 per cent for corporations. We gave very progressive, refundable tax credits to those people in our community who are disadvantaged. We admitted all the way through this that we were advancing debate.

We did not say that our ideas were conclusive. We sent our material to the Minister of Finance on several occasions, and asked him to refute it, to give it to his officials to criticize it and try to improve on it. Not once did I hear from his department, or from the minister. I have been listening for months to him saying there are absolutely no alternatives on this side of the House. Finally, when I got his ear today, he snuffed off 179 pages of hard work by men and women from academia, from business, and work done by chartered accountants. He said: "Oh, that is some little booklet, on a single tax that does not work".

Mr. Volpe: He is blind and deaf to reality.

Mr. Mills: Well, I think the Minister of Finance is really losing it. He refuses to acknowledge that 80 per cent of people in this country are concerned about the goods and services tax. It is a tremendous disincentive to small business. It is causing fear for senior citizens.

Instead of listening and asking his departmental officials to do an analysis of that and point out the weaknesses, he continues to say there are absolutely no alternatives. I think the Minister of Finance is doing a tremendous disservice to his office.

It is only one alternative. I have said in this House before that this is not the Liberal Party position. We, in this party, right now, are going through a leadership debate. So we have three, four or five alternatives. But that is not the point.

Mr. Karpoff: Your leader is going to decide for you.

Mr. Mills: In fairness, we are a team. But that is no excuse for the Minister of Finance to ignore the idea. Whether this idea came from a member of the New Democratic Party or whether this idea came from a Conservative member, or whether it came from industry, it does not matter. It is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to look at a constructive alternative to a tax that is just crippling the spirit of this country.

We have said in this House before and many Liberal members have said that the current tax system is not just the product of members opposite, it is the product of many governments over many years. The point is that right now it is 15,000 pages of rules and exceptions to exceptions. Even the best accountants and tax lawyers in this country will readily admit today that they no longer understand it. It is out of control. Canadians are being so frustrated by the current Income Tax Act that it is time for this government to take the lead and clean it up.

The government always talks about productivity. We lack productivity because, generally speaking, Canadians do not feel there is fairness in the tax system. A man who is working on a shop floor making $20 an hour might pay $8 a week in tax on that hourly wage and at the end of the year he might pay another $1,500 or $2,000. His neighbour next door might be an architect or a tax lawyer who is making $150,000 a year and he will not be paying any tax. We know that is not right.

The tax system, with all its legal tax preferences, is so imbalanced right now, that the person who is working his heart and guts out on the shop floor says: "Why should I work so hard when my neighbour who is making three times as much does not pay anything?". That system does not work.

If we are going to have fairness and productivity and if we are going to get a nation that can be a world-class competitor again, we must start with the tax system. A goods and service tax that adds another 45 or 50 pages to the 45 or 50 pages that every individual in Canada receives right now, is not the way to go.

One of the members said today that he phoned his constituents and indicated that he had enough constituents who were supportive of the goods and services tax.

• (1735)

I can tell you that in my riding it is the exact opposite. It is not that the people do not want to pay tax. People just want something that is fair, simple and efficient. The current system does not provide that.

This is one idea. Professor Brooks has another idea. I think it is the responsibility of this government to do a full analysis of this. We are already at the third draft in our proposal. It is the government's responsibility to respond.

The disincentive factor that is caused by this goods and services tax is going to force a further underground economy. Right now they guestimate that there is $40 billion to $50 billion in an underground economy in this country. If we had a system that was more fair we could probably recapture some of that underground economy. There might be enough to develop a national day care program.

But this government is so obsessed with cutting and retreating from programs that it is forgetting that there is a creative process. Instead of trying to develop ways to make the pie larger and renewing the spirit of productivity, it is cutting. This government has been retreating from national responsibility for the last six years. If it keeps going like this, it will be history within the next two years.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have been travelling with the finance committee on the GST debate. It has been almost three years since the finance minister informed Canadians through the tax reform White Paper how he planned to replace the 65 year-old manufacturers' sales tax.

The bill has already met with the expected enthusiastic response from the opposition parties in the House of Commons. But the many benefits for the whole economy of a broadly based goods and services tax far outweighs the criticism to date of this government proposal.

There is a major problem with the manufacturers' sales tax. The MST is applied to business inputs. That is the materials, parts and supplies used in the manufacturing process. This makes it tougher for Canadian exporters to sell their products in foreign markets and compete with producers who pay no tax on their business inputs. In other words, being uncompetitive costs Canada jobs.

Surely it is time for us to take an honest look at the manufacturers' sales tax, that 13.5 per cent bite on most things made in Canada that has been conveniently hidden for too long. Suppose this tax did not exist and suppose your provincial premier, myself being from Ontario, Premier Peterson, decided to impose a similar provincial tax on manufacturers, there would be a great public outcry. There would be a charge that Ontario jobs would be lost and that business could not stand the competition from other tax-free provinces.

Or, suppose that the city of Cambridge or the city of Kitchener decided to impose its own manufacturers' sales tax on industry within those city limits? The move would be denounced as driving businesses to other communities such as Guelph, Brantford and Woodstock.

What are some of the concerns with the manufacturers' sales tax? First, it applies to a very narrow base. There are five commodities; tobacco, alcohol, automobiles, automobile parts and motor fuels. They represent about 16 per cent of government spending and yet they generate about one-third of the revenue from the manufacturers' sales tax. People who come here always ask why gas is so much cheaper south of the border. Why is tobacco so much cheaper? Why is alcohol so much cheaper? It is those five products that pay a heavy burden with the manufacturers' sales tax.

Another thing that Canadians have heard is that over the past 60 years there has been fiddling with the tax to satisfy one special interest group over another. As a result, there has been some 22,000 special provisions; including things such as athletic headbands. An athletic headband is considered clothing. Therefore, it is exempt from the manufacturers' sales tax. But if you buy an athletic wristband, it is considered sporting equipment and therefore is taxed.

A facial tissue is considered a cosmetic product and the MST is included in the price. The makers of facial tissues will argue that it is a health care product and, as such, should be exempt from the MST. If the makers are successful in winning that argument then they do not have to pay the tax. The tax they do not pay eventually is picked up by consumers somewhere else.

Another concern about the existing manufacturers' sales tax, the tax we want to get rid of, is the impact it has on domestically produced commodities. For example, I was talking about cosmetics. There are various rates. The reason for various rates depends on how a company handles its marketing and distribution function. On some cosmetics on the shelf the effective federal tax is as low as 5.8 per cent. On other products it is as high as 19.2 per cent.

Here we have similar products made by different companies in the same industry and yet we have a wide range of tax. I could not take you into a store and point out which product has the 6 per cent MST and which one has a 19 per cent effective rate. That is the type of situation with which we are dealing.

Small appliances have rates as low as 5.5 per cent and some as high as 13.9 per cent. Here we have within Canada again, companies competing against themselves but charged different rates of tax. They are trying, through the courts, to lessen their tax burden. They do so by setting up new corporate structures so they can change market distribution and reduce tax.

Another major concern is the impact on imported goods and exports. For example, office machines and equipment. For a domestic producer the MST rate is as low as 12 per cent to as high as 13 per cent. The important fact is that for a foreign company, the effective rate to that company on MST when it imports office machines and equipment is 7.5 per cent. Right away the Canadian domestic producer of office machines and equipment is at a 5 per cent disadvantage. He is at a 5 per cent disadvantage because of a tax his own country is charging. Canada is the only country that has a manufacturers' sales tax of this type, and when we consider that 40 per cent of our income comes from exports it is ludicrous that we maintain this tax.

I can think of one benefit of the manufacturers' sales tax, which has really been for politicians only. That is the fact that it is virtually invisible to consumers. Some people say "what you don't know won't hurt you".

Many people did not know that they were already paying a federal sales tax. A one-income family with two children and an income of $35,000 today is paying a manufacturers' sales tax on the average consumer basket of about $1,500. After the introduction of the GST they will pay about the same amount. For this particular family there is no change.

We have gone from a tax you can see to a tax you cannot see. I think the people of this country have reacted because they are suddenly seeing something which has been there for many years. Almost since its introduction, the MST has been a problem to manufacturers. We have heard of the many royal commissions that addressed its fundamental flaws in 1940, 1966 and 1983. Each study has recommended major change.

Canada is the only industrialized country with a manufacturers' sales tax of this kind. In 1990, the manufacturers' sales tax fails every test of good tax policy. At the age of 65 it is time to retire the manufacturers' sales tax.

No one should suggest that the GST is 100 per cent perfect. But when you compare it to the existing manufacturers' sales tax, the GST is a clear winner, a gold medal winner.

Mrs. Maheu: Tell that to your voters.

Mr. Sobeski: I will tell it to the voters.

• (1745)

According to the C.D. Howe Institute, the adoption of the GST would be the single most significant, recent advance in Canadian tax policy. The study states that the GST, by broadening the base of the tax to include currently untaxed goods and services, by changing the method of collection, will improve the efficiency of the Canadian economy.

So we have the C.D. Howe Institute, the Economic Council of Canada, the Conference Board of Canada who all support the improvement and the competitive position of Canadian manufacturing which they acknowledge will benefit the whole economy. They do not have any problem with the recommendation in Finance that it will create 60,000 new jobs every year.

The GST is a solution to a problem that most Canadians are unaware they have. There will not be any more royal commissions, any more study. This government has taken the daring and necessary step to reform the sales tax system. Canadians may not like being told they have a deficit. They do not like being told they have a deficit problem. They may not like having to pay taxes, but Canadians are realistic. They realize there are no freebies. There are no painless solutions to this serious problem.

Mr. Gauthier: You and Wilson ought to get together.

Mr. Sobeski: We are clearly together, and I have been supporting this right from the beginning. We would like to improve it.

Naturally, we would like to have had a national sales tax that would have incorporated the federal and provincial sales tax systems, but this was not possible, given the political dynamics of the day. The issue is not those failed negotiations. The issue is the pressing need to proceed with reforming the tax system which is hurting Canadian business, and we are doing it in such a way that it leaves open the possibility of a truly national sales tax at a later date.

In conclusion, I would like to quote Terence Corcoran of The Globe and Mail. He said on December 8: "Think of the GST as a home renovation. It will make a bit of a mess while the work is being done, but the final result will be something you can be proud of".

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, after having heard three members from the government side, I think it is inevitable that I, and my party, should share the same contempt for this government that the Canadian people feel as a result of the utter contempt this government has directed toward the Canadian people.

I listened to the member for Edmonton Northwest bleating about the efforts of the New Democratic Party representative on the finance committee. Whatever may be said about the efforts of my colleagues on that committee, they had one single purpose, and that was to ensure that all of the Canadian people were heard on this tax. We can understand why we heard the parliamentary secretary say: "We did not want to hear any more because they are all going to say the same thing." Eighty per cent of the Canadian people are going to say the same thing, that this tax is an unacceptable tax. It is a tax that must be opposed, and will be opposed.

We have heard my colleague talk of certain members on the government side who did not adhere to caucus discipline. I think it is important to know the fundamental elements that constitute the basis for that caucus discipline. I think it was best expressed by the hon. member for Simcoe Centre. She expressed it in ordinary language that everybody could understand: "If I listen to my constituents, I would not have time to give leadership."

We just heard the hon. member down the way say: "We are through with hearings. We are through with royal commissions. We are through with all that stuff. We made a decision." It is a decision which I said before is utterly contemptuous of the Canadian people.

Because the Canadian people have been denied the right to be heard adequately, the Ontario caucus of the New Democratic Party has for the last several days been holding hearings so at least Ontarians could be heard.

I think it is important, even before addressing the tax, to give you an impression of how Canadians are feeling. They feel that what is happening to their country as a result of the consistent actions of this government, tears at the very fabric of Canadian civilization, our humanitarian instincts and our sense of community. There is the sense that somehow our country is being robbed of so much that gave us pride and confidence, that in spite of everything, we could influence our fate and the destiny of this country.

But with the changes as a result of the free trade agreement, the cuts in UIC, privatization, deregulation, and other actions which have been opposed by the people but implemented by the government, it has created a terrible sense of powerlessness, frustration, anger and alienation. If the government wants to know why there seems to be so much division in this country then it should look for the answer in what it has done.

By creating a level playing field with the United States it has done what we predicted would happen. The Conservatives have made this country more like the United States. There are too many people out there who, frustrated with the government, are looking around for scapegoats. That is why we find so many of us looking for others to blame and exhibiting all kinds of characteristics that are alien to our culture before this government came to power.

It is interesting that the Minister of Finance and the other member who talked about this bill to introduce the goods and services tax, did not at all attempt to defend the goods and services tax itself. They said only that the manufacturers' sales tax should be eliminated, that it cost jobs and that it should be eliminated in the interest of the growth of the Canadian economy.

We have never questioned that. The manufacturers' sales tax should be eliminated. But should it be replaced with a goods and services tax?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. McCurdy: Let us for a moment, Mr. Speaker, consider what the manufacturers' sales tax entailed. The manufacturers' sales tax led to $18.5 billion in revenue, whereas the goods and services tax will raise $21.5 billion in revenue. What is very interesting, if you look at the actual net gain in revenue, apart from the cost of administering the tax and rebates associated with the tax, all we would need to do is raise $14.5 billion. We can raise that $14.5 billion without having a goods and services tax, or the 4,000 people needed to collect that tax, simply by making small changes in a variety of taxes with no change in the establishment of the Department of National Revenue.

Let me list the changes. You can search for the details in the publication of Neil Brooks which was cited earlier.

• (1755)

Let us suppose we eliminate the MST and the GST but maintain the excise taxes on cigarettes and liquor. That is good for $2.3 billion. Eliminate the entertainment deductions for rich business people and the corporations; $1 billion. Tighten capital gains; $.5 billion. Eliminate all necessary tax breaks for corporations; $2 billion. Impose a minimum tax on corporations, the same as the Americans do; $2 million. Tax wealth either in the form of an inheritance or an annual tax on net wealth; $2.5 billion. Stop tax cheating as we used to before this government came to power; $3 billion. Restore the income tax to five rather than three marginal rates and raise the top marginal rate to 40 per cent. It is awfully interesting what the result of that is. Even the Minister of Finance admits that inflation will increase by 1.25 per cent or more probably 3 per cent as a result of the GST.

The alternative would not only allow a fairer tax system and eliminate the problems of the MST, in fact it would cut inflation by 2.3 per cent. This, in turn, would mean that interest rates could be cut. If interest rates were cut investment would increase. If investment increased, jobs would be produced.

Yes, there is an alternative that is in the interests of the vast majority of Canadians. The Tories are not interested in the Canadian people, they show utter contempt and the people will show their utter contempt for a government that cares not for them or the country.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it seems that we have near unanimity, at least on this side of the House and among those on the other side who refuse to be muzzled by their Whip that there is, on the part of the government, total and utter contempt for the wishes and needs of Canadians, total and utter contempt for the activities in this House.

A few moments ago we heard the Minister of Finance sneer contemptuously at the fact that we in the Liberal party did not have an alternative, and his associate minister held for his consideration a proposal by one of our colleagues, the member for Broadview—Greenwood, the single tax. What did they do? They say there are no alternatives. The Conservatives refuse to listen. They refuse to hear what Canadians have to say. They refuse to hear what Parliament has to say.

My colleagues from Alberta will know and appreciate these statistics. Since Standing Order 57, which refers to the closure motion, was adopted in 1913, it has been applied in this House 21 times to cut off debate from 1913 to December of 1988. In this Parliament, since 1988 that closure motion has been invoked 13 times.

Today we saw this motion applied in order to muzzle the backbenchers of the Conservative Party itself. How can Canadians get across their vehement dislike for this goods and services tax when the governing party has to put a muzzle on its own members?

I know all members on this side of the House think it is a shame that Canadians cannot debate the biggest tax fraud ever perpetrated against Canadians since Confederation. Mr. Speaker, I know you are going to give me 10 minutes to address this issue. We have seen the first application of a 7 per cent tax. I am only going to be able to speak for 1.4 per cent of that time. I see members opposite smile.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have eight minutes remaining in his speech.

It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until until tomorrow at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table today, in both official languages, an Order in Council announcing an appointment made recently by the government.

Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), this Order in Council is deemed to have been referred to the Standing Committee named in the appendix.

While I am on my feet, I take this opportunity to move:

That the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Danis), which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mrs. Gaffney: My apologies, Mr. Speaker, had I been in my seat when the vote was counted, I would have voted with my party.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I had planned, following completion of Routine Proceedings earlier today, to make an application under Standing Order 52 requesting an emergency debate on the urgent crisis facing women's centres. My point of order is that since this is no longer possible as the government moved earlier to deny proceedings, I seek unanimous consent of the House to make this application now.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

FUNDING TO WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): I thank my colleagues for giving unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to move that this House do now adjourn under the provisions of Standing Order 52 to discuss a matter requiring immediate and urgent consideration concerning funding to women's centres across Canada.

This funding was terminated on March 30, leaving these places of information, referral and support for abused women, homeless women, jobless women, and women in difficulty on the brink of closing. The centres have not yet closed but most will do so almost immediately if federal funding is not continued.

This is a very urgent matter and a grave crisis facing women of Canada from coast to coast to coast and I ask for an emergency debate on this matter.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid that this does not meet the requirements of the Standing Orders and at this time I am afraid I cannot allow the debate.

The hon. member for Crowfoot.

DRESS CODE IN CHAMBER

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, during the vote just taken I noted that the hon. member for Davenport was not wearing a tie. That is a requirement under the rules of the House. It is not a point that I would not normally raise except that it was a matter to which recently some attention was brought in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have allowed the hon. member to be recognized on the vote but I would not recognize him on debate, or any points of order, or questions in this House until he changes to proper attire.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

TIME ALLOCATION—BILL C-62

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre:

That, in relation to Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage, and one sitting day to the consideration of third reading stage of the said bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for Government Business on the final day for consideration of each such stage, both days, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this Order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose respectively of the report stage and third reading of the said bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise again and continue the debate we began last night on this issue. Last night the debate was becoming more than acrimonious. We saw the Minister of Finance negotiate with a gun called "closure" on the table. It earned the absolute ire and anger of all members. You quite rightly put everybody in place by reminding us that he is, after all, an honourable member. And as an hon. member he is being very appropriate in disseminating the truths—and there are many that come from his department and office—regarding the GST proposal.

He forgot to tell us that the start-up cost for the GST proposal is going to be in excess of $1.1 billion, according to the Minister of National Revenue. He forgot to tell us that the operating costs for the implementation of this GST are going to be in excess of $380 million annually. He forgot to tell us again that there are going to be an additional 3,900 other tax collectors required to implement this tax. He forgot as well to advise all members that the operating and administrative costs are going to be horrendous as the provinces and his own department are confused about how all of this will take place.

Mr. Speaker, you reminded us that the minister was an honourable man, so we continued to listen as he berated this side of the House for not coming up with alternatives. The minister said that his view was the only view because no one had presented an alternative. Again, he forgot to tell us that he and his party were elected to present policy proposals for our consideration. He did not give us an indication as to what proposals his department had rejected in place of the GST.

He forgot to take notice in Toronto just a few days ago that a group of economists, academics and journalists who write on economic matters presented a series of alternatives to the GST objectives by focusing on government inefficient administration that, if corrected, would save in excess of $13 billion per annum.

When the minister says that he must redress the tax situation in Canada in order to address these kinds of inefficiencies, why does he reject these rather worthwhile proposals by these individuals?

That is a good question. But you insist that he is an honourable man and we cannot impugn his honour. He forgot to tell us that the Institute for Research on Public Policy made a new alternative proposal to the GST, basing a new tax reform on income tax and an increase that would still be 10 points lower than it was in 1981. I do not know why that could not be considered an alternative tax to the GST.

Again, all members were silenced because, after all, the Minister of Finance speaks as an honourable man. He rejected with scorn and disdain another proposal presented by my hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for a single tax. He says "No, no. That is but a simple book, a simple book that even my back-benchers over there cannot read". Yet, you insist, Mr. Speaker, that he is an honourable man and we must treat him with deference.

What are the objectives the Minister of Finance holds so dear that we must bow and scrape and I dare say grovel with deference, without being able to put across our views? The minister says we must have tax reform. Let us have tax reform.

Over the course of the last four or five years there has been an increase in personal taxes of some 24 per cent. There has been an increase of 62 per cent in personal taxes for low and middle income Canadians while at the same time only an 8 per cent increase for those in the upper income category.

This is the tax reform he would address with the GST. The minister forgot to tell us and his own members—except the two worthy hon. members from Alberta who have already rejected his entreaties—that there has been a decrease of some 4 per cent in the amount of taxes paid by corporations as a percentage of the GDP.

The minister forgot to tell us, even though his estimates pointed out that over the course of the middle 1980s, 1987 for example, businesses were to pay $12 billion in corporate taxes but received $9 billion in subsidies. The minister's tax proposal does not address that as a reform. According to the budget estimates presented only last month, corporations that were to pay $14.5 billion paid a mere $12.5 billion. Is that tax reform?

Another person might have suggested that the Minister of Finance lies, but he is an honourable man and that cannot be said of him.

Let us take a look at what a member of his own party, the member for Halton—Peel, said on national television Sunday night. He said: "We must have the GST. We have to raise more money to reduce the deficit, continue to pay for our educational programs and our medical programs across the country"—those which were cut in this budget—"but we are going to do it because this will give us an opportunity to reduce the deficit and the debt".

The hon. member for Halton—Peel is an honourable man too, but he suffers from excessive ambition. He would take the place of the Minister of Finance.

When we are talking about the effects of the GST, let us leave with a word of caution from members of the tourist industry who say that the implementation of such a tax measure will cause the loss of 30,000 jobs in that particular industry—5,000 in Ontario alone.

Those kinds of actions and consequences are not the marks of an honourable man, and the Minister of Finance does not deserve the title.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate today. I have been listening with great interest to the debate these past couple of days.

I understand the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence standing and mocking the Minister of Finance and trying to make him out as a mean-spirited individual. I understand the Liberals' concern about the current Minister of Finance because he is the best Minister of Finance this country has seen in 40 years. The member is so upset about it because there is not a soul in that caucus who could even tie his shoes.

Who over there would be the Minister of Finance? Would it be the hon. member from the east coast who was on national television to debate the Minister of Finance? Is he going to be their Minister of Finance if they ever gain power? The present minister wiped the floor with him in Edmonton. There he is, he just came into the House. I welcome him. I am glad he is here.

I understand why the Liberals are so concerned about the Minister of Finance. It is because he is good and they know it. He has been an excellent Minister of Finance for this country.

The hon. member talked about the rich getting the breaks. The GST is a consumption tax. I want to educate my hon. friend because he comes from an area of the city where they have high-income and low-income people. He has a mixed constituency, much like I have. The GST is a consumption tax. The more you consume, the more tax you pay. The more expensive the things you buy are, the more tax you pay.

Who is going to be paying more tax under the GST? The wealthy, of course they are. He failed to point that out in his little diatribe. Of course that is what a consumption tax is all about.

Today we are debating time allocation. The reason that the government has brought in time allocation is for the very reason that you hear from across the floor of the House. The Liberals brought in a series of motions to negate each clause in the bill. That is all that was in these motions. They did not make amendments to improve the bill, but strictly to wipe out the bill.

Mr. Gauthier: Scrap the tax, that's what we want.

Mr. McDermid: They had an opportunity to do that with their votes, but, no, they would not participate.

The other thing about the Liberal Party of Canada is that it has no alternatives—absolutely no alternatives whatsoever.

Mr. Mills: How can you say that with a straight face?

Mr. McDermid: They had no alternatives to the free trade agreement. Everybody remembers the former leader standing there and saying: "I'm going to tear it up. I'm going to tear it up".

Now, the candidates for the leadership of that party are going around the country saying: "We are going to wipe out the GST". I am going to tell you, one of the things they are not saying to the Canadian people is what they are going to put in its place. Not one of them has said that.

Mr. Mills: That is not true.

Mr. McDermid: Except le p'tit gars de Shawinigan. He said very clearly: "We must be sure. We cannot wipe it out."

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I do not think it is too parliamentary for a member of Parliament to use that kind of facial expression. I think that is mockery. I do not think it is parliamentary at all.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I have to remind my friends that I have been in the House many times when Eugene Whalen used to get up and do exactly the same thing. I am not making fun of my friend, Mr. Chrétien. I am impersonating Mr. Chrétien when he says he would not wipe out the GST if he became the leader.

Mr. Mills: That is not what he said.

Mr. McDermid: Sure, that is what he said. His mouthpiece from Toronto has moved from his back-bench seat to the front row so he can heckle me. He can heckle all he wants. I am going on with my speech.

The Liberals would negate the bill, they have no alternatives.

Let me turn to my good friends from the socialist party. The socialists in this country have made it very clear from day one—they have been right up front with it, and I have to give them full marks for that—they would do everything to obstruct this bill—absolutely everything. They are not here to debate it. They are not here to try to improve it. They are here strictly as obstructionists.

A government was elected to do the business of the country, and that is what we are doing. That is why we brought in time allocation. It is obvious that they are not interested in debating the bill in an intelligent way. We have gone through a major consultative process on this bill. We have, for many years, been consulting all sectors of the economy on the goods and services tax. It is now time to get on with it.

We have some government amendments that have been introduced which improve the bill. They come from suggestions and consultations in the finance committee under the able leadership of the hon. member for Mississauga South.

I will tell you, that is another thing members of the opposition are upset with. We have a great chairman of the finance committee, and they do not like him at all. It is too bad. He has done a marvellous job, and this country understands that he has done a marvellous job.

I might say that during the committee hearings we had some excellent representations from witnesses. They have provided us with suggestions for improvement. We will see those improvements in the amendments that are brought forward to make the GST operate better and more fairly in this country.

Governments have to make tough choices, tough decisions. We understand that they may not be popular with the people. But there comes a time when the government has to make a decision for the economic well-being of this country. That is what we have done.

I read with great interest this morning my media pundits saying that our caucus is falling apart, that our caucus is disintegrating because of the goods and services tax. There is nothing further from the truth. The Progressive Conservative caucus is solidly behind the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister on the goods and services tax.

You know what? I will tell you. The caucus members met regularly with the Minister of Finance, and also with the chairman of the finance committee, and made some very positive suggestions which improved the goods and services tax. Members of our caucus did that. They were very productive. They were very positive in their approach. They did not have this negativism that we get from the other side, which has absolutely no alternative. There have been no alternatives whatsoever from the Liberal party, or from the New Democratic Party that make any sense.

I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, and I want the media to understand this, as well as the Liberals and the New Democrats, the Progressive Conservative Party, the Progressive Conservative caucus is solidly behind the Minister of Finance and the government in this motion today.

We watch what is going on in those two parties, and their leadership convention. We see them fighting over one another all the time. They should be taking a look at themselves before they look at the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr. Nault: Eighty per cent of Canadians are against the tax. That's a good job in six years.

• (1210)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member for Kamloops is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I must not have understood the news media last night. I thought I was watching and hearing members of the Progressive Conservative caucus who indicated they were not voting in favour of the GST. When my hon. friend says that the caucus is uniformly in solidarity behind this measure, obviously he is not speaking the truth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that is debate. The minister has one minute left.

Mr. McDermid: Certainly we know it is debate. We know who he is talking about. He is talking about someone who, from day one, has opposed the goods and services tax and who has been sitting on the outside of the whole debate and has not participated in a positive way, like the other members of the caucus have. The caucus is not disintegrating, I can assure my hon. friend of that. As much as he would like to see it, it just is not happening.

Finally, what we are seeing across this country is that approval for the goods and services tax is growing. It is growing through the understanding of how the system operates and how it works.

I received a letter recently from a small businessman, a manufacturer in my community who said: "I have done as you suggested and prepared a cash flow statement for 12 months under the present federal sales tax system and also one under the proposed GST. It appears that this is a case where I am glad to say I was wrong. Quarterly remittances makes a big improvement on our cash flow"—it is about 34 per cent by the way—"and offsets the outlay of cash when raw product is purchased. The GST tax credit on office supplies, et cetera, makes very little difference to our particular company but I can see in other operations it could be significant."

That is what is happening across this country as the small business community understands that this is going to be a great improvement. I can tell you, by 1992 the Canadian people will be pleased that we brought this system in.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask the minister if he could table that letter so we can all see it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would the hon. minister like to mail the letter to the hon. member?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I did not read from it, I ad libbed around the essence of it.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to talk a bit about the goods and services tax in the short time I have to speak on this. I say a short time because, quite frankly, many of my colleagues on this side of the House have been lining up to speak on this bill and have not been given the opportunity to do that because of time allocation.

I will start my remarks by talking about the government's attitude toward time allocation and its use of it. Since I was elected to this House, the government has used time allocation or closure 35 to 40 times. That is an appalling number of times to limit debate. Canadians want us to stand up and speak on their behalf on these issues. Yet time and time again this government has brought in time allocation to limit our abilities to discuss the issues.

The GST issue has only been debated in the House at report stage for 46 minutes, and we are already debating time allocation.

There are many serious concerns that the people of Haldimand—Norfolk want me to express about the GST. I have had various meetings throughout the riding with them.

I want to centre on three issues dealing with its effects on agriculture, seniors and our small business people. These are the people in riding who have come to me to express their concerns about the GST.

Farmers will now have to pay the GST on fertilizers, chemicals, fuels, lubricants, equipment repairs and all other general maintenance. To receive rebates, farmers will have to chase down every single receipt for money they paid in order to receive any funding back from the government.

Farmers have told me time and again that this is going to be an extreme burden on their abilities to farm. Instead of taking the time to deal with proper farming methods, they are going to have to be bookkeepers. They are going to have to be accountants. This tax puts an undue burden on them. The farmers of Haldimand—Norfolk wanted me to express that to you, Sir.

As Ontario Federation of Agriculture president Brigit Pyke told the finance committee: "Their cash flow position could be considerably worsened, forcing them to borrow money in order to pay the tax." This is a real problem for agricultural communities.

Then there is the massive paperwork burden. As the president of the Western Canadian Wheat Growers put it: "We'll be doing our books every spring instead of riding a tractor".

Farmers already have a cash flow problem, as we have discussed in this House, and this government has decided to take away the interest free advances that farmers, especially in my riding, count on.

Now the government brings farmers the GST. With it, the money that farmers need to put out to get their crops planted and harvested will now be used to pay taxes. If they want rebates quickly, they will have to do their books on a monthly basis and they will never be compensated for this time and effort.

Farm equipment dealers told the finance committee that the GST will mean an additional $40 million in interest and paperwork costs to their industry. Allen Hills of the Canadian Federation of Farm Equipment Dealers of Canada said: "We cannot afford to absorb any more costs. Either the farmers will pay or some dealers will have to go bankrupt".

The government is not totally heartless when it comes to farmers though. If farmers decide to give up the farm completely, to sell all their land to another farmer or a relative, or if they are forced out of the business, then they do not have to pay GST. But if farmers decide to stay on the farm and try to make a go of it by selling off part of their land to a developer or to any other business to pay for the additional costs of farming that the GST will force upon them, the sale will then be subject to the GST.

The government has stated that basic food prices will not rise as a result of the GST. But if the costs, in both time and money, of growing food rises, surely either the food prices will rise or the burden will be put on the farmer.

As badly off as the farmer will be, he will not be alone. As I said, I have had many discussions with different seniors groups in Haldimand—Norfolk and, quite frankly, Sir, they are outraged with this tax. They have lost respect and confidence in this government. The government that told them that social programs were sacred was the same government that attacked our elderly with the clawback and is now attacking them with the GST.

I and my caucus have met with different seniors organizations. Jean Woodsworth, president of the One Voice Seniors Network, said: "The tax on goods and services means hardship on seniors. It seems that low and middle-income seniors will be pushed toward poverty. The proposed tax credits do not reassure them—meanwhile, wealthy Canadians will be paying proportionately much less, and that's just not fair."

The GST proposal is not fair. It is not fair to seniors, it is not fair to farmers and it is not fair at all to the small business people, especially those in my riding.

I had a meeting recently with them in Simcoe where we discussed this tax. Quite frankly, 99.9 per cent of them were against the GST. They had very valid reasons. They were concerned by the cost that the GST would put upon their small businesses, which now need cash flow. They are concerned that government programs to assist them with purchasing things like cash registers will not be in place and that the cost of maintaining this GST will be much more than any rebate that the government gives to them, and they voiced these concerns to me. Mr. Bulloch, who appeared before the committee, gave many differing reasons why small business was against the tax. I do not want to go through them, but I do want to quote from a speech of his in which he outlines the stand of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. He said:

> The measures proposed to assist small businesses with implementing the tax—would be a reasonable attempt to offset the regressive compliance implications of a single-tiered sales tax. They do not, however, begin to offset the actual costs that will be imposed on small firms by a two-tiered tax system.

• (1220)

Even the government and the Minister of Finance, early on indicated that they would not bring in a two-tiered tax system. It was his idea that if you could negotiate with the provinces and get some sort of agreement on this, then that would be the best approach to take. Quite frankly, he has failed to do that. As a result, he has put in jeopardy small business people in Canada, and those in my riding.

I see my time is coming to an end. Before I finish, I want to quote a constituent of mine who called the GST hotline to get information on the GST. He is a small businessman. He said: "While they gave me very good information on certain questions I had, one person asked me if there was any other country I would like to live in. I happen to be a third generation Canadian, going back to the early 1800s. My father served in World War I and I served in World War II and I do not appreciate being asked this question just because I had opposition to the GST".

Quite frankly, that question portrays the attitude of this government toward those who oppose it. Instead of listening to opposition concerns, taking them in and trying to develop some sort of alternative that might reflect what small businessmen, seniors and farmers are saying out there, it brings in closure instead. It brings in time allocation to stop debate on this issue.

There are other approaches. There are approaches and alternatives that have been put out by different groups. I think that these should have been discussed. The process should have started with discussion, first, and then the alternatives.

Our party does have an alternative to the GST. We want to scrap the tax. We want to open discussions, talk with Canadians, small businessmen, farmers and seniors about their concerns. I think that is the proper approach.

I see you are signalling that my time is up. I appreciate having the opportunity to speak on this question.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I will not hide from you that I am more convinced than ever that it is important to pass this legislation as quickly as possible.

I am even more convinced because of what I just heard the previous speaker say. His statements and allegations are totally unfounded and so erroneous that I am more determined than ever to get the debate over with, because these falsehoods are likely to frighten our people and have nothing to do with the legislation we are preparing to pass.

I also deplore the fact that my hon. colleague who just spoke and who is also a backbencher did not take more time to read the legislation a little more thoroughly and report back to his constituents. He gave some examples like farmers and small businesses, but he could have given them clarifications to show that he really represents his riding. But alas, what I just heard from him is false.

So I repeat, Mr. Speaker, it is urgent to pass this bill and to get it over with once and for all.

After years of studies, analyses and reports on the problems of our present system, now more than ever is the time to act, not to talk and distort reality.

In the past few months, we have seen a whole slew of tactics and tricks from the hon. members opposite, and I just heard another example of it.

Did they make statements to improve the bill? They did not. Did they suggest alternatives to the present unfair system? They did not. Mr. Speaker, I have not heard a single constructive remark in all the speeches they have made so far. All they have done is criticize. All they have done is use scare tactics on Canadians, especially on certain groups tire senior citizens. All the delay, all the problems they raised were just a lot of petty politics. This is just one more example of the opposition's traditional tactics of scaring people and not moving an inch, so that we now have this disastrous legacy including our cumulative annual deficits—our national debt—and what they did was merely maintain the tax system we have today that is so unfair to Canadians.

Both opposition parties know perfectly well that we must change the present federal sales tax—a hidden tax—and do so drastically. They know perfectly well we must reduce the deficit—

Mr. Young (Gloucester): You increased it by 45 per cent since 1984.

Mr. Côté: —and control our debt so we can get rid of it altogether. However, in their, I would say, cynical campaign against the GST, spokesmen for these two parties have tried to scare, as I said earlier, the most vulnerable members of our society: senior citizens and low-income families.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Is the FTQ scaring people in Quebec? Is Louis Laberge trying to scare people in Quebec? Yes or no?

Mr. Côté: I must say, Mr. Speaker, and I heard some reactions just now. I believe that to a certain extent, they scared people. Yes, they did. Remember what they did during the debate on free trade. They scared them then, to a certain extent. They did. However, all the more reason to finish with these enless arguments which are causing considerable concern among Canadians.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): We haven't finished yet! Remember the deindexed pensions?

Mr. Côté: Many people do not realize that thanks to the tax credit they will receive, their incomes will go up, although my hon. opposition colleague from the finance committee does not agree.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): It isn't indexed.

Mr. Côté: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether my colleagues across the way, who are interrupting me, are proud of what they did? Are they really proud of the scare tactics they used on the most vulnerable people in this country? If they claim to represent Canadians, including the most vulnerable in our society, how can their conscience and sense of honesty let them do and say what they are doing and saying now?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Eighty per cent of Quebecers are against the GST.

Mr. Côté: The answer is clear. They are not responsible people and they do not represent these vulnerable groups because otherwise, Mr. Speaker, they would have suggested alternatives. They would have added constructive amendments. But it was no, always no, until the very end, including the filibuster.

Mr. Boudria: My colleague proposed 60 amendments.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The Tories are down to 17 per cent in the polls! Twenty per cent of people are for the GST.

Mr. Boudria: You are even less popular than the GST!

Mr. McDermid: Wait until the election!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): When you start flogging your promises again?

Mr. Côté: So it is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that when they are exposed to this kind of cynicism and tunnel vision on the part of opposition members, Canadians have trouble trusting politicians. Unfortunately, this reflects badly, not just on the opposition but on all parties generally. How can groups that are particularly vulnerable, and how can Canadians in general be expected to trust politicians?

An Hon. Member: Fewer than 20 per cent are in favour of the GST.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): You are down to 17 per cent in the polls.

Mr. Côté: Mr. Speaker, just listen to the opposition's violent response to whatever we have to say, and we have a right to say it, Mr. Speaker.

In two or three years, when election time comes around again—and I would advise you, my opposition friends, to listen to what I have to say.

An Hon. Member: Good for you, Yvon!

Mr. Côté: When election time comes around again, in two or three years, I am convinced that once again, the vast majority of Canadians will put their trust in a government that has acted responsibly, that had the courage to do what is necessary, what others before us failed to do, thus leaving us with this deficit and this national debt.

• (1230)

Mr. Speaker, as long as politicians base their decisions on partisan and purely political considerations, we will have governments that are not responsible, that are powerless, and we should not be surprised at the kind of legacy such governments leave to the electorate they claim to represent and whose well-being they claim to defend. I repeat, in two or three years, we—when I say we, I mean Canadians, except for the opposition—will appreciate the competence and courage of this government.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 12.31 o'clock p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) have expired.

Accordingly, under the terms of the Standing Order, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in opposition to recent budget cuts to various social and educational programs. This government has cut important programs for our aging veterans, is diminishing our native people's ability to communicate with themselves and others, has cut women's programs which provide support for battered and sexually assaulted women and for jobless, illiterate and homeless women in Canada.

Furthermore, this government has cut important educational programs and, in particular, has cut funding to the summer group exchange program. This program has permitted students to learn English and French through exchanges between Quebec and Ontario.

I wonder, with others, why this government cut funding to a program which promotes bilingualism, tolerance and understanding among our young Canadians. This year, because of government cut-backs, 18 school boards were forced to drop the program eliminating the participation of over 800 students.

At a time when relations between English and French speaking Canadians are strained, we are seeing an assault by this government on a program which promotes greater understanding, tolerance and acceptance.

The Commissioner of Official Languages this week accused the government of failing to take the necessary measures to promote the intent of our Official Languages Act. I ask the government to accept the just criticism and, as a first step, reinstate the necessary funding to promote student official language exchanges.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, we are all aware of the need to take steps to improve our environment and to protect the natural beauty of this country for future generations.

The creation of the Rouge River Valley system is an important victory that will preserve 10,500 acres of river valley in close proximity to Canada's largest city. This victory was only achieved after decades of effort by many people and all levels of government.

When we look at this triumph, we can see the tremendous effort we all must be willing to put forth over the next years if we are to make real progress in solving our environmental problems.

In this effort, I wish to acknowledge the member for Scarborough Centre who worked tirelessly to bring about real solutions to this difficult environmental problem.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this government appears determined to force Canadians to swallow the goods and services tax, despite the obvious negative effects it would have on the health of our economy, despite protests from all sides, and despite the general feeling that it is a rotten tax.

This exercise of having the GST rammed down our throats has left a lot of us feeling pretty sick. In fact, even some Conservative members of the House are showing signs of nausea. At the same time, we have heard that any Tory member who misses the final GST vote will be asked to produce a note from his or her doctor. In other words, they are going to be dragging themselves here even if they are at death's door.

As someone who cares sincerely about my colleagues, I am urging hon. members to play it safe. If you are feeling too disgusted to vote for the GST, I am sure that we can come up with a doctor's note to get you off the hook.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the federal government in one year has cut back its commitment to agriculture by 57 per cent, a drop of $1.8 billion.

The Ontario soybean growers report that current prices are 14 per cent below the five-year average, 25 per cent below that of a year ago, and that several areas were hit hard by drought and excessive moisture last year. Likewise, the Ontario corn producers marketing people note that the yields from last year are down 30 per cent to 60 per cent due to continued drought across 13 counties, and that the Niagara—Haldimand area and Essex were critically damaged due to excessive moisture last spring. The income of corn producers in Ontario is currently only 28 per cent of pre–1985 levels.

Although grain and oilseed producers in Ontario are encouraged that the government has finally made an announcement of possible aid, the "if" factor of the government's proposal has left them vulnerable and does not address immediate planting problems.

To date, there has been no indication of how much assistance has been earmarked for Ontario or what mechanisms will be used to determine levels or the nature of that assistance. These critical questions need answers immediately from the government.

The time for stalling is over. Canada's producers need a firm commitment rather than one that makes them pawns for the cynical hard ball tactics of the federal government against the provinces.

WORLD HEALTH DAY

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, Canada celebrates on Saturday, April 7, World Health Day, which has for its theme "Your Health and the Environment" and for its slogan "Think Globally and Act Locally".

About 1,000 to 2,500 children under the age of five years in developing countries die every hour from diarrhoeal disease caused by lack of safe water. About one million people are poisoned each year from contact with pesticides of whom between 5,000 and 20,000 die.

Indeed, environmental problems are now the world's major causes of diseases, death and dislocation. Industry poses the danger of chemical contamination and toxic waste. Burning fossil fuels causes the greenhouse effect.

Destruction of the environment by creating deserts and raising the level of the sea will force people to move from their homes.

This year's theme challenges all concerned to embark on an awareness program to highlight the measures citizens and countries must take to stop further damage to our planet and to spotlight the viable options for sustainable development.

As parliamentarians, let us accept the political prescription: the challenge to us to act locally in matters of health and the environment is great; the challenge to us to think globally when we act locally is greater.

"No man is an island, entire of itself", wrote the 17th century poet, John Donne. As we celebrate World Health Day, let us recall and live his message.

LABOUR

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as members will know, the task force report of the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre was released this past Monday.

The report highlights that Canada's future economic growth and prosperity will increasingly depend on a highly skilled and adaptive labour force. Yet, to meet the demands of an evolving work environment, Canada needs a new attitude and approach to training our labour force. Our current national training effort sorely lags behind that of our major competitors.

It is imperative that our government show leadership in this respect. We must work with the provinces as well as with business and labour to realize the fundamental recommendations of the CLMPC report.

Through a new institutional framework, policies and programs, we can help Canadians adapt effectively to the changes in occupational and skills requirements which they will face in the future.

I urge the members of this House, and indeed all Canadians, to read the CLMPC report. Many of the recommendations demonstrate the urgency and vitality of an effective and comprehensive skills training strategy for our future economic well–being.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, details of the government's long awaited relief package for the Atlantic fishery are trickling out. In what we have seen so far, there is no mention of any plan to upgrade the role of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in any of the areas where there should be, one of which relates directly to seafood marketing.

Had this government not directed the department in 1986 to relinquish its traditional leading role in marketing, Atlantic fishermen might be in a better position to harvest profitably the hundreds of thousands of tonnes of fish currently allocated to foreign boats as underutilized species. Instead, we now see groundfish plants closing because they are dependent on traditional stocks.

This is a question of taking responsibility. The government does not dispute the fact that this crisis is a result of its poor scientific analysis. In order to ensure that as many fishermen and plants as possible can stay in the fishery until the stocks recover, the government must also take the responsibility for helping hard pressed Atlantic Canadians diversify their seafood product lines and establish new markets.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we witnessed the Prime Minister of this country flying all the way to Alberta, without passport, to urge MPs in Alberta to support the GST. The Prime Minister's advice was not heeded by a significant number of Tories. I am urging members in this House to consider the pitfalls if they go along with that advice.

Just think if they support the government and the GST is passed. Not one of the Liberal candidates running for leadership has said that if they were Prime Minister they would cancel it. What we have is the government urging those western members of Parliament to become part of the kamikaze squad. They will die so that the Liberals can live, and Canadians can't stand it.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at the June 1988 Changing Atmosphere Conference in Toronto, the best scientific minds from around the world concluded that we should globally reduce carbon dioxide pollution by 20 per cent by the year 2005.

Two years later, at a ministerial conference just concluded, the federal energy minister argued that Canada should wait. For what, for whom, and why?

• (1410)

This is another example of indecision and division. On the one hand the environment minister issues a well intentioned but weak discussion paper on the environment saying that if we do not take action soon on global warming, it may be too late. On the other hand the energy minister declines to give leadership on the environment and declares that national restrictions on greenhouse gases are premature.

So far this government's statements on the environment are empty words. What a sham.

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Earlier this year, Mr. Speaker, Alitalia Airlines appeared no longer interested in the Rome–Montreal air connection and was even planning to vacate its Montreal head office.

Following this announcement, representatives and travel agents within the Italian community decided to take up this challenge.

An Urgence Pro–Alitalia committee was formed and I personally travelled twice to Rome, together with a delegation, to meet the top Alitalia executives.

It is clear, in the present circumstances that the new Alitalia officials do not realize the importance of Quebec as a reliable, constant and cost–effective market.

After listening to our representations, the Alitalia executives reverse their decision; they will maintain, for the time being, the Montreal–Rome air connection.

We have won a battle granted but not the war!

Alitalia Airlines will surely try again, because it wants more flexibility on the new bilateral agreement which is to be negotiated within a couple of weeks.

I have told the Ministers of Transport that we should accept a new and more flexible agreement, provided we are not penalizing Quebec, Montreal and Mirabel, and certainly not the Italian community which I represent.

FORESTRY AGREEMENTS

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to continue in its efforts to renegotiate the lapsed forestry agreements between the federal government and the provinces.

In recognition of the importance of this issue, I would like to advise that there was a unanimous recommendation from the forestry subcommittee that we in the strongest terms express to the minister our continued support for his efforts to renegotiate this agreement. It would be unthinkable if our provinces were in any way to allow these programs that are so valuable to our environment as well as our economy to lapse.

The minister has our support. I ask him to get those agreements.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, during the past 24 hours I have heard protestations of anguish from members opposite about the government's use of time allocation to conclude the debate on the GST bill.

At the same time, the unelected Liberal majority in the Senate is endlessly delaying Bill C–21, thereby costing unemployed Canadians thousands of dollars that they need and deserve.

Now we have the member for LaSalle—Émard, in his quest for the leadership, calling on the Senate to ignore the will of the democratically elected House by blocking the GST bill.

Meanwhile, the little guy from Shawinigan does not like the GST, but he would not scrap it.

This morning on CTV, Senator Kirby said the Senate should hear from those Canadians not heard by the finance committee. Yet, the Senate committee on Bill C–21 heard 54 of the same witnesses as had been heard by the legislative committee of this House.

The Liberals may be confusing themselves. They are not fooling Canadians. That is why this party is in power, and that is why this government will be re–elected.

PROGRAM FOR OLDER WORKERS ADJUSTMENT

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on an efficient government.

The reason I rise today in this House is to remind Hon. Members that last week, within the context of a federal–provincial initiative, the Federal Government showed leadership by entrusting the private sector with the management of the Program for Older Worker Adjustment through the awarding of several contracts for the purchase of life annuities.

The purpose of this program is to provide a regular and steady income to working men and women between the age of 55 and 64 who permanently lose their jobs as a result of mass lay–offs.

Mr. Speaker, it took only nine months from the time the legislation was passed to the time the first cheques were issued.

By having the private sector look after the management of the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, the Government did not have to set up a new bureaucracy thus saving additional costs which would have been spread over a couple of years.

I wish to congratulate the Federal Government for its leadership in this area, and especially Hon. Jean Corbeil, the Minister of Labour, in charge of this project to assist Canadian men and women who have contributed so much to our Canadian society.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, last night the Prime Minister went to Alberta to soft sell the GST. It is obvious that Albertans are not going to be flattered into supporting it.

As the final vote for the GST approaches, we see how Alberta MPs are being strong armed. Albertans are against this GST and do not appreciate the chief government Whip bullying them into line, to oppose the wishes of the democratic majority. We see that two members have already been threatened. We know that other members are being bribed to vote for the GST or risk losing precious lifetime pensions.

By not appointing Mr. Waters to the Senate, by stifling debate on the GST, by imposing it on Albertans against the wishes of 80 per cent of the people, and by the chief Whip suggesting an increase now of $7,000 on their tax-free allowances in times of fiscal restraint to buy anti-GST MPs, this government and the Alberta MPs are doing little to endear themselves to the electorate.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in Winnipeg this weekend Jean Chrétien continued not to support the fight against the GST. He is refusing to say what he would do if he were the Prime Minister of this country.

We saw the effect of Mr. Chrétien's wavering. This afternoon, only 110 Conservatives showed up to vote for the time allocation motion. They won that by 43 votes and 48 Liberals did not show up to vote against the government. If those Liberals had shown up, then Tory MPs would have had to go home at Easter, hear from their constituents and would have voted against the GST.

As a public service, I wish to give out Mr. Chrétien's campaign number so people can protest the lack of voting by the Liberal caucus. In Winnipeg, the number is area code 204-944-0267, in Vancouver, area code 604-684-8492, and in Montreal, area code 514-844-1990.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

We have learned in recent days that some government members are having trouble representing the concerns of their constituents against the goods and services tax because of the strong arm tactics of the Conservative Whip.

Will the acting Prime Minister allow all government members, including those who have these concerns, to vote freely on this legislation? Will he allow a free vote on the goods and services tax?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member well knows that this government regards this major economic measure, as governments of which he was a part in the distant past regarded major economic measures, as a question of confidence.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the acting Prime Minister.

The report of the special committee on the reform of the House of Commons, the McGrath report, states:

> —government members should be able, without fear of retribution, to amend or defeat clauses in bills; make amendments to bills implementing ways and means legislation;—and reject proposed legislation outright.

Speaking in this House, the Prime Minister said:

> I was proud to be able to appoint this committee and, as Prime Minister, I endorse all its recommendations.

Given that the Prime Minister himself has endorsed the right of government members to vote without fear of retribution and even oppose government legislation, why won't the government announce today that it will allow a free vote of its members on the goods and services tax legislation?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition takes considerable liberties with the McGrath report and indeed with the traditions of Parliament which he well understands in regard to questions of confidence.

He will also remember that when his former colleague, the former member of Parliament for Westmount, had serious disagreements with a matter of fundamental policy in that party, he found it within himself to act in an honourable way and to dissociate himself from the Liberal Party caucus. That is the tradition of this place.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I quoted the McGrath report verbatim, and I also used the Prime Minister's exact words in support of this report. So I am surprised that the Acting Prime Minister continues to refuse to allow a free vote on the GST, even after he was reminded that the Prime Minister had spoken in favour of the right of government members to vote freely without fear of retribution.

So I ask the Acting Prime Minister: Will there be a free vote on the GST Bill, and if not, why? Mr. Speaker, there is no real reason, according to what the Prime Minister said.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, according to what the Prime Minister said and in keeping with parliamentary tradition, budgetary or economic questions that are of prime importance, or questions on motions presented by the opposition on allotted days are always questions of confidence. It is a well-established principle, accepted by the McGrath Commission. The Leader of the Opposition should stop trying to rewrite history.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Rumours are circulating that the aid package for the Atlantic fishery is a paltry $500 million.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rompkey: That is true. I see the front-benchers laughing. The same front-benchers who provided $21 billion for farm aid out west, I see them laughing.

Can the parliamentary secretary confirm that the aid package for Atlantic Canada is more than the paltry $500 million, and in line with the promise of the Prime Minister to be generous and in line with the offer to western farmers? Can he guarantee that?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, first, I can guarantee my hon. friend that the aid package for the Atlantic fishery will be designed, be prepared and be presented to ensure that the needs of the Atlantic Canadian fishery are addressed and that the needs of the people who depend on the Atlantic Canadian fishery are addressed.

The amount of money is not what guides this government. It is the concern for and understanding of the fishery that will guide the policy of this government.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, if the government would put its money where its mouth is, it would be fine because all it has offered so far is $130 million to move people to Toronto.

Will the parliamentary secretary guarantee that the government will live up to the promise of the Prime Minister for a generous settlement, which is far in excess of $500 million?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the mere $130 million is designed to address the immediate needs of the people in the communities of the Atlantic provinces who have been hurt by the problems that we all acknowledge we face in the fishery.

We have provided not only unemployment insurance, training, mobility, but community funds as well, so that the communities of Atlantic Canada can put together responses in which all of us can participate to address community based solutions for the problems in Atlantic Canada and that we know there is a future for communities in all our provinces. I think that is the wish of all members.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance keeps on saying that his tax will not hurt low- and middle-income people. We all know that it is not going to be so. Not only is the GST credit inadequate, but we just learned that the provinces could consider it as income and tax it. That would be the case in Quebec.

Can the minister confirm that this is what will happen?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm very clearly that if the province of Quebec or any province treats this as taxable income, we would look to my hon. friend as well as to all members of the House of Commons to roundly criticize that approach by the provinces and try to ensure that there is not an attempt by any province to try to take a credit provided by the Government of Canada to offset the impact of the GST on low income earners. I would hope my hon. friend would support us strongly on that.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. I take it the Minister of Finance is promising to this House that he will take strong action and comments, if provinces do undertake to tax the credit.

The Minister of Finance said in the 1987 budget that profitable corporations should pay their share of taxes. By the end of that year, there was $27 billion in untaxed corporate profits, most of that in the hands of businesses that made over $100 million a year.

Will the government start undertaking to tax large corporations for new tax revenue rather than poor and middle income Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those half-truths that the hon. member puts forward.

She talks about the 1987 budget, but she neglects to say that within four months of that budget we brought down a White Paper on tax reform, one of the principal elements of which was to remove a number of the loopholes that corporations were using to reduce their tax liabilities. The statistics that she and her colleague from Yorkton—Melville use are 1987 statistics, before the corporate income tax reforms took place.

Let me give her two examples of what has happened since then. This year the chartered banks which were paying no tax at that time will be paying about $700 million or $800 million worth of tax. At that time there was no large corporations tax. Now we have a large corporations tax that will raise in excess of $1 billion.

These are two examples of how this government has introduced fair taxation to ensure that corporations will be paying their fair share of taxes.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, 145 corporations with profits over $100 million each still remain tax-free and are able to write off 100 per cent of their interest costs. Meanwhile, consumers, small businesses and farmers face the goods and services tax that the minister is proposing, and today again an increasingly rising interest rate.

Will the minister now lower interest rates and scrap the GST?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those facile approaches that the NDP periodically talks about where we snap our fingers and we get interest rates down.

If she were honest with herself, she would know that that is not possible. She would know that there is a good deal of inflation in the economy today. There is a good deal of strength in the economy today which is leading to those high interest rates. She knows that if the Governor of the Bank of Canada just suddenly dropped the rates, as she would have him do, we would have a financial crisis on our hands.

That simply is not the way to look after interest rate policy. It is not the approach to monetary policy that we are going to follow as a government, because we are committed to getting inflation down and doing so on a permanent basis so that we can get interest rates down on a permanent basis, which will lead to an ongoing healthier economy.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the House will want to join with me in extending our condolences to the bereaved family of Captain Pierre Trottier of Princeville, Quebec—the pilot killed in yesterday's crash of a Canadian Forces CF-18.

I have a question for the Minister of National Defence relating to the several crashes of CF-18 fighter aircraft. Canadians have a right to know the problems surrounding these crashes. Will the minister undertake to make all reports public on the crashes to date and will he refer these reports to a special commission or public board of inquiry charged with bringing in corrective measures?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I know all members of the House join in the sorrow felt by the wife and family of Captain Trottier in the tragic incident of yesterday.

As the hon. member may be aware, since 1982 there have been nine crashes of CF-18s serious enough where the plane has been written off. These have involved six fatalities. Investigations have been completed in three of these instances and from the information I have, in none of those instances does it appear as though the fault was that of the airplane.

The policy of the department has not been to automatically release the investigation results in such circumstances, although the information is available under access to information.

My colleague, the minister, and I, and senior officials are reviewing this policy and look forward to bringing in policy which may be more responsive while at the same time ensuring the integrity of the investigations and the privacy of those who may be involved.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the CF-18 is a highly technical piece of equipment. Why does the minister's department not allocate more training hours for pilots who are given the responsibility of operating these very sensitive and sophisticated aircraft?

Why would the government want to skimp on training and orientation and risk the lives of highly skilled professionals, to say nothing of the financial investment lost to the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should be aware that our pilots who fly the CF-18s are highly skilled pilots. They practise on a continuing basis and receive what I think is outstanding training.

There is a requirement for a number of hours to be flown before they can go into a CF-18. There are many hundreds of hours flown each year by each one of our pilots. I believe that they are in fact the best trained within our NATO allies and our incident ratio would reflect that sophistication and that professionalism of our pilots.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the race is on now for foreign nations to buy Canadian fishing licences to fish inside of our 200-mile zone, just in case this government gets some starch in its backbone and decides to restrict foreign fishing inside our 200-mile zone as the Harris report has suggested. There are 32 foreign factory-freezer trawler licences issued so far for fishing activity that does not take place until the fall.

My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does he realize that Canadian fishermen and Canadian fish plant workers understand that they have to cut back and suffer in order to save our fish stocks but they cannot understand for the life of them why the Government of Canada is issuing licences to foreign countries to fish cod, redfish, turbot and capelin, the very fish that we must conserve? Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs act now and put an end to this run on Canadian fishing licences by foreign countries?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suppose if one were interested simply in making dramatic statements on the floor of the House of Commons instead of trying to deal with a fundamental and serious problem, one would establish a policy of an all out attack on foreigners in any form, foreign fishermen or others.

The hon. member knows that the practices to which he is referring have to do with obligations that Canada has as a member of the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization. He will know that there are difficulties now with regard to the degree to which the European Community will respect NAFO quotas. He will know that for us to take the action that he is recommending would mean, in effect, our withdrawal from the NAFO regime.

It would also mean that the efforts that are being undertaken today by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, and my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, to try to use the rules and context of NATO to get more respect for our rights under that international regime would be undercut and Canadian interests, including the interests of Canadian fishermen, would suffer dramatically.

He knows that and he should stop trying to make dramatic headlines on the floor of the House of Commons at the expense of the Canadian fishing industry.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning, while MPs were attending caucus, five licences were issued, four to Moscow and one to Havana, to catch 12,265 tonnes of fish in the northern codstock zone, including redfish and a by-catch of cod and turbot on the Labrador coast, enough to keep a Canadian fish plant going for an entire year.

Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs realize that the Moscow licences permit 1,000 tonnes of northern cod as a by-catch and three million pounds of redfish in 2-J and 3-K, the very fish in the very zone in which we have to cut back? The fishermen want to know what Moscow and Havana have that Fogo, Twillingate and Moreton's Harbour do not have. This is the Canadian government, not the United Nations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is also not the OK Corral.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): This is a country which, under Liberal governments and Conservative governments, has sought to live by and to enlarge the ambit of international law and international understanding.

I do know about the implications of Soviet fishing here. I do know that for the first time ever the U.S.S.R. has agreed to deliver in 1990 their by-catches for processing at Canadian fish plants.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I do know that the U.S.S.R. presence in Canadian water also provides us with about $13 million worth of economic benefits. I think it is more in the interests of Canada to take advantage of those real benefits than to try to score points by attacking Cuba or Moscow.

ARMED FORCES ADVERTISING

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Associate Minister of National Defence who has condemned her department for its offensive, stereotyped, portrayal of women.

I have two more examples so outrageous that they must represent a deliberate rejection of the federal guidelines. One ad of the Canadian Armed Forces portrays an Afro-Canadian, dressed in civilian clothing, acting as a chauffeur for three white soldiers, including one woman. Another portrays an oriental, dressed as a chef, operating a radio among three uniformed soldiers.

Is that the level of participation that is expected of visible minorities in the Canadian Armed Forces? Is it that their positions should be subservient? Will the minister act to discipline those responsible and bring a halt to it?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member I think already knows, when these ads were brought to my attention I was very annoyed with them, as I am sure he can imagine. They have been cancelled and we have put in place new measures to ensure that in future such advertising will be reviewed at a higher level to give a broader perspective on such advertising.

• (1440)

I would like to say as well that the purpose of the advertising campaign was to show that anyone in Canadian society could be interested in a career as a part-time reservist in the militia, and to show that women and minority groups form part of our reserves. Obviously the method that was used to try to portray that was inappropriate. It has been stopped and I will ensure that it does not happen again.

FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): My supplementary question is for the Secretary of State. Once again this government has shown its contempt for women. The minister's office has confirmed that regional offices across the country have been told to hire private security guards to protect them from peaceful women's demonstrations.

Will the minister explain to the women of Canada why there is enough money in the Secretary of State budget for rent-a-cops but not enough to keep the doors of women's centres open.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, on the one hand, there is a need to protect the confidentiality and to allow the staff to continue to serve the numerous client groups which recognize how well we have been serving them through the years. On the other hand, we would want it recognized very clearly that while core funding has been discontinued as a consequence of the budget, and we all understand that there were some difficult decisions made, we do have project funding with flexible criteria that are being applied.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Jan Carnogursky, Deputy Prime Minister of the Czecho-Slovak Federative Republic.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Bronius Kuzmickas, Vice-President of the Parliament of Lithuania.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S CENTRES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. It is well known that core funding for women's centres is a provincial responsibility but in some provinces, like my own, the province does not participate. Consequently the budgetary decision to cut core funding for women's centres has left centres such as the Second Storey Centre in Bridgewater in the lurch.

What measures is the minister prepared to take to ensure that women's centres which are providing valuable, important and essential services for Nova Scotians do not have to close their doors?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I indeed have recognized the importance of the women's centres and have also indicated the important role they are playing and will continue to play in our community. The program funding is available and I have encouraged groups to start completing applications which we said we would fast track and even help to complete.

I might say that the Second Story Women's Centre in Bridgewater did complete an application, and submitted it on Tuesday. It was approved yesterday and the cheque will be ready today.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment and concerns the need for an environmental assessment of the construction plans for a coal-fired power station at Point Aconi, Nova Scotia.

The Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans both said no to a similar request for the Oldman River Dam, and the courts told them they were wrong.

This time, will the Minister order a public environmental investigation so that the project can then proceed without damage to the environment and without the chance that it might be stoped half-way, wasting several million dollars?

Will the Minister finally decide to protect the environment?

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the very significant Oldman River dam decision, Environment Canada officials are very closely investigating a number of projects which are under way or have been proposed in recent months. As a result of those preliminary investigations it does appear as if the EARP process might well apply to the Point Aconi project because of possible fishery impact. But it is too soon at this time to give a definitive answer.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is over three weeks since the Oldman River dam decision, when the courts clearly told the government what its responsibility is. What is there to question when tonnes of carbon dioxide will be going into the atmosphere? The government likes to brag about conferences, protocols and leadership, but when it comes to action, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is waiting for someone else to go first.

The world's climate cannot wait for this "after you, Alphonse" routine. Will the Minister stop side-stepping his legal and moral responsibilities and get on with an environmental assessment immediately? What more thought is needed?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has indicated, the decision with respect to the Oldman came down about three weeks ago. That decision, of course, was contrary to an earlier decision of the Federal Court.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, as most hon. members know, the province of Alberta has given indication of its intent to apply for leave to the Supreme Court to appeal. In the meantime, departmental officials in conjunction with other related departments, as I have already said, have been very closely investigating not only how we should respond to the Oldman, which I think is an appropriate deliberation on our part, but how we should also respond to each and every other project which has been proposed within the country that might have implications for the federal government.

We are doing that and those decisions will be announced in due course.

ENERGY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister was quoted last week as saying he would take steps to protect the environment but only if they were, in his words, "doable".

There are many alternative energy conservation measures which help the environment which have proven effective in Canada, Japan and Europe.

Why does his government continue to cut back on alternative energy and conservation programs?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I find it interesting that the hon. member would suggest that as a society we can only do those things that are doable within the balance that has to be made, which is the environmental considerations as well as economics.

I think we must keep in mind that development is part of that phrase, "sustainable development".

We had a task force study since 1988, following the Toronto conference, looking at CO_2 emissions. The task force study clearly pointed out for example, that we could not meet that 20 per cent target if we also factored in growth. That task force report was released.

I have said as well that according to the best studies we have, energy efficiency, which has to become part of the action plan of the Department of the Environment, and we are working with that department, can reduce CO_2.

Our best projections at the present time are about 2 or 3 per cent of the 20 per cent that could be met through that way.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. Alternative energy and conservation programs are very popular with Canadians. They protect the environment and they must be given a higher priority than this government has been giving them.

Why does the minister not listen to Canadians when it is clear that they want more, not less money spent on alternative energy and conservation?

• (1450)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I already pointed out that an energy efficiency program will be incorporated into the environmental action plan. I will not hesitate to say to the hon. member again that I will not spend money and I am not spending money on the kind of programs that came out of the National Energy Program where there was money spent but very little return in terms of either alternate energy or reduction of CO_2. That is why we are changing that policy.

I also point out to the hon. member that if one takes a look at alternate energy, for example in her own province of Prince Edward Island, there is a program relating to biomass and the commercialization which we have done.

Second, in Alberta, the MDIP program, $28 million, for instance to convert to natural gas and motive fuels, or in British Columbia, for two-cycle engines for highway transport trucks or transit buses, which we are doing in Vancouver, or rapid fueling for example where we can now fuel a bus in four or five minutes. There is the home demonstration demonstration project where a person can—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has a lot of examples.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the acting Minister of Agriculture. Agriculture Canada predicts that farm income across the prairies will drop by some 63 per cent this year. At the same time it states that this government's support for agriculture will be cut by 57 per cent.

Given the fact that 25 per cent of farming families are in some stage of bankruptcy, that spring seeding is about to commence, and given the fact that the new federal agricultural program is nothing more than a carrot that is being dangled in front of farmers and provincial governments, will this government make a real commitment to agriculture this year, or is it simply admitting that farming families in rural communities have been cut off, written off and forgotten by this government?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is no way we are writing off the farmers. I think that the farmers realize that we are there with them and will stand with them through the difficulties they have had.

As was mentioned in an earlier question about the $21 billion that had been sent to farmers in the past few years, we are there again. We offered a package of $500 million last week to be matched by the provinces. We will stand firm with that. I believe the farmers of this country will respond and do well this year.

I have to mention as well that last November or December, predictions were made about the farm income. Since that time new projections have increased farm income for 1990 by around $200 million. The seed has not been taken out of the bins yet, is not in the ground, and there are all kinds of opportunities for those things to change before this year is out.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue. A U.S. barge company has announced plans to ship dangerous chemicals from Detroit to Windsor. Will the minister confirm that in fact his ministry is not prepared to make a decision to provide customs officers to this proposal and is he also prepared to make a commitment that no such decision will be taken until such time as the environmental concerns that have been raised by the city of Windsor are fully dealt with?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that there have been discussions with BTI Barge Operations in Windsor for the possibility of the transportation of goods between Detroit and Windsor. But I want to assure the hon. member and all members of this House of Commons that absolutely no approval will be even considered unless and until all approvals are accepted and run through health, safety and environmental concerns. In other words, every element of health, every element of safety, and every element of the environment must be satisfied even before consideration will be given to the issuance of a licence.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. I would like to get back to the regulations of the Official Languages Act. Once the regulations are tabled, they will of course have to be considered by this House or by a committee of the House, before they are published in the Canada Gazette, a process that will probably take several months from the date of tabling. Since this government has abdicated its leadership and is aggravating the language crisis through its failure to act, I want to ask the Minister whether its inaction is caused by the fact that the government is afraid explain to Canadians how the new legislation will be implemented. Is the Government really afraid to explain to Canadians how the Official Languages Act will be enforced in Canada?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I told the hon. member during our last two question periods, we simply want to observe the letter and the intent of Bill C–72, which requires consultation with all language groups in this country, and that is why we need this period of time before the regulations are tabled. A few consultations have yet to take place, and subsequently, the government will table the regulations and follow the procedure provided under Bill C–72.

[English]

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Canada's major official language groups told us that the consultation process had been finished last Christmas. The Commissioner of Official Languages also expected that process to have terminated last Christmas. I am following the promise made by the minister last year that we would, indeed, have these regulations by Christmas.

After close to two years of negotiations, either the President of the Treasury Board is the all–time expert in delaying tactics or simply a bad negotiator, which I do not believe he is.

Will he now admit that his round of consultation is a sham set up to kill time? Indeed, why is the government taking all this time? The consultations are over. Why are we not given the regulations as agreed?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, first the hon. member should note that consultations began early fall, last September as a matter of fact, following the period that was required to draw up a draft set of regulations. We went through the consultations with minority groups throughout the country from coast to coast. Those were completed in late fall.

Obviously, if we are going to consult, it presumes that we are going to listen. If we listen, it presumes that we make some changes. Following that, some of the groups asked for a second round. Not all of the groups, but some of the groups asked that we consult with them when the new draft regulations were completed. That is what we are prepared to do. As soon as that is completed, we will table the regulations in this House and follow the process set out by Bill C–72. We are following the wishes of this House.

HOUSING

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing. A Winnipeg contractor has been on a hunger strike for eight days. The contractor, Helmut Klug, is locked in a dispute with the federal government stemming from a housing project on a northern Manitoba Indian reserve. In short, Mr. Klug built some 40 houses and he has not been fully paid. Given the gravity of the situation, I want to ask the minister whether he is now prepared to settle this issue once and for all.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, the contractor, Mr. Klug, referred to by the hon. member, has contracted with an Indian band. The federal government is involved in a peripheral way through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The contracts involve not only housing, but also include contracts for projects for a sewing factory, medical centre, a band office and other things. The matter is currently under discussion with federal government officials, discussing the matter with Mr. Klug.

I might say as well that the matter is presently before the courts.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, the situation has dragged on far too long. I cannot imagine what the government is concerned about. Now we have a situation where a man's health is at risk, and perhaps his life.

Is the minister prepared to ask for a review of this matter and to find a solution that is fair to all parties involved?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, the matter has been under review for a considerable length of time. The matter is before the courts presently, and there are discussions going on between Mr. Klug and government officials at the present time.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare responded to questions regarding the safety of the Meme breast implant, about which serious questions have been raised, he twice said:

> Statistics show that the failure rate among the Meme breast implants is considerably lower than among every other silicone breast implant.

As a recovered breast cancer victim and patient who has had a silicone implant, I want to ask the minister on behalf of the one in ten Canadian women who will face breast cancer and possibly face the very difficult choice of having a breast implant, could he please tell us definitively that silicone breast implants are safe?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when Dr. Carolyn Kerrigan did a study for the department last year, one of the things she said was this:

> There is an urgent need for controlled experimental studies of breast implants to address countless issues regarding their usage. Mandatory information concerning implant composition, degradation, excretion, placement, contracture, infection and others must be determined on a clinically applicable animal model.

The FDA in the United States is doing continuing research with regard to all implants. We are also paying for work to be done in Canada as well.

We will undertake to make every possible effort to ensure that any implant, whether breast implants or other surgical devices, is safe and efficacious before being implanted in Canadians.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, am I to believe then, as a result of the kinds of answers we had yesterday and today, that Canadian women are being used in place of animals for testing implants?

The minister should be aware of the fear he has created by raising and coupling silicone implants with the Meme implant.

He should also be aware that there is a difference between failure and danger. The Meme implant, we are being told, is in fact possibly carcinogenic.

Women who have faced cancer do not need the fear of possibly facing it again as a result of part of the corrective surgery.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that the House understand who is raising these fears, and who is suggesting that there is a danger to Canadian women.

It is not I who is suggesting that. It is her colleague who is sitting directly in front of her.

It was her colleague who held a press conference on Monday in which he gave out information. My department to date in looking at his material has found over 20 instances where that information is incorrect.

I offered to give the hon. gentleman a full briefing where all the questions that he had could be answered. Typically, the hon. member did not ask for it first. We had to offer it to him. He has agreed, finally, to have it. I would even indicate to the hon. member as well that she would be welcome to attend as well.

We are confident in the safety of these devices. Instead of raising concerns among Canadian women, and creating false fears, let us work together to get information. Let us have accurate information. Let us not create false fears among women.

Ms. Langan: Then you should be accurate in the House.

CHEMICAL WEAPONS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Canada cannot afford to remain silent when faced with the threat of proliferation and excessive use of chemical weapons in the world. More specifically, the threats by Iraq against Israel are very disturbing and reflect a situation that Canada cannot condone.

Yesterday, in answer to a question on this topic, the minister's parliamentary secretary said:

—this is a point that I will bring to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because I think the leadership role that Canada can play in this, as the hon. member suggests, is very timely and important and the Government of Canada would like to do that.

Could the minister tell the House today what exactly Canada's role will be?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was able to talk to my parliamentary secretary as soon as I got back from Montreal yesterday, and I also gave our officials certain instructions.

First, we believe that for the time being, it would be more effective for us to pursue the general question within the context of the Geneva talks on chemical weapons, which we are doing now.

I will continue to look at this question, and as soon as we can usefully raise the matter in the UN Security Council, we will do so.

Third, today I have given instructions that Canada's ambassador in Iraq be called to my department so that we can inform him of our concern about the statement by the President of Iraq.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the time for oral question period has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a question, the one the House leader is usually asked on Thursday. I would direct it to the Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House, who is still our Deputy Speaker. I would like to know what is on the government's legislative agenda for the coming days until next Wednesday, when we break for Easter. Could he tell us the government's legislative program?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to tell my hon. friend that tomorrow will be a supply day. On Monday and Tuesday, the government intends to proceed with Bill C-62. As for Wednesday, we will continue our consultations with my hon. friend and the hon. member for Kamloops and we will tell the House once we have reached a decision.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I understand that the Speaker is prepared to hear further points of order relating to the matter brought before the House this Tuesday by the hon. minister—

Mr. Speaker: I should make it very clear that I will hear not further points of order, but further argument. I know the hon. member would want to understand that distinction.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you for correcting me, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, what I want to do is bring a number of further arguments very briefly—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing is raising a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege stemming from the comments made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday in response to my question regarding the Meme breast implant.

In response to my question the minister made two comments which attacked my motives and—

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Traditionally, when a point of privilege is raised we ask that the people involved be here. Unfortunately, we did not have any notice of this particular question of privilege, and I am afraid the Minister of Health is not here. Perhaps it could be set off until we can arrange for his presence.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary raises a point which is customary in this place. I wonder if the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing would extend to his colleague, the minister, that courtesy. Perhaps both the minister and the hon. member could liaise through my office and we could arrange to have the matter heard at the earliest convenience to both the member who has properly filed his notice and to the minister.

Is it agreed?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for not informing the minister. I do not think my office did that and I will be happy to do as Your Honour suggests.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate very much the courtesy the hon. member has extended.

An Hon. Member: The minister is here now.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the minister for not notifying him of my intention to raise this point of privilege, and I appreciate his coming back into the House to address it.

The point arises from comments that the minister made yesterday in response to my question regarding the Meme breast implant. In response to my question the minister made two comments which attacked my motives in raising this issue. In addition, he made statements which were misleading in themselves.

The hon. minister accused me of making false allegations. I hope you will permit me the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to point out why the minister wrongly characterized my statements as being false allegations.

Studies at both the University of Florida and Laval University indicate that the foam covering the implant breaks down within the body producing a carcinogenic compound.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I listened very carefully to the exchange yesterday. In fact I have it in front of me.

The hon. minister said that the allegations made by the member who was questioning him were false. Those statements did not carry with them the suggestion that they were intentionally false or dishonest, that they were wrong or incorrect. That happens very often in exchanges in this House on both sides.

I have to say to the hon. member that unless he has something more serious than that I do not think he can pursue this very far. Certainly, a question of privilege is not a place to get into debate on the relative merits of medical evidence.

I will hear the hon. member further.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate those comments. Of course it is difficult to respond to an accusation of being false without getting into some of the details, but I am happy not to do that.

The minister also accused me of being irresponsible.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. That happens in preambles day after day in this House. The hon. minister may be absolutely wrong, and I am prepared to accept at least prima facie the position of the hon. member that he is not irresponsible, but that is getting into debate. It is not a question of privilege.

I do not think I need to call on the minister.

Mr. Beatty: I would love to respond.

POINT OF ORDER

SENATE AMENDMENTS TO BILL C-21

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I indicated a few minutes ago that I wished to comment briefly on the point of order raised by the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons on Tuesday.

There are two points I would like to raise very briefly in relation to the message from the Senate and the proposed amendments to Bill C-21.

My colleague from Ottawa—Vanier has expressed quite eloquently his opinions as to why the royal recommendation issue is not a valid one to start with, simply because in large measure the amendments proposed by the Senate do not have an impact in the manner in which the minister suggested.

I want to bring one additional point in a somewhat different area of concern. The minister stated in the House as reported at page 10140 of Hansard for April 3, 1990:

> Had these amendments come from a member of this House, I am sure that citation 698(5) of Beauchesne's sixth edition would have been invoked to rule them inadmissible. They are clearly contrary to that principle of the bill.

He said as well that the royal recommendation of Bill C-21 was infringed upon by the decision of the Senate. He also backed up these comments based on Erskine May and Beauchesne and referred to the fact that this was contrary to parliamentary precedents, not only here in Canada but at Westminster as well.

I take exception to those remarks. First, the twenty-first edition of Erskine May states at page 693 the following:

> Unless the recommendation of the Crown enjoined by Standing Order No 46——that is the British Standing Order, of course.

> —has been signified, the Speaker cannot propose the question on a motion which comes within the scope of this standing order. Accordingly, if any motion is offered to be moved which requires but fails to receive the Queen's recommendation, it is the duty of the Chair to announce that no question can be proposed on the motion.

Clearly this means that this issue cannot be voted on by this House without having a royal recommendation or, as it is described in Erskine May, a recommendation from the Crown.

If such a recommendation is required, I would suggest that the recommendation would only have to be included with the bill at the time, or prior to us disposing of the question, not as to whether or not the issue can be presented before the House. In any case, the member for Ottawa—Vanier has spoken on the second issue as to whether the recommendation is necessary to start with.

I want to back this point up further by raising the following with the Chair. I have in hand a copy of a bill presented in the British House of Commons, entitled, The Rights of Way, Agricultural Land Bill. This is a private member's bill, introduced and passed at second reading in the British House of Commons. I am prepared to table this bill with the Chair.

Indeed, the bill does spend public money. It states: "There shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament any increase attributable to the provisions of this act," and so on. This section of the bill is written in italics. I am informed by an officer of the British House of Commons, namely, Mr. William McKay, the Clerk of Journals, that the precedent used in the British House of Commons is that this bill could only be passed at third reading if accompanied by such a royal recommendation.

It does not prevent the introduction of the bill. It does not prevent the bill being debated at second reading, or in committee, oranywhere else,s ave and except the completion of the debate at third reading and then the subsequent taking of the vote.

The minister said earlier that the precedents in both Canada and Britain would stop a private member from proposing an amendment that spends money. Of course a private member cannot initiate a tax. Of course a private member cannot present a budget, and so on. That is well known and not at issue here.

What is at issue is whether or not a bill or an amendment proposed even by a private member of this House could be dealt with by this House if it has as an incidence, rather than a cause, the expenditure of certain funds.

Clearly, the precedents that the minister has used to back up his argument are wrong. I have proven it here, I believe, with this private members' bill, which I will table with the Clerk or present to the Speaker, if he wants a copy of it.

Therefore, what the minister has invoked is inappropriate in my view.

Second, and I do not intend to repeat the comments of my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, a clear case has not been made anyhow as to whether a royal recommendation would be necessary to start with. Even if it were, I suggest that that in itself should not be grounds for the House denying consideration of these amendments offered to us by the Senate.

It could be that in its final judgment the government will decide that it does not wish to provide such an accompanying royal recommendation if, again, one is required, which has not been established. If it decides that, that is its prerogative. The government can state that, if it is its wish, but it should not state that it is contrary to the rules for the Senate to at least present its case before this Parliament.

Those are the few points that I wanted to make. I hope that the Chair will consider this argument, as well as the one which has been presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I am sure other comments will be brought to the attention of the Chair by other hon. members this afternoon.

In summary, I do not think that the government has so far presented the Chair with a case which would lead the Chair to conclude otherwise than that these amendments are perfectly in order and can be considered by the House. If the House later decides to defeat the amendments, then the House can deal with the fact that perhaps it will get no legislation at all. That is for the House to decide. In any case that should not prevent us from at least considering the amendments proposed to us by our colleagues in the other place.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: If I may assist hon. members, I will hear the rest of the argument from the Official Opposition. I will hear the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, then I will move to my hon. colleague who I know is going to present some wrap-up arguments for the New Democratic Party in the absence of the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I also indicate that I would like to add at some point five or six minutes' worth of comments.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps in carrying on in the usual tradition, I could call on the parliamentary secretary after arguments are completed.

Mr. Gauthier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice yesterday that I wanted to add some brief comments.

Mr. Cooper: Again?

Mr. Gauthier: No more than you will do, but just as many.

Mr. Speaker: I thought yesterday I got the point. I will hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier first.

Mr. Milliken: I think he is prepared to let me go ahead, Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker is much helped by the agreement between colleagues in the Official Opposition. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the points that have been raised by the government House leader. I may say that it has been helpful to have an opportunity to review the comments he made because he referred to so many authorities in his speech the other day. I thought that I was going to have to spend hours reviewing them to find out exactly what point he was—

Mr. Speaker: Despite what the hon. member may have thought, I hope he has managed to adjust his thinking for this afternoon. I am sure the Speaker does not need to hear a commentary on all those authorities.

Mr. Milliken: That is the point of my comments, Mr. Speaker. I think that the member got carried away. I find it hard to believe that he read all the authorities, not because he could not have done so in the time he had available, but because if he had read them, he would not have cited them in support of the arguments he was putting forward, in my view.

There are basically five points I would like to make to Your Honour in connection with the arguments he made. First, there is the question of the point of order. I want to stress the general rule that a point of order in this House must be raised at the earliest possible opportunity. In support of that I rely on citation 321 of Beauchesne's sixth edition, which reads as follows:

> 321. A point of order against procedure must be raised promptly and before the question has passed to a stage at which the objection would be out of place.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, in this case the Senate message rejecting this bill and suggesting amendments to it was sent back to this House.

On March 12 the government moved a motion rejecting certain of the amendments and accepting certain other of the amendments and stating for all the world to read what the government believed were the principles of the bill. I will come to that later.

That resolution was debated for two days in this House. The government invoked closure on March 13, when it was passed and the message was sent back to the Senate.

If the amendments that were proposed by the Senate were out of order at that time, I submit that it was the duty of the leader of the government in this House, to stand on his feet and object to those amendments.

Indeed, being a modest man, I am very reluctant to quote my own words. But on March 13, in the course of my contribution to the debate, I said exactly that. I know

Your Honour will have read these words, but I refer the Chair to page 9247 of Hansard where it states:

> I suggest that any member of this House could have moved any of the amendments that have come down to this House from the Senate. We could have moved them at any stage on this bill, and they would have been in order. The government House leader knows that full well.

And he did. He had a choice. He could have proceeded at that time with his resolution and message to the Senate, or he could have argued before Your Honour that these amendments were out of order and asked Your Honour to kill this bill. Yet he did not do it. He chose to take his chances and move the resolution that he did on March 12 and then force it through the House with his substantial majority on March 13.

It seems to me, having taken that step, it was not open to him, given the rule in Beauchesne that a point of order must be raised promptly and at the earliest opportunity, to raise that point the day before yesterday.

The second point is that in effect the House has already made a decision that in fact these amendments are in order. If they were out of order, they had to be out of order before the House adopted a resolution relating to those amendments. Yet on March 13 I believe the minister himself was here and voting. He voted for this resolution which, admittedly, condemned the amendments, but it accepted certain ones and agreed in principle with certain others. Now he is trying to in effect have his cake and eat it too.

Mr. Cooper: We always do that.

Mr. Milliken: As the parliamentary secretary says, that is the government's continual effort.

That is what happened. There was the minister getting his majority to vote in favour of a resolution to approve certain of these amendments and to deny certain others. Having already voted on this issue the House has made its decision. In so far as this House is concerned, the amendments must be in order. If they were out of order, we should never have had that vote.

If they were out of order, and the House leader believed them to be out of order, and if he believes what he says now—and I invited him to do this on March 13 before the vote—then he had plenty of opportunity to make this argument. He chose to allow the House to come to a decision on those amendments.

Now he says: "Boy, we won the vote in the House. We have lost it in the other place. Now I want the House to in effect do something it should have done before, that is, rule these amendments out of order," for whatever good that is going to do. I will come to that in a moment.

That is the second argument, and I suggest he is wrong on both those counts.

The question that arises is this. What does the government House leader really want Your Honour to do? That is not clear. He gives reasons why he thinks this is a valid point of order. But does he want Your Honour to say that these amendments are out of order and thereby kill this bill? Or does he want Your Honour to say that the Senate cannot do this and send some kind of message to the Senate?

What is the purpose of this point of order? I think with respect, what Your Honour must look at is the situation that has already obtained in this case. The question of the propriety of these amendments, having regard to the Constitution Act, was argued in the Senate. The Speaker of the other place rendered a decision on those arguments.

Hon. Senators representing the government in the other place stood up and argued before the Speaker of the other place that certain of the amendments proposed by the Senate committee that considered Bill C–21 place were out of order—the very ones that the government House Leader now says are out of order.

The members argued the point in the Senate. There was an extended debate. At the conclusion of the debate the Speaker of the Senate handed down a ruling.

What did he say? Did he say those amendments were out of order? He said that two of them were, which is my recollection of that ruling. Those two were struck out. They could not be presented to this House. But he ruled that all the others were in order.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, how ridiculous our Parliament would appear in the eyes of other Parliaments in the Commonwealth if we had the Speaker of one of the Houses saying that these are proper under our Constitution and the Speaker of the other House saying that they are not proper? Surely, the Constitution is the Constitution. Surely, a legal argument is a legal argument. A legal argument won, I would have thought, in one court is therefore a valid legal argument in all courts.

We do have a doctrine of precedents. I realize that Your Honour, the Speaker of the House of Commons, is not bound by decisions of the Speaker in the other place, but surely they have to be given some weight. Surely, when the point has been argued by learned Senators who know what they are talking about, who have sat in this House—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Milliken: My hon. friends opposite would do well to heed the advice of Senator MacEachen from time to time. But that is a matter for them, Mr. Speaker.

Those Senators have served in this House. They know the rules of Parliament. They know the rules of the Constitution. They know the powers under Section 53 of the Constitution. They argued persuasively that these amendments were in order, and I submit that their arguments were correct. The government House leader is trying to bring Parliament into disrepute by having the Houses at odds in so far as rulings from the Chair and interpretations of the Constitution are concerned. I submit that is not the way it ought to be.

• (1530)

I would like to refer Your Honour to what the procedure ought to be in this case. The government House leader should know this, but he is new and perhaps a little lesson or two would be helpful to him.

Mr. Cooper: From a member who has been in this House untold years!

Mr. Milliken: As I say, the government House leader is new in his position. The government House leader may have a proven ability on how to make the Post Office make money, but in terms of making this House operate efficiently the jury is way out.

I want to refer the parliamentary secretary and Your Honour to page 216 of Beauchesne's Sixth Edition. There is a section headed "Intercourse Between the two Houses". I would recommend that the parliamentary secretary and the government House leader look at it, because it refers to the practice of having conferences, free conferences and otherwise.

The position now is that if the government does not like what the other place has done to this bill, it has an obligation. It can come to this House and ask us to establish a conference, appointing members to have a conference with the other place, a meeting of managers, in accordance with the rules. I submit that that is the procedure that should be adopted.

Mr. Speaker: I have been noting very carefully what the hon. member says. There is an arrangement, hallowed by custom, between this place and the other place, but that is not the point the hon. House leader raised.

The point he raised is that one way or another the other place has dealt with this bill in a way which is not appropriate and as a result certain consequences flow. I want to hon. member to confine his remarks to that problem, and I know he would appreciate my suggestion that perhaps he could bring his remarks to a close soon.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, of course I accept your admonition. I was simply, on the way by, seeking to help out my hon. friend.

As reported on page 10143 of Hansard for Tuesday, the House leader indicated he had two reasons for objecting and asking Your Honour to rule these amendments out of order. The two reasons were:

> First, it provides for an alternate scheme to that proposed with the Royal recommendation. Second, it infringes on the financial initiative of the Crown by establishing payment from the CRF which was explicitly withdrawn in the 1989 budget approved by this House.

I would like to deal with those arguments because in my submission they are fallacious. First, I would like to deal with the question of whether or not the Senate amendments upset the principle of this bill. The difficulty the minister faces, I submit, is that Beauchesne's defines principle of a bill, and the government is bound by what is already introduced as part of the principle of a bill. I will come back to that one in a moment.

The government House leader is attempting to rewrite the authorities when he defines principles the way he does. He also did it on March 12 when he wrote into the resolution adopted by this House what the principles of this bill were. If Your Honour looks at page 9098 of Hansard, you will see that three principles were enunciated as being the principles of this bill. I submit they are not evident from reading the bill itself. Indeed it is contrary to Beauchesne's for him to suggest that those are principles of this bill.

The references in Beauchesne's are quite clear. I refer Your Honour to citation 671(4) of Beauchesne's which states:

> An amendment which amounts to no more than a direct negation of the principle of a bill is open to objection.

I submit that these amendments do not in fact change the principle of this bill.

I could cite extensively from Beauchesne. The government House leader referred to several, but I would refer to some others. Citation 698(5) of the sixth edition refers to amendments in committee. It states:

> An amendment which is equivalent to a negative of the bill, or which would reverse the principle of the bill as agreed to at the second reading stage is not admissible.

In other words, Beauchesne's consistently speaks of the principle of the bill, not principles, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that there is a significant difference. The government House leader has argued that somehow this bill has more than one principle and that the Senate, in dealing with these amendments, has changed those principles.

I would refer Your Honour to what constitutes the principle or object of a bill and again Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, citation 689(3), provides an answer. It states:

> The objects (also referred to as the principle or scope) of a bill are stated in its long title, which should cover everything contained in the bill as it was introduced. Amendments, however, are not necessarily limited by the title of the bill.

If Your Honour looks at the title of this bill, you will see that it is an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act. All the amendments proposed by the Senate to this bill affect those very same acts.

In other words, the principle of the bill was a series of amendments to these acts and I submit that the Senate amendments are amendments to the same acts and therefore are within the principle of the bill as defined in Beauchesne's, as defined in the authorities in this House.

I think the government House leader is seeking to rewrite the principles in his resolution and then transpose that argument from March 12 and his resolution of that day to his argument of April 3 on the point of order. I submit that he is not permitted to do that.

The second argument along the same line is whether or not the bill impinges on the royal recommendation. I have already submitted an argument to Your Honour on the necessity for royal recommendations on government bills. I have argued it specifically in relation to a bill arising out of this year's budget and, had I reviewed Bill C-21 with sufficient care before second reading of that bill, I could have argued the same point.

I would like to touch on a simple case. What is the effect of the royal recommendations? Suppose, Mr. Speaker, the government introduced in this House this year a bill to pay Mr. Broadbent a salary of $50,000. Suppose it had to be done by legislation and a bill was introduced that provided for a salary for Mr. Broadbent of $50,000. Would that bill require—

Mr. Speaker: Maybe we could use some other name. This might cause some embarrassment to our former colleague.

Mr. Milliken: I will use Mr. Jones. I was only referring to him because I know he is now working there and no bill was required for that. However, I will go with Mr. Jones.

Mr. Jones is to be paid a salary of $50,000. The government introduces a bill to do it. Is the bill one that requires a Royal recommendation, Your Honour? I think the answer is yes because it provides for a charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Suppose that bill has passed, it has been adopted, it is part of the law, and the government wants to change it. It brings in another bill to reduce Mr. Jones' salary to $25,000. Does that bill require a Royal recommendation? No, it does not. The reason it does not, in my submission, is because it reduces the charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada. There is no increase so it does not need a Royal recommendation and any member of this House, therefore, could introduce such a bill.

Suppose, in the course of consideration of that bill, there was an amendment proposed to increase the salary from $25,000 to $40,000. Would such an amendment require a royal recommendation? No. My submission is that the answer is clearly no, because there is no additional charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund. It would be the same as introducing a bill to reduce it to $40,000. It is simply amending a bill that provides for a reduced charge and staying within the terms of the original royal recommendation.

If the Crown originally recommended a charge of $50,000 as being proper on the Consolidated Revenue Fund, it can hardly balk if this House chooses to ignore that recommendation and fix the charge at some lesser amount because this House controls the purse strings, this House controls how much can go out, subject to the Royal recommendation.

We cannot spend without Royal recommendation, but having got an authorized limit we can reduce that amount. We can fix it at a lower amount. We do not have to agree with the Royal recommendation. We can choose to authorize less. We can choose to pay less. We can choose to tax less. That is the option this House has always had; it has had it for hundreds of years.

I submit that an amendment to increase the salary from $25,000 to $40,000 in the amending bill would be in order. Would it be in order to increase it to $60,000? No, I think it would not. My answer is clearly no, because that would infringe the Royal prerogative. It would increase the charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund to beyond that encompassed in the original Royal recommendation.

It is precisely that argument, which I hope has been clear to the parliamentary secretary, that must apply to this unemployment insurance bill, Bill C–21. The Senate considered this matter carefully in its report No. 9 of the Senate finance committee to which the government House Leader referred Your Honour and to which I invited Your Honour to have regard in my argument the other day on royal recommendations.

The thrust of that report was very clear, that where there is no increase in the charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund it is within the power of the other place, or a private member in this House, to introduce amendments to bills before this House whether or not there is a royal recommendation attached to them.

My whole purpose in arguing that there was no need for a Royal recommendation in respect to the other bill was that these bills provided for a reduction in the charges on the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

It is a very simple argument but it seems to me fundamental, because if the private members of this House are not able to move amendments to these bills which do stay within the scope of the original royal recommendation, I submit that by putting these royal recommendations on the government is saying: "You are not allowed to make any amendments because this bill has a royal recommendation". That is exactly what the government House leader was saying in his argument the other day. As reported on page 10143 of Hansard, he said the following:

> It is the duty of members to protect the the rights and responsibilities accorded to this House, not only by the Constitution Act and our Standing Orders, but by centuries of parliamentary procedure and rulings which have given financial responsibility to the House of Commons.

He suggested that we had to suspend Standing Order 80 and so on in order to deal with these amendments. I suggest that that is just inaccurate and unbelievable. I find it hard to imagine that he would put that argument.

The second last argument I have to make deals with section 53 of the Constitution Act. The act provides, as Your Honour knows, as follows: "Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Commons".

I stress the word "originate", because in his debate on March 12 the government House leader argued that a bill which was amended in the Senate could not be seen as having originated in this House, that somehow the amendments originated in the Senate, and that therefore it was contrary to section 53 of the Constitution Act. I hope I am not misrepresenting his argument, but that is what it seemed to me he was saying.

What I would like to argue is the interpretation of the word "originate" in section 53, because I think the drafters of the legislation chose those words extremely carefully. Many bills can originate in either House. Bills can be introduced in the other place; bills can be introduced in this House. In that sense bills originate in one place or the other.

However, certain bills can only be brought before Parliament in this House because there is an initial step. That initial step has now been abolished under our rules, so we tend to forget what went on, but the initial step for money bills was always a decision of a committee of this House. In other words, every money bill had to be brought before a committee before it could be introduced in the House of Commons.

I ask Your Honour to cast your mind back. Every tax bill had to be introduced in the committee of Ways and Means. Every bill for appropriating money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund had to be introduced in committee of supply, every government money bill which had a royal recommendation attached—and I am using the words "money bill" loosely—and every bill which imposed a charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund but did not grant money out of it, such as the unemployment insurance bill when it was originally introduced, came first through a resolution in committee of the whole.

We have abolished committees of the whole; we have abolished committee of supply; and we have abolished committee of Ways and Means. Before every money bill is introduced—except now under the new procedure, but certainly in Ways and Means and supply—there is a resolution of the House adopted and there is no leave sought in the House to introduce. The bill originates in the House because it comes to the House by a different route. It comes through a committee and then to the House.

That was the standard procedure when the British North America Act was drafted. What we have here is a situation where the framers of the act said that bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing a tax shall originate in the House of Commons. It did not say they shall be introduced in. It said: "They shall originate".

Mr. Speaker: I am listening carefully to the hon. member. I know he would not want to extend his argument more than a moment or two longer.

However, as I understood the hon. minister the other day, basically he is saying that this bill, which admittedly was an amendment to an existing bill—and I do not ask the hon. member to get into an argument about that—cut the funding from the Treasury of Canada to the unemployment insurance fund. In other words, it made the fund self-funding as a consequence of charges, not on the Treasury any more, but charges directly against the employer and the employee.

As I understand the basic thrust of the Senate's response, it was at least in part to put back a responsibility of the Treasury as a guarantor or a partial funding of that fund.

I am taking no position in the argument. It seems to me that this is the nub of it. Is the Senate in this case trying to go beyond the bill, which admittedly was an amendment, and on its own come back here with the suggestion that we should put in place a charge which this House took away?

I know the hon. member will realize that in the interests of other business in this House we cannot continue this too long, but I put that point.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, if we go back to my argument before, if a bill is introduced in this House to reduce Mr. Jones' salary from $50,000 to $25,000, the charge has been reduced. I am suggesting to Your Honour that a private member, I or any member of the opposition, or any back-bench member of the government, could move an amendment to that bill to increase the amount to $40,000. As long as it was within the original amount, then it could be increased.

What I am saying in this case, Your Honour, is that in each of the amendments to which the government House leader objects, the other place has provided for amendments that will increase the amount to something less than they were before, but not more than they were before.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member. I know that he understands the issue here, and so does the Chair.

The question is: Is the Senate in a position where it is increasing a charge that this House has taken away, whether or not the bill to which the amendment applies would allow it? There may be precedents on that exact point and, if there are, I would certainly like to know where they are.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, this House cannot take away charges on the public revenue of its own. Charges on the public revenue are taken away not just by this House, but by Parliament. It requires three steps before charges can be taken away from the public revenue.

• (1550)

Mr. Speaker: I am completely with the hon. member on that. This House, though, initiates a bill to take away the charges. If it goes to the other place and the charges are put back partially or in some form, is that not an initiative of the other place which increases the expenditure that had been considered in this place?

Mr. Milliken: It may increase the expenditure which has been considered in this place, but the original expenditure was authorized by an act of Parliament. In other words, the act of this House, the act of the other place, and the Royal Assent of the Crown. All three of those elements had to combine in order for that expenditure originally to be authorized. I submit that what we are involved in here is not one House in the legislative process but all three elements, and what is required before we can change the order of expenditure authorized by that original bill is another act of Parliament.

The Constitution Act does not give this House the exclusive right to control expenditures. It does provide that bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue must originate in this House. We have a right to deal with them first. Certainly without a Royal recommendation attached to an authorization for spending, it could not be passed by this House. That much is clear from the Constitution. Sections 53 and 54 provide for that.

If this House receives a bill with or without a Royal recommendation that reduces the charge already there, before that reduction can take effect it must receive the assent of the other place and the Royal Assent. Those are the elements that are required to make that a law. We do not have, as a House, an exclusive right to decide on a new limit that is lower than what has already been authorized by statute. Statute is statute. It is no longer the creature of this House alone. It is the creature of all three elements in Parliament.

The government House leader is saying that once Parliament has enacted a law, if we want to change it we in the House of Commons have the exclusive right to change it, and that is not accurate; that is not the way the law works. An amendment to a statute requires the same thing that the statute itself required: introduction in this House and passage, introduction and passage in the other place, and Royal Assent. It must have all three before it can become law and change the original law.

Mr. Speaker: I am only exchanging views with the hon. member so that I clearly understand his argument. Perhaps the hon. member could wrap up his argument. I think I have the points.

Mr. Milliken: I have only one other point to make, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Very briefly.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, Sir. In order for a point of order to be a valid one in this House, aside from the argument with respect to time limits, it must be one that is raised in relation to the business of the House. We had a spectacle on April 3 of the government House leader raising this point of order when there was nothing before this House for consideration. He has not proposed a motion for a message to the Senate. There is no proceeding before this House. The Senate message has arrived on the table of this House. The Senate insists on certain amendments. That message is sitting on the table of the House. It has never been taken off. Nothing has been done about it, and it happens in the normal course of events.

The government House leader has raised a point, under the guise of a point of order, saying that he wants Your Honour to do something now. I submit that that is a very important principle because if I had stood up on a point of order saying out of the blue that I think, in relation to something that happened down the hall or some other place, I should rise on a point of order and object to it, I think Your Honour would say no, that it has nothing to do with the proceedings in this House.

He has to move a motion, upon which he may then want to make an argument, but it has nothing to do with order, procedure and dealings in this House. The only reason I did not raise this argument at the beginning, Your Honour, is because I thought Your Honour would see it so clearly that you would say that you did not want to hear the rest of my arguments. I have saved it for the end.

Mr. Speaker: There is no way I would ever say that to the hon. member. However I have your point.

Perhaps I could hear briefly from the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, come back to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and listen to the parliamentary secretary. I am not going to listen very much longer as this has taken up quite some time and I think I have the arguments.

An Hon. Member: It is important.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, it is an important issue and I have the arguments. The hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr Speaker, I was intending to be brief. The government House leader raised a number of interesting questions on Tuesday. Specifically he asked for the Chair's guidance on whether or not the Senate amendments were in order, whether they would have been in order if first introduced in the House, and whether the acceptance of the Senate amendments would not constitute a defeat of the original government bill and thus raise a question of confidence.

I would like to reiterate the comments of my party's House leader. I find the logic odd on the part of the government. When the first message came from the Senate, as we have heard, no procedural questions were raised on the floor by the government and the government proceeded to frame its reply, which was then forced through the House on closure.

The question arises then: Can the Speaker find a message from the other place to be out of order? I had not thought it possible for our Chair to assume that responsibility, but if you do, Mr. Speaker, it raises interesting consequential questions.

For example, could the Speaker of the Senate similarly find a message from this place to be out of order? Could a decision of the Speaker of the Senate to find a message from this place in order be overturned by a Senate majority? In other words, by an extension of the logic, the Senate majority could perhaps use procedural manoeuvres to defeat government bills which arrive there.

Second, is it a question of confidence in the government for the House to consider Senate amendments which go against, in the government's view, the principle of a particular bill? Perhaps it is. I would like to support the contentions made by my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands with regard to the nature of the bill and its relationship to being a money bill. It is not a money bill in the usual sense. It does not raise taxes. It does not increase government expenditures. In fact it does not spend government money. Rather, it is a reduction. Perhaps that is the best way to put it.

If the bill were defeated, could there be a question of confidence in the House? The Senate has defeated bills which were more obviously money bills than is Bill C–21. In fact, I believe it was a Conservative dominated Senate which defeated the first old age pension bill many years ago, but was it a question of confidence in the government? No, Mr. Speaker.

Essentially, I think you will find that the arguments of my hon. friend, the government House leader, are with the other place and not at all with anything which you are empowered to do here in this House. If the government has difficulties with the constitutional powers given the Senate, I would invite it to address those concerns in the normal manner and it may even find support from this side of the House on meaningful Senate reform. My hon. colleague, the government House leader knows well, as do we all, that you as Speaker of our House are not authorized to rule on legal or constitutional matters.

I have a few very short observations. First, it should be well understood that the government has several options before it in replying to the message from the Senate concerning the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I will just refer to one as you indicated that you did not want to hear a long list of the options the government has.

Of course the government has the option to accept the Senate amendments and need not ask you to rule them out of order in order to save it the embarrassment of voting them down. I would add parenthetically that the Senate amendments reflect the Liberal position on the unemployment insurance bill and are not endorsed by our party.

It should come as no surprise to anyone that under such circumstances as we are finding ourselves in presently with the operation of Parliament Canadians are looking for other avenues to raise their grievances. I think the dilemma facing my hon. colleague is largely of his own government's making. It is incumbent on the government to recognize the seriousness of these circumstances and to respond appropriately. The issue is not to raise unnecessary points of order but to listen to Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for succinctly wrapping up the arguments of his party. I know he will extend my compliments to the hon. member for Kamloops on his contribution made the other day.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to come back to this very important question as to why on March 12 and March 13 the government did not rise and bring to the attention of this House that in its opinion the amendments were out of order.

At that time you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that you or your deputy who presided over much of the debates took no exception to the amendments. There was no point of order brought to the attention of this House at that time.

I want to be very brief here. I quote from Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 120:

> Foremost among his many responsibilities, the Speaker has a duty to maintain an orderly conduct of debate by repressing disorder when it arises, by refusing to propose the question upon motions and amendments which are irregular, and by calling the attention of the House to bills which are out of order.

• (1600)

Mr. Speaker, now we are doing something which maybe the government should have done prior to March 12. On April 3, I believe, the minister got up on a point of order which I found rather unusual at the time because there was nothing before the House. He rose without notice and started to object to the message, asking the Chair for advice, making allegations about what occurred on March 12 and 13. The message that we are getting now from the Senate is identical to the message we got February last and which we debated here on March 12 and 13.

Mr. Speaker, if you listen to his arguments, the House leader was probably wrong by not raising the point of order then. I would not want him to make it appear that you were wrong, Mr. Speaker, in allowing debate on that motion if today that motion, as he argues, is wrong because we are talking about the same message. If it was wrong in February, it was wrong in March, and it is wrong in April. But that is not the point, Mr. Speaker. The point is that debate was allowed on the motion and on the amendments on March 12 and 13. I participated in that debate. The debate concluded with a vote. The message was then acceptable to this House. Procedures were, in my view, in order and we proceeded with disposition of the message.

I draw attention to Standing Order 13. I want to read it because it is more specific and more explicit than Beauchesne:

> Whenever the Speaker is of the opinion that a motion offered to the House is contrary to the rules and privileges of Parliament, the Speaker shall apprise the House thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the Standing Order or authority applicable to the case.

Mr. Speaker, I find it intolerable that the government through its House leader now alleges, at least by implication, that the Speaker failed on March 13 to apply Standing Order 13. The question was put. The motion carried. The House has made a decision. I can hardly see how this House can come back and reflect on a decision of the House.

What was dealt with on March 12 and 13 was in order in the first instance and is now to be found out of order. I would like to know how we can argue that point. What the government is asking is to turn back the clock. I do not have to remind this House of what happened in 1956 when the clock was turned back. I do not have to give any examples, Mr. Speaker, as to what happens then because that is in my view totally unacceptable and will not be, I hope, the result of this debate.

What the government is asking, Mr. Speaker, is for you to make a decision on so-called procedure when indeed we are dealing with a political problem. That is the perilous course of action that this government is putting you into, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think that you will want to reverse proceedings and go back to March 12 and 13 and say that what we did in this House on March 13 was wrong. I think Mr. Speaker ruled it in order at that time. It was in order. The message being identical to what we have today, I can hardly see how we can argue today that what we did then was wrong and that we turn the clock back. In my view, it would be absolutely contrary to our rules and probably very dangerous for all of us.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I think most of us are very conscious of events in 1956. I would hope this House would never get into that situation again. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your patience on this significant point of order in terms of the rights and privileges of this House and of all the members because it is more than just a government–opposition issue. I think it is one that does affect the whole House.

I want to make three quick arguments in response to the comments made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on April 3, last Tuesday. On page 10147 of Hansard the hon. member explained why he thought the Senate Speaker ruled the way he did on certain amendments. He said, and I quote:

> He cited Erskine May in his ruling that the amendments in question were in order and that they imposed no additional charge on the public treasury.

I submit that in itself is part of the flaw in the ruling that we have from the other House. The reference here is to Erskine May and Erskine May is a procedural book of the United Kingdom.

The relationship between the two Houses in the United Kingdom, particularly on the question of money, is very different than the relationship between the Senate and the House of Commons in Canada.

I remind the House and the member opposite that the Senate of Canada has asserted since 1917 that on money questions it is not the same as the House of Lords. So there is a unique difference.

I argue that the Speaker of the Senate should have used our own authority such as Beauchesne's on which to base his ruling. If he had, I think the ruling would probably have been quite different.

The Senate Speaker, when asked to rule on the admissibility of amendments which would, if adopted, initiate government spending not now budgeted, did rule correctly in saying: "No special form of procedure applies to proposals to reduce existing charges and they may be moved in the House of Commons or in committee without the Royal recommendation". However, and I think this is the key, he was not asked to rule on whether a senator can make these types of amendments to bills such as this bill which already have a Royal recommendation.

He did not address the point. I believe had he done so it would have led to a different conclusion and a different result in the House today.

The authority which I believe ought to have been used is Citation 540 in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition. Its language could not be clearer. It talks not just about amount of charge, but also the objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. These disputed amendments would change those objects, purposes, conditions, and the qualifications set out in this bill as principles. Therefore, I argue that they are ultra vires.

Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, citation 548, is even clearer. Mr. Speaker, this touches on the points that you made in your discussion with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Beauchesne's, citation 548 reads, and I quote:

> Amendments to bills are out of order if they attempt to substitute an alternative scheme to that proposed with the Royal Recommendation.

What is really significant here is that under the present UI program there is a draw on the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Bill C–21 changes that dramatically to a draw from employers and employees. The Senate amendments are reversing this process and as a result we definitely do have an example of amendments being out of order because they are substituting an alternative scheme to that proposed with the Royal recommendation, which is, to use the exact citation of Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 548.

If the Senate Speaker had based his decision on Canadian authorities and not on the United Kingdom parallels, which I do not think apply, he would have recognized that the proposed Senate amendments varied from the specific conditions laid out in the Royal recommendation attached to Bill C–21. In the House on April 3 the member for Ottawa—Vanier argued at page 10147 of Hansard:

> None of the amendments proposed to the various clauses of Bill C–21 seeks to increase or change the amount or purpose of an allocation in a way which would affect the royal recommendation of March 10, 1971.

This, of course, was the date of the original Unemployment Insurance Act.

• (1610)

What about the Royal recommendation tied to the present Bill C–21? I argue that is a jiggery-pokery type of argument. Why does this member not add to his use of the words "amount and purpose" the other required considerations I cited as standard, words from the Beauchesne's test such as "object, conditions and qualifications".

Such amendments as proposed in the Senate, and now here, would not be receivable from a member here. Quite the contrary to what I believe my friend says. Our Speaker's ruling is sought on that dispute as well as some others.

Mr. Gauthier: Why didn't you say that on March 12?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the second point to which I refer comes to what my hon. friend suggests. He is asks why we did not do this on March 12. I think it is fairly obvious. We wanted to demonstrate that we are reasonable.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, come on.

Mr. Cooper: Hon. members laugh, but that is the truth.

When the Senate sends a message in the first instance, as tradition and experience would tell us, the first message is usually sufficient to deal with the issue. We wanted to yield where we could, to state our purposes to the Senate in specific terms by motion and a message back. We thought our motion, which was adopted by this House, would be understood by the Senate to be just that.

An Hon. Member: Oh, come on.

An Hon. Member: Say that with a straight face.

Mr. Cooper: I say it with a perfectly straight face.

We gave the Senate, by way of message, a reaction to the amendments. We did so to be reasonable, to express to the other House what we felt would be the case on this side and what we thought and hoped would be their reaction. Obviously, the circumstances changed. They did not accept our response to the message. They have now come back with a similar message and we are back to the same thing.

This brings me to the final point that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands raised in his argument where he said that a point of order, in order for it to be raised, must relate to something before the House. I am paraphrasing, but that is what I heard the hon. member say.

First, we are dealing here with an attempt on the part of the government to be reasonable in a response to a message from the Senate.

Second, when that reasonable response is not accepted by the other place, we then consider what we believe to be fundamental principle arguments to be addressed. Is the issue before this House? I argue that in fact it is. What we are responding to is the message. The message has been sent from the Senate. It is an issue before this House and, ultimately, after your very important ruling, which does not apply only to the government in this issue, but to the rights and responsibilities of all members of Parliament because our relationship to the other House is a most fundamental relationship that goes back to the beginnings of parliamentary democracy and the whole idea of a parliamentary system.

The issue is clearly before the House. It is a very important issue. Mr. Speaker, your ruling is one that is very important to all of us. I hope the arguments you have heard on both sides have helped you to address the issue.

The arguments we have made demonstrate that just as those amendments would not be acceptable in this House, neither should they be acceptable by way of message back to this House.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think there is any need to continue the argument. I am indebted to the hon. parliamentary secretary for summing up in the careful way he has.

I shall bring my observations to the House as soon as possible. I do not think you can expect them tomorrow morning. I am going to take some considerable thought on this matter.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Perrin Beatty (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-51, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the measures taken in Bill C-51—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member begins his speech, I think it would be appropriate to explain why he is dressed that way.

[English]

I had already received letters from members of the public when I recognized an hon. member on the other side some time ago who also had a damaged hand and was unable to put on a jacket properly.

I want it clearly understood that the hon. member is being recognized not because he is deliberately not staying within the bounds of decorum in this House, but because he is an injured memeber who, despite the injury has managed to bring himself to do his duty to the House and to the country.

Mr. Vincent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

So I was saying that the measures provided in Bill C–51 are modest, but important as part of our effort to improve the operation and efficiency of the Canadian tax system. They deal with two specific problems involved in collecting unpaid deductions at source. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this problem is growing in Canada.

Deductions at source are amounts that by law must be withheld from a payee for income tax, unemployment insurance premiums and contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, as well as any interest or penalty thereon. By far the largest category of deductions at source is the money withheld by employers from payments to their employees.

When money is deducted at source as prescribed by law, the payee is credited with the amount withheld, whether or not the payer turns over the deduction as required by law. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the employer does not always turn over the amount deducted at source, but uses it for his own purposes. Some companies, especially when they are in financial difficulty, use deductions at source as a way to finance their business and to cover their operating expenses.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree that a company official who takes payroll deductions which would normally be sent to the government and channels them into operating expenses is guilty of an offence because the funds withheld by the official and diverted to other uses belong to the federal government, to the government of Canada. It is as if the funds were in a trust. Sure enough, penalties are applied and interest charged when money due to the treasury is not paid within the time limit. But the fact remains that since October 1, 1989 there have been changes to the regulations as a partial solution to the problem we all know. This is why the rate of interest on delinquent payments was then raised by two percentage points.

The legislation is intended to speed up payment of payroll deductions and set up a more effective recovery process. Keep in mind that the employee has done his share when he gets his weekly or bimonthly cheque from which deductions have already been made, but it is a different proposition in the case of the employer who makes the deductions and uses the money for whatever purposes instead of sending it to the government, as he should.

Allow me to say more about two problems which I mentioned at the outset of my remarks.

The first stems from a recent court ruling which thwarts the effectiveness of the improved garnishment provisions which came into force in 1987 and apply only to the recovery of payroll deductions. This is the way Revenue Canada has since been recovering most unpaid payroll deductions.

The enhanced garnishment enables Revenue Canada to intercept the monies owing to a tax debtor but paid to one of his creditors pursuant to a security agreement such as an assignment of accounts receivables. Once the letter has been served to the person who has not remitted the source deductions, the monies seized are payable to Revenue Canada instead of to the secured creditor.

A ruling of the Alberta Appeal Court in a case involving the Lloyds Bank of Canada calls into question the efficiency of the enhanced garnishment provisions. The Court ruled that the present provisions did not give Revenue Canada priority over secured creditors. Revenue Canada appealed that ruling to the Supreme court of Canada.

It is not my place, as you will understand, to comment on the ruling or on the merits of the appeal. However, considering the importance of the revenues involved, it is essential that the government ensures the efficiency of those provisions immediately instead of awaiting the decision following the final settlement of the case before the courts.

You will understand, Mr. Speaker, that the amounts involved are very significant. Between $100 and $200 million are collected each year through the enhanced garnishment procedure. Therefore, we suggest that the procedure prescribed in the Income Tax Act be amended to ensure that the service of an enhanced garnishment letter will effect the transfer to the government of Canada of the seized monies and that Revenue Canada will have precedence over any other secured debtor for the payment of such monies.

These amendments do not affect the rights of anyone involved in legal proceedings on November 6, 1989 when the ways and means motion was introduced in this House nor the rights arising from rulings made on or before that day.

The changes will automatically apply to the collection of source deductions for amounts payable under the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, since both incorporate the garnishment provisions of the Income Tax Act.

The second problem results from an omission in the amendments made to the Income Tax Act through Bill C-139 in the last session. These changes included the reorganization of the subsections in section 227 of that legislation. A related amendment was omitted by mistake.

Therefore, the provisions prohibiting Revenue Canada from collecting any unpaid taxes in the 90 days following the day the assessment notice was mailed or before a decision is made on any proceedings related to these taxes, also apply to unremitted source deductions.

That was not the legislator's intention and the rules clearly specify that they do not apply to such amounts. This amendment rectifies the situation.

I hope that, with this overview of the general content of Bill C-51 and with the spirit of co-operation I recognize in my colleague across the way, we can pass this Bill at second reading as soon as possible.

As you know, these amendments are important to ensure tax fairness for all Canadians as well as to reduce the deficit. All Canadians must pay their fair share of income tax, but Canadians must also abide by our tax system without taking undue advantages of it as, for example, businesses who finance their operations by using source deduction funds.

Source deductions are monies paid by employees and employers should not be allowed to use those funds for their own purposes. The system serves the interests of the federal government well. It is useful for our current expenses and has helped us in our efforts over the last five years to reduce the deficit.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your attention and I invite my colleague to do the same.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, in looking at Bill C-51, I feel that in general there are very strong concerns regarding the ability of employers to take payments through unemployment insurance and other sources of income and not pay those directly to the government. We know that the principle of Bill C-51 establishes the ability of the government to legally garnishee payments that have been made on an employee's behalf to employers which have not actually been paid to the government.

The government is very limited in its ability to collect, particularly since the Alberta Court of Appeal ruled in June 1988 that the government does not have the first ability to get in. In principle we believe that any funds that have been paid by an employee to an employer should directly go to the government and the employer should not be able to use those funds to supplement business or to carry on other business ventures at the cost of the individuals dealing with a—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope the hon. member would wind up because there really are no questions or comments on the initial first three speeches. If he could wind up his remarks I would appreciate it.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I have a few points that I would like to put forward, it certainly being very clear that the Liberals, on principle, cannot support allowing businesses to finance or subsidize operations by not paying government taxes when they have deducted those incomes at source.

We also believe that giving Revenue Canada the authority to collect unpaid taxes and make deductions may push small businesses—if they use a very heavy hand with small businesses which are in difficulty or in receivership—away from their ability to survive. If those small businesses that are in receivership end up in a position of not being able to survive then in the long term the government will collect far less taxes.

We also need a thorough investigation of the income tax legislation relating to bankruptcy. It is my understanding that the government is coming forth with that legislation at the present time and it will put those critical points on the floor.

It is important to realize that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has not had a chance to really study the legislation and bring in recommendations for us to study. Very clearly, at this point in time, taking that legislation to committee and having the committee deal with it is probably the best route that we can go, and that is the route we would recommend.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will not recognize any more questions or comments. I am going to recognize the next speaker and that will be the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. He is entitled to 40 minutes with no questions or comments.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just want to get my comments on record.

First of all, I want to wish the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, our colleague and Parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, a speedy recovery. I hope his arm will get better, that the GST hasn't done him too much harm, that he will soon be as good as new and that in future he will be suitably dressed.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before us implements the Ways and Means Motion to amend the Income Tax Act, notice of which was tabled in the House of Commons on November 6, 1989. It is a piece of positive legislation which provides for so-called technical amendments to the Act and which, I am sure, will have the support of the Official Opposition.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this bill re-establishes the legal "garnishment" authority for the government to collect unpaid source deductions. Employers have to collect unemployment insurance premiums, Canada Pension Plan and income tax deductions from employees' pay cheques and pass them on to the federal government. Employers who have collected these sums of moneys on behalf of their employees should, but sometimes do not, pay the source deductions to the federal government as they should.

The government has had this enhanced garnishment authority since 1987 when subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act was enacted, but a recent court decision has thrown subsection 224(1.2) into question. The Alberta Court of Appeal ruled in June, 1989, in the case of Lloyds Bank versus International Warranty Company Limited that Revenue Canada did not have priority over secured creditors in the collection of unpaid debts from a business in the case of a bankruptcy and that the Income Tax Act did not transfer property of the funds to Revenue Canada.

That is basically the background to this bill. That is why we have Bill C-51 before us, and that is why the Liberals will give it their support and hope that it will go to committee for thorough study and possibly amendment to the act with a view to strengthening the legislation.

Bill C-51 ensures that the receipt of a garnishment letter from Revenue Canada transfers property to Revenue Canada and that the claim of Revenue Canada has priority over secured creditors in the case of a bankruptcy.

Bill C-51 states that legal actions to collect unpaid source deductions, including garnishment, cannot begin until 90 days after Revenue Canada rules on a taxpayer's appeal of their assessment, if any appeal is made. If a taxpayer launches a court appeal of their assessment, no action can be taken by the government until the court has made its final decision.

By giving Revenue Canada the enhanced collection powers proposed in Bill C-51, the government is attempting to ensure that businesses with a severe cash flow problem and facing possible bankruptcy do not use unpaid source deductions as a source of emergency financing which may not be able to be collected if the firm goes into bankruptcy.

After consultation, and as I understand it, the government views Bill C-51 as simply re-establishing the powers of Revenue Canada to those which existed before the ruling to which I alluded to a few minutes ago. Bill C-51 does not give Revenue Canada any new powers which it did not have prior to the court decision. Without Bill C-51, the government estimates that it will lose about $200 million.

The bill itself is a move in the right direction. My colleague and friend who spoke just prior to me made some points about bankruptcy. I would hope the government would use common sense, and not force small businesses into bankruptcy because once they are into bankruptcy, they do not pay any more taxes.

Small business is an important part of Canada. Small businesses are often the ones that are hardest hit by the downturns of the economy. Small business will be touched very seriously by the GST. Given the fact that the government is imposing this goods and services tax on Canadians on January 1, 1991, I would hope that, by giving support to this bill, the government does not take it that the problems of small business can be passed over, and that difficulties that may arise with small business can be overlooked.

I would hope that my friends to the left, the members of the NDP who traditionally are in favour of closing tax loopholes for corporations, but may oppose this bill, would try to understand that what we are doing is closing a tax loophole of some $200 million. If some people get away with literally taking moneys which are not theirs and not paying the federal government moneys which are due, then I think that is a wrong thing to do and I give this party's undertaking that we will pass this bill as fast as possible.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I trust the injury sustained by my friend, the first speaker for the government, was not as a result of the arm twisting that is going on in the Conservative caucus to keep members in line on the GST.

We in the New Democratic Party support the intent of Bill C–51. I think that we should review in general what this bill is intending to do. It makes it possible for the government to have an enhanced garnishee so that it can attach moneys that are owed by firms which have not paid the moneys they have deducted at source, particularly the moneys they have deducted from employees for UIC premiums, Canada Pension Plan premiums, and income tax, as well as moneys that they owe for their contribution to UIC and CPP.

There are a number of businesses in this country that are experiencing increasing difficulty with cash flow, and there is a great temptation for all sizes of business, both small business and fairly substantial corporations, to simply utilize money that has been deducted at source as a method of interim financing. This may be done with all the best intentions in the world, but if the cash flow problem continues over any period of time, then they have increasing difficulty meeting their obligations to pay the money to the government within the first 15 days of the next month, which is their legal obligation.

In speaking to the bill, the member of the government mentioned the problem of increased bankruptcies in Canada. That is a growing problem. The year end figures in 1989 showed that bankruptcies had increased 8 per cent above the level of 1984, which had been the highest. Bankruptcies in January of this year increased an alarming 33 per cent, and from December to January were up 20 per cent. Bankruptcy is also related to industrial profits. In 1989, Statistics Canada reported that operating profits for industrial corporations fell $5.5 billion, down almost 15 per cent. In 1989, profits for industrial firms ranging from manufacturing to mining were down to $32 billion from $37.5 billion. In Quebec, the liabilities related to bankruptcies have risen from just over $50 million in 1987, to almost $180 million.

Businesses in Canada are having increasing difficulties in making ends meet. Many of them are facing bankruptcy and cash flow problems because of the free trade deal. This week in my riding of Surrey North there was an announcement that the Ste. Michelle Winery was going to be closed, directly due to the free trade deal, with a loss of 47 jobs. Fortunately Ste. Michelle is part of a larger winery system, so at this point in time the parent company is not in a state of insolvency or, as far as we know, having problems with its cash flow.

We are going to see this problem increasingly in the next period of time, particularly if the government is determined to go ahead with the ill–conceived goods and services tax. Small businesses will find it increasingly difficult to maintain the viability of their businesses and their cash flow. It is going to be very tempting for them to utilize the source deduction moneys as a ready source of cash, rather than forwarding them to the government.

The government has made some attempts to improve the efficiency of the tax system. I think members will find that any time the government attempts to improve the efficiency of the tax system where it is fair and equitable or plugs loopholes that the New Democratic Party will support this.

The Bill C–51 allows the government, by letter known as an enhanced garnishee, to attach moneys that are owing to a firm that has not paid its source deduction moneys. There are some good parts of that which deserve study in committee, particularly parts that deal with the fact that the person can appeal an assessment. If there is an appeal of an assessment, the garnishee order would not take effect for 90 days, or if there is a court appeal, that would not take effect until that court appeal is heard.

The government has every obligation to the Canadian taxpayer to ensure that it collects money that it is owed. We often think that, in relation to some of the larger corporations and deferred taxes, the government should be more vigorous in its pursuit of these moneys. These are moneys that employees have given to the company in trust for the Canadian government. They are moneys that the employees have had deducted from their pay cheques and given in trust for forwarding to the government. Therefore, they are moneys in which the employees have a big investment, not only in terms of the handling of them by companies in trust but also what happens to them in terms of their use by the government.

Source deduction moneys are earmarked, in part, for the UIC fund. The changes that the government has introduced which are now in the process of being debated, mean that the government no longer has, or wishes to have, any direct financial responsibility for the unemployment insurance funds, so these funds are basically employer–employee funds. They are being held in trust by companies until such time as they are transmitted to the federal government.

Employees have a large stake in the use of these funds, and employees across Canada have been expressing their disapproval of the government's plans for the use of these funds. They have been expressing their disapproval by opposing the UIC bill, particularly to its changing the responsibility for training to come out of an insurance fund that was meant basically to protect workers' incomes and not as a fund to subsidize industry and government in the training of workers.

Training and retraining of workers is vitally important and must be undertaken on a massive scale, if we are going to be competitive in a modern industrial society. It is inappropriate to take money that was designed for income maintenance to pay for the basic necessities of food, shelter, rent, and basic health care for families.

The opposition that we have seen across Canada to the government's use of UIC moneys indicates how seriously Canadian workers take what happens to moneys that are deducted at source. They feel very strongly that these moneys should be used as an income maintenance program. They are unhappy that the government has decided to increase the number of contribution weeks that are required in order to qualify for UIC and to decrease the length of time that a person is able to draw UIC. They feel that source deduction funds are now being used to not only supplement the training component, but to offset other government revenues in order to assist the government in debt reduction. Employees feel that debt reduction should be the responsibility of all Canadians, not just employees who are contributing to UIC and CPP, and particularly UIC.

Mr. Dorin: Has this got anything to do with the bill?

Mr. Karpoff: Certainly. Everything has to do with the bill, because these are source deduction moneys and Canadians are very concerned about what happens to their source deduction funds. They are concerned that not only are these moneys held in trust properly by employers and forwarded properly to the federal government, and if they do not they are quite pleased to have legislation like Bill C–51 in place to ensure that the federal government has the ability to attach these moneys, but they are equally concerned as to what the federal government does with this money once it gets it. It is all very nice to say that the responsibility is to transfer the money to the federal government, but if it is not being adequately or properly utilized by the federal government then I think that employees would not support this type of legislation. They are concerned about supporting the legislation on the basis that they understand and want to be reassured that these moneys are being utilized effectively by the government.

• (1650)

In addition to the UIC bill, much of the money that is used goes to the Canada Pension Plan. The Canada Pension Plan was set up initially in order to ensure that Canadians had adequate retirement funds in their old age. Unfortunately, the Canada Pension Plan and other pension schemes that the government has undertaken have fallen short. Increasingly, many of the elderly in this country are inadequately protected. At least 20 to 25 per cent of elderly single people live in poverty. In addition, there are a large number of elderly single women who find it very difficult to make ends meet on limited pensions.

One of the problems is that the Canada Pension Plan is restricted solely to those people who have been in wage earning or self-employed positions. The Canada Pension Plan has not been broadened to deal with such areas as women who choose to stay at home and make their contributions to society by caring for their homes. For years, the New Democratic Party has advocated the development of some type of homemakers' pension scheme as part of the UIC or as part of the Canada Pension Plan.

Forty-two per cent of unattached individuals over the age of 65, and 20 per cent of all senior citizens, live below the poverty line. That is nearly 500,000 Canadians. Older women, particularly, are more likely to be poor than men; 71.7 per cent of the elderly poor are women.

The Canada Pension Plan, which was initially thought of as a pension plan that would provide adequate pensions, is now only providing 25 per cent of retirement income. We know that is not adequate to guarantee people a proper income. It might be adequate if one had a lot of cash resources. I know some of the Tories have lots of assets—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would just like to ask the hon. member if he plans to take his whole 40 minutes.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I plan to speak for a few minutes more. I do not know whether I will take my full 40 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, Official Languages; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Forestry.

On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, as you had interrupted, I thought it might be a good time for me to put my point of order.

I have listened to members of the three parties speak in the opening round of this bill. All three parties appear to be supporting the bill. I wonder if there might be unanimous consent of the House to send this bill, at five o'clock, to the legislative committee, on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I want to return to the problems around bankruptcies and wages. One of the things that happens when firms go bankrupt or insolvent is that not only do they not pay to the government the Canada Pension Plan and UIC moneys that have been deducted from employees, but often those same firms do not pay the wages owed to employees.

It is very nice for the government to bring forward Bill C-51 to ensure that it has a priority of claim for moneys owed to it, but it is remiss that it has not seen fit to enact legislation that gives a priority over other creditors to employees wages. The New Democratic Party, particularly the member for Nickel Belt, introduced Bill C-217 which was given first reading on April 10, 1989 which attempted to do this.

During the next couple of years with the effects of the free trade deal and the goods and services tax and the problems they bring, which the government calls "dislocation", and which is equated to bankruptcies and failures of businesses and industries like Ste. Michelle Winery in my riding, we are going to have increased difficulty with companies not only not remitting their moneys to the government, but also not paying wages to their employees.

It would be much fairer if the government had a companion piece of legislation to Bill C-51 that increased the priority of employees, as opposed to other creditors, for wages. What we were talking about in Bill C-217 were wages of up to the first $2,000. These are the wages that people need to feed their children. These are the wages that people need to pay their mortgage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest on a point of order.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I was just wondering whether this was a throne speech debate or a debate on Bill C–51, because we are covering a pretty wide range of subjects here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member is really coming to the bill.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

NEEDS OF YOUTH

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Anawak:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider developing special initiatives, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education and health needs of aboriginal youth.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to be able to join in such an important debate. I thank my colleagues on this side of the House for presenting this motion for our general consideration. I can think of no issue which haunts all Canadians more than the need to deal with the issues facing aboriginal youth across this country.

Since this debate began several weeks ago, I have noticed that the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, Max Yalden, has added his voice to the debate. His argument is that the treatment of native peoples in Canada is one of our greatest and most pressing problems. He, in fact, would like to see a royal commission set up to address this issue.

Whether or not a royal commission would add to the momentum remains to be seen, but certainly it is one more indication of the anxiousness among those people who wish to see this issue addressed. Mr. Yalden's approach should be taken seriously by the government and by all of us sitting in this House.

We are asked in this motion to consider ways in which the Canadian government can begin to address specific questions facing aboriginal youth. Perhaps we should reflect for a moment on why there are so many problems among youth in terms of education, health and employment. I think we can begin by realizing that for every positive influence given to non–native, non–aboriginal children, those influences are probably lacking with respect to aboriginal children.

One fact not appreciated by many parliamentarians is that while people my age, the baby boom, have benefitted from in Canadian society, it is different in the native community. In fact their baby boom is going on as we speak. While their greatest growth in population is with the youth between 15 and 25, this is the group that is totally lacking in education, employment, proper health care, and housing. At that very moment when they need us we are not doing anything for them.

How can we begin to address the problems? Over the last decade in the province of Manitoba there have been groups which have reached out. Perhaps we should accentuate the positive in this debate and talk about what people are trying to do.

I can think of my own involvement over the last decade, for example, in the community of Shamattawa in northern Manitoba, a very remote community of a few hundred people. In that community we had tremendous difficulty with gasoline sniffing. Through an intervention project and the setting up of a community centre, the children of that community realized there was some place to go and something to do other than going off to the bush to sniff gasoline. That led to further employment projects and the community is very proud of the fact that today they have built their own school. That is not a project run by southerners, but a project run by people from the community.

A little farther south is Norway House, another remote community. In Norway House the situation among the 3,000 people living there was so bad that the youth took it upon themselves to form the Norway House Youth Council with its own young chief. This youth council has an employment committee, an education committee, and a health committee. It set up a youth conference and invited people from outside the community, including myself, to have an opportunity to discuss with them what it is they are trying to do.

In the course of preparation for this conference two more of their friends committed suicide. It is not just a problem in the abstraction when people are trying to work things through in their life while their friends are committing suicide. I think there are very few of us in this House who have had to deal so directly with such a pressing problem and had to translate those personal concerns into building or rebuilding a community.

That youth council has made great progress in the last four years and deserves the support of Canada. It deserves the support through programming, through moral support, and through business to the community. The young leadership has to be given a chance by telling them that we will not let them fail and will give them whatever support they need to have a more productive life.

In the middle of my constituency of Winnipeg North Centre a number of different groups are trying to deal more persuasively with the problems of aboriginal youth. Winnipeg probably has the largest concentration of urban aboriginal people in the country. It is difficult to be accurate, but it ranges between 25,000 and 50,000 people. Half of those are under the age of 25 and probably 80 per cent of them are within single parent families.

Most of these families are without employment. The education levels, despite the hard work being done in schools such as R. B. Russell, are very limited. Instead of there being generation after generation of success, with an older brother or an older sister doing well, we find that they are constantly confronted with a lack of opportunity in our society.

We in Winnipeg are trying to deal with this issue. When we set up the aboriginal justice commission one of the observations made by Justice Sinclair after looking at the situation was: "We have to turn attention to aboriginal children. We have to give these children an opportunity to have some hope, to have an opportunity to participate in our schools, to participate in the job market".

One of the projects I most admire in the Winnipeg area is Rossbrook House, which takes a very superficially laid back approach where people can come to visit them. From that, the people who are active in Rossbrook House have developed programming which goes 24 hours a day, seven days a week. They have opened their doors and on that basis they have become increasingly involved in programming, job creation, education support, and family support.

When we are talking about dealing with aboriginal youth, we are not talking about the icing on the cake. We are talking about one of the most fundamental needs in our society. I think what is often lost, as we go through government deficits is that we do not know what to protect. We do not know what is really important to us.

I am pleased to see that the minister responsible for the native communications program is here. There is nothing more important than for native youth to have an opportunity over the next decade to develop the written and verbal capacity to talk to each other in their own language. The fact that we have in times of cut-back not seen that as the greatest priority of our society leads me to wonder whether or not they will maintain hope that we will be able to do it.

The broader question is: Where should there be opportunities for aboriginal children as they become more educated and find their way in the professional world? Which routes should they have available to them?

One positive initiative that has been taken by Canadian governments in the last decade is the attempt to reinforce the opportunity for self-government, to reinforce the opportunity for freedom, and to reinforce the opportunity for self-management. Once the people get the education and training at their community colleges, learn how to manage economic development projects, learn how to manage band offices, and learn how to manage downtown projects in our major cities whether it is dealing with the homeless or dealing with family services or dealing with education, we should let them take control of and learn how to run these institutions. We should freely give it to them and not use the excuse of a lack of learning as a reason for not giving it to them.

It is a very daunting proposition because many people look at the failures in our society. They look at the failures of Indian bands to develop economic development projects and the failure to account for money. They have seen a lot of negatives in the past 20 years and tell the government that it has given away too much. They say that native people do not know how to spend money or handle responsibility. However there is only one direction to go if we are to save this next generation of aboriginal children. The only direction to go is in favour of self-government.

We must take a risk. We must show support for people who are desperately trying to find a way to rebuild confidence in their communities, confidence in each other, the capacity to manage, the capacity to learn and the capacity to create employment among themselves.

If we look at the successes, if we look at the opportunities provided by the Dakota—Ojibwa Tribal Council in its own school at Yellow Quill, and if we look at the opportunities provided at Norway House through economic development initiatives operated by the youth, the benchmark of success in one area of the country after another is in self-government.

The more that we in Parliament through passing motions like this show support to members who are dealing with these problems in their own constituencies, the more we can turn to the people of Canada and say: "We have looked at motions such as this and we are not afraid to lend our support. We are morally committed. We are legally committed. We want to see these proposals go through."

The aboriginal youth of this country can look at a motion like this one and see that it simply says the government should consider developing special initiatives. It does not say the government should spend a lot of money. It asks the government to consider helping the aboriginal youth of this country. We should tell the aboriginal youth of this country that we agree we should be taking some initiative and working with them. We should be saying: "We want to work with you. We agree with the Canadian Human Rights Commission. There is a role for us. There is a role for you. Let us work together".

I call upon this House to adopt this motion and to show support for our aboriginal children.

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed very pleased to address this motion, a motion to consider special initiatives for aboriginal youth.

I am pleased because aboriginal youth and the development of positive programs have been a personal interest and involvement of mine for many years. This is a matter of tremendous importance, as other members have previously stated.

• (1710)

The needs regarding employment, education and health are all interrelated and should be considered together, although separately each deserves its own consideration.

Without education it is very difficult to obtain employment and without health it is very difficult to obtain an education or employment. With education and employment it is much easier to stay healthy. So the needs, if and when properly addressed, will result in aboriginal youth who are, among other positives, proud of who they are. Aboriginal youth will feel a part of this country once again, to the extent that they then can become positive contributors as nation builders in every aspect.

The problems we have come to know too well are immense but not insurmountable. I think aboriginal youth want to contribute. Given the same chance as everyone else they can become winners like everyone else. First they have to feel good. They have to feel good about who they are and where they are going, but collectively we must first deal with myths and stereotypes that have been proliferated over the years. The days of the no good, lazy, drunken Indian must come to an end. How does it happen? One of the ways is with education. Another is with employment.

When dealing with aboriginal youth I am often asked: "How is it that you have the highest suicide rates, the highest unemployment rates, the highest drop-out rates from high school, the highest inmate population rates in jails"? In yesterday's edition of The Globe and Mail these kinds of statistics continued to appear. Let me quote from the article:

> The statistics compiled by the Canadian Institute of Child Health on suicide among people from the ages of 15 to 19 go beyond the basic question of why anyone to whom the full flavour of life should just be dawning would wish to end it. Why would young people in Canada's north be apparently so much readier than others to quit this life? Is it linked in some way to the relative hostility of their environment? The despair that feeds on unemployment and low incomes? Is this the lot of a culture torn between the old ways and new ways, seduced nightly by the dish-antenna visions of southern lifestyles and escape through the bottle? Is it the inevitable fate of a huge territory of scattered communities?

Whatever the explanation—and it might be a hellish alchemy compounded from all of the above—it is clear that the native northerner can count substantially fewer of the blessings of life than other Canadians. Fewer in almost any category you care to mention.

The unemployment rate among native northerners, reports the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, is among the highest in Canada, reaching 50 per cent in some communities—

I might add that in some areas it is as high as 85 per cent. It continues:

The Northwest Territories has the highest per capita incidence of alcohol offences in Canada, and probably a very high rate of substance abuse.

Although the article refers to the north, I do not think it is very much different in other parts of Canada. In fact at home the suicide rate is even higher. Where the article mentions rates four to five times the national average, ours have been as high as ten to twelve times.

I think over time, with self-fulfilling prophecies, much of this has happened because we as native people have become to believe that we are no good or lazy or that you have to drink to be an Indian or that we should die before a certain age.

Much can happen to change the world for aboriginal youth. Much has been done in the past. Allow me to thank all of those concerned for their efforts to date, but much more needs to be done. This motion, when passed, would begin that process. When the motion was first introduced I wanted to refer to a couple of noteworthy events related to the issue. I think they are still relevant.

First, after 10 years of negotiations, the UN General Assembly unanimously adopted the first convention on the rights of the child. I applaud the members involved whole-heartedly. Then during the same week the Leader of the NDP in his final speech to this House spoke very eloquently on the plight of the poor and in particular of children in our affluent society of Canada. Yet, for the children who are referred to throughout those speeches and documents, many of those are aboriginal children.

In 1990, in Canada, we still have aboriginal youth who go to school every morning hungry or too hungry to concentrate or to study or to do their homework. Until the employment, education and health needs are addressed and met, we will have this cycle of desperation.

What can be done? I do not want to appear totally negative because there are many success stories. Aboriginal youth want to contribute. In fact I believe aboriginal peoples want to contribute. We want to contribute to the development of our own youth. We know they will then become strong segments of Canadian society and, in that way, we will then have a stronger Canada.

A basic minimum to accomplish this is for full, meaningful consultation to occur with aboriginal peoples. If I may mention a personal bias, I believe that personal, physical, mental and spiritual development must first happen as a foundation. Sir, when you were the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, you contributed to that positive development. I thank you for that, but I think you will also agree that it was because you consulted aboriginal people yourself that made those sport programs successful. I was grateful, therefore, for the announcement by our colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that he too, would consult with natives on post-secondary education.

As I go out speaking in Indian country, I speak about an Indian winners' club. I started out a few years ago by calling it a 5 per cent club, those we never hear about because they succeed. Good stories don't always make the news, but we always hear about the 95 per cent who dropped out of school. This past year alone I spoke to over 200 post-secondary graduates in Alberta. I have changed the name of that club to the 10 per cent club. We are improving, but it will be a great day when someone, hopefully I, can get up and say I want to congratulate those graduates because we now have a 95 per cent or 100 per cent success rate.

When that happens I know those aboriginal youth will then be employed and will also be in a position to contribute ever better to our nation. It is only then, also, that economic self-reliance as an aboriginal dream can become a reality. We need more success stories, but we must also change our focus to highlight positive stories whenever they occur.

I recall the debate a while ago when member after member rose in this House to speak from their heart about the atrocities that occurred in China after the university incident. I ask those same members to recall that night and, in the same spirit of human compassion and kindness, to forget about the political affiliation and support this motion.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, indeed it is an honour to rise in support of the motion presented by the member from Nunatsiaq which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider developing special initiatives, in consultation with Aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education and health needs of Aboriginal youth.

I am sure you would agreed, Mr. Speaker, with other members who have spoken today that if there is a motion before this House that should be passed or dealt with more than ever, it is a motion like this one. I think the concerns are being expressed by members who represent many of the people to whom this motion is directly related. We have a long way to go.

Others have made reference to the most recent annual report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission where the commissioner cites last year's annual report and states: "We described the situation of Canada's aboriginal peoples as a national tragedy". It is still a national tragedy.

The Carrier Sekanie people live in my riding. I have had meetings on the reserves and most recently with the chiefs who had gathered in Prince George. Some days it seems to them that the challenge is almost insurmountable.

I know of the problems that we have faced in working with the people at the band level to help get even the simple things that we take for granted in this Chamber and on this Hill. We have to fight and work to get adequate sewer and water in many of the reserves in northern British Columbia and other parts of the country.

• (1720)

I do not know how much more emotional a member can be when we meet with representatives of our bands in our areas and they tell us the litany of the problems they have faced not only over many years but even in recent years, with the work that has to be done to help with the education, health and housing of many of these people.

It was stated earlier that a major accomplishment would be to recognize self-government. Certainly in my province the biggest road block we have is the government in Victoria currently not recognizing the existence of land claims, self-government.

The federal government negotiates. We have some concerns with that process but at least in most cases they are talking. In my home province, the government in Victoria, British Columbia does not even recognize that. One of its ministers said they deal with Indian Affairs issues on a day to day basis. That is their commitment.

We in this Chamber have to show that our commitment goes deeper than that. The Prime Minister has made some major statements about the direction in which he wants to see his government go. He has talked about education. We are debating major tax policy and trade policy. I would ask the Prime Minister to take it upon himself to deal with many of the questions we are dealing with in our ridings when it comes to Indian people and to work and push his ministers and the new minister to see that these problems are dealt with.

The Secretary of State is in the Chamber today listening. I am pleased about that, because he knows we have had discussions and correspondence about the issues that we are facing in our area and the requests that we have had from the Carrier Sekanie people to develop and preserve their language. One of the first official duties I had as a new member was to go out to Vanderhoof to attend a scholarship ceremony for the Ingenika Dene language institute, where they are teaching aboriginal people to go out and teach the importance of language. We call on this government to provide some assistance.

We are working on building a new university in the north. I understand that the premier will be in my home town, Prince George, tomorrow, to make an announcement about an interim board of governors. I trust that he has consulted, and I trust that he will be appointing someone who can reflect on, comment on and help develop an aboriginal languages institute as part of that university. It is critical and essential to our area.

The Carrier Sekanie people have developed many other initiatives to deal with and describe the concerns they have about their young people. They are talking and working with school boards in the area to develop an aboriginal education program from K to 12, as they are called. I know my colleagues and those at the provincial level have been pushing for and supporting the preservation of native languages which have given us a great history in this country.

I do not have to comment about health. We all know the problems. Northern Ontario was spoken about earlier, but in my riding nothing has been done for years at the federal level. It is a day to day job to see that we get the attention of the departmental officials and the minister to see that the work is done. Chiefs and elders representing both the young and the old in their areas are very concerned. I think you know, Mr. Speaker, how important they feel this issue is.

Employment is mentioned in the motion. In our area it is hard to find jobs for aboriginal people with regular employers. I have been on the phone in the last day or two working with one of those employers, where the Indian people themselves are developing the economy and the businesses themselves which will employ their people and developing the training mechanisms that they need to give their young people their rightful place in this economy.

I ask government members and the Prime Minister to take up the challenge that aboriginal people have offered us. We must meet that challenge and respond to the needs as laid out in this motion in terms of health, education and employment. I urge and ask government members to support this motion.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I feel this is a great opportunity for myself as the member of Parliament for Portage—Interlake to make some comments with respect to the motion of the hon. member for Nunatsiaq.

I join with my colleagues in the House who obviously have a large representation of Indian people in their respective constituencies in recognizing the importance of such a motion to the welfare and the goals our first Canadians clearly wish to be considered.

I would like to pay tribute to the member for Nunatsiaq who in fact recognizes the importance to the people he represents of trying to find ways that the Government of Canada can assist in addressing the concerns regarding health and better education. It is pretty much a known fact that the living conditions of our natives are certainly in most cases inferior to what most Canadians take for granted.

That situation is, I might add, changing to some extent. It is probably fair to say that those changes in living conditions on our reserves and for our native Canadians perhaps do not occur as fast as we would like.

We recognize that there is a lot of social problems. It is not for us to lay fault for the social problems some of our native Canadians are fraught with, but clearly they need to be addressed.

Once again, my colleague from Nunatsiaq has taken up the challenge. He talked about education. I do not think there is a member of this House of Commons who would deny that the key to any society and any way of breaking out into the world of job possibilities and the particular requirements of the total workforce is education. I might add that it really is what I would like to talk about today with regard to this motion.

A lot has changed in the last 25 years and a lot has changed in the last 10 years. I recall the hon. member for Provencher, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and myself some three years ago ventured into northern Manitoba where we participated in the opening of some $60 million in new educational facilities on about seven reserves. These particular institutions, high schools and community centres, were built at a tremendous cost, probably almost double the cost that it would be to build those same facilities in southern Manitoba, southern Ontario, or near major centres. This was mainly because of the remoteness of where these new schools had to be built. In some cases it took a year of waiting until the roads froze in winter and were no longer flooded before supplies could be trucked in. It took almost an entire year to build up the supplies in order to build the school facilities at, for example, Shamattawa or Gods Lake Narrows. The cost is almost double. Therein lies a new constraint that the Government of Canada has.

Nevertheless, you will now find facilities in some of our most remote locations in most cases of a standard that is equal or, in some cases, better than you would find in other parts of Canada. This is due in part to the desire of the Government of Canada in the past and in the present to continue to put a lot of emphasis on a community centre, not just an educational centre, but a place in which the community can have tremendous pride. This gives the people the feeling that they are not any longer, in terms of the educational field or community centre, second–class citizens of Canada.

These are the kinds of things that are ongoing. I am very grateful that they are.

I have about 13 reserves in my riding. One specific reserve has been very aggressive in terms of taking total control of its school. Many others have as well. It has put its priority on education. The people on that reserve have realized that that is their key out of the economic demise that they found themselves in at the cost of decisions made in the past by someone in the head office in Winnipeg, and prior to that in Ottawa. They are coming to me to discuss their future concerns with regard to the education that they want and desire under their kind of conditions, using their culture and possibly their language.

Twenty–five years ago this was an unheard of situation. I think we have made gigantic steps toward fulfilling what many Canadians take absolutely for granted when it comes to the education of our first Canadians.

This of course is not to say that more cannot be done. There is no doubt that more can and will be done. However, there has to be a consideration that it has to be done and the moneys have to be expended in a very sincere and careful manner. Obviously, the desire to expand all these facilities is far greater than the tax burden and the economy of Canada can really handle.

I had a meeting with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development just yesterday with regard to providing those communities with the proper ability to fight fires. Up until now a good number of reserves that are remote had no capability to fight fires.

We know that some of the houses are crowded. Some homes that have been there for some 20 or 30 years are not at all up to standard. Fire codes were never heard of when they were built. Today, we are trying to build homes that meet the same fire codes and standards that everybody else has. Why should they not have the right to have that situation which will obviously assist them in securing safety for their families?

In the last short while three reserves in my constituency had the misfortune of losing five children in fires. None of the reserves had the capability of fighting fires with a volunteer fire department.

These are the changes that are occurring. They are very significantly different. Yes, they are at a great expense to the taxpayers, but I think willingly spent to assist people who are far less fortunate than we are.

In fact, moneys are now in the hands of native business people who have taken another new initiative. They have approached the Government of Canada to assist them in developing and funding their own businesses. I have some tremendous examples of that existing on some of the reserves in the Interlake in the Province of Manitoba.

I am sure that if some of my Alberta colleagues and members from British Columbia who spoke earlier were polled, we would find evidence today of tremendous amounts of funding that the Government of Canada has used to assist in developing native businesses with the help and assistance of tax dollars which gives these businesses a chance to establish the pride of ownership and to compete in what could be considered a very difficult market.

I heard one of the members here speak today about the fact that all too often the bad news is reported when a business attempt is made and funds have been expended. All too often the finger is pointed immediately indicating that we have wasted money. People say that we did not approach the problem the right way, or that the bureaucrats made a bad decision or should have known better. I recognize this does occur. I am no different from some of my colleagues when we see not so much the fact than an Indian has taken an initiative and lost, but that he may have been guided by a non–Indian. In fact, there may have been some individuals who have wanted to take advantage of the system to create personal gain. This does occur.

I agree with my colleague who spoke earlier. We should not always highlight the failed projects. Certainly, there are some very good and very effective projects that have worked for constituents and for Indians who desired to have their own business.

There is a tremendous amount of evidence of change that has occurred with regard to bringing about self–government, self-fulfilment and improved opportunities through education and our health care system. I think this government has no apologies to make to anyone in terms of its effort to continue that process.

I would like to thank again the member for Nunatsiaq for his efforts in trying to look after the broad constituency that he represents.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to lend my unqualified support to the motion put before us. I would like to thank my colleagues, the member for Nunatsiaq and the member for Kenora—Rainy River, for their initiative in bringing this matter before the House.

I grew up in Hagersville which is on the edge of both the Six Nations Reserve and the Mississauga of the New Credit Reserve. Half of the school population in the school I attended as I was growing up was made up of students from those two reserves. So I do know a bit about what I speak.

I am quite ashamed to say that a lot of the problems aboriginal youth were having back then are still the same problems that they are having today. I quite frankly do not think that we as a society or we as Canadian legislators have taken our role in helping to solve these problems.

I want to start off with a quote from the Canadian Human Rights Commission. "An Indian youngster in Canada has a better chance of being sent to prison than completing university."

I quote that statement to inform all members of the House of the gravity of the situation we are talking about here.

We have heard a lot of talk lately about intolerance from Canadian society. Pins, T-shirts and public opinion polls are causing the media to conclude that maybe we in Canada are not the equal, tolerant and just society that we think we are. I am quite sure that that realization came as no surprise to the aboriginal peoples of our country.

• (1740)

For the past two years the Canadian Human Rights Commission has described the situation of Canada's aboriginal peoples as a national tragedy. The statistics are startling.

The aboriginal peoples of Canada face infant mortality rates and medical neglect on a scale which other Canadians have never had to face. Aboriginal peoples face depression, substance addiction and suicide on a scale that Canadians in other parts of Canada surely do not realize and surely will never have to face.

The suicide rate among the Inuit in the Northwest Territories, for instance, is four times the national average. Over half of the suicides are among Inuits between the ages of 15 to 24.

The incidence of tuberculosis is seven to ten times higher than the national Canadian average.

The infant mortality rate among Indian babies is more than twice the national average. The Inuit infant mortality rate is more than three times the national average. If we think of all the human suffering that is behind those statistics, we will think that this House should be doing more. Parents see their babies die. Teenagers find a brother or a sister who has committed suicide. Each of us in this House knows that the suffering is unacceptable. The most tragic thing of all is that we know that it does not have to be this way. This human suffering is avoidable.

The motion before us aims to call the government's attention to the need for more government action. The needs of our aboriginal peoples require the immediate development of special initiatives in the area of health, employment and education. These initiatives must be developed first and foremost only after consultations with aboriginal peoples—real consultations as they have been described lately.

There is no doubt that the programs and the initiatives that work are those which are developed by aboriginal peoples themselves. They must be consulted before, not after, the development of these programs.

There are encouraging signs that aboriginal peoples were succeeding in consolidating their belief systems in the education of their children. There is more hope for the future than there was in the past, but it is a long way away.

There are other pressing needs in the areas of employment, education and health. Census figures in 1986 found that the average Indian income was half that of the general population.

The Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs recently released its second report. In that report it is stated that while there was a wealth of ideas and energy on the part of aboriginal people in the area of economic development, for instance, there has been little improvement in recent years in bridging the gap between aboriginal and non-aboriginal income.

The unemployment rate of aboriginal people is shocking. It ranges somewhere in the neighbourhood of between 35 per cent and 50 per cent.

As my colleague from Nunatsiaq pointed out earlier in the debate on this motion, an aboriginal youth employment crisis is looming on the horizon. This government needs to take action now.

Two-thirds of the Indian population is under the age of 25. Between 1987 and 1997, 140,000 aboriginal people will become eligible to join the labour force. If aboriginal employment rates are not maintained—and we are not talking about improving but just maintaining them—8,000 new jobs will be required by aboriginal people each year.

The federal government has got to take the lead in developing employment initiatives and providing jobs for these people, to take advantage of the ideas and the creativity which is being demonstrated by these aboriginal groups.

The federal government's own record is not what it should be. Little improvement has been made in the employment rates of aboriginal people in the federal public service and other employees covered by the Employment Equity Act.

Between 1987 and 1988 it was reported that the representation increased by only .07 per cent. There has not been enough done in this area.

According to the 1989 Canadian Human Rights Commission report, at the present growth rate it will take another 20 years before aboriginal employment reaches even 2.1 per cent, which is the current level of their availability in the workforce.

More must be done to improve employment and economic development opportunities for our aboriginal peoples. Educational opportunities are vital for the future of aboriginal youth and the success of aboriginal economic endeavours.

Approximately 60 per cent of Indians have a Grade 9 education. That figure is lower among aboriginal peoples of the Northwest Territories.

The Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs reports serious concerns that exist over the low quality of elementary and secondary education that aboriginal children are now receiving. The government has decided to restrain the growth of the funding which helps Indian students to attend post-secondary education institutions. We had that debate earlier and nothing has been done since to improve that situation.

The Human Rights Commission had these words to say in response to the government's restraint on growth: "We have understood on several occasions that given the importance of education, and particularly technical and post-secondary education, it would be worse than short-sighted not to guarantee every possible opportunity to enable native persons to pursue their schooling."

In closing, I call upon all members of this House to support the motion before us. I urge and encourage the government to develop the special initiatives necessary to deal with the health, employment and educational needs of Canada's aboriginal people.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to address the subject of the employment opportunities for aboriginal youth in Canada's north.

For six years as the member for the riding of Timiskaming I had the opportunity to have the lower end of James Bay, the communities of Moosonee and Moose Factory as part of my riding. I was able to work with the groups in that area and along the James Bay coast. Unfortunately, through redistribution, I lost the opportunity of representing them, but I still have the people of that area very close to my heart.

The youth of any society are its strength and hope for the future. This statement is particularly true in Canada's north. Its aboriginal people are in a period of transition, adapting their traditional ways of life to today's needs. Unfortunately, the transition has not been an easy one.

This government realizes there are certain stark realities that must be addressed. The Human Rights Commissioner, in his recent report, pointed out that unemployment, the exception for most Canadians, is the norm for aboriginal Canadians. Off reserve, in terms of their percentage of the population, aboriginal Canadians are under-represented in the workplace in virtually ever sector of the Canadian economy.

While the problems are very clear, their resolution is not. This government is aware that a long term commitment is necessary to achieve the ultimate goal of self-reliance and self-sufficiency for Canada's aboriginal people.

Nowhere is the problem more complex than in the north, where there are limited wage-earning opportunities over all, and relatively few employment opportunities for unskilled workers. More important, the Indian and Inuit population has a significantly lower level of education and skills. This is related to a number of factors, including cultural differences and difficulty of access to schooling.

Another factor of particular interest is the age structure of the Inuit population, which is markedly different from the rest of Canada. In 1981, the median age of the Inuit was 18, versus 30 for the Canadian population. In 1991, there will still be a 12 year gap between the median ages of both groups. The gap will widen in the longer term to a 15 year age difference in the year 2001—the median age for the Inuit will be 23 compared to 38 for all of Canada.

This relative youthfulness of the Inuit population has important implications for government initiatives. While the Canadian population is aging into retirement and will be demanding increased social services such as geriatric health care and housing for the aged, the Inuit population is entering into the working-age groups and will need labour market oriented services such as training, employment opportunities and assistance for economic development.

I am aware that education is the best way to combat the social malaise and physical hardship that now afflict too many native Canadians. I also know that assistance for Indian post-secondary education is one of the most successful programs the federal government has ever undertaken. The issue of education is an important one that I would like to address in depth at another time.

At the moment, I would like to deal with the initiatives this government has undertaken to stimulate the training and employment opportunities so vital to the youth of the north.

The Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, announced last June, will provide long-term employment and business opportunities to Canada's aboriginal citizens, by giving them the means to manage effectively their own business enterprises, economic institutions, job training and skill development.

This strategy is a long term commitment by its very nature. While previous programs were limited by a sunset clause, this strategy will be on a continuing basis. It represents a government commitment of close to $874 million for its first five years.

Throughout, we will be seeking assurances from aboriginal business and community leaders, provincial and territorial governments and the Canadian business community at large, that they will work together to bring Indian and Inuit people to a new level of economic self-reliance.

A skills development component of the program, to be delivered by Canada Employment and Immigration, will be of particular importance to Indian and Inuit youth in the north. It will provide and increase managerial, professional and vocational skills through training at community colleges, universities and other institutions.

This strategy is not a first by any means, but merely the latest in a series of programs this government has implemented to stimulate employment in the north and throughout Canada.

Over the past five years of Canada-Northwest Territories economic development agreements, $29.6 million will have been spent promoting income and employment growth in the tourism, small business, mining, renewable resources and arts and crafts sectors of the economy.

Over the past five years, this government contributed the largest share of the $21.7 million spent under Canada-Yukon economic development programming which, among other things, promoted the development of businesses maximizing employment and investment opportunities for Yukoners.

No review of employment measures would be complete without considering the measures taken by the government to ensure that the training and employment benefits of claims settlements are enjoyed by claims beneficiaries. Subagreements in each agreement in principle pave the way for concrete steps to ensure training and employment opportunities are marketed aggressively to the beneficiaries, ensuring that the opportunities created by the settlements flow to the claimants.

This kind of collaborative economic development programming is important because of its multi-faceted approach and the fact that it recognizes that the role of the federal government is to support, to the extent possible, the decisions and goals that northerners make and set to themselves.

These are important initiatives. They clearly and amply illustrate the role this government is playing in assisting the employment of aboriginal youth in the north. The future belongs to the youth and we are ensuring they are equipped to meet the challenges of new opportunities and to carry future generations forward along the same self-sufficient path.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion before the House.

This motion focuses on the employment, economic and health needs of Canada's aboriginal youth. While these matters are of profound importance, they are also clearly more than just another excuse for partisan debate.

The fundamental problems and concerns involved are hardly new. What is new, however, is the determination and clear direction which this government has demonstrated in addressing these problems and concerns which have had their origins in the earliest days of settlement in this land.

I will not attempt to address all of the issues contained in this motion. In the next few moments, however, I would like to deal with the matters of economic prospects and opportunities for aboriginal youth in Canada. Many approaches have been tried and much serious effort has been made by previous federal governments to address the legitimate and pressing concerns of Canada's aboriginal peoples in general and aboriginal youth in particular.

Why then are we here today debating the same issues and the same concerns which have been the subject of such vigorous efforts in the past? At least part of the answer lies in the complexity of the issues themselves.

Yet another important part of the answer lies in the realization that only a long-term commitment to the achievement of self-reliance and self-sufficiency by Canada's aboriginal people will help to build the basis for genuine and lasting economic and social progress.

How exactly is that progress defined? It is defined in terms of achieving real increases in average income levels and employment rates. It is defined in terms of an expanded and flourishing business base, a better trained and more mobile aboriginal labour force, and a stronger aboriginal management and entrepreneurial capacity. It is defined in this government's Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, announced in June of last year.

I would hope that the majority of hon. members are already well acquainted with the details of this strategy. Unlike previous aboriginal economic development programs, which were limited by deliberate sunset provisions, this strategy will be on a continuing basis.

Supporting this process is a minimum federal government commitment of close to $873 million for the first five years of the strategy. This strategy brings together aboriginal business and community leaders, provincial and territorial governments, and the Canadian business community in a new national partnership. It is a partnership designed to bring aboriginal people to a new level of economic self-reliance with the means to effectively manage their own business enterprises, economic institutions and their own job training and skills development.

Just as the orientation for this strategy is long term, its development did not come overnight. Two years of intensive consultation were undertaken, involving a number of federal departments and representatives of aboriginal people from across Canada. The result is an integrated approach.

This strategy takes into account developmental training, management and ongoing project-support requirements. It offers substantial new opportunities for aboriginal individuals and communities to develop and expand commercial enterprises and to obtain long-term employment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have more than seven minutes, but I realize we are subject to certain constraints.

On June 25, 1987, the government tabled in the House of Commons a new Official Languages Act, to replace the 1969 legislation that had become obsolete. The new Act was passed by this House on July 7, 1988 and by the Senate on July 27 the same year. It received royal assent on July 28, 1988, 13 months after it was tabled.

To be effective, Mr. Speaker, legislation must be accompanied by clear and precise regulations with respect to the language of service, language of work and equitable participation. Those are the three major points this legislation was supposed to clarify, and it was to provide clear and precise guidelines on language of service, language of work and equitable participation.

As the responsible department, Treasury Board was to conduct preliminary consultations with minority groups, which was done in the spring of 1989, when I met Treasury Board's Deputy Secretary, Official Languages Branch, who told me that preliminary consultations had taken place with the Fédération des francophones hors Québec, Alliance Quebec and six or seven provincial associations across Canada.

At the time, preliminary consultations were scheduled with the SANB, the Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick, in Moncton that week and with the Yukon shortly afterwards. I am talking about March 1989, exactly one year ago. So, consultations with minority groups as required under section 84 of the legislation; approval of draft regulations by cabinet, I suppose, and probably, tabling in the House according to the usual procedure so that members can become acquainted with the regulations, as required under section 85 of the Act.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation comes into force after a long and complex process. However, as the government keeps putting off tabling its regulations, it will become increasingly difficult for Canadians to find out how the legislation will affect them.

I asked the President of the Treasury Board on April 11, 1989 when we would have the regulations under Bill C-72, the Official Languages Act. He assured me they would be tabled by December 1989. Well, Mr. Speaker, April 1990 is here and we still do not have anything.

The lack of action of the government in promoting a new law and informing Canadians on its application is such that Canada is now facing a situation which is getting worse every day. Instead of implementing regulations and launching an information campaign on the actual application of the new law, the government is behaving like a silent witness and doing nothing to counter the misinformation spread throughout the country by certain extremist groups.

Official language minority groups are trying to defend as best they can the language policies the Conservative government is afraid to uphold.

Mr. Speaker, in his annual report tabled in the House two days ago, the Commissioner of Official Languages rightly criticizes the government's lack of action in putting forward regulations that have been too long in coming. He said, and I quote: "We must have the courage to carry through without fear of negative reaction. After all, we are not launching a revolution!"

The Commissioner even compared the lack of leadership shown by the Conservative government and the Prime Minister to a bad conductor. I refer those interested to the annual report which is quite interesting and, I think, fair.

Mr. Speaker, this why on April 3, after waiting 21 months for regulations which have yet to be released, I asked the Prime Minister to show some firm leadership and instruct his ministers to stand in their places. The President of the Treasury Board told me me he had not yet consulted with minority groups.

Mr. Speaker, I phoned every single minority association in Canada and was told that consultations are over. It is true that after my question Treasury Board officials called the FFHQ and asked for a meeting. But no proceedings nor any meeting with the associations had been arranged before I raised the question.

Obviously the Conservative government is either afraid of extremist group reactions or inefficient in its negotiations—and today I said as much to the President of the Treasury Board. I am sorry but things are moving so slowly that one has to wonder whether he has become an expert at all-time delaying tactics stalling or whether he is simply a bad negotiator. I know he is a good negotiator, so something is wrong somewhere. Something seems to be difficult to settle in this case. The commissioner's threatened resignation yesterday came as a shock, and I strongly suggest the government should not exacerbate the situation and let it deteriorate to the point where the commissioner, the official languages ombudsman, points a critical finger at the government in his annual report and goes as far as saying he might resign, an officer of the Parliament of Canada!

• (1805)

Mr. Speaker, The Commissioner of Official Languages said: Very little has been done in terms of the official languages over the past ten years. I quote: During the firtst ten years of the Trudeau administration there were people who did look after the official languages issue and much progress was accomplished. Again I quote: Since the Conservatives are in office, he said, the ratio of federal employees who meet the linguistic requirements of their duties has decreased.

Mr. Speaker, we do have linguistic problems in this country. I ask the government to do something, to give us right away the regulations of Bill C-72 so that we know just what the government plans to do in this matter.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, allow me to respond to the concerns of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board.

[English]

The member has expressed in the House on many occasions his deep concern for the official language policy of the Government of Canada. His concern is no deeper than that of the President of the Treasury Board and members on this side of the House of Commons. That was expressed very effectively in the Official Languages Act which was enacted by the House of Commons in 1987. No greater faith in the policy of duality of languages in Canada could be expressed than was by the enactment of a statute in the House of Commons.

What remains to be done is the full implementation of that statute and I want to assure the hon. member of the good faith of the President of the Treasury Board and the Government of Canada in that implementation process.

May I draw a personal analogy, Mr. Speaker? The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is a life-long resident and native of the national capital region, as is the President of the Treasury Board. Those people understand very well the two solitudes in Canada coming together and being one. They are leaders, as indeed they should be, in this evolutionary process. But they must realize that it is a evolutionary process and that moderation is required. Moderation and will win the day, not pre-emptory action that will not accomplish the desired end.

There is evolution and development every day. We have heard in the House and other places that the Greater Vancouver Regional District just recently passed a resolution supporting the linguistic duality of our nation. It urged all Canadians from coast to coast to display the tolerance and understanding necessary to the building of Canada as a unified nation and constructive member of both the English-speaking and French-speaking parts of the world community. I think that is what we all want to accomplish.

The question is how do we accomplish it? Do we accomplish it by simply pushing forward regulations and forcing them on Canadians, or do we go through a consultation process to ensure that everyone is in agreement on how the official language policy should be implemented. As the hon. member well knows, that is what the President of the Treasury Board is seeking to do and is doing. He has consulted, in accordance with the provisions of the Official Languages Act, with the linguistic minority groups. He has spoken, as required by the act, to a number of people.

Evidence of that is in the action by the Vancouver group. If we see evidence of that across Canada, we know that people are gathering around this policy, this principle of language duality as represented by the Official Languages Act.

The member complains that time is passing and action is not sufficient to meet his desires. He has to realize that it is a difficult process but the goal is to convince all Canadians of the benefits of the official languages policy.

The President of the Treasury Board has time and time again committed himself to this task. The Government of Canada is committed to this task. I do not know why the member raises this complaint. To answer my own question, I do know why. The Commissioner of Official Languages raised this point and he wants to take advantage of it. I do not fault the member for that. The more he raises it and brings public attention to this issue the more people will understand the need for progress.

• (1810)

The Official Languages Commissioner has his job to do and he has done it well. He has brought it to the attention of the House of Commons and all Canadians. I assure the member and the Official Languages Commissioner that the government is proceeding at the appropriate rate of speed. It is consulting, it is ensuring that the end product will be satisfactory to all Canadians and will accomplish the desired end of unanimous consent and concurrence to official language policy.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today on what I think is a very timely debate. As you know, I rose in the House last Friday to question the Minister of Forestry about the British Columbia–Canada forest agreement which was expiring the day after. That was actually an anniversary date. It was more bad timing by the government because that was the anniversary date for the expiry of forest agreements in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario, and not just for a week or two, but for a full year.

I rose to ask that question of the minister. I am pleased that his parliamentary secretary is here today to respond. Perhaps he could make an announcement in the Chamber tonight about the forestry agreement. I want to raise my concerns about how important that agreement has been to the provinces I mentioned but, more particularly, how important it is to the province of British Columbia.

The Forest Resource Development Agreement has meant thousands and thousands of people employed in silvicultural work in British Columbia. It has been used primarily to replant what we call our backlog NSR, the Not Satisfactorily Restocked land. It has provided funds for research and it has helped focus activity at both the federal and provincial levels of government to tackle our problems with forests.

It is because of the debate concerning our forests today in this country, in my province especially, that this agreement is so important. It is important because it gives a role to the federal government to work with the provinces at a very basic level in terms of employment opportunity. The B.C. forest agreement contributes close to 600,000 additional cubic metres per year to the annual cut in British Columbia. That means people get jobs because of the forest agreement.

We have been calling on the government and the provincial government to renew that agreement for some time now. We had commitments from the federal Minister of Forestry in April, 1989; June, 1989; October, 1989; December, 1989; and now we are told, after the agreement has expired, that we have to wait some more, we have to wait until planting season. Well, I do not think that is good enough and the people of British Columbia do not think that is good enough.

It is important that we do not let the government of British Columbia off the hook either. This is a process of setting priorities, priorities by the federal government and priorities by the provincial government.

We have had the most unfortunate situation where the Premier of British Columbia hollered loudly last fall for this government to cut transfer payments to the provinces. This government did that and then the Premier cried "foul". The Premier of British Columbia has pulled the rug out from under his Minister of Forests. I think this is the eighth one. As far as I know he is still the Minister of Forests in British Columbia.

We now have the spectacle of the federal Minister of Forestry saying that the initial British Columbia request to replant our forests is unreasonable. We now have the current provincial Minister of Forests saying that the initial request that his previous colleague developed is utopian. This is a shellgame between the Conservatives in Ottawa and the Socreds in Victoria, and it is our forests that are going to suffer.

We have been arguing with my provincial colleague, the MLA from Prince Rupert, and our entire New Democratic caucus. In particular, the B.C. members of this house have been arguing for this agreement.

• (1815)

The premier is in Prince George tomorrow. The provincial minister is there. The federal minister is sneaking in Friday night. They should use the occasion in Prince George tomorrow to sign an agreement that reflects the range of $800 million to $1 billion as identified by the silvicultural and forestry communities as necessary to replant our forests in B.C. That is how important this agreement is.

These agreements across the country have, in varied ways, done different things. In Alberta there has been considerable research into developing some added value qualities. Ontario has gone a year without an agreement. While the federal minister has suggested that the Liberals in Queen's Park have not made a lot of noise about renewing the agreement, I can at least echo the words of the provincial minister, who is suggesting that at a time when the sustainable development of our forest is so important, there is a reduction in the federal commitment.

That is not good enough. The people of British Columbia and other provinces want that agreement signed, and they want it signed today.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my colleague from British Columbia. I would first of all like to thank him for especially pointing out that the latest series of federal-provincial forestry agreements has been very beneficial, for his province and all the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind him that since 1984, the federal government has been strongly committed to forestry. Just think of all the agreements that were signed, the first series providing over $1 billion, of which more than $600 came from the federal government, to see what a priority forestry is for our government.

I would also like to remind my colleague that since the late 1950s, 1957-60, this is the first time we have a full Forestry Department independent of other departments like Agriculture or Environment.

I would also remind my colleague that all three parties in this House unanimously agreed to restore a Department of Forestry because we know how very important this industry is for our country's economic and social health, in all provinces of Canada, Mr. Speaker, and that of course includes British Columbia.

I would also remind my colleague—and if you have some honesty in politics, you must admit it—that the oppostion often accuses us, the federal government, of not having done anything last year. I would like to remind my colleague that the minister of Forestry firmly intends to renew the agreements in each of the provinces. It is obvious; we just have to mention the New Brunswick agreement, which was improved, the Nova Scotia agreement, the Prince Edward Island agreement. We just have to mention the Eastern Quebec Development Plan, which was renewed. We just have to mention the willingness of the minister, who travelled from Newfoundland to Vancouver, met with concerned groups and discussed with people.

Mr. Speaker, it's nice to say: We absolutely want a forestry agreement, it's vital to our province. However, conscienscious people, people who believe in consultation and can accept ideas from other people nevertheless have to start by sitting down with the people concerned and determine what the needs are, analyse them and, if funds are available, make agreements and allocate amounts that could be most beneficial to the forest sector.

That is precisely what the Minister of Forestry has been doing for the past year. I would like to point out to my colleague that the minister has met numerous people, in British Columbia as well as in Quebec and Ontario. And our minister speaks the truth, Mr. Speaker, when he says: "There should be more consultation with the provinces." The provinces must also give us the feedback we need regarding forestry. I think that is important, because this government does not intend to act unilaterally as far as the forest sector is concerned.

What we are expecting from the Department of Forestry is— It is important that the agreement takes into account the needs of the environment, sustainable development, quality supplies for our businesses, and decent salaries for our forestry workers. That is what the Minister of Forestry has been working for and I hope my hon. colleague will support such a worthy approach, not only for a political party, but also for a very important sector of our economy, namely our Canadian society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should reinstate core funding for women's centres, to enable those centres to continue to provide essential information, referral and support services to women.

She said: Madam Speaker, this is a very important motion on a very important issue. The devastation to women's centres by this latest budget cut really speaks to not only a lack of fiscal support for women's centres but a concerted political effort on the part of this government to silence the voice of dissent of women across Canada.

Women's centres grew out of the recommendations of the 1970 Royal Commission on the Status of Women. That royal commission spoke of the real inequality that women faced in our country. The recommendations of the royal commission were being implemented gradually, painfully slowly, across Canada. Women's centres were playing a significant role in this process.

Women's centres are necessary. Some of the services that they provide include services for battered women who do not know where to turn, where the nearest shelter is, or how to get there, or even which lawyers they would best talk to. Women's centres provide that information and sometimes they are adjacent to the very services which a battered woman would require.

Teenage women get information regarding sexuality or sexually transmitted diseases and the location of supportive health centres. Women's centres provide that information. There are homeless women right here in Ottawa. The Women's Place in Ottawa has operated as a drop-in centre for homeless women on weekends because there was a gap in social services provided by municipal and other services.

The centres can tell jobless women, newly divorced women, young women, or older women who may not know where to start looking for a job what job programs are available for them and can provide counselling.

Centres inform mothers and parents what child care facilities are available in a community; they advise immigrant and visible minority women what programs are available to them, what organizations can help them.

Women's centres can help sexually harassed women and those who are discriminated against at work, by telling them what the law says, and explaining their rights. Many have a list of lawyers who can help them.

All women and men in a community can use the resources of a women's centre. They provide public information and public education on women's issues. They speak out on matters affecting women.

With these latest cuts, 100 per cent of their core funding, these services are going to be at least drastically reduced if not eliminated completely in some cases. That is going to have a very negative impact for the kind of work we have tried to do over the years to implement the recommendations of that Royal commission report.

For example, in Whitehorse, cuts to women's and to native organizations' funding means a cut to 80 per cent of the voluntary organizations in the Yukon. This is a pattern that has evolved over time.

The Secretary of State's women's program was cut in the 1989-90 budget by $2 million. In the last budget it was cut by a further $1.6 million.

At the same time, the argument is that we have to address our deficit. I think there is no one in this House who is going to deny that the deficit has to be addressed and reduced, but the debate is about the way in which that is being done.

In this same budget that reduced the core funding for over 75 women's centres by 100 per cent, there were increases as well. There was an increase to the budget for CSIS in the amount of $33 million. There were also $14 million allocated for advertising for the GST. We can see where the priorities of the government are. When you consider $33 million for CSIS and $14 million for advertising for the GST, $1.6 million is a very small amount, and one wonders how credible the argument is that this is a cut that is necessary to reduce the deficit.

It is also very interesting that it comes at a time when this government has been spoken to very forcefully by the women of Canada in their opposition to the initiatives under Bill C–43, the recriminalization of abortion. I do not believe that it is just a coincidence.

I think there is a political agenda that is being followed here. The voices of women from those women's centres and their ability to do organizing in communities has been profoundly limited by these budget cuts. What is happening now is that those women's centres are now having to redirect their energies by fundraising, in order to keep their centres open and in order to do project analyses and write up project proposals.

Having been the Chair of the board of our local women's centre in Victoria, I know the kind of energy that has to be put into that paperwork. The staff of those women's centres are often paid very little. They are dependent upon volunteer work as well. I know the staff of our women's centre in Victoria was paid about $22,000 a year, which is probably the national average.

One does not work in those centres in order to get rich. One works there because of the hope that ultimately the recommendations from the Royal commission's report of 1970 will come to fruition and that there will be real equality for women in Canada. Those women staffers, right from Victoria to Newfoundland, are committed women who are doing the government's work at a very low wage. They are doing it with commitment and passion. It is a very effective way of trying to implement what the government itself has set out. So, again the argument that the cut of the $1.6 million is a deficit reduction initiative falls flat.

There is another agenda here. The agenda is to silence women, but I can tell you that women will not be silenced. We have seen, throughout the week, the initiatives of women who will not be silenced. We have seen them from Newfoundland to Port Alberni and to the north.

The 100 per cent cut to core funding for the women's resource centre in Whitehorse, in the Yukon, means that that centre will have to close its doors. The closest women's centre, if that is closed, is in Port Coquitlam, British Columbia. Is that what the government means by alternatives?

What are we going to do? Are we to pay air fare for women to come and consult? Are we to pay long distance phone charges? No.

The reason that these funds are being reduced is to silence women, and women will not be silenced. It fits in with this government's agenda to silence the poor of Canada. The poor will not be silenced.

My colleague from Mission—Coquitlam, in her duty as social policy critic, has met with a number of low income women and low income men who are dependent on social services. These are the kinds of people we should be looking after.

It really speaks about the role of government when we talk about cuts to women's programs. Who are we supposed to be helping through our taxation system? Is it the people that are already doing well enough? The government seems to think so. The cuts to women's centres, native centres and other initiatives can make the government uncomfortable. I think it is a quite blatant political act to keep them quiet.

I would like to turn to the effect of the closure of centres. In British Columbia the following women's centres are about to close: the women's centres in Chetwynd, Fort St. John, Howe Sound, Kelowna, Penticton, Port Alberni, and Kitimat.

We have asked repeatedly to meet with the minister responsible, the Secretary of State. He has sent officials with no power to make changes to the funding situation. These officials further angered the women, and I think the minister responsible has also incurred their wrath. Last Monday, the women members of our caucus sent a letter to the minister asking for a meeting at his convenience. We have not received a response.

This is an urgent situation, and that is why we are using this opposition day to put forth this motion. I think it is a black mark on this government if it feels it can get away with this, and there will be continuing civil disobedience if it is to continue.

We should also focus on the fact that the government's international reputation will be sullied by this action. The government is breaking international treaties by this initiative. Canada has signed the UN convention for the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women. The government has also gone along with the Nairobi forward looking strategies.

Canada cannot say one thing in international fora and another thing at home. We are talking about $1.6 million dollars, a piddling amount when we consider some of the other initiatives that have been increased by this government in what is being applauded as a deficit reducing budget. Canadians are not fooled at all.

In responding to questions on the committee for the elimination of discrimination against women about the country's success in combating discrimination against women, the permanent representation of Canada at the United Nations explained that it was the strength of the Canadian feminist movement and the commitment of Canada's leaders to the equal rights for women. How does eliminating the core funding for women's centres demonstrate the commitment to equal rights for women? There may be some painful logic, and I am willing to listen to it today.

The women's movement is constantly undermined by funding cuts and the refusal by government to meet with the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, Canada's largest women's lobby group, made up of over 600 women's organizations. Not only has this budget cut $1.6 million from women's centres funding, it has also cut funds available to feminist publications. I think that is also a concerted effort to reduce the ability of those publications to work effectively and to bring the women's agenda to light. There is a concerted attack on women's equality through those reductions. I remind the House that this is a cut of $1.6 million, compared to a $33 million increase for the budget of CSIS.

That comparison alone speaks to the government's agenda, of this government's priority, and of its lack of commitment to promoting the equality of women. It is a black day if this government continues with this initiative. I hope the minister responsible will go back to his cabinet colleagues. I also hope the Minister responsible for the Status of Women will carry out her responsibilities for the status of women and will ask her cabinet colleagues, as my motion indicates, that the funds be reinstated for those women's centres so that the women of Canada, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, to Yukon, to Yellowknife, will be able to do their work as they have done in a a very efficient, effective, low cost and committed way.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words today concerning women's centres in relation to comments that the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands has made.

Some 10 years ago in Scarborough we set up a women's centre. I was a member of the board founding that centre. It was very important to establish the centre in order to reach out to women who are having difficulty so that we could as sisters help them. In the process of setting up that women's centre we looked for funds. We spent a lot of time around the table filling in those applications, getting the right words in order that the funding would become available, but at no time did we believe 10 years ago that our sole funding for women's centres was to be from the federal government.

At that time we were looking to foundations, to the community, and to fund raising events to see how we could have funding from various levels. I am very pleased today, thanks to two very wonderful individuals in Scarborough, Nina Willcocks and Linda Davis, who have diversified this funding so that now there is very little funding from various levels of government in order to provide services for social justice and economic equality for the women in Scarborough.

I have a question and comment. The hon. member speaks about funding cuts. Let us look at some of the numbers. In 1984–85, the year just before the Conservative Party took over the government, the funding was about $8 million for women's programs under Secretary of State. There has been a tremendous increase in that funding. In 1988–89 it was $13 million.

The commitment demonstrated by a number of women within our own party in order to increase funding dramatically over the last six years is a great credit to the government and these women. Many have benefited from those programs.

I think that it is time that we started setting some of the record straight in terms of the advantages we have been able to provide for women, such as jobs and the number of women who have been able to establish their own businesses. Two-thirds of the businesses in Canada started in the last six years have been started by women.

I wanted to set the record straight. I look forward to doing so as we progress through this debate.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, it is a very good idea to set the record straight. Let me begin my remarks by setting the record straight regarding the 1990–91 commitment for women. The women's program has been cut to $9 million from $13 million. We are back nearly to 1984–85 levels. When we take inflation into account, that shows the real commitment to women's centres.

We should really address what the government is trying to do by having women focus on fund raising. Every minute used to raise funds is a minute taken away from organizing and creating real change in Canada. Do not think that women are fooled. They are not.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I would like to direct a question to my colleague. How does she explain to the people at women centres that there is no money from the federal government, while at the same time it can find $16 million to spend on a GST that is going to be detrimental to women and their families and is not supported by 80 per cent of Canadian population? Since the funding for women's centres is obviously supported by the vast majority of Canadian women and men, how does she explain to women this tremendous contradiction in the Tory government policy?

Ms. Hunter: I think the women and men of Canada have seen through the pained logic that this is going to assist in reducing the deficit and have seen that this is a concerted political act to silence women. I do not try to explain the kind of logic that will allow for $14 million in advertising for the GST, which as my colleague points out is going to be hurting the very women and men the centres are trying to assist.

The redistributive capacity of our tax system is at stake here. We are talking about what the government should be doing with our money and the kind of initiatives that this government has undertaken since it gained office again in 1988. It has spoken very clearly about the kind of direction it believes it should take.

The women and the women's centres have voiced very clearly their opposition to the government's agenda. I think that is one of the reasons for this latest round of cuts. The government is using these cuts to silence women.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I happen to be the member of Parliament for the riding of Mission—Coquitlam where the Port Coquitlam women's centre is located. To set the record straight, I would like to tell hon. members that 100 per cent of funding is not expected by that woman's centre or any other women's centre from this government.

I would like to ask hon. members in this House to consider information about the monetary value of the volunteer time put into women's centres.

The volunteer time amounts to 2,700 hours. If we multiply that by $10.50 an hour, which is the average hourly wage paid to counsellors across the country, we see it equals $28,350. That is how much our collective time as women is worth.

If we multiply the $28,350 figure by the 33 women's centres in British Columbia we get $935,550, almost double what it would cost to keep these centres open.

In setting the record straight, we have to remember that women are putting in $935,550 for centres that service 231,000 women in British Columbia. I would say that is darn good value for any dollar the government puts forward.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am particularly pleased that parliamentarians have an opportunity today to reflect on the contributions that women have been making to this country. Indeed, I am pleased to be examining what progress we have been making in terms of equal opportunity and equal access that almost all of us have made the cause of our lives.

This particular day will certainly mark for all of us the beginning of a renewed opportunity to stop marginalizing and trivializing the very, very important activities that have been so instrumental in providing women with the opportunity to gain equality and social justice. Programs have been advocating that. They have been helping to provide the services that have been very essential. I have been very quick to note the effectiveness of those very programs.

Today the opposition day is focusing on core funding. The motion states that the government should reinstate core funding. I am not sure there are three people in the country, outside certain people inside the ministry itself, who understand what core funding or sustaining funding is all about.

Mrs. Maheu: You tell them, Gerry.

Mr. Weiner: What is clearly at stake is whether any expenses dealing with administrative overhead, such as rent and lights, can be included as admissible expenses. If you want to call it core, you can call it core. You can call it project or program. What we have indicated in a very open manner is that the criteria that are established are flexible enough to allow many of those expenses as admissible expenses under the program or project funding.

The question is not whether it can be described as core funding, because some groups receive core funding and some women's centres do not. In the Province of Quebec there are some 78 women's centres, 39 of them had received some sustaining funding, the other 39 did not. I might add that there are more women's centres that do not receive any federal funding compared to those that do.

It always hurts when trying to administer a program to have a little less. This particular area, at the moment, has a little less. But this should not minimize the government's commitment to bring forward a strong cross-government commitment in terms of every single ministry, in terms of every single department, in making sure that once and for all this country is a full and equal opportunity society.

We will have an opportunity today to review all of the government's programming in the women's areas, so that we can set the record straight.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Milliken: You mean you're going to start to admit to some of the blunders?

Mr. Weiner: I hear a lot of snickers, but snickers from that party which trivialized the women of the nation in terms of its programs and commitments—

Mrs. Maheu: Who started the programs?

Mr. Weiner: We have a record not just in terms of appointment, but in terms of full participation that is the envy of anybody sitting on the other side of the House. You have no reason to snicker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Clancy: Programs started by Liberal governments.

Mr. Weiner: Madam Speaker, I hear the gallery, and we will talk to the gallery from time to time because I know they want to be actively involved. They have not asked to meet with me this week, and I will be very pleased when they do.

Ms. Langan: We have! And you won't meet with us.

Mr. Weiner: I have not heard from her.

I am here today to set the record straight on the government's commitment to fund women's centres, and to support women's programs and the women of Canada. Motions like the one we face today fuel unfounded fears.

Over the course of the last few days I have watched with dismay as misleading reports obscured the simple truth of the matter. The motion before the House on the issue of funding to women's centres gives me the opportunity to speak to all members and through them to all Canadians.

Madam Speaker, the opposition would have Canadians believe that the government is not interested in the women of Canada. Nothing is further from the truth! No other government in Canadian history has been so concerned with advancing women's rights and working with them for sexual equality in our society.

Let us leave controversy aside and rather look at the facts. Between 1980 and 1984, the Liberal government—

[English]

—you were there, sitting in your seats—

Ms. Clancy: I was not here in 1985.

[Translation]

Mr. Weiner: The Liberal government only spent $12 million on women's programs, Madam Speaker—only $12 million.

[English]

Our commitment far overshadows that. Since 1984, at Secretary of State, we have spent over $56 million to support Canadian women in their ongoing efforts against disadvantage and for equality.

Ms. Clancy: How about the money to REAL Women?

Mr. Weiner: This year, for example, we will be working with over 550 voluntary women's organizations building a vital partnership in every province and territory. For example, we have made a priority of programs which assist immigrant and visible minority women, women with disabilities and native women. We have assisted women's groups in improving their fundraising skills.

[Translation]

We are addressing the problem of family violence with a multi-year strategy that is giving concrete results. We have taken a government-wide approach, calling on the resources of my department and those of Health and Welfare, Indian and Northern Affairs and Justice, as well as Canada Mortgage and Housing.

[English]

We have responded to the issue of family violence with a budget of over $40 million, including some $22.5 million for CMHC's Project Haven which will provide 500 shelter units for women and children. But our commitment goes beyond funding.

The government has built up an impressive legislative record with amendments to the Canada Pension Plan, to the Pension Benefits Standards Act, to the Old Age Security Act, to the Indian Act and it enacted the first national Employment Equity Act. The list goes on and on.

The government has more than doubled the number of women appointed to federal boards, agencies and commissions.

The government has increased the number of women working at the deputy minister level from seven in 1984 to 21 today.

We have everything to be proud of, so I find pathetic the litany of gloom I hear from across the way. Let them measure their record against ours. I know what the outcome will be.

[Translation]

When the Prime Minister appointed me Secretary of State, he gave me the mission to do what I could to make equality a reality for all Canadians. Needless to say, real equality must include the group which makes up more than half the population of this country: Canadian women. That is exactly what the government has been doing over the past six years. We have done more for equality than any government before us.

Nevertheless, in hard times, one must make hard decisions. We cannot avoid them. The people of this country expect the government to be responsible.

• (1040)

[English]

As part of the government-wide expenditure reduction measures, my department's women's program budget was reduced from $11.2 million to $9.6 million. This reduction was part of an across-the-board effort affecting many departments. We simply must make sacrifices now to be able tomorrow to have the strong Canada we all desire.

Ms. Clancy: What do you mean "we"?

Mr. Weiner: This government recognizes the vital role women's centres play in the communities they serve and is committed to ensuring that they continue to carry on their activities.

[Translation]

The government knows and appreciates the activities organized by these centres. The women's centres are an important tool for the advancement of equality.

We have funded them and will continue to do so, to help them continue their invaluable efforts in this area. I would urge women's centres to apply for assistance for specific projects, and I can assure them they can also receive funding for the administrative costs involved.

[English]

This is the kind of funding that I announced yesterday in the House for the Second Storey Women's Centre in Bridgewater, Nova Scotia.

Ms. Clancy: Playing off one group against another.

Mr. Weiner: Women's centres will have priority in accessing project funding so that they can maintain their ability to carry out their activities that are mostly in their community—

Ms. Mitchell: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. I have a point of order from the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Ms. Mitchell: I am sorry to interrupt but I really feel I have to. I wonder if the minister would entertain a question on the point that he is making.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I can ask the hon. minister if he will entertain a question at this time, but there will be a period for questions and comments after the hon. minister has completed his intervention, when I will be delighted to recognize the hon. member. The hon. minister.

Mr. Weiner: I have instructed my officials to deal with these applications on an urgent basis. For years some 20 centres across the country have been securing project funding from my department. With this assistance they have carried out excellent work and made a significant contribution to their communities.

I cannot repeat often enough how important it is for the government to see women's groups diversify their funding. The Women's Program is not the sole source of financial assistance. Other federal departments such as National Health and Welfare, Employment and Immigration, Labour Canada, Justice and the Solicitor General's Department provide assistance as well.

Many provincial governments also appropriate funds for this purpose. Furthermore, an increasing number of women's groups are funded by other programs at the Department of the Secretary of State, including Multiculturalism, Official Languages, Native Women and Disabled Persons Participation.

My department's Women's Program is intended to help women's organizations that are working to promote equality. Let me assure you that the centres will continue to receive assistance for any specific projects that are eligible.

The program has never directly funded health or social services. I want to make it quite clear that the Women's Program is not, and has never been, responsible for subsidizing shelters for battered women. Consequently, the decision with respect to funding for women's centres does not affect battered women, since this type of service is not included in the program's terms of reference.

[English]

The fact is that these vital services for some of the most disadvantaged Canadian women are funded at the municipal or provincial levels with the assistance of other federal government departments.

I want to be very clear about this. It is not within the mandate of the women's program of the Secretary of State to fund services for sexual assault victims or rape crisis centres. This program has never had a mandate to provide these kinds of services. It was not created for this purpose.

I would also like to make it clear that the majority of women's centres have survived in this country without core funding from the women's program.

What kinds of projects are funded by the women's program? Let me give you some examples. There are single mothers working to improve their economic opportunities; rural women developing information networks; immigrant women enhancing their skills; voluntary organizations working on child care issues; and women with disabilities organizing workshops on violence.

These few examples give the true flavour of the women's program. It is a program that meets contemporary challenges by assisting women and their organizations. This government takes its responsibility to fund women's centres across the country very seriously.

[Translation]

Considering the important role played by these centres, I believe the provinces should do their fair share. I had a meeting last week with the Hon. Philip Warren from Newfoundland and this afternoon I will be meeting the Hon. Violette Trépanier from Quebec. My colleague, the minister responsible for the Status of Women, is having talks with the Hon. Carol Gran from British Columbia.

[English]

The women's centres and I share a common objective. We want the centres to remain open. I have provided the means for keeping the centres open. Let us take advantage of this opportunity—

Mrs. Maheu: You've cut the programs.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister.

I am sure that when members of the Opposition take the floor they will want to be heard and would certainly not be happy with the Speaker should the Speaker allow raucousness while they are speaking.

I would like hon. members to extend the same courtesy to the hon. minister.

Mr. Weiner: I thank you for the intervention, Madam Speaker.

Ms. Clancy: Poor little, Gerry.

Mr. Weiner: I have had the pleasure of meeting with representatives of women's centres. I will continue to look for opportunities to meet representatives of women's centres. I have a number of meetings scheduled for next week. I am willing to talk. I would like to have a dialogue.

Ms. Clancy: Why don't you meet with the NDP women?

Mr. Weiner: There is a reality. The core funding, as some have described it, is discontinued. Increased program funding is available, with what I have described as very flexible criteria.

The program covers some admissible expenses as part of the program. I am very concerned. I have indicated that I want the centres kept open. There are others who have the same interest. There is a growing coalition of people who are interested in being supportive—and finally stop trivializing the importance of these activities.

Ms. Mitchell: You are the one trivializing.

Mr. Weiner: I have indicated that as quickly as applications can be completed, I will make sure that those applications are fast-tracked so that the money can be flowing to the centres. I am not sure what more anyone could expect, but I think that the individuals who have the concern of the women's centres at heart and the women's program should do all they can to help these initiatives come forward.

These are not easy issues for any one of us, and I know how concerned all members of Parliament are that we do the right thing.

What is interesting is that there is a very important program available through the Secretary of State. As I have indicated, within the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, we have made available almost $1 million through the program to immigrant women and visible minorities. There is over $2 million in the aboriginal women's program. There is increased funding for the disabled persons' program, and we know that almost 65 per cent of disabled people are women.

It is very important as we look at the over-all capacity of my ministry to respond to the growing needs of women in finally addressing the inequalities of the society that we be given the opportunity to help our client groups.

One thing that has been recognized has been the very positive and effective role that the staff and officials have always played in terms of their desire and their ability to serve their clients. It has been recognized by the people we serve that we have been easy to work with and that we have tried to be helpful wherever we could. This is the message that my regional people have tried to get out.

• (1050)

My associate undersecretary spent three or four days in Newfoundland attempting to help the several women's centres there bring forward their applications. I sense an openness on their part to come together, an openness to see how the project and the program funding can help them carry on.

What is even more important is that I see for the first time, a willingness on the part of Canadians from coast to coast to come together to make sure these important initiatives are allowed to carry on for the benefit of all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments? The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I invite all the heckling they can muster on the other side of the House, if it makes them feel better. It certainly makes me feel better.

I would like to ask the minister some questions and, again, I would also like to set the record straight. When I have completed I would appreciate it if the minister would tell me how he expects women's centres to utilize program funding when they don't have core funding to pay the rent.

I would also like to point out to the minister that women's centres received five weeks' notice before their core funding was completely cut off. Five weeks is not nearly enough time to replace tens of thousands of dollars of funding. It is evident that obviously this government could not care less what happens to these centres.

The minister gave us a long list of the things that this government has done for women. I would like to talk a little bit about what this government has done for women lately.

I would like to talk about the fact that it reneged on its promise of a new child care system.

It proposed a recriminalization of abortion and removing women's reproductive choice.

It has called a .5 cent reduction in the wage gap between women and men a victory of the employment and equity legislation.

It has proposed a 7 per cent goods and services tax on everything from postage, books, tampons, haircuts, movies to transportation.

It has traded away women's jobs in the electronics, food processing and textiles industries.

It has backed out of its responsibility for unemployment insurance.

It has provided funding for the building of transition houses and shelters, but provided no assurance that there will be funding for programs.

It shut women out of the consultation decision-making process.

It spent more money on loans to strip clubs than to women's groups.

It continues with an immigration policy which favours rich men, and it continues to discriminate against immigrant women in federally funded language training programs.

It has refused to fund women's work on reproductive choice, lesbian rights and the environment and peace.

It has decreased funding for women's groups in the last two years by $3.6 million.

This government, I am sure, is very proud of that record.

Mr. Weiner: Madam Speaker, I am not sure I heard a question. I did hear the member tell me that she did not understand what I said about core funding. That is what I heard.

Ms. Langan: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Weiner: She asked me to help her, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A point of order, the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, as point of clarification for the hon. minister, I would like to point out that I did not ask for clarification. I asked him how he thought women's centres could—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): That is not a point of order. We are getting back into debate. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Weiner: Madam Speaker, I want to be very careful so that I can help not only the member for Mission—Coquitlam, but perhaps other members and all Canadians who are watching.

I would like to talk about the words "core funding" and what they mean. I have heard in the last week or two how some may not be able to operate if these words are not reinstituted in the lexicon or the vocabulary of the ministry. Certain expenses, such as rent, lights, administrative overhead, staff—is that what the members mean by "core"?

What I am saying is that the criteria of program funding are flexible enough to allow those expenses as admissible expenses. If your funding ended on March 31, and I have indicated that we have increased project funding available for all the women's centres—not necessarily only for some that were funded in the past—then please help yourselves. Help me to make sure that you can continue to provide the very essential service that you always have because you know there was a time not that long ago when that gang was in office and you got nothing.

Ms. Langan: Not true.

Ms. Clancy: You're rewriting history.

Mr. Weiner: We recognize the importance of what you are doing. Frankly, I am saying that I am here to help you complete the applications.

We had an example concerning Bridgewater, Nova Scotia. I received an application on Tuesday. We approved it Wednesday. The cheque was delivered.

Ms. Langan: It was a Tory riding, too.

Mr. Weiner: What better way can there be of guaranteeing continuity?

In addition, with respect to Newfoundland I was so thrilled that I received three pages faxed to me of new-found supporters of the women's centres, some of them putting money in envelopes.

I said: "Look at what we have done, look at the benefit. A coalition of Canadians, governments at all levels, private and public sector, all interested finally in guaranteeing the sustenance and the future growth and support of the women's centre. Look how important it has become now".

I will tell you, Madam Speaker, never will anybody trivialize an activity. We have the commitment of the whole community. This is Canada speaking. Wake up to the benefit of what is taking place.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, since the minister is obviously telling us this morning that project funding has turned into core funding—only the names have been changed to protect the innocent—I wonder if he could tell us if everyone who got funding under core funding is now going to get funding under project funding. What is going to happen to the people under project funding? Has the pie increased? Have we got so much money now that you are just changing the names? What is the story?

Mr. Weiner: I thank the member for allowing me another moment or two for further clarification, Madam Speaker. I tell you the first requirement of having an application approved is to complete the application form.

Ms. Clancy: We knew that.

Mr. Weiner: As far as we are concerned, our officers from coast to coast at the most senior level have been open and willing to do this seven days a week. I think it is very well recognized by the centres, and in particular the women from coast to coast, how able we are to do that. As far as I am concerned, as quickly as the applications are completed projects will be approved and the money will flow.

Ms. Clancy: I didn't ask that question.

Mr. Weiner: I am waiting very, very patiently for all of the applications. I do not open files. There is opportunity now from coast to coast. New program funding is available. Our officers stand by ready and willing as they always have to be helpful. As I have indicated, they are recognized to be the most helpful people anywhere in the country.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if he has talked directly to women who are working in women's centres, particularly the women in St. John's, Newfoundland, and British Columbia who have been so concerned and who have been trying to meet with him through the office of the Secretary of State. As well, has he talked to the the women in the Yukon and those women who are facing the closure of centres? A number of centres have already closed, as he should know.

Those women are saying over and over again that they cannot keep the door open. It is fine to talk about short-term program funding with a little token administrative cost on top, but that is not what we mean and he knows that. It is not what women mean either. It is for funding to keep those centres operational. Program funding is short-term.

I want to ask him if he has met with any of the women specifically, particularly women who are not Conservatives. If he has not, will he meet with them?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It will have to be a short answer from the Secretary of State.

Mr. Weiner: Madam Speaker, the answer is yes.

[Translation]

Yes, in both official languages and I am very honoured to be taking part.

• (1100)

[English]

I will be meeting again with women from women's centres this week as I have before. I have been very active since I have been in this portfolio, and indeed in the last months. I have been very quick to want to meet and carry on a dialogue with all the people working with our program.

In addition, it is important to note that I have now had the pleasure of meeting with one or two provincial ministers. I am pleased to see that we are all interested in bringing forward a process that will guarantee, community-wide, the support and sustenance of this very worth-while organization.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

WORLD HEALTH DAY

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Madam Speaker, April 7 is World Health Day. This year, the theme will be health and the environment, and the slogan: "Think globally, act locally".

Together many countries throughout the world, Canada will continue to examine the extremely complex relationship between the environment and public health—whether we are talking about air or water pollution, the quality of food or promoting safe use of chemical products.

As a society, we have learned the hard way that we cannot go beyond certain limits without endangering our own health and that of other living creatures.

I would ask you and your constituents to stop and think a moment about your priorities. Are we doing enough? I would say that in many cases we are not. Let's not just dream about a healthy environment. Let's make it happen.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION AWARD

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, and I would like to congratulate the staff of the Cornwall management area office upon receiving Employment and Immigration Canada's 1989 Outstanding Team Award in the management area category in recognition of their excellent work and valuable contribution to the communities in this region.

The team, led by manager Denis Thibault, has met or surpassed project goals and targets for the last three years, consistently keeping within their budget while providing a client service built on dedication and respect for both employers and the available workforce. The team motto is "Our commitment is service", and they have certainly proved that.

The office installed computerized systems to upgrade operations in the employment, insurance, claims and administration sections and created an extensive catalogue of employers and data on the job market. This led to increased job placements and better service for workers requiring assistance.

On behalf of the people of Stormont-Dundas and Glengarry-Prescott-Russell, we wish to thank the team and congratulate them on a job well done.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, this country is once again facing a period in our history when we are all being called upon to be show tolerance and understanding of our fellow Canadians.

During the next several months we will attempt to amend our Constitution to take another step forward in the development of the Canadian nation. We are not taking the last step forward. This is not the end of the process of constitutional renewal. We must all refrain from taking rash or negative actions. It is a time for building on the progress that has already been made. It is not the time to destroy the work of others.

I am looking forward to the next few months as all Canadians productively put forward their views on the constitutional renewal of Canada.

HEALTH

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, as the B.C. newspaper The Province put it yesterday, the only thing certain about the Meme breast implant is that doctors and scientists are uncertain about it. At least five scientists in the Department of National Health and Welfare urge that the implant be withdrawn from the market.

The minister claims the Meme is safe on the basis of the Kerrigan report, yet yesterday the minister acknowledged that even Dr. Kerrigan believes that further studies are warranted to address the possible degradation and contents of the foam. This is the main concern and no one seems to be able to say the foam is safe when implanted into the human body.

I am not fearmongering as the minister has suggested. I am trying to get answers to critical questions. Surgitek of Montreal is the only Canadian distributor of this product. The foam itself is imported from Pennsylvania and since 1984, 12,000 implants of this particular product have taken place, 10,000 of those implants in the province of Quebec alone.

I urge the minister to order the withdrawal from the market of the Meme until safety has been proven.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, next week members of this House will be voting on the goods and services tax, a tax that close to 80 per cent of Canadians have said they oppose. This government has chosen not to listen to the polls, but perhaps government members will listen to their constituents.

Only 21 of 167 Conservative members are needed to vote with the combined opposition parties to defeat the tax. We urge Canadians across the country to phone their Conservative members of Parliament, raise this issue with them and tell them they oppose the tax.

In Saskatchewan, people in Kindersley—Lloydminster can phone their member by calling 882-3959; in Souris—Moose Mountain, 634-5988; in Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, 773-2887; in Regina—Wascana, 780-5555. In Manitoba, they can phone the member for Provencher at—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member's time has expired.

WORLD HEALTH DAY

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, April 7 is World Health Day. This year the theme is "Health and the Environment".

Recent environmental disasters such as the Hagersville tire fire emphasize the need for all countries to examine and begin to address the environmental hazards that may pose continuing health problems for future generations of Canadians.

Canada is in an enviable position with its high standard of living, its excellent health and social services system and its incredible supply of natural resources. But we all know that no country can afford to be complacent. We must work hard to preserve what we have and ensure that our environment is a positive force for healthy living.

I would urge you all, both as individual Canadians and as members in your own communities, to think globally and act locally, and to urge your friends, your families and your constituents to do the same.

UNIVERSITY OF MANITOBA CONFERENCE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I rise again to bring to the attention of this House the reaction of Canadians of the Islamic faith to current public usage of the term "Islamic terrorism", in particular with reference to an academic conference scheduled to take place this month at the University of Manitoba.

Although I am fairly sure that this phrase was not developed to deliberately insult or demean the Islamic faith, and although this unfortunate term has been used in other parts of the world and in connection with published works, it should be clear to us in Canada that this term derives from insensitivity and ignorance. For example, terrorism in an Islamic country is not more Islamic than terrorism in northern Ireland is Catholic, or terrorism in Israel is Jewish.

Our continuing challenge in Canada and elsewhere in the world is to enhance our inter-cultural and inter-religious sensitivity and respect.

I am pleased to note that organizers of the conference on terrorism are incorporating into that conference a session which will reflect the principles of peace and brotherhood which underlie the Islamic faith.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, many fishermen and plant workers, both men and women, have not been able to obtain unemployment insurance benefits this winter because the Liberal senators delayed approval of Bill C-21.

The non-elected Liberal appointed senators used all kinds of tactics to block this important legislation, preventing the application of the new measures included in the bill.

Who suffered and are still suffering? Certainly not the Liberal appointed senators, certainly not the Liberal opposition members, but the people living in 15 fishing communities on the lower north shore. They are the ones suffering because of that injustice.

These hard working and decent people are asking the Liberal senators: Why the delaying tactics? They want to know why they are held hostage because of political partisanship. They tell me that they are fed up with partisan politics being carried out on their backs. They want this bill to go through.

TOURISM

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, tourism is the largest growing business in Canada, and this government is set on a course to destroy it.

Since 1984, the size and capabilities of the federal Department of Tourism have been steadily reduced by 75 per cent. The cuts to VIA Rail will effectively keep people from visiting many parts of this country. This all comes at a time when support for the industry should be increasing in order to accommodate the world-wide rapid growth of tourism.

But most devastating of all is the proposed goods and services tax with its ill-conceived rebate which will be an absolute nuisance to travellers.

• (1110)

We have heard nothing but complaints from tour operators over this tax. As a result of an across-the-board 7 per cent sales tax on such items as hotel rooms, attractions and motor coach charters, many tour companies will no longer be able to market Canada as an affordable destination. A loss of tourist revenue translates into a loss of jobs.

I urge the government to stop this assault on the tourist industry by scrapping this tax and doing something for this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, on Saturday, Canadians can vote for or against the goods and services tax in malls and public places throughout Canada. On Monday, they can vote at their workplace. I suspect they are going to vote against it; at least the opportunity is there.

But what about Parliament Hill? We in the NDP have set up a balloting station here on the Hill. To be specific, it will open on Monday at 10 a.m. in the Commonwealth Room right here in the Centre Block. We are inviting staff, visitors on the Hill and MPs to vote.

As a matter of fact, I would like to specifically invite the Tory MPs, the back-benchers, to come and vote on Monday at ten o'clock. It is a secret ballot. I know many of them would like to vote against the GST; here is an opportunity.

FEDNOR

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, on budget night the opposition members from northern Ontario said that the FedNor economic development program was gone. This morning, the hon. Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism announced in Sudbury that an additional $14 million would be allocated to FedNor initiatives for a total of $69 million that has been allocated to northern Ontario.

That means that to date $20 million has been spent, 260 businesses have been developed and 1,350 jobs have been created. For those in the opposition who feel FedNor is gone, this is the first time that any government has recognized northern Ontario with a special program and I applaud the government for doing so.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker:

Tuesday in Toronto
Baseball will begin
The Blue Jays take on Texas
Our team is going to win.
Blue Jay fans will gather
The Skydome will be full
The PM is attending with President Bush in tow.
But there is more than baseball
As all Canadians know
The GST is going
To strike a lethal blow.
So let us shout our message
Loud and clear and slow:

Some hon. members:

Hey hey ho ho
The GST has got to go.

Mr. Peterson:

Oh! somewhere in this favoured land the sun is shining bright;
The band is playing somewhere, and somewhere hearts are light;
And somewhere men are laughing and somewhere children shout,
But there is no joy in Canada, Mulroney has struck out.

Madam Speaker, I invite you to join with me as we all shout:

Some hon. members:

Hey hey ho ho
The GST has got to go.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, in today's Ottawa Citizen Liberal Senator Sidney Buckwold indicated that senators may likely delay the GST legislation.

Is the unelected Liberal senator saying that they will again attempt to block crucial government legislation for purely partisan purposes? I am sure that Senator Buckwold can recall his own words before a special joint committee on Senate reform. Senator Buckwold stated that the House of Commons is supreme. He also said: "Ultimately, in the case of a disagreement, the will of the House of Commons would prevail".

I hope the senator and his Liberal colleagues come to their senses and not only pass the GST legislation expeditiously but also pass C–21 so that Canadians can soon have the benefits of the law that that will bring.

THE SENATE

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a serious matter dealing with Senate reform. Last night the Prime Minister dealt another blow to Senate reform in the country when he said that he could not possibly accept an elected senator from the province of Alberta.

In a weird rearrangement of Canadian logic, he said he was elected by millions of people, the senator was only elected by thousands and that until he saw a new process in place completely, he would not accept an elected senator.

I would like the Prime Minister to use the House to explain to us how Meech Lake precludes an elected senator from Alberta. By denying Albertans the right to have another member in the Senate, he slows down the constitutional process and becomes the No 1 Dr. of Canadian politics.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, next week members will be voting on Bill C–62, the goods and services tax. Close to 80 per cent of Canadians across the country oppose this tax, but the government has chosen not to listen to the people. Canadians rightly believe that this tax, if passed, will result in higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

The main supporters of this tax are big business, the income taxes of which are being reduced. The government has used closure at the committee stage and now for final reading of this bill in the House of Commons. I suggest that it is doing so at its own peril.

We are urging Canadians across the country to phone their Conservative members of Parliament to tell them to vote against this bill. For example, constituents of Simcoe Centre told me Tuesday that their member said publicly that she does not listen to her constituents on the GST because they do not know what they are talking about.

If she did say that, I for my part call on the member of Parliament for Simcoe Centre, whose phone number is—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

All across the country we have seen an unprecedented level of opposition to the government's goods and services tax. The ranks of discontent are growing from one end of the country to another. We see growing discontent in the Conservative ranks, in the Conservative caucus.

The more the government tries to explain this tax, the less Canadians like it. Eighty per cent of Canadians are now opposing the government's goods and services tax. If more and more Canadians are so fundamentally opposed to this tax, does this not mean there is something fundamentally wrong with it?

Why will the Prime Minister not listen to Canadians and withdraw this tax now rather than try to force it through the House and shut off debate?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we were elected by the people of Canada to lead and not to follow. We are going to lead even though the subjects are difficult and even though it means the government accepting a substantial degree of unpopularity, because doing what is right for the nation oftentimes means doing things that are difficult and unpopular.

Since 1924 there have been five Royal commissions or task forces telling the Parliament of Canada to get rid of the pernicious manufacturers' sales tax which we presently have. There was all-party agreement that the manufacturers' sales tax had to go. We agreed to get rid of it. The Liberals and NDP changed their minds because they are followers and not leaders.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this government was elected to do what is right, but why does the Prime Minister not understand that what is right certainly depends not just on his personal judgment and that of his caucus but on that of Canadians? And, 80 per cent say what he wants to do is not right

Canadians are also saying that they do not believe the Prime Minister and his government when they say that the goods and services tax will not have much effect on inflation. Canadians know that when all of a sudden they start paying more tax on more things than ever before, they have less money in their pockets.

It is not surprising that workers in this country are taking steps now to protect themselves against the inflation this tax will bring and to protect themselves against the loss of purchasing power this goods and services tax will bring.

Why will the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance not admit today that this tax will cause more harm to the economy, more inflation, more damage than they have so far been willing to admit, and withdraw this tax? They should listen to Canadians when they say: "This tax is not right and we want the government to do what we have in mind on this essential subject".

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party challenged the Minister of Finance to a debate on this matter in Edmonton. The Minister of Finance went out and took on the finance critic from the Liberal Party, and we have not seen him in the House since.

• (1120)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robichaud: Cheap, cheap. That's a lie.

Mr. Speller: Lie.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Lie.

Mr. Mulroney: The fact of the matter is that when challenged the Liberal Party said that what it was going give was more of the same: a manufacturers' sales tax that imposes a 13.5 per cent unfair burden on the backs of Canadian producers and that subsidizes imports so that importers can steal Canadian jobs.

We are making difficult and important but beneficial structural changes in the economy. We know that while it is unpopular today, it is in the national interest and, when given the choice during an election campaign between a party that took the tough decisions and a party that chose to hide its head in the sand, Canadians will vote for the Conservative Party.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the quality of what the Prime Minister is saying is demonstrated by the gross inaccuracy of his statement that the finance critic for the Liberal Party has not been in the House since the debate with the Minister of Finance in Edmonton. That is simply not true. The finance critic has been here continuously asking questions of the government on the goods and services tax, which the government has been unwilling to answer.

[Translation]

So I want to ask the Prime Minister: If his GST is so good for our economy and the present sales tax is so damaging, why did his government raise the present sales tax four times? Why, Mr. Speaker?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition surprises me. For almost 50 years, five royal commissions or rather, parliamentary task forces have advised Parliament to get rid of the pernicious tax we have today and replace it with a tax on consumption.

Mr. Robichaud: You raised the tax four times.

Mr. Mulroney: The hon. member has been sitting in Parliament for a quarter of a century. He knows perfectly well that everyone agrees the existing tax is pernicious and damaging to the economy, both our national economy and that of Quebec or Alberta. We received unanimous recommendations from the various political groups in this House. The government, well aware that such action is not popular, then proceeded to get rid of a pernicious tax that is damaging to Canada's economy. We took this unpopular action, and lo and behold, the opposition changed its mind. Instead of supporting the government in a major initiative that will promote economic development in this country and create jobs for our young people, the Leader of the Opposition has taken his party back to the past instead of leading it to the future. Canadians, however, will vote for a government that faces the future, a new future for our young people.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Letters from 29 grade four students, co–signed by their parents and with a covering letter from their teacher, Mrs. Donna Cohen of Elwick Community School, reached my constituency office this week. All fear that tax on books will make their education suffer. They have asked me to tell the Prime Minister: "Don't tax reading. Have a heart and listen."

Will the Prime Minister listen to the plea of these school children and accede to remove the GST on books? Would he listen, as well, to the sentiments of their parents expressed eloquently by one of them, Mrs. Poitras, who said: "Illiteracy is slowly becoming a problem of the past, don't make it a problem of the future"?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, to follow up on what the Prime Minister was saying, we have chosen a modern method of taxation which is very good for the country and which has been chosen by 48 other countries.

We have organized it in such a way that it will be fair to lower income people. We need to proceed on a very wide base and then give credits to lower income people so that they can make their choices. A family with an income below $30,000 will be better off after reform than it was before.

This is a modern reform. It will help the economy, and it will continue our effort to extricate Canada from the awful situation the Liberal Party left us in, in 1984.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, if those school children and their parents were here, it would be very simple for them to tell the minister that he did not answer their plea; he did not answer their question.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. Perhaps this one will be answered directly and correctly.

Treatment of depression and behaviour disorders is lengthy and costly. Under the proposed GST psychoanalysts who are not physicians will have to tax their patients for the same treatment provided tax-free by psychoanalysts who are physicians.

Will the minister rectify this inequity by exempting all health care professionals from taxing their patients under the GST or, better still, by scrapping the GST altogether?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we are not going to scrap the GST because it is a necessary, good and modern way of dealing with a problem.

Referring to his particular area of concern, we do not want to use the tax system to change the organization of life in Canada. At the present time, the provinces have a responsibility to determine which services are accepted under health care. We have decided that whenever two provinces make a decision that a particular service is covered, we will do the same.

WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Fifteen women demonstrating in the corridor outside the twelfth floor door of the Secretary of State's Vancouver office yesterday were dragged away and are to be charged with assault by trespass.

Women across this country are being forced to risk criminal charges and conviction to let this minister know how devastating his cuts to women's centres are.

Will the minister meet with representatives of women's centres about the cuts?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the answer clearly is yes. I have met with representatives of women's centres; I will meet with them; and I will want to continue to meet with them.

As far as the specifics of any incident are concerned, we understand that there are a lot of documents kept in the offices of the Secretary of State. The confidentiality of our clients is at risk. We must consider the security of our staff, who have provided excellent service to their clients through the years, and the client groups recognize how well they have been served.

Indeed, in this period some of them have been intimidated, hassled and harassed, not necessarily by the women themselves, but that is part of what has been taking place.

The administration has determined that we should be able to continue to operate and serve our clients well with some kind of security. I am not in charge of the security but the Undersecretary of State will continue to look after that and, I am sure, monitor it very carefully.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not feel that dragging 15 women away from a locked door with people behind it is not intimidating, is not fear invoking and is not much of a response when one asks whether and when the minister will meet with women?

He says he has met with representatives of women's centres. He has never met with a representative of a women's centre in British Columbia. I would like to know where he met with women.

I would also like to know when he will respond to the letter from the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby about whether he will meet with the women MPs of the New Democratic Party, or are we too intimidating?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I have been willing to meet with as many of the groups that we serve as is possible. I am always interested in maintaining an open dialogue.

I have indicated quite clearly that all Canadians recognize how important a function women's centres fulfil and how essential it is that they continue to provide the opportunity for women to gain full equality in our society.

We have made progress, and maybe this is an important day to take the opportunity to examine what progress has actually been made. This government has a significant record of achievement. The appointments of women we have made to agency, boards and commission have more than doubled. The number of women at the deputy minister level has risen from seven in the 1984–85 period to more than twenty-one today.

Never again will women's programs or the activities of women be trivialized as they were in the days when the group opposite ran the government.

• (1130)

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. minister was not able to tell New Democratic women MPs when he would meet with us. However, we will see how many women in Canada are convicted under this government.

My third question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday, the Minister of Finance gave his assurance to my leader that should any province decide to penalize those on social assistance by deducting money from welfare benefits to compensate for their receipt of the GST rebate, he knew that all members of this House would roundly criticize that approach.

We have information, Mr. Minister of Health and Welfare, and I would like you to confirm this, that the government of Quebec is currently deducting $3 per adult per month, $5 for each of the first two children and $1 for each subsequent child from benefits given to social assistance recipients from federal sales tax credits and child tax credits. Would the minister please advise this House what he intends to do about it.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, when benefits are paid by the federal government to welfare recipients, we have a concern if provinces do not allow those benefits to be passed on. In cases where this occurs, we attempt to encourage the province to reconsider its policy to ensure that the full benefit goes to those people who are intended to receive it from the federal government.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Yesterday, his department announced funding for the Second Storey Women's Centre in Bridgewater from his department's project funding.

Can the minister assure the women of Canada that every group who lost core funding will receive comparable funds from Secretary of State's project funding and, more important, that women's groups are not being forced to compete with each other for ever decreasing funds.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated very clearly, both in the House and outside, that there is increased program funding available. I have indicated that the program criteria have been opened up very carefully so that expenses which were previously admissible, under what some considered core funding—and hopefully I have helped everyone understand what that means—are now admissible under the project or program funding.

In order for the money to flow, in order for us to be able to help the women's centres continue to carry on their very vital activity, they must complete the applications. The applications must be sent in and then be approved and cheques will flow as they did to South Shore, where the Bridgewater Second Storey Women's Centre probably has its money this afternoon, with only a two-day delay from the time we received the application.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): I only wish that the hon. the Secretary of State had had the benefit of attending the "wiener roast" that the women of Halifax held last Monday.

[Translation]

My supplementary question is also for the Secretary of State. The minister told us that women's groups now receive project funding. Can he explain why women who were demonstrating very peacefully at the Secretary of State's office in British Columbia were arrested yesterday?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I greatly appreciate the hon. member's willingness to participate in projects to support women's centres. Recently in Newfoundland, I received three pages from individuals or groups who came together and they are all prepared to contribute to the vitality and future development of women's centres. I think it is important that all Canadians do their part. Not all women's centres are supported by the government.

Ms. Clancy: What about the group of B.C. women that were arrested yesterday?

Mr. Weiner: Everyone knows that some of these centres are supported by the government; however, more of them are not supported by us.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. The minister knows that the people of southwestern Montreal are eagerly waiting for the government's response to the recommendations of the southwestern Montreal employment and economic recovery committee (CREESOM). In February, the minister promised that the government would respond by the end of March. Can he tell us today how the government intends to support the initiatives of the local community?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transports)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount should know that for 20 years, his party let the economy of Montreal deteriorate to such an extent that the number of jobs in the Montreal area continually declined while his party was in power. Our government has only been in power for five years, but employment in Montreal has increased considerably and, as we have shown in the past, we are aware that some regions of the Island of Montreal need additional help to make up for what was not done during those 20 years.

When we got requests for help from the east end of Montreal, we responded to the satisfaction of those concerned, except that we would like to do even more to assist those who cannot enter the labour market now because they lack the necessary preparation and need training. So would he kindly tell his colleagues in the other place to pass Bill C-21 as quickly as possible?

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the question. He knows people have now been waiting since November for the government's reply. In February, he told us we might get an answer by the end of March. Could he perhaps tell us today when the people of Southwest Montreal will receive the government's response to the CREESOM Committee's report on economic recovery and employment in Southwest Montreal? When will we have a reply from the government and the minister?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transports)): Mr. Speaker, for reasons I mentioned earlier, we are giving very serious and careful consideration to our response to the CREESOM report, a response that will be aimed at correcting the same inequities the hon. member's party allowed to develop on the Island of Montreal for 20 years. An important aspect of our response to the CREESOM report concerns the issue of worker retraining and adjustment, and we waited as long as we could, in the hope the Liberal Party would change its mind. Considering the harm being done to people who are now unemployed and are waiting for retraining, we thought the Liberal Party would be able to persuade their colleagues in the other place to pass Bill C-21, so that we could provide the best possible response to the demands of Southwest Montreal. However, since that does not seem to be in the cards, we will have to give the right response just the same, in the next few weeks. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the members of CREESOM will be very pleased with our response.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

The economic policies of this Conservative government are having their desired effect. We have seen impossibly high interest rates, cuts in regional economic incentives, cuts in transfer payments for health and post-secondary education, cuts to UI and now we are seeing cuts in equalization payments to four provinces. For example, Prince Edward Island is going to lose $18 million, more dollars than they have lost already through Tory budgetary measures which will put P.E.I. into a deficit position because of this reduction in equalization payments. That province's finance minister has said it shows the direction the federal government is going, the provinces are being squeezed.

When is this government going to stand up for the poorer regions of this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the record of this government stands for what we think about poorer regions of Canada. I will tell the hon. member that the results are what it is all about. This morning, the unemployment statistics are the lowest they have been since 1981.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Loiselle: How is that for devastation?

Of course, a lot remains to be done and this is what we are proposing to this House by modernizing our fiscal system, modernizing our trade with the free trade agreement, organizing our economy so that the full force and capacity can be there to serve Canadians. The government has a major role to play and is playing it and I am very proud of our decisions, particularly concerning the lower income regions of Canada.

• (1140)

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the unemployed and the people in the fishery in Newfoundland do not quite agree with what the minister is saying. They and the farmers in Saskatchewan, women, women's groups, native Canadians and the poor are all feeling the cuts in their pocketbooks, and their families are feeling the cuts, too.

How do you have the nerve to tell Canadians families—

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): I ask the minister, how could this government possibly have the nerve to tell Canadian families, who cannot make ends meet, that they will be better off with less? How can less be more?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the responsibility of this government is to ensure that the services the government has to provide to the population are there. The best way to do that is to get our fiscal house and economy in order. There are no short cuts.

I remind the hon. member that in our last budget we were very careful to devise our transfer payments in a way that would protect the poorer regions of Canada. But yet again, we must all tackle the deficit and debt together.

The government has maintained its increased programs at 3.5 per cent over the last five years, while the provinces have been moving up to 7 per cent, 8 per cent, 9 per cent, and in certain instances to 14 per cent. This cannot go on forever. This is money we are taking from Canadians. We have made transfer payments in a way that eastern provinces in particular and lower income people will be better served by our transfer programs.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Finance. At the same time, I would like to offer him my unswerving support for what must be done, namely, the implementation of the goods and services tax.

I realize that in the past the Department of Finance has done a remarkable job in its economic projections, and there is no good reason to believe that this will change.

However, I would like to know the government reaction in the event that the goods and services tax should take in more revenue than is anticipated. I know that the people of Regina would reject these funds being used to increase government spending, therefore I would like to ask the minister to tell us and the people of Regina—Wascana that if extra revenue should occur, will it be put to further reducing our deficit or will it be used for increased program expenditures?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that the government has always said that the GST is an integral part of deficit reduction.

As far as managing the pressures within the system is concerned, we have reserves that are there for that purpose. To the extent that we receive greater income or greater revenues than expected from the GST or from any other source, of course they will be applied to deficit reduction.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it concerns the disturbing news that the federal government is again transferring its deficit on to the backs of the poorest of the provinces.

In the P.E.I. legislature yesterday—and my hon. colleague just alluded to it—the provincial Minister of Finance, Gilbert Clements, indicated that, because of an unannounced change in the equalization formula, Ottawa will save over $1 billion in 1989 which he says will mean big revenue losses for all of Atlantic Canada.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that there has been a change in the equalization formula, and will he kindly tell us why these changes were kept hidden from the provincial finance ministers until last Friday?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the pleasure of reading the statement by the Treasurer of Prince Edward Island, to which my hon. friend referred, but I can tell him that the budget of the province of Prince Edward Island appears to be in virtual balance. It is a balanced budget in large measure due to the massive transfers of federal funds from Ottawa to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Prime Minister that that budget surplus has now been turned into a budget deficit in Prince Edward Island because of the $1 billion in cuts that it found out about last Friday. I will send the Right Hon. Prime Minister a copy of the statement so that he can read it.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. At the very time that the Atlantic economy has been battered by a collapsing fishery, by hundreds of millions of dollars in cuts to federal EPFs, and withdrawal by the federal government of regional development programs, we now find out there could be up to $1 billion cut in equalization payments to the poorest of provinces.

What actions does the Prime Minister plan to take to address this very serious loss of revenue to all of Atlantic Canada, and why does he continue to adopt and practice the cruel "kick them when they're down game" on the Atlantic provinces of this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows full well that he is doing and has been doing a very serious disservice to the facts.

His partisanship obscures any value that he may bring to the House of Commons. Get the chip off your shoulder, and people will start listening to you.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: This government, Mr. Speaker, is in the process of bringing forward a program for the Atlantic fishery, which has increased transfer payments to Atlantic Canada, increased EPF payments to Atlantic Canada and increased regional development programs from $182 million, where they were when the hon. member's party was in office, to $400 million a year. Premier Frank McKenna described this government in terms of ACOA as having brought forward the single most important vehicle for regional development in the history of Atlantic Canada.

My hon. friend should be congratulating this government for what it has done for Atlantic Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Finance).

A minute or two ago, I heard him say that the goods and services tax has always been intended to be an integral part of deficit reduction. Yet we heard the Minister of Finance say in this House that the goods and services tax would be revenue neutral, which to most people would mean that the tax would not bring in any more revenue than the existing manufacturers' sales tax.

How can the tax be at one and the same time revenue neutral and be an integral part of deficit reduction? No wonder Canadians don't believe anything the government says about the goods and services tax.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. Leader of the Opposition suffers from an acute case of selective listening.

He should have listened to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, when he indicated that GST would reduce the deficit, because the present pillar of the federal sales tax is a porous one. That means that as it grows, companies evade tax. There is a lot of tax evasion and it threatens our resources. In putting together a modern, efficient system of sales tax the GST will prevent this and ensure that the government can deliver its programs and pay for them.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State (Finance) says that the present manufacturers' sales tax is a porous pillar.

Canadians would like to know, if that is the case, why has the government raised this tax not one, not two, not three, but four times since it came into office, and the revenue, since it came into office, has grown by billions of dollars to the present level of over $18 billion? If that tax is so flawed, why has it done this?

I ask the minister, how can Canadians believe anything that the government says, when he says the new tax will be an integral part of deficit reduction and the Minister of Finance says the same tax will be revenue neutral? It is simply not believable.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, you have to run with your old car until you buy a new one so we have made use of a system which was not a good system. We have devised a way of changing it. We have a system where there are 22,000 different private arrangements with companies, so this is a terrible system. It is an old system which has been there for 64 years.

We announced our colour before the election. We introduced a White Paper, we introduced a technical paper and we introduced a bill. Meanwhile, we have had to make do with a bad tax.

• (1150)

FUNDING FOR THE ARTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last December, the Minister of National Revenue threatened the Canada Council over its funding of the Buddies in Bad Times Theatre Company in Toronto. This week, the chair of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture threatened the National Gallery with a funding cut because the gallery bought a painting "Voice of Fire" which was a controversial buy.

Does the Prime Minister's government still believe in the arm's length principle of our cultural agencies, a principle that means that while the government funds the agencies, the government does not get involved in the operation of the agencies? Does the government still believe in that principle, and if it does, will it start acting like it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we believe very strongly in the concept of the arm's length arrangement with these funding agencies, although I suppose, like all Canadians, voters in Charlevoix, for example, are sometimes astonished when they see a grant for say $12,000 go out for something the rough equivalent of studying the sex life of the eastern fly. They find it difficult to understand the value of that for Canada.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is again talking out of both sides of his mouth. Either he believes in the principle or he doesn't.

It is easy to take a cheap shot at the National Gallery, as the chair of the cultural committee has, but he did not have the guts to show up when John Kim Bell came before our committee on native matters.

Given what the chair of that committee has done in the past with respect to the advertisements on the CBC, the trips to Africa for hunting, the comments on the gallery now, will the government act like it believes in the arm's length principle and replace the chair of that committee?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am astonished at my friend's question because this government has increased the discretionary spending limits for the groups that dispense funds at an arm's length relationship with the government.

There is no case on record that I am aware of—and I would be happy if my hon. friend could bring one forward—of the intervention of myself or any member of the government attempting to insinuate himself or herself into the decision-making process of one of these granting agencies. Our attitude is best described by the fact that we have increased the funding to these agencies. We fully respect and acknowledge the importance of the arm's length relationship.

We also hope that those who make the decisions in granting these funds realize that they are not functioning in a vacuum. They are functioning in Canada in given circumstances. We hope that they will apply their best judgment, with an understanding that they are dealing with hard earned taxpayers' money.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. It seems to me that the government is spending a great deal of time these days in court defending the tendering process for the GST data centre.

Can the minister tell the House whether the government went into this process with the decision having already been made?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker. We did this transaction in the usual way. A decision to lease was made by the accommodations branch and then it went to the realty branch. It was a process that was done to the best of our ability in an open and honest way.

When it was questioned we paid attention to Mr. Justice Strayer's decision. We carried out a re-evaluation and we decided it would be in everyone's best interest if we, despite the pressures of time, opened the tendering process again. This has now been done. The bids are being evaluated. The deputy minister will bring a recommendation forward and we hope that this will be done next week.

[Translation]

M. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, does the minister agree that by changing the rules in the course of the process, his government has created a certain amount of chaos for people tendering bids for the data centre? Will the government investigate charges that the selection process is unfair and subjective?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would reject immediately any suggestion that the selection process was falsified. As far as changing the specifications is concerned, we did not change the specifications, we only attempted to reflect as much as possible the special requirements that our client department, namely Revenue Canada, required such as security, access, working conditions and important things like this.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for External Relations. At a time when the government has cut $666 million from the budget for the Canadian International Development Agency, spread over a period of three years, how can it justify spending $600,000 on the office of our ambassador-at-large and personal representative of the Prime Minister, the Hon. George Hees, who is acting as an advisor on food distribution in Third World countries?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was away from the House and I read with dismay and astonishment that a question had been raised that would in any way tarnish the reputation of one of Canada's outstanding war heroes and parliamentarians, the Hon. George Hees.

This Parliament and this country should consider itself fortunate to have someone like George Hees undertake sensitive, important responsibilities checking on the distribution of food world-wide. I can tell you that at 75 years of age and after a lifetime of service to Canada, both in times of war and in peace, I was honoured to be able to appoint George Hees to that position. He has come through and filled that job in an excellent fashion which brings great honour to every member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish the Prime Minister had listened to my question because I was extremely careful. I respect Mr. Hees, and every member of this Parliament, I am sure, respects the outstanding record that he has contributed to this country.

But the fact remains, does the Minister for External Relations not feel that given this government's commitment to thrift, which it talks about so consistently across this country, that this office, costing $600,000, represents at least a duplication and at worst, a triplication, of the supervisory role in food distribution in the Third World and that this money might be better spent on the food itself and the aid to these foreign countries.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the insinuation in that question, and I know my hon. friend does not intend it that way, is very unfortunate and very misleading. There have been no additional costs to the Government of Canada, apart from the ongoing salary for the hon. George Hees.

Mr. Milliken: And his staff, and his flights.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend has staff himself to help him do his job. Would he suggest that Mr. Hees, doing a sensitive international job for the Government of Canada, not receive some modest assistance himself?

Surely it is appropriate that if you ask someone, a minister of the Crown, a member of Parliament for 35 years and one of Canada's most distinguished public servants, to undertake a sensitive job to make sure that food is distributed properly to Third World countries in the most efficient and expeditious manner possible you would want him to have the services of a modest degree of support staff.

I can tell my hon. friend that I was delighted to appoint Mr. Hees. I was also delighted to appoint the hon. Ed Broadbent to a job. I can tell you that the support staff that Mr. Broadbent enjoys, as well as the general salary and benefits package is a very nice one and compares favourably with that of other senior public servants. Why would it be otherwise? Mr. Broadbent is serving his country well. Mr. Hees is serving his country well. Why would you pick on someone like George Hees? Why not just acknowledge the fact that he has been a tremendous public servant and let us stand up and celebrate what he has done for his country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1200)

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister if he feels it is appropriate at a time when budgets have been reduced for overseas development assistance that he have a personal envoy who reports directly to him? Is it not public information, this very crucial issue of food distribution?

Further to the question from my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, does the Prime Minister feel it is appropriate that this should be a triplication of work with CIDA, with non-governmental organizations and with Canadian missions overseas? Does he feel it is appropriate that $612,000 per year is allocated for his personal information?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely astonished at the fact that the NDP would allow a member of Parliament to raise this kind of question.

Budgets were being reduced but we still proceeded with the creation of the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, of which Ed Broadbent is the president, and I can tell you that the cost of running that institute is substantially higher than $600,000 a year. The fact that we are cutting budgets does not mean that we should not be concerned about Third World development or about human rights.

In the cases of both Mr. Broadbent and Mr. Hees, they are doing a tremendous service for Canada. The hon. member in raising these questions is trying—inadvertently I hope—to undermine the reputation of Mr. Hees and should apologize to Mr. Hees in the House of Commons.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that in no way do I impugn the reputation of Mr. Hees.

In light of this, will the Prime Minister now reassign Mr. Hees to a more appropriate act in his absolutely demonstrated commitment to the Veterans Independence Program? That is where the money should be going. If the Prime Minister is going to have a personal envoy have Mr. Hees work in the area in which he has expertise and demonstrated commitment.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question is apparently generated by cuts in budgets, if the hon. member wants the amount of $600,000. cut out, I can tell her that the cost of operating Mr. Broadbent's new institute is in the neighbourhood of $3 million. Would she want that cut? I do not think it should be cut, because even though we are going through difficult times, human rights is vital. Mr. Broadbent is a very good person to defend the cause of human rights just as George Hees is an outstanding person to undertake the responsibilities he is undertaking.

The NDP should be ashamed of themselves. This is a cheap shot.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, earlier during Question Period I may have violated a rule of the House when I referred to the absence of a member, which I ought not to have done. I think it is a generally accepted rule of the House that we not refer to each other's absences. The hon. member for Gloucester may have been present in the House more often than I have because my travels have kept me outside the House. I withdraw any reference to his absence.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-43—TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-43, an Act respecting abortion, without amendments.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like to make a few comments. Clearly, a bill like Bill C-43 concerns a subject that is prone to controversy and has a high emotional content. I therefore wish to thank all members who sat on the legislative committee and who are to be commended for their serious and thorough approach. They have shown a degree of tolerance and respect that I find admirable and which is very much to the credit of this House.

We heard three ministers and 53 groups and individual witnesses, who provided a broad range of extremely varied views. Altogether, including briefs, telexes and telephone calls, we received nearly 2,000 communications.

Speaking on my own behalf and on behalf of all members of the committee, I also wish to express my thanks to all support staff in areas including research, legal affairs, translation and interpretation, and especially to our clerk. Their dedication greatly simplified my task and that of my predecessor as the chair of this committee.

BILL C-60—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-60, an act to amend various acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in Ontario and to provide for other related matters, with one amendment.

BILL C-59—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-59, an act to amend various acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in British Columbia, without amendment.

STRIKING—THIRTY-SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the thirty-sixth report of the Striking Committee.

SPECIAL COMMITTEES

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY A PROPOSED COMPANION RESOLUTION TO THE MEECH LAKE ACCORD—MOTION TO ADVERTISE ON PARLIAMENTARY CHANNEL

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Madam Speaker, I believe you will find there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That the Special Committee of the House of Commons to Study a Proposed Companion Resolution to the Meech Lake Accord be authorized to use parliamentary channels in order to solicit briefs and requests to appear before the committee and to announce its future agenda.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Does the minister have leave to present the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present today pursuant to Standing Order 31.

I am pleased to present the first one signed by 55 Nepean petitioners who are asking the Government of Canada to intervene in the release of one of Canada's citizens, Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo, who is being held in prison in Taiwan as a result of political interference for exercising his freedom of speech.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, the second petition relates to the goods and services tax. This petition is signed by several Nepean petitioners. It is something that is ongoing in Nepean and the people of my riding are very concerned about the imposition of this unfair tax.

FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S CENTRES

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition with respect to government cuts to the budget for women's centres. It is signed by approximately 500 people from central Vancouver Island.

I would like to point out that one of the signatories of this petition is Caroline Gran, the minister responsible for the status of women in the province of British Columbia.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions to present to the House today.

The first petition was collected in the city of Halifax. It is a petition directed at Parliament and concerns the intention of Canada Post to close the Halifax shopping centre corporate outlet at the end of March. The petitioners suggest that this is a major disruption and inconvenience to the large number of senior citizens, families, and other individuals in the neighbourhood who depend on the products and services, and inconveniences others who use one of the largest shopping centres in Nova Scotia.

• (1210)

The petitioners call on Parliament to ensure that Canada Post reverses its short-sighted plans and keeps a full service Canada Post operation at the Halifax shopping Centre.

This petition is signed by 750 people and is the first of two petitions I have submitted for certification by the House.

The second petition is signed by 165 residents of the Saskatchewan communities of Watson, Englefield, Quill Lake, but primarily from Watson, Saskatchewan.

They call on Parliament to save the national postal system and to ask Canada Post to stop its ill-conceived plans to sell off the postal service to big business. They say that rural post offices not only provide the service they need, but offer an important federal presence in their community.

The petitioners call on Parliament to refrain from putting retail postal outlets where there are existing post offices in their communities. The petitioners did not ask for retail postal outlets, they do not need them, and they do not want them.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): The third and final petition is signed by a number of residents from the province of British Columbia. It concerns the goods and services tax.

The petitioners note that the proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay. They call upon Parliament to reject the current bill on the goods and services tax and replace it with a reformed tax system that would provide for fairer taxes on Canadians.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present today on behalf of the residents of Metropolitan Toronto and region in support of Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo.

They urge the Canadian government to take immediate and effective measures to secure his release from the Taiwan government where he is being held prisoner.

[Translation]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of people in my riding who ask the government to reject the GST bill.

[English]

I have two more petitions on the same subject from Canadians from Baie Comeau to just about every small city between there and St. Laurent.

The imposition of the new goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians and they ask this government to reject the project.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to table in the House a number of petitions signed by Quebecers from Plessisville, Laurierville, Princeville, Victoriaville, Arthabaska and Sainte-Rosalie, who are vehemently opposed to the position taken by this government in wishing to impose a new tax on goods and services.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have a petition certified according to Standing Order 36 from a number of people opposed to the goods and services tax because it is unfair and bears more heavily on low income Canadians than high income Canadians.

They therefore urge Parliament to reject the goods and services tax and to cause the government to shift the tax burden from ordinary Canadians to those who are able to pay.

I have a further petition signed by 200 Canadians from various provinces, much more specifically concerned with the fact that since Confederation there has been a zero rate of tax on magazines, books and newspapers, and the government now proposes to include them in the goods and services tax, although uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by that application.

Therefore they call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): I have two more petitions, Madam Speaker. One is from a number of residents of Toronto who urge this Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training.

They demand that Canada withdraw its application for a NATO-NORAD base there and redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by about 150 people from different towns in Ontario who are concerned with the government's policy on transportation, its deregulation of air passenger service and its restriction of VIA Rail service.

Therefore they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions to table.

First, I have a petition signed by approximately 500 residents of the community of Lafleche in Saskatchewan who are protesting the decision by Canada Post to shut down their rural post office. I want to say that I totally agree with this petition.

I also have a petition here signed by the residents of the fine community of Dalkeith, Ontario in the constituency of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

These 289 citizens of Canada are very upset with the decision of Canada Post to shut down the rural post office in the community of Dalkeith, a post office which has been in existence for over 100 years. I fully and totally support this petition signed by my constituents.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I want to table a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by a number of citizens from the great community of Windsor, so ably represented in this House by our hon. Leader, the member for Windsor West.

These people are terribly upset, and rightfully so, with the government's proposed goods and services tax. Hopefully at this eleventh hour the government will listen to the concerns of these fine citizens of Windsor and immediately drop its plan for a goods and services tax in Canada.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a number of petitions signed by British Columbians, in which they request that this Parliament reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and bring in a fair and equitable tax system based on taxpayers' ability to pay.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to table petitions from people in the riding of Windsor West. They, with the people of Beauséjour, wish to announce their strenous objections to the government's tax proposal, a proposal that is entirely unfair, and I am referring to the goods and services tax.

[English]

The petitioners oppose this goods and services tax because they say that it is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians which will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

Therefore the petitioners humbly pray that Parliament will reject this proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I too have a petition to present pursuant to Standing Order 36, which is certified correct.

It is with regard to the goods and services tax as the ongoing petitions that I have provided to the House in the past. It says that the Minister of Finance's proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for the ability of taxpayers to pay.

• (1220)

They object that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while it forces low and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

They call upon the government to scrap the tax and bring in a more equitable taxation system.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House today a petition from residents of the greater Toronto area.

They call upon the government to exercise all of the means at its disposal to secure the release of Mr. Columbus Leo, a Canadian citizen who is incarcerated in Taiwan for reasons arising from his conduct related to his attempt to exercise democratic freedoms there.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 797 of my constituents throughout Stormont—Dundas against the proposed 7 per cent GST. These names can be added to the list of over 600,000 Canadians who have petitioned the government to abandon this regressive and totally unfair tax. They join with the more than 70,000 who telephoned the Official Opposition phone-in campaign against the GST in calling upon the government to scrap this tax.

I urge the government to respect the wishes of the people.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE BARRIERS IN AGRICULTURAL AND FOOD PRODUCTS

Question No. 234—Mr. Althouse:

Has Agriculture Canada, in co-operation with provincial ministers, prepared a list of the interprovincial trade barriers in agricultural and food products and, if so, (a) what number of items does it contain (b) for each of the ten provinces, in detail, what are the trade barriers identified?

Hon. Donald Frank Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Agriculture): A study interprovincial barriers to trade in agricultural and food products was undertaken by the Federal/Provincial Agricultural Trade Policy Committee. The purpose of the study was to identify interprovincial barriers and associated programs which inhibit the free movement of these products within Canada, and then develop ways and means to reduce them.

(a) and (b) The study did not provide a complete analysis of trade barriers maintained by individual provinces. An indicative list of the identified barriers and programs is attached. Some of these barriers and programs operated in more than one province. As a result, the total number of individual barriers was greater than those included in the list.

MEDICAL EVACUATIONS

Question No. 242—Mr. McGuire:

1. In 1989, did the Department of National Defence expend any flying hours conducting medical evacuations from Prince Edward Island and, if so, what total number of hours?

2. Has the government spent $3.9 million on Prince Edward Island medical evacuations and, if so, over what number of years?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes, 111.6 hours.

2. The 413 Squadron offers both search and rescue and medical evacuation services. Medical evacuation is a provincial responsibility and Prince Edward Island is the only province in which the provincial government does not offer its own medical evacuation services. The federal government, using the 413 Squadron, provides medical evacuation in Prince Edward Island and then bills the province. Between 1 April 1973 and 31 December 1989, the federal government spent $4.1 million for the provision of these services to Prince Edward Island.

ADMINISTRATIVE FLIGHT SERVICES

Question No. 243—Mr. McGuire:

1. In 1989, were Challenger and COSMO aircraft used to fly the Prime Minister, Cabinet Ministers or government officials to cities and towns served by scheduled airlines and, if so, was there an expenditure of (a) flying hours and, if so, what number (b) funds and, if so, what amount?

2. Since 1985, have backup Challenger aircraft been flown by 413 squadron to air fields in the vicinity of Prime Ministerial visits and, if so, was there an expenditure of (a) flying training hours and, if so, what number (b) funds and, if so, what amount?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

a. 1415 Challenger and 94 Cosmos flying hours were expended.

b. The DND estimated incremental cost (cost of petroleum, oil and lubricants, spares, repairs and overhaul, travel expenses of the crew and ground handling charges) of providing this service in 1989 was $3.8 million.

2. No.

TELEPHONES

Question No. 251—Mr. Blenkarn:

To the knowledge of the government, does the Senate provide two telephone numbers that any person in Canada can call without charge to be connected with the Senator of his or her choice and, if so, is it the intention of the government to provide such service with regard to the House of Commons and, if so, at what time and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Albert Cooper Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): All inquiries pertaining to the administration of the House of Commons may be directed to the board of Internal Economy.

TELEPHONE NUMBERS

Question No. 252—Mr. Blenkarn:

For each month from September, 1989 to February, 1990, what number of telephone calls were received on the Senate numbers 1-800-267-7363 and 1-800-267-7362?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): All inquiries pertaining to the administration of the Senate may be directed to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

"THE MORNING TOUR"

Question No. 254—Mr. Blenkarn:

Has the government incurred any expense in the production of a video in both official languages, entitled "The Morning Tour", from the Public Information Office of the House of Commons and, if so, in what amount?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): All inquiries pertaining to the administration of the House of Commons may be directed to the Board of Internal Economy.

PUBLIC INFORMATION OFFICE

Question No. 255—Mr. Blenkarn

Has the government incurred any expense in connection with the Public Information Office and, if so, in total, in what amount?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): All inquiries pertaining to the administration of the House of Commons may be directed to the Board of Internal Economy.

GOVERNMENT FUNDS ALLOCATED FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

*Question No. 235—Mr. Saint-Julien:

For each year since the Canadian Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology (CANMET) was created, for each province, has the government allocated funds for research and development in (a) mining (b) the utilization of metals (c) industrial minerals (d) fuels and, if so, what amounts?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Due to archival constraints, the requested information, since the founding of the Canadian Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology (CANMET) in 1975, is not readily available. However, for the years 1985 to 1990, the following provincial distribution of costs can be provided for CANMET research and development projects which have been contracted out to industry and universities:

GOVERNMENT FUNDS ALLOCATED FOR LABORATORIES

*Question No. 236—Mr. Saint-Julien:

For each year since the Canadian Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology (CANMET) was created, for each province, has the government allocated funds for laboratories in (a) Ottawa (b) Edmonton (c) Calgary (d) Elliot Lake (e) Cape Breton (f) Quebec City (g) Montreal (h) Val d'Or and, if so, what amounts?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Due to archival constraints, the requested information, since the founding of the Canadian Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology (CANMET) in 1975, is not readily available. However, for the fiscal years 1986–87 to 1988–89, the following distribution of CANMET's operating costs can be provided:

Average Operating Costs, 1986–87–1988–89

		$/Year	%Distribution
(a)	National Capital Region	51,244,000	88.4
(b) & (c)	Alberta	4,233,000	7.3
(d)	Elliot Lake	1,421,000	2.4
(e)	Nova Scotia	1,076,000	1.9
(f)	Quebec *	–	–
(g) & (h)	CANMET does not have any laboratories in Montreal or in Val d'or.

NOTE : The indicated operating costs, which have comprised about 82 per cent of CAMNET's total costs in the past, will decline to about 76 per cent of the total during the next few years as a growing share of CAMNET's R&D program is contracted out to industry and universities. This will result from a change in the nature of CAMNET's R&D program as well as from a desire to diversify CAMNET's R&D effort. Moreover, the regional distribution will change to reflect the presence of the new energy laboratory at Varennes, Québec.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The questions as enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S CENTRES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Hunter:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should reinstate core funding for women's centres, to enable those centres to continue to provide essential information, referral and support services to women.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I rise today in sorrow that I have to support this motion, although pleased that the motion was brought forward by my colleague from Saanich—Gulf Islands, but in sorrow that the need for a motion like this arises in Canada.

I might also say that I am devastated to see that the Secretary of State is no longer with us.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. The hon. member does know that referring to the presence or absence of a member or a minister is just not done in this House. I know she will be careful.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I am devastated that we have to speak on this issue yet again in the House.

We are looking at the Secretary of State cut of $23 million in total. We are looking specifically at the cut to women's programs of $1.6 million. We are also looking at the difference between core funding and project funding.

The hon. minister told us this morning that some women did not understand the difference, and I assure you that women understand all too well the difference between core funding and project funding.

First, the number of programs affected by cuts in core funding is 76, and I will discuss those programs further along in my remarks.

Second, core funding is a long-term kind of funding. It allows for long-term planning and for autonomy, an arm's length relationship to government policy. Project funding, on the other hand, is short term and limited to a particular purpose. If the government is changing the rules vis-à-vis the titles of these funding programs, all that is happening is something similar to a geometry program in high school: it is changing the letters on the theorems.

What is really happening for women across Canada is that they are being forced into competition with each other because the dollars are less. We have a $23 million cut right across the board in the Secretary of State and a $1.6 million in core funding, but the real answer is that there is less money available.

To be told as we have been told over and over again, today, yesterday, and so on, that women's centres will receive their project funding if they apply is insufficient and not at all reassuring. The women's centres that face these cuts nation-wide include 40 women's centres in Quebec, 7 in Newfoundland and in excess of 30 in the province of British Columbia. These women's centres provide a range of services that is unique and will not be offered elsewhere to Canadian women.

I recall when these women's centres first began to be set up in Canada. We have again been admonished by a number of people on the government side of the House to look elsewhere for funding. I doubt that there is a woman sitting in this House today who does not know the exigencies of fund raising for women's groups and organizations that support women's projects.

Whether we are talking about national groups like the YWCA, or whether we are talking about individual women's centres, the problem is the same: without core funding from the government it becomes a futile task of going back to the same people time and again for ever decreasing dollars.

If the government is committed to equality for women, if the government is committed to alleviating the very real sufferings that gender inequity creates in this country, then core funding is the only answer.

Look at the things that this government decided to fund when it cut a paltry $1.6 million and devastated women's centres across this country.

We have just sat through the presenting of petitions in this House. We heard of thousands more Canadians who are against the GST. Yet, this government in its effort to sell this possibly most unpopular program in the history of Canadian parliamentary democracy has allocated between $11 million and $14 million, to sell the GST: $1.6 million to devastate women's programs nation-wide and $14 million to convince Canadians to swallow a pill that they absolutely do not want.

In my riding of Halifax visiting cabinet ministers will now have an office. This office will be decorated at a cost of $1.6 million. The same amount of money, $1.6 million, so that visiting cabinet ministers can have a place to relax in the city of Halifax.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): So they will have a place to work.

Ms. Clancy: Well work, relax. I assure the hon. Minister of Justice that she can use my office whenever she wants if she needs a place to work. I would be happy to let her have it.

I suggest to the minister that my colleague from Dartmouth and her colleague from Halifax West would be happy to let her use their offices on the rare occasions when cabinet ministers need to work in Halifax.

Madam Speaker, $1.6 million for an office in one of the provincial capitals. The women of Canada understand what core funding is; they understand what project funding is; but they do not understand why they lost $1.6 million and why the exact amount is given to decorate an office.

• (1230)

Ceremonial state activities were allocated a $3 million increase in this most recent budget. I agree that there is a need for Canadians to see and to celebrate their country. But when women and children are suffering across the country, that is a $3 million allocation vis-à-vis a $1.6 million cut.

Finally, this year the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was allocated a $32.6 million increase. I am not necessarily saying that CSIS does not do a valuable job. That remains to be seen. The jury is out. But could we not have given CSIS $31 million and left $1.6 million for women's centres across the country? I think, in view of what this cut will mean to women on a national level, from St. John's to Victoria, that might have been something that could have been included in the budget.

Core funding no longer exists, we are told. But project funding has been increased. Project funding does not give the women's centres the kind of continuity and security they need. In spite of the protestations from the other side, it does not necessarily pay the rent. It does not necessarily pay the salaries for co-ordinators, and it does not necessarily pay the heat, lights and other things necessary to set up an office.

It is crucially important that it be brought to the attention of all members of this House, the kinds of things these women's centres do. We were told earlier that the federal government is not supposed to provide services for victims of sexual assault or battered wives, and so on. But one of the absolutely crucial services performed by women's centres is that they are a clearing house and a communications network for women who are otherwise alienated and isolated from the help they have to have.

Surely, no one needs to stand in the House yet again and remind any of us of the incidence of abuse of women and children. It is at a shocking and unacceptable level. Women's centres are in the front lines of fighting this abuse. They are not transition houses. They are not shelters. But frequently, for a woman in an extreme situation, the only place she knows to call is that place down on Main Street or that house where those women have those programs. She calls and is referred to the proper social service agency, if indeed there is one in the town in which she lives. If there is not a transition house or a particular agency, normally there are networks of women volunteers who will try to provide her with support and help to get her out of the untenable situation she is in.

Women across the country work an unbelievable number of hours as volunteers in women's centres. They work to help other women. They work, many of them, because there is no money available to pay them salaries, and so they do it out of a sense of survival for all women, out of a sense of duty, and out of a sense of what we must do to pull together.

The salaries that come from the core funding are hardly the kind of salaries to which anyone would aspire. The payment of part time and full time co-ordinators is still barely above a subsistence level in the country. Think about it again. We have talked about a maximum of 60 centres that are closing in the country, and the cut that is closing these centres is a mere $1.6 million. Start dividing up that quotient and see what it means on an individual level.

One centre in Nova Scotia was receiving $46,000 and another $49,000. Well, nobody is living high on the hog on the portion of those grants that pay for salaries. Nobody is able to deliver services of the kind that were being referred to this morning.

These centres are clearing houses. They are places of communication. They are referral services. They are places of safety where women can walk in the door and say: "Tell me what to do next. Tell me who to go to for help. Tell me who can help me in this situation in which I find myself, that I can no longer deal with. Tell me". That is what women are saying in transition houses in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Quebec, and British Columbia.

Even if the project funding keeps the doors open a little while longer, without core funding the long term hard work of these centres will go for naught. The switch from core funding to project funding is the end for many of them and the beginning of the end for the rest.

The cuts to the Secretary of State women's program did not just affect women's centres. Funding to research organizations was also cut by 20 per cent, organizations such as the Canadian Council on Learning Opportunities for Women, the Canadian Research Institute on the Advancement of Women, the British Columbia Women's Research Centre, and in Quebec, Nouveau départ.

These are organizations that have done incredible service for women in the area of knowledge and communications. They are the women who know what problems are facing other women in the country, what resources are available for them, what educational facilities are there, and what research has been done to assist them in a myriad of activities as they emerge slowly into a world that is all too slowly heading toward the eventual goal of gender equality. Again, these organizations are run on shoestring budgets. Many women involved with these organizations do so on a voluntary basis.

One of the issues which relates to core funding and relates to the whole spectrum of the way the government deals with women is, of what value is the contribution of women? What is the value of the work that women do in women's centres, with CCLOW, with CRIAW, NAC, and the various other organizations across the country? What is the value of that work? It appears that the answer is, not very high.

We saw the increases to various government agencies. What did we see across the board for women? Cuts and decreases. We did not see anything that would tell women there is a light at the end of the tunnel, that we want to help them, or that we want to show them that what they do is valuable. We want to see gender equality as an end in the country at least within the lifetimes of some of us sitting here in the House.

I know that there are individual members on the other side of the House committed to this. I know this. I have worked on committees with those members. I know how they feel and I know what they think. I know it must be difficult, but there has to be a political will.

Women make up 52 per cent of the population. While it is true that not all women support the kinds of things we are talking about here today, it is also true that the vast majority of women in the country do support these things. The vast majority of women look to the government and say: "Why are you undervaluing and undercutting what it is we have worked so hard for over the past 10 to 15 years? Why are you stifling the voice of women by cutting grants to research? Why are you undoing the work that for the last 15 to 20 years of the most recent exhibition of a woman's movement has developed?"

• (1240)

Every woman in the Chamber has some experience of that work, some more than others. Every one of us has had some experience in that area. We are all, to a smaller or larger degree, committed to this work and to the development of gender equality. At least, I thought we were.

The women of Canada have received too many blows from the government, particularly over the past several years. We see that abortion is going to be recriminalized in the country. We hear that women's groups across the country are crying for better medical services, better access to medical services, better education and training, more child care and more of the services that are not frills or frosting but the absolute essentials for a decent life.

We know that the feminization of poverty is a fact of life in our country. We know that when girl babies are born, as they go along in life they can expect, if they are university educated, to make as much money as a male high school graduate; if they are professionally educated, to make as much money as a single university degree graduate who is male.

My hon. colleague across the way shakes her head, but she can look at the statistics. Statistics Canada will tell her the truth.

These women can expect, no matter how much money they make or where they live, to have difficulty in finding adequate child care for any children they will have. They can expect to have difficulties and systemic barriers facing them in whatever profession or walk of life they choose. The vast majority of them can expect to end up in pink-collar ghettos. An unfortunate percentage of them can expect to be battered by their partners in life.

It is not good enough, Madam Speaker. You know it is not, I know it is not, and members on both sides of the House know it is not. The women's centres from St. John's to Victoria have been there and will continue somehow to be there. But the women who staff them will be paid less. There will be days in the winter that the centres will have to shut down because they will not be able to afford heat. There will be other times when they will not be there to provide essential services because they have lost core funding.

The women of Canada are fighting a battle that for a while we thought we might win. Without the political will, and without the dollars that that political will can and must generate, the women of Canada will lose this battle. They will lose this battle and we will all be the poorer for it. But they will not lose this battle quietly and they will not lose it without inflicting some wounds of their own.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to make an intervention at this time. Equality and social justice for women in Canada is a high priority for all of us in the House and all of us across Canada.

We can be very proud that just recently the first female Minister of Justice was appointed. We are delighted that we now have the first woman justice minister and we can be truly proud of the outstanding background which she brings to this portfolio.

Let us get to the core funding applications and project funding applications about which my colleague has spoken. The core funding applications have been annual applications, not long term applications. They must be applied for every year. Every project needs to have an application.

In the last few weeks the minister has reiterated the importance of flexibility in the program. These moneys are to be used for such things as rent, light and heat. The minister has asked the women's groups to forward applications. The staff has been available to assist in filling out the applications. We are prepared to expedite those applications in order that the funding is available. I think the hon. member, instead of inciting a situation, needs to see how we can work together to make this a very substantial program so we can attain what we are all looking for and that is equality and social justice for women.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her comments, but I am afraid I must correct a misconception on her part. It is difficult to understand the difference between core funding and project funding. It may have been a slip of the tongue, but what she said was that each project must be approved separately. That is quite true for project funding, but core funding is different.

Core funding is done usually every year, I agree. There are different lengths of time, but a year is the average. Core funding is considered to be renewable and it covers certain things that project funding does not. I further tell the hon. member, with the greatest of respect, that I asked the minister today in Question Period, whether or not he could assure the women of Canada that all those groups which lost their core funding would get comparable funding under project funding. I am afraid I received no such assurance and neither did the women of Canada.

Core funding pays for things like rent, heat, lights, and co-ordinator's salaries. Project funding relates to a specific project and, thus far, it is not within the project funding terms of reference—so far as we know and so far as we have been told by consultations today with the minister's department— whether or not a project can be keeping open the centre. It does not appear that can be the case, that you must have a specific project.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment and ask a question. I would like to comment on a comment, if I may.

The Conservative member across the way has just said that the government wants to see equality and social justice for women. Well, why not just restore the funding? Why not just admit it was a mistake, or it has gone wrong, or it is not working, and just restore the funding? That would be the simple way of doing it. Governments have done that in the past.

We had a provincial government in B.C. that I never voted for and never liked, but sometimes the old Premier, W.A.C. Bennett, would say: "Well, we're taking another look at it" and something would change when there was a public outcry. Why the gobbledegook about core funding and project funding? That is just putting poor women who are overworked and underpaid through more bureaucratic hassle. Just restore the funding.

I have a question for the hon. member from the Liberal Party who just spoke. Is there another agenda here from the government? She mentioned more money for propaganda and advertising the GST. There is more money for the secret police. Are we, in fact, seeing the government trying to punish what they think are political opponents in the women's movement or, for example, native people? The government cut back native communications programming and so on. It is a paranoid government that considers that somehow these groups are not on its team. They are not the big business boys so it is punishing them. They are the groups in society which can least afford to be punished.

I wonder if the hon. member is hinting that there is another agenda there on the government's part and that it is not just an oversight. Is it a real agenda to kill these kinds of groups and to put them down, perceived in the paranoid way of the government that somehow these groups are in opposition to what it stands for?

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague from British Columbia for his comments and his question. Indeed, if I was hinting, I apologize. I agree, absolutely, that there is another agenda here. I am not absolutely certain that it is a political reaction in the manner suggested by him in that political opponents within the women's movement or native Canadians who have become politically active are being punished. I do not think that the level of reaction here is quite that sophisticated, at least not so far as women are concerned. It is my belief that in general the political will is that a woman's place is not in the corridors of power or in the seats of the mighty, or in—

• (1250)

Mrs. Browes: What about the Minister of Justice?

Ms. Clancy: One swallow does not make a summer.

Mrs. Browes: What about the Minister of Employment and Immigration?

Ms. Clancy: Two swallows do not make a summer. You can list them all. Six swallows do not make a summer either. Neither do two or three justices on the Supreme Court or the various supreme courts nation-wide.

There is a general response. The abortion legislation gives us an example of that, as do the cuts to women's programs. Women have become too uppity. They have made too much noise and it is absolutely time that some of this was squelched at the source.

Mrs. Gaffney: They have to be slapped down.

Ms. Clancy: Yes. They have to be slapped down in a political manner, I do agree.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I would just like to pick up on my question before the member from the NDP spoke. It was in relation to the question posed by the hon. member for Halifax to the minister.

What we are encouraging the women and groups of women to do is to make application. We want to keep the women's centres open and to have those applications in order to be flexible so that we can keep the centres open and make it possible for those programs that have been set forth by the women's centres.

In the blanket question that the hon. member is asking, we want to look at each application. Our staff is ready to co-operate at any time in order to provide the service.

I just want to say to the hon. member that the social justice program for women is really quite a remarkable one. If you think of the women in positions of power, 30 per cent of the positions on all boards and commissions are now held by women, which is a remarkable increase from when her party was in power over some years.

We have the employment equity bill, the federal contracts program, the Canadian Jobs Strategy, and the changes to UI Act, Bill C-21, that we think is important to get through for training. There are the family violence centres and initiatives that have been put forth. There is $40 million in additional funds over the next four years to help the problem of family violence, $22 million for 500 new transition houses, and $18 million to help improve social and health services for Canadian women. Now that is a remarkable accomplishment.

When looking at the total picture, these are remarkable initiatives that the government has pursued and we will continue to work with the women of Canada in order to provide that social justice that we believe is so important.

Ms. Clancy: I have just a short response, Madam Speaker. I thank the hon. member for Scarborough Centre. I cannot imagine why the women of Canada do not feel better. They just feel so good, it is a wonder their heads do not fall off.

The number of programs can be cited and recited by the government members. There is this idea that the women just have to reapply. Why is the government changing the rules in midstream? Give them back the money, $1.6 million. The minister himself has said it is peanuts. So give them the peanuts and let the centres stay open. What is the matter? Are you afraid there is something going on in there that is going to do something dreadful to you? Come on. Be good. Be honest. Give those women back the money they need.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I must certainly affirm what was just said by the member representing the Liberal party.

Before I get into my own remarks, I would like to extend my greetings or regrets to the member for Burnaby—New Westminster who was the instigator of this resolution and this debate today. I can tell you that this member, who has worked so hard for women, is at this time meeting with women's groups in British Columbia and will soon be meeting with women's groups right in the front lines in other provinces as well.

We are extremely concerned about what the government is doing to women, particularly to women's centres. This is just the tip of the iceberg. It is really the symbol of so many things that are wrong about the government.

I would like to say, before I get to women's centres, that in my view the most cruel and inhumane cuts in this very devastating budget were cuts to Secretary of State funding. These cuts affected a number of groups: aboriginal groups, ethnic minorities as well as women. They were cuts also to the kind of programs that are helping powerless groups to speak out and to work for equality, cuts to advocacy groups of all kinds, to national groups in the case of native people who are working towards self-government, to communications publications that help groups to network and bring their issues before people to gain broad support, cuts to research and to self-help groups. I would call women's centres a self-help program.

Why has the government chosen to cut funding for disadvantaged groups that are struggling to achieve equality? I would just like to requote the statement of my colleague a few minutes ago. He questioned whether or not this was not the "actions of a paranoid government that is punishing political opponents"? I think this was a very astute comment by my colleague. Why are government members, and particularly the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and the Secretary of State himself, deliberately trying to silence the voice of native groups who are working towards self-government, ethnic minorities who are pressing to end racism and to achieve equal opportunities for various ethnic groups, women's organizations that are front-line advocates for equality which are part of the feminist movement across Canada and the feminist publications that are the link between women in this very large country of ours?

Obviously, the government does not want criticism. It does not want criticism of its policies. Of course, women in particular have had very much to say about this and about the fact that we are not moving nearly quickly enough towards equality in the country. My colleagues have noted a number of examples, as did the Liberal speaker a few minutes ago.

The government really does not want to have these groups that are speaking out for disadvantaged and so-called powerless people becoming powerful. That is, of course, what is needed. We need advocacy groups that will represent people across the country and get to the government, not only to criticize but to put forward positive ideas and positive programs and amendments to legislation and so on. I think this is an essential part of our democratic system. It is very important that the government continue to fund such groups. The government is deliberately cutting the voice of the most disadvantaged of Canadians.

We have heard over and over again today, and we just heard a few minutes ago from the member for Scarborough, about what a wonderful job the government has done in appointments. What good is lip service about equality, which it is also great at espousing, and token appointments to a few jobs, if, at the front lines in communities, women are getting poorer and they are increasingly being battered and abused? Their rights are not being respected. They are not able to get into equal employment with decent rates of pay, and they do not have child care. At the same time, the women's centres, which are there to help with critical problems, are being closed because of the need for a relatively small amount of money from the government which it has deliberately taken away from women.

This government also is the government that espouses multiculturalism. I say this as the multicultural critic. At the same time, it has cut federal funding for heritage languages, for advocacy groups that are speaking out at the federal level, and for citizenship and language training programs that are absolutely essential for newcomers to the country and others. These are all part of the same pattern.

Today, however, we want to concentrate particularly on the whole problem of the budget cuts of $1.6 million to women's centres.

• (1300)

Where is the minister who is responsible for the status of women? She has not been in the House today. She has not answered questions—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. The hon. member is an experienced member and I wish she would not mention who is and who is not in the House. She knows that this should not be done. Will we have to repeat this again and again today? I thank all the hon. members for their co-operation in this matter.

Ms. Mitchell: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I think my colleagues and certainly the women across the country who have been watching the House this week, and women who have been sitting in women's centres and been tossed out of women's centres, even being charged with offences, are well aware of what has not been said by the Minister responsible for the Status of Women this week. She has refused to answer questions. I have put several questions to her. She has refused to answer them and I think, indeed, that her colleagues have been protecting her. I think it is time—

Mrs. Browes: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to correct the record. I am not sure whether the hon. member who is speaking now was in the House this week, but certainly the minister—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. This is not a point of order and the hon. member will have the opportunity on question and comments to rise and correct the record if she feels it ought to be.

Ms. Mitchell: I think the record will show that the member who just spoke has been on her feet much more this week than the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

However, let us get back to the whole question of budget cuts to women's centres which are so devastating for women in this country. When we consider the number of centres that have been covered across the country by $1.6 million, it is really a very small amount. As I said earlier, this is one of the most insensitive and inhumane cuts. I do not blame women for feeling that this is the last straw, and that it is actually a direct attack on women and on the women's movement across this country.

A women's centre is a place for women to go when they need support, when things are falling apart at home, when they need to talk to someone who will listen and who will be sympathetic and give encouragement. It is a place to go when they have problems or ideas they want to share, when they have been battered or abused and they just do not know where to go for help. It is a place where they can help others, when they want to volunteer and help their sisters.

There is so much that women's centres provide, and for such a small, piddling, little amount of money. The value that our society and women themselves have received for the very wonderful service that women's centres across the country provide is incredible.

I want to repeat what everybody on this side of the House has been saying today, and the minister did not seem to hear this morning, that women's centres need core funding. Do we have to keep saying it over and over again? They need basic administrative core funding to pay the rent, to pay for the telephone, to keep the door of the centre open, and to provide, at a very minimum a co-ordinator, who usually works seven days a week and many hours of overtime. The centres are open in the evenings and quite often on the weekends. Emergency services are available. When there is one co-ordinator then you can have many, many volunteers who will help as well. We can multiply the staff that is there to serve people.

I want to pay particular tribute to the women who have worked, and are still struggling to keep women's centres alive across this country.

I met many of them about three years ago when I was on the Secretary of State committee that toured this country several times and spoke to groups in every province. We held hearings because at that time the REAL Women were challenging women's funding of the Secretary of State program. We heard over and over again in every region about how hard women are working, and their dedication to overcome the hassles of having to constantly fight for resources to survive.

The minister and other members opposite have been saying that they would be nice to these poor women by providing fast-tracked project money. As we have been saying over and over again, project money is not the answer. That is not what they want. Project money is of no use if you cannot keep the centre open in the first place and if there is nobody to work with a core of people to develop the programs.

We also know that projects are just adjunct to what centres offer. It is nice to have specialized programs but first the women's centre has to be open and there have to be people there to welcome women and be there to help when women come to their sisters in desperation. You cannot have other programs, as I say, unless first there is core funding to keep it operating.

I think the Secretary of State is really misrepresenting what women's centres want and need. I asked him a number of times today if he had or was going to meet with women in these centres? He said yes. I do not know who he has been meeting with. He would not name any of the groups and he would not say when he had met with them. He certainly would not go to St. John's, Newfoundland, when the women were sitting in at the Secretary of State centre there. In fact, he was the one, through his central office here, who approved police action to go in and not only remove women but to charge them for civil disobedience.

It is incredible. He is the minister who also has refused to go out to British Columbia to meet with women there. They have been protesting and I understand 15 of them were removed forcibly. This is not an isolated policy, it is a policy that has been approved by the minister and it is creating a police state for women in this country. It has got to stop.

When the minister talked about project funding he also neglected to say that this is short-term funding. It is not going to solve the problem. It takes endless hours of bureaucratic procedure to allocate the money.

Probably one of the poorest communities in Canada is in downtown Vancouver, in an area called the Downtown East Side. The women's centre there, the Downtown East Side Women's Centre, serves the poorest women, street women, women who have come out of mental institutions, women who have alcoholic and drug addiction problems, native women coming from reserves and many of the most troubled women that you can meet. The Secretary of State in the Vancouver region, over and over and over again, refused funding for that centre. I want to put that on the record.

When I hear about all the other centres across the country that have had funding over the years and should have funding, I want to make a particular complaint on behalf of that centre. Yet that is one of the centres that has been writing letters to the editor saying how important centres are in fighting for their sisters.

The minister does not seem to care about this. In fact, I do not think he really even knows about it. Certainly the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, who should be down there in the Downtown East Side talking to these women, could not care less it seems. She certainly has not given us any indication that she cares or even is beginning to listen to what women are saying.

As I said, we must have a commitment right now to reinstate the funding that the minister took away so brutally for core funding to keep women's centres operating. It amounts to $1.6 million to operate some 75 centres. I am not very good at arithmetic but that certainly does not amount to very much per centre, especially when centres do so very much with such a range of services and ways of helping, and with so many volunteer resources.

• (1310)

Other people have mentioned this as well. It is very hard for Canadians, both men and women, to understand how this government could not just maintain, but increase the funding for CSIS, the security force of Canada, by $33 million.

At the same time, the government cannot find $1.6 million to keep 75 women's centres operating across the country. I think we can see where the government's priorities lie. They prefer to throw women out of Secretary of State offices, to arrest them and to pay for rent-a-cops to protect the Secretary of State offices from these violent women who are attacking them. Actually, these women are conducting civil disobedience in some cases, but certainly to protest the cuts in funding and to demand their rights. I congratulate them for doing this.

This week I asked the minister how much the Secretary of State will be paying for the extra security of these rent-a-cop services that he feels are necessary to protect his staff and to protect his precious files. I know that no women in those offices are interested in getting into files, and they certainly are not interested in attacking staff. Maybe if they could get a hold of the minister, they might like to give him a wallop, but they certainly are not going to pick on people in Secretary of State offices. They were asking for the minister to meet with them, and, of course, this is what he has not done.

I must repeat again, where is the minister responsible for the Status of Women in all of this? She is supposed to be defending Canadian women. She is supposed to be listening to their concerns. She is supposed to be going to the minister and to cabinet on their behalf.

That is the purpose of this office. That is why the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, 20 years ago, insisted that this be a new position. Yet it is really a negative position now. It is incredible that in the one or two times when she has responded in the House, she has just angrily defended the government and its cut-backs. These cut-backs are decimating women's centres.

I heard the minister last night on the news channel. He was again defending his action in cutting core funding for women, and accusing people who did not like this of trivializing and marginalizing women's centres. That is the jargon he has been using. Women are trivializing women's centres by demanding funding to keep them operating. One of the women from British Columbia, from the Vancouver Status of Women, on the same program pointed out that in B.C., 21 centres received $478 from Secretary of State. In addition to fund raising, they provided 61,000 volunteers which valued at over $450,000. It cannot be said that they are not doing their part.

I see that my time is almost up. I just want to again say to women across this land: Keep up the fight. This is a fight for equality. It is just the tip of the iceberg. We must have funds for women's centres reinstated immediately.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, there were so many inaccuracies in the speech by the hon. member that it is hard to know just where to begin.

First I want to say how proud we are of the work of the women in the cabinet of the Government of Canada, in particular the cabinet minister who is responsible for the Status of Women. Having had an opportunity to work with the minister on a number of projects and on a number of committees, I know of her commitment for the last 25 years on women's issues. It is a disservice for the member across the way to be making such statements.

First, let me point out that the regional offices across the country are set up in order to serve the public. We have citizenship documents there that need security. We also have the public property that has to be secured.

Most important, we want to be able to approve the applications that we have invited women's groups to put forth. If our staff in the regional offices are unable to serve the public because of interruption of their duties, I think the member across should be encouraging us to have staff approving and reviewing the applications and working with persons in a positive way in order that we can assist the women's centres in every way we can.

Our government has put forth a number of programs for what we might consider the double disadvantaged women. Having spent some time working in a women's centre in Scarborough, I know that there is a referral system. We refer people to other agencies and so on. They provide a great service. However I think it can be noted that the double disadvantaged women's programs are targeting money for disabled women, aboriginal women, visible minority women, and rural women. It is important that we do not overlook the tremendous commitment that we have as a government in terms of providing services in a whole range of areas through a comprehensive program. I think it is important that the member understand that.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I would like to say that I have known the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and often sit with her on the plane going back and forth to Vancouver. I like and admire her. That is why I am so deeply disappointed, not in her as a person, but in this government. I am sure the government is behind this. This responsibility has become worthless. In fact it is a negative position. I just wanted to make that clear.

The hon. member mentioned that the Secretary of State offices are there to serve the public. That is also the purpose of women's centres, to serve the public, yet the government is shutting down the women's centres.

The women who are going into Secretary of State offices are not going to be looking at citizenship files. I would like to have one bit of evidence that has happened. Really, the simplest way to solve this whole problem, to stop the protest, to stop the sit-ins in the offices, to stop the need for extra security and paying for extra security forces, and to ease the government's apprehension is to reinstate the funding. It is so simple.

It will not require staff time, and it will keep the services going that women are providing.

The hon. member mentioned services for double disadvantaged women. I could not agree more. In fact our task force that was looking at Secretary of State women's programs said that is where there should be special targeting.

I would like to point out the example, I gave a few minutes ago, of women in my riding, at a women's centre downtown. They are the most disabled women you could find: young native women who need and want to be off the streets, visible minority women and many immigrant women who do not speak English. That is a centre that has been refused funding. The government says one thing, but it does not carry this out in practice.

Women who are immigrants or have certain disadvantages are far more likely to go to an informal storefront operation, operated by other women who are friendly and caring, than they are to go a big bureaucracy or to go to Secretary of State office and talk to bureaucrats.

• (1320)

There are many reasons why women need these funds, and it is a small investment for the amount of economic and social value in return. I hope that the hon. member, who I know is a very sincere and hard working person, would do her best to convince the minister and the government that these funds must be reinstated.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Charlesbourg.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to specify that, since I will share my time with one of my colleagues, I will only use the first 10 minutes.

I am a little confused by the motion before us today. I listened to the speeches made by the Hon. Members for Halifax and Vancouver East and I came to the conclusion that it is hard to change. It was 20 years ago that the Royal Commission on the Status of Women tabled its report.

If I personally asked my colleagues opposite whether Canada has moved toward women's social and economic equality in the last 20 years, I am sure they would both agree that the country and the government have made progress in that direction.

In the last six years, this government has also worked in co–operation with Canadian women to achieve women's equality in every sector, in particular by amending existing legislation, introducing new fiscal initiatives and appointing more women to influential positions. This is where it starts.

Let us take social reform for example. The reform of the Divorce Act and the adoption of certain legislative measures such as the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act have resulted in greater compliance with these orders and agreements. Several provinces have set up a computerized central enforcement machinery which is automatically triggered by the legal system.

To fight against family violence, Madam Speaker, our government has earmarked over a four–year period some $40 million, including $22.2 million which were used to develop 500 new facilities where victims of violence could find temporary shelter, in addition to the 1,400 emergency housing facilities already provided for by the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This assistance makes it possible for 25,000 other women and their children to find shelter and escape violence.

Of course, when we consider the progress made, we are all aware that there is still much to do, but I suggest this is a continuing process. What matters is that the situation is improving and that increased efforts will be made to improve it further.

To fight against family violence, the government has taken other initiatives, for instance in research. A very significant point, in view of some real cases, is the new awareness of the legal system. The awareness of the public, the allocation of special funds to native communities, and all the initiatives resulting from the federal legislation which came into force in January 1988 to fight against child and the sexual abuse.

Madam Speaker, the government has implemented other legislation to help and treat more fairly aging women. I refer for instance to the spouses' allowances, the survivors' benefits, as well as the amendments to the Pension Act and the Pension Benefits Standards Act.

The purpose of these legislative measures was first and foremost to help women more and more.

Madam Speaker, I suggest everybody will agree that women are playing a more active roll in the economic life of this country and that, as such, they contribute still more to its economic development.

Today women are 44 per cent of the labour force. Statistics show that they account for 73 per cent of Canada's economic growth since 1980. In the last five and a half years, Madam Speaker, our government has done much to remove the obstacles that prevented women from participating fully in our economic life. One of these achievements was the passage of the Employment Equity Act in 1986.

Our government has established an equal–pay program to help federally regulated employers comply with the requirement that everyone be paid the same for work of equal value.

Recently, on January 26, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) announced salary adjustments for some Public Service employees. Under a joint management–labour agreement, about 70,000 public servants in female–dominated occupational groups will receive on average $4,000 each in retroactive payments, as well as annual adjustments of 4 to 7 per cent.

The policies which our government has adopted over its term of office, and I already mentioned several of them, have provided women with greater opportunities to participate more in the economic life of our country and to contribute more to its economic prosperity.

The barriers that prevent people from obtaining better jobs and participating more in society are hard to overcome for some groups, in particular native, immigrant and illiterate women. Our government is continuing to establish policies and programs to eliminate these barriers and to help women prepare for a better future.

For example, to help native women we set up a federal–provincial task force whose mandate is to study the economic development issue and suggest ways to offer them more interesting challenges in business, management and self–development.

After giving serious consideration to the needs and aspirations of women immigrants, we organized a linguistic training program to help them settle in their new country. The program, designed for immigrant women who are not in the labour force and who remain at home to look after their family, proved to be profitable and we decided to expand it. In 1988 our government invested $25 million to help women immigrants get used to life in Canada and improve their employment opportunities by offering basic language courses in their own country, expanding orientation and linguistic training programs in Canada, and offering these women a wider choice of training courses for specific jobs.

To my mind, Madam Speaker, the most constructive initiative taken by the government to give women better opportunities to take part in the various activities of our society has to be the $80 million five–year scholarship program unveiled in 1988 to encourage Canadian students to major in engineering, applied sciences, mathematics, agriculture, physics and biology. At least half of these scholarships will go to women. The contribution of women is essential if we want Canada to compete successfully in tomorrow's world economy, and this program reflects that fact.

Madam Speaker, our government has made a firm commitment to women's equality. Amendments already in place provide a stepping stone towards that goal, and we want to continue to work as a full partner in promoting the right of women to full and equal participation in our society.

We have also focussed on the needs and aspirations of immigrant women. We have set up a language training program.

• (1330)

In view of all those objectives, Madam Speaker, we can say that some things a have been achieved, but that there is still much to be done. And we believe some degree of cooperation is in order. The government program I am the proudest of as a woman is the Scholarship Canada studies fund. If I were sitting on the other side, I would make an effort to consider Bill C–21 and the harm it has done to women. I can tell you that I have heard of more problems and received more inquiries from women about that question than on any other. The same is true of the child care program that the other place has rejected as insufficient in 1988.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Charlesbourg, but I would also like some further explanation. She mentioned the contribution her party made to women, the economic impact women have had in our country since her government took office, the strong commitment made to women, and the promotion of womens' rights. However, as far as employment equity, and equal pay for equal work are concerned, can she tell us how the Secretary of State can subsidize a group, like REAL Women, which is against equality for women and has made its position known to the Committee on Abortion? How can she explain that? And what about immigrant women. The immigrant women in our province, which is also your province, Madam Speaker, are probably the ones most in need of these women's centres. If we really want to promote equality for women, we must work with these centres. Battered women need those centres. The same goes for women in trouble. Back home, in Quebec, the closure of women's centres will cause almost irreparable harm. I would like to hear what the hon. member has to say about that.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, as I would like to point out to the hon. member, we all agree that the work done in women's centres is most important. But this area must as any other reflect the changes our society has undergone. Reference was made earlier to progress in some areas. It is a fact that women's groups have contributed a lot to our society's evolution. We now have a co-ed society, which probably was not the case when you were going to school nor indeed when I was; we have a society where boys and girls share the same education system; when you go to a university you find that often female students out number male. If we do not face up to the fact that society has changed over these last 20 years, we will still be addressing the problems of 20 years ago rather than the present ones. We must be able to adopt and to change, we must find new ways to meet those challenges. On a number of occasions today, during Questions Period the minister had this answer: Submit applications! For core funding, applications have bveen made yearly anyway. Test the system, submit your applications. You would not have to wait long for an answer. We will treat them on a priority basis so that you know exactly where you stand.

It seems to me this is a lot of noise rather than a attempt to find out what this is all about. Is the change so dramatic, or does it allow us not only to identify core needs but also to specify the scope of activity of an individual group?

I was once much involved with consumers'groups. At one time, we reviewed grant programs. I can tell you those programs are very similar to women's programs. However, applications once decided upon must be replaced by others.

As I said earlier: Yes, we have done a lot of things. But we are not ready to say there is nothing else to do. There remains a lot to do. We must move forward, it is imperative that those centres, those groups, keep on working. We are asking them to change their procedures, which does not mean we are not willing to keep on working with them, in the best interests of all women in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure and a privilege for me to speak in the debate this afternoon. The issue of the women's centres has been no more an issue anywhere in the country than in my own community and in my own province.

In Newfoundland and Labrador we have seen the threatening of closure of seven women's centres. At this time in my province they are playing a role that is probably expected of no other women's centres, at least certainly not to the same extent, considering the nature of the economy, the fishery and some of the many other difficult social challenges that we face in coming to grips with some of the realities that we see.

Nobody in our society feels the pressure, takes more of the responsibility and is left with more of the task of keeping a family together, particularly in a society like ours in Newfoundland and Labrador, than the woman. We are seeing in our women's centres and in other places an increased demand for services for the family and for women as our communities come to face and to deal with the realities that are before us.

Over the last little while the women's centres have played a tremendous role, not only the traditional role of advocacy and providing referral services and education, but particularly in providing a base from which women's groups—which are community and family groups—can provide other services either directly or indirectly. The women's centres have played a substantial role in the development of transition houses, crisis intervention centres and programming. They play a tremendous role in providing advice to those who need to know about a community or region as they provide analyses of current social trends, the effects of the economy and how a community is responding and the needs of that community down the road.

The women's centres have played a tremendous role in ensuring that all of us know what it is that matters to women, what is important to women and how their interests are best represented, best addressed and kept in the forefront of the minds of people who make decisions or who do things that impact on women.

Therefore, the ongoing role of these women's centres is clearly essential. This is something that I have made very clear to the Secretary of State. He and I have discussed this matter virtually every day for the last three weeks. I know that he understands the situation in Newfoundland and Labrador.

He has met with me and with the chair of the Provincial Advisory Council on the Status of Women. He has met with me and with the provincial Minister of Education who was representing his colleague who is responsible for the status of women. He has had his officials meet with officials of other departments on the basis of conversations that I and others have had to bring people together.

• (1340)

The point of all that is to bring together the resources of the Government of Canada, the province of Newfoundland and Labrador and the community to ensure that the ongoing support and resources are available so that the women's centres in Newfoundland and Labrador can continue their work.

We can sit around and debate and argue about core funding, about this, that and the other envelope. My concern is that those seven centres are able to continue. They must continue.

I am not going to spend resources and energy banging my head against the wall, when in my view I should be out trying to deal with the situation that we have in front of us. That says to me that I, and I know others, including and especially the Secretary of State want to put together those resources so that we can continue the operation of these centres.

We have increased funding in Newfoundland and Labrador. That funding has a much greater flexibility that will allow us to have these facilities continue.

What is essential is that we meet and sit down with officials of the Secretary of State and representatives of the women's centres. The minister has said that he will meet with representatives of the women's centres.

We have seen the effectiveness when dealing with the Second Storey Centre in Bridgewater, a centre that we all know is very effective and has done a tremendous amount of work.

We do have the capacity to make this happen, if we have the will. The need is there. There is no one in my community who disputes that. What we need to do now with the help of the Secretary of State who has made it very clear to me, to this House and to people across the country, and who is prepared to be flexible and move forward with the type of funding that we need, is to ensure that the centres continue. More than anything, it is important to ensure that the centres do continue now and into the future, so that they can continue to provide the services, the voice and the education for women in my province where, sadly, it is still needed as much as ever.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On questions or comments, the hon. member for Nepean.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to those who spoke before me. I am not speaking this afternoon on this subject as much as I would have liked to. I would just like to make a couple of comments before I ask my question.

There is no doubt in my mind, or in the mind of any woman who sits in this Chamber, that we have made great strides as women in this country. All we need do is look at the number of members of Parliament who are women, the number of women who are on the bench, the number who are educators to confirm that. Women are playing key roles in helping to change the fabric of our society in the way that our country is moving and governed.

That is a positive statement. I am proud to be part of it.

There is also a segment of our society that needs our help, support, dollars and appropriate legislation because it cannot possibly survive or achieve the status that we would like it to achieve unless we do provide help.

I do not think these women want handouts. Women are not like that. We do not want to be on the dole. But there are some people in society because of their position in life or because of what they have been born into who have no way out.

The previous speaker from Newfoundland stated that eloquently. He recognizes that in his own riding. I congratulate him for that.

I would like to look at a project in my own riding, the riding of Nepean, which is probably considered fairly affluent. But there is not a riding in this country that does not have depressed people, demoralized and deflated people. People in my riding and I have been trying to get a project going. It is called SWIN, Shelters for Women in Nepean. We have applied through the Minister of Housing for funding for that project. We can get capital funding for a shelter for women in Nepean where our women are having to be transported hundreds of miles away if they have to get out of an unhappy home situation. But there is nothing there to help with the operating costs. The government will help build a shelter, but where will the money for the operating costs come from?

To get to the cuts of $1.6 million, I wonder if the the person who was there with that big sharp knife cutting the money from these projects really looked and saw who they were hurting. It is not you or me, not us here in the House. They are hurting the women who can least afford to be hurt. I wonder if they looked at that and decided that it did not make any difference, if they thought that, after all, this is a women's program, let's cut it.

I would like the member to respond to that comment.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, first, I will comment if I may on my hon. friend's comment. One of the problems and the frustrations that we have in a province like Newfoundland and Labrador is that there are a tremendous number of services that need to be provided. But either because the provincial government has its priorities in a certain order, or because it does not have the resources, these services cannot be or are not being provided. That happens with every provincial government in Atlantic Canada. It has nothing to do with parties or anything. That is just the way it is.

As well, the community is often not at the point of being able to provide a service. Needs emerge in smaller communities in rural Atlantic Canada. They have a long way to come compared to Nepean. I think my friend recognizes that.

What we have seen is that out of necessity one way or another, or because of a clear commitment, women's centres have provided a tremendous base of services to women and families, partly in the absence of other people being able to do it and partly, as I say, the commitment is there.

There is no question that we must continue to support women and women's programs directed to those people in our society in the sector that my friend was referring to who need the help the most. Tragically, so many of those problems befall on people simply because they are women. That is something that we must continue to work against in this country. Despite the great accomplishments that we on this side talk about, and which my friend acknowledges, women, simply because they are women, have a tremendous number of problems that the other half of us do not simply because we are men. In this country, that is wrong. It is not something that you change by law, sadly. It is something that you change by attitude.

In terms of commitment, this government has been committed to women in a number of ways. Hon. members have heard about it. I want to talk briefly about one program that we funded through ACOA.

Some $800,000–odd was allocated to develop a women's enterprise centre, to provide women a source of information so that they could start businesses, recognizing that women are under–represented in the business community in Newfoundland and that their capacity is not being developed, enhanced or released so that we can see economic development and job creation.

ACOA put in that amount of money to say: "Let's go. Let's see what is out there. Let's say to women, 'Come in. What ideas do you have? We will help you around the red tape.'" It is not money. It is not source funding. It is not grants or anything else. It is: "We'll tell you how to get other sources of money, what the red tape is, where the corners are and we will help you cut them." The commitment is there.

Family violence is another area. We are focusing on the illiteracy of women.

There are a lot of things in my province that we have been able to do, but an awful lot more has to be done.

• (1350)

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood. That is the first article of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

I would like to stress the terms "dignity" and "brotherhood". In an increasingly violent society, where the number of the homeless and the needy is increasing, where can we find this spirit of community and brotherhood? In women's centres or, at least, in the few centres that will survive the budget cuts imposed by the Conservative government.

This is the second year the government has drastically cut back on funding for women's centres. It has entirely abolished core funding for organizations that meet a vital need in all communities. These centres, where the majority of the staff are volunteers, were created to respond to emergencies, but this government has said no, no more!

These centres are often the first place where battered women, alone or with their children, go to get some human warmth, assistance, information and especially support, in a crisis situation. Now there is no more funding to help these centres stay open, who will be there? Who will take over? Who will be on call 24 hours a day?

The unemployment rate is rising and, as was announced by the Minister of Finance, will continue to do so. This will only aggravate social unrest, aggressive behavior and poverty. As of next January, the GST will put additional pressure on all those women who already have trouble making ends meet. Where can they go? Where will they turn?

More than 40 women's centres in Quebec alone will be forced to close because the government has cut $1.6 million in aid programs for women. And that, while they are often the sole bread winner. If we refuse to help them, how can they help their children?

And what about the large number of children who lack the very basics, who through these centres were getting some form of assistance and especially an environment that was less disturbed than what they were exposed to daily. All these children living in substandard housing and raised in an climate of despair and violence are the foundation of our society, but the government is abandoning them by cutting funding for women's programs.

Is this how this government intends to prepare our young people for the future, by forcing them into a life of misery early on? Is it trying to show how unimportant the future of this country is, since they are our future and will soon take our places?

Madam Speaker, I know full well that the Secretary of State will answer me that they will support at least 600 projects totalling $6 million, as he told us on March 26. However, he added, and I quote:

> I realize there are areas where far more should be done, including Native women, women who belong to visible minorities, immigrant women and, of course, women living in isolated rural areas.

Since the Minister admits that far more should be done, how can he justify a $1.6 million cut to the Women's Program? The needs are obvious, often urgent, and this money is essential for some 75 centres. It is a matter of life or death for them and the Conservative government is condemning them to death, just to get back $1.6 million. We see how important the human factor is when it comes to money! How sad!

Mr. Speaker, the government managed to add $114 million to the budget for the Canadian Armed Forces in Europe, while the eastern countries are gradually opening up. It was able to find $33 million more for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. However, it was not able to keep, let alone increase, $1.6 million for the Women's Program. What a curious way to handle a budget.

[English]

Women's organizations have been providing for next to nothing the types of information and services which would cost provincial governments millions of dollars to take on. With the budget presented by the Conservative government not so long ago, how are the provinces going to find the resources to pick up the tab? Who will be losing in the end? Women and children—society as a whole.

What about the Canada Assistance Plan, CAP, which funds social assistance, but which also provides shelters for battered women? With the Tories slapping a spending limit on the three provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, what will happen to women in need?

Presently, shelters for battered women must turn away one out of every two women who come to them desperate for a place to feel secure in. Where will they go? What will happen to them? Does the government need that $1.6 million so badly?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when I asked the Minister responsible for the Status of Women if she had good news for women's groups in Canada, and I would really like to have some this afternoon, she answered, "As the Secretary of State said, we are looking for a solution. He is prepared to release emergency funds to help these organizations apply for project funding."

I do not understand why, if the minister is prepared to release funds, he has to wait for an emergency. Can this government not do prevention instead of picking up the pieces? The solution it is looking for is so obvious: it only has to assure the women's centres of the money it intends to take from them. Is it not better to invest in something that works well than to have to start all over again in a crisis? Surely, without great effort, we could find a way to help the 75 centres stay open and continue their extremely useful work. When we take into account the efforts devoted by hundreds of volunteers and the help given to thousands of women at a critical time in their lives, we realize that $1.6 million is not much.

Who will be there when the next crisis occurs? The police? The emergency services? Canadian women are not asking the government that much. Don't they contribute their fair share? Why refuse them a little support when they are in dire need?

With the new legislation concerning RRSPs, the conservative government will give a tax break to people earning more than $86,000 a year that will cost the public Treasury a further $400 million dollars, and the same government has the gall to argue that it must cut $1.6 million in the Women's Program. Is that a way to meet the real needs of Canadians?

Mr. Speaker, we are gearing for year 2000 but we forget to prepare those who will be living in the next century. In 1990, the Tory government promised a higher unemployment rate, it cut funding of the Women's Program and capped Canada Assistance Plan contributions in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

• (1400)

Result: In each of the three provinces where a ceiling has been put on CAP benefits there will be no place for more than 50,000 children in day care centres. Has the government any suggestions for parents—single parents in most instances—who had planned to send their kids there?

Result: At least 75 women's homes will have to close down for lack of money. Whom will battered and desperate women turn to in times of crisis? The police?

Result: Ever more women are unable to land a job, but when they do find work they have nobody to look after their children. Who will offer them financial security? The welfare system!

It is a sad comment on our society when the government cuts off essential services and then spends $14 million to promote the goods and services tax which nobody wants and which will only swell the ranks of poor Canadians. Under such circumstances they find it increasingly difficult to keep their dignity and maintain a spirit of brotherhood.

Nothing warrants the $1.6 million cut-back which will force so many women's centres to close down. They exist because they meet a real need which nobody else wanted to meet. They exist because our society is not all that well. They exist because in many instances they faced up to critical situations which others would not even acknowledge. And now the government wants to get rid of them to save a paltry $1.6 million.

Has anybody measured the cost in human failures which will result from the closing of these centres? Has anybody considered its social impact? Has anybody suggested an alternative to face up to the critical situation which will result from this closing? And above all, can anyone explain the logic behind these cut-backs which, while helping nobody, create hardship for the have-nots in our society.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the more I search, the less I find the logic in a $1.6 million cut, forcing 75 centres for women throughout Canada to close. In a period of Canadian life when tensions are high, poverty is on the rise, violence and crime are daily news and jobs are getting rarer by the minute, we need centres. We need centres for women to help them get through the crisis.

These centres ask government for a minimum. Daily, volunteers are there as a help, as a presence, as counsellors, with time to give and no pay to take. These are the centres the Tories are closing. This is the saving, $1.6 million, that will save the budget?

[Translation]

Why is the government so determined to keep women and their children live in misery? What have they said to deserve such a wrath? Is the government demonstrating his lack of consideration for Canadian women by abandonning them in times of crisis? Is it because they never lived through such desperate situations that none of the members on the government side can sympathize with this cause and defend it. Yet, it is not necessary to have experienced every kind of hardship to support such a worthy project. Could it be that this Tory Government has doubts about the usefulness of these women's centres? Could it be the unavowed reason behind these cuts?

Article 4 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights states: "No one shall be held in slavery or servitude; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms."

Mr. Speaker, slavery and servitude become the destiny of all the battered women who do not know where to go. It is the destiny of all those who have become homeless against their will. It is the fate of all the have-nots who seem to go through a series of critical situations. As a society, what are we going to do?

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I cannot accept the many excuses the Conservative government comes up with when asked to give back $1.6 million, an amount that should not ruin it, to the Equal Opportunities for Women Program. It would thus allow 75 women's centres to continue to deal with crisis situations.

Mr. Speaker, when women ask for help, the government must be totally responsive and support them. That is why I ask once again that the $1.6 million be reinstated immediately to preserve what is in place.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville. At one point, she mentioned there are 80 women's shelters in Quebec, 40 of which received an operating grant from the federal government. If we look at the level of funding in Quebec, we see that these 40 centres received an average of $8,500 each. As I have often had the opportunity to work on grant applications, I wonder if an organization with very specific goals and the support of its whole community would have much trouble designing and presenting a project for less than $8,500 to the Secretary of State. I understand that, since the situation is not the same in each of the provinces, it would be hard to extrapolate.

I am talking about what is done in the province of Quebec. We know that all women's centres are also funded by the Quebec government as well as by municipalities and local social groups. But I know full well that it may not be the case in all provinces. In Quebec, that funding represents $8,500 for the operation of the centre. That is the present funding level. Does the hon. member think that the switch from core funding to project funding could jeopardize women's centres in the province of Quebec? I would like to tell her that, at the moment, the reaction we get is that the change will not jeopardize women's centres in our province. I would like to hear her response to that question. Does she think that it is impossible right now to switch from core funding to project funding?

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the honorable member for Charlesbourg for her questions. What I fail to understand, however, is this. Is it because there is not as much hardship in Quebec than in other provinces that $1.6 million, a trifle amount indeed compared to our overall national budget, is not considered important? In my area, women's centres have contacted me. If $8,500—enough money to pay for a volunteer for a year, I suppose—is nothing, why are those women so furious then? Why is the prospect of loosing a mere $8,500 per centre worrying them so much? As far as financial assistance from the Quebec government is concerned, we all know that all provincial governments have seen their transfer payments cut this year. Therefore, if the Quebec government has to pay a great deal of attention to health care and welfare services, I suppose that the women's centres will get the same deal. Again, what is $1.6 million? If you have close to a million to spare for projects, why not reinstate the $1,6 million program that made many centres happy?

Mrs. Tardif: Madam Speaker, I would like to reformulate my question. I was not talking about maintaining a grant of $8,500 or about doing away with a grant of $8,500. I was saying that in Quebec the average was presently $8,500, and I was asking my colleague whether the fact of going from core funding to project funding would really make a difference? Is the centre in her own riding, for example, not capable of submitting a project application instead of a grant application, and of getting about the same amount of money?

Mrs. Maheu: If I take my riding, for example, the new projects are not eligible for core funding. The minister was not clear when he explained the difference between the two. All the women's groups are concerned that the same standards will not apply to both, so that funds will no longer be available. By the way, without the federal government grant, our local centre will not get any other grants. Therefore it will have to close. The situation is very serious.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of comments and questions for the previous speaker. I am delighted to see that the Liberals are supporting the NDP motion in the House.

Ms. Clancy: We invented the program.

Mr. Karpoff: Well, they may have invented the program, but I think they have been a little tardy in coming to the defence of women in this debate.

Ms. Clancy: Oh, right!

Mr. Karpoff: The issue was raised initially in this House by the leader of the NDP, Audrey McLaughlin. We are the ones who applied for an emergency debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. I am sure the hon. member means the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Karpoff: You are right, I mean the hon. member for Yukon, the leader of the New Democratic Party. We are the ones who filed for an emergency debate. We are the ones who put forward this motion in the House and our critic, the member for New Westminster—Burnaby, has been to Newfoundland and Vancouver. She has been working with the women in the centres that have been affected by this program. She is the one who has sponsored the type of dialogue that is going to be necessary to ensure that women's programs in centres are in fact restored.

One of the things that we keep hearing the Liberals saying is that they are supporting this. Can the member recall some of the difficult positions women in Canada were in when the Liberals left government in 1984?

With regard to the issue of wage equity—

Mrs. Maheu: How much are you doing for them in B.C.?

Ms. Clancy: You did a lot for them in B.C., huh?

Mr. Karpoff: I think they are very, very sensitive over there. One of the things I have learned in the last two years is that since the Liberals have become opposition, they talk very nicely but they do not look back on what their record has been.

Ms. Clancy: Where's your record? You don't have a record. You're a broken record.

Mr. Karpoff: I will stack the record of New Democratic Parties in Canada against the Liberal record any time. New Democratic Parties have brought in health care, pensions and other kinds of social programs. The Liberals talk very nice about what they are going to do with regard to women's programming, but then one has to wonder because they keep flip–flopping on every issue. One begins to wonder whether their promises mean anything.

Ms. Clancy: Women, women's centres. Get on the topic.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. I am sorry, I do have to interrupt. The time for question and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Simcoe Centre.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, before I start I would like to say that my 20 minutes is going to be shared by my colleague across.

I would like to make a few comments in addressing the motion before this House. The first has to do with the difficulty of bringing this country's deficit under control.

All members of this House are acutely aware that this government is saddled with an enormous debt. We are managing a debt which threatens our existing social programs. But, worse, unless this debt is reduced now there will simply be no hope of our expanding these programs or even contemplating new and needed social programs.

The Minister of Finance and this government are reducing the nation's debt. We have done what had to be done to bring government spending under control. We have started the deliberate task of building toward balanced budgets. It is only when fiscal stability is in sight that we will be able to consider the different social programs which Canada needs.

Yes, we have had to reduce spending in some areas. It was not a pleasure making those reductions. Let no one think otherwise. They were not made because we wanted to make them. They were made because we had to make them.

No reduction is popular. Everyone has a vested interest in some aspect of federal spending and they complain bitterly when that spending is reduced. No one wants their program to be touched.

The reductions we have seen are to areas in which we can no longer afford to participate, or in which we have to move more slowly, or in which other jurisdictions have a more rightful place.

Every member of this House acknowledges that there are women in need of help: women whose lives have been torn by violence against them, women who have been abandoned by their mates, or women whose lives have been disadvantaged. Every member will agree that women's centres provide that help, that they are there for women.

However, every province in this country provides social services to people in need. These social services provide necessary information, provide referral to appropriate agencies, and provide support and counselling. These are provincial services so one may reasonably ask: Why was the federal government supporting another system of services?

Through the Canada Assistance Plan the federal government supports one-half of provincial expenditures on social services for women and other populations. Over the years the federal government has invested heavily in the core funding of women's centres. It no longer can afford to do so and provinces will have to assume more responsibility. However, note that the federal government will share one-half of whatever provinces spend on services for women in need.

As I noted earlier, there are many ways in which women are in need. We have all become acutely aware of the need for more and better child care. It was this government which was the first to do something to address that need. We wanted to do more and members opposite will recall how we were prevented from doing so by the other place. We all now wish that all elements of the national strategy on child care had been put in place. Not all were, and now we find ourselves having to go slower on child care than planned as we manage the nation's debt. However, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have stated on numerous occasions that a national child care program will be operational before the end of this mandate.

This strategy will enhance the well-being of families and children in terms of meeting child care needs. This will affect families all across the country, but some elements were put in place and they are directly helping women across Canada every day of the year.

The federal government has, as part of the national strategy on child care, implemented two major initiatives on child care. In this regard families now have access to enhanced tax assistance for pre-school aged children through an enriched child care expense deduction which was doubled to $4,000 per child in 1988 and a new $200 supplement to the child tax credit. Taken together, these measures assist almost two million families. In addition, a child care initiatives fund has also been established to encourage innovation and enhance the development of approaches and services as they relate to child care issues by providing funding to projects that promote quality child care services for Canadian families. Women who must work have more affordable child care because of these measures.

• (1420)

The child care initiatives fund, which is just two years old, has had a profound impact on child care in this country. The government has already committed over $33 million in support of some 250 projects across Canada. Members will recall that priorities of the initiatives fund included the stimulation of services within native communities for special needs children, in rural and remote communities for parents who work part time or on shifts, and within multicultural communities.

All of these needs are being addressed. Let us acknowledge the facts. These are the needs of women. These are the needs of women who must work or whose child care arrangements make work difficult and complex. Addressing these needs lets women participate economically and equally. It helps women obtain the training and education which they need to enter and rise in the labour force.

Let us look at just a few of the projects being supported by the child care initiatives fund. In Montreal the Board of Trade is stimulating employer supported child care. It is persuading its members to develop services for employees. In Langruth, Manitoba the Lakeview Children's Centre is developing child care services for farm women of that community. Big city and small town, women's child care needs are being addressed.

In Edmonton the Franciscan Sisters have established multicultural services to support parents while they establish themselves in this new land. The Family Service Bureau in Regina will provide emergency services for sick children to assist working parents.

Projects to provide care to children after school until their parents are off work are being undertaken in Fort St. John, B.C. and Windsor, Ontario. Groups in Kent County, New Brunswick and Red Lake, Ontario are designing services which let handicapped children be cared for with other children.

Perhaps most gratifying of all is the success of the child care initiatives fund in assisting Indian and Inuit communities in the design and development of child care. Some 20 per cent of its projects have been awarded to our native peoples. Who more than our Indian and Inuit women deserve help? The initiatives fund is helping.

These are all demonstration projects. They are to test new and better ways of caring for children. Clearly the parents of the children served by these projects will benefit but, in time as other communities see what can be and has been done, the parents and their children in those communities will benefit. Most of all, the women of Canada will benefit.

While the motion before us would have you believe, Madam Speaker, that this government does not care about women, it is quite clear that we have initiated programs which are very much for the benefit of Canadian women. In these tight economic times we have had to make choices. We have chosen to support women and children.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the member who just spoke would comment on some of these choices.

Does she really believe that the Halifax office for visiting cabinet ministers, at $1.6 million, is worth more than all the 75 women's centres across the country and the thousands of women they serve?

Does she really believe that Boeing Corporation is more worth $161 million, that is 100 times the amount we are talking about, than all the 75 women's centres?

Does she really believe that a $500 million increase to the Department of National Defence budget, which is now $11 billion—the $1.6 million for women's centres would have been one three-tenths of 1 per cent of that increase; not the budget, just the increase—is a better choice than 75 centres for women right across the country?

Does she really believe that ceremonial state activities are worth $3 million, twice the amount that has been cut from women's centres right across the country?

Does she believe the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is worth $32.6 million but all the women in Canada and their centres are not worth $1.6 million? Did she notice that most of these priorities of her government are male priorities?

Mrs. Anderson: I think that comparing the $1.6 million reduction on the women's program to a project that was announced and created two years ago is hardly a fair comparison. The cabinet ministers' office in Atlantic Canada is very important. It is actually going to help the government to have that.

Boeing has created a huge number of jobs for Canadians. It has a tremendous number of orders on file. In fact there are so many of them that they are going to go on creating jobs for Canadians.

Mrs. Catterall: How many women?

Mrs. Anderson: I did not ask how many women. I am not sure how many are in there. I know my daughter is one of them; she is an engineer there. She is a good one.

I would like to point out that during the years 1979 to 1984, under the Liberals, $12 million was committed for women and our government has committed $56 million from 1984 to 1990 for women. I think that is pretty good.

I think that probably will answer the hon. member's questions.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like the member opposite to respond to a question. Is she aware that the government has scrapped the national strategy on child care? Is she aware that the Canada Assistance Plan which provided funds for child care was also capped by this government?

She made a number of glowing remarks about this government's commitment to women, quite apart from what the motion addresses. I suppose, if you are asked to talk about wasps and you would prefer to talk about bumble-bees, it is nice to talk about bumble-bees. The motion is very explicit in wanting the core funding to be reinstated women's centres, but if she wants to talk about other things we are prepared to talk about other things.

Is she also aware that the transition houses in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario are affected by this latest budget cut through the cuts to the Canada Assistance Plan? These transition houses, where women who have been battered seek refuge, are having their funds reduced. Is she aware of all of those things?

Mrs. Anderson: Madam Speaker, I can start with the national strategy. The national strategy was a program that we had in place which did not get passed, as you will recall. I think the reason was a few members did not support it. There were three parts to that program. Two of them—

Mrs. Catterall: Who cancelled it?

Mrs. Anderson: It did not get through the other—

Mrs. Catterall: Your government cancelled it.

Mrs. Anderson: No, it did not get through the other place, either. Do you recall?

Mrs. Catterall: Your government cancelled it.

Mrs. Anderson: No, that is wrong. That is not correct. We have promised it by the end of this mandate. It will come through before the end of this mandate. We have promised it.

The child care special initiatives fund, to which we have allocated $100 million over seven years, has been in place since April 1988. There have been 217 projects approved for a total allocation of $29.8 million. The tax assistance measures include a $200 supplement to the refundable child tax credit for pre-school children. This is part of that national strategy. I know as part of the strategy the government has proposed the expenditure of $400 million over the seven year period to increase the number of good quality child care spaces. However, the government decided at the time of the 1989 budget not to proceed—

• (1430)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, I have to interrupt the hon. member. The time has expired. On debate, the hon. member for Regina—Wascana.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, this has been an interesting debate, which I know every political party in the House of Commons takes as a very serious matter.

I believe the debate is just a matter of semantics. Yet the public who are watching are probably going to take sides, and when they weigh the value of the debate at the end of the day, they will wonder how any specific issue would cause a split of opinion among hon. members, because everyone agrees with the importance of the matter before us.

Therefore, we are arguing semantics, which is unfortunate because it does take up an awful lot of Parliament's time. Unfortunately, that seems to be the way it is.

I know that there are some members who were not with us earlier when there was this outbreak that caused those of us on the government side no doubt to sit with a smile on our faces at the conflict that appeared to be between the members of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party. It was an exchange, a series of mea culpas. I was there first, whose on second, what's his name is on third. Fortunately, it did not go on but it did seem to break the strain that seemed to be in evidence at the time.

That seems to be over, but I notice that there are two very strong voices in the Liberal party who no doubt will not let me go unscathed after I sit down. It is their job and I can see from the expression on their faces that it will be their absolute delight and pleasure and there will be a few more pleasures down at the other end of the Chamber as well. With that brief assessment of how I view where we have taken ourselves so far today, I wish to express that it is with pleasure that I have the opportunity to speak to the opposition motion concerning the reinstatement of funds to women's centres.

Madam Speaker, I want members of this House to know that we, the government, have had a longstanding interest in promoting the health and well-being of Canadian women. The federal government carries out, as you well know, a variety of programs that address the particular needs of women. In recent years, we have developed new initiatives such as the one to prevent family violence, to respond to the concerns that women themselves have told us are important to them.

Family violence is an issue of tremendous concern to women and to Canadian society generally. We estimate that between one in ten to one in eight women each year are physically abused by the men they live with. This means that as many as one million Canadian women each year are being abused by their husbands or partners. We also know that the majority of victims of child sexual abuse and abuse of the elderly are women. The Badgley Commission reported in 1984 that half of all young women have experienced some form of sexual abuse.

These figures are horrific. Ten years ago, we as a society were largely unaware of the seriousness and extent of this problem. Since that time, it has been women themselves who have worked long and hard to bring to light the problems of family violence and violence against women. This government has vowed to help them.

The federal government through the Department of National Health and Welfare and other departments has worked and worked hard to support women's groups in creating greater public awareness of these issues. We have supported public education programs, national and regional conferences, training initiatives and research studies to create greater public awareness of the causes and consequences of family violence. During this time we have worked closely and consulted with many women's organizations and services all across this country.

The federal government is and remains committed to working with Canadian women to create a society where women do not have to fear for their personal security and lives, either at home or in public. To this end, the federal government announced in June, 1988 a new federal initiative on family violence. This initiative, which is currently under way, has a budget of $40 million over a four-year period and involves 14 federal departments carrying out measures to address family violence. The Department of National Health and Welfare plays the lead role in co-ordinating this initiative.

Under this initiative, we are seeking to better co-ordinate existing federal activities on family violence, to augment these with new activities and to create better means of co-operation among federal departments, provincial and territorial governments and NGOs.

We are working on a number of fronts to prevent and reduce family violence. For example, we are supporting front line voluntary organizations that help women affected by family violence. We are developing new approaches to policing and enforcement. We are supporting research studies on better ways to treat offenders, providing services to native communities experiencing family violence. As well, we are supporting the training and education of professions to better equip them to recognize and deal with family violence. We are also working to develop, in consultation with provincial and territorial governments, provincial associations, business and non- governmental organizations, a concerted long term strategy to address family violence.

I do not think there is anyone in this House who has not had or heard of some kind of example of how much work remains to be done in the area of violence against women. My wife works in a related area and her work there has taught me much. Exposure to the problem has convinced me how important this work is and how necessary it is.

In the case of one pregnant teenage student in my wife's program, the teenager was pregnant for a second time. The pregnancy was caused by her father who, when the teenager indicated that she was going to the police, was struck on the head by the father with a baseball bat. She now suffers from a permanent lingering side effect of this assault. When she was asked why she and her mother did not leave, she answered that as rough as it was at home, it was the only home that they had.

New initiatives are required. One of the most significant elements of these initiatives is a new program called Project Haven which is providing $22 million over four years to increase the number of emergency shelter units or rooms for battered women and their children across Canada. Emergency shelters are an essential resource for battered women and their children. They provide short term accommodation and a safe haven for women and their children who have had to flee an abusive home. Research indicates that a typical victim of such abuse will have been beaten an average of 35 times before she seeks help. Emergency shelters, as well as providing much needed protection, also provide a supportive environment, counselling and information on the options available to women to deal with the problem of abuse.

Project Haven is managed by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation on behalf of the Department of National Health and Welfare and contributes up to 100 per cent of the capital cost of constructing new shelters. The cost of operating the shelters after they are built will be shared between provincial governments and the federal government. We have agreed that provincial governments approve new shelters before we proceed with capital funding under Project Haven and we have established co-ordinating mechanisms with our provincial counterparts to set shelter priorities and to review funding applications. We have placed priority on serving areas which are especially underserviced in emergency shelter facilities and we will give priority to special client groups such as disabled, immigrant, rural and native women.

By the end of the four-year initiative, in March of 1992, we expect to have created an additional 500 new units for battered women. We estimate that these new shelter units will accommodate about 25,000 additional women and children per year on an ongoing basis.

To date, federal officials have negotiated final arrangements with their provincial counterparts for the construction of 301 new shelter units under this program. Project Haven represents a significant undertaking by the federal government to address the needs of Canadian women who have been victimized by violence. It is an example of the kind of co-operative undertaking we have been developing under the family violence initiative where we have worked closely with provincial-territorial governments and community women's groups. Under the current initiative, we have responded to the most immediate needs such as emergency shelter of abused women. We have also undertaken a process of consultation and planning with other government and non-government organizations to develop a long term, national approach to preventing family violence.

We expect that many of these longer term initiatives will become integrated into the ongoing activities of federal departments. We intend to continue our initiatives to prevent and reduce family violence and to continue to consult and work with women's organizations in this process.

As I noted earlier, family violence and other forms of violence against women remain a major concern and priority of women's groups and individual women across this country. Preventing such violence and obtaining full equality for Canadian women will also remain a major concern and priority of this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On questions or comments. The hon. member for Surrey North.

• (1440)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I have heard a lot from the government this afternoon about how much progress has been made for women in Canada. Usually government members keep referring to very high status, high profile women. There has been some progress made in terms of equality for women who come from families who have a great deal of power and a great deal of financial influence. But when you start looking at what is happening to women who are not quite as economically fortunate, you begin to wonder. Some of the programs they brag about, you should really take a look at. They talk about the family violence program on which they are going to spend $40 million over four years. That amounts of $10 per battered woman per year.

There was a lot of discussion from the previous speaker about Project Haven. It was supposed to provide 500 beds. Two years later it has provided 49 beds.

At the same time, in the last budget they introduced a limit on Canada Assistance Plan funding, which will limit the operating cost expenditures in provinces like Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

I have heard talk from the government about employment equity. Since this government has come to power, the wage gap between men and women has increased. When they came into government, women were receiving 66 per cent of the average wage of men. They are now receiving 65 per cent. It has been reduced. Yes, there are some very high profile women, including cabinet ministers, but the average working woman in this country is worse off.

They talk about pay equity in terms of the public service. Yet the government stalled for five years on pay equity and then only offered one quarter of what they were entitled to.

They have talked about language training for immigrant women. The government has not eliminated the inherent discrimination against women in government language training programs. Why did the government eliminate the settlement language training program that mostly affects women? It talks as if it is improving things, but then it eliminates one of the most effective programs, the language settlement training program that was mainly used by immigrant women.

It talks about native women. Well, I do not understand how any member of this government can get up and talk about native women, when it has just cut $9.8 million from native programs.

The most laughable one is when it starts talking about child care. This government promised and promised child care, and once it gets elected it withdrew all its promises and is now trying to suck the Canadian people in so that it can promise it again.

There have been problems in my own municipality with loss of child care spaces, loss of basic child care. It is very nice to have initiative programs which would be icing on the cake, if there was any cake. In my own municipality of Surrey, the women's centre—I could not possibly be out of time already.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member was recognized on the five minute question and comment period. There is about one minute and fifteen seconds let, and I thought he may want to allow the hon. member some time to answer.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, I will certainly put my question. The previous speaker stated that this was all a matter of semantics. In my own municipality of Surrey in South Surrey—White Rock, the women's centre's core funding was reduced by $25,000. They have had to close their sexual abuse program, their battered wives program, and they are going to be able to keep the doors open by bingos and casinos. I ask the member whether he thinks that is a matter of semantics.

Mr. Schneider: Madam Speaker, in the less than one minute that I am allowed to respond, I have made points on about six or seven items that my hon. colleague made reference to. I only wish I had the opportunity to address each and every one them, because certainly I could. I will respond to two in the very brief period of time that remains.

With respect, I am totally appalled at his example of our efforts being made only in areas that affect high quality or high status women. On the one hand, if there is not some acknowledgement being placed towards the very significant and real contribution that women can make in positions of so–called status, our efforts are deemed to be useless and worthless because they are, after all, not meaningful.

On the other hand, I can cite many examples and cases of situations where I have personally been involved representing the Government of Canada where our efforts have been made by and large at numbers of people who are suffering from a broad perspective of problems.

The very last item the hon. member raises is the one about semantics. The difference between operating funds and program funds is, in a nutshell, the difference between having an organization that is responsible and accountable for its funds, as all members in the House of Commons must be, as opposed to those who are not. Simply to disburse a pailful of operational funds at a business location with an address and expect that it will do good things is not good enough for the people of Canada.

They have told us that they want all such funding sources to be truly accountable and responsible to the people of Canada. It is therefore to that degree, in that extent, that the hon. Minister of State, I think rightly, has made money available on a project by project basis.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I do want to talk about these semantics which the previous speaker brought forward. It seems that a great deal of words have been put around the issue by the government, because it chooses not to address the issue.

The issue is women's centres, centres operated by women and for women. The issue is $1.6 million that the government has chosen to cut completely so that those centres have no federal funding. The issue is, will the government, or will it not, recognize its obligations to give women the ability to speak for themselves, to decide for themselves what programs and what services they need. Will the government restore the $1.6 million? That is the issue on the table today.

The government members so far have chosen not to speak to that issue. They have talked a great deal about what they have done for women. In the last three years funding for women's programs has dropped from $13 million to $9 million. It is a simple fact of life that with dollars in your pocket or in your bank account, you can accomplish something and without them, you cannot.

The government, not only by this year's cuts to the women's centres, but by last year's cuts to women's programs, again a matter of 15 per cent, has chosen to stifle the voices of women, to cripple their ability to gain equity in Canadian society. It is doing it not only through the women's programs. It is also doing it through having allowed the Court Challenges Program to lapse and giving it nothing but a temporary, interim amount of funding to carry on. What that has done is completely thwart the efforts of many organizations to bring to the courts the issues that are constraining women's equality, to attempt through the courts to firmly establish women's rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The attack on women, women's programs and on women's rights is not limited to the total cancellation of funding for women's centres in 75 communities across Canada. It is happening throughout government programs.

It seems to me that perhaps members opposite need to be reminded what the women's centres do. Fundamentally, they empower women and allow women to come together to determine their needs, to gain knowledge, confidence and the skills that they need to function fully in Canadian society whether that be as mothers staying at home, as grandmothers, as young girls growing up, as women entering the workforce or as women still in the workforce. That is what the government wants to cut, the ability of women to establish themselves clearly and unequivocally as full participants in all aspects of Canadian society.

• (1450)

Lest people think that there is no need for that, women have arrived and are sitting here in the House of Commons in miniscule numbers, but nonetheless they are here and we do not need to do anything more for women. I think that is the tenor of some of the discussions I have heard today.

I want to remind the members of the House that for many decades the status of women was determined on an 1876 precedent of British common law that ruled that women are persons in matters of pains and penalties, but not persons in matters of rights and privileges.

Every October, the women in this House and other women get together to celebrate the personhood of women that was decided in 1929. The personhood of women was never decided by a court in Canada. It was decided by the Privy Council in Britain. The last pronouncement of the Canadian courts on women as persons per se, was the following: "That since persons required for the public office must be fit and qualified, only men would be eligible for appointment to the Senate". They were ruling specifically on a request that women be defined as persons.

I want to talk very briefly about some of the indicators that women still are far from equal participants in society, that the disadvantages that any person can suffer in society are suffered double, triple or quadruple and more by women.

One in four women in Canada can expect to be sexually assaulted at some time, half of them before the age of 17. A million Canadian women are abused by their husbands or live-in partners every year. Fifty-six per cent of women do not feel safe walking around their neighbourhoods in an urban environment.

Over 42,000 women stayed in crisis shelters in 1985, with 55,000 children. I ask, as we think about women, that we remember that for the large part, women and children are still a unit. Children are the responsibility of women. While there may be some single parent fathers caring for children, the vast majority of children with only one parent are the responsibility solely of women.

What happens to those families? In the first place, if you were in a family headed by a woman, you were five times as likely to be poor than if you were in a family headed by a man. You were only one-quarter as likely to complete high school and go on to university, if you came from that kind of a family.

I want to put in a few statistics about the record of women and their economic status since this government has come to power. In 1984, two-thirds of all poor seniors were women. We hoped that was changing and that we were recognizing the poverty of women as a serious, social and economic crisis and moving towards improving it. But, no, in the last five years it has changed from two-thirds of all poor seniors being women to three-quarters of all poor seniors being women. In case the members opposite are not terribly good at mathematics, that is an increase from 66 per cent to 75 per cent of all poor are women.

I want to talk about why the women's centres fill an important role. The fact is that women experience life in our society differently than men do. There is very little in the public policy structure or in government that recognizes that. How often in the House do we see a male colleague stand up and address any area of their responsibility from the perspective of how a policy or a program or a budget decision affects women?

Ms. Hunter: It depends on which party.

Mrs. Catterall: Only yesterday, I had to send a note down to the party on my far left to remind one of their key spokespersons that when he talked about the impact of free trade on businessmen, he was excluding one-third of the business people and the businesses in this country. It depends on which party, the member said. Ignorance and neglect of women's issues exists in all parties.

It is not only on the front of the women's centres where there have been cuts. Multicultural programs have been cut which will mean the closing of many heritage language schools and it is certainly going to mean the reduction of heritage language schools. Those heritage language schools are the vehicle through which many women are involved in a meaningful way with the rest of their community.

We are cutting funding to native programs, affecting the ability of natives to communicate with each other and to advocate on their own behalf. Members opposite should know that if you happen to be a woman from a multicultural background or a woman from an aboriginal background, you are doubly discriminated against and in double jeopardy.

I want to know why the minister responsible for this program sits there today and talks about project funding. I heard a very paternalistic attitude in that which says basically: "We know best what is good for you girls out there. Just be good little girls and tell us what you want to do with your money, and we will let you have it". The government will not acknowledge that women's centres, run by women for women, are a good thing because they give power to women to make decisions for themselves and to set their own course in life. The government says: "We will tell you what is good for you and we will let you have some money, if you are good little girls and behave yourselves".

I want to know why women have been arrested in St. John's and charged with public mischief for demonstrating quietly in a federal government office. They were sitting there quietly and making their presence known, nothing more, and they were charged with public mischief. Well, the public mischief is the Secretary of State.

Why are we so afraid of women quietly expressing their opinion that we lock government offices against them? Are they such a threat? The building owner, in whose halls women were demonstrating, did not choose to call the police. He did not find them an interference. He did not find public mischief, but their own government did.

I read into the record earlier and I am going to do it again, the kinds of choices that this government has made when it comes to cutting money and the kinds of choices it has made about where to increase its spending. The Halifax office for visiting cabinet ministers, $1.6 million dollars. That is the same amount that is now being taken away from 75 women's centres across Canada. Boeing Corporation, $161 million, 100 times the amount required to keep all the women's centres in Canada open. Then the increase in the National Defence budget,$560 million: one-third of 1 per cent of that increase would keep all the women's centres in Canada fully funded to the extent they are now. Ceremonial state activities was allocated a $3 million increase. I wonder if this includes the ceremonial investiture of the Governor General of Canada, where women were excluded from participating, even though they are members of the Governor General's Footguards.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Althouse:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act to include coverage for producers who feed their own grain to their livestock.

And on the amendment of Mr. Funk (p.4792).

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to stand today and speak on this private member's motion. I must say, as in the case of a good many other motions which have come before this House, this is an example of how effective the idea has been.

The hon. member for Mackenzie is to be heartily congratulated for having brought this matter to the attention of the House. In spite of the fact that the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act pretty well cover the whole sector of grain growing in our nation, and although they have been effective in giving some kind of stability to the grain growing people of Canada, there always has been a deficiency when it comes to those who grow grain which is used on the farm for feeding cattle, poultry or pork.

I was going to say that that has been a serious oversight, but that would be overstating the matter. The fact of the matter is that it is high time that this situation is addressed because in Canada we are so well aware of the need for secondary industry. What the two acts have done is, in a very serious way, hamper the development of secondary industry in agriculture. They put the person who did use the grain on his farm at a disadvantage in so far as other producers in the field were concerned.

This motion goes a long way to alleviating that situation. I understand it has the support of all parties in the House. I think it is a very progressive thing for the Parliament of Canada to be doing.

As I was saying, this motion establishes more firmly the concept of secondary industries within the primary industries in our nation and will go a long way toward doing several things. Hopefully, in so far as the stabilization of the rural economy is concerned, it will help to stop the exodus of people from the rural areas into the cities and should go a long way toward stabilizing the rural populations of our nation in general. The reason for that is it will provide stabilization for the secondary industry and some growth in it as well.

The production of pork, chickens and cattle by the smaller producer will give a stability to these people as well. It will also provide an incentive for people to get away from growing grain only and back into a more labour intensive situation. Again, as I said before, this will help to reduce the depopulation of our rural areas.

There had been some concern expressed in so far as the administration of the program is concerned. I understand that was one of the reasons the concept had not been introduced more rapidly than it has been up to this point. There have been demonstrations in a different context, primarily with the administration in the province of Alberta, in a roundabout way, of getting the Crow benefit to farmers, something which my party and I do not agree with. The idea, the concept, the certainty introduced by the member for Mackenzie that the program can be administered is there. It is something which we should all recognize is possible and will work well. Proof of that has been that it is going to be copied, if it has not been already, in the province of Saskatchewan and in the province of Manitoba as well. It may not be too effective to list a great number of the organizations which have supported this idea, but we could certainly include the Canadian Pork Council, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the Christian Farmers Federation of Ontario, the Ontario Milk Marketing Board, the Prairie Pools and many other organizations which are almost too numerous to mention.

It is very gratifying that we now have what looks like, almost without question, the support of the House of Commons. Certainly Canadian agriculture will be taking a more stable step forward with the passage of this very important motion introduced by my colleague, the member of Parliament for Mackenzie.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo and then the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): For a minute, Mr. Speaker, I thought I was going to have the hon. member's riding, which is a very rich riding—I probably wouldn't mind it—but mine is rich as well in the great agricultural traditions of Canada. I am delighted to represent my riding. It probably has more pork producers, dairy producers and chicken producers than most other ridings in Canada.

I rise with pleasure to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Mackenzie, as amended by the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. It doesn't make the changes that have been suggested here this afternoon. It simply proposes that the government consider changes to the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act to allow payment for grains grown on the farm and fed to livestock on that farm.

I support and have supported this principle for many years. Four years ago the mover of this motion and I sat on the agriculture committee when we made a different recommendation which I will read into the record in just a minute.

I support this motion even though I believe it is a little late. It is late because the need was seen five years ago when grain prices first dropped. Payments to the grain farmers were very large at that time and the pork, chicken, poultry and beef producers were not allowed access to these very large payments.

They saw support going to people who grew their crops on the same type of land right next door to them. They sincerely wanted part of that type of support. But now the five-year average for the crop is so low that the issue is only one of principle. Perhaps in the future if it occurs again in the same set of circumstances, the changes that are suggested here today will have impact and in that light I am delighted to support the motion.

It is too late, as well, I believe, simply because the government has already moved to cover most of the areas concerned. I hope I will have some time later to mention the amount of discussion that has taken place on the safety net proposal. These are discussions that involve many groups and farmers to the point that the agricultural community is almost "discussed out". The farmers hardly have the energy to keep up to the many discussions. The motion comes almost after the fact because we have already moved in this particular area.

I am sure that some of the effects of low grain prices are helped through the stabilization programs that are in place in the red meat sector. But they do not make the wide changes that are built in, which occurred in 1985 and 1986. The farmers like to consider themselves as having two enterprises, the first a grain-growing enterprise and the second a livestock enterprise. I can understand their concern.

Perhaps I could take a moment to add that some of my farmers believe that if they got their subsidy or help in the grain industry, instead of through the red meat industry, then somehow American farmers would not see the stabilization for pork, which has been high in the last little while, as a countervailable item. Somehow they would see it as similar to their deficiency payments and their target prices. Therefore, it is thought, they would not introduce countervail actions.

On the other hand there is also the thought among beef farmers that if we do stabilize grain, then the Americans will indeed see that as a countervailable subsidy which could create the possibility of a countervail action.

I want to go on record as saying that I believe it does not matter how the subsidy arrives in a farmer's hands. If our good, efficient producers can sell a product into the American market and appear to be displacing their producers, then their producers will start a countervail action regardless of the method by which the subsidy is given. Indeed the only solution that is going to stop the countervail program, something which is off the topic here today, is an agreement to net out subsidies which can and will, I hope, be arrived at under the free trade discussion.

• (1320)

About four years ago the mover of this motion, the member for Mackenzie, and I sat on the Standing Committee on Agriculture. At that time we passed a motion which reads: "It should be only for the final products marketed that the producer receives market production under the WGSA or the ASA. In the case of livestock producers, they face the livestock market but not the grain market risk. Treating livestock producers as grain producers means the grain may be covered in the raw form and again as it goes into the final product".

You will see that while the government did not move to fulfil the area I wanted, it did follow the direction of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and the direction of the member who moved this motion in this session of Parliament. I am very pleased that now, through the safety net proposal, we are moving ahead to consider a different form of support.

What are the problems if we follow this motion? As I said before, it is just a suggestion about future action. One problem will be that we go to production records. We are not talking about sales any more if we are dealing with home-fed grains. We have to figure out how much grain is grown on that particular piece of land, the land base that surrounds almost every livestock operation in Canada. It is a matter of how to get those records. We simply do not have them. We would have to go to regional records. The very good grain producer, the man who produces the big crops through good management, perhaps with better land, would be hurt because he could not get as much stabilization as he should be getting. The poor producer would have a benefit because he would get more than perhaps he should because of his production.

As well, we have the matter of increased costs. We have the costs of getting these records. We have the costs of paying for the stabilization of this home-fed grain. It has been suggested that it is about 20 per cent, which is perhaps high. But it is a significant amount of Canadian grain that is fed on the farm and there would be an increased cost to the government.

There would also be increased costs in the Western Grain Stabilization Act, as it is now established, to the farmer since he pays a premium for this coverage.

In our red meat stabilization program there is a factor built-in. In the case of red meat it is the market price of grain. I believe there is a compensating factor. It is not adequate, but there is some compensation paid in the red meat programs. If we introduce stabilization to home-fed grains, it has always been my belief that somehow we would have to separate these out. I have not been able to work out in my mind how such a separation would occur.

There is another effect concerning the stablization of home-fed grains. In my riding there are many dairy producers. Their cost of production is worked into the price they can charge for their products. So the cost of growing the grain is built into the cost of the very excellent milk, cheese and butter that we buy. Indeed, if the dairy farmers of Ontario, and I am sure those across Canada, were to receive stablization of home-fed grains it would reduce the cost of production and end up reducing the market price of their product. Thus stabilization of home-fed grains is of no advantage to the dairy producers of Canada.

This government has done a lot to help the grain farmers of western Canada. In 1985, we introduced interim stabilization payments in the spring so that they could have help early in the crop year, if a payment were judged to be due in the fall. We have extended the coverage. Nine new crops were brought in in 1988. We made it easier for farmers to rejoin the program. We wrote down a very large deficit in the program to help the grain farmers. This has resulted in a very large increase in participation which was, indeed, the reason why we undertook all of these measures.

Later, in the last five years, we noticed that the stabilization payments were now doing their job to help the farmers simply because we have had a long term of depressed prices. Before 1984, it seemed that we would have one product down while other products were up. Stabilization in the one product would help to smooth out the waters. Now it seems that all product prices are low.

You are indicating, Mr. Speaker, that I have come to the end of my time. I appreciate the opportunity to get a few ideas on the record. I had many more. I am delighted that I and most of my colleagues to whom I have spoken are in favour of this principle, although we feel it is probably too late because the government has already acted to consider it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will be making a few short remarks on behalf of my colleagues. As the House knows, we on this side are happy to support the member for Mackenzie on his motion.

What encourages me about this particular motion that we are all supporting today is that very few times do we have a motion in the House which receives support from all sides.

The last couple of weekends I have been travelling in the rural areas of Ontario. As I have said previously, we must begin putting the business of agriculture to the very top of the agenda in the House.

Less than an hour's drive outside Toronto young farmers are moving into the city. One can see thousands and thousands of acres that are being abandoned. They are pleading for support and that we all get together. We should apply the all-party support we have for this motion to many other issues that we debate in terms of agriculture in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The first question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion agreed to.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 1.30 p.m., I do now leave the Chair until 2 p.m. this day.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 1.30 p.m.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, today is a very sad day in Canadian history. Today is the day that the Government of Canada will bring in closure on the goods and services tax, a tax that will hurt big business, small business, senior citizens and everyone in this country. Eighty per cent of Canadians deplore this tax.

For weeks the Minister of Finance has said that there are absolutely no alternatives to the goods and services tax, when repeatedly we have offered him the single tax as an alternative. It is more fair, it is revenue neutral and it will enhance productivity. We implore the Minister of Finance to do an analysis of this study.

For those Canadians who want a constructive alternative to the goods and services tax, please read the Toronto Star this Saturday where you will find full details.

NATIONAL SOIL CONSERVATION WEEK

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am sure this House will wish to commend the Government of Canada and the government of the Province of Ontario today for their demonstrated dedication to conserving what is one of our planets most precious resources, the soil.

In launching National Soil Conservation Week, the federal and Ontario Ministers of Agriculture announced a $22.2 million agreement to promote the careful management and protection of soil, to prevent its physical and chemical deterioration and to ensure its long term preservation for agriculture and the environment.

The cost of the programs under the agreement are shared equally between the two governments. Ottawa's contribution goes to providing more extensive knowledge of soil conservation, technology and practices, and to increasing the awareness by farmers of existing problems and the solutions which are available. Ontario's share goes to the existing Land Stewardship Program, providing grants to encourage rural conservation practices that will improve food production, soil resources and quality of water.

We want to congratulate the two ministers, the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture, and the Hon. David Ramsay for the high priority they have committed to conserving our precious soil for future generations.

POVERTY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, study after study, report after report, all point to the same thing; the extent and depth of poverty in Canada is a national disgrace.

Last week a Statistics Canada report noted that the poor in Canada are at risk. Put simply, poverty is a health hazard. Nearly one million children in Canada are poor. In Ontario, 200,000 people depend on food banks and half of these are children.

But what action do we see by governments, both federal and provincial, both Conservative and Liberal, to alleviate these problems? We see the Tory federal government refusing to take the lead and raise the federal minimum wage as a means to redress the most basic need of the working poor—more money.

We see the Ontario Liberal government cut the $1.4 million Emergency Shelter and Assistance Program which helps feed the poor and the homeless. Without it, more will go hungry. It is time governments, both Tory and Liberal, stopped shirking their responsibilities, buried their deceptive rhetoric and took concrete action to assist this country's poor.

THE FORESTIER D'AMOS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the president of the midget AAA provincial circuit in Quebec announced last Saturday that the board of governors, by a majority vote of 6 to 2, had withdrawn the concession held by the Outaouais region and granted it to the Forestiers d'Amos, starting with the 1990-91 season.

The Amos delegation, with President Pierre Simoneau, Guy Nolet and several other sports enthusiasts, was responsible for this success.

Since 1977, the Abitibi region has been trying to get a midget AAA provincial league club. Finally, being a remote area was no longer a barrier, thanks to the president of the AAA midget league, Denis Baillargé, to Jean-Louis Carignan and to the governors who believe in hockey and in the Abitibi—Témiscamingue region.

Mr. Speaker, I say three cheers for Pierre Simoneau, Jean-Claude Babin and the mayor of Amos, Jean-Paul Veilleux, for the excellent work they have done. Long live the Forestiers d'Amos!

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, contrary to the opposition's doom and gloom projections and their quick-fix solutions, the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have received an explicit endorsement of their interest rate policy over the last two years. In the report, Zero Inflation, the Goal of Price Stability, the C.D. Howe Institute argues that the monetary policy can achieve stable inflation. According to the institute president Thomas Kierans, the goal of price stability is "the only way to go".

In addition, all of the five contributing economists agree that a 5 per cent inflation rate is too high and it should be moved downward to the range of 0 to 2 per cent. Perhaps their most significant observation is the argument that the benefits of reducing inflation, including lower interest rates, higher productivity and the elimination of distortions and inequities caused by inflation, outweigh the cost of living with it.

Mr. Minister, Mr. Crow, keep up the fight and in the end we will all enjoy the benefits of having inflation under control.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, it is totally unacceptable that a minister of the government, in this case the Minister of the Environment, should suggest that Canada must choose between Quebec and Newfoundland. Such a statement is divisive and confrontational and should be categorically rejected.

All our provinces are valued, needed and loved, and the Prime Minister should make every effort to bring them together and to resolve the differences among them. Surely there is room for honourable compromise on such important constitutional questions.

Now is the time to build bridges, not walls, and this requires leadership from the Prime Minister and his ministers. In this respect the Prime Minister should call the provinces together as soon as possible to resolve this constitutional impasse. If the statement by the Minister of the Environment is not government policy, then the Prime Minister should repudiate it. If it is government policy, then the government should resign and call an election.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, like most issues around here, the GST is getting blown out of all proportion. A recent article in a weekly newspaper in my riding stated that the GST would cause senior citizens to lose their homes and not be able to eat. How absolutely absurd.

The GST is simply replacing one tax with another tax very similar to those used by many of the most prosperous countries in the world, countries like West Germany, England, Scotland, Japan, Belgium, Denmark, France and on and on, including Sweden which has some of the most progressive social programs in the world.

I believe that our economy is in urgent need of repair and, unfortunately, the steps required to repair it are not going to be popular. One of these steps is to make sure that our business community will be competitive and one of the ways to do that is to have a competitive tax system similar to those of our competition.

I believe that it is not our God-given right to have one of the highest standards of living in the world, and that we can only have it if we earn it. I also believe that in the years to come it will be even more difficult to earn it because of the growing international competition.

Yes, we will have change and that will be bad enough, but let us keep it in perspective and avoid the hysterics.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Official Opposition, I know my party is firmly committed to regional development. What I do not know is how committed this federal government is to regional development.

Last week the finance department of Prince Edward Island was informed of adjustments to equalization payments which would amount to a loss of $13.6 million, affecting the 1989-90 revenues. The provincial finance minister was informed of this loss on the last working day of the fiscal year, March 30, two weeks after he had tabled the provincial 1990-91 budget.

I urge this government to improve its contribution to regional development in Canada and not adjust its funding commitments at the last minute, causing increased economic difficulties to those already in need.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak today concerning the cutbacks to veterans' programs contained in the February budget. I believe that the failure of the government to preserve the dignity of veterans is the greatest possible indictment of a government that has lost touch with the people.

I feel deeply about these cuts, in part because I have the honour of representing in this House the residents of the Rideau Veterans Home, but also I think because my father spent most of his adult life receiving a war veteran's disability allowance. DVA was one of the first acronyms that I learned in my civil service household.

We are often told that the deficit is a mortgage on our children's future. But can it be said that our children are really better off when we take nickels and dimes out of the pockets of the men and women who served in the armed forces in Canada's wars?

Most of the veterans are old, many are infirm and most, as my father would be if he were alive, are reluctant to make a fuss or to be seen to be begging.

On their behalf I urge the government to leave the veterans alone and restore the cuts to programs announced in the February budget.

WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I met with the women from the St. John's Women's Centre in Newfoundland. That is the longest serving women's centre in this country and it is now in danger of closing because of this government. I have met with the women in Vancouver who have occupied the Secretary of State offices.

New Democrats are meeting with women from Quebec women's centres. We have spoken to women's centres in the Yukon, Alberta, and in Ontario. The message that we are getting from coast to coast to coast is this: women are angry at this government.

• (1410)

Compare that to this government giving $161 million to Boeing, compare it to spending $14 million to advertise the GST, compare it to an increase to CSIS of $33 million. We see increased military spending by this government. When you compare that to the $1.6 million to continue the women's centres is peanuts.

A total of 30 people now have criminal charges against them for protesting the cuts. Instead of arresting people and hiring extra security at the Secretary of State offices, instead of making the women of this country compete for a tiny little pool of project funding, reinstate the core funding. Reinstate it now.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this month marks the first anniversary of the government's Labour Force Development Strategy, the biggest effort in many years to increase federal government's help to Canadian workers.

Soon we will be able to mark another anniversary, the one of the introduction to this House of Bill C-21. Since the bill first came to the House it has been much debated, widely reported and often misunderstood. Lost in the bafflegab has been the very nature of this bill.

Bill C-21 provides $350 million per year for training UI recipients, more money for training social assistance recipients, increased allowances for those taking training, a major increase in the Community Futures Program, more money for training and adjustment of older workers and added funds for the valuable industrial adjustment service.

It is time Bill C-21 was law. It is time for Canadians to receive the benefits of Bill C-21. It is time the arrogant Liberal hacks in the Senate respected democracy and allowed this bill to become law.

CHILLIWACK MUSIC FESTIVAL

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday evening I had the pleasure of attending the final concert in Evergreen Hall. My spirits were uplifted by the beauty of the music and the beauty of what it represents. Indeed, there were individual winners but I believe that every competitor, every musician, was an equal winner. The dedication and commitment that these musicians reflect is encouraging to say the least.

A festival of this nature brings out the best that a community has to offer. It is a time of celebration. It is a time to celebrate the harmony that music brings to our personal lives, and indeed it is a time to celebrate the harmony that we bring to our community.

My congratulations to the Chilliwack Lions Clubs, to the organizers of and participants in the Chilliwack Music Festival for providing us with the opportunity to realize the harmony that exists in all of us in our community.

TRAINING PROGRAM

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the world is changing. Waves of freedom are rippling through eastern Europe and Barrie is playing a part.

For the people of the Baltic republics to pursue their dreams they must have the right economic tools. That is where Barrie comes in. Two local landscaping businesses are breaking new ground.

Timberline Nurseries and Brookdale Treelands have obtained work visas for a group of seven Estonians whom they will be training over the next six months. This is a first. It means that seven individuals will bring home valuable skills that will make them not only entrepreneurs, but also pioneers in their new exciting market, and they will leave with a better understanding of Canada.

The government is responding to the challenge of change. We are working hard to help rebuild the economies of eastern Europe and we welcome the co-operation of Canadian small businesses.

WORLD CURLING CHAMPIONSHIP

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Canadians I want to congratulate Ed Werenich on winning the world curling championship.

The people of Scarborough are especially proud of our long time fire department employee for bringing such honours to Canada. With steady shot making and the support of a talented rink, Ed defeated Scotland 3 to 1 in the final game. This is Ed's second world title and the second consecutive victory for Canada.

Congratulations to Ed Werenich and to his rink, John Kawaja, Ian Tetley and Pat Perroud. You have won a great victory for Canada.

CANADIAN PATENTS AND DEVELOPMENT LTD.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in the 1990 budget the minister announced that the crown corporation, Canadian Patents and Development Ltd. would be wound up and its functions dispersed into 14 government departments.

What the minister ignored was that other departments have said they do not want or need this additional burden. The minister received a submission that showed the cost of such a dispersal would be three times higher than the cost of letting CPDL handle the work.

How can the minister justify this costly action during times of budgetary restraint and so-called deficit reduction? CPDL has played and continues to play an invaluable role in the transfer of technology. It has generated economic benefits and direct revenue to Canada.

The dispersal of CPDL will erode the expertise it now provides and cost the Canadian taxpayers three times as much money for the same service. Obviously government fiscal mismanagement has found another target and the government has shown once again that dogma is more important than common sense.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In Quebec City on Friday, it was reported that the Minister of the Environment said: "We can now imagine a scenario where English Canada will have to choose between Quebec and Newfoundland."

These were discouraging words for Canadians who, I am sure, believe that every federal cabinet minister has an obligation to speak in a way that shows that he or she believes that each and every part of this country is valuable and needed.

Is it the policy of the government that Canada should ever have to choose between these two provinces? Was the Minister of the Environment speaking for the government when he used the words he used in Quebec City last Friday?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be helpful if the Leader of the Opposition quoted the Minister of the Environment fully. The Minister of the Environment went on to say, and I am quoting him directly: "Nobody thinks Newfoundland should leave Confederation."

That is the position of the Government of Canada and all Canadians.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has not given a direct answer to my question as to what he has to say about the words that the Minister of the Environment in fact did use.

What constructive result does the Prime Minister think can come out of the special committee that began its work today on the proposals of Premier McKenna, if he allows his senior ministers to go around the country using the kind of language I have quoted as being used by the Minister of the Environment in Quebec City last Friday?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if all the minister said was the quote that my hon. friend chose to use, then obviously my hon. friend would have questions to raise.

However, the Minister of the Environment said: "Nobody thinks Newfoundland should leave Confederation." That is a statement that should satisfy all members of the House, including the Leader of the Opposition.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a third question for the Prime Minister. According to a report today from Canadian Press, an American source involved in the preparations being made for the Canada-U.S. Summit stated that the U.S. President and the Prime Minister of Canada are to discuss the Canadian constitutional deadlock at their meeting this week.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether this information is correct. If so, wouldn't it be better to discuss this domestic problem with the provincial Premiers and Canadian legislators here in Canada instead of discussing it with a foreign head of State?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend quoted an anonymous American source with reference to a meeting that will take place with the President of the United States. Canada's internal matters will be discussed with Canadians, not with others.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, last week the Prime Minister told Canadians that he would start a campaign to sell the GST. Why spend millions on advertising if the Prime Minister is so sure that once Canadians have a better understanding of the GST, they will certainly support it? Why not set an example to Canadians by allowing Tory members, who ought to have a good understanding of the GST, a free vote on Bill C-62?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, personally, I believe government members would not be here if they were not capable of listening to Canadians. Canadians also tell us a lot about the GST. Almost every day, several thousand Canadians ask us for explanations, because of the opposition. While you were in power, you brought the finances of this country to the brink. You have always been against everything we did to improve the situation. When we talk to Canadians quietly, as I did only yesterday, when I met people who had been upset by members who may have ulterior motives, other than Canada's economic interests, in fact I talked to them for five minutes, and they told me: We did not know that; thank you very much. I am sure that if we work very hard in the months to come, we will be able to reverse the situation.

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has said that this is a money bill so it becomes a question of confidence in the government for all members to your right, Mr. Speaker, to vote in support of the bill.

I want to ask the Prime Minister specifically whether that means that members of his caucus have by consensus supported the GST, or does it mean that the government is forcing the members of the government to support the GST?

Mr. Speaker: I have some grave doubt as to whether that is a question that goes to the administration of the government. I think it is out of order. The hon. member might find a different way to put it.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the question is a very simple question. The Prime Minister himself has said that this is a money bill and that it is a question of confidence in the government.

Is the Prime Minister allowing members of the government to vote according to their conscience or is he forcing a vote? It's a simple question.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I think I must advise the hon. member that he is trespassing over the line.

The hon. member for Yukon.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Over the weekend and today thousands of Canadians have registered their anger and opposition to the goods and services tax. Today, outside on Parliament Hill we saw yet again working people expressing their opposition to the goods and services tax.

The Prime Minister says that this tax will be good for us. How can he be so right and 80 per cent of Canadians be so wrong? Isn't it time to listen to the voices and votes of Canadians, to stop abusing Parliament and his own back-benchers, and to have a free vote in the House of Commons on the goods and services tax?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the government were choosing to do the easy or popular thing, obviously we would not pursue the goods and services tax.

Mr. Boudria: You wouldn't be at 15 per cent in the polls.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend from the Liberal Party, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, says that they would not be at 50 per cent in the polls either.

Mr. Allmand: Fifteen per cent is where you are.

Mr. Mulroney: I remind him that I will let him be at 50 per cent in the polls now, and if we continue to do the right thing for Canada—not what is popular but what is right—we will be in first place on election night.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister.

I point out again that Canadians across the country from coast to coast to coast are registering their opposition to the goods and services tax because they know it is an unfair and an unjust tax. They are asking the Prime Minister and the government to listen to their voices.

I say again to the Prime Minister: Will he not listen to the voices of Canadians; will he not listen to the constituents of his members as well and have a free vote in the House of Commons?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks whether we have listened to the voices of Canadians. Yes, indeed, we have. We have listened and read very carefully the reports of five Royal commissions and task forces of the Government of Canada over some 40 years, recommending that the Parliament of Canada summon the courage to rid the nation of a pernicious and very unfair manufacturers' sales tax which kills jobs in Canada and imposes an undue penalty on Canadian producers.

We have listened and analyzed very carefully the objective data of five Royal commissions and important studies and we say in the interest of Canada get rid of this pernicious and unfair 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax and substitute a 7 per cent goods and services tax.

We have listened. We are doing that, not because it is popular, and it is clearly not popular, but we are doing so because it is right for Canada. It must be done.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

Clearly the Prime Minister is saying that there will not be a voice for democracy in this House and a free vote on the goods and services tax.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister claims the GST is advanced. I find that surprising. The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that charitable organizations, for instance, work for the public good and that they are indispensable. How can he say a tax is advanced if it taxes charitable organizations?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party referred to a tax as not being very advanced and not very sensitive to social concerns. I may remind her that two socialist governments introduced that kind of tax in their own countries, so it can't be that bad.

We have had long and thorough consultations with charitable organizations, and would urge the Leader of the New Democratic Party to read the technical papers which explain that we have set in place a series of mechanisms so that these organizations will not be penalized far from it by this tax reform.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

From what we have heard so far of the minister's aid package for the troubled Atlantic fishery, the government has decided to focus on getting people out of the fishery.

We see no specific evidence of any increased commitment to scientific evaluation and no new efforts to develop the under-utilized species and thereby remove the foreigners from our 200-mile zone.

Does the minister not think it would be wiser to be sure about the stocks and to be sure that we have fully developed all available species before we tell the people that they must give up their life's work and the traditions of all those communities dependent on the fishery?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I agree.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister is going to put the emphasis on scientific evaluation and on the under-utilized species. I hope that when we do see the supposed package we will see that; that it will be seen that there needs to be a new mesh size for all sectors in the fishery, that there will be new scientific evaluations in the waters around Nova Scotia.

But for the 2,000 people who met in Digby under very extreme conditions on Saturday, it is not a solution to hear the minister say: "Yes, we agree". We want to see what you are going to do. We do not need money. We want to see that you are going to give a commitment to keep the jobs in the fishery.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear, for the first time in several months, a Liberal member of Parliament asking the government not to throw money at the problem. I thank her for her recommendation.

What the government will do with the situation in the fishery in Atlantic Canada is to devise methods whereby we can assert the federal role in the fisheries and work in co-operation with the fishermen and the provinces to ensure that we can have a viable fishery, ensuring a good income for fishermen and plant workers.

• (1430)

We also want to continue what this government has been working on since 1984, that is, trying to diversify the economy of Atlantic Canada so that our kids in Atlantic Canada can have a bright future there. That is what we are working on.

I can advise the member that my meetings with fishermen, union representatives in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, and the leaders of these provinces led me to conclude that we are on the right course. I will continue to listen to them so that I can have their input and develop something that may not be nice for grandstanding on the issue but that will be relevant to the needs of those people.

AIR SURVEILLANCE

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services, I will directed my question to the Prime Minister.

This weekend we learned of allegations that the request for proposals for the $28.5 million east coast air surveillance contract was deliberately written to exclude all other bidders except Atlantic Airways, a company that just happens to be represented by one of the Prime Minister's close pals, John Lundrigan.

How can the Prime Minister justify this apparent sole sourcing of a $30 million contract which brings into serious question the integrity of the entire public tendering process?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, last week I happened to be in Atlantic Canada, in St. John's, with my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, where we advised people in Atlantic Canada of what the Department of Fisheries and Oceans would be doing in terms of surveillance.

The Liberal Party may well be interested in trying to find mud in all of this, but the people down there know that twice as much surveillance will take place in Atlantic Canada by those aircraft. That is what the people were very, very happy with.

That this company in St. John's, Newfoundland had the new technologies to ensure that it could become a leader, not only in Canada but world-wide, should be applauded by the hon. member instead of trying to throw mud at it.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party is not against additional surveillance, but the Liberal Party is certainly against the awarding of contracts based not on the merit of the proposal but on the political connection of the lobbyist.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I was very patient for the first question, but I am afraid we will have to move on.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Most Canadians are aware that the environmental record of this federal government is extremely poor, particularly on issues like the Oldman River dam and the Rafferty-Alameda.

Since the Minister of the Environment is fully aware that Quebec Hydro is proceeding with James Bay II, or the Great Whale Project as it is known, without federal approvals, why is the minister continuing to duck his responsibilities to put a panel in place which has a credible time frame to evaluate the impact upon the Inuit and the Cree, fish, migratory birds, caribou, whales, methane, and global warming, all those impacts that are clearly in federal jurisdiction, or will the studies be done after the dams are built as we saw in Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if the member would at least read the newspapers, he would know that as a government we are dedicated to the environment, that we have rejected—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The question was put and the other side listened to the question. The minister is rising to answer it, and I would ask all hon. members to allow the minister to speak.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): We announced last Friday that this government is rejecting the plan proposed by Quebec on the kind of joint assessment that Quebec would like to do. We said that Quebec's proposal does not respect the standards of efficiency and rigour that the federal government would like to have in this assessment.

We stated that we would present a counterproposal, probably this week, where we will state all of our requirements and try to reach a joint assessment with Quebec. If we are unable to reach an agreement on this, the federal government will proceed alone on a separate environmental assessment.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as the minister is aware, Quebec Hydro is busy selling the power from James Bay II, is busy building the roads and is busy clearing the land for the dam construction project for those five river valleys.

Could the minister be somewhat more specific in terms of time frame, in terms of information access and in terms of when exactly a federal panel will be composed? Canadians, and particularly Canadians in the province of Quebec, want to know when the panel is going to start its work. Is it going to be now when the terms of the project can be carefully defined and the information necessary to define such a project can be done before the project is well under way?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has very clear jurisdiction in the area of environmental impact assessment. This jurisdiction is not challenged—it cannot be challenged—particularly in the case of James Bay. However, we must admit that Quebec's position poses a problem, because Quebec would give the commission only about four months to do the environmental assessment. The federal government believes that the commission must be given the time it needs to do a proper assessment that will assure the people of Quebec and of Canada that the James Bay project will have no negative impact. No one is in a position to lecture us on this subject. We are pursuing a national policy so that the requirements of the federal process are respected throughout the country—in the West, in central Canada, in Quebec and in the Maritimes.

WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the Second Storey Women's Centre in Bridgewater has delayed its acceptance of project funding for two reasons: first, because those women do not want to be in competition for small amounts of money with all the other women's centres in the country and, second, because they still have a hope that this government might reinstate the $1.6 million in core funding.

Will the Secretary of State melt his and his colleagues' stony hearts, spend this small amount of money, and save all the women's centres in Canada?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I believe I was very clear when I said that core funding was discontinued for the women's centres.

I did indicate that there was increased project funding that was available. I have opened up the criteria so that certain admissible expenses, which were formerly only admitted under core funding, would now be considered under the project application.

I am waiting anxiously to make sure that any application that is received will receive expeditious treatment so that the money can flow. We are anxious to make sure that whatever funding we have available is made available to those who can carry on the very excellent work that they have had to do in the past.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons that the women at Second Storey have some hope that the government might change its mind is that they met on Friday with the minister's colleague, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. In Halifax she promised that she would lobby her cabinet colleagues, and in particular the Secretary of State, to meet with representatives of all of the women's centres affected so that they could be certain that they were not in competition with each other for every small amount of money in project funding and so that they could possibly convince the minister how crucial core funding is.

Although the Minister responsible for the Status of Women is not here, can the Secretary of State say today to the women of Canada that he will meet with the representatives from all these centres together and give them some hope?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I will be meeting with representatives of women's centres tomorrow.

Ms. Clancy: Together?

Mr. Weiner: I will be meeting again on Thursday with representatives of women's centres.

Ms. Clancy: But not together.

Mr. Weiner: As far as I am concerned, I am willing to talk. I would like to continue a dialogue. I would like to make sure that our program, which is available, is there to be effective in helping the women's centres to carry on with their work.

FOOD BANKS

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

On February 14, the Minister of National Health and Welfare was asked to address the current economic crisis in which 1.4 million Canadians, including over one-half a million children, are forced to rely on food banks.

Today, as the Daily Bread Food Bank kicks off its Easter food drive, this government is still doing nothing to help the poor, the homeless, and the hungry.

What is this government doing to end the reliance on food banks? Why will it not take full responsibility for helping to feed the victims of its own economic mismanagement?

• (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, this is a very specific question with a very global approach. We are aware that all such prevailing situations are related to social, sociological, economic and political conditions. Our programs are designed to help all classes in society, of course including children, families and women. We are concerned about such issues as health, welfare and our participation as a government. The answer lies in the interest we show in all these programs.

[English]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the only growth that this government has had is in the line ups at the food banks. The dependence on food banks has doubled in 1988.

Studies show that between the federal CAP cut-backs, the cruel changes to the UI eligibility formula, and the GST thousands of more Canadians will be forced into poverty. How can the minister justify her answer when she knows that this government's policies will directly increase the number of poor Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to my hon. friend who raises a very sensitive and important matter. Since the general question involves poverty, she will be the first to applaud the fact that since the swearing in of this government almost 800,000 Canadians have been removed from the poverty rolls in Canada.

In fact, since 1984 the number of children living below the poverty level has fallen by 259,000, compared to an increase of 283,000 between 1980 and 1984 when her party was in office.

Also, it is probably significant for my hon. friend to note that on Friday morning when Statistics Canada reported unemployment figures, the unemployment rate in Canada has now dropped to the lowest since August 1981. Since this government was sworn in, 1,587,000 more Canadians are working today than when we took over from the Liberals.

TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will be aware at this point in time that there is overwhelming opposition to the GST throughout Canada due to the fact that Canadians perceive that the system is inherently unfair. They point to the fact that there were 93,000 profitable corporations that did not pay any tax in 1987.

Does the Prime Minister not recognize the blatant unfairness of this fact, that these corporations pay no corporate tax at all. Will he at least commit himself and his government to bringing in a minimum corporate tax?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and many colleagues in his party keep repeating this information which is wrong. There is no such thing as 93,000 profit making corporations that do not pay tax and we on this side of the House have changed that.

Due to measures taken during the crisis, a lot of loopholes were built into our fiscal system. We have removed them one by one, and now all large corporations pay taxes.

What he refers to are very often small farms and small businesses that have not been profitable for five years and frequently earn less than $25,000. Would the hon. gentleman want us to tax them and put them out of business? Frequently they are not taxed because they are in remote areas where there is a high level of unemployment. This is a good measure and, like the GST, it is a fair tax.

Yet again there is opposition because the member, instead of accepting his responsibility to help Canadians extricate themselves from a difficult financial situation, does everything he can to mislead the population.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, again to the Prime Minister. The minister who has just answered has suggested that we are not giving the figures correctly.

Some Hon. Members: Exactly!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Rodriguez: The figures that I have provided to the House are the figures from Statistics Canada as we requested them. It was a study that Statistics Canada did for the New Democratic Party in 1987.

The minister said that was before tax reform. In 1988, these were some of the small corporations: Xerox Canada, $74 million, no tax at all; Bramalea Corporation, $33 million, no tax at all; Brascan Corporation, there is a small one, $263 million and not a penny of tax. That is 1988, after tax reform.

In view of the fact that tax reform in 1988 has just created another tax holiday for all of these large corporations, not small corporations, not family businesses, large wealthy corporations, is the minister prepared now to make them pay their fair share—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): The great trouble, Mr. Speaker, with the hon. gentleman is that he loves listening to himself. He should listen to me and to us as well.

Perhaps he was away, but I would like to welcome him to the 1990s. He is giving figures from 1987. He does not seem to be aware that we have a tax on assets. Any corporation, not with profits, but with assets of $10 million pays tax. We are collecting billions of dollars from them, but he fails to mention that. He claims again the old repetitions. Canadians understand that these reforms are there to help the economy of Canada and to create jobs. This is what we have been doing and will continue to do.

REFUGEE STATUS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It is hardly necessary for me to describe the panic and anxiety felt by many Canadians of Lebanese origin. Is the minister aware of charges made against the Immigration and Refugee Board that it is insensitive and indifferent with respect to people applying for refugee status here in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the refugee board operates at arm's length from the government. Whereas we established the board, this is a judicial process set up under an arm's length arrangement with that board.

My understanding is that the board is functioning quite well. If there are problems, and if he has a particular allegation to bring to me, I would be happy to ensure that it gets looked into.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that I will be filing complaints with her office in a few days.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Do you not feel that time has come for the government to intervene in the case of refugees of Lebanese origin who are experiencing great hardships? They need understanding and compassion in such trying times.

An Hon. Member: Good question!

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, our government is highly sensitive to the situation of Lebanese people. Because of the on-going war, refugees go to Cyprus or Damascus and apply to come to Canada—

• (1450)

[English]

We have set extra people in Cyprus in order to be able to deal sympathetically and effectively with the Lebanese. We are working very hard on their behalf, and we will continue to do so.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, 80 per cent of Canadians are saying no to the government. The people are mad, angry and disappointed with the goods and services tax. Never in the history of Canada have so many people said no so many times to a government bill.

There are only two reasonable choices left for this government: either scrap the tax, or call an election. Which one will the government choose?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would call an election, but I cannot out of fairness. They do not have a leader.

Mr. Gauthier: We beat you the last time, remember?

Mr. Marchi: That's what Joe said in 1979.

Mr. Mulroney: I just want to draw to the hon. member's attention comments made by Mr. Chrétien with regard to the manufacturers' sales tax and the commodity tax system. He stated: "It worries me that serious structural problems have been identified in the manufacturers' sales tax. To name just a few, in some cases its burden falls less heavily upon imported goods than upon domestic goods. It falls unevenly upon competing goods which are marketed at different trade levels. It does not currently permit a meaningful appeals system. These problem areas in the law cannot be tolerated indefinitely."

Then Mr. Chrétien said: "Before long, I will have to assess the merits of all opinions and make a decision on the best course to follow." That was on November 22, 1977.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are ready for an election when the government is ready for it.

We always acknowledged a need for reform in the tax system, but we never called on someone to hit the people on the head with a two by four. That is exactly what this particular tax does.

[Translation]

How can the government continue to ignore the workers, small businesses, seniors and low- and middle-income Canadians who have done all they could to get the government to listen to them? When will the government finally listen to Canadians and withdraw this unfair tax?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, given the demand that my friend makes, one would think that there would be a consistent approach from his political party.

Yet on March 7 in The Globe and Mail Mr. Martin is quoted as saying:

> —that he would scrap the 7 per cent tax if he becomes Prime Minister and "if it is humanly possible," but he refused to rule out some sort of consumption tax as an alternative.
> On Monday, Douglas Young, the Liberals' finance critic, also said the party would scrap the GST if it came into power, but he was unclear on an alternative.

Thirteen years later, after making the first speech, Mr. Chrétien said it would be irresponsible for the Liberals to decide now on scrapping the GST. "We cannot reasonably make a commitment that there will not be a consumption tax".

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

A year and a half after the slaughter of 3,000 pro-democracy demonstrators in Burma, the military government has forcibly relocated hundreds of thousands of its citizens and imprisoned, tortured and even murdered many opposition leaders in preparation for phoney elections.

Petro-Canada, which has signed a $5 million contract with that government, says that none of this is of its concern. Is this the future of a privatized Petro-Canada? Will it prop up oppressive regimes, even those condemned by our government? Or will the government take action to end this arrangement, and do it now?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if that were a practice of a privatized Petro-Canada, that is something that we will have to wait to see. If the accusation the hon. member makes applies to Petro-Canada, it applies to it in its capacity as an agency of the Crown. Therefore, the hon. member cannot be making that argument against the process of privatization.

As a matter of fact, and as the hon. member knows, the contract of which Petro-Canada International is a part is a strictly commercial operation in which it is operating with other companies in the private sector.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, we have heard the answer we were afraid to get, that profit comes before human rights. That is not a principle we applied in South Africa.

I ask the government to take action to make sure that our Crown corporation is not propping up a regime that kills its own citizens and would destroy free elections.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member a categoric assurance that the Government of Canada and Crown corporations of the Government of Canada are not doing the things to which he has referred in his question.

There is a commercial operation involving Canadian companies, including Petro-Canada, with regard to explorations off-shore of the country now called Myanmar. To draw the conclusion that the hon. member draws is inaccurate and I think that even he would admit that he has overstated his case substantially in the House.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as you know, tomorrow it will be one month since the Federal Court handed down its decision on the Oldman dam. I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him why he and his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, are ignoring such court order, why they are not conducting an environmental assessment, and when will he and his colleague launch this environmental assessment on the Oldman dam?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend will realize, the decision by the Federal Court of Appeal has some pretty far-reaching implications. We are studying the decision and examining various courses of action which will take into account the safety of the people in the area, the safety of the dam and of the structure. As soon as we have finalized our decision, we will make it public.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister realize that every day that goes by, the credibility of his government and of the Minister of the Environment is eroded by this kind of inaction?

Point of Order

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that there would be even less credibility if we acted hastily and did not take all factors into account.

POINT OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask your indulgence in explaining to the House certain decisions that you have taken during Question Period.

The members of this side of the House, the Official Opposition, have been trying for some time to put questions of relevance and urgency to the government. The difficulty we have, of course, is that the questions that were put today by the members for Gloucester and Dartmouth were similar in format to questions that were put last week to the minister answering for the government at that time, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I want to refer to Hansard of April 5, at page 10220. When asked if the government would allow a free vote, because that was the essence of the question, the Secretary of State for External Affairs answered:

> Mr. Speaker, according to what the Prime Minister said and in keeping with parliamentary tradition, budgetary or economic questions that are of prime importance, or questions on motions presented by the opposition on allotted days are always questions of confidence.

A question was put to the Prime Minister today asking whether or not he would allow a free vote on this question. In our view the question was quite in order. It was a question that was repeated from last week's Question Period. I am asking you, Mr. Speaker, to explain why you ruled it out of order today. That is the first point.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The Speaker will always hear a point of order on a Speaker's ruling. First of all, I would like to review the "blues" and I am prepared to discuss it further.

The Speaker sometimes has to make an instantaneous call. I would like to look carefully at what was said. I can say that I felt the question was going beyond the simple question: "Will there be a free vote or not". I felt it was getting into the relationship between the Prime Minister and members of his own caucus.

If I am in error, then I will not be the first Speaker that has been in error. The hon. member has another point.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question about surveillance, the member for Dartmouth was responding to an accusation made by the minister that, indeed, Liberals were against surveillance, which is a lie in itself, because we are not against surveillance. We are for surveillance. We want it improved.

The question asked by the member was: "Why is the government not willing to award the contract on merit, rather than to friends they know?"

The question was quite in order as far as I am concerned. I do not know why you ruled that out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can settle it right now. One could say that that is a marginal line, but it is getting awfully close to accusing improper dealing. There are different ways to put the same question. But the question clearly carries with it the innuendo that there is something improper going on.

Now if I have moved too quickly, I am indebted to the hon. member for bringing it to my attention.

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Not if it is going to be a challenge to the Chair.

Mr. Milliken: I would not challenge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: You might not, but that does not mean that the Chair is perfect.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 18 provides:

> No Member shall speak disrespectfully of the Sovereign, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the Governor General or the person administering the Government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any Member thereof.

Mr. Speaker, during statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31, the hon. member for South Shore referred to certain members of the other place in terms that I believe were disrespectful.

I would ask that Your Honour review the "blues". He referred to them as, among other things, Liberal hacks. All hon. members know that the members of the other place, particularly those in the majority in the other place, are in fact very distinguished Canadians who have served their country for many years.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milliken: There was another adjective but I would not want to repeat that because it was even more disrespectful. I suggest that the three words together constitute disrespect for the other place contrary to Standing Order 18.

I hope Your Honour would review the words. If they are, in fact, improper words, I would ask Mr. Speaker to ask the hon. member to withdraw them. I am sorry he is not here. He left right after the statement so I have been unable to give notice of the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has undoubtedly had to take up other duties elsewhere. I will look at the "blues" to see whether the hon. member had crossed the magic line or not. I did not take it that the hon. member was being particularly respectful.

Mr. Milliken: No, he certainly was not.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek some guidance. At the beginning of my supplementary question this afternoon, basically I was responding to an allegation from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

More importantly, I was not making an allegation. I was merely asking a question based on allegations that are in the public domain by way of a Canadian Press story that appeared in a number of newspapers over the weekend. I seek the guidance of the Speaker, and ask you to review the "blues" and at least privately, if not publicly, indicate whether or not I was in contravention of the rules.

Mr. Speaker: I thought I indicated to the hon. member's House leader that I will certainly do that. I do caution hon. members, though, that merely the repetition of something that might be in the newspaper does not necessarily remove it from the essence of an allegation that might have to be taken in another place.

I know the hon. member will bear with the Speaker. Sometimes it is a very fine call. I shall look at the matter and would be very pleased to discuss it with the hon. member. I certainly did not mean to improperly cut the hon. member off. The issue is quite legitimate. I was concerned about the way it was put.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table in both official languages a number of Order in Council appointments which have been made by the government. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1) these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

While I am on my feet, I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 3, consideration of Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and on motions Nos. 1 to 11, 31 to 36, 39 to 55, 57 to 85 and 90 of Mr. Young (Gloucester) (p. 10156-8).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Skeena had the floor.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to carry on the debate in opposing the goods and services tax. There are a few things I would like to put on the record for the interest of the viewing public and those on the government side who still have an IQ.

I look at one of the charts that is available, and it is worth noting that a working poor family with an income of $20,000 would pay 10 times more in taxes—$695 instead of $70—if the money is raised through the goods and services tax instead of through income tax whereas a wealthy family with an income of $100,000 will pay 40 per cent less through the goods and services tax than it would pay through income taxes.

I have just a couple of more points before going on to speak at greater length about why the government is 15 per cent and will continue to go down, and why the Liberals—even though they are fluctuating upward in popularity—will soon come plummeting down as well, as soon as they pick Mr. Chrétien as leader.

Mr. Duhamel: You hope.

Mr. Fulton: I certainly hope it is Mr. Chrétien who drags the Liberals down again.

• (1550)

Let us have a look at what Dr. Maslove, an economics professor here in Ottawa, had to say regarding the government's so-called tax reform since it took office. The effect of lower rates and other actions during the phase one of tax reform has been examined by Dr. Maslove of Carleton University. Using a Statistics Canada model to assess the effects of changes in the personal income tax system since 1984, Dr. Maslove has determined that the only real beneficiaries of tax reform are those whose annual incomes are under $10,000 or over $114,490. The federal government is losing over $30 billion annually as a result of tax shelters, special grants and incentives to business. It has been observed in this regard that, if the corporate sector's tax share had matched that of individual taxpayers in 1988, Canada would have enjoyed an $18.5 billion surplus instead of a $30 billion deficit.

What we see is a continuation of what the Liberals did when they were in office, only in a much more blatant form under the Conservatives. The Liberals always liked to funnel all of the special tax shelters and grants to certain corporations and to certain very wealthy people, but the Tories have really taken it to heart and are now directing the majority of tax breaks to the extremely wealthy and to those corporations which funnel lots of cash back to the government at election time.

Let us take a look at one of the big concerns that many Canadians have about a GST, that it is simply a wheel waiting to be spun by profligate Tories and Liberals. Denmark brought in a GST in 1967 at 10 per cent and, by 1990, it was up to 22 per cent. It has more than doubled. Ireland brought in a GST in 1972 at 16 per cent and now it is 25 per cent. Look at Great Britain, the idol of all Conservatives—Madam Thatcher and the poll tax. It brought it in at 10 per cent and now it is 15 per cent, a 50 per cent jump. Italy, in the same year, 1973, brought a tax in at 12 per cent and now it is 18 per cent. Again, that is a 50 per cent jump. The concern that Canadians have is a very real and justified one. That is, if the government plans to bring in a goods and services tax at 7 per cent, and then just as Michael Wilson did with the manufacturers' sales tax, it will take it from 9 per cent to 10 per cent and all the way up to 13.5 per cent.

As Dr. Maslove and other economists have found, the fact of the matter is that this punishes working Canadians the most. The wealthy get a 40 per cent tax break, and those earning less than $20,000 will be probably about the same, if not marginally worse off. The somewhat lukewarm battle put up by the Liberals over this legislation demonstrates what we heard from the Minister of Finance here in Ontario,that the Liberals are just waiting for their opportunity to collect the tax so they can take their cut. We know exactly where the Liberals are coming from. We have seen how few the number of speakers are that they put up, and heard how little they have had to say when they actually rose to their feet. We know in terms of the tax system that is in place, it is the same under the Liberal—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance on debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today in this debate on the goods and services tax. This debate has attracted much attention in the country, many comments pro and con and, above all, a lot of misinformation. What I want to emphasize today is the misinformation about the goods and services tax given to Canadians by various groups including, unfortunately, some members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to speak although I am not dressed as the Standing Orders require, which the Leader of the Opposition pointed out last week, but I know he understands. With my arm in a cast, I have no choice.

Mr. Gauthier: The GST hurts.

Mr. Duhamel: Did a constituent do that to you?

Mr. Gauthier: No, it's the GST.

Mr. Vincent: You will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to quote several paragraphs from an article by Claude Piché in La Presse of Thursday, March 29, 1990, entitled: "The GST at a glance"

The first paragraph mentions how Canadians and the Minister of Finance are separated by a wall of misunderstanding.

I hope that most Canadians now know that we have a 13.5 per cent federal sales tax at the manufacturer's level.

Mr. Gauthier: You raised it four times.

Mr. Vincent: It is a 13.5 per cent tax collected at the manufacturing level. He gave the following example: "A furniture manufacturer sells a chair to a wholesaler for $100. The wholesaler pays $113.50, tax included. Assuming the wholesaler has a profit margin of 10 per cent, he sells the chair to the furniture store for $124.85. No tax is collected on this transaction. If the retailer takes a 10 per cent profit, he sells you the chair for $137.35. The federal tax does not appear on your bill, but you are paying it just the same because it is included in the selling price. That is the present system.

This tax raises $18 billion annually for Ottawa. Mr. Wilson's proposal consists in abolishing this tax and replacing it with the GST". This means getting rid of the present 13.5 per cent tax and replacing it with a tax on goods and services that will be 7 per cent across the board. In the end, the consumer will pay only 7 per cent on what he purchases and not the present 13.5 per cent manufacturer's tax.

He repeated the same example with the new tax, and I quote: "The new 7 per cent tax will apply at all stages of production and distribution. Consider our example. The manufacturer sells the chair to the wholesaler for $100. The wholesaler pays $7 in tax. He does not add the $7 to his cost, since Ottawa will refund the tax when he sells the chair. The wholesaler adds his 10 per cent profit, sells the chair to the furniture dealer for $110 and claims his $7 refund from Ottawa. The dealer will pay $7.70 in GST. After adding his profit margin, he sells you the chair for $121 and claims a refund of $7.70 from the government. You, the consumer will pay 7 per cent tax, which works out to $8.47, on the selling price. You cannot claim a refund. The chair costs you $129.47, and that is the system being proposed by Mr. Wilson".

Mr. Speaker, according to this example, with today's tax of 13.5 per cent the chair costs $137.35, but under the system that will be in effect as of January 1, 1991, the chair will cost $129.47, which means that thanks to the tax change, it will be cheaper in 1991 than it is today.

And on he goes, Mr. Speaker, referring to the GST:

"The GST is regressive in the sense that it is harder on low income people. Both the man on social welfare and the millionnaire will pay the $7 tax on a $100 chair. Had Mr. Wilson not done anything to correct that the TPS would be unfair and scandalous.

But the minister did provide for compensation to offset the GST impact on poor households through tax credits geared to income, family status and number of children. These credits will be paid by cheques on a quarterly basis."

Then he gives examples. This is important, Mr. Speaker, because it is the basic argument in the GST issue. It says here, and I agree: It would be a regressive tax if there were no tax credits. But, as it happens, there are major tax credits. He gives one example: "A retired widow with a $12,000 income will get a $290 tax credit. She would have to spend at least $4,000 on goods and services (other than rent and food)—", and drugs. She would have to spend $4,000 a year to cancel the value of her tax credit, or not to end up a loser "—to cancel the value of that credit. That is highly unlikely."

• (1600)

Again, Mr. Speaker, I quote the article. "A single-parent family made up of a child and a young woman earning a net income of $16,000 will get a $480 credit, or almost $10 a week. To annul the credit the household would have to spend something like $140 a week on taxable goods and services." Again, on goods and services, other than rent, food and drugs. A single parent family earning $16,000 a year would therefore have to spend a $140 a week, on something other than non-taxable basic items to, cancel the value of the credit received.

The article continues: "Finally, a couple with two children with a combined net income of $25,000 will receive a credit of $580.

These examples do not take into account the current sales tax which all these consumers are unknowingly already paying and which will disappear following the reform. Clearly, these households will certainly "make money" out of the GST." Mr. Speaker, it is written right here: Clearly, these households will certainly make money out of the GST.

I continue: "As a matter of fact, if your family income is less than $30,000, you are among the winners. If it is more, you are among the loosers, because you will not be entitled to the tax credit, although you will have to pay the GST just the same."

Because I now realize that my time is coming to an end, Mr. Speaker, I wish to conclude by saying that the GST is good for the Canadian economy and good for Canadian exporters and importers. It is also good for Canadians whose income is less than $30,000 and who, as I said, will come out winners with this new tax to replace the 66 year old 13.5 per cent federal sales tax.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, let's not kid ourselves about what is happening here. The GST is a tax on consumption. It means that every time you buy anything, you, the individual Canadian consumer, are going to pay more.

[Translation]

Because it is regressive, it will hurt most low and middle income families who can the least afford to pay it. It is a tax which goes against all the promises which this Government has made in terms of tax fairness and which forces all low and midde income Canadians to shoulder the most unfair tax burden in our history.

[English]

It is nothing more than the Canadian version of Margaret Thatcher's new poll tax. Why are they rioting in Britain? Why are they saying: "Axe the poll tax"? It is because it is an unfair tax.

I am not suggesting violence as we have seen in the United Kingdom, but Canadians have a right to be outraged. Canadians are upset about the GST for the same reasons Britons are upset about the poll tax—it is an unfair tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, over 80 per cent of Canadians are against this tax. Canadians, by the hundreds of thousands, have signed petitions, sent letters and protested against this tax, just as they did again today on the Hill.

[English]

Canadians realize it is going to be a massive change, not only in the way we are taxed but on what we pay federal taxes.

As my colleague from Ottawa South has pointed out, corporations as such will no longer pay a federal sales tax, but people will. It is the biggest corporate tax grab in history, and nobody but the Minister of Finance thinks companies will pass all their savings from this on to consumers before applying the new goods and services tax.

The GST is a tax on just about everything—all goods, all services, with very limited exceptions. Let us look at a typical day under the new tax regime.

Picture this. You wake up, shut off your new alarm clock, a clock for which you paid 7 per cent more. You brush your teeth with toothpaste and a brush for which you paid 7 per cent more. You use soap, 7 per cent more; towel, 7 per cent more; dress children for school, 7 per cent more for shirts, shoes, socks, dresses; hand them their school books, 7 per cent more for the books; get into the car, 7 per cent more for the car; flat tire on the way to work, 7 per cent more for repairs; park the car, 7 per cent more for parking; at work, have a coffee break, 7 per cent more; have lunch, pick up a sandwich, 7 per cent more, bowl of soup, 7 per cent more, cup of tea, 7 per cent more, dessert, 7 per cent more; drive home, stop for gas, 7 per cent more; stop at the hardware store for a can of paint for the children's room, 7 per cent more; a paint brush, 7 per cent more; stop for a haircut, 7 per cent more; pick up a hockey stick, a baseball bat or a doll for one of the kids, 7 per cent more; pick up a pizza or other take-out food for a quick dinner for you and your family, 7 per cent more; after dinner, sit down to write your cheques for utility bills, the gas bill, 7 per cent more, the electricity bill, 7 per cent more, send the cheque to the lawyer who did the legal work for the purchase of your new house, 7 per cent more for the fees, and that is in addition to the 7 per cent more you paid for the house and you are still waiting for the rebate cheque from the government for half of it. Call a plumber to fix the leak in the bathroom sink, 7 per cent more; sit in your new chair that cost you 7 per cent more; walk across your new rug, 7 per cent more; read a book, 7 per cent more; have a midnight snack, 7 per cent more.

And if all of this is too much for a taxpayer who drops dead, that will cost the taxpayer 7 per cent more, as well, because this tax even applies to funerals—even they are 7 per cent more.

The only way Canadians can avoid paying the tax is to stop eating anything which is not defined as basic groceries by the bureaucrats at the Department of Finance, and that is not very much; do not buy any more clothes or shoes; unplug the phone; unplug the TV; unplug the fridge; turn off all the lights; shut off the electricity; turn off the furnace; sit in the basement; and, above all, do not die.

Every time a Canadian pays this goods and services tax he or she is going to be thinking about how this tax came to be and who imposed it.

[Translation]

Canadians will remember the dishonest way the government tried to bring in this tax. They will remember that the Minister of Finance himself said that this new tax would not cost more than the old one. Before the election, he said that it would be revenue-neutral. After the election, it became a money-maker for the treasury.

[English]

Just last Friday in the House the Minister of State for Finance admitted that the new tax had always been intended to be an integral part of deficit reduction. Despite that fact, the Minister of Finance has been telling everybody it was and is revenue neutral. It cannot be both. It just cannot be. No wonder Canadians do not believe anything the government says about the goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before the election, the minister said that the tax would be visible. After the election, he admitted that he could not force retailers to show it on their bills.

[English]

Before the election the minister said such a tax would be unworkable without provincial involvement. But so far not a single province agrees with this tax. So far not a single province has joined him in opposing it.

Did that stop the minister? It did not even slow him down. Now he is bringing in the tax, without provincial co-operation, even though he said that without it the tax was "unworkable".

Before the election he said the tax would be simple. After the election he still says that, but nobody outside his office believes him because nobody outside his office can figure out why a tax that is supposedly simple needs multimillion-dollar ad campaigns to explain it and why it needs an army of 4,000 new tax police to collect it. It is no wonder the head of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business calls it a compliance nightmare.

• (1610)

Before the election the minister said the tax would not be inflationary. After the election he said it will cause an increase of only 1.25 per cent in the cost of living. But most observers say it will be much higher.

Nobody but the minister believes this new tax will not cause a huge increase in the rate of inflation, as well as higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

The government can still withdraw this tax, and it should do that. But, Mr. Speaker, I say to the government if you do not, Canadians are not only going to remember the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance who imposed it, they are also going to remember that they could not have done it without the support of the back-bench Conservative MPs.

Every time they pay this tax those Canadians with Conservative MPs are going to ask themselves: "Did my Conservative MP stand up and say "no" to the GST? Did my Conservative MP stand up for me?"

I want to tell the Conservative members sitting behind the ministers that now is your chance to join with more than 80 per cent of Canadians, and at least two of your colleagues, and say "no" to this unfair tax. Because of the size of the Conservative majority you, the Conservative MPs, are the only ones now who can make sure that this tax is stopped here in this House. You are the only ones who can save your constituents from this massive and unfair new tax burden.

Mr. Speaker, I will tell the Conservative MPs something right now. If you do not stand up and save your constituents, your constituents are not going to stand up and save you.

The recent finance committee hearings on this bill did not produce one single new reason why this tax should be imposed. In fact we heard nothing but reasons why the tax should not be imposed.

It is still the same unfair tax proposal. For most Canadians, the GST is still the gouge and screw tax, the grief and suffering tax. For most Canadians GST still stands for "God save the taxpayer". If it passes, they will say: "God help the taxpayer". The Conservatives will need all the help they can get. Indeed, they will not get very much.

I say to all the Conservative back-benchers, the fate of this tax in this House is in your hands. I urge you, Canadians urge you, to join with us and defeat this tax. Listen to what Canadians are saying. Listen to what your constituents are saying. The message is coming in loud and clear from one end of this country to the other.

Conservative MPs, use your vote today and tomorrow to defeat this tax. Strike a blow for fair taxation and say "no" to the GST. Liberals have already said and are continuing to say "no" to the GST.

We ask the Conservative back-benchers to join with us to say "no" to the GST and "yes" to fair taxation for all Canadians.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the Leader of the Opposition I can understand why there is so much indecision on their part in relation to the GST.

Mr. Keyes: Indecision?

Mr. Thompson: If you look at exactly what he said there is not an ounce of truth in any of his statements made today in this House.

An Hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, he went over a list of goods that he claims are going to be taxed under our new GST which is coming in. We are going to support it. What he fails to point out obviously is that there is a hidden 13.5 per cent federal sales tax on each and every one of those goods that he mentioned in his speech. The hon. member has been around this House a lot longer than you, Mr. Speaker, and a lot longer than I. He more than anyone else should know better than to say that to the Canadian people.

Throughout this debate on the GST the opposition has not scored any points with the people back home. The people back home have a fair sense of what is going on, and a sense of fair play. When someone like that can get up in the House of Commons and rattle on in that fashion without coming clean on the goods and services tax, it tells you something about that party and what its members want to do to this country.

That party, if you remember 1979, is the same party that led us down the garden path in relation to the price of gasoline. We had a government in 1979 and a finance minister, Mr. Crosbie, that were prepared to come to grips with certain realities in this country. One of them was simply that if we as Canadians want services and programs from government, we must be willing to pay for them.

In 1979, Mr. Crosbie rose in this House and presented his budget, a budget that would have raised gas 18 cents a gallon, bringing the price up to $1.17 a gallon. That was a budget that the then finance minister claimed to be a budget of short-term pain for long-term gain, but members of the opposition of this House chose to defeat it. In defeating it they defeated the best opportunity that this country has had since Confederation to come to grips with reality.

Now opposition members want to do the same thing with the goods and services tax. But there is one element that these characters are missing this time. They are missing the number of votes required to defeat it, thank goodness.

When we took office in 1984, after having lived through those Trudeau years from 1979 to 1984, we inherited a $200 billion debt. I challenge anyone on the opposition side of this House to dispute that figure. It is there; it is recorded. You can look at it yourselves. It is undeniable.

We have been in power almost six years. On that $200 billion debt, with an 11 per cent interest rate, on average, we have paid interest charges of $132 billion on the debt that the Liberals gave us.

When they left office they bragged. Some of the former cabinet ministers in that Trudeau government bragged that when Brian Mulroney took office there was no way, no way possible that that guy or his party could get re-elected. They said: "We left the cupboard bare. There is no money. There is no room for you people to manoeuvre".

But we have manoeuvred. We have done the things that are right for this country, and we are going to continue to do the things that are right for this country.

I have something to tell the Leader of the Opposition. The members on our side of the House are going to support this tax bill, and we are going to support it for a very good reason. I do not want to mortgage my children or my grandchildren to pay off the debt that we have incurred in this country. We can come to grips with it today or we can come to grips with it tomorrow. But I prefer to face reality square in the face because that is what the people back home put me here for.

In 1986, our government tabled a White Paper on tax reform in this House of Commons. That White Paper, laid before the Canadian people was the goods and services tax, among other things.

In the 1988 election every member of this House, every candidate that ran in that election knew what was coming. The goods and services tax was clearly on the table. It was an issue and part of our platform in 1988.

• (1620)

I ran on that issue, as I did on other issues, and so did the member for Calgary Northeast, as well as the member for Edmonton Southeast, the Kindy and Kilgour act. Those characters knew the goods and services tax were coming. They knew it very clearly.

Do you know what that same member for Edmonton Southeast did in 1986 and 1987, Mr. Speaker? He sneaked out of the Conservative caucus because we were not high in the polls. Do you know what he is doing now, Mr. Speaker? He is doing the same thing. He came crawling back in 1988 when Brian Mulroney brought this party back up in the polls. He made sure he was on board—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would ask the hon. member to refer to other hon. members by their titles or by their ridings.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I am more than willing to live by that ruling.

The point I am making is clearly this. Those same members ran for this party in 1988, knowing that this legislation was coming. They could live with the results of that 1988 election, but they cannot live with reality.

I am going to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this party is going to come back in the polls in 1992 and 1993. I will tell you that when we do, those two characters are going to be on the outside looking in because I don't want them on my side.

I can go back home in my riding and be a popular guy if I want to be against the goods and services tax, but the people voted me here to stand up for what I believe in. I believe that this goods and services tax is good for our country.

The present tax is a silent killer of jobs. It discriminates against home grown products, home manufactured products. I could draw many examples right in my riding where we are discriminated against because of the present federal sales tax.

Since 1935, we have had five Royal commissions report in this country. We designated five Royal commissions to investigate taxation. Each and every one of those suggested that the federal sales tax must go, that it is not a fair tax and it has to be replaced.

Mr. Keyes: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: I am glad to hear that because the Liberals do agree with us. We have come up with an alternative, one that every single country in the world has moved to. We are the last country in the world to bite the bullet on the FST. The goods and services tax is good for this country. We are going to bring it in. If we have two members here that do not want to support us, it is their fault and they will suffer the consequences.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Davenport.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte does not seem to realize why his party is so low in the polls. He would have perhaps done himself and his party a favour if he had analyzed a little why the Progressive Conservative Party is so low in the polls these days.

The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte does not seem to be aware of an important fact, namely, that his party since it took power in November, 1984, has increased the federal sales tax by 50 per cent. It was 9 per cent then. It is now at 13.5 per cent.

Mr. Thompson: You left the cupboard bare in 1984. You gave us no choice.

Mr. Caccia: Finally, the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte does not seem to realize—

Mr. Thompson: I better leave the Chamber, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Davenport has the floor.

Mr. Caccia: Finally, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte does not realize how often his speech today will be quoted by his Liberal opponent in the next election.

The fact of the matter is that Canadians are very upset. They oppose the thought of another tax. They have seen, since 1984, an increase in the federal sales tax. They have seen this tax go up from 9 per cent to 10 per cent, and then from 11 per cent to 12 per cent, and from 13 per cent to 13.5 per cent—an increase of 50 per cent.

Canadians know that this type of tax is unfair. They know that it applies the same whether you are rich or poor. In other words, it is a regressive kind of tax.

This is, of course, an ideological point that escapes the mind of the average Conservative politician who insists on using a sales tax as an instrument for raising funds, no matter how it applies.

Canadians, I would submit, want fairness in the tax system. They would like now, at last, to see a tax system that also introduces a degree of discipline in our behaviour in the environment. The sales tax as proposed by this government ignores the environment completely. Actually, it does a disservice to the environment.

On the one hand, it reduces the tax on cars, as has been announced, obviously by virtue of the nature of the general sales tax. But, on the other hand—and now I am quoting two extremes—it should not tax any equipment, any service or any type of initiative that is energy efficient, that is efficient in the use of water and of our natural resources. It applies the same sledge-hammer on everything, without any consideration for the environment to which this government has committed itself on a variety of occasions and, extensively so, by way of the notion of sustainable development.

The government may want to know, rather than being criticized, what the alternatives are that it should have considered, and which it can still consider.

There is a substantial body of work that has been carried out in developing some kind of a carbon tax, a taxation of fuels, a taxation that would be dependent on the amount of carbon dioxide that is released when consumed. It has been developed quite extensively by an organization whose name is the Quebec Union for Conservation of Nature in Charlesbourg.

This tax would be calculated on the basis of $130 per tonne of oil equivalent. Such a tax could generate up to $17.2 billion in revenue. It would even reduce the number of officials in charge of collecting it. This tax would encourage, as a result, fuel efficiency in all industrial applications. It would improve our economic competitiveness. It would lead to higher productivity and a better ability on our side to be effective on world markets.

If that taxation measure is not adequate or interesting enough, the Minister of Finance—and I am glad to see his junior colleague in the House today—could have a good conversation with Professor Rees at the University of British Columbia. Here we see the development of an entropy taxation. Professor Rees argues that instead of subsidies to hydrocarbons, Canada should place a tax on fossil fuels on the economically sound ground that atmospheric capacity to absorb carbon dioxide is a scarce resource for which the consumer should pay.

Of course, this type of tax should vary for different fossil fuels, depending on the carbon content per unit of energy. It would be twice as much for coal as for natural gas. Such a tax would then have the effect of lowering the consumption of hydrocarbons, encourage conservation, reduce carbon dioxide pollution and increase considerably our over all energy efficiency.

• (1630)

If the minister is not satisfied with home grown suggestions for an eco-tax reform, we invite him to look across the Atlantic to Europe, with which he is very familiar as we all know, at the University of Cologne in the Federal Republic of Germany. Policies have been developed there for a green tax reform which include a carbon tax proposal, taxes on throwaway packaging, taxes on junk mail, and taxes on water consumption. The estimate is that a package of green taxes would produce revenues over the long term of well over $100 billion at the current rate of exchange. I am sure, if the Minister of Finance had a chance to read these papers, he would be tempted to withdraw his GST proposal and go the eco-tax route.

One has inevitably in this debate to raise the question of The Green Plan because it is relevant in its economic instruments chapter to this debate. We find an absence of ideas as to what could be the economic instruments and the taxation instruments for this government if it wants to pursue economic goals.

Unlike other sections of the Green Paper where questions are asked, there is no question asked in the economic investment and instruments section. However, it does ask some earth-shaking questions such as: Should the government emphasize compliance or enforcement in general terms? The paper does ask how regulatory procedures can be clarified and streamlined in general terms.

When we come to economic instruments, I must say to the Minister of State for Finance that his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, needs help very badly and very urgently because this process that has been launched by virtue of this discussion on the environment is so weak on the economic side that it makes you weep in despair.

What can we say at this stage of the debate? We can only repeat that Canadians have seen over the last six years a 50 per cent increase in the federal sales tax. They know that it is an unfair instrument. They know that there are alternatives which would be desirable both in terms of fairness and in terms of progress to be made in the environment.

Therefore we have to conclude that this entire exercise is anachronistic. The government has missed the boat with this kind of approach. Not only that, but it has done itself irreparable harm politically as reflected in the polls every month.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, today, as on many recent days, members of this House have the opportunity to debate the GST bill and, through that debate, bring improvements to this important legislation.

Unfortunately today, as on many recent days, members of the opposition are wasting their time and the time of this House on a carnival side-show designed to demonstrate to Canadians that they are against the GST.

This spectacle of delay and obstruction is telling us other things as well. It is telling all Canadians that the NDP and Liberal Party have again found the basis for a partnership in futility and waste. It is telling Canadians that some members of Parliament will sacrifice not just time, money and their personal dignity in search of a few seconds of TV news, they are also willing to sacrifice the parliamentary process itself.

There are clear rules designed to allow members of Parliament to do our work. Along with our obligations as members of Parliament we receive certain privileges and entitlements. Among those privileges is the ability to slow down the process when there is reason to believe that a government is exceeding its authority or acting in haste. However, the opposition is making a tragic mistake if it believes that Canadians want them to damage or destroy the parliamentary system itself.

Over time the parliamentary system of government has evolved to become the instrument through which the people of this country govern this country; nothing more, nothing less. This is where things get done. The government has a responsibility to govern, but what are the responsibilities of the opposition? Short of forming a government themselves, how do they measure achievement? How do they justify their existence? What are their responsibilities?

Over the past few weeks we have seen a curious fate overtake members of the opposition who have carried their opposition to the GST bill beyond the limits of reason, if not the limits of parliamentary procedure.

Their systematic refusal to deal with the GST bill on its merits has serious consequences for the people they were elected to represent and for the process of parliamentary government itself. Their obstruction may have started life as a sincere attempt to show their opposition, but as the days and weeks rolled by it became more and more clear that they were not refusing to speak out because of their opposition to the GST but because, quite literally, they had nothing to say.

Time and again we have challenged members of the opposition to present us with clear alternatives to a national tax on goods and services. Time and again they have failed to respond.

The concept of a Canadian goods and services tax has been discussed for several years. In more recent months the GST has passed through various stages by which the ideas mature and develop to become legislation and the law of the land.

It is interesting to note that as Bill C-62 has assumed a more definitive shape in reality the members who oppose this legislation have become less interested in the details of its operation. As various groups—and we have heard hundreds—have focused on its implementation and its impacts, members of the opposition have devoted more of their attention to obstructing the process by which work gets done in this House and in its committees.

The fate which has overtaken these opposition members is irrelevancy. In a very real sense they have taken it upon themselves to serve as road-blocks and obstacles at a time when their constituents need their intelligence and reasoning abilities the most.

By now it should seem clear to even the most sincere opponents of GST that this government has committed itself to a course of action which it believes is right. So far we have not heard arguments that would turn us from this course.

By now it should be clear that this government knows how to listen to groups and individuals who come forward with sound and reasonable advice. Much of this advice is now incorporated in this bill. The finance committee, of which I am member, travelled across this country and heard from groups and individuals from every province and territory in Canada. Over 300 individuals and groups of witnesses read over 1,000 representations to the finance committee on the GST. This all-party finance committee recommended 70 amendments to this bill after listening to Canadians across the country who want to deal constructively with the GST.

The opposition in refusing to deal with this legislation on its merits exclude itself from improving it. By stubborn, blind, across the board antagonism, the opposition is turning its back on reality and is turning its back on the people it represents.

The people do not elect members of Parliament to create confusion. They do not vote for ignorance. They do not vote for delays, obstruction and waste. They vote for leadership. If the opposition wants to give us the monopoly on leadership, then we have no choice but to accept.

One of the few pleasures of opposition is the ability to ignore reality. There is nothing quite as intoxicating as the ability to build a better future by breaking every rule of arithmetic, logic and common sense.

However the great concern of government is economic reality. Look at free trade. Look at the privatization of Crown corporations. Look at the improved management of government spending. These are all controversial issues. They attracted a great deal of opposition but they all got done.

• (1640)

Let us suppose for a moment that this government took the same all for nothing attitude that the opposition demonstrates. Under those circumstances it is quite possible that the measures I have just mentioned and the GST itself would be vastly different from what they are today. This government does listen to Canadians; we listen to all Canadians. When it comes time to take action we act and we act decisively.

Bill C–62 the GST bill is no different. It has changed over time as this government received the benefit of advice from every region and every sector of this country. This legislation is better because Canadians responded on its merits. They did not dream of a world where corporations can somehow pay taxes without raising prices to consumers. They did not dream of a world where personal income taxes can be increased year after year with no impact on the economy. They responded with realistic and practical solutions to the challenge we place before them.

We on the finance committee, all parliamentarians, should be grateful for the people who took the time to appear before the finance committee, people from all across Canada with constructive advice to criticize the bill in some cases but to improve it, to discuss it on its merits, not just to be wasteful and obstructionist like the opposition MPs in the House.

Here we are again today. This is the debate on report stage. Time is running short and soon time will run out. This government knows what it is doing. We have a list of objectives. We are here. We want to get the deficit under control. That is why we have acted to bring government expenditures under control and have introduced the GST bill, Bill C–62.

We want to build an economy that can fight and win against international competition. That is why we negotiated the free trade agreement and introduced Bill C–62. We want a fair tax system. That is why we reformed the corporate and personal income tax system, and that is why we introduced Bill C–62. A great deal of work remains to be done. There is still time for opposition members to abandoned their ill–conceived and foolish struggle and get down to some real work.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, as usual, we are speaking to time allocation or closure, one or the other. The Canadian people have suggested to this government that the time allocated is about two years and a couple of months perhaps. Closure is fast approaching; at the end of that time period the Canadian people will invoke closure against the government.

I appreciated the remarks of the member for Windsor West who spoke of a day in the life of an ordinary Canadian, but I am sure Canadians are wondering about the Liberals since their leadership candidates, the leading contenders, are not quite sure whether they would keep the GST in place. I want to tell the Canadian people that the New Democrats are really the only party that is opposed to this GST.

I do not want to mislead Canadians as did the member for Windsor West. Not all of those products will include the 7 per cent because the MST will be abolished. Nevertheless, when young couples in Canada turn on the lights and their radios in the morning, it will cost an extra 7 per cent. God forbid they should go get an Egg McMuffin, because that is going to cost an extra 7 per cent. Home renovations is an $11 billion business in this country, but now that will cost an extra 7 per cent. That is going to discourage many young Canadians from proceeding.

It has been indicated to us that prices of cars will go down. I do not think Canadians are going to believe that until they see it, and we are not sure if they will see it. Nevertheless, they may have to make the decision to repaint their car, but that is going to cost an extra 7 per cent too. When they go home and turn on their television set, the cable service is going to cost an extra 7 per cent. If they go out for a pizza as a special treat for the family, that is going to be an extra 7 per cent. They should have bought it at the grocery store. That points to the inconsistency of this GST.

It is bowling night, a nice recreation for young Canadian families,and older Canadians as well, but it is going to cost an extra 7 per cent. The bowlers say that the government struck out on this one.

Dad takes kids to hockey. Hockey equipment is going to be taxed by 7 per cent. Mom or dad takes daughter to piano lessons. It is going to cost an extra 7 per cent. Every young child likes milk and cookies at night. This government is going to change that, it is going to have to be milk and crackers because this government is going to tax cookies, believe it or not.

There is an old saying that you cannot avoid death and taxes. Well, this government has ensured that you cannot even avoid taxes upon death because funeral services will be taxed 7 per cent. You just cannot avoid the land of 7 per cent. We know that this government will soon make it the land of 8 per cent and 9 per cent. Where, in fact, will it stop? I do not know. I cannot begin to suggest when it will stop and I am sure Canadians are wondering.

This government is not listening to people. I want to take this opportunity to voice some of the concerns of the individuals in my community of Sault Ste Marie. I have received 18,000 signatures from people who have signed petitions through the small business group in Sault Ste. Marie. I did not want to bring them down here because they would pile up both desks. One thousand bowlers sent in cards. I have 500 petitions that I cannot table because they are not in the appropriate form.

Nevertheless, Mr. Paquin of Sault Ste. Marie took it upon himself to go out there and collect petitions and Pat Lacelle from Wiber Street, Carmen Briglio from Parliament Street, Peter Charette from Lake Street and Jim Belleau from Echo Bay, Ontario, signed these petitions on their own. These were unsolicited petitions saying: "Please, no GST".

What did the bowlers say? Well, they are concerned about recreation but Ruth-Ann Huckson said: "Have some mercy". Rose Rizzo said: "A person can't even have a good time without (you people) spoiling it." Tanya Van Looy said: "What do you think we are, walking banks!"

Here is one from a nine-year-old, Jeremy King, who says: "I think it's awful when a nine year old has to start paying tax for sports. (It stinks)." Lisa Beaulieu says: "You can afford to go golfing and fly cross country but we won't even be able to afford bowling. You won't be getting my vote." That is what 1,000 bowlers in Sault Ste. Marie said.

I have tabled 1,000 petitions under Standing Order 36 and I have several more that I have not tabled yet, but I will take this opportunity. A whole host of people from Trunk Road; Mary Pritchard, Allan Pritchard, Mary Buck, Ralph Buck, Loretta Armstrong, Candace Bond, Myra Patterson, all said: "Please, no GST".

I received 2,000 responses to my householder. Brian O'Neill from Church Street says: "The most regressive tax instituted in Canadian history. This government may have the authority but it has no mandate for such a tax".

Peter and Terry Lorzi from Wallace Terrace say: "I have a small business with three other people working besides myself. As much as I hate to, I'm thinking of giving it up and working for someone else, the small business person can barely survive these days. It seems very unfair to me".

Dennis Seabrook from Boundary Road says: "Please no GST". Debbie Belsito from MacDonald Avenue says: "I am an owner of a hair salon and like quite a few others, owning your own business is becoming less appealing. I love what I do and I love my country but it scares me to think of where it's going to end".

Gordon and Sandra Root say: "As music teachers we are very disturbed by the proposed taxing of music lessons. The pursuit of a musical education should be applauded and rewarded by the government much as the athletes are—not discouraged by taxation".

Rose and Liela Boniferro of Wellington Street East say: "Please stop. You are destroying the unique character of Canadianism. Never mind, your day is coming".

Mrs. Bouchard says: "I am 57 years old and my husband is 60 years old. For the first time in our over 40 years neither my husband or I own or can afford to own a vehicle or a house. My husband is retired".

An Hon. Member: It will be cheaper.

Mr. Butland: It will not be cheaper and Canadians know that.

• (1650)

I received 2,000 householders and 5,000 clippings from fast food restaurants in my community. The vote in my community: 28,000 signatures from people in my community who say "no" to the GST. But I have to be honest with you and the government, Mr. Speaker. I received two letters from constituents who said they were in favour of the GST.

I would encourage the government to take note of this vote in Sault Ste. Marie, and in probably all the other constituencies in this country. The vote is overwhelming. No GST! No GST! Listen to the people.

I have not mentioned individual letters. I have received letters from the New Brunswick Home and School Associations, from veterinarians, funeral homes, underwriters, appraisers, bowling lanes and tax preparers. Everybody says no GST. I encourage the government to listen, to come to its senses. No GST.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have to admit that I cannot help but feel a bit of sadness, not because of what the hon. gentleman has said, but because of the over-all attitude of the members of the Liberal Party as well as the New Democratic Party. We have a clear example here, through the member from Sault Ste. Marie, of all the problems that these members are creating by choosing to use a major tax reform politically instead of looking at the good of the country.

Instead of saying what he has just told this House, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie should open up the book we have produced to explain the technical papers. He should read and he will have answers for his constituents. His duty is not only to report, it is also to enlighten and explain calmly to his constituents that the problem is not at all what they hear.

The list is long. He talked about music lessons and so on. He knows full well that the impact will not be the one that is feared and he should assist the government in this reform by explaining to citizens of his riding how this reform will work. They may not like it afterward, but they should at least try to have the correct information. We on our side at least, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, will continue to work very hard over the coming months to explain to Canadians the importance of this reform.

As an example of information that is used in a way that is not always straightforward, I will refer to what the Leader of the Opposition said about deficit reduction. Last Friday, the Leader of the Opposition indicated that there was a lack of consistency between what I said and what my colleague, the Minister of Finance, had said, saying that the GST would contribute to deficit reduction.

I would like to remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that in the technical papers of August last it was written: "The GST will contribute to deficit reduction effort and ensure we can continue to pay for programs".

I go back to the December papers where it is written yet again:

[Translation]

—that the GST will contribute to the government's deficit-reduction effort and help us continue to finance, etc., the programs and services to which Canadians are attached.

So, Mr. Speaker, I note that the opposition members, especially the Liberals, brought this country's finances to a sort of dead end which we are trying to change, modify and improve. Instead of helping to solve the problem that they created, the members of that party systematically oppose for partisan reasons everything we suggest to reduce government spending and to improve economic efficiency.

The Leader of the Opposition just said that the GST was "a tax on consumption", a consumption tax. I gladly agree, because 48 countries have one. This type of tax in itself does not—

Mr. Young (Gloucester): How many countries have two such taxes?

Mr. Loiselle: Well, how many countries also have 11 governments?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Don't compare oranges and bananas!

Mr. Loiselle: Canada is a federal country and we are used to living with complicated political structures. How many countries have 11 first ministers?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Those countries don't have governments like ours!

Mr. Loiselle: How many countries have 11 finance ministers? It won't kill us! There!

He said this tax would come down particularly hard on people on low and modest incomes. I repeat, we are going to replace a hidden tax that is slowly but surely destroying the economy with a modern tax. However, a consumer tax can be regressive unless it is accompanied by a certain number of measures. That is why we have put in place the best system—compared with all other countries that have this kind of value-added tax—to prevent and correct any regressive aspects of the sales tax, and I am referring to a system of tax credits—

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Not indexed?

Mr. Loiselle: Not indexed!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Typical of our friends from Quebec, but we Acadians are used to being corrected this way!

Mr. Loiselle: I believe the past bodes well for the future. In successive Budgets we have always adjusted our credits and we are committed to doing so in future as well.

In any case, there is a tax credit system. We have also eliminated a number of commodities on which people on modest incomes are most likely to spend, such as rent, drugs and food. As a result, we have a system that adequately protects families with incomes of $30,000 or less, so that after the tax reform they will have more money than they had before.

Of course the opposition knows taxes are not a popular subject and I realize that people would prefer not to pay taxes at all, which is a perfectly normal reaction. So they are concerned, and the opposition is playing on that concern and making outlandish statements that have no connection at all with the GST. To hear them you would think companies will collapse under the tax burden. Nobody would make money any more, and meanwhile, it seems, we would make a terrific profit. It doesn't make sense. Why should we want to bring our economy to a standstill when what we want to do is put it back on track?

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) said that although we were replacing the manufacturer's tax because it was a bad tax, we increased it by 50 per cent over a number of years. And so we did. We used mechanisms that had been in place for 64 years to collect the funds we needed to carry out government programs. However, we tried to find ways to replace this pernicious tax, and we identified a modern, equitable and fair approach that was not only necessary but long overdue. I believe the government is acting responsibly, and the opposition parties should realize how important it is to continue our efforts to put our financial house in order. They were largely responsible for putting this country's economy in a practically untenable situation in the first place. Since 1984, we have been working very hard to turn the situation around. The goods and services tax is a modern tax that protects people on low- and modest incomes and, I repeat, it is a tax that exists in 48 countries. When people say: Sure, but none of these countries has a federal system of government. If that is the only drawback, let's discuss it, but they go on to mention the rest. It will be 7 per cent more. That's not true. We are removing a 13.5 per cent tax to replace it with a broader tax of 7 per cent. Canadians and consumers will in the end pay the same amount they were paying before. It will be a much more dependable way of collecting the revenues the government needs, and it will protect our ability to provide government programs. All in all, I repeat, this is a necessary, advanced and equitable tax reform, and I am sure that increasingly, Canadians will come to understand this.

[English]

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the government's proposed good and services tax has sparked a great deal of intense debate in recent months. I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this issue that concerns and will potentially affect all Canadians. To state that I have serious apprehensions and misgivings regarding the GST would be an understatement.

I would like to outline some of the more troubling aspects of the proposed GST, with particular emphasis on those aspects that have the most effect on my province. I am convinced that the implementation of the GST will have serious detrimental effects on the citizens of Prince Edward Island and on all Canadians.

The government seems determined to implement the GST, despite the fact that approximately 80 per cent of Canadians disapprove of this new tax. It believes this is the time to implement this tax because it feels there will be enough time for people to forget before the next election. Instead of listening and responding to the concerns of the provinces, of businesses and of ordinary Canadians, the government is promoting the GST with an advertising campaign costing millions of dollars.

Canadians have every reason to be upset. Canadians are tired of the tax increases imposed on them since the Conservatives took power. From 1984 to 1988, personal income tax has increased by 106 per cent, corporate tax has increased by 49 per cent, and indirect taxes have increased by 54 per cent, and still there is very little reduction in the deficit.

A study done by the Canadian Council on Social Development says that taxes on the poor since 1984 have increased seven times those that are charged to the rich. Because of increases in personal and indirect taxes, the middle-income Canadian is now shouldering a disproportionate share of the tax burden. Not only are we paying more, we are receiving less. The GST will further aggravate this situation.

No one will argue that the manufacturers' sales tax is a tax that should be retained. No one will argue that this country does not need tax reform. No one will deny that we need a more simple and equitable tax system. But the GST is not tax reform. It is just a new tax, an unfair tax, an inflationary tax, a complicated tax which has all the earmarks of a bureaucratic horror show.

All Canadians will be affected by the inflationary impact of the GST. While the government expects only a 2.25 per cent increase in inflation by 1991, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants predicts that this figure could be doubled as a result of the GST, which means that it will be 4.5 to 5 per cent. This coupled with the ordinary inflation, we will be experiencing a 10 per cent inflation figure by 1991.

Introduction of the GST in the present circumstances will create a two-tiered sales tax system in every province except Alberta. This will be chaotic for both business and consumer. Small business will be facing a compliance nightmare and consumers will find themselves in a state of confusion at the retail counter.

We were promised a visible tax. Consumers would be aware of how much federal tax they would be paying. The Consumers Association of Canada feels that visibility is an essential principle of any tax change. Consumer awareness lends to greater political accountability, greater reluctance to bump up the tax rate at budget time, and fewer accusations of unfair pricing.

There is little doubt that the GST will contribute to the worsening of existing regional disparities. The impact of the GST will be most harmful in the provinces with the highest provincial tax rates. These high provincial taxes will be imposed after the GST has already been added to the cost of an item. That is, there will be a tax on a tax. Therefore, the proposed new tax system will have a particularly detrimental effect on provinces with high tax rates and those provinces tend to be the ones which already have weak economies.

In Prince Edward Island, there will be a total of 17 per cent charged through the GST and the provincial tax system. The 10 per cent provincial tax will be added to the cost of the item plus the cost of the GST.

Another very serious problem arising from the GST, and one that will further contribute to regional disparities, is the fact that the tax will apply to transportation. Transportation costs are a vital factor for all Canadians, but particularly for those who live in regions remote from the production and distribution centres.

For example, a farmer in Prince Edward Island will have to pay more for farm equipment than a farmer in Ontario because of the increased costs in transporting the finished product from the point of production. Moreover, the imposition of the GST will also affect fuel costs. Even though transportation companies will be able to claim back the GST paid on fuel, the finance department apparently plans to offset this revenue shortfall by raising excise taxes on fuel. This additional cost for transportation companies will be passed on to consumers in the form of higher rates.

Once again, the ultimate bearer of the new tax will be the consumer. It appears equally evident that the consumer who lives in remote and rural areas will suffer the most from the increase in transportation costs. Atlantic Canadians will get it in the neck one more time.

It is time for a change. The government should be devoting its efforts to alleviating regional inequities rather than imposing a tax which will help keep the poor provinces poor.

The effects of the GST will vary from sector to sector. One of the industries that will be hardest hit by the GST is tourism. It is irresponsible for the government to push through a tax proposal that will seriously damage an industry that generates $24 billion in gross revenues per annum, that has created new jobs faster than any other sector, that is Canada's second largest earner of foreign exchange, and that generates $11 billion in tax revenue for all levels of government.

According to the Tourist Industry Association of Canada, the industry will lose $1 billion per year and 25,000 jobs by 1993, if the GST goes through. Moreover, many of the 60,000 small tourist enterprises will be placed in jeopardy.

The imposition of the GST will also raise the price of domestic air fares and domestic holiday tours. Canadians will be discouraged from taking vacations in their own country. This will be extremely harmful, since approximately 70 per cent of total tourist dollars is spent by Canadians in Canada. Tourists will be further deterred from taking their holidays in Canada by the fact that the cost of eating in restaurants will increase because of the goods and services tax.

The effects of the goods and services tax on tourism will be particularly devastating for the Atlantic provinces. About half of the tourists who visit these provinces are from central Canada. These tourists might find that, in light of the GST, a trip to the United States of America might be easier on the pocket-book.

According to the Canadian Tourist Research Institute, Prince Edward Island will suffer more than any other province because tourism makes up 10.5 per cent of Prince Edward Island's gross provincial product.

The agricultural and small business sectors will also be seriously affected by the proposed GST. Cash flow problems will be further aggravated. While many of the goods and services that are being used by a farmer will be taxed and rebated, the farmer will still be required to pay the tax up front. Farmers will be forced to spend a lot of time and money figuring out the claims system and maintaining detailed records in order to comply.

According to John Bulloch of the CFIB, the ultimate compliance nightmare will be caused by the two-tiered tax system. The GST alone has to be accounted for at every stage of the production-distribution chain. The government's attempts to simplify the accounting procedures are, in Mr. Bulloch's words, "the most complex part of the whole nightmare". This is typical of the bureaucracy. By simplifying things, they make it more complex.

The complexity of the system will add significantly to accounting costs, not only for the business owners and farmers, but also for those who have to comply with a sales tax system for the first time.

• (1710)

For example, fishermen in Prince Edward Island who, for the most part have had their record keeping maintained for them by the large fish processing companies, will be faced with significant administrative costs when the GST is implemented. They will have to file monthly GST returns in order to be eligible for rebates on their purchases. The Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen in Atlantic Canada says that the fishery sector in Prince Edward Island will be particularly hard hit with high costs arising from the administration of the GST.

Another problem area that I would like to address briefly is housing. Housing ownership was once regarded as an inalienable social right of Canadians. Past governments have instituted programs to help people save for a down payment. In 1985, this government killed the RHOSP. In 1990, the same government is adding GST costs which will help make home ownership even more unaffordable and will impact negatively on the construction industry. GST will also be added to legal fees, appraisal fees, real estate fees, et cetera, further inhibiting home ownership.

These are only a few of the burdens added to the tax load of Canadians by the goods and services tax. It is a terrible tax: inflationary, cumbersome, unfair and expensive to administrate. The GST is not the answer. I ask the government to withdraw it. Since Atlantic Canada is especially hard hit, I ask the Conservative members from Atlantic Canada to live up to their responsibilities to the people of the region and join us in killing this odious tax.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with firm resolve to speak as an Alberta member of Parliament and to speak on this measure at the report stage on legislation introducing the goods and services tax.

All Canadians are aware of the controversy in the debate generated by this aspect of tax reform. Of course, members of the opposition have not helped. They have played upon the natural fears of many Canadians through using misinformation, the only weapon they have in their arsenal.

This is, and will continue to be, a tough debate on the streets, in the coffee shops and over the kitchen table in homes across Canada. Some constituents have urged me to vote in favour of the GST and some constitutents have urged me to vote against the GST. What are the factors that I must consider? What are the arguments on either side? Let me deal first with why I should even consider voting against the GST. There are nine commonly cited reasons.

One, if the GST were a new tax raising buckets of new money for the federal government, then I should vote against the GST.

Two, if the GST were a cash cow easily increased once in place, then I should vote against the GST.

Three, if Albertans do not already pay a sales tax and we know that that is one of the ways that we as Albertans define ourselves, then I should vote against the GST.

Four, if the GST were to create a spiral of inflation in our economy, I would be the first on my feet to vote against it.

Five, if this were an unfair tax that hurt the poor and the seniors, then I should vote against the GST.

Six, if the GST were to be an administrative nightmare for small business and farmers, then I should vote against the GST.

Seven, if businesses and farmers would have to pay GST on their rent, on their equipment, on their supplies and other purchases resulting in an increase to input costs, then I should vote against the GST. If the GST were to increase costs of production in agriculture, then I, as chair of the agricultural caucus representing a strongly agricultural riding, should vote against the GST.

Eight, if I felt the elimination of the existing federal sales tax would not be passed along to consumers, then I should oppose the GST.

Finally, number nine, if I felt there were several better alternatives or even one better alternative, then I would vote against the GST and call for that better alternative.

The bare facts do not sustain any of these propositions. Let us examine them one by one.

First, this is a replacement tax. The GST replaces the federal sales tax. Both the old FST and the new GST raise about $18 billion net for the Canadian treasury.

Second, if governments wanted a secret cash cow, they would keep the existing federal sales tax. Perhaps, this is the real reason that some members of the Liberals and the NDP oppose the GST. They want the so-called painless secret cash cow provided by the existing federal sales tax. The Conservative party wants an open and a visible tax so that Canadians know when they are paying for the services they receive from this government.

Three, Albertans already pay $1.7 billion in federal sales tax. Under the GST, they will pay about the same amount.

Four, regarding inflation, there is clear evidence from other countries that indicates that such a change does not create a spiral of inflation, because of the removal of the federal sales tax at the time that the new goods and services tax is introduced.

Five, regarding seniors and lower-income Canadians, the GST does not tax groceries, rent, health care and other basic necessities which compose the bulk of expenditures of these people.

Six, regarding administration for small business and for farmers, the GST tax return is but one page in length.

Seven, the GST will decrease input costs. For example, a farmer presently pays federal sales tax on the purchase of a pick-up. Under the GST, he or she will not be paying that input cost any more.

Eight, with respect to whether the eliminated FST will be passed on to consumers, we know that if one retailer is slow to pass along the difference another will not be. That is the basis of economic competition in our society.

Finally, is there an alternative? Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are alternatives, but I can assure you that they are all worse in their impact on my riding, on my province, and on my country.

We could stay with the federal sales tax. We could continue to damage the economy and to eliminate thousands of jobs that never got a chance to get started. We could increase income tax. Is that what they want? They want us to increase income taxes. They want to increase other taxes. Or, we could cut out important programs like pensions. Is that what they want to do? There are always simple answers, and they do not work.

It is my view that I was not elected to simply be popular and to try to get re-elected. I believe that I was elected to make judgments and do the right thing for my riding, my province and my country. For these reasons and for many more, I will vote for the goods and services tax.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the best of luck to that hon. member. We are going to see an alternative all right, an alternative sitting in that seat after the next election.

I want to begin my remarks by saying how disappointed and disgusted I am in witnessing this continual abuse of parliamentary procedure by the Conservative government. The government has decided again to invoke closure, or time allocation as it is properly called, on almost every piece of legislation in this House.

Since I was elected, the government has moved to limit debate no less than 37 times. That is more often than any government in history since Confederation. No wonder the Conservative government is at an all-time, precedent-setting, record low of 15 per cent in the polls, and going down. Read all about it. It states in the newspapers that no other Canadian government has fallen to such levels since Gallup began polling during the Second World War. Mr. Reid states that this is a signal that Canadians think the government is adrift. Adrift, Mr. Speaker!

I rise in support of the motions moved by my colleague for Gloucester, seconded by the member for Kingston and the Islands. The motions would have the effect of deleting the most substantive portions of the bill. These portions would have the effect of putting into law the concerns raised by the Official Opposition regarding the goods and services tax.

What are those concerns, Mr. Speaker? Permit me to list them for you: that the GST is regressive; that the GST is unfair; that the GST is inflationary; that the GST will be a nightmare to administer for the government and businesses. According to the Minister of National Revenue, the start-up costs for the GST alone will be over $1 billion and will cost over $380 million to administer every year.

The legislation before us would entrench a system of taxation that would put the tax burden squarely on the shoulders of the less well off in our society.

I could not help but listen to the two hon. members earlier. The member for Calgary Southeast had the audacity to ask: "What are they doing here?", referring to the opposition. He says that we are wasting time here in the highest court of the land. But I would like to remind that hon. member for Calgary Southeast that we in the opposition represent 80 per cent of Canadians on this issue. Eighty per cent of Canadians say no GST. I suppose that the hon. member for Calgary Southeast represents the remaining 20 per cent.

Then the member for Calgary Southeast had the nerve and the audacity to call the members for Calgary Northeast and Edmonton Southeast "characters". They are Members of Parliament. They are fellow caucus members of the member for Calgary Southeast. These gentlemen, and I suppose there are other members of Parliament in there as well, know best the demands and the wishes of their constituents. They are the ones who are there in the riding. Yet the member for Calgary Southeast has the nerve to stand up and call the members for Calgary Northeast and Edmonton Southeast characters just because they are acting in the best interests of their constituents. It is their constituents who are telling their member of Parliament, the person they gave the privilege and the honour to stand in this House, to say no to the GST because that is what the constituents want them to do. The member for Calgary Southeast calls them characters and makes idle threats: "Kick them out of caucus", he says.

Even before this second stage of the tax reform had taken shape culminating in the bill before us, the Conservative government, led by the Prime Minister, managed to raise taxes 32 separate times since taking office in 1984. The present manufacturers' sales tax, a tax which the Minister of Finance called a silent killer of jobs, was raised by him from 9 per cent in 1984 to 13.5 per cent today. Each time he raised the tax, in essence he became an accomplice to the elimination of Canadian jobs. Under the second stage of tax reform—now, there is a word, "reform". The Tories did not want to call it what it really is, they call it tax reform. A good PR job sells it better—it is becoming increasingly clear that the poor and middle classes will be hit even harder with the GST. We have heard examples of that, especially from the hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the member for Windsor West. He gave all kinds of examples of how that tax is going to hit us along the way.

Under the second stage of tax reform, this government has forgotten, but it must recognize that whatever tax system is finally put in place it must promote fairness and eradicate economic discrimination. The GST is not such a tax. It would have the opposite effect and here are a few examples. The Hamilton and District Homebuilder's Association states that the GST will add $3,000 to the price of a new home. In Metro Toronto, this could be as high as $9,000.

Due to the GST, the government expects a minimum increase in inflation of 2.25 per cent. Of course, we know that is going to signal the Bank of Canada to maintain high interest rates, adding to the cost of a new home, car, or whatever other investments.

The Conference Board of Canada estimates that the number of jobs that will be lost due to the tax could be as high as 72,000 in 1991.

If the government has its way under the changes to the unemployment insurance system, Canadians who lose their jobs, through no fault of their own, will receive less entitlement for a shorter period of time.

The tax will be a nightmare for small businesses to administer. It could cost them over $2,000 in compliance costs alone. The Conservative Government had promised an annual subsidy for small businesses, but instead has opted for a one-time allowance.

The government has also placed the onus on businesses to decide whether or not they will include the GST on the shelf price of the good, or at the cash register. If they include the GST on the shelf price, the Minister of Finance says that businesses should post signs saying that the GST has been included. However, his officials have confirmed that there is no requirement to do so, meaning that another promise has been broken that the tax would be visible.

Let us not forget the provincial sales tax. Even though the provinces stand to gain, there will be a little windfall for the provinces in applying the GST then the provincial sales tax on top of the price of the good. So the Ontario Government, for example, stands to win. This government cannot get one province on board to help administer this tax.

Canadians should remember that included in the second stage of tax reform are massive cuts to existing programs. Some of these are familiar to Canadians already. The clawback on Old Age Security, the freeze on payments to Canada Assistance Plans for the needy, withdrawal of government support for the Unemployment Insurance Program. The GST is simply part of the over all Conservative strategy to paint a misleading picture of our present situation.

In closing, as a member of the Official Opposition, I respect the fact that Canadians can and should be encourage to join in pursuit of the free market. However, I do not believe that the operation of this country should be financed on the backs of those who are least capable of paying, which is what I believe is proposed in the GST.

For the record, GST simply means "government sanctioned theft".

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, we are going to axe the tax and put in a tax that is fair.

The other day people opposing the goods and service tax decided to phone my office. I happened to be there and picked up the phone and talked to a Mrs. Carmichael. She told me how terrible this tax was. I said: "Mrs. Carmichael, we are going to axe the tax". And she said: "Oh, that is marvellous. You are going to axe the tax". I said: "We are going to axe the federal sales tax, Mrs. Carmichael". She said: "That is wonderful. Why didn't you say so?". Well, that is what I have been saying across the country. That is what the whole policy is about. The policy is about getting rid of the most unfair, unCanadian piece of legislation that the government has had in force since 1924.

• (1730)

We have had report after report: three royal commissions. There was the Goodman study, on behalf of the hon. Marc Lalonde; a study undertaken by Mr. MacEachen, a study undertaken by Mr. Chrétien; a study done by Mr. Turner; a study done by our present Minister of Finance; all designed to find out how they could alter the current federal sales tax and do something other than a goods and services value-added tax.

Time after time governments realized how wonderful the current tax was for them, because under this current tax when taxpayers' put their hands in their purses or wallets and take their money out, the government takes their money and they do not know it. We are going to axe that tax and we are going to put in a tax that is fair, visible, upfront, honest and works for the benefit of Canada.

Mr. Fisher: It is regressive.

Mr. Blenkarn: This tax covers the whole gambit of goods and services in the country. It is designed to be rebatable and take the burden off our industry and off our business. In the rebatable system what we do is allow business to invest in new buildings and new machinery and farms to buy new pick-up trucks, new milking machines and new things that they presently pay tax on and get that tax rebated to them so they can grow, develop, create and make a better Canada without the burden of tax on their backs. That is a 4 per cent refundable tax credit to every single developer-creator in Canada. That is what we are doing. We are building Canada.

My friends on the other side are worried about building Canada. They want to make sure that there is a weak, wimpy Canada because they are weak and wimpy.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: We are now at report stage of a bill that has had before it was engrossed a very thorough study across Canada by the finance committee. It has been the subject of a report. It has had a further study by the department that resulted in a bill which was brought before this House on second reading and then referred to the finance committee for further study and further amendment. A whole host of amendments were put through.

Two excellent amendments, by the way, were put by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor dealing with the benefits to credit unions and psychoanalysts, an exempt profession. These are good amendments that were put forward by the member for Essex—Windsor.

It is too bad members of the Official Opposition could not get around to doing any thinking on the bill because they too probably could have come up with some more amendments that were worth while. But, what did they do? Their amendments before us today simply say: axe this section, axe that section, get rid of that clause, get rid of the other clause, but there is nothing progressive, no creative thinking.

I recommend to the House tonight the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Mississauga West dealing with the horse racing industry and with the ability of charities and others to run bingos so that that kind of fund raising on behalf of charities bears no tax. These are the kinds of amendments that have come out of hard work done by members of this House in changing, persuading and ameliorating the problems of this tax to make it work better.

I want to thank members of the finance committee who worked on it, my colleagues from Mississauga West, from Essex—Windsor and others for the efforts in making the bill work the way it ought to work, because it is a pretty simple form of taxation.

I am told it is awfully complicated. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, in a simplistic way all you have to do is put two nails on the wall. On the one nail, you put all the bills you received for everything you buy, and on the other nail put all the invoices you have for everything you sell. Then once every three months or once a month, depending on how often a small business wishes, they simply subtract one pile of bills from the other pile of bills, multiply by 6.54, and that is what they send in. That is as simple as you can get.

Mr. Fisher: What about those who have nothing to sell?

Mr. Blenkarn: If you have nothing to sell, you create nothing. Then you pay the tax because you are a consumer and consumers pay consumption taxes.

We have a philosophy of taxation on this side and that philosophy is: as far as income is concerned we ought to tax income, we ought to tax work, but not so much as to persuade people who work that it is not worth their while to work. That is why we have managed over a period of time to reduce our income tax rates. We have to do more of that, but we have reduced income tax rates as we did in stage one of tax reform.

We have to tax capital, but not so much as to make investment unfair or inappropriate. We have done that as we have worked, bit by bit, through amending the Income Tax Act and other statutes. Here we are reorganizing our consumption tax in such a way that we get growth in consumption tax activity instead of the negative attitudes that have been expressed in the existing federal sales tax. This tax creates a new growth attitude in Canada, a growth attitude of 1.4 per cent above the existing base case, that improves Canada and makes it bigger, grander, and finer.

It creates an additional $9 billion worth of new wealth in the second year of the tax and probably more. They say it is going to cost us $300 million in additional costs. I guess I would spend $3 to make $90 any day. That is what we are talking about when we talk about costs.

Where are we? We are in the final stages of a debate in this House of Commons to change a tax system that Canadians have been asking to have changed since the Rowell-Sirois report of 1940. No government has had enough guts, drive or initiative to do what has been necessary.

You do not rule by the Gallup poll. You do not govern by the Gallup poll. You govern by election, and we presented to the people of this country our alternative for sales tax reform in the White Paper of 1987. That White Paper formed the basis on which we went to the country in 1988, and the country endorsed this party as the government. It is on that endorsement that this policy is now before us here, in final form, endorsed by the people of Canada in the election of 1988.

Mr. McCurdy: Give us a break.

Mr. Blenkarn: This is a simple form of taxation. Even Mr. Bulloch will be able to figure it out when he gets around to it.

An Hon. Member: Don't count on it.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says "Don't count on it", but I have to say that even Mr. Bulloch will figure it out. Once it is in place I believe we will have the provinces of this country joining up in this tax system. Sure, it is unpopular now. Sure, we are unpopular, doing the tough things that have to be done, but we are trying to make Canada grow and we are building a nation. We are not building a society of wimps and weasels, and wastrels.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is an unexpected pleasure to be able to speak after the hon. member for Mississauga South. As I listened to him I knew I was listening to someone who was so absolutely out of touch with the Canadian people that he could say that public dissatisfaction with this GST is actually diminishing. The member is radically and completely out of touch with the Canadian people. Of course the tax is unpopular. Any tax is bound to be unpopular. It is not a question of whether the tax is in itself is unpopular, because obviously there is a natural tendency for tax to be unpopular.

However this particular tax is unpopular for a deep and fundamental reason. The member fails to read history. What history says is that over and over again governments, administrations and regimes that fail to listen bring in a tax which cracks the system and forces change. Every major revolution over the last 200 years or 300 years has been triggered by an unpopular and unnecessary tax. I suspect, unless this government listens more carefully in the hours, weeks and months ahead, what we are seeing now is a fundamental radical realteration of the Canadian political landscape.

I spent last weekend in my home constituency, as did most members. In Victoria I was impressed not only with the amount of the opposition to the GST but the underlying sense of bitterness and despair that we have a government in Canada that simply will not listen to the Canadian people. This government has learned as a result of the 1988 election a mistaken lesson. It learned then that it could recover from unpopularity if it just hung in there.

It is now trying to apply that lesson to the current situation. It has been advised by tax advisors who simply fail to understand that a tax system is an intricate system of social economic relationships. To tinker in a fundamental way as this tax does is to set loose major tremors through the whole economic system at a time when the Canadian economy simply cannot take it. For example, the government and its advisors, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have said over and over again that this tax will not be inflationary. They have studies to prove it. Already the people are understanding more than the government knows, that this tax is going to be dramatically inflationary at a time in our economy when we cannot stand it.

I have a tax notice that a senior citizen received in Victoria. The tax notice is for a tax increase of 17 per cent that comes into force on July 1 of this year. The landlord, in explaining the tax increase, says it is because of the GST. We know that workers across this country are beginning to gear their wage demands to take into account the effect of inflation. We know that prices are already beginning to be jacked up in anticipation of the GST. Real estate prices are going up in anticipation of the GST. The people know that this tax is going to be inflationary.

Why won't the government listen? This weekend we had what was called the no campaign. People had an opportunity in more than 500 communities across Canada to vote on the GST. Certainly in Victoria they came out in amazing numbers. People of all persuasions, of all points of view, were united around a single clear message, and that is no to the GST. As I emphasized before, it is not simply a reaction to being taxed more. When one has a chance to sit and chat carefully with the people who are signing these cards, one uncovered a range of attitudes. In some cases it was a negative feeling toward any increased taxation. In many cases it was thoughtful, careful business people who have studied this and who are worried and afraid of the impact of this tax on their business and the administrative chaos that is going to ensue.

I talked to a couple who are involved in the clothing business in Victoria and Vancouver. They already find that the retail prices in Washington, just south of the border, equal their wholesale prices. They worry about what the GST will do to them.

There was another couple who had a business. They looked into the administrative aspects of this and found there were tremendous complications in collection that this is going to cause. Another man has been a Conservative all his life. He was feeling a sense of tension and anxiety at the cheating that he says will happen in his particular business. He does not want to do that. He says that, in competition, he is going to be forced to do that, or he is going to be forced out of business.

These are genuine concerns. They are based on life-long experience and this government should listen. There will be hundreds of thousands of Canadians over this wèekend who will sign these cards. They will take the special effort of signing a card and filing it, and asking the government to say no to the GST. It is not too late for the government to listen.

I suggest that in mere self-preservation the government must begin to listen to the people of Canada. The member for Mississauga South made a virtue of acting in the face of public opinion polls, and certainly there are circumstances under which those acts of political courage are necessary. But this is an act of arrogance and foolhardiness, pushing forward with this tax in the face of the collective wisdom of the Canadian people.

It is now very clear that the impact of this tax is felt most strongly among those who have spent their lives as Conservatives, who have been supporters through thick and thin of this Conservative party. It is ironic that it is the Conservative party which is now seen by so many people as leading this country into disintegration and disarray. This was the party that founded Canada in many respects, that had that initial, historic vision.

It is now the party that is perceived by many of its own supporters as dividing and causing the disintegration of this country. We have the free trade agreement. We have the litany that we have been raising in this House over the last number of months; the disintegration of social programs, unemployment insurance, seniors' programs. We have had in recent months and weeks the elimination of funding for women's programs, a clear and absolute violation of the responsibility of this government.

Now we find that this party, which was elected back in 1957 and 1958 on the campaign for the freedom of Parliament and against closure, has used closure to impose this unpopular, unfair, dishonest tax on the Canadian people. The GST is part of the Americanization of Canada. The government is refusing to see that we have, in this country, a distinctive social and economic system which needs changing in a different way than that the government takes us.

This government moves us increasingly into an integration with the American economy. We must have a tax system that reflects the essential social democracy of this country which is fair, honest and open. The government's refusal to listen to the Canadian people will mean the end of a Canadian institution. I must say I do not spend too much time worrying about the fate of the Conservative party, but it is an institution which has played a part in keeping this country together.

What is happening in Victoria is happening in community after community across the country. The Reform Party for example, in my riding, has now signed up 800 members. Clearly, from the impression I had on the weekend, it has replaced the Conservative party as the voice of conservativism in western Canada.

• (1750)

That means that western Canada is now represented by a sectarian party which does not and cannot properly represent all Canadians. But it is a symptom of the disease which has been inflicted on this country by the Conservative party.

I call on the House to reject this bill, to reject this tax and I call on the government to pause once before it crosses the brink. It is not too late. The Canadian people must be listened to. The Canadian people will be listened to.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to participate in what I hope is near the end of a lengthy process of reforming the tax system which this government began about five years ago. I have been part of that process for most of that time. Over the course of that time we have seen more misinformation, hysteria and nonsense on this subject than perhaps any other that has ever been discussed, with the possible exception of the free trade debate during the last election campaign.

I took the time yesterday to find one of the tabloids that I used in the last election campaign because I wanted to make sure that what I was doing here on this subject was consistent with what I was doing in the election campaign. I took that tabloid out. I have it here and it has a nice picture of me and one of the Prime Minister and some senior citizens. It talks about free trade and has some information about that. But what is important is what is on the back here—

Mr. McCurdy: Show us what is on the back. There is another picture there too.

Mr. Dorin: That is right. There is another picture. There is a picture of myself and the Minister of Finance. He was the Minister of Finance then and he is now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member knows that he should not be using any of his props. I do not wish to see any props in this House, please. The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest has the floor.

The hon. member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair on a point of order.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a picture album of himself. Since that is a document to which he is referring, I would ask that it be tabled for the benefit of other members of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest has the floor.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I would be more than glad to table it. But before I table it I will quote something from it. It talks about tax reform. It says the following.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): First, the hon. member will not be able to table it. Second, I would appreciate if he would just leave it on his desk and quote from it there.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that. What I said in that document was that tax reform is an issue in this election. That of course was the last election. We had completed the first stage which was income tax reform, corporate and personal. I was talking about the second stage of tax reform because we had completed the first stage:

> The second stage of tax reform will be the development of a better and fairer sales tax regime. The inadequacies of the present federal sales tax system are widely recognized; it is complex, hidden, unfair to lower-income Canadians, impedes the ability of Canadian firms to compete internationally, and is too narrowly-based. The present tax applies to only about one-third of the goods and services produced in Canada.
> Changing the federal tax system is a very complex process. This government is committed to developing and implementing sales tax changes in full consultation with the provinces, the business community and individual Canadians. The government is continuing to work with the provinces—
>
> Reform of the sales tax system will ensure that the revenue obtained will replace those of the old manufacturers' sales tax and will be accompanied by a significantly enriched sales tax credit—It will be designed to reduce the complexity, ensure the fair treatment of all businesses and eliminate both the inequities and competitive disadvantages that are a basic part of the current tax regime.
> The government is also committed to ensuring that municipalities, hospitals, school boards, colleges and universities will not bear a greater tax burden under the new system and that basic groceries, prescription drugs and certain medical devices will not be subject to tax.

Those were my comments during the election campaign. I distributed 40,000 copies of that document in my constituency. I gave every elector in my constituency an opportunity to see what we were planning to do when we returned to office, as we were, because the people chose wisely and they recognized that this was a government with a platform, plan and vision.

What we are doing here today is implementing exactly what we said we were going to do in the last election campaign, exactly what I said we were going to do as stated in 40,000 copies of a tabloid that I distributed throughout my constituency.

Over the course of the last several months, we have heard from a lot of people who have talked about this particular tax. I would just like to let you know what some of them have had to say. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce said:

> We do not favour the maintenance of the current manufacturers' sales tax. Its serious flaws have been well documented and need not be repeated here. We do support the concept of a value-added tax as a vehicle that could serve as the best replacement mechanism—

Some people might be interested to hear what Shirley Carr of the Canadian Labour Congress had to say. She said:

> I should add that the Canadian Labour Congress has long been critical of the existing federal sales tax which is hidden, unfair, and economically destructive tax.

She was accompanied by Bob Baldwin, director of technical services. He said:

> Within the realm of multi-stage taxes, there are all kinds of design options—We have not said we are opposing multi-stage taxes in principle.

Maybe we should talk about Mr. Bulloch because he had some things to say. Some members were quoting him earlier. I asked Mr. Bulloch the question: "Do you agree there is a problem with the existing federal sales tax that needs to be resolved? Is that true?". He said: "Yes". Then he said: "Everybody out there would like to have an alternative to a multi-stage sales tax. The trouble is, one is not out there".

Let us hear what some other people had to say. Mr. Alasdair McKichan, president of the Retail Council of Canada said:

> Our members are firmly of the opinion that the current MST is outmoded and inefficient in a great many ways. We acknowledge it must be replaced and that the economy and the revenue needs of the government would best be served by a comprehensive goods and services tax along the lines of the type we are now considering.

I will give another example. Mr. Michael Geller, president of the Urban Development Institute said:

> Our position is that the sales tax reform is necessary to reduce the deficit, to improve the over-all fairness of the tax system, and to ensure that Canada can compete effectively in the world. We will support a GST which will contribute to the realization of these goals.

Because there are many members who have automotive plants in their ridings, I will quote Mr. T. Mezon, Government Relations Committee of the Automotive Industries Association of Canada:

> As a representative of the manufacturing sector of our association, let me say that we are in agreement with the proposed GST. We think that the current FST has been an unfair burden for the Canadian manufacturer.

Mr. Roy M. Woodbridge, president of the Canadian Advanced Technology Association said:

> I can tell you pretty categorically that if you got a roomful of our members and asked them, taking the good and the bad all together, how many are in favour of this, you would have about 98 percent raising their hands in favour.

I could go on and on because I have a long list here, but I know that I am out of time, so I will thank you and allow the next speaker to continue.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight, and it is night, it is six o'clock and supper hour, to say that I am against Bill C-62 and will vote against it. Every consumer sitting around their kitchen table can say that the food on that table will not be taxed because it is a necessity. But next year every consumer in Canada will pay an additional 7 per cent on everything else in the kitchen.

• (1800)

The minister can talk about his 13.5 per cent—maybe he thinks he can fool some Canadians, but obviously he has not fooled 80 per cent of Canadians. The manufacturers' sales tax, or the federal sales tax, as the minister should be aware, is only on some goods. I do not say that it was a good tax. But I certainly do not think that the goods and service tax is a good tax when you think that everybody is going to pay 7 per cent on all goods and services, except on basic necessities such as food and medicine.

There are several reasons why I dislike this tax. One, it is regressive. It makes the lower income Canadians pay. I think there are other areas where this government could have looked to reclaim some money from Canadians—but I will come to that. It affects every low income Canadian, whether they are a student, unemployed, a widow, or single woman or man in their 50s, everybody. It means they will have to find 7 per cent more next year to buy the same thing that they bought with their income this year, except for some of the major items such as a car and they are still going to have to pay 7 per cent on a car.

The other thing is that it is inflationary. We are asking the people to find 7 per cent more in their income. It means higher wages and it also means, in my opinion, fewer jobs. There will be less incentive to buy come the beginning of the year until people get used to this tax. Next year they will need more money to do what they did this year.

The government says: "Oh, well, we are giving a credit to Canadians". I agree, they are giving a credit to Canadians. There has been a federal sales tax credit in the income tax system for the last three years. I have never heard statistics on how many Canadians filed income tax returns when they did not pay income tax nor have to pay income tax. I can only say that my constituency offices have many people who have never had to fill out an income tax return, and there are many people who not even know that that credit has been there for the last three income tax years. As well, it means they must file an income tax credit in order to start receiving the credit next December. That means every Canadian.

It would be very amazing to me, a politician, to think that every Canadian will have enough awareness to know that they must file that income tax return in order to qualify for that credit. It takes a long time for people to get used to it. There is always an injury to Canadians until they get used it.

Ms. Clancy: That's right.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): The collection from the individual taxpayer is one thing but there is another element. It is only partially indexed. The National Council on Social Welfare estimates that a partial indexation of the goods and service tax credit will result in 100,000 families losing the credit within two years, and some 700,000 within five years. The Canadian Tax Journal tells us that 46 per cent of Canadian families earning less than $30,000 will pay more taxes in 1991, contrary to the government's argument as to the fairness of the goods and service tax.

The Minister of Finance says it will increase inflation by a factor of 1.25 per cent. That is his statistic. That is a government statistic. Many economists say that that is a very optimistic figure.

I see many other consequences that we do not have time to talk about here. I do know that next January there will be more bartering among people, and I cannot say that I am against it. Why not avoid the 7 per cent? Why not allow the poor or lower income Canadians to barter? I am certain that the higher income Canadians will go to the United States for services and the government will not get the 7 per cent. Why do I say that? If I were going to plan a trip to the United States, I would write to an American travel agency rather than pay the 7 per cent here for the same service. With the free trade agreement it could not be prevented because the United States would tell us that we were interfering with their way of work. I can see many areas where the government will lose the benefit of passing this goods and services tax.

I know we are under a 10 minute rule for speeches under closure and this is one of the last times to debate this bill. Tomorrow night at this time we will be voting on third reading. Contrary to what 80 per cent of Canadians may feel, by tomorrow night at this time the House will not have the power to change anything in that bill unless it is returned to us from the Senate.

I say to the 80 per cent of Canadians, as a person who understands politics, there is only one way to make your voice heard between now and tomorrow night. My constituents have certainly written to tell me they are against the goods and services tax. I can only say to them, find the telephone number of your member of Parliament. Find out where his or her office is and make sure you report your feelings on the goods and services tax.

All weekend I heard: "Well, if 80 per cent of Canadians are against it, how can it pass?" It is a very real thing in our parliamentary system that we have a government which has a majority and the majority is going to pass this bill.

We have heard why it is a simple tax and why there are no other alternatives the government has wanted to look at, and I will get to those alternatives if I have a minute. I tell the Canadian people that a majority means that regardless of the feelings of constituents the government is going to pass this 7 per cent tax. I can only say to Canadians, get on the phone, go visit your MP's office by tomorrow night at six o'clock, and register your concern in their offices, at their desks.

Ms. Clancy: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): That is your last chance—except of course in the next election. It can easily be done at that time but it is better to do it now so that the tax is not put into place.

Ms. Clancy: The electorate will remember.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): What are the alternatives? The government could have kept the federal sales tax, or it could have done away with it as people have said. It could have used the our income tax system as it is today by increasing the income tax levels of the three groups. But the government does not want to do that. It wants to bring in a 7 per cent consumption tax, a regressive tax. It could have gone to the single tax—as my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has said—which has a lot of support across Canada from both businesses and economists. It could have closed existing loopholes, such as changing the capital cost allowance, as I have said before, so that it reflects a true replacement cost. It could tax real capital income including capital gains.

At least these would be affecting the higher income earners rather than the lower income and the poor people of Canada. It could have gone after the business meals and entertainment deduction that tax specialists have said is a big loophole, a billion dollar loophole and growing.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that my time is ending and that I have two minutes.

I want to get very parochial because as a maritimer, as an Atlantic Canadian, a Canadian coming from the eastern part of Canada, there are other things that this tax does. It will affect our tourism trade.

Ms. Clancy: Will it ever!

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Yes, they can get a refund as they leave the country, but 7 per cent on top of everything else is very negative to tourists coming to Canada. It is certainly a better thing for the Canadians to go to the United States and not have to pay the 7 per cent on the goods and services there. I am sure there will be an exchange of tourism, but we will be going to the United States to buy instead of paying the tax here.

The other thing it does is to put a negative on transporting goods from the east to the Ontario market. We are going to have to add on an additional 7 per cent to our transportations costs, which in light of some of the things that have happened in the past few months, have gone up.

• (1810)

I know that my time has run out. I thank you for your endurance. I would only say that I think the government should reflect hard and long before bringing this bill in for third reading tomorrow. I think that the people in Canada should get busy and tell their representatives that they have a majority and they are abusing it.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to participate in this debate today because I think it is important that we set this particular item in the context of what the government has been doing for the last several years.

We know that one of the difficulties facing Canada is that we may not be competitive down the road. If we look at what this government has tried to do over the last five and a half years, most of those actions have been designed to make Canada a competitive country so we could enjoy the social programs that we all desire.

Take for example, the Foreign Investment Review Act.

Ms. Clancy: Take it, please!

Mr. Winegard: People said: "You have got to watch that. Don't let any of that foreign money in."

Ms. Clancy: We've sold the country. Let it go.

Mr. Winegard: FIRA has gone, and the reason FIRA has gone is that we want to make Canada competitive. We welcome foreign capital.

Another example is the National Energy Program. I often hear what a marvellous thing the National Energy Program was for my province of Ontario. We know what damage it did to the west, but it also severely damaged my own province of Ontario. Let me explain. It damaged it because with the cheap energy, lower than world prices, Ontario industry became lazy. Ontario industry did not have to use their heads because they had the option of cheap energy. That was no favour to my province. The National Energy Program was bad for the whole country. That is why we got rid of it, to make Canada competitive.

With the free trade agreement, people wanted to draw the wagons around in a circle. They would prefer to have us trade only interprovincially. They did not want to have us get out and trade with the rest of the world. They said it would cost us jobs, and it would be terrible. The fact is that since it came in, 200,000-odd jobs have been created since January of 1989. Of course, they are not all due to the free trade agreement, but the net result has been positive.

We look at some of the other things that this government has tried to do. With deregulation we are trying to make Canada competitive with the rest of the world, and that is really what the GST is all about. When you have a 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax, a tax that hurts Canadian industry and everyone agrees in this House that that is a bad tax—

Ms. Clancy: Not as bad as the GST.

Mr. Winegard: —then you have to do something about it. When you have 22,000 exemptions to the current federal sales tax, you have to do something about it.

When your exemptions complicate the issue so much that you really do not know which way you are going, left or right, you had better do something about it. When you look at what we have in terms of our exports, every export in this country is penalized because of the current manufacturers' sales tax. The rate is somewhere perhaps between 1 per cent and 3 per cent. People say: "Well, if you are only penalizing your exports by 1 per cent or 3 per cent, what is that?" That represents something between 10 and 30 per cent of the total profit that the exporters are dealing with. That is another reason why you have to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax.

There is a company in Guelph that operates a manufacturing section as well as an import section. The president of that corporation says to me: "Why would you continue with the current system? All you do is penalize me for manufacturing in Canada, because when I move to import things, I do not have to charge on that price for the sales tax, my distribution system, my importing system, and all those things. It is easier for me to import than it is to manufacture, so we have got to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax."

Most people in this House have said over the past few days that they would like to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax. We have had it for 64 years and we all recognize it is doing us damage. We have had the royal commissions and we have had statements by governments over the last 40 years about it but we have not done anything. How long do we go on putting something off that decreases the fundamental thing we need in Canada, namely, being competitive?

That is the thrust of most of the things that this government has tried to do. We are taking one more step in getting rid of those things that get in the way of making Canada a truly competitive trading nation. From all the things that were said during the free trade debate and those things that have been said in this House over the last several days we must enhance our trading position or we will not have the things that Canadians want.

We have got to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax. No one questions that now, not even the members of the opposition but that is where the agreement stops. They would like something different. They say it is a tax that other people do not have.

Ms. Clancy: We did not say we didn't have it; we said we didn't want it.

Mr. Winegard: There are 49 other countries in the world that have this goods and services tax. If this is such a terribly regressive tax why do those other countries manage to do quite well with it?

I heard one of my colleagues on the other side of the House talk about tourism and how bad it is for tourism. You had better tell some of the countries in Europe that. Obviously they do not understand it because their tourism is doing quite well and they all have the goods and services tax. There are 49 other countries, Mr. Speaker, with this tax.

Ms. Clancy: And there are riots in Britain, riots in the streets.

Mr. Winegard: I have heard some of my colleagues on the other side say: "Whack it to them in income tax." They do not understand how much income tax would have to go up if that were done. That would again drive people out of this country, the people who are trying to put their money in to make the country go. I hear them say: "Oh, well, if you would tax the corporations more! Why do you not sock it to the corporations more?" We have done a lot of that over the last several years.

You heard the Minister of State for Finance talking today about the things we have done in terms of removing some of the tax loopholes which were used by corporations. We will continue to look at all those things.

What some of the opposition members really want is to sock the corporations so that they become uncompetitive with the rest of the world.

Mr. Fisher: Tax the poor!

Mr. Winegard: That makes no sense. They want to drive the wealth-makers out. They do not understand how you create wealth. You create wealth by having corporations do new things, make new products and bring more funding into Canada. They do not understand that. All they understand is killing the corporations because they are nice things to attack. Corporations are not really people so you attack the corporations. If we drive the corporations out of Canada then we will not have the wealth that we all want, to have a Canada such as we really want.

I have heard that they want to talk about capital gains. Let's hit all those capital gains. What this government has done is put a limit on capital gains. It has also changed the rate at which capital gains are charged in terms of tax remittance. I do not think we should go any further. If you do not allow people who want to take a risk with their money to have some benefit from that, then you are not going to have the risk-takers in Canada. You will have the people who want to sit on their hands and clip their coupons and that is not going to do us any good. You have to have risk-takers. You do not have risk-takers if you don't let them keep something of what they take the risk for. But no. I know all my colleagues want to share the wealth—I know whose wealth they want to share. They want to share the wealth of the risk-takers and yet they do not want to take the risk themselves.

I have heard about this tax being regressive and terrible. A GST that exempts basic groceries, a GST that exempts residential rents is not a regressive tax when you then give back to the lower-income groups in the form of a tax credit that differential that they are going to have to pay.

• (1820)

One of the things we will do is make sure people apply—

Mr. Fisher: If they apply.

Mr. Winegard: —because we will have the advertising and will put slips in with their Old Age Security envelopes to say: "Please apply to do this". Listen to the beasts when we do. They will say: "You are advertising. You are doing terrible things". We will inform the people of this country about what they need to do to have their tax credit.

Mr. Fisher: So will we.

Mr. Winegard: They are already getting their tax credit and they will get a larger one. So this tax is not, I repeat, not a regressive tax.

Some people tell me that the 13.5 per cent will not come off. They are living in a different world than I am. The competition that is coming from the free trade agreement, the competition coming from Europe '92 will ensure that corporations which do not take it off will not be in business. It will be as simple as that. But we also have the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs doing its very best to ensure that people are notified if the tax does not come off.

Ms. Clancy: John Diefenbaker would not like this tax.

Mr. Winegard: I have spoken to both the President of General Motors and the President of Ford. They can hardly wait until this is law so they can reduce their prices. That is exactly what they want to do, so they can compete better with others.

Mr. Fisher: So they can reduce their costs.

Mr. Winegard: As the Prime Minister said the other day: "We could take the easy way out. We could take the way out that every government has done for years, do nothing." We do not intend to do that. We intend to make Canada a competitive country. This is one more block in our story to do that.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in the debate on the amendments that are before us, most of which were put to this House by our finance critic, the member from Gloucester. The hon. member has worked very diligently, not just on behalf of the members of this caucus, but on behalf of all Canadians, in trying to show this government the folly of its ways in this piece of political nonsense called the goods and services tax.

This particular group of amendments that have been put in this piece of legislation should be worthy of considerable debate. They were worthy of considerable debate in the committee studying this piece of legislation.

Once again, I find myself rising and speaking on behalf of over 80 per cent of Canadians. I think it is probably 87 per cent today. We know it is at least 85 per cent. If you take 100 and take the 15 per cent of Canadians who now support the Conservative party, you are left with at least 85 per cent that do not. I would suspect that those 85 per cent have seen the error of the ways of this government and have decided that they can no longer support it no matter where they live in this country because of the government's arrogant fiscal policies it has tried to foist upon the Canadian public.

The debate tonight on these amendments is limited. We know the Canadian public wants to see a full and thorough debate on this piece of legislation. This piece of legislation is singularly the most unpopular piece of legislation ever foisted upon the Canadian public by its own government. It is a crazy piece of legislation. The government will see the next time it goes to the electorate that it will pay the price for not listening to the Canadian public.

In the report stage of this legislation, we have seen the government do what it has done at every stage of debate on this legislation. It has imposed time allocation. This government has imposed time allocation, over and over and over again, for fear that the more opposition members stand up here and speak on behalf of the majority of Canadians, the 85 or 87 per cent that are saying no to this GST, that there will be more members opposite who will wake up and smell the roses, listen to their constituents and do what they are elected to do, namely, to represent the views and interests of their constituents.

We have already seen what happens when you have freedom of thought and free expression on the other side. You get kicked out of certain rooms and certain caucuses to sit by yourself.

I want to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this particular piece of legislation that we are debating at report stage today is a piece of legislation that Canadians have decided must not, and will not, go through.

I have travelled this country from coast to coast. On one particular day I stood at the ferry terminal in Dartmouth on the Atlantic Ocean and saw over 2,000 individuals who told me that they wanted me to come to this place and tell this government "no" to this goods and services tax.

That very afternoon I was in the city of Calgary—Tory country. I talked to people in Calgary who had never voted anything but Progressive Conservative in their lives. They told me that they would never, ever, vote—their right arm would fall off before they would vote—for these people opposite because they felt betrayed. They felt betrayed because this government had put a policy in effect or tried to called the goods and services tax, which is completely contrary to their wishes, and what they said was completely contrary to even Tory philosophy.

Later that afternoon I was in downtown Vancouver. There, I stood shoulder to shoulder with Canadians from various parts of British Columbia who were collecting names on a petition, to try to show this government the folly of its ways, to say no to the goods and services tax, but this government has not yet listened.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, after the government picked up the paper today and saw that it is the most unpopular government in the history of this country, it is going to have to start listening to Canadians.

The goods and services tax is not the only bad piece of fiscal policy that this government has tried to foist upon Canadians. This is perhaps the straw that broke the proverbial camel's back. In the last number of years we have seen a government that talked about tax fairness, sacred trust, and social policy over and over again, flip-flop on its positions on fiscal and social policy.

Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that this is the government that partly de-indexed the old age pensions. I saw the Deputy Prime Minister in the Chamber a few minutes ago. He was the very man who stood up and said that the government supported a strong national railway from coast to coast. These are the very people who have dismembered our national railway from coast to coast in this country. They destroyed the national railway system when they dismembered VIA Rail.

This is the government that talked such a good game about regional development. The Prime Minister made much to do about nothing—now we find out—when he announced $1.05 billion for ACOA. Subsequent to that and subsequent to November, 1988, we saw this government completely withdraw its support and commitment. It is an age-old commitment that governments in Canada have given to regional development.

We have seen a government which has mismanaged not just the fisheries— I get up all the time, as do my colleagues, trying to shake some sense into those people opposite about the fisheries—but it has also mismanaged its agricultural sector into a state of complete chaos and collapse.

This is the government that talked about how consensus-building could work. This is the very government that went and told the poorest provinces of this country that they could not get what it expected from Established Programs Financing; the very funds that provinces like Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island rely on for their national standards; for post-secondary educational institutions and health care. This is the government that did that.

This is the government that in the last budget lost all sense of propriety and withdrew funding that subsequently shut down women's centres from coast to coast in this country. This is the very government that used to have its Minister of State for Indian and Northern Affairs stand up and talk about all the wonderful things it was doing for aboriginal communities. Yet in this budget it cut the very funding for Native Friendship Centres from coast to coast.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): And newspapers.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): This is the government that has come forward and devastated veterans programs. There is nothing sacred any more. Everybody and every group is a target. This government does not know where to stop in its crazy pursuit of trying to get hold of its fiscal house because it does not know where it is heading and it does not know where it is coming from.

These are the very people that were telling seniors: "No, you are not the senior veterans who need those special programs for veterans affairs to help with their cleaning in the house". It is telling them now: "You must bear a disproportionate share of the burden that we have created as a Conservative government when we doubled your national debt between 1984 and 1989".

This is the very government that said it had a spending commitment, a spending priority, and that the funds were committed for a national system of child care from coast to coast in the country. The day after the electorate put its faith in this government, it flip-flopped and decided that it was not going to have a national child care program.

This is the government that went in 1984 to the Canadian electorate and said to those men and women who serve and have served this country greatly in international defence forces that it supported the national armed forces of the country and that it recognized the commitment of those men and women. The government came into this Chamber with a White Paper on defence and, as soon as the electorate got suckered into giving it another term in office, it completely gutted the White Paper. It closed bases from coast to coast.

Not only that, but how many times in debate did we hear about the Polar 8 ice-breaker? It was on, and then it was changed. Then it was modified, and then it was put off. Not even the protestations of the member for Capilano—Howe Sound, who is the Associate Minister of National Defence, and the tears she could cry, could show the government the error of its ways. It cancelled that program as well.

On 33 occasions the government has come into this place and raised taxes for Canadians. It came in with a goods and services tax that it pretends is going to be revenue neutral. It pretends it is going to be simple. It pretends it is going to be fair. It pretends it is going to be single tiered.

The Prime Minister, when he is faced with 85 per cent opposition and 15 per cent standing in the polls, shows his typical arrogance in standing in the House, I believe he did it today, and saying: "Well we know that we are doing the right thing. What counts is what the votes are on election day."

What is going to count for the Prime Minister is what he is going to do after the next election outside politics. The Canadian people have placed their trust in this government's capabilities to manage the affairs of the country and to live up to their promises for the last time. The history books will record that the goods and services tax, this regressive tax, this assault on the wallets of the Canadian taxpayers, was the final nail in the coffin of the Mulroney government.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the debate today.

The member who just spoke talked about how he was going to talk about all those amendments that members of the Liberal Party has proposed to this legislation so that they could improve it because they did not like it. He talked about everything but, and I guess that is why he is called the member from Dartmouth: because he has used his mouth to dart all over the place but he did not talk about the legislation itself. I find that rather disturbing because I think he should have.

Not only did he not talk about the legislation that is in front of us today, but I listened to other members make their pitches on the legislation. They said what they like about it and what they did not like about it. Again, we have had some very good comments from some members of the House and some comments that are, if I might say, misleading from others.

This morning before I came to Ottawa I met with a group of seniors in my riding. There were about 25 of them. They probably reflect many of the same opinions as many seniors across Canada. They reflected opinions based on information that had been given to them to a degree by people in opposition who chose to give them the wrong information. Therefore, naturally, there are 85 per cent of Canadians opposed to it. I am surprised, with the information out there from those in opposition, that it is not 90 per cent or 95 per cent of Canadians opposed to the legislation.

I watched the debates here in the House. I would like to give you some examples, Mr. Speaker, of some of the things that have been said.

The member for Hamilton West chastised the government because the legislation did not require visibility of the tax. I take it he is not upset with the 7 per cent. He is not upset with all the contents of the tax. He just does not like it because it is not visible. Either he has not read the legislation or he needs an explanation.

I will give him the explanation so that he can very clearly understand what the legislation states. In fact Bill C-62 requires that the vendor—the store or shopkeeper, the business or whoever—must clearly indicate to the purchaser that the tax is included in its price. It must indicate 7 per cent in a sign or some mechanism somewhere in the store or, second, the actual amount of the tax has to be shown. That is in the legislation, and it is exactly opposite to the comments being expressed by that member. What that member wants us to do is: he wants us to go to the small business community, that community that he feels his party supposedly represents, that community that Mr. Bulloch represents, and force all those small businesses, those small mom and pop shops, those people who have small cash registers, to buy new cash register equipment. He wants us to force them to buy new point of sale equipment. He wants us to force them to go to IBM and buy those deluxe computers that really are not necessary because under our system of GST, under the legislation that we have, we are allowing businesses some freedom to indicate to their customers exactly how the tax is being applied.

That is a government that listens. That is a government that cares. That is certainly more than what the Liberals do. The Liberals talks a great show until they get to perform in office, and we know what happened when they performed in office. During election campaigns they say one thing and, lo and behold, after the election campaign is over they are doing exactly the opposite. They govern by public opinion polls. The end result is that we had a $38 billion deficit because they promised everything that every person wanted. They did not care about where the money was coming from.

I am happy to say that I am a member of the government that does care. The essence of visibility is there in the legislation.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie rose in this House and claimed that music lessons would be taxed at 7 per cent. I am not necessarily going to say that he was totally wrong, because if somebody out there somewhere wants to take lessons on how to play the spoons or a washboard, yes, those things will probably be taxed. If you want to take formalized lessons, if you want to take lessons as part of a conservatory of music, things that lead to various grade levels of education in music, all those lessons are tax exempt. Did the member say that?

In my constituency there are not many people taking lessons on how to play the spoons or the washboard or some other beautiful instrument that the hon. member thinks is taxable, but I have an awful lot of constituents, whether they be children or adults, who are taking those conservatory music lessons, and they will not be taxed. That is not what the member for Sault Ste. Marie said.

This morning in my meeting with the seniors in my riding they talked about the tax on cable TV companies. They have been told that the tax on the cable TV fees is going up 7 per cent. Yes, there will be a 7 per cent GST levied on cable TV bills. I note that the same member for Sault Ste. Marie made comment about the fact that cable TV services will be going up 7 per cent. What he did not say in his presentation was that the 11 per cent communication tax was being removed. If you want to start making comparisons, I think you have to give all the information.

The fact of the matter is that the information he did not give was that the communication tax was coming off; 11 per cent off and 7 per cent on. In the math that I was taught it tells you that you are 4 per cent better off. In Sault Ste. Marie that might be different.

We had the member for South West Nova carry on with a great presentation. She talked about the federal sales tax, that it is only on some goods. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you know that when you go and buy a head of lettuce in the store, or whether you buy fish that were caught by some fisherman in Newfoundland, some lumber from British Columbia, some agricultural products from people here in Ontario or a car that was produced in Ontario, there are taxes on all those things. The list goes on. She says it is only on some products when literally everything in this country has the federal sales tax. Of course the member for South West Nova did not want to say that. She wanted to ignore that particular comment.

Mr. Thompson: Ignorance is bliss.

Mr. Soetens: The member for Egmont made terrible comments about the poor farmers of this country and how they are going to be hurt by this tax. Again, it is very easy not to use all the information available, which is how members of the opposition operate.

Farmers and all the products of farming and fishing as a matter of fact have been zero rated. They will get back the taxes that are applied in the cost of their production. We have listened to farmers and their concern about cash flow. We have put in place a system whereby they can get a listed exemption and not have to pay the tax on those listed items. We listen to farmers. That is more than this group to the left is doing. All it does is talk, talk, talk. It certainly does not listen to farmers.

• (1840)

I had the same experience this morning when senior citizens said: "Our phone bills are going up. You are now going to tax us more on our phone bills". Yes, the GST will apply on the phone bill, but the 11 per cent communications tax will not apply on the long distance charges. That tax is being removed.

There are a whole bunch of things which the opposition members choose not to share with the consumers at large. This will be good for them.

I would have thought that some members would have put some positive amendments, like the hon. member from Mississauga did. He put some amendments dealing with horse racing and the various agricultural communities affected by that. Where are these members and why are they not speaking about how good that amendment is? We are going to assist some 80,000 people involved in the horse racing and horse side of the agricultural business. Why are they not saying that that is a good amendment and that they are going to vote for it? No, they are not here talking about that either. All they are talking about is the negatives.

Another amendment that they could be talking about is the one that I have put, Motion No. 88, which talks about confectionery products and how we are trying to make the tax fairer. I put that amendment because I think it would be fairer for that particular sector of the economy.

Did opposition members put any of those amendments? Is there some sector of the economy that they are particularly concerned about and feel is being negatively affected by the GST? Where are their amendments? Their attitude is just to cancel the GST. We know the FST is falling apart, so what is left? Well I guess the deficit goes up.

That is the Liberal attitude on everything. The last time that party was in office, it took the deficit from zero to $38 billion. That is the way it operates. If it had another chance, I would hazard to say it would take it from its current $28 billion—and fortunately by the time it gets a chance we will have it down to $15 billion—and run it right back up again.

I am happy to say that I am here in support of this legislation. I am a member of a government which has some policies, which has a direction, which has the interests of the Canadian people at heart, and which is making decisions which need to be made, unlike the government that preceded us which did not make any decisions that needed to be made. That government just made decisions which were popular.

Popular decisions are good at certain times of the year, until you have a $38 billion deficit. Even at that point, that government was not prepared to deal with that decision.

I do not have any problem supporting this legislation. I do not have any problem supporting some of the amendments because they are wise, but unfortunately opposition members chose not to put any amendments that would enhance the legislation. They simply put amendments which in their minds would cancel it. They do not suggest what else would happen.

I take it that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I could go on. I am sure I have convinced—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member of Okanagan—Shuswap.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I understand my comments are limited to two minutes because of a time restriction. Is that correct?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Two minutes.

Mr. MacWilliam: Jean Colbert, a 17th century French statesman, once said that the art of taxation consists of plucking the goose so as to obtain the most feathers with the least amount of hissing.

While this and previous governments have returned again and again to pluck yet a few more feathers, our Canadian goose has traditionally protested little. It would honk about and flap a little bit just to let the government know that it would not be taken for granted, but the protest was generally short-lived and soon forgotten, until now.

The government's proposed goods and services tax has changed all of that. The requisite honks of protest from our Canadian goose have turned into a terrified squall as it fights being throttled in the process of being plucked.

There is a fundamental change taking place across this land in response to this Tory tax tragedy. People from St. John's to Victoria are telling this government that enough is enough. They are angry and they are ready to take action. They are no longer willing to roll over and submit quietly to this government's repeated assaults upon Canadians.

In my very limited time I do not intend to stand here under any illusions that my brief comments will change this—

Mr. Speaker: It being 6.45 p.m., pursuant to the order made in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78, on Thursday, April 5, 1990, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on Motion No. 90.

Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, why you are only reading Motion No. 90. I think there are other motions previous to this that were on debate at this time and which could be put to the House. Motion No. 90 covers a whole series of others as a result of a decision made by the House some days ago.

Mr. Speaker: The reason is that in the ruling that was given earlier a vote on Motion No. 90 applies to Motion Nos. 1 to 11, 31 to 36, 39 to 55 and 57 to 85.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: I am not questioning the Speaker's reasons. I take it that members will be asked to pronounce themselves on Motion Nos. 1 to 11, 31 to 36, 39 to 55, 57 to 85 and 90, which are grouped for debate. A vote on No. 90 applies to these previously mentioned motions.

I did not hear the Speaker putting those motions in debate as of now. I am asking why is it only Motion No. 90 is before the House rather than the grouping that I just referred to. That is my point.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will of course want to know that I have considered what he said.

All those other motions were moved and put to the House. I think if the hon. member goes back and looks at the ruling that the Speaker made he will see that the ruling was clear and that Motion No. 90 would cover all those when it came time to vote. I do not think at the moment that it is necessary for the Chair to put all those motions again.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, my difficulty, and one that all members in this House have at this time, is that there is no doubt that the motions were put for debate and that Motion No. 90 was in front of the House. I do not quarrel with that. I have your decision on Bill C-62, Mr. Speaker. There are 90 motions and amendments set down on the Notice Paper and I could go on and read it.

I am trying to draw attention to the fact that there is only a need now to put all those motions that are indeed before the House. I can go back, and I will get my research staff to send me the precedents. I have them. I thought that every motion would be put at this time, Motion Nos. 1 to 90, including the groupings, and then the only question before the House at that time would be on Motion No. 90. All the other motions have to be put. Otherwise, it is not in my view a procedure that I can understand.

• (1850)

We debated that, but now the question is being put on those. That is a different matter all together. Debate is followed by questions on the usual procedure before the House.

Mr. Speaker: I have consulted with table officers, and I think that my original view is correct.

The fact of the matter is that if one takes a look at the ruling, as well as the practice, one will see the appropriate thing to do now is to put Motion No. 90 to the House. That may or may not be deferred, but it is not appropriate now to redo what has, in effect, already been done.

I think in view of the fact that there has been a question of order raised I should ask the question again.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved:

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-62 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out lines 4 to 27 at page 9.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. You are putting the other motions to the House, Motions No. 14, 15 and 16 since they are grouped for debate. Is that correct?

Some Hon. Members: He is on Motion No. 12.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can help the hon. member.

I read: Mr. Nystrom moved:

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-62 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out lines 4 to 27 at page 9.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, to avoid confusion could we have Standing Order 65 apply tonight, and every time you put the motion in English we could have it also in French. The people would find it easier to follow, and all of us would understand what we are doing.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, we have a long evening ahead of us and I am afraid your voice may not last with all of this reading. Voters may not know that every member in this Chamber has all of these motions, in both languages, sitting on their desks and they can read them for themselves.

I am wondering, because the House of Commons costs about $250,000 an hour to run, whether or not they would like to save the taxpayers of the country about $250,000 and simply let you read the motions and let us vote on the motions without going through the kind of detail that does not add much to the understanding.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting proposal of my hon. friend, but if he had the real concern of the taxpayers of Canada at heart he would withdraw the legislation and we could close this down right now.

• (1910)

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member for Calgary West that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has invoked the order and, unless there is consent to dispense, I am bound to follow it.

Mr. Hawkes: On a point of order, I want to assure you that from the government members you have that consent.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the hon. member for Calgary West that I was quite sure of that. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, we could go on with this debate but I think we started at 6.45 tonight and if we proceed as we are doing, pretty well, we might get through this evening early. But if the Whip and government members start rising on this kind of superfluous points of debate, then we may get into it.

The fact is they were thoroughly confused. As a matter of fact, they voted for our amendments at the beginning. They said "yes", Mr. Speaker, to a whole series of our amendments and I think they should get their act together.

Mr. Speaker: I think both sides and the Speaker probably have got our act together now. What was put forward by the hon. member for Calgary West was a suggestion. It is not the first time suggestions have been put forward during votes in order to hurry them along but without consent your Speaker is bound by the rule which has been quite properly invoked.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved:

That Bill C-62 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out lines 27 to 43 at page 134, lines 1 to 46 at page 135 and lines 1 to 7 at page 136.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West) moved:

Motion No. 23

That Bill C-62 be amended in Clause 12

(a) by striking out line 8 at page 139 and substituting the following therefor:

"Division VI,"

(b) in the French version by striking out lines 33 to 35 at page 139 and substituting the following therefor:

"VI, le ministre est réputé, pour l'application de cette section, lui avoir versé à ce moment un"

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved:

Motion No. 24

That Bill C-62 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out lines 24 to 48 at page 146.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I want to bring to the attention of hon. members that there is a certain amount of exchange of opinions across the Chamber.

An Hon. Member: Insults would be a better word.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I heard one member say that "insults" would be a better word. I would not want to pursue it but I do point out to hon. members that while this ordinary exchange is taking place without members having the floor, they may be drowning out for the public the very important matters that the Speaker is reading to the House.

[Translation]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76 (8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

[English]

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This amendment was put by me and there is slight error in line 2 on page 1990. In the French version I would like to change the word "d'une", where it says "dans le cadre d'une activité" to "de son activité". I would ask for the permission of the House to make that change.

Some Hon. Members: No.

• (1920)

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the hon. member that there is not consent.

The hon. member on the same point of order.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you could advise me who did not give consent. I have always supported, through statements in this House, the linguistic duality of this House. Since my mother tongue is English, I would only ask that my mother tongue be given precedence and that the necessary amendments be made later on.

Mr. Speaker: It is up to the House whether or not the House will accept the changes the hon. member has asked for.

The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member from Mississauga wants to explain to the House and if the House wants to revert back to debate and indeed debate Motion No. 19, we would be more than pleased to hear him out. But unless there is a special procedure at hand here, I cannot see how one could amend a bad bill. Withdraw the motion. Withdraw the bill.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow on the comments of the House Leader for the Official Opposition and suggest that we, too, would be willing to reopen debate, as long as it is debate on this clause and every other clause. But this is a bad bill and we will not accept any amendments whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker: Well, in the interests of the public who may be wondering what we are doing here, I just want to advise that we have considered the wording en français "dans le cadre d'une activité commerciale" against the suggested change, "dans le cadre de son activité". I have taken some advice on it and I do not think it is going to make any significant difference in the law.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West) moved:

Motion No. 19

That Bill C-62 be amended in Clause 12

(a) by striking out lines 20 to 39 at page 95 and lines 1 to 32 at page 96 and substituting the following therefor:

"188. (1) Where a commercial activity of a registrant (other than a registrant to whom subsection (5) applies) consists of taking bets or conducting games of chance and, in the course of that activity, the registrant pays an amount of money in a reporting period as a prize or winnings to a bettor or a person playing or participating in the games, for the purpose of determining an input tax credit of the registrant, the registrant shall be deemed to have received in the reporting period a taxable supply of a service for use exclusively in the activity and to have paid, in that period, tax in respect of the supply equal to the tax fraction of the amount of money paid as the prize or winnings.

(2) Where, in the course of an activity that involves the organization, promotion, hosting or other staging of a competitive event, a person gives a prize to a competitor in the event,

(a) the giving of the prize shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Part, not to be a supply;

(b) the prize shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Part, not to be consideration for a supply by the competitor to the person; and

(c) tax payable by the person in respect of any property given as the prize shall not be included in determining any input tax credit of the person for any reporting period."

(b) by adding, immediately after line 45 at page 96, the following:

"(5) Where a registrant who is a prescribed registrant throughout a reporting period makes taxable supplies of rights to play or participate in games of chance, the following rules apply:

(a) the registrant may claim an input tax credit for the period equal to the amount, if any, by which

(i) the total tax (other than tax that the registrant is deemed under this Part to have collected) in respect of all supplies made by the registrant that became collectible in the period exceeds

(ii) 7 percent of the total of all amounts each of which is

(A) consideration that became due in the period, or that was paid in the period without becoming due, for a supply of property or a service made to the registrant, or

(B) an amount (other than consideration included in clause (A) in any reporting period) paid in the period by the registrant to or for the benefit of a person where the amount is or would be, if the person were resident in Canada, required under section 6 of the *itIncome Tax Act*ro to be included in the income of that person from an office or employment;

(b) tax that became payable, or that was paid without becoming payable, in the period by the registrant in respect of supplies made to the registrant shall not be included in determining any rebate under section 259 or any input tax credit (other than an input tax credit determined under section 193) of the registrant for any reporting period during which the registrant is a prescribed registrant;

(c) any property or service acquired in the period by the registrant shall be deemed to have been acquired for use exclusively in activities other than commercial activities of the registrant; and

(d) the registrant shall be deemed not to increase, in any reporting period during which the registrant is a prescribed registrant, the extent to which any capital property of the registrant is used in commercial activities of the registrant."

Motion No. 86

That Bill C-62 be amended in the Schedule by striking out section 5 at page 323 and substituting the following therefor:

"5. A supply made by a public sector body of an admission in respect of a place of amusement at which the principal activity is the placing of bets or the playing of games of chance, where

(a) the administrative functions and other functions performed in operating the game and taking the bets are performed exclusively by volunteers; and

(b) in the case of a bingo or casino, the the game is not conducted in premises or at a place, including any temporary structure, that is used primarily for the purposes of conducting gambling activities.

5.1. A supply made by a charity or non-profit organization (other than a prescribed person) of a right to play or participate in a game of chance (other than a prescribed game of chance).

5.2. A supply of a service that is deemed under section 187 of the Act to have been supplied

(a) by a charity or non-profit organization (other than a prescribed person); or

(b) where the service is in respect of a bet made through the agency of a pari-mutuel system on a running, trotting or pacing horse-race."

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the previous ruling, Motions Nos. 19 and 86 are grouped together for the purpose of debate. The vote on Motion No. 19 will also apply to Motion No. 86.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved:

Motion No. 25

That Bill C-62 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out lines 30 to 41 at page 148 and lines 1 to 29 at page 149.

Some Hon. Members: No.

• (1950)

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As we all know in the House, our pages are first-year university students and they are in the middle of their exam week. I wonder if the House would be so disposed to allow our pages to go home so that they can keep up with their studies?

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion, is there consent?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion was certainly made in the right spirit. Perhaps we could hold off making a decision until we have some consultations. There is some question that perhaps there would be a need for one or two of the pages. I am sure we can come to some accommodation.

Mr. Speaker: After some consultation has taken place, perhaps the House could advise the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Negatived on division.

Motion No. 88 negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I seek clarification on Motion No. 88. Did the government vote against that motion?

Mr. Speaker: The ruling is that the motion was negatived on division.

Mr. Riis: On another point of order, Mr. Speaker. In terms of the pages, I think we are all appreciative of the fact that it is pre-exam period. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if there would not be a disposition of the House to give unanimous consent to enable the Chief Page to negotiate with the pages and to keep only a bare skeleton staff on tonight to serve the members.

Mr. Speaker: A few minutes ago the hon. member for Athabasca suggested that the pages leave. There was a suggestion from the hon. member for Kamloops that some discussion take place. The hon. member for Kamloops has made a suggestion. Does it meet with the wishes of the House?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there has not been any discussion. We stand by the original suggestion that all the pages be allowed to go.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered, and with our thanks.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

I think at this point it might be helpful to explain to members and to the public that I will presently be calling in the members to vote. This is a matter of explanation only. There will be a 15 minute bell. Following that there will be votes on all the motions which I have been putting to the House and when that is concluded there will, of course, be one further vote and there may be a bell at that time and that will end the proceedings.

I am obligated to read the following to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

There is a long-standing tradition in the House that when a vote is being taken, members remain in their seats. I have been observing members from all sides of the House, but in particular on the government side, moving out. The member for Mississauga South moved out after being approached by the Deputy Whip.

An Hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Gauthier: Maybe it was an emergency, but I wish members would not move around until we actually see what is going to happen around here. Stay in your places.

An Hon. Member: Wait until the vote and then go to the bathroom.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to support my hon. friend's intervention. It became particularly problematic when the chairman of the finance committee left. It is obviously a reflection of how he plans to vote in the future. That is an encouraging sign.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the House that none of the members who moved, moved before the vote was counted. Or, if they did move—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hawkes: Other members moved at the conclusion of the previous vote and did not vote in the division just taken. It is unlike the behaviour of the opposition, where two New Democrats voted twice in the House on a single division not too long ago and members on that side came in after the motion and voted anyway.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on the same point?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the member for Calgary North clearly left the House before the vote was announced by you. All members saw it. There are a number of others. I must challenge what the member across said because it is simply inaccurate.

Mr. Speaker: Could I have the attention of the House?

Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fifth Edition, citation No. 223, paragraph 2, states very clearly:

> A Member must be in his own seat should he wish to vote and should remain in his seat until the division is complete and the result announced.

I point out that that is a long-standing rule. There is no question about it. It is not for the Chair to intervene unless a point of order has been called. A point of order has been called. There is a reason for the rule. We are in a series of votes, but even if it was only one vote, the rule is to avoid confusion and to add to the efficacy of a democratic vote in this Chamber. I would ask all hon. members to co-operate.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The next question is on Motion No. 14 standing in the name of hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have been waiting patiently for the $1 million mark. At the rate we are taking these votes, if we do not apply some of those completed to future ones, we will be here another four hours at a cost of $1 million to Canadian taxpayers.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hawkes: I am wondering if we might have unanimous consent to save $1 million.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw the bill!

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the government Whip raises a good point, but if he is really concerned about the taxpayers of Canada, the best thing that he could be advised to do is for his government to resign.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, we want to remind the government Whip that while he has been worried about the cost of democracy, and there is never too high a cost to pay for democracy to allow the people of Canada to be heard, in the six votes that have been taken, this government already has approval for some $8 billion worth of GST and we are not going to say yes to rest of it without a fight.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The next motion is on Motion No. 17.

The House divided on the motion which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I think there might be a disposition in the House to ensure that all votes are against the GST given that we have just found out that 2,026,533 Canadians cast their vote against the GST this weekend.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 21 standing in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

[Translation]

I would ask for your attention for a moment, because I hear some Members asking how many votes are still to come this evening.

[English]

For everybody's information, I think I should advise the House that there are eight more votes and then there will be a further vote for concurrence.

The next question is on Motion No. 28 standing in the name of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of tabling, in both official languages, the Order in Council announcing appointments made recently by the government.

Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), these Orders in Council shall be deemed to have been referred to the standing committees listed in appendix.

[English]

While I am on my feet, I move:

That the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I have a very important point of order. This procedure prevents members from tabling petitions. I just wondered if we could get unanimous consent to revert to petitions so that we could table very important petitions dealing with the GST.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

Orders of the day.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The hon. Minister of State.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House today is the result of long and detailed studies and debate. It is a bridge to an equitable and prosperous future. Of course it is a tax, and of course it is unpopular, but it never will be, any more than income tax and all the other taxes introduced over the years. However, when we stop to think and consider the tremendous cost of our social programs and other services that Canadians demand, and rightly so, these taxes are necessary, and this particular tax reform, the GST, is both necessary and timely. Mr. Speaker, there is no future without a certain cost.

If we were to conduct a poll on income tax, I am sure most respondents would say they don't like income tax. Should we abolish income tax? That is the kind of logic or lack of logic being used by the opposition. Opposition members have been telling us, day after day, that the polls show that 80 per cent of Canadians don't like the idea of a tax on goods and services. According to them, Canadians are asking us to abandon this tax reform proposal. Of course, opposition members are playing on these concerns—after all, it is a major reform. People are entitled to express some concern, to have perfectly legitimate questions. However, our proposal is perfectly fair to people of modest incomes, for example, and provides assistance to small businesses in coping with this tax.

So we have answers to these questions but the opposition members, instead of acting responsibly by helping the government restore the nation's finances, take the easy course and use an unpopular tax to embarrass the government. The opposition members forget this great responsibility, especially in the present context when we are at the end of seven years of economic growth, when the economy is slowing down and when we are faced with a national debt and a large deficit that we must fight. Instead of looking for solutions to these problems for which they are largely responsible because of their previous management, they make sport of it. What is easier than asking someone, "Are you for or against a tax? Put your name at the bottom of the page". But what does that prove? It proves nothing. I feel that our responsibilities as members of Parliament go much further.

No tax in the world, Mr. Speaker, has majority support. I saw a similar tax implemented in France, where they talked about a second French revolution, in Spain, where they talked about a major social crisis, and six weeks after the law was passed, these taxes were working very well. We are told that it will be a disaster for the tourism industry. Just see how Canadians rush to Mexico, which has a GST, a value added tax, how they go in great numbers to England, France, Italy, countries where tourism is a very important industry that works well. A balanced tax system does not prevent this—These arguments are based on a fundamental misconception, which the opposition takes pleasure in exploiting to create problems for the government.

But you know, Mr. Speaker, there are times in a government's life when it must make decisions and take initiatives that may be unpopular, I agree, but are necessary for the country's health and well-being. So when an epidemic outbreak becomes a definite possibility the government may have no choice other than prescribe vaccination for everybody. As far as I know people do not particularly care for vaccination, but that just may be necessary to protect the health and even the life of the citizenry. It so happens that economic vaccines are required now and then, and such is the case today with respect to the federal sales tax which Canadians have been paying for almost 64 years and which is nothing short of a virus gnawing at the economy. I am sure most of our colleagues on the other side agree: the current manufacturer's sales tax, ultimately paid by the consumer, simply has to go. It has been identified as a virus and the GST is the vaccine which will help us get rid of it. The existing federal sales tax is a virus against which we must fight because it strikes at the core of our country's future growth and prosperity by stiffling domestic productivity and exports of Canadian made goods.

Mr. Speaker, picture if you will a major industrial country like Canada with its sparsely populated expanses, a country whose survival depends on exports and which is the only industrial nation with a tax structure having such a stupid levy that, on both domestic and international markets, Canadian producers are more handicapped than their competitors. We must do away with this aberration. This virus also undermines our efforts to lower the deficit and strengthen our budgetary process because this tax is an ever growing fester on our tax structure.

At the time of the last budget, as I said, when we increased the manufacturer's sales tax to ensure a certain level of revenue, we knew that by doing so, we were running the risk that businesses would attempt to avoid it. We said: Beware, for in a year from now, we are going to replace the current system with a value added tax system, with the hope that these businesses would not make drastic changes for such a short period of time, because the current tax which concerns only some businesses and applies to 75,000 items with 22,000 exceptions is a tax which is harmful, negative, unbalanced and which encourages evasion. Well, we want to replace it to consolidate the government's basic revenues and help finance the programs which Canadians have every right to expect.

Finally, the current tax is a virus we want to get rid of because its victims are the most vulnerable in our society, because it is a silent killer of jobs, because it destroys the ability of our industries to compete, and because it reduces the productivity of our labour force. It is harmful to our economy in a world where competitiveness is of prime importance and where other economic blocks and countries are not prepared to give us a free ride.

Mr. Speaker, the necessary vaccine against the current manufacturer's sales tax which has been identified as a virus is the goods and services tax. Judging from the reaction we get from the opposition at the mere mention of this tax, we get the impression that the GST is truly an abomination, although 48 modern countries, including many of our main competitors, have implemented a similar tax. Therefore, we cannot be accused of having an overactive imagination. We have looked at other alternatives. We have considered personal income taxes, where the government collects moneys straight from the people's pockets, allowing them little choice, as well as the pros and cons of a consumer's tax. We have accepted the notion that a consumer's tax could be regressive unless accompanied with several measures aimed at protecting those with limited resources.

This tax we are planning to introduce will liberate in some way the economic forces of our country. It is part of a plan this conservative government adopted when it first came to power in 1984 designed to stream line our economy and act as a positive factor to liberate the forces with are found in our businesses in Canada, and I am referring to our labour force. Our exporters and businesses will then be able to compete. It will be a solid basis for eliminating the scourge of the deficit. Our main sources of revenue include income, excise and corporate taxes as well as the leaky and unbalanced manufacturers' sales tax, which encourages evasion, applies only to certain products and creates all sorts of inequalities. By eliminating this tax which is getting increasingly difficult to collect, we will fight the deficit. It will make the Canadian economy stronger by injecting into it $9 billion, particularly in the Atlantic and Western provinces which are quite dependent on the export of natural resources.

By removing these pressures on our economy and releasing these new investments and development incentives that will benefit all Canadians, we will spread the wealth, increase public revenue through income and corporate taxes and thus fight the deficit. Mr. Speaker, this tax will guarantee a more equitable future for the most vulnerable members of our society.

During this long drawn-out debate—I will remind our friends opposite that, in the last campaign, many of my colleagues on this side of the House showed me the paper they published at that time about this reform we were proposing.

We discussed this proposal in detail in our White Paper and in our Budget documents. When pushed to the limit, the opposition has said: Sure, we understand, but we are a federal country and now we will have two levels of sales tax. And when we finished arguing that aspect, they went across the country, saying: Not only the poor will be affected!

From the outset, we said that we wanted to make this a national tax. We discussed the tax with the provinces for two years. We knew right away this reform would not be popular, because in the past 50 years, despite any number of commissions of inquiry and reports, not a single government could bring itself to deal with the problem. Well, Mr. Speaker, we decided to deal with this problem, but the provinces, with a sales tax that was better organized than our present sales tax, could afford to say: Well, we are not going to be very popular if we go along with this. They were more reluctant and were not under the same pressures as we were. Because of the harmful aspects of our present tax, we were in much more of a hurry, and for the time being we have had to start the reform alone, but we are keeping the door open for the provinces, and at the present time, senior level talks are continuing which, I hope, will lead to a genuinely national tax in the future.

Our friends opposite insisted on the status quo. Although they admitted the status quo was unacceptable, they wouldn't budge. They also did everything they could to block the tax reform. This is not new. The Liberal Party always says no. They are against free trade, and they are against tax reform. Every time we ask for cutbacks in government spending to deal with the deficit, they object to these cutbacks which are in the best interests of this country. They object to every single measure we propose. So that is nothing new. Instead of trying to improve the measures we suggest, they have concentrated on building barriers to progress. Improvements had to come from this side of the House, from enlightened members, serious workers, who drew our attention to certain aspects of the bill that could be changed for the better. In fact, we made a lot of changes—more than seventy.

So I think the opposition's attitude is rather—-

An Hon. Member: Negative!

Mr. Loiselle: —is a rather bizarre joke, Mr. Speaker.

An Hon. Member: Negative!

Mr. Loiselle: There is a great deal of irony in all this. We have our friends in the New Democratic Party, normally great believers in democracy who have been fighting for a long time for abolition of the Senate. They are now prepared to create one more obstacle by asking the non-elected Senate to reverse the government's democratic process. Imagine, a party that calls itself democratic! It's like countries in Eastern Europe that were literally democratic in name only.

Some Hon. Members: That's true!

Some Hon. Members: Shame, comrades!

Mr. Loiselle: When you have to—Imagine a party that calls itself democratic, as in the German Democratic Republic! Some democracy, Mr. Speaker!

Some Hon. Members: Shame, comrades!

Mr. Loiselle: —a party that has a cordial entente with non-elected members to obstruct the efforts of a government elected by a solid majority of Canadians. That is really show biz, Mr. Speaker!

An Hon. Member: They are still hamming it up!

Mr. Loiselle: And what about the Official Opposition? If what the New Democratic Party does is show business, Mr. Speaker, members of the Official Opposition are a bunch of actors being manipulated by the other place.

What I see before me is a real wasteland. No proposals except for general remarks such as: Soak the rich, vague remarks like that! We would like to introduce massive reform, but when you are in the government, you have to govern, and it is the Liberal Party's failure to do so which has put the finances of this country in the abysmal situation we see today—-

An Hon. Member: For 20 years!

Mr. Loiselle: —and we are now trying to get the country out of this situation by making difficult decisions that are both courageous and necessary.

Members on the benches opposite are offering Canadians a bunch of illusions. They are talking about a tax on luxury items, a tax on this and a tax on that. I think it is rather disconcerting to hear our opposition colleagues talking about the tax system. They would have Canadians believe that there are simple, straightforward and painless solutions to the problems associated with the present sales tax.

According to our New Democratic Party friends, all we have to do is make the corporations and the rich pay more. Actually, what they are suggesting would have a very severe impact on small and medium-size businesses and the middle-class. They are the ones who are now exempt.

• (1210)

Mr. Langdon: It is up to you to do it.

Mr. Loiselle: Moreover, this reform, this approach, would add a tax burden to corporations, which would pass it on to consumers in the end. Unfortunately, they do not understand how the economy works. They are back at the time when bankers wore black coats and top hats and had fat cigars in their mouths, as we saw when we were children in rather naughty books that often came from eastern Europe. But the world has evolved.

For example, the New Democratic Party proposed alternatives. How daring! They proposed a royal commission of inquiry on the tax system. What imagination! After 50 years of study, royal commissions, parliamentary reports and so on, the New Democratic Party wants another royal commission of inquiry. How ridiculous can you get, Mr. Speaker! Now is the time for decisions. Although ridiculous, the NDP position is at least open. We cannot say as much about the tactics and approach of the Liberal Party, which cannot tell the difference between cleverness and sneakiness. They have had trouble with that for a long time. We hear the leaders or would-be leaders each giving their own solutions: One would abolish the GST, another would not, one will see after, another will see before, a third one will see in the meantime.

Mr. Saint-Julien: They see nothing.

Mr. Loiselle: Meanwhile, we see how they ran the country in the past, bringing it into an extremely difficult financial situation.

We have to be wary of the Liberal Party's tricks. We remember when they told us, "Wage and price controls? Never!" right in an election campaign.

Mr. Saint-Julien: We remember that.

Mr. Loiselle: A few months later, the Liberal government implemented a system of wage and price controls. The Liberal Party told us, right in the middle of an election campaign, that they would never impose an 18-cent tax on gasoline. We know what the Liberal government did a few months later, and it was not just 18 cents—it was a lot more.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Thirty cents, thirty-two cents—

Mr. Loiselle: Today, it is the same party which is saying "not on your life" about the GST. But what does "not on your life" means coming from that side of the House? In the Liberal lexicon, it means "yes, absolutely, but we will not say so before the election". That is why, had it not been for the courage of this government, the Liberals would have dragged their feet because they are unable to face difficult decisions. We are proud to say that this is the difference between them and us.

Fortunately, these difficult and courageous measures will have an impact which may ensure that the Liberal Party will never on your life come again to power!

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the government has stated its position clearly and honestly before the Canadian people. We have taken every opportunity available to us to debate the issue, to answer questions and to provide as much information as possible to Canadians right across the country. We will continue to do so.

It is very important to be attentive to the concerns of Canadian citizens and we are going to do that. We will try to be more efficient. We have told Canadians where we stand. We have shown that we have the courage of our convictions. That is not easy. It does not give glowing results in the public opinion polls, especially when the issues one is dealing with are painful, serious and complex. We will not imitate former Liberal governments which refused to deal with the problems associated with the federal sales tax.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I am quickly coming to the conclusion that most of our Liberal colleagues believe that Canada's national bird is the ostrich, because they keep insisting that we should stick our heads in the sand and pretend that there is no problem. Well, that may be their way of governing, but it is not ours.

In fact, on the question of tax policy, as we have done on so many matters, the members of this government are willing to put their seats on the line. The stakes are high. The existing tax costs Canadians about $9 billion in lost opportunities for growth and investment. What a price to pay to maintain the status quo, but that is exactly what the Liberal Party wants us to do.

As Jonathan Swift once wrote: "There is none so blind as they that won't see." And what about our efforts to reduce the deficit? With a list of 22,000 exemptions to the existing sales tax, which list is growing year by year, where will we find the revenue to reduce the deficit and ultimately get rid of our $350 billion national debt?

Of course the Liberal party has never worried much about debt. The simple truth is that one way or another we all have to pay our programs and services as well as for efforts to reduce the deficit. Some people would have Canadians believe otherwise. Some people, for example, our colleagues opposite want Canadians to believe that government is Santa Claus.

Mr. Mills: You doubled the debt.

Mr. Loiselle: We are talking about the debt. I will remind the hon. gentleman, a debt of $200 million with a deficit of $38 billion.

Mr. Milliken: How much is it now?

Mr. Loiselle: We did not even have money to pay for Old Age Security. We had to borrow $16 billion when we came in. How could we tackle the debt?

We have reversed that. Now we have a surplus of $9 billion which allows us, finally after many years of good management, to start diminishing this debt. We had to go through that process, that together with fiscal reform is the answer.

But governments have no gifts to give because the money we have comes from the people. In the same way, the national debt is not the government's debt. It is our debt, that is, the debt of every man, woman, and child in this country.

People who try to pretend otherwise might as well be selling snake oil. However, far from selling dreams to Canadians, they are inadvertently selling nightmares, nightmares of growing national deficits and debt, nightmares of shrinking economic activity, nightmares of job losses.

[Translation]

Contrary to our colleagues opposite, we are not trying to impress anybody. Moments of truth are rarely easy or pleasant. They are often unpopular. If Canadians should choose not to listen to or believe the government they will have the choice to turf us out at the next election.

Mr. Langdon: At the very first opportunity.

Mr. Loiselle: Let the people who will be tempted to do so, make no mistake about it. Whomever is in power will have to deal with these issues. Sooner or later, the government will have to find the necessary revenues to maintain our programs and services and reduce the deficit. The government is not proposing this GST because it likes taxes. The ultimate purpose of the GST is to rectify an increasingly complex situation in order to provide Canadian men and women with the best quality of life both now and into the 21st Century.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Our children.

Mr. Loiselle: When we came to power first in 1984, and again in 1988, we made some firm commitments to the Canadian people. Our economic objectives were at the core of these commitments, namely streamlining the government finances in order to protect the security of the most vulnerable in our society and of future generations, while at the same time implementing an economic reform program, including the tax system, with a view to ensuring that Canada may further develop and be better able to face a more intense competition on the world markets.

• (1220)

The GST is one of the cornerstones of this economic program and, now hear this, we will not be sidetracked by any kind of pressure whatsoever. Mr. Speaker, we have listened carefully to the remarks and suggestions about the GST. When we formally introduced our propositions last December, they were the outcome of lengthy discussions and detailed analyses. The bill before us faithfully mirrors the additional improvements and corrections which make me prouder than ever of our legislative measure. It represents a serious and honest effort towards reform. It deserves the support of all those who do make the effort to understand the many faults of our current system, and I hope we can count on them. You did not understand. We do not expect Canadians to like the GST, after all it is a tax. Still I am convinced that most of our fellow citizens will understand that, confronted with difficult problems—

Mr. Saint-Julien: Read this morning's papers.

Mr. Loiselle: —some of which seemed to be practically unsolvable, this government took a serious, responsible and fair approach.

Mr. Gauthier: This is an unfair tax.

Mr. Loiselle: Not at all. Ours will be the most equitable system of the 48 countries that have a similar tax. When time comes to make a decision—

Mr. Gauthier: There is not a federation— None of the Canadian provinces wants this sales tax—

Mr. Loiselle: What has that got to do with it? Sure. But Canada has been under a federal regime for quite some time. We have ten Ministers of Finance, ten Premiers, ten tax systems, if you will. Taxes do exist, this is not a new phenomenon. It is part and parcel of both the complexity and the wealth of our country. Would you have us scrap the provincial systems so we can standardize ours?

Mr. Saint-Julien: Never have you been able to make it visible at 13.5 per cent.

Mr. Gauthier: It is an unfair and hidden tax.

Mr. Loiselle: Anyway, when time comes to pass judgment on this government, Mr. Speaker, I feel confident that our fellow Canadians will be first to admit that we took our responsibilities and stuck to our convictions.

Mr. Gauthier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there would be unanimous consent, in view of the rather shocking speech, the minister just made, to have a couple of questions, even though the Standing Orders do not allow them? I wonder if there would a disposition to let hon. members ask questions of the minister.

An Hon. Member: The answer is no.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. Minister of State (Finance) (Mr. Loiselle) with much interest, because I know he has been looking for quite some time at this government's problem, which is to try and sell Bill C-62, the goods and services tax, to the Canadian people. I have a lot of respect for the minister's hard and arduous work in trying to sell an absolutely unsaleable proposal.

Very interestingly, Mr. Speaker, when I listened to my hon. colleague, he referred to us in opposition as if we were isolated on this whole issue. I find rather regrettable that the minister does not seem to notice the thousands of people from all walks of life, from Quebec and elsewhere, who are constantly telling us they made up their own minds the GST was no good. Admittedly, Mr. Speaker, the hon. colleague may think the dozens of Liberal members from Quebec have done a good job of convincing Quebecers, more than 75 per cent of them, that the GST is no good, because government members from Quebec have remained silent on this matter. The Minister of State (Finance) and a few other people were given the responsibility of discussing the GST on occasion. I think it is particularly disturbing that instead of asking well-informed members, members who by the way they vote in the House have shown that they support the GST, to campaign in all the provinces of this country and explain why the GST is a good deal for Canadians, instead of doing that, the government has decided to spend millions of dollars to try and convince Canadians through the media, instead of through its members, that the GST is a good deal for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, it didn't work. We watch our hockey games, and we see people saying: Hey, Marie, we are going to get a cheque every three months. Fantastic! Who are these people? What is their income? How many children do they have? On what grounds are they saying that these people will get a cheque from the government every three months, starting December 1990? What is behind all this? It's the government's strategy for talking about the present 13.5 per cent tax and never letting its members, who are supposedly convinced of the advantages of the GST, act responsibly and stop talking about Liberals and New Democrats allegedly using scare tactics and misinforming the public. It would be only normal for the government to ask its members to do that, Mr. Speaker! These are the people who are paid to do their job, who say they are convinced, who say they understand the GST. They should be asked to go from door to door and talk to Canada's senior citizens, people in the universities and people responsible for small businesses. In other words, let them do what most members have to do as part of their responsibilities: meet their constituents. And if they do that, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member and his friends to your right will realize that Canadians are sufficiently well-informed about the GST to say: No! We don't want the GST!

[English]

As I listened to my colleague I realized that today we will have to do something which we don't often do in this place, we will have to talk about lies; we will have to talk about cowardice; we will have to talk about misrepresentation; and we will have to talk about the kinds of things the Minister of Finance was talking about in 1988, when he said: "Wilson calls Turner liar, coward, and defends national sales tax plan".

That is what we will have to talk about in this place today. We will have to talk about lies; we are going to have to talk about cowardice; and we are going to have to talk about misrepresentation. We are going to have to make sure that Canadians have an opportunity to decide who is lying and who are cowards—

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: This is terrible! I can't believe my ears!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Terrible? What is so terrible? Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member, and I agree that when Mr. Wilson said to Mr. Turner that he was a liar, that he had no guts—you can see for yourself, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Wilson did not mince words in describing Mr. Turner.

[English]

I want quote again the words of the Minister of Finance when he called John Turner a liar and a coward. Regarding the national sales tax in the 1988 election campaign, we find this report: " Mr. Wilson took pains", undoubtedly it was painful for him, "to play down the effect of his controversial tax proposal on Canadians, saying 'Canadians will not pay one penny of additional tax, as a result of these measures'."

Now we have the Minister of State for Finance saying that this is going to be a deficit reduction tool, that Canadians are not going to pay one penny more, not one penny more. At the same time the hon. Minister of Finance was calling people liars, he was saying that he would not be collecting one penny more from Canadian taxpayers. Let us take a look at the tissue of deception and lies that has taken place in the last seven or eight months. Let us start with the documents of the Department of Finance itself. I think it is very important to take a look at them since my hon. colleagues to your right, Mr. Speaker, get a little nervous. I know they all understand. I know the member for Abitibi has read all of this material produced by the Department of Finance since August of last year. I know the member for Abitibi has looked at it all. I have no doubt about that. It is a simple tax. He being a simple man would understand a simple tax.

• (1230)

What I want to make sure of is that we look not at what the Liberals have have said about this and not what the New Democratic Party has said about it. Let us take a look and see what the Tories have to say about their tax.

The first document I wish to refer to is entitled Goods and Services Tax: Technical Paper issued by the Hon. Michael H. Wilson, Minister of Finance, August 1989. The H incidentally stands for "hold-up", I think. In any case this document of course was a simple document dealing with the tax, just a technical paper.

What the government did was produce this other document which is entitled Goods and Services Tax, an Overview. It was issued by the Minister of Finance in August of 1989.

Mr. Wilbee: It is to make sure that everybody understands it.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): My hon. colleague says we should try to make sure that everybody can understand it. Let us just start anywhere. Where should you start with a document, maybe just by happenstance, but at the beginning. This is what is says on the very first page: "The goods and services tax is an integral part of the government's agenda for securing Canada's economic future. Sales tax reform will achieve three important goals. The GST will contribute to the deficit reduction effort and ensure we can continue to pay for programs and services Canadians value".

Let us look at the very first statement made in this document published in August of last year by the government. "The GST will contribute to the deficit reduction—". However, our friend who calls other people liars, says: "Mr. Wilson took pains to play down the effect of his controversial tax proposal saying Canadians will not pay one penny of additional tax".

This was the Hon. Michael H. Wilson saying: "Not a penny of additional tax". This is the hon. minister saying at the very same time in his document produced in August of last year: "The GST will contribute to the deficit reduction effort". Which is it?

Another thing that went on in this very same paragraph was that the government said that we can continue to pay for programs and services Canadians value. This document was published in August of last year. Let us talk about the programs that Canadians cherish and value.

For example, let us talk about programs to protect women. Maybe someone in the House, like the hon. Minister responsible for the Status of Women, would like to comment on this particular document. The words were: "to continue to pay for programs and services Canadians value". The fact is not only will he not be doing it next year, we are not doing it now. As the hon. Minister responsible for the Status of Women would know, programs have been cut.

Already the first paragraph in this document can be contested very directly on the basis of the minister himself having said: "deficit reduction" and "We are going to continue to pay for programs and services Canadians value".

Let us look at another paragraph on the very first page where it states: "The GST will improve the over-all fairness of the tax system". This is the Tory way to be fair. You collect more money from Canadian taxpayers, but you redistribute it. You go from $18.5 billion, which was projected for 1991, and you collect $22 billion or $23 billion with the 7 per cent tax. I remind hon. members that these documents were produced, of course, at 9 per cent. We want to make sure we do not misrepresent the numbers.

With respect to the notion of fairness that is alluded to in this particular paragraph, go and ask the people who are supposedly going to be helped by the fairness aspect of this system, which I assume refers to the tax credit system. The problem is that the credits are not indexed. What we will have to do is take the minister's word. The minister says: "Well, from time to time, we'll index them". If the intent is from time to time to index and to be fair, why would not the government say: "We'll just index it"? That is the fair way to do it.

Even the hon. chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance understood that. He was very clear in his statements. Many members of the Conservative Party were as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the hon. Minister of State for Finance rising on a point of order?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. critic for the Liberal Party. Much as I would like to listen to the hon. member, I have to leave. I will be reading very thoroughly his intervention, but I have to meet someone from my riding who is being honoured. I apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point. We understand the minister possibly has another place where he wants to be rather than in the House listening to a good speech by the member for Gloucester. We accept the minister may have a prior commitment. We would like to have at least some ministers of the government stay with us while my colleague's speech is going on. It is a highly important speech.

Since the government does not seem to be interested in this debate, maybe we could adjourn the sitting and come back this afternoon when the government members can be in their places.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, while you were listening to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, I was listening to my hon. friend for Abitibi saying that there are eight cabinet ministers in the House. That is indicative of how Tories count.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I know the hon. minister is worth a lot of ministers. There are two here, to be generous, and it is nice to have them here.

I want to refer again to the document produced since it will take some time to get through the process that the government set forth to be able to come forward with its goods and services tax. Again referring to the overview that was produced in August 1989 by the government, it states on the first page: "In addition to improving the over-all fairness of the tax system, lower and modest income Canadians will be better off once the GST is in place".

As I indicated, in 1988 the Minister of Finance took some pleasure in calling the Leader of the Liberal Party a liar. I can only state—and obviously we are not attributing this particular statement to any one person; it is a government document—that that is certainly a lie. Lower and modest income Canadians will not be better off once the GST is in place. Some may be, but not all, and that is the lie.

The studies produced by Pat Grady of Global Economics and by Neil Brooks both clearly indicate that the distributional aspects of the GST that was put forward by the Department of Finance are not accurate and cannot be defended. They say that they are erroneous and flawed. In fact, unlike what is alleged in this document produced by the government, it will not be the case once the GST is in place that low and modest income Canadians will be better off. It will mean that over half of Canadians, members of families earning under $30,000, will be no better off or worse off. This is in complete contradiction to what the government alleged in August of last year.

There are differing views on what it means for families to be better off. Some will be marginally better off. Others will be marginally less well off, but a number will be affected negatively. The Minister of Finance and the Department of Finance have been aware for some time of these figures produced by Pat Grady and by Neil Brooks. They simply said that they are wrong, but the government has not challenged them on the facts.

The government has not challenged them on the basis of the model on which they base their projections. In fact, both Mr. Brooks and Mr. Grady have been very outspoken in their criticism of the methods and the base used by the Department of Finance to arrive at its very optimistic projections which most people, including the people who are going to be affected by this, disagree with.

• (1240)

Poor people know that sending them a cheque every three months will take money out of circulation, while imposing a tax on practically every service that they use and every product that they buy. The Department of Finance and the Department of the National Revenue have no notion of what the implications are in terms of the implementation of this tax for low and middle income people. Just imagine what is going to happen to anybody with less than $30,000 of income.

In order to get these cheques out in December of this year, what is the department going to base its information on? Is it going to take numbers out of the air or just conjure up a number? No. It is going to go to a data base. What is that data base going to be? What is the information going to be?

It is going to look at information on a family unit that is already two years' passé. In the case of a family that does qualify the department is going to send a cheque to whoever filled in the income tax return for that family. In this day and age in Canada imagine, first, the changes in family structures that occur year to year. People have had children added to their families. How will one possibly know? Children will have left the family setting. Families will have broken up. There will be divorce, separation, or death. Who is going to handle this and what is the process?

When we asked the officials of the department they told us that they do not know. There is no provision in the legislation before us.

For example, what will happen if the money is paid in excess of what should be paid? Even more important for poor people, what will happen if insufficient moneys are paid because the government was not aware of what the actual family situation was?

Where will the government find these people and how will it keep track of them as they move around? We know what a transient society we have with people moving about. How does a mother with custody of the children go and get the cheque from her spouse who filled in the income tax return the year before? How are we going to deal with poor people and low income people?

The government does not know because it has not looked into it yet. It is more interested in selling the goods and services tax as a tax proposal than it is in dealing with the real problems it is going to create by implementation.

When this document came out there were a lot of other things that were said in it. For example, one of the obvious advantages that the government has been promoting is that it will replace an existing sales tax that is a silent killer of jobs. At the same time that we were being told that, the government was increasing the federal sales tax from 9 per cent when it came to office in 1984, to 10 per cent, to 11 per cent, to 12 per cent, to 13.5 per cent.

All through this period this terrible invisible tax which the government talks about so much now had actually doubled the revenue accruing to the Government of Canada from that tax source. We are talking here about lies and misrepresentations, the way people distort and try to convince Canadians that black is white and good is bad, and that what is going to happen to them with the GST is going to be something to bring smiles to their faces.

Imagine at the same time the government going through a process from 1985 to 1988 and saying that it was creating more jobs in the country than have ever been created before. The government went before the people in 1988 and said: "We have created a million-plus jobs". At the same it had nearly doubled the tax rate, as well as doubled the revenue from this federal sales tax that it now says is a silent killer of jobs. You cannot have it three or four different ways.

I have listened to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance and others talk about the existing federal sales tax. They have said: "Everybody agrees it is a bad tax". That is about the only truthful thing that has been said in this entire debate. Everybody agrees that the existing federal sales tax is a bad tax.

However, this is where the hook is put in. Then we hear people say that for years there have been royal commissions, task forces, and study groups, and they have all recommended this tax. That is an absolute lie. Never has any royal commission or task force recommended this goods and services tax. Never has a royal commission or any task force recommended a two tiered retail, consumer driven sales tax in Canada. Never has that occurred.

What all of those commissions and task forces said is that we have a problem with the existing federal sales tax. It has 22,000 special cases and circumstances and exemptions and so forth. It is a very thick and difficult document. It does create problems for 70,000 to 80,000 manufacturers in this country. That is a fact that is acceptable.

But no one has said: "Now go out and create a tax monster, a two-tiered administrative nightmare both for government and for business to replace it". No one has said that, and I defy anybody in this House to come forward with any statement by any respected economist, any commission or task force that has ever suggested such a foolhardy thing.

I listened to the Minister of State for Finance today saying: "But why point a finger at us? Forty-eight other countries have done the same thing". I know that the hon. Minister of State for Finance would not intentionally mislead the House, so I want to take this opportunity to clarify that.

Not a single country in the world has a two tiered retail consumer tax—not one. There is a reason for that. It is because it is unmanageable and unfair. It is because it is too complex. It is because when you eliminate a problem from one sector of our economy, which is manufacturing, instead of causing problems for 75,000 manufacturers or so you then cause a problem for 1.6 million to 1.8 million registrants who will have to collect the GST.

When we talk about fairness, how can we possibly discuss a two tiered sales tax in Canada in every province except for Alberta that will require the hiring of at least 4,000 new tax collectors?

As I indicated, the government has been very proficient in putting out all kinds of material. In August of 1989 it came forward with the proposal. At that time it was said clearly by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister that that was it. It was another one of these take-it-or-leave-it deals that the government likes. The government said: "It is not going to change. We are adamant and we are going ahead".

It turned out that there was a fly in the ointment, and a big one at that. The chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance had already smelled the rat in 1988. In 1988, when the government was running around saying nothing is going to cost you more and everything is going to better and all of these programs that we are putting together in our electoral platform will not cost you a single nickel more, the member for Mississauga South, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, ran the flag up the pole and said: "Whoa, that is not so".

That was a very courageous act.

Mr. Milliken: When did he say that?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): In 1988 during the campaign. That is when the member for Mississauga South made a clear statement. Based on his experience and the experience of the committee having looked into the situation in New Zealand and being aware of what had happened in other jurisdictions where the goods and services tax was opposed, the hon. member said: "Just a minute here. You are going to find a lot more money in that goods and services tax than you guys are saying".

Mr. Milliken: Is that the only Tory who was telling the truth?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): He was the only Conservative member at that point who would tell the truth and come straight out and say: "Look, that is just not going to fly because it does not make any sense".

The Conservative member for Mississauga South, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, said this. I want to be fair about this since the proposal at that time was for a 9 per cent tax. Whatever the proposal was the member must have known because he made this statement. He estimated that a national sales tax would bring in between $10 billion and $14 billion in additional revenue.

Obviously, that would not be the figure at this point, and I want to be fair to the hon. member, because everyone expected that the rate would be somewhat higher than 7 per cent. Looking at what has happened elsewhere, and this is why I want to come back to what the Minister of State had to say today, you have to question whether or not the government would put itself through this masochistic exercise to maintain revenue neutrality.

• (1250)

What sane human being, what kind of government would do that, after seeing itself so low in the polls? If this continues, and I am not one to make predictions, the rate on the GST will be higher than the popularity rating of the Conservative party in this country.

Why would any government in the face of this unheard of coalition of opposition continue down this path to self-destruction? There has to be a hook, because that is the Tory way. Thank goodness that the experienced member for Mississauga South, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, spotted it early and alerted Canadians to the fact that the pot of gold at the end of the GST rainbow is a $4 billion to $5 billion windfall that will help the government on its merry way to try to buy Canadians before the next election and convince them that things are not as bad as they thought they were going to be.

I want to put this in a little bit of perspective. Consider any Canadians putting themselves in the position of the Minister of Finance and saying: "Okay, here we are now, we have Shirley Carr and the Canadian Labour Congress, we have John Bulloch and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, we have the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, senior citizens' organizations, anti-poverty groups, professional organizations and insurance adjusters all opposed to the GST". The list goes on forever.

As a matter of fact, if I can ever get the chance, Mr. Speaker, I have over 100,000 signatures on petitions in my possession from bowlers across this country to table in this House. Imagine, men and women, young and old, people who go out for recreational bowling or competitive bowling taking the trouble to sign documents that have been certified by the Clerk—over 100,000 of them—saying "no" to the GST.

Just imagine the average average Canadian sitting there saying: "I am the Minister of Finance". Why would a person undertake the goods and services tax as it is proposed here? This is the proposal. Bill C-62 is now a package at last. Why would you do it, when some people say, and the documents maintain it, that it is revenue neutral? The Minister of Finance said it is not going to cost Canadians one penny of additional tax. Yet you have got 80 per cent of Canadians outraged. You have got small business in such an angry state of mind that the Minister of Finance has refused to meet John Bulloch now for months and months and months. He will not talk to him, or have anything to do with him, a person who represents some 80,000 Canadian small businesses. All of these people are massively opposed to the GST and here is the government saying: "We are going to continue going ahead with it anyway".

Talking about tax cuts, the government has shut down VIA Rail and laid off people all over the place. It has cut back on programs, closed down shelters for women and cut off funding for information media for aboriginal peoples. The government has done all those things, Mr. Speaker, but then says to the Canadian people, because it wants to be consistent: "In order to collect this revenue neutral tax that is going to be good for Canadians we are going to hire a minimum of 4,000 new tax collectors, and we are going to hire 250 specialized people who will be tax police. We are going to recruit from the commercial fraud section of the RCMP and anybody who has a background in tax and being able to see through all these problems".

Mr. Speaker, just put yourself in the position of being an ordinary Canadian sitting in your living room saying: "I am going to pretend I am finance minister. So what am I going to do? I am going to put a tax on people that they despise. It is going to turn 80 per cent of Canadians against me. I am not going to have one penny more left after I have gone through all of this exercise. I am going to have 4,000 new tax collectors on my payroll. They are going to be all over the place checking into everybody and all of their dealings. I will not be able to get into a cab because the guy will slam the door on my hand, because I have to have my hand out to collect the GST". So here you are a finance minister who is going to have to walk for the rest of your life or drive your own car.

The finance minister cannot go and get a haircut because, even though there is not too much business now for a shave and a haircut, the barber may decide to give him a shave with a straight-edge razor.

The finance minister cannot go to a movie theatre because he would walk in and the people standing in line would say: "Well, well, well, this is the guy who is costing me an extra 7 per cent to go into a movie theatre."

He cannot go to a hockey game. The finance minister is going to have to become a hermit.

This whole question is going to be part of the Canadian game and there is not much humour in this affair, to say the least. But with Michael H. Wilson you are never sure. Is it "hold-up"? Is it "hermit"? What does that "H" stand for?

The question I want to put to Canadians is: If you were sitting there actually thinking about doing this yourself, would you undertake this perilous journey down the slippery slope of goods and services tax and say: "Not a penny more? Everybody is going to be mad at Mike. But I am going to have 4,000 new people on the federal payroll collecting taxes, tormenting people, running around and auditing people, finding out if they are registered, checking the paper trail, doing all the kinds of things that so outraged Canadians not that many years ago with the income tax system". I think that no matter how many pieces of paper the government produces it will not change their mind.

There is so much paper here concerning this tax. It has been one of the most savage attacks on Canadian forests that we have seen in a long time. Not everybody is going to accept this tax. The government has produced all kinds of paper, and we are just at the August documents at this point.

At that point in August, these were the pamphlets, Mr. Speaker, if you can imagine, that the government put out to explain this simple tax. There is information for senior citizens, for barbers and hair-stylists, for convenience stores, for exporters, housing, self-employed tradespeople, farmers and fishermen, information for dealers and used vehicles, information for commission agents, information for tutors and instructors, information for travel agents and tour operators, information for real estate agents, information for students, information for pharmacies and drug marts, information for taxi limousine drivers, information for service station operators, and information for charities.

These are just the booklets to help explain what goes on here. This is just the beginning of this savage attack on the forests of Canada to try to make sure that Canadians understand the goods and services tax.

At the same time, I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there was a previous document that we missed. This document came out with the 1989 budget.

One of the reasons that Canadians are not too convinced about the goods and services tax is because in 1989 in the budget you may recall, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance was predicting interest rates around 10 per cent by the end of the year.

Mr. Speaker, you could imagine that would throw a few people off when they are looking at other things that are said in here. This document was brought out with the 1989 budget. It misrepresents what the goods and services tax has become because it talks about simplicity, fairness, revenue neutrality and integration.

None of those basic elements has been achieved. That is why, as the government continues on its attempt to try to tell Canadians what is good about the GST, it has even failed, Mr. Speaker, as you well know, to convince members of the government. That is why we will not have a free vote later on today when we have a vote.

Two people who even decided to exercise minimum freedom have been expelled.

Mr. McCreath: How may free votes did the Liberals have?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I am just listening to the hon. member for South Shore. I know he is upset about this tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP WEEK

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, today our government honours a number of our citizens who have made significant contributions to their nation. Citation for Citizenship awards exist so that we can publicly acknowledge individual Canadians who care enough about our nation to proclaim their citizenship for all the world to hear. They care enough about Canadian values to do something to make a difference in their local communities for their fellow citizens.

These awards are given to individuals and organizations who have continuously shown a commitment to their Canadian citizenship and all of the rights and values that accompany being Canadian.

This year's recipients have made outstanding contributions to citizenship in areas ranging from literacy to human rights to multiculturalism. Their contributions represent the partnerships that build our nation.

I call upon all hon. members of the House to join me in applauding these respected fellow citizens and to participate in events during National Citizenship Week, April 15 to 21.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on January 31, 1990, the National Transportation Agency ordered the CN to restore service on the branch line from Franquet to Chapais, in the Abitibi area, by July 31, 1990.

During the hearings, the Agency learned that the CN had closed off that section in contravention of a ruling made by the Canadian Transport Commission, on November 19, 1987, requiring the rail company to keep that branch line open.

In its ruling (45-R-1990), the Agency makes the following recommendations: Illegal closure of branch line; as mentioned before, the Agency thinks that the illegal closure of that branch line is a serious offence. Consequently, pursuant to section 173(2)b) of the 1987 NTA, it recommends the Attorney General of Canada to consider sueing the plaintiff for violating of the Commission ruling.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the GST is nothing more than government sanctioned theft. I rise today to report that the constituents of Hamilton West say no to Bill C-62, the GST.

In a poll conducted through my latest householder, there were those who were in favour and those who were opposed. In favour, 144; opposed to the GST, 1,155. They know that the tax is regressive and will take money out of their pockets and out of the pockets of those who are least able to pay. They know that the tax is unfair; that the tax credits are not fully indexed to inflation. They know that the tax will be inflationary, adding at least 2.25 per cent to the rate of inflation, signalling the Bank of Canada to maintain high interest rates.

The Conservative government is not even prepared to listen to the people. Again today, the government will not hear the petitions signed by hundreds of thousands of Canadians opposed to the GST. So, Mr. Speaker, constituents of Hamilton West join the overwhelming number of Canadians who say no to this Conservative government and no to the GST.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in the last three days more than two million Canadians have expressed their opposition to the Goods and Services Tax.

They have protested against this deeply unfair tax which does not differentiate between rich and low income families.

Recent polls show that 80 per cent of Canadians are against the GST.

As members of this House, we are all accountable to the Canadian people. Members of my party have joined the protesters ever since the GST was introduced. We know the Canadian people want a real and equitable tax reform.

I therefore call on all members of Parliament to join the tax fairness movement and vote against the GST.

NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP WEEK

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I take the floor for a few minutes to tell my colleagues that, for the third consecutive year, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship awards civic merit certificates to mark National Citizenship Week.

The theme of this year's celebrations—from coast to coast—fittingly applies to the contribution which certificate holders have made to our society. Their dedication can be felt from coast to coast and involves a wide array of important sectors of Canadian life.

This year's laureates, including four organizations, are active in major urban centres and smaller rural communities. Deeply aware of their responsibilities as Canadian citizens, they proudly display uncommon public spiritedness and commitment, and they highlight the ideal epitomized by the Canadian flag which was raised for the first time 25 years ago.

Their contribution reaches indeed from coast to coast and, if Canadians are known the world over as a nation where peace, diversity and humanism are traditional hallmarks, for that we are indebted to Canadian men and women like those we honour this week.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge my colleagues and all Canadians to express their appreciation to the recipients of the civic merit award—

Mr. Speaker: The time allocated to the hon. member has expired.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, the St. Matthew Passion, the Emperor piano concerto and il Noce di Figaro are examples of musical compositions well-known to millions of Canadians and written by, to use the words of the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, "musicians from some other country".

One would think that the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture would be supportive of the arts in Canada. Why does the government attribute such a low priority to the arts as indicated by its choice of chairman of this committee? Surely Canada's cultural community deserves support, not the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune hurled by Tory mugwumps.

TOURISM

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the Ottawa weather, spring and summer are rapidly coming to Nova Scotia's beautiful South Shore.

This past weekend, the South Shore Tourism Association had a highly successful annual meeting with over 200 in attendance. Tourism is one of Canada's most rapidly growing businesses, and not surprisingly, in Nova Scotia.

If you like wonderful beaches, beautiful seascapes, wonderful landscapes and a glimpse of Canada's history, plan to come to Nova Scotia's South Shore this year for your vacation.

I encourage all Canadians to consider Nova Scotia as their vacation destination this year. Come to where the hospitality is warm and there is so much to see.

The South Shore Tourism Association has produced an excellent and thorough guide, copies of which I would be pleased to make available to all members.

CANADA–U.S. SUMMIT

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker,

A Canada–U.S. summit
Takes place tonight under the Dome,
The agenda is Eastern Europe,
Clean air, our new Mexican home.

They will not talk about trade,
'Cause the auto pact's shot to hell.
They won't even mention takeovers,
We've nothing left to sell.

They will not talk about water,
Oil, gas or secure supplies;
The U.S. agenda is finished,
What's ours is theirs, no surprise.

And paying us won't be a problem,
They keep their interest rates low.
And American Express will finance
Wilson and Governor Crow.

And when Brian gives advice on taxes,
George again will have the last word.
"An American GST, never,
How could I be such a nerd?"

Before our Blue Jays beat Texas,
Our leaders will throw the first pitch;
And then George will turn to Brian
And say "Read my lips".

"The people can't stand your new tax,
It's regressive, oppressive and unfair,
So be a good boy and join with me
As together, we all declare"

Some Hon. Members:

Hey hey, ho ho
The GST has got to go.
Hey hey, ho ho
The GST has got to go.

SOCIAL BENEFITS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–21 proposes improved special benefits for needy unemployment insurance recipients throughout Canada.

Natural fathers cannot receive parental benefits today, but will be entitled to do so by C–21. Natural mothers and adoptive parents too, will be entitled by C–21 to receive parental benefits in addition to any benefits for which they otherwise qualify. And these special benefits in general, now subject to a cap of 15 weeks, will be provided to a maximum of 30 weeks by C–21.

Some of these changes follow through on previous court judgements and thereby make the UI system as consistent as possible with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Together with other improvements to the UI system proposed in Bill C–21, these benefit provisions are necessary changes to an out of date system that should be put behind us. I urge all members of the House to do their bit and help make this happen.

LAND CLAIMS AGREEMENT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, for the second time in ten days I am pleased to offer congratulations on the signing of a land claims agreement in northern Canada.

The Dene–Métis of the Northwest Territories, who last night signed a final agreement on their long–standing claim, are the second in such a length of time to do so. This is a credit to the spirit of the Dene–Métis and to those who have supported the long struggle that they have led for justice in the north.

All Canadians should celebrate the signing of this agreement because settlement of land claims works to the benefit of all communities and all Canadians. Whether it is the development of resources or the establishment of national parks, only when all parties have clearly defined their rights can progress take place.

I congratulate the Dene–Métis people, the Government of the Northwest Territories and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The settlement of the Yukon First Nations claim and the Dene–Métis claim are important steps in the right direction. I urge the minister to continue to resolve other outstanding land claims. First Nations deserve nothing less.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE ROLAND MICHENER

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents of Wetaskiwin and the people of Canada, I rise in the House today to extend best wishes to a constituent, former Governor General Roland Michener, who will celebrate his ninetieth birthday on April 19.

Daniel Roland Michener was born in Lacombe, Alberta. He first served as an Ontario provincial member and cabinet minister and then went on to serve as a federal member of Parliament and Speaker of this House from 1953 to 1962. In 1967 Prime Minister Pearson appointed him as Governor General of Canada.

Throughout his distinguished career, he has had a positive influence on all Canadians. I know he made a significant contribution to Canadians physical fitness by his own personal example.

Once again, I would like to take this opportunity to salute his efforts for all Canadians, and ask the House to join me in wishing him a very happy birthday and continued good health.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LAND CLAIMS AGREEMENT

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Slavey.]

[English]

Yesterday was a very historic moment for the Dene and Métis of the Western Arctic. They initialled a land claims agreement with the federal government.

My grandfather was a signatory to Treaty 11 in July, 1921. I believe he would be proud of our people who have come together and have made the decision to go forward and initial this agreement.

I congratulate my people. After almost two decades of negotiating with Ottawa, this agreement gives control and management of their affairs to the Dene and Métis of the Northwest Territories. By initialling this agreement the leaders have given the opportunity to the people in the communities to study and vote on the arrangements that have been negotiated with the government.

I commend the Dene and Métis leaders for their skill, their tolerance and their had work.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we witnessed a poorly-attended demonstration on the Hill against the GST featuring the Communist party, the CLC and the Pro-Canada Network, with special guest appearances by the members for Edmonton Southeast and Calgary Northeast.

If these members are so eager to join with the Communist party in opposing the tax, maybe they should join the Communist party and stop being all things to all people and stop being Tories of convenience.

MUSEUM CORPORATIONS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-12 establishing the four museum corporations has been delayed for some time now. The result is that more than 56 appointments that need to be made have been held up.

I would hope that this delay is for good reasons. I hope the government has been delaying these appointments only because of its search for good quality people. These corporations deserve first class appointments who will contribute to the good of the cultural community.

Let us hope that this delay has nothing to do with the Voice of Fire controversy or any discomfort that the government may have with the arm's length relationship with cultural agencies. Let us hope that this is not old-fashioned government indecision.

I urge the government to get on with these appointments for the sake of the cultural community, and especially for the sake of the museum corporations which have a lot of work to do.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we have all heard of the Calvin Klein and Alfred Sung lines of fashions. Today, I am going to introduce the latest in men's fashion; it is the Michael Wilson GST slacks. They are manufactured by Cambridge Clothing—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is exceeding the bounds of the proper use of a member's statement.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister stated a few weeks ago that interest rates in Canada would come down shortly. The Minister of Finance based his budget estimates on an 11 per cent interest rate for the current year. Finally, last weekend, the Minister of Finance stated in London that interest rates in Canada would not come down. My question to the Minister is this: What really is the policy of the Canadian Government concerning interest rates in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this Government is well aware of the need to reduce interest rates for an efficient economic performance. But the fact is that we just cannot reduce them artificially by simply pushing a button. The best way to go about it is to reduce inflationary pressures thus making it possible to bring and keep interest rates down.

As for the rates which appeared in the budget, I submit that since they apply to the year beginning April 1st, we hope that the policies we are taking combined with favourable international conditions will help us achieve our objectives.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, again in the area of contradictions the Minister of Finance has stated and the Minister of State said this morning that the goods and services tax will be revenue neutral. Documents prepared by the Department of Finance say the GST will both be revenue neutral and will serve to reduce the deficit in this country.

The chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance says that the GST is going to raise an extra $4 billion to $5 billion. The Minister of State for Finance discussed this matter this morning. Is the government prepared to tell the Canadian people that the goods and services tax is the biggest tax grab in Canadian history?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not want me to lie to this House, therefore I will not say that.

There is something that the hon. member and many of his colleagues have great difficulty in understanding. When we say that the GST will contribute to deficit reduction, that does not mean that we will grab an awful amount of money and use it. It means that this type of tax is less porous, less prone to avoidance than the one we have. The present tax leads to evasion.

Second, because it will have a very positive impact on our economy, it will be the equivalent of $9 billion in our economy. We hope that this performance of the economy will contribute to higher government revenue.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said this morning that Canadians are going to love the goods and services tax.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister and others have said that the problem with the goods and services tax is that Canadians do not understand it, can the Deputy Prime Minister explain to the House why he will not allow a free vote this afternoon on this bill if he is convinced that members of his government understand the goods and services tax?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote the way I want and I hope the hon. member does the same thing.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Government insists that families will not be unfairly treated under its GST. We are all aware that in Quebec, footwear and clothing at a certain price are deemed to be basic items and therefore non taxable. Why does not the Conservative Government offer the same exemptions? Or better, why does it not completely abandon this tax which is unfair to Canadian families?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that I do not share the view of the Hon. Member as to the unfairness of this tax. Quite the contrary. Obviously a great many categories of people and goods would like to be exempted, which would compel us to increase the rate. We are determined to keep the tax base as wide as possible. Having already exempted groceries, drugs etc., we feel that by maintaining as wide a tax base as possible and giving low income families significant credits, we will end up with a much better and fairer tax system.

• (1420)

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): My supplementary question is still for the same minister, since the Deputy Prime Minister does not want to answer. Middle-income families will have to pay on everything they buy—food, clothing and shoes. Why is the government so determined to make life miserable for these families?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, once again, I would say that is certainly not our intention. You must understand that in the end, Canadians will pay the same amount. The government will still collect $18 billion. Basically, it is a different breakdown, which will quite specifically protect various categories of people, like seniors or those on lower incomes. In particular, credits will be provided for those earning up to $40,000, and those earning up to $30,000 will come out of the reform with more money than they had before.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. By now the Deputy Prime Minister must know that more than 2 million Canadians registered their opposition to the goods and services tax by signing a ballot through a national campaign organized by the Canadian Labour Congress and the Pro-Canada Network.

Last weekend in the shopping malls, on street corners and in the workplace, citizens took the time to give this government a message. They voted against the unfair tax in perhaps the largest protest vote in the history of Canada.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister admit that this government has no mandate to impose this tax and will he simply submit to the Canadian people this government's alternative to this unfair tax?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. Leader of the NDP that there is no great merit in inciting people to sign petitions against taxes, any taxes. The New Democrats should try this against income tax because they would probably get a few million signatures.

We have been listening to Canadians and we will continue to listen to them. They told us that they want a fair tax system. This is what we are providing. The opposition systematically hides this fact from Canadian citizens, but we will continue to work hard to explain to the people why we are undertaking this reform and why it is good for them.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yes, this government is listening to Canadians. It is listening only, however, to the Council of Bankers and to the National Council on Business Issues. We are asking this government to listen to the Canadian people.

As one example, Mr. Speaker, today in the news we are informed that the government has extended a tax break for its friends on Bay Street. Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us why stockbrokers will get more tax breaks while ordinary Canadians are going to be taxed on muffins and movies?

Where is the fairness? Scrap the tax now. Listen to all Canadians.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would not expect the Leader of the NDP to understand very well the functioning of a free economy. But the measures we have taken are precisely devised to prevent tax avoidance. We want our industry to remain under Canadian control and this is why these measures have been taken.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister. This government and its friends in the Business Council on National Issues are the only ones who like the GST. Eighty per cent of Canadians are against the GST. Yesterday, people throughout the country told the government that they do not want this tax. More than two million people who voluntarily filled in a ballot voted "no". When will the government accept the judgment of all these people and present fairer alternatives?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Leader of the New Democratic Party must admit that of course Canadians, like people in other countries, do not usually like taxes, and I think members on both sides of the House would agree that asking their opinion on this does not have much merit. You must understand that we are implementing a change, a tax reform, that is good for Canada, that will create jobs, that will encourage better use of our resources and that will release our economy's productive capacity.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The lobster fishermen of Atlantic Canada are concerned as to what help they will receive from the much-promised aid package for Atlantic Canada.

Will the minister tell the lobster fishermen of Atlantic Canada if they are included in the aid package, if there is one?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, if the question is about whether or not the federal government will participate with the lobster industry and the provinces in trying to find a solution to the inventory problem experienced, the answer is yes.

If that is not the question, maybe the hon. member should take his sheet and read it more carefully so that I can get his real question.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the fisheries aid package should also be used for wharf and harbour repair in Atlantic Canada.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. Before there is—

An Hon. Member: Read it slowly, he can't understand.

Some Hon. Members: Slowly, slowly.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has the floor. The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. MacAulay: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Before there is unnecessary loss of life, can the minister assure us that the needed wharf repair and harbour dredging will be done before the fishing season opens, which is just around the corner?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I could warn the hon. member to tell his researcher not to apply in my shop because he has no chance in it.

If the member wants to bring to my attention a particular port where there is a life-threatening situation, I am sure I will want to look into that matter.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House of Commons the Prime Minister of Canada balked at the opportunity to refute the comments of the Minister of the Environment who suggested that in future Canadians may have to choose between Quebec and Newfoundland.

When a minister in Newfoundland spoke out of turn, the Premier of Newfoundland disavowed those comments immediately. When the Minister of the Environment of Canada makes inflammatory statements, the Prime Minister makes excuses.

My question is straightforward. Will the Deputy Prime Minister advance the cause of national dialogue in Canada by dissociating the Government of Canada from the irresponsible speculation of the Minister of Environment?

• (1430)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately Hansard for yesterday is not available.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, it is.

Mr. Mazankowski: I would refer the hon. member to the answer that the Prime Minister gave yesterday where he quoted in full the context within which the hon. minister's comments were made, and I think that that explained it very clearly.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have no desire to choose between members of the Canadian family—

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Ratify the accord, then. We will be a family when you ratify the accord.

Mr. Tobin: —and to ignore the remarks of the Minister of the Environment by twisting and turning, trying to escape the import of what was said is to condone those remarks. That is something that neither the government nor Canada can afford.

Will the Minister of the Environment himself withdraw those remarks, make a contribution to Canada by putting an end to words that are offensive to the spirit of Confederation, and particularly offensive to the people of Quebec and to the people of Newfoundland? Withdraw them now.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to add to the Prime Minister's response to the hon. member's question yesterday. It is pretty clear. When an hon. member is quoting a minister or any other member—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: Let the minister speak.

Mr. Mazankowski: —he or she should quote it in its fullest context and not be selective, as the hon. member has been.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Aklilu Afework, Minister for Foreign Economic Relations of Ethiopia.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

WOMEN'S CENTRES

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. A spokesperson for the Secretary of State pointed out that the 100 per cent cuts affecting 39 women's centres in Quebec have had a beneficial effect, since the centres will now receive $10,000 from the Government of Quebec instead of $8,500 from the Department of the Secretary of State. How can the minister claim this has a beneficial impact on women's centres in Quebec? Is that his idea of viable federalism?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I had an excellent meeting this afternoon with representatives of women's centres. I am familiar with their work and I know how important it is to the community. I may add that last Friday, I had the pleasure of meeting the provincial minister responsible for the Status of Women, Mme Violette Trépanier. We had an in-depth discussion about the future of the centres, and ways in which we work together effectively to guarantee the vitality of these mechanisms which are so important to the community.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State said that he had a pleasant meeting with the women of Quebec today. From what I understand from that meeting, he made it clear to them that this decision to cut $1.6 million from women's programming was not simply his decision but the decision of the entire cabinet.

The Secretary of State is now paying for women from Newfoundland, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, and Yukon to fly to Montreal, business class, and to stay at the Dorval Hilton in order to meet with him on Thursday.

The Secretary of State is also spending an estimated $500—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member would put her question.

Ms. Black: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Every dollar that is not spent on women's centres directly is—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is getting into a speech. I know she has a question, and I would ask her please to put the question.

Ms. Black: My question is this: instead of spending money on extra security, instead of flying women all over the country, business class, will the Secretary of State reinstitute the core funding to women's programming, and will he do it today?

Mr. Speaker: I must advise hon. members, especially those who wish to ask questions, that if I have to interrupt and delay, it takes time out of your colleagues' questions later on. The hon. minister.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, there are almost 200 women's centres across Canada, from Newfoundland to British Columbia including the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Many of them have indicated a desire to meet with me as quickly as possible. While I am always available and would like to have that dialogue, I did feel it was important to have a few of them come to meet with me so that I could hear their concerns.

Is the member saying that I should not be meeting with any women's group on Thursday? Is that what she is saying? We have a very important program—

Some Hon. Members: Yes or no.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

As we heard during the members' statements yesterday, the minister signed an historical agreement with the Dene-Métis people.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Littlechild: This agreement is welcomed by Canada's native people and I am sure by all Canadians.

I would like to ask the minister if he might inform the House on the specifics of the agreement and what ratification process will be necessary to approve it.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for a question of significant importance not only to the Dene-Métis people of the western Arctic but to all Canadians.

The agreement which was concluded yesterday, a final agreement with the Dene-Métis people, recognizes the special status of those Canadians who occupy their homeland known as Denendeh. This agreement, in its main elements, provides the Dene-Métis with cash compensation of $500 million, a land quantum of some 70,000 square miles, a share of any future resource royalties the government collects on resources developed in these areas, and a significant voice in the ongoing management of wildlife and the environment.

All members are extremely grateful to the Dene-Métis people for the confidence they have shown in Canada. We are grateful to them. I say to the Dene-Métis people: mahsi cho, thank you very much.

FEDNOR

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On February 20, the Minister of Finance said in his budget address: "Today, I am asking Canadians to join with me in a program to reinforce our efforts to control government spending."

The very next day the board of directors at FedNor increased their per diem rate by over 20 per cent.

How does the Deputy Prime Minister reconcile the position of the government, as given by the Minister of Finance, with what the minister responsible for this agency did the very next day?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that FedNor does not increase its own honorarium for its own board, but perhaps it should when one considers that FedNor has already created over 2,000 jobs in the member's area and close by.

FedNor itself has generated 332 businesses that did not exist three years ago. FedNor is making a contribution to northern Ontario like no other regional agency ever has.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. That certainly was not an answer to the question I asked.

Let me ask a question from his own press release. The advisory board stated that since FedNor began it maintained a business-like bottom line approach to all its activities.

I ask this minister what is business like and what is bottom line when someone asks the Canadian people to observe restraint and he allows his agencies to do exactly the opposite?

• (1440)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the FedNor board has been one of the hardest working federal boards established since 1984. Part of the reason it is so busy has been recognized in the announcement I made last week.

Members opposite wrongly said that FedNor was going to be hurt by recent changes in the budget. The exact opposite is true. We announced last week a 26 per cent increase in FedNor's budget. We also announced, very importantly, that from $100,000 or less FedNor could continue giving grants and contributions and not just loans. That is 90 per cent of its present business.

I would like the province of Ontario to follow our lead and continue to have a hard working northern Ontario economic expansion.

AIR SURVEILLANCE

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services who earlier today said that one of his primary objectives as minister is to maintain fairness and integrity in the tendering process.

In the case of the controversial east coast surveillance contract and concerns raised earlier in January by a number of the bidders who felt that the bid was written to favour one company, in effect sole sourced, the minister's silence was damning.

Was the minister made aware of these concerns when they were first raised and, if so, why did he still insist on dancing to the jig of Tory lobbyists, instead of protecting the integrity of the federal contracting system in this country?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me the question in committee this morning and I gave him a very full and detailed answer. He is obviously trying to play for some political partisan purpose today in talking the way he has.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nault: What kind of business do you think we are in?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Dick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Three companies out of the 14 that were invited replied. Two of them were compliant: one from the Atlantic provinces and one from Calgary. We chose the one which was the cheapest.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister.

Prior to today, was the minister aware that there were proposals on the desks of his colleagues, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of National Defence that would have seen the government owned tracker aircraft fleet operated by the private sector providing increased surveillance at the same cost and also save the badly needed jobs in Summerside, P.E.I.?

If he was aware of that, then why the suspicious haste to effectively sole source a $28 million tender?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what specific proposals he might have had on somebody else's desk, but if he had wanted me to know about them he could have put them on my desk.

I do know that the third person who put in a response was non-compliant. If he wants to be a spokesperson for Ken Rowe, why does he not just stand up and say so? It was a non-compliant bid.

HOUSING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing.

As the minister knows, Toronto City Council must decide by Thursday whether to bid to host the 1996 Olympic Games and their decision turns on whether CN will sell 50 hectares of its former railway lands to the City Non-Profit Housing Corporation so that they can provide 3,200 units of housing, first for the olympic athletes and later for affordable housing for low income residents.

CN is stalling. They are demanding, instead, an upzoning for commercial towers on land nearby.

Will the minister use his good offices to persuade CN to drop this stance and use public land for the public purpose of the Olympics and affordable housing?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, CN is discussing the matter with the city of Toronto. I can assure the House that federal government support will be consistent with that which was given to Calgary for the latest Olympics. We are in the game with the Toronto bid with a full range of essential services. We believe that the negotiations are going forward. We see no reason for the government to interfere.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in view of this government's pledge to provide public land for affordable housing in Toronto, will the minister seek the support of his cabinet colleagues to provide this 50 hectares of land, not used any longer for railway purposes, to be used for the government's declared purpose of public, affordable housing?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, CN is very cognizant of the commitment to assist the city and to help with housing. All of CN's plans are based upon agreements between CN and the city, and have been approved by the Ontario Municipal Board.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. In 1987, CN unlawfully closed the section between Franquet and Chapais, in Abitibi. In Decision 45-R-1990, the National Transportation Agency recommended that the Attorney General of Canada prosecute CN.

My question is as follows: Could the minister inform the House whether she read the letter dated February 13, 1990, sent by the Hon. Erik Nielsen to the Minister of Transport, in which he asks, and I quote: "to take all measures you may judge desirable to enforce the agency's recommendation". I would also like to know when you intend to take action on this troublesome issue.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, indeed I did read Mr. Nielsen's letter, and the hon. member is aware, CN has applied to the Federal Court of Appeal for permission to appeal the National Transportation Agency's decision dated January 31, 1990. I shall therefore have to await the court's decision before taking any further action on this matter.

HEALTH

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Health.

On Sunday, April 8, in a follow-up to a death in Winnipeg, W-5 showed that there is no clear accountability for the rules and regulations overseeing medical drug studies affecting thousands of Canadians and their safety.

What is the minister going to do to ensure that there is accountability, that someone or some organization is ready to accept the responsibility for the clear interpretation and application of the rules and regulations dealing with the testing of new medication affecting the safety of thousands of Canadians?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the particular case to which the hon. member referred is very sad for everyone. However, I think it would be inappropriate to comment on this matter right now, given the fact that the matter is being investigated by a medical examiner at the present time.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, why does the minister not suspend the Volmax drug studies in which Candace James was involved at the time of her death, until he knows that there is absolutely no danger to anyone's safety?

[Translation]

Why not stop the study, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, if we stop the study, this would prejudice the current investigation.

FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. In light of the solidarity of women's centres nation-wide to refuse project funding until her government resolves the core funding issue, can the minister tell the women of Canada that there is a light at the end of the tunnel and that core funding will be restored?

• (1450)

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased, as the member knows, to have had the opportunity to meet last week with representatives of women's centres in Halifax and Newfoundland, and today from Quebec. I am pleased that my colleague, the Secretary of State, is also going to be meeting with them to see if there is a method of resolving some of the difficulties.

I cannot give her the assurance that core funding will be reinstituted, but I know that my colleague is looking at methods to try to find a resolution of this very difficult problem.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the minister says she knows and says she understands how these women feel. We want to know whether she has managed to convince her colleagues to change the policy or is she too, like Canadian women, being ignored and overlooked and are her efforts a failure?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. colleague would agree that none of the women in this cabinet would ever be ignored by their colleagues. They would do it at great risk, I can assure you.

While we cannot give a definitive response today on this issue, I hope to work with my provincial colleagues so that we can come forward with some better plans in the long term for delivery of services to women at the community level, which will involve different levels of government and the communities to provide these much needed services.

INTELLIGENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. According to reports published today, the United States government, over an extended period of time, persistently engaged in illegal intercepts of the conversations of René Lévesque, then the duly elected Premier of Quebec.

I am sure the Solicitor General will agree that both the intercepts are illegal and that the acts are completely unacceptable behaviour by a so-called friendly government to Canada.

Can the minister tell the House, first, did the federal Liberal government of the day know of and acquiesce in these intercepts and, second, who else in Canada is being spied on by the United States government?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to point out to the House that the press reports to which my hon. colleague is referring are related to a book that was released yesterday.

Considering that I have not had time to read the book since it was released yesterday, it would be inappropriate for me to comment.

On the other hand, I would like to take this opportunity to reaffirm the policy of the Government of Canada that any intelligence operation in Canada can be conducted only with the consent of the Solicitor General and under Canadian control.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, when the minister and his department get around to reading the book, I hope that they will then take the obvious response—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, will the minister take steps, as soon as he has absorbed the details of the book and verified the accuracy of the account, to advise the United States government that the behaviour in that case was completely unacceptable and will he get plausible, clear assurances from the United States government that this action will not happen again?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that if my hon. friend in his first question referred to the press reports, it is because he also has not had time to read the book.

I can assure this House that appropriate steps, if necessary, shall be taken and we will take cognizance of the book.

CATELLI FOODS

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

On April 7, the workers at Catelli in east-end Montreal ratified a new three-year collective agreement by a 53 per cent majority. Catelli management said that this new agreement, which lowers wages and eliminates many benefits for employees, was essential if the plant was not to close.

Mr. Speaker, since the Catelli employees have done more than their share in accepting considerably reduced working conditions, what does the federal government intend to do for its part to ensure that the Catelli plant is restructured and modernized in the short term?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers, and especially Montrealers, are pleased with the decision the union made last week and the agreement reached with Catelli in Montreal. Yesterday, officials of the department met with people from Catelli and the company applied for aid. We are studying the request, future meetings are planned and we hope to be able to reach an agreement with the company itself.

MINISTERIAL TRAVEL

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On October 25, the President of the Treasury Board stated that he had initiated an urgent study on ministerial travel accountability for a report to this House.

By February 8, the minister still had not reported and as chairman of Public Accounts, I wrote to him concerning the denial of information required to audit ministerial travel. He replied to my letter 33 days later and still did not answer the question.

When is the minister going to live up to the commitment he made in this House and table his report on ministerial travel?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in the unavoidable absence of the President of the Treasury Board, I will take that question as a representation from the chairman of the public accounts committee, but perhaps the President of the Treasury Board did not want to embarrass members of his party since this government has used ministerial travel so much less than its predecessor government.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General of Canada has stated that the Government of Canada is the only jurisdiction left in Canada where ministers' travel receipts are not made available to the appropriate Auditor General.

In his March 13 letter to me, the President of the Treasury Board does not make a single mention of ministerial receipts, to which the Auditor General wants access.

Will the minister tell us today when he will be introducing a policy that will make ministerial travel receipts available to the Auditor General for auditing purposes in Canada?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the President of the Treasury Board will comply with all commitments that he has made. The policy of this government was very simple: we should travel less than our predecessor government, and even if we did that, it would keep us on the road twice as much as we are.

SCIENCE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Science. The government-appointed hatchet man at NRC has now said that NRC is not in the business of high energy physics and has proceeded to close down one of the most significant scientific enterprises at NRC. Some of the scientists are threatening to go to other places.

What action does the government plan to take, if any, to save a very significant scientific enterprise in this country, which is quite significant to other activities such as the neutrino laboratories and others, of which the minister is aware?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, over the years one of the interesting things about the National Research Council is that it has always been able to initiate various kinds of research, to take that research up to a fruition point, and occasionally have spun it off to other corporations or other universities.

One of the things that we are concerned about here is the high energy physics group. My hon. colleague says it is going to disappear. It is not going to disappear. The high energy physics group is likely to remain intact.

I also wish to tell my hon. colleague that as far as SNO is concerned, nothing will interfere with the operation of the Sudbury Neutrino Observatory, and I promise my hon. colleague that that will be the case.

• (1500)

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister says that it is not going to disappear, and subsequently says that it is not likely to disappear. I think that we want clearer assurances about whether it is going to disappear, or is likely to disappear, or whether it is going to continue. The scientists there and the scientific community want to know the answer. What is the government going to do to ensure that that high energy physics establishment continues to make its valuable contribution to Canadian and international science?

An Hon. Member: I guess you have to spell it out for him.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Yes, I will try to be even more clear, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Winegard: The high energy physics group at NRC is not going to disappear as a group. Is that satisfactory?

An Hon. Member: No, it's not good enough.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Earlier in the proceedings in an exchange between myself and the Minister of Supply and Services, in response to my second question, the minister clearly, I believe, impugned my motives and my privileges as a member by indicating that I was a mouthpiece for a contractor.

As a member of Parliament, I try my very best to raise matters of public concern with the government. If that implies somehow that I am working or lobbying for someone, then that is absolutely ridiculous. I would ask the minister, to whom I sent a note because I do respect my colleagues in this place and indicated I would raising this point of privilege, to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Mazankowski: If the shoe fits, wear it.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Dartmouth—

An Hon. Member: Who are you?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: The minister was up on his feet.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker does decide who has the floor. The hon. House leader.

Mr. Andre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, when the hon. member for Dartmouth rose to ask a question, he implied wrongdoing in his preamble and the Speaker, quite properly and in keeping with the long tradition of the House, ruled the question out of order. This was challenged by the House leader of the Liberal party afterward.

The hon. member knows that we have immunity in this place and that the laws of slander and liable do not apply. But coupled with that, it is not proper under that immunity to slander or liable, by accusing another of an illegal act. However, in the event that the hon. member is convinced that others have committed an illegal act, they need only make that charge formally. Of course, if they are not able to substantiate it, they forfeit their seat. That is the tradition of this place.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Gaffney: You are shameful.

Mr. Andre: Earlier today the hon. member asked another question where he made the suggestion that the government was—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Eric the second.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The hon. member has raised a question of privilege on a specific point. The hon. minister can reply to it or he does not have to, or the hon. House leader can reply to it. This is getting into a much more extensive debate.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I was indicating what his comments were today to which my colleague replied.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I am not entering into a long debate on this. There is a point made by the hon. member. Either the minister involved can respond or I will look at the "blues" and come back to the House.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am recognizing the hon. minister.

An Hon. Member: The other minister.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I merely want to make the point that if in fact there is a prima facie question of privilege, as one should indicate when one raises a question of privilege, the member can ask that the matter be referred to the appropriate committee of the House and have it discussed there.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. House leader has every right to take part in this. But I have made it very clear. The hon. member for Dartmouth rose on a specific issue. It can probably be settled in a moment or two. I am prepared to listen to the minister who is involved in the question of privilege.

I have not said it is a question of privilege and it may well not be. If the hon. minister wants to respond, he can.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything I said in my response that requires me to withdraw. People in this place lobby on behalf of people all the time. That is their job as members of Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Clancy: Oh, no it's not.

Mr. Dick: If he is now saying he was not lobbying, that he was just a mouthpiece, then so be it.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I just heard that it is the job of members of Parliament to lobby. It is against the law—

Mr. Andre: Wrong, wrong.

Mr. Gauthier: —in the way the minister is saying. There are two or three points that have been raised by the minister which I think require a response; first, yesterday's Question Period, which the minister alluded to in his remarks. I went back—

Mr. Dick: I never alluded to it.

An Hon. Member: He did, not you.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. He opened it and I closed it down. We are not getting into debate on the hon. member's question of privilege. I will consider what the "blues" show and come back to the House.

Point of Order

That matter is closed until I refer back to the House.

The hon. government House leader.

POINT OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday, the House leader of the Liberal party raised a point of order in respect to Question Period, and in that context I would like to respond briefly in terms of today's Question Period.

I wanted to point out that the question raised by the hon. member for—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: Question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader has a point of order.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte today raised a question that had been raised yesterday by the leader of the Liberal party, who asked a question about a newspaper story respecting a comment made outside the House by the Minister of the Environment.

I merely want to acquaint the House with the fact that Beauchesne's fifth edition, section 359(10) says:

> A question ought not to refer to a statement made outside the House by a Minister.

Based on that citation, the questions yesterday and the question today are out of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I will bring the minister up to date. There is a sixth edition, Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fraser, Dawson, Holtby publishers, Beauchesne's.

Mr. Tobin: He needs to be brought up to date.

Mr. Gauthier: I shall read Citation 410:

> In 1986 the Speaker put forth further views in light of more recent conditions and precedents. It was observed that:
>
> (1) Television has made a marked impact on Parliament and public perception thereof;
> (2) While some previous guidelines remain valid others have fallen into disuse, e.g. that it is out of order to ask about matters reported > in the media or statements by Ministers outside the House or "certain questions regarding government policy".

That, Mr. Speaker, I'll repeat:

> (2) While some previous guidelines remain valid others have fallen into disuse, e.g. that it is out of order to ask about matters reported in the media or statements—.

Mr. Speaker, that has been ruled out of order a long time ago and it is now in order to quote ministers when they say things outside this House.

Mr. Andre: The lead question for the Liberal party today was GST. Let me read section 409(12) of Beauchesne's sixth edition:

> Questions should not anticipate a debate scheduled for the day, but should be reserved for the debate.

The debate scheduled for today is on GST. The questions by the leader were out of order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, earlier I gave notice to the Minister of the Environment, who I suspect passed the information along to the Government House Leader, that I wanted to raise a question of privilege, which the Government House Leader has now tried to anticipate.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker, during the course of Question Period the Deputy Prime Minister suggested that comments I had made in framing my question in fact were a misrepresentation of the words of the Minister of the Environment, or did not fully give credence to the words of the Minister of the Environment.

Perhaps in a different atmosphere than has prevailed and has been exemplified by the government House leader in the last few minutes, I am prepared, if I in any way have misrepresented the words of an hon. member and an hon. minister of a national government in this place, to withdraw anything I may have said. I am not prepared to accept a claim by the Deputy Prime Minister that I deliberately misrepresented anybody.

It would be most helpful, and a great opportunity, were the minister in question to rise in his place and tell us precisely what he meant by those remarks, because I am prepared to acknowledge and accept his apology or his explanation now. This is his opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a statement. I am not sure it is a question of privilege. If in fact his point of of order is that he was referred to in an unparliamentary way, perhaps I could look at the "blues" and if that is so, I can come back to the House. But I think that is the end of the issue unless I find something there.

The hon. member, on the same point of order?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I can only assume from the silence in this place—

Mr. Andre: Point of order!

Mr. Tobin: —that my words stand and that the minister indeed made those comments and should withdraw—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Andre: Point of order! Order!

Mr. Nault: Storm the chair again.

Mr. Tobin: He hasn't got the backbone to get up on his hind legs and clarify. He hides behind the Prime Minister's skirts.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear what the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte said because of the shouting. I want to hear it.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, do you want to hear what I said?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I said that the Minister of the Environment in my judgment, given this opportunity to clarify the issue, has no backbone and is a coward.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Andre: Withdraw.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Just go outside. Come outside the room and we will settle that outside. Nobody calls me a coward.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Andre: Sit down, you little jerk.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Arseneault: You started it, Harvie.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): I will never accept that.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the Day.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I demand—I demand—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Charge the chair.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to advise the hon. House leader, and I want him to listen. I want him to get his temper under control.

Mr. Andre: I have my temper under control.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise the hon. House Leader of this. I am going to deal with this in my own way and I will come back to the House if it is necessary. In the meantime I am calling Orders of the Day. The hon. House Leader.

Mr. Andre: The Minister of the Environment was slandered in the House—

Mr. Speaker: I am calling Orders of the Day. I will deal with it in my own way.

The hon. minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to clarify the substantive issue in this debate and then go on to correct something I find unacceptable. As for the issue in debate, the statements reported in the newspapers on the weekend and attributed to me are all accurate. If I am asked to repeat them here or elsewhere, I shall gladly do so, because they arise from the deep indignation all Quebecers feel with the attitude of Premier Wells of Newfoundland, who had his legislature tear up one of its own decisions, and who repudiated his predecessor's signature. I will not allow Quebec to be held guilty for wanting to maintain the Meech Lake Accord, which was approved by this House.

Mr. Speaker, I would not say what I think of the behaviour of all those who are on their feet feigning indignation. I will be polite, which the hon. member who just spoke was not. I do not wish to impute to him feelings and attitudes that I find reprehensible. And with that, Mr. Speaker, I leave it to you to set the record straight and to restore my honour. But I want to be sure that no one can ever say of me what was just said here.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Blais: Apologize first.

Mrs. Maheu: Just a minute.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, given that the Minister of the Environment has now categorically stood in his place and indicated that he does not withdraw the words uttered by him the other day, and that he is prepared to repeat the words uttered by him the other day, I withdraw the accusation that the minister is a coward.

He is certainly not a coward, but he has clearly told us that he is not fit for national office.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I was elected as the member for the Lac-Saint-Jean riding. For those who do not know where it is, it is in Quebec. I have been sent here with fellow federal members from Quebec to represent the interests of Quebec within the national government.

We did that, believing that the Meech Lake Accord would be ratified and would be passed. We did that because we believed that people in Canada would honour the signatures of the premiers who signed the Accord in June two years ago.

So I consider myself perfectly fit to assume national responsibilities, and be a Quebecer at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has withdrawn the offending words. He said other words that are not necessarily parliamentary. I am moving to orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: Before moving on, I wonder if both the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Dartmouth could see me in my Chambers on the matter that was raised yesterday.

The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor and I would not want to interrupt that, but perhaps at a time convenient to both of them they could come and see me.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would be more than pleased to meet with Your Honour at a time appropriate and convenient to us all.

• (1520)

To continue, Mr. Speaker, the whole question of dealing with Bill C–62 is a very arduous one. From the very outset the tone was set for the debate in the 1988 election. As we have discussed many times in the past year and half, the credibility of the government is fundamental to whether or not Canadians believe that the goods and services tax is an acceptable proposal.

I think it is fair to say that this proposal did not get off to a very good start when the Minister of Finance characterized our concern about it during the 1988 election campaign by describing the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada as a liar and a coward. We know how abhorrent those terms are in this House. We have just had some indication of that in the kinds of words that have been uttered back and forth across the floor in this place in the last few minutes.

What is extremely critical for Canadians to recognize is the fact that the government is now telling Canadians that this is the only way to proceed in several areas of major concern that it has identified. The government has told us that the existing federal sales tax is so badly flawed that there is no alternative but the goods and services tax.

In 1984, I believe that most Canadians were prepared to give the Minister of Finance the benefit of the doubt, when he stated that he was going to involve himself and his government in a major reform of the tax system in this country. Going back again to the legislation, the draft legislation and the technical documents that were brought forward, it is hard to understand where we went astray.

There were a number of aspects to tax reform when the government began the process in 1984. It involved reform of the tax system as it applied to corporate taxes and also for personal taxation. It was our impression and I believe that of Canadians that this was going to come together as a package.

What is actually taking place is that we are asked to deal with this legislation at this time, after a general election, during which time, the Minister of Finance was describing the Leader of the Liberal Party in very unflattering terms. The government at that point was telling Canadians that there would have to be a rate for a national sales tax that would be lower in every province than the existing federal and provincial sales taxes taken together.

Those are the kinds of statements that were made and on which I believe people depended. We are now being told that the goods and services tax was an issue in the 1988 election, and that Canadians have given this government a mandate to deal with the reform of the system by imposing the goods and services tax. Surely, we are beginning to recognize that there is nothing in the goods and services tax proposal, Bill C–62, that remotely resembles what was either promised in 1984 as part of tax reform, or what was talked about during the 1988 election campaign.

I repeat. The Minister of Finance said, and I quote:

> The rate of the new national sales tax would be lower in every province than the existing federal and provincial taxes taken together.

Except for Alberta, which does not have a provincial sales tax, the imposition of the federal sales tax not only will not result in what that commitment undertook but the provincial sales taxes will be hiked because it is imposed on top of the federal sales tax. So without the provincial governments doing a single thing, we are faced with a situation where not only was this commitment not recognized and adhered to, provincial government sales taxes will be increased because of the cascading effect.

I listen often to members of the government talking about alternatives, and that you have to put forward alternatives. Let us call a spade a spade. The government has had since 1984 to put forward an alternative to the federal sales tax. It has come up with a tax that 80 per cent of Canadians are opposed to.

I want to be very clear that there are groups which have consistently opposed the federal sales tax. They are convinced, as are many Canadians, of the difficulties inherent in the federal sales tax, such as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, at its annual meeting in Saint John, New Brunswick, last fall stated that as bad as the federal sales tax is, unless it was changed and basic requirements and conditions for change were made, then the government should stick with the federal sales tax until it can get this proposal put together properly to let real tax reform take place.

I want to make sure that Canadians understand that the red herring we are being given of there being no alternative, is just that. The Chamber of Commerce—I do not want to misrepresent its position—do believe that the FST should be replaced. It even believes in the principle of the goods and services tax which we in the Liberal party oppose, but the Chamber of Commerce, having taken that position over a number of years, have said to the government and the Standing Committee on Finance as recently as this year, that with the existing proposal, it would recommend to every member of the House of Commons that they vote against the goods and services tax, Bill C-62.

How can we possibly accept the approach of the government members that everyone who is opposed to the goods and services tax is opposed to it either for partisan or political reasons, or doesn't understand it? That was the attitude taken last fall when the goods and services tax was being considered by the Standing Committee on Finance and we travelled across the country.

We went into Alberta and Albertans were told by the standing committee chairman that they were so uninformed about the tax—the actual word used was so "ignorant" about the tax—that grade five teachers from Ontario should be sent west to educate westerners on the goods and services tax. I think it was a monumental mistake for the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance to say that because those Albertans who perhaps did not understand the tax have taken up the issue and have learned enough about it to make sure that they know they are totally opposed to it.

But what particularly irritated Albertans was the cavalier attitude taken by members of the government toward the serious reservations put forward by the premier of Alberta, the hon. Mr. Getty, and his treasurer, the hon. Mr. Johnston.

This is not unheard of but it is extremely unusual in this country to have the Conservative premier of Alberta and the Conservative treasurer of Alberta being told implicitly by government members that they do not understand, that their opposition to the goods and services tax is ill-founded.

Beyond that, to put a little salt in the wound, government members have stated, the Minister of Finance and officials of his department have also said, that Alberta will be better off than any other province in Canada after the imposition of the GST. Imagine the kind of guff that the government is trying to peddle in Alberta.

Here is a government that commissioned its own study. The Government of Alberta commissioned a study released before the end of the year, in which it clearly set out its position that the goods and services tax would have a very negative and serious effect on Alberta. It would cause problems in a number of areas, such as the service industries, the resource-based industries, the tourist industry and will affect disposable income.

So, Mr. Speaker, here we have this very unusual situation of us, to your left, being told by government members, that we do not understand the tax, and that we are doing it because we are exploiting—to quote the Minister of State for Finance—"for political purposes" the fears of people by setting out the GST as a terrible burden on Canadians.

Following a study commissioned by the government of Alberta, and paid for by the taxpayers of Alberta, the premier and treasurer of Alberta have said that the goods and services tax will be a terrible burden on economic activity and the social well-being of the people of Alberta.

The basic question is, who are we to believe? I want to be very clear on this. I have been to Alberta more than once. Everywhere I go people I meet are aware that I am a Liberal. I would not be offended, and I mean this, to be in Alberta and to have people say: "Well, you know Doug Young from northern New Brunswick, a little town called Tracadie, is out here telling us that the goods and services tax is a bad thing for us". They probably would not be very upset with the fact that I am from Tracadie, but they would be very upset with the fact that I am a Liberal. It is a fact of life in Alberta that it can cause you some grief in terms of credibility to go out and tell people that you are a Liberal representing this party and that you come from the east.

• (1530)

If I were the one who was putting forward this premise, I could accept that people would have some reservations. On the weekend the Premier of Alberta, in convention, faced extremely serious questions about the future of this country. I do not want in this place at this time to get into that. I think Canadians from coast to coast were proud of the fact that Albertans and their government stood up for Canada. Surely, I am proud of that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): At the same time the Government of Alberta was faced with having to deal with its colleagues in Ottawa imposing a goods and services tax. I do not want to focus entirely on Alberta. I use it because it best exemplifies the dichotomy that exists in this country from the point of view of Conservatives. Here you are with a party in government, a party which has been there for a long time with Mr. Getty and his predecessor Premier Lougheed, in full open convention dealing with major national issues such as national unity and the economy with the leadership of the premier having been reaffirmed unequivocally, and we have people who have the audacity to say in this place and outside of it that Liberals and members of the New Democratic Party oppose the goods and services tax for partisan reasons.

Canadians have to understand that if Premier Getty and Treasurer Johnston oppose the goods and services tax, surely it cannot be for partisan reasons. Surely it must be because they understand better than anyone what the impact will be on the economy of their province.

I ask Canadians as we continue dealing with what this government wants to do to them with respect to the imposition of the GST to remember not to question the motives of those who point out the difficulties with the goods and services tax, but to question the motives of those who insist that they have seen the light and that their view of the affair is the only one to take and if you do not take it there is something wrong with you. Never argue it on merit. Always try to colour it and play it with smoke and mirrors. It is revenue neutral, but it is going to be a deficit reduction tool. Even I am boggled at times when I start to think about the way the Tories approach Bill C-62, because it does get very convoluted.

Going back to the question of alternatives Canadians have to understand that the Alberta government put forward in its study a clear process that it believes should be followed.

First, it insisted that there had to be meaningful tax reform. That is a situation that I believe we must address when we are talking about the goods and services tax. There is a feeling in the country now that the FST has to go, and surely it should go at an appropriate time when an appropriate tax package is put together. The Government of Alberta in rejecting the goods and services tax did not rush out and say: "This is what we should do specifically". What it said was: "We should have tax reform based on consultation".

I think that that is the key. Let us look at what has happened in Canada in the last four or five years. We have had over 30 tax hikes. We have had significant change, as the last budget indicated, on how Canadians will be able to finance social programs at the provincial and municipal level. The federal government is moving unilaterally in a number of sectors like, for example, with this goods and services tax.

About one year ago in April all the ministers of finance from across the 10 provinces, the Northwest Territories and Yukon were here with the Minister of Finance for the Government of Canada. They undertook, as we understood it at that time, to consult on how we could as a nation go about implementing a national sales tax. The finance ministers then left.

My information is that that is the one and only time there were political discussions about a national sales tax. There had been some preliminary meetings at the officials' level, but this was the first time it was raised in a formal context at the ministerial level.

Within two weeks of that meeting here in Ottawa, the Minister of Finance for Canada unilaterally announced that the Government of Canada was proceeding with the goods and services tax. That repudiated a basic element of what the government had said all along: that it would be integrated, that it would be fair and that the final amount would probably be less than existing provincial sales taxes because the base would be changed.

The whole problem with the goods and services tax is something the government does not seem to understand. I do not think any number of ads could ever overcome that. The people of Canada do not believe the government when it says that it is going to be fair, simple and good especially for those with low incomes.

Can anyone in this country imagine, under any circumstances other than a national emergency like war, famine or something of that nature, a coalition as broad as what has developed around the opposition to the GST? I do not think that we can overstate the case. Canadians from every walk of life, from every part of the country, have come together and said that this is not going to work.

Among those people is small business, and I think it is important to recognize specific areas of concern. Over the years, again because Canadians are becoming extremely well informed about what goes on in our political system, I think that it would be fair to say that John Bulloch, the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, has not been one of the more outspoken or consistent supporters of the Liberal Party of Canada. Mr. Bulloch has mounted major offensives on behalf of his membership against what they consider to be unacceptable tax economic activity on the part of the government.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business represents 70,000 to 80,000 small and medium sized businesses in this country. From the very outset it has consistently opposed the goods and services tax proposal that is before us.

Let us not mince words: the CFIB has said that in principle the goods and services tax approach is one that it could live with, but there were many, many factors that it did not agree with. Among those was the fact that there was a commitment on the part of the government when it talked about tax reform that the goods and services tax would be simple. The response of the small business community in this country to the suggestion that the proposal we have before us is simple is probably best illustrated by how it entitled its response to the goods and services tax. It called it "A Nightmare on Main Street".

Again, we are talking about John Bulloch, the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. This is not a Liberal dominated organization of some kind taking a partisan position on a tax issue for political advantage.

What the government has said, and even what officials of the Department of Finance have said, is that small business in this country does not understand the goods and services tax. It does not realize just how good the goods and services tax will be for it and for the economy. There is a limit to how much condescension people can accept. Here are men and women, struggling every day for years and years. They know their businesses better than anybody. I know some of my friends opposite would say: "Yes, and they had tough times in the late seventies and early eighties". That is right, many of the small businesses had tough times then, which is why they are so sensitive to anything which is going to cause them grief. Many of them have been through it before.

Here are people who have survived high interest rates, difficult times, downturns in the economy and a full recession who are saying that this measure is worse than anything that they have ever gone through. They do not say that lightly because they know they will be challenged. The challenge has been such that no one has wanted to diffuse it.

• (1540)

As recently as a couple of weeks ago Mr. Bulloch was in touch with the government again, begging to meet with the Minister of Finance who refused to meet him, not only on the goods and services tax. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, in the hey-days of tax reform and the conciliatory approach to government that this group of people allegedly practise, that there used to be pre-budget consultation. People like John Bulloch and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business were called in: "Come on in, John. Let's sit down and have a chat about what direction this country is going in, what kind of budget proposals we think we might want to put forward. What kind of suggestions do you have for us?" This year: "Bulloch, you stay in Toronto." "Small business, we do not want to hear from you, not even in the budget consultation, never mind the GST."

How far should the ordinary Canadian go in believing the government's contention that if you understand it, then you will support it? The Canadian Federation of Independent Business is a very sophisticated operation. It has looked into this in great detail. For months and months and months it told us in all kinds of ways. It had polls taken of its membership, which it does on a regular basis. It interviewed people in various segments of small business to find out how the GST would impact on the different kinds of small businesses, and they said: "This is going to be a nightmare on Main Street." But the government said: "You just do not understand it."

We talked about the nightmare that small business would have to administer. These are people who should understand it. We have had a hard time deciding what are biscuits, muffins, cakes, chocolate bars, wafers and all the rest of it, but it goes far beyond that. Take the corner store, for example. The corner store in a way in people's minds has become the old general store of years ago in the country where that one store sort of served everybody's needs from equipment for the farm to clothing, to the necessities of life, food and patent medicines and so forth.

The corner store in a way in many areas of this country has taken on that kind of aura. It is the mom and pop operation. People are working hard all hours of the day and night, seven days a week and so forth.

Rather than deal in the abstract, let's just walk into that store. There is a young lady working there on a Sunday afternoon, probably the daughter of the owner or the daughter of a friend of the owner. Certainly she is somebody from just down the street, not from out of town. She has not graduated from the Harvard School of Business or anything of that nature.

This person is going to be asked to deal with all the items in that store. Corner stores now carry a vast variety of items similar in so many ways to what we had 50 years or 100 years ago in the general store; different but similar. Instead of having equipment for the farm maybe there are videos for rent. They will still have the odd bit of patent medicines, aspirins and that kind of thing. They will have a microwave as opposed to the old stove that people sat around. Out of that microwave comes the kaiser roll and a slice of ham and a piece of cheese.

Do you know what happens, Mr. Speaker? That young person standing at the cash register has to decide on some very important stuff. If that person is fortunate and has a member of Parliament who took home the simple tax law to them, this is what she could have as reading material sitting up around the cash register. She could say: "Let's take a look at this, because there must be an answer to my problem in here."

This is what has been put together. I got rid of a lot of the stuff that we dealt with this morning. This is just starting with the draft legislation that we got in October 1989. These are not the technical documents that we got in August 1989. We have already dealt with that.

Mr. Speaker, picture this person sitting there or standing there, having to deal with the myriad items that are in that store. There is ice cream in the store. That person will have to remember: "Ice cream, if it is in a cone I handle it one way, but if it is in the deep freeze and it is in a container then that is another way. Then I have that microwave to worry about because McCain's makes pizzas." I hope you will not mind, Mr. Speaker, if I put a little plug in for a good New Brunswick business. So now you have a situation where there is a McCain's pizza, and if you take that pizza out of that corner store and take it home and put it in your microwave, then that is okay. The young lady has to know how to charge you for that.

But if the young lady is industrious and her dad and mom have said: "Look, why send him down to Pizza-Pizza when we can do that here. Let's cut that McCain pizza in four pieces and as people come in you can fire it into the microwave and we will sell it by the slice". But that is a different kind of thing, and it has to be paid for.

I could go on literally for hours. Everybody who came before us kept setting out specific examples of some things that are taxed provincially but are not taxed federally; some things that are taxed federally but are not taxed provincially; some things are taxed at both levels; and other things are not taxed at all.

I am coming to the problem that John Bulloch and small businesses have had in convincing the government that they understand their problems far better than the government recognizes the kind of mess it is creating for them.

You would think that next to that young lady there would be a cash register. You can go into places now such as a major food retailer and there are all kinds of sounds that we would not have heard in a general store 50 or 100 years ago—little beep-beep-beeps as the electronic gadgets check over the markings on all kinds of products and decide how much you are going to pay for them.

In the large operations they will have to calculate to some extent how they are going to apply the goods and services tax. Is it going to be on single servings? Is it going to be on a small can of soup or just a big can of soup because a small can of soup can be heated there whereas the large can soup most likely will be taken home? There are lunch counters in these large food outlets.

But back at the corner store we have the young lady trying to figure out how she is going to do this. "Well", you say, "there is no problem. Let's get her a cash register". All one has to do in this day of technological progress is program it. Of course that's no problem. How many different kinds of items would there be in a corner store? I suppose it would depend if the corner store is in a small rural area of Canada, or if it is a Mac's Milk, a Green Gables, or one of the larger operations in one of the metropolitan areas. I do not know. Would there be a thousand items? Five hundred? Five thousand? When the price changes who programs it? Who goes in and takes care of all this? Is it the girl sitting there helping out her parents on the weekend? Is it the mother, the father? How is this all done by small business? Is there some magical trick to pricing that allows for the complexity of Canada being the only country in the world with two levels of consumer taxation.

The people who have had to address that are in the business of trying to provide that young person with an answer to her problem. They have cash registers, point-of-sale equipment. You would think this is a heck of a windfall for them. If you were in the business you would be saying: "Gosh, they must really be looking forward to this". However, they realize that they are dealing with people on very limited incomes in terms of profit margins. The competition is fierce, the hours are long, and the return is very limited. But they are also faced with real limitations in terms of technology.

Sweda Canada Inc. manufactures 35 different models of point-of-sale equipment that it supplies to Canadian retailers. It has written letters two and three pages long explaining just how difficult this is going to be. This is not somebody with an abacus or pocket calculator. We are talking about sophisticated companies dealing on a world-wide basis with point-of-sale equipment.

Mr. Speaker, can I for the record read to the House a letter I received on March 30 from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business telling us that its consultations with Sweda had this result:

> Dear Mr. Young:
>
> Information received from the cash register industry confirms our position that the goods and services tax should not be implemented until agreement can be reached with the provinces on a harmonized sales tax system.

• (1550)

The CFIB understands what is needed to reduce the administrative nightmare.

> The attached material produced by our research department and a letter written by Peter S. Boyle, President of Sweda Canada Inc., confirm that the industry would not be able to meet the demand for new equipment or the conversion of existing equipment in less than a year after all the rules and regulations pertaining to the GST and the nine provincial sales tax systems have been finalized. To proceed with the proposed two-tier GST sales tax system will cause chaos at the cash register and wide-spread consumer confusion.
> We urge you to use all of your influence and efforts to prevent this ill-conceived tax from being implemented.

The letter is signed by John Bulloch.

That is not very ambiguous. What he is saying is that it cannot be done efficiently.

As my colleagues will recognize, when the Auditor General came before the committee he raised very serious concerns about the government being able to put a system in place that could effectively and efficiently administer and collect the goods and services tax. He talked about losses of millions of dollars a day in the initial phases if the system was not put in place adequately.

With all due respect, and it certainly is the mandate of the Auditor General, he was concerned about that slippage, that loss from the point of view of the Canadian taxpayer and revenues for the Canadian government. The purpose of replacing the FST with the GST is to avoid all the slippage we are being told occurs with the existing federal sales tax.

As much as I understand and sympathize with the Auditor General that it is important for the Government of Canada to get the revenues that are coming to them, imagine what it does for the small business. Not what it does just to one, but what it does to 10, what it does to them in Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland and across the country. Imagine what this is going to do to small business.

If government is having the trouble it is—and I do not want to get into the details of it trying to find space in Ottawa, which has been a saga in its own right—then Canadians have got to be asking themselves the question: "If a company like Sweda is saying: 'We are not at all convinced that we can be prepared within a year of getting all the rules in place and knowing exactly what kind of a structure we need', how are we going to do this in the next seven or eight months?"

The hidden cost of the FST was something that the government made a major issue of, that Canadians are paying the federal sales tax on a whole series of manufactured items and they really do not know that they are paying it. If you went out right now and asked Canadians: "Would you rather keep paying that thing that you do not know you are paying, or would you like to pay the GST?" I think every Canadian would opt for the devil he does not know, rather than the devil that is coming down the track that he knows all too well by this stage of the game.

When you look at the private sector, you see that the federal sales tax had about 75,000 clients. There were about 1,300 or 1,400 people to collect that tax. There were hidden costs to the consumer, no doubt, and it caused difficulties for exports. There was unfair competition from imports that did not have similar tax. We have heard all of that. What about the hidden cost of compliance for small business?

Instead of 75,000 manufacturers having a problem—and that to varying degrees because not all those 75,000 manufacturers had huge problems, but they all perhaps had some—now there are between 1.5 million and 1.6 million registrants under the goods and services tax. Imagine what it is going to cost each of them each year to collect this tax. The government is going to help out a little bit, one time. What will happen next year and the year after?

Again, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business talks about an average cost per year of $1,300. That is from a taxi operator, for example, who is going to be a registrant. A person who is involved in running a hairdressing operation is going to be a registrant. Canadian Tire is going to be a registrant. Major, major retailers are going to be registrants. The average cost will be $1,300 per registrant. That is a hidden cost.

When you go in to buy a product at my corner store and that young person is sitting there, that cost has to be absorbed by that operation. Will the consumer know that? What is the cost of $1,300 per registrant when there are 1.5 million of them? Just think about it. There are huge hidden costs, huge problems for small business. It is an impossible technological challenge, at least in the short term, for anyone who has to implement the goods and services tax.

I have to go back to a point I made this morning in discussing this bill. Why would anybody want to do this to Canadians? In the face of what the industry and small businesses are saying about the point-of-sale equipment, why would the government embark on a course of forcing the goods and services tax down the throats of Canadians?

Why would it want to choke us at a time when we are suffering from high interest rates? The government says that now there is no hope for lower interest rates. I am sure you will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that a month ago in the budget the government said that there was hope for lower interest rates. This is why Canadians are having such a hard time believing that things will go well with this proposal.

In his budget the Minister of Finance says that he expects this year that the interest rate will be at 11.1 per cent. We are just barely into the year now but the same Minister of Finance, who had a different audience when he released his budget on February 20, told Canadians that everything in the budget was based on the premise that the interest rate over the year will average 11.1 per cent. He said that that was achievable and that Canadians should be confident.

As a matter of fact, he did not stop there. This year he was extremely confident. Last year, in the budget of 1989, he told us that by the end of 1989 and the beginning of 1990 interest rates would be around 10 per cent. You know, Mr. Speaker, how well we did with that.

This year, the minister very confidently predicted that by next year the rate would be down to 9 per cent. This is why Canadians have enormous difficulty believing that the goods and services tax that is being proposed is going to be good for them because nothing that has been suggested has come to pass.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance was very confident about a number of other things. He was predicting in his five-year budget and economic recovery plan in 1985 that our deficit would be down below $20 billion. Of course, we have had two increases in the deficit in the last two years. The government worked at it for a while and then a thing called an election came along. That sort of threw the plan off.

In 1989, the average interest rate was 12.2 per cent. The minister had said it would be around 10 per cent. The projection for 1990 was 11.1 per cent. You might want to put three or four points on that if you are going to reflect what most economists and most analysts in Canada believe.

Here is the real hook, Mr. Speaker. In 1991, with inflation being bumped up by the GST by at least 1.25 per cent, according to his own figures, the Minister of Finance is predicting that the interest rate will be down to 9.5 per cent. Well, I have some swampland in Florida I want to sell tomorrow to the Minister of Finance at interest rates somewhat above 9.5 though, because even at that I could not make a buck.

If we are serious in trying to deal with how Canadians will cope with this tax and why members opposite should vote against the tax, then let us look at problems from a cash flow point of view for small business. Small business does not have the capacity or the lines of credit that large manufacturing plants do. We know that the FST caused problems for 75,000 manufacturers. What is going to happen with small business? They are involved with things such as the 21 days, input credits, paperwork, getting their money back, writing this off, dealing with a non-profit organization, is it 50 per cent, and dealing with goods across the board.

For example, when ice cream is manufactured, how much of it is going to go into ice cream cones and how much of it is going to go into tubs. One could say it does not make any difference because they will not be paying the goods and services tax anymore. That is right. It is quite a break for the manufacturer of ice cream. However, once it gets to the corner store, it is a big headache. The headache is taken away from the manufacturer who is going to supply 500 corner stores and the problem is put on mom and dad and the people who are trying to eke out a living.

I talked about the hidden costs. In most small businesses the margin of profit is very narrow. After the people who are usually self-employed take reasonable and, in many instances, very minimal salaries out, there is very little money left to reinvest, maintain inventory, and upgrade. The compliance costs are estimated by the CFIB at being at $1,200, $1,300 and $1,400 a year on average. What does that do to already shrinking margins of profit?

We believe that, had the government listened to the people who came before the Standing Committee on Finance and had the Conservative members sitting on that committee listened, this is what they would have heard. They would have heard many people say that they accepted the principle of a goods and services tax. There is no doubt about that. Many people who came before the committee representing organizations and groups said, yes, they could live with the goods and services tax, but there was this problem, that problem and the other problem and they set out a litany of complaints. They said: "If you cannot do these things, it is going to be disastrous for us."

I am not exaggerating. All the briefs and the comments made by the 300 or so witnesses that we actually heard, as well as the hundreds of briefs that came in from people who did not get to appear before the committee, laid end to end would never, ever fill the bill. Without exception, everybody who came along had all kinds of complaints, suggestions, concerns, fears, and problems of every nature and description.

There was one thing they understood, and this was terrifying and I can understand why members opposite will feel that they have to vote with the government on this. Even sophisticated, strong and well-represented organizations believed the government would drive the GST through no matter what. They came in with an olive branch. If the truth were known, many of those people did not support the GST at all in any way, shape or form. They thought they might get a break if they came and said: "Look, we know you are going to do this anyway." It is the old story: If I am going to get strapped or struck with a whip or a bat, or anything else, and I know it is inevitable, I am going to try to negotiate it down to as few bashes as possible. There was this very sorry spectacle of people coming in and saying: Look, we don't want anybody to get the wrong impression. We think the government has to do this and it has to be done, but could you help me out?" This went on and on. There was not any great reason for people to be concerned about the fact that they were going to be apologetic and they were going to be looking for ways out.

As you well know, Mr. Speaker, we have been through the documents of August, 1989 when the technical documents were brought forward. It was a very large document and then a subsequent document to explain it. Then, all kinds of pamphlets came out and told us how to try to figure this whole deal out. In October, out came draft legislation because the original documents were technical documents. This is the draft legislation that the government brought forward after about five years of being in office. It provided us with this and said to take a look at it and go across the country.

The Standing Committee on Finance then sat in hearings across the country and produced these two documents. Generally speaking, this is what Conservative members found to be unacceptable or should be corrected during those hearings. The New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party filed minority reports dealing with suggestions on how real tax reform might take place.

Mr. Dorin: What was your alternative?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Edmonton asks about the Liberal alternative and I want to take a moment because I think that that is a very fair question. I want to quote from two sources as to the alternative.

First, I will quote from the study prepared by the Government of Alberta, commissioned by Premier Don Getty and the Treasurer Dick Johnston, wherein it states without equivocation that it is opposed to the goods and services tax. It suggests, first, that meaningful tax reform take place in consultation with the provinces. I was struck by the common sense being exhibited by the Conservative Premier of Alberta, and particularly his treasurer.

The hon. member from Edmonton will recall well the meeting we had in Edmonton and the wonderful reception that was provided for members of the Standing Committee on Finance by the Government of Alberta at Government House in Edmonton. On that occasion I was absolutely enthralled by the lucid exposition of the problems of Alberta put forward by the Treasurer, the Hon. Mr. Johnston. I was so excited by his approach where he indicated clearly, based on their information, that Alberta would suffer so terribly under the goods and services tax that we took it upon ourselves as Liberals to learn from what the Treasurer of Alberta and the Premier had done in terms of their work on their report. We listened to the Mayor of Vancouver, His Worship Mayor Campbell, in his presentation before the Standing Committee on Finance in Vancouver. I know that the hon. member from Edmonton was present at that hearing as well. The Liberal alternative could be summarized as being based very, very much on the very thoughtful suggestions made by the Premier and the Treasurer of Alberta and the Mayor of Vancouver.

In our minority report, we indicated that tax reform was certainly very, very important and that meaningful and massive tax reform should be based on principles. There were a lot of goods thoughts put forward. Because the original premise set out in the documents that were put forward by the Minister of Finance in how the goods and services tax, the value added tax, or whatever form that tax took, would have to be based on certain principles, we compiled and distilled the best ideas from all. This is what we came up with. We said this in our minority report:

> Acknowledging that overall tax reform will be a complex and delicate process—

God knows that that is true, Mr. Speaker, because the Conservative government after five and half years has come forward with a process that has 80 per cent of the Canadian people against it.

> —it is important for Liberals to make clear the principles upon which tax reform should be based.

These are the principles on which we would base our tax reform, and they are taken nearly verbatim from the premises put forward by the Minister of Finance in a number of documents relating to his own tax reform proposals. Our report continues:

> 1. Fairness—A Tax System Based on the Ability to Pay
> The Liberal Party has always stood for and defended a fair and progressive tax system. Reform must respect the principle that the burden of paying taxes should be based on the ability to pay.

That would be the very first principle that we would have to respect. The report goes on, and this will sound very familiar to the member from Edmonton:

> 2. Simplicity
> Tax reform must be designed to make the tax system easier for Canadians to understand and thus ensure compliance.

Compliance is a major problem with the existing federal sales tax and we listened carefully to Canadians who said that. So we said we have to make sure that the tax system allows for compliance. We went on to say:

> Voluntary compliance has always been the foundation of our tax system. But——we questioned and I think rightfully so—

> —for how long will Canadians continue to comply voluntarily with a system that is beyond comprehension—

We recognize that the FST did have those problems, but we were not positive that this kind of tax reform that was called simple would really meet that test.

• (1610)

Obviously, again relying on the very valid points made by the Minister of Finance when he first began this adventure of tax reform, our third principle was integration. This is what we said in the Liberal minority report from the Standing Committee on Finance:

> Sales tax reform cannot be undertaken independent of income tax reform, corporate tax reform, social welfare reform or independently of the other levels of government. Canada is in need of an overall tax reform that encompasses all forms of taxation and all levels of government. An integrated tax reform must recognize that while there are several levels of government in Canada, they will all look to the same person to pay their bills—the taxpayer.

That is as accurate a reflection as we could arrive at to put into words what had been expressed to us, particularly by the Treasurer of Alberta, the Hon. Dick Johnston and the Mayor of Vancouver, His Worship Mayor Campbell. They both expressed the fear of what is happening to our system. The federal government encroaches on provincial jurisdiction and makes it more difficult for provincial jurisdictions to be flexible enough to be able to respond to the needs of their own government administration, apparatus and programs.

Very fundamental to the whole discussion was what was happening to municipalities and how they were being left totally out of the equation. As the federal government plays its tax games, and the provincial governments play their tax games, all of a sudden, people who for centuries have depended on real property taxes were being squeezed out. I thought that was the most interesting point that was made in Vancouver by Mayor Campbell.

Going back to the principles put forward by the Minister of Finance when the Conservative government embarked on its tax reform program, the fourth element that we addressed in our minority report was visibility. The Liberal minority report said this:

> Canadian taxpayers have a right to know what taxes they are paying. Any reform of the tax system should be designed to help Canadians understand exactly how much and to which level of government they are paying their taxes.

That question of visibility was addressed by practically everyone who came before us. Because of the existing federal sales tax, people were very concerned. I want to come back to the question of visibility because I am very upset that in the government document, the question of visibility is not addressed in Bill C-62 to the extent that Canadians expected it would be.

The whole idea of visibility was seen by many Canadians as being a deterrent to free-spending governments, which would just raise the tax, get the money it needs at election time for promises, spend it foolishly, and then all of a sudden be in extremely difficult times. Above and beyond the discussion on goods and services tax, tax fairness, and that kind of thing, the recurrent theme throughout all of the hearings on the goods and services tax across the country and here in Ottawa, was Canadians talking about the terrible burden of the deficit and debt.

The fifth principle, and this is the last one, dealt with revenue neutrality. This again was taken directly from the principles put forward by the Minister of Finance as the Conservative government began its process of tax reform. The report states:

> Tax reform should not be a smoke-screen for raising taxes. Rather, tax reform should be undertaken with the goal of improving the tax system.

—and making it more fair.

> If a flawed tax can be replaced with a better tax, then it should be done in a way that does not raise the revenues of the government. In this way the new tax would be less likely to affect the economy adversely and Canadians would be better able to judge whether the new tax is working fairly and effectively.

One of the reasons for bringing this particular idea forward is that the government had indicated that it was a fundamental part of its initial program. That is what it had committed to, but had not followed through on. Even more telling was the tremendous commitment of the member for Mississauga South to fairness and to openness. He was the first to jump and sound the alarm when the goods and services tax was proposed in the 1988 election. That was first and foremost in our minds as we drafted our minority report. The hon. Member for Mississauga South, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, had clearly seen the tax-grab that was inherent in that proposal put forward during the election campaign by the Minister of Finance.

It is hard to believe but the Member for Mississauga South believed that anywhere from $10 billion to $14 billion would accrue as a windfall to the government if the tax went through at 9 per cent. It was obvious that we had to address the question of revenue neutrality, since the government had said it would do it, and the Member for Mississauga South was so impassioned and articulate in his commitment to the fact that if one is going to do something, say it. If one is going to go for an extra $8 billion, $10 billion or $14 billion, one should not sit back and all of a sudden find it as a windfall, and say: "Oh, my goodness, are we ever lucky! This is the gold at the end of the GST rainbow." He saw it coming, so we wanted to address it.

In summary, my friend from Edmonton Northwest was very kind in asking the question and that is why I want to address it as completely as I can. In fact, tax reform would have to be based on fairness and simplicity. It would have to be integrated. It would have to be very visible and, of course, it would have to be revenue neutral.

After five and a half years, the government, not having consulted or worked at making sure it came forward with a tax reform package that was acceptable to Canadians, is in this morass of the GST. There is as much unrest as any of us have ever seen with respect to a tax bill in the country. Even John Bulloch's tremendous fight years ago against a budget that we will all remember did not come anywhere near this. There are some parallels.

I remember in this place, not all that long ago, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom told Canadians and members of this place that the free trade deal would be a good deal. We know that there is a great deal of affinity between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. If one wanted to push an analogy right to the limits, I suppose one could say that the Prime Minister of Canada appears to want to duplicate what is going on in the UK with respect to the infamous poll tax. Surely the Prime Minister is not prepared to push Canadians to the wall, but I think one could say that we are going in that direction. Canadians have a great deal of patience, but it is being tested.

We are not into Boston tea parties, particularly, and we all know that in Canada there is perhaps a lack of awareness on people who are not native to this country. I look at the Governor of the Bank of Canada, for example, and I wonder sometimes if he really understands Canadians when he suggests that there should be wage moderation and that we have to have higher unemployment to control inflation, and that we have to have high interest rates. It is one thing to say: "Let them eat bread," but I suspect that many Canadians, having learned that the Governor of the Bank of Canada has just enjoyed wage increases between 20 per cent and 40 per cent over the last three years, might want to eat some "crow" at this stage. That is not the way that we normally do things. I would think that Canadians will want to have many opportunities to continue to express their concerns about the goods and services tax, and I am sure they will do that.

I want to discuss the alternative that we believe arises normally out of the principles that we have set forth and on which we would base tax reform. Obviously, the first thing that we would want the government to do is to withdraw the goods and services tax. We think that that is what Canadians want. It is not a question of whether the Liberal party wants it or the New Democratic Party wants it. Canadians are saying: "Look, withdraw the tax. There is a federal sales tax there. You are raising $18.5 billion. That is two and a half times more than you were raising in 1984 when the tax was at 9 per cent. You have moved it from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. We know it is there now. It is not as visible as it should be, but there are very few Canadians after all the hooha that has gone on who don't know there is a federal sales tax there."

The Chamber of Commerce says: "Withdraw it." The Canadian Labour Congress says: "Withdraw it." The CFIB says: "Withdraw it." Poor people say: "Withdraw it." Senior citizens say: "Withdraw it." And we believe that that is what should be done. We also believe that we have to have massive, fair, total tax reform. That tax reform has to be predicated on the basis that there is only one taxpayer in Canada. Whether that taxpayer is paying municipal water rates, sidewalk taxes, or property taxes, provincial sales taxes, excise taxes, gasoline taxes, taxes on booze, income taxes, goods and services taxes, federal sales taxes, or tobacco taxes, there is only one taxpayer. We cannot continue to pretend that one government can move, unilaterally, and say it is going to correct its problem by raising taxes, or as this government has done, not only raise taxes and impose new taxes, but shift the burden onto the provinces by forcing them to either reduce services or increase taxes as well.

One of the strangest things I have heard in a long time was a statement made by the Prime Minister today that Canadians will love the GST. It boggles the mind that the Prime Minister would say that, unless he is convinced that the advertising campaign that his government is undertaking will do it.

We hope that there will be a will in this country at the municipal, provincial and particularly the national level to get involved in some real tax reform and I think we can be terribly creative. My friend, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has put forward a tax proposal for a simple and a fair tax that has generated a lot of interest all over the country. Some people will attack it and say, "Is that the Liberal party position?", or there may be some problems with it. That is not the point. It is an alternative that has every right to be considered. Other people have put forward personal expenditure tax proposals, luxury taxes, corporate taxes, wealth taxes, corporate profits being deemed as dividends in the hands of shareholders for tax purposes. There are all kinds of situations that we have to address.

One area that is of particular interest to me and I believe it will become that to many Canadians, is that I am not sure that real property taxes are any longer a measure of a person's capacity to pay. I think they become location taxes. You could have a home, Mr. Speaker, in St. John's, Newfoundland, in Fredericton, New Brunswick, in Halifax, Nova Scotia, in Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Willowdale and the same house will be very much the same price. There will be some differences because of local costs involved in terms of the people who build the house, the physical labour, but the cost of transporting goods to St. John's, Newfoundland or to Victoria, British Columbia, goods coming out of Toronto or Montreal, will balance out, so the cost of the house itself will be very similar. There may be larger and more expensive homes in Toronto than in Tracadie, but what has evolved in this country is a system where the land beneath the house dictates the price of the house. Where the land is located decides what is the value and the price of the land.

Should we call into question what we have traditionally accepted as the Bible on local taxation and revenue generation for municipalities, real property taxes? Well, that has to be done in the context of tax reform.

For instance, take the case of a widow in Chatham, New Brunswick, who moved into a home with her husband and family 40 or 50 years ago. Her means really have not changed very much, but life has continued on and perhaps she is very comfortable. That house might be worth far more than she ever dreamed it would be worth. However, the only way she can realize that equity is to sell it, and then what does she do? People say, yes, but we have to tax it because it is situated in town and we have to get our money out of it.

This has happened with remarkable results in places like Toronto, where people bought homes for $30,000 and $40,000 and are now sitting on real estate that is worth $500,000 and more. For people from other parts of the country, it is difficult to believe how people can buy a home in Vancouver, never mind how they can maintain it and pay taxes, insurance, and so forth.

I do not want to belabour the subject, but I think that when we get into tax reform we will want to look at real property taxes. We will want to look at something that is only now beginning to surface and that is the whole question of water rates.

In Canada we have taken as a given, since we have been here, that we have clean, pure and good water and lots of it. In some municipalities people pay nothing for water. They have water to their door in a system where they pay nothing. In other municipalities it is costing more than $1,000 a year for water for a residence. Is that fair? People have to have water. At one point it was so minimal that it just seemed to be fair that a system for generating revenues for a municipality was arranged where water was part of it.

I do not think that we want to be locked in with old ideas. We have to look at what Dennis Mills has to say about taxation. I think we have to look at what Neil Brooks has to say about taxation. I think we have to look at the Fraser Institute, the C.D. Howe Institute, the Economic Council of Canada, at what Pat Grady, McCormick and all the rest have to say about taxation. We do not want to be, under any circumstances, involved in trying to deal with—

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I noticed that my colleague from Gloucester noted a couple of minutes ago that he did not want to belabour the point. I simply wanted to request that he contribute to a fair debate in the House of Commons by permitting the leader of our party to make her contribution to this debate.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I wanted to say that there has been a kind of cosy deal here between the government and the New Democratic Party which has deprived members in this Party—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am listening to the point of order. If the hon. member would come to the point of order, then I will resolve this grievance immediately.

Mr. Milliken: Your Honour, the difficulty seems to be that the member has asked whether or not my colleague is about to finish his speech. I was enjoying his speech very much and I think that the point I was seeking to make was that, because of the sweetheart deal that has been made between the government and the New Democratic Party, we in this Party have been deprived of our opportunity to debate this bill on numerous occasions and my friend—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not find that a point of order. I find this a grievance. The hon. member has unlimited time, and I am afraid I am going to have to recognize the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on that same point of order. The only point that I would want to make to my hon. friend who just spoke on behalf of the Liberal Party is that there are no cosy deals with this government, with either the Liberal Party or the NDP on GST. It is important for us to get the GST legislation through and let the hon. member speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order either. It is a point of debate and a grievance. The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. minister, I think we would all agree with that, that there are no cosy deals with the government. Anybody who would make a cosy deal with the government at this point would have to be a fool. This is just not the time.

In dealing with Bill C-62, I think we need to recognize the point that was made by my hon. friend with respect to participation by all members. It goes without saying that, since we began dealing with the goods and services tax, we in the Liberal Party have tried to deal with it in a very forthright and dignified way. We intend to do that throughout the remainder of this debate. Canadians have come to understand this fact.

• (1630)

If we are going to deal with tax reform, we are going to have to deal with it on the basis of what people are saying, what people are doing, and how people are presenting the alternatives that they hope Canadians will have to look at at some point.

I want to return to the alternatives. One of the problems with the goods and services tax that many, many people—

Mr. Butland: Be fair.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I hear things about alternatives. I will be fair. I will address the concerns of the New Democratic Party because I want to make sure that Canadians understand what is happening with the goods and services tax as it applies to the New Democratic Party.

When we began consideration at the Standing Committee on Finance on this matter, we had to deal with a number of people who wanted to appear before that committee—

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Essex—Windsor on a point of order.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, if in fact the speaker wishes to address points dealing with the New Democratic Party, it seems to me he has at least a responsibility to permit New Democrats to speak in this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think I have to listen to any more grievances. I appreciate what the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is saying, but this House has made up its own rules and whence the rules are changed we will be able to look after such problems. The hon. member for Gloucester does have the floor on debate.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to the rules and how they are applied, how they are interpreted and how they affect members of this place whether we are in the House or in the Standing Committee on Finance. One of the things that I was looking forward to as a member of the committee was the presentation that was scheduled on a Monday a few weeks ago by the New Democratic Party and a further presentation that was to have been made by the New Brunswick Federation of Labour.

I want to point out that the leader of the New Democratic Party of New Brunswick was here in Ottawa to assist in the presentation of her party. Mr. McCarthy, the president of the New Brunswick Federation of Labour, was here to assist in the presentation. Further, representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress were present in Ottawa and prepared to make presentations to the Standing Committee on Finance. I was looking forward with a great deal of anticipation to those presentations being made, as I am sure were all my colleagues.

Unfortunately we were unable to hear those persons. There was a procedural wrangle. The government became involved in moving motions in retribution for the way the New Democratic Party had handled matters previously when other witnesses were present at the beginning of hearings. This went on, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that you deplored it as much as I did, for hours and hours and hours. The only redeeming grace in the whole thing was that, thank goodness, the New Democratic Party left its brief with members of the committee as did the New Brunswick Federation of Labour and the Canadian Labour Congress.

What we have today is a situation where I am glad to be able to help out in this way. I can indicate that as the Liberal Party said when we filed our minority report last fall we believe in massive and total tax reform based on the principles that I read today and which have been articulated over and over and over again. I cannot repeat it often enough. Any tax reform has to be based on fairness and simplicity. It has to be integrated into an over-all system respecting provinces and municipalities. It must be visible and it must be revenue neutral.

This was part of the minority report that was filed. From time to time, by various members of the New Democratic Party, the suggestion was made that there was no alternative. Treasurers and ministers of finance across the country at the provincial level were saying: "You have to consult with us. You have to understand what the impact is on us". Mayors, like the mayor of Vancouver said: "You have to understand the burden and the difficulty we are faced with when governments move unilaterally".

We took all of that into consideration and we said: "The Conservatives have not listened. We are in a terrible mess here." They would not listen. They did not care. We were going across the country. We were listening and we heard and we paid attention. My colleague from Sudbury and various other members of the committee sat down and said: "We have to put this together. We spent all this time listening. We will have to do it".

The New Democratic Party had done the same thing, had gone through the same process. Every now and then, like a sound from the depths, we would hear: "What is your alternative?". We would say that our alternative was to deal with tax reform in a meaningful way based on these fundamental principles that Conservatives and everybody else in the country, I am sure, agree on. The Conservatives had them set out in their documents dealing with their tax reform package. Unfortunately they had not met the test that they had set for themselves.

Then, as I say, thankfully I was able to read the briefs that were brought before the committee on that day. Through all kinds of machinations and tomfoolery that I would never get into, do not want to mention, and hope I never see again, we were unable to hear people who came in from my province of New Brunswick and from Sudbury.

Mr. Milliken: Why?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The only explanation was tit for tat.The Tories were mad because the NDP had acted up and filibustered when other witnesses were before the committee. The New Democratic Party is a nationally recognized party. Where is it in the polls now?

Mr. Milliken: They are slipping too.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): They are going down with the new leader.

Mr. Langdon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Here we were with people who were coming in to try to deal with serious measures and we just could not get to listen to them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Essex—Windsor on a point of order.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt this fascinating, absolutely brilliant speech by the member for Gloucester, but he has suggested that the New Democratic Party has been declining in the public opinion polls. I simply point out to him that the most recent polls in fact show us going up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor on debate.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I want to deal with the facts that would have been presented to the Standing Committee on Finance had we been able to hear these people when they travelled from all over the country to Ottawa to be heard.

I refer to the brief presented by the New Brunswick Federation of Labour. It is very important to make these points clear when you are talking about alternatives because the implication has always been that the New Democratic Party has alternatives. I would like you, Mr. Speaker, to listen to this very closely.

The New Brunswick Federation of Labour joins with the trade union movement across Canada in rejecting the GST and demanding a royal commission on taxation.

Mr. Epp: We've had 20 of them.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The minister says that we have had 20. This is the NDP. The New Brunswick Federation of Labour asked that there be a royal commission. This is very interesting stuff.

Here is the New Democratic Party's presentation to the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs—

Mr. Langdon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Essex—Windsor on another point of order.

Mr. Langdon: I appreciate very much the effort on the part of the Liberal finance critic to put these points on the floor. I would simply ask, especially as he is a member of Parliament from New Brunswick, that he not insult the New Brunswick—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate. The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote the Canadian Labour Congress and the brief that it presented.

Mr. Langdon: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): This is what the Canadian Labour Congress had to say: "Today we again urge the government, through this committee, to withdraw the proposed GST and instead launch an independent systematic review of the existing tax system". That sounds good to me; that sounds real good to me.

Mr. Langdon: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The following are the comments made by the New Democratic Party in its brief presented to the Standing Committee on Finance: "The New Democrats would start the process toward a fairer tax—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Langdon: The point of order which I was finishing was that the member had suggested that he would outline the alternatives of the New Brunswick Federation of Labour. He mentioned just one point from the brief and I would urge him, as an MP from that province, to—

• (1640)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. It is a point of debate. The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I understand the point being made by the member. I do not blame him for being embarrassed. If the New Democratic Party has a position, why does it want a royal commission? If you have a position, you have a position. The New Democratic Party says in its own brief: "New Democrats would start the process toward a fairer tax system by rolling back the level of the existing sales tax to 1984. Of course this would only be an interim measure, as New Democrats believe the time has come for another royal commission."

Mr. Whittaker: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, this is the New Democratic Party. It has a position and it wants a royal commission.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is another point of order by the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I know this particular member for Gloucester to be an honourable person. He has spoken of fairness and honesty with respect to alternatives. I would urge him to wrap up his speech and give the Leader of the New Democratic Party the opportunity of putting some of those alternatives to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the point I am trying to make is a very simple one. The government has had a lot of difficulty in selling the GST. The New Democratic Party has said over and over again that it wants a royal commission to be able to develop a position. I understand that. There is no problem with that.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Our position is very clear. We have said over and over again that the only basis for tax reform in this country is to deal with it in a fair and equitable way.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn on a point of order.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I take exception to the—

Mr. Epp: That's not a point of order.

Mr. Fisher: The member has insinuated that the New Democratic Party somehow brought the CLC and the New Brunswick Federation of Labour—

Some Hon. Members: Debate.

Mr. Fisher: We had their support.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate. The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. Peterson: On a personal point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Epp: Personal? What's the difference between that and privilege?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Willowdale has a point of privilege.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House for the last 15 minutes listening to the member for Gloucester making very credible points. During that period of time I have counted and there have been 10 interruptions by the NDP on spurious points of order. I feel my ability to carry out my function on behalf of the people of Willowdale is being impaired by the disorderly conduct in this Chamber of those members. I can only suggest that the only discipline appropriate would be to cut them off.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of privilege. It is a point of debate. It is a grievance. The hon. member for Gloucester has a couple of minutes left.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, again in the spirit of fairness, we should make sure that the point of view that would have been expressed at the Standing Committee on Finance on the day in question is heard in this House. It is very simple. I feel very badly that the New Democratic Party does not want to recognize the documents that were brought forward here. This is a presentation by the Canadian Labour Congress to the House of Commons on the goods and services tax—

Mr. Dorin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest on a point of order.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has put forward a very interesting tax proposal. I am wondering whether the hon. member for Gloucester can respond today and endorse that on behalf of the Liberal Party, and then we could perhaps all agree to go forward.

Some Hon. Members: Debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Edmonton East—Petro-Canada; the hon. member for Halifax—Women's Centres; the hon. member for Chambly—Environment.

It being 4.45 p.m., pursuant to the order made in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78 on Thursday, April 5, 1990, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

• (1720)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I was unable to reach the House in time, but had I been here I would have cast my vote with my party against this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.21 o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, recognizing that we have had an important vote, and recognizing the value of Private Members' Hour which we have cut into by 22 minutes, I wonder if we could have unanimous consent to have the full hour of debate today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No, there is not unanimous consent.

SCIENCE

WATER SCIENCE RESEARCH INSTITUTES

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing Water Science Research Institutes in critical watersheds, such institutes to be responsible for researching and developing innovative methods of water resource management, including land-based sewage treatment, waste-water recycling and the development of long-term water management plans.

He said: Mr. Speaker, what I have to say may be a little anti-climactic after such a session, voting on the goods and services legislation, but I think it is an important matter in its own right.

A fundamental global threat is the acceleration of the pressure of human activities on the natural resources and the ecosystems on which life itself depends.

The recent report of the Brundtland Commission stated very bluntly that our fragile planet simply cannot sustain the current destructive industrial practices when its population is expected to double within the next 35 years. That threat is best exposed when we look at the impact of man's activities on the quality of our inland waters and oceans.

Water is the lifeblood of the biosphere and, as a fundamental component of a complex ecosystem, the preservation of its quality is essential to ensure our continued survival.

Although Canada holds 20 per cent of the world's fresh water, it possesses only 9 per cent of the world's fresh, renewable water. The rest, according to the Science Council of Canada, is "fossil water" which is a legacy of the melting ice sheets.

Our over-all supply of water is truly formidable, but the picture disguises wide variations. Over 60 per cent of Canada's river flow is carried northward where only 10 per cent of Canada's population lives. Major sections of Canada's population, including the prairies and the interior dry belt of British Columbia live in regions of chronic water shortage.

Canadians have failed to recognize that, despite our exponentially increasing demand for water, there is in fact a limit to the fresh water run-off from the land each year and thus there is also a limit to its availability for consumption.

The 1973 report of the Science Council of Canada stated that "Canadians must begin the transition from a consumer society preoccupied with resource exploitation, to a conserver society engaged in more constructive endeavours" and, I might add, a more judicious husbandry of our resources.

Evidence of the over-exploitation of our water resources and the consequences of environmental stress are becoming all too clear to all of us. Pollution from human activities has destroyed aquatic life, inhibited the reproductive capacity of mammals and birds and now threatens our very existence. The misuse of our water resources has caused widespread degradation of our soils, has disrupted our supplies of clean potable water and has generated massive economic dislocation. We can no longer afford to use our waterways as convenient dump sites for domestic and industrial wastes. To continue on our present path jeopardizes the integrity of our total environmental system. With it, it jeopardizes the economic well-being and in fact our very survival.

In recent years, pollution from human activities has seriously disturbed the composition of species and has greatly increased the rate of species extinction. It is estimated that aquatic ecosystems in some parts of North America have lost up to 20 per cent of their indigenous species because of the acidification of our lakes by airborne pollutants.

Twenty-four species of birds are endangered in the east as a result of the impact of acid rain.

Estimates of the number of lakes at risk in Canada from acid rain range up to 600,000. Already as many as 100,000 lakes have been seriously damaged. Approximately 14,000 of those lakes are biologically dead. Unless acid rain depositions are reduced, another 10,000 to 40,000 will also die.

More than 360 chemical compounds have been found in the Great Lakes systems alone. Among them are a number of persistent toxins. They include alkylated lead, benzopyrene, DDT, hexachlorobenzene, mercury and other heavy metal contaminants, polychlorinated biphenyls and a slew of other chemical cocktails.

It is no wonder that of the 10 most highly valued species of fish in Lake Ontario, seven have almost completely disappeared. It is no wonder that in the species still remaining, tumours and lesions have been found and their ability to reproduce effectively has been questioned. Evidence also links a sharp increase in deaths among beluga whales to contaminants in the fish that they eat. Canadians should not be surprised to hear of closures in the west coast shellfish industry because of the dangerously high contamination from pulp mill effluents.

Throughout the aquatic food chain the phenomenon of biological magnification is occurring, causing those species at the end of the food chain to ingest and to accumulate lethal concentrations of toxins and pollutants. Fish-eating birds, for instance, such as herring gulls, herons, and bald eagles have been affected and populations have declined.

The need for urgent action to maintain the health of our waterways is abundantly clear. Although pollution is more often the cause of water problems for Canadians than scarcity, there is also the problem of the demand for water in areas such as the southern prairies and in the interior of British Columbia where the demand already approaches the limits of supply and shortages in dry years are becoming more and more common.

• (1730)

Problems also exist in how we dispose of our sewage effluent. Only 57 per cent of Canadians are in fact served by waste water treatment plants, compared to some 74 per cent of Americans and 99 per cent of the Swedish population. In addition, 28 per cent are served by sewage collection systems, but the sewage is discharged into a lake, into a river or into the ocean without treatment. In 1984 approximately 2,200 of Canada's 3,250 communities had sewer systems, and of these only 44 per cent had some kind of sewage treatment.

However there are some success stories. The communities of Vernon and Osoyoos in the Okanagan Valley have demonstrated what can be accomplished with innovative approaches to waste management disposal. These communities have learned to put their effluent to work for them, by disposing the treated waste water on to the surrounding grasslands and the fields and crops. Vernon is now attempting to implement a program of wild land irrigation, but I must add that the lack of provincial and of federal commitments for this funding are proving to frustrate their efforts.

It is high time that the federal government took an active role in developing and in funding alternative methods for sewage waste disposal so that other communities across Canada can benefit from these efforts.

Canadians too often take our water resources for granted. We are in fact the world's second largest user of water on a per capita basis. Canadians use 4,100 litres per day and Americans use 6,300 litres per day. Those figures include both domestic and commercial use. The average domestic use for Canadians is a startling 300 litres per day. Our experts tell us that we need to curb the waste of our water resources. Our water crisis in Canada is fundamentally a problem of resource mismanagement. According to scientists we can become 90 per cent more water efficient. What is needed is to allow a better husbandry of our water resources and a more thorough understanding of our hydrologic cycle. We need more information about how water supplies are managed before we can implement the detailed management strategies that are needed. Above all, we need to develop a coherent picture about the state of Canada's water supplies, both in terms of quality and quantity.

Canadians, largely out of ignorance, have squandered their water resources. For too long water in Canada has been treated as a free commodity with no financial incentive for conservation. It is estimated that it would take the equivalent of 5,000 litres of water just to put a restaurant meal on the table. The average Canadian uses 300 litres of water per day, but biologically they need only 1 to 2 litres a day for consumption. It takes 10,600 litres of water to grow a half a pound of beef. A McDonald's Quarter Pounder requires 2,790 litres of water just for the beef. That does not include the water needed to grow the tomatoes, lettuce, or the grain for the bun.

One apple tree growing in the Okanagan Valley consumes 465 litres of water each day. When you consider that 70 per cent of our irrigation water is lost to evaporation, it conceivably takes up to 1,500 litres of water each day to feed a single growing apple tree.

There is no doubt about it: water is indeed critical to human survival. That is why it seems reasonable that to tackle the environmental problems before us today we should start with the most basic of all resources—our water.

Canada's federal water policy announced in 1987 has remained essentially a toothless document. It has limited itself to a philosophical statement of the government's goals and its projected objectives.

However the federal water policy does commit the government to a joint co-operative approach to water management with the provinces since under the Constitution Act the provinces in fact exercise direct control over many aspects of water management.

The policy states: "The federal government intends to work with the provinces and territories to encourage the provision of safe and sufficient water supplies for Canadians". The over-all goal of the federal water policy is to "encourage the use of freshwater in an efficient and equitable manner consistent with social, cultural and environmental needs".

To achieve this goal the policy identifies two major objectives: first, to protect and enhance the quality of the water resource and, second, to promote the wise and efficient use of water.

To achieve these objectives the policy has outlined specific tasks. These include establishing research advisory mechanisms with representation from scientific and applied research personnel, developing and maintaining with the provinces and territories water data and information systems directed to improving the knowledge available for managing Canada's water resources.

It also talks about promoting co-operative federal and provincial endeavours as well as undertaking and supporting research and development in these issues.

The policy further emphasizes that it endorses an integrated approach to water management, taking into account all water uses and water related activities within whatever political, administrative, economic or functional boundaries that are defined. I interpret that as an approach that is synonymous with joint federal-provincial territorial planning.

The critical point to make here is that the 1987 federal water policy gives a firm commitment from the federal government to become directly involved with water management in co-operation with the provinces and territories.

That commitment, although it has been well intentioned, I submit has as yet remained unfulfilled. It is time that the government replace the rhetoric with action.

In a recent document entitled Water 2020, which was put out in 1988 by the National Science Council, the report states that the water use problems facing Canadians can only be solved when we apply science to achieve our goals.

The growing scale of cultural and technological developments which pose threats to water quality requires that water science become central to all policy decisions.

Canadian water policy requires strong leadership. However there has been little evidence of that leadership in water science today. The research is fragmented among many different departments and co-operation between agencies, to say the least, is weak indeed.

The federal government has 22 departments and agencies with different responsibilities for water. For example, pesticides, a major contaminant of inland waters and a potent toxin to aquatic life, are regulated by Environment Canada while exhaust emissions, which is a causative factor in acid rain, are the responsibility of Transport Canada.

As a result, we have at best an ad hoc and unco-ordinated response to complex environmental problems rather than an integrated approach to monitoring, control and conservation.

Today, in some federal departments, scientific excellence is imperilled by a dispirited research population that is struggling to find the appropriate challenges and an effective policy role. As of 1988, Environment Canada had only five Ph.D. level scientists in ground water research working at its two national research institutions.

There is no national, long-term, co-ordinated program in water science research today. Partly as a consequence of that, Environment Canada has over the past seven years lost many top notch scientists to the United States. To be blunt about it, the present political and administrative structure is totally incapable of developing the integrated policy and the programs that are needed to tackle our water related environmental problems. We must adopt a new approach if we are to find effective solutions.

What are the solutions? There is an urgent need for the federal government to develop a national plan for water use and conservation. This plan has to be backed up by strong legislation.

• (1740)

The National Science Council has recognized the need for increased research and development in water science, including the need for the development of a comprehensive water resource inventory, the development of a program for integrated water resource management, and the implementation of specific post-secondary educational and training programs in water science.

As a first step in facilitating these objectives, my colleagues and I call upon this government to establish regional water science research facilities in critical watersheds throughout Canada. Such facilities could be administered jointly by the ministries of the Environment, Fisheries and Oceans, Health and Welfare, and Agriculture through a newly established department of water science. This department would in turn be mandated to work co-operatively with the appropriate provincial and regional authorities to establish needs and priorities as determined by the nature of the watershed.

As has been recommended by the National Science Council, each facility should be attached to at least one university or other post-secondary institution and should include at least five scientists. Each facility would be responsible for conducting ongoing research in all aspects of water use, including the collection of pertinent hydrologic data of the water supply area. Each research facility could work with the provincial and regional facilities to ensure that the efforts are incorporated into regional water management plans.

As well the new department of water science, in liaison with the National Research Council and provincial post-secondary institutes, could develop educational and training programs in water science research. Such programs would help resolve the critical lack of training facilities and provide academic centres for post-graduate research programs in conjunction with the research facility.

Finally, I would suggest that as a provincially designated environmentally sensitive area, which is already experiencing serious water shortage conflicts, the Okanagan and Shuswap watersheds could provide an ideal location for a pilot project of this sort. The construction of a prototype water science research facility would address the serious water resource problems in this region and would help develop the framework for the implementation of a national program of water resource management.

In concluding, I ask that this government support this motion today and, by so doing, begin to tackle the serious water resource problems that continue to confront this nation.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, water resource management has been the subject of thorough consultation in this country. The Commission of Inquiry on Federal Water Policy, established in January 1984, stated in its final report, published in 1985, that water management problems were no longer local problems of water supply and water pollution; they had taken on regional and even global proportions.

Subsequently, an interdepartmental task force was set up to consider the commission of inquiry's recommendations and draft a general framework for the federal water policy.

In November 1987, the government announced its federal water policy, whose main objective is to encourage fair and realistic use of fresh water in Canada, so as to meet the social, economic and environmental needs of present and future generations.

The policy is intended to achieve an integrated approach to water resource planning and favours the kind of water use that will help to maintain the many relationships established within our ecosystem. To manage Canada's water resources, the government has set itself two main goals: Preserve and improve water quality and encourage realistic and effective water management and consumption. The policy outlines 25 specific issues and five basic courses of action: pricing of water services; leadership role in water science; integrated planning; legislation; and public awareness.

Mr. Speaker, with these strategies the government not only intends to obtain the co-operation of the provinces and territories as well as multilateral organizations in other countries, it also wants to support various federal agencies, municipalities, industry, universities and environmental organizations so that they will be able to take the necessary action to deal with specific issues that concern them and can meet future challenges in water resource management.

This policy is now being discussed at the interdepartmental level, with discussions to be followed by a report to the Minister of the Environment on the various activities of the departments involved in its implementation. The problems with which Canada must deal in this area are national and international in scope and concern increasingly complex issues. Faced with a range of water-related problems that goes beyond traditional geographical boundaries, the government stresses its leadership role in water science, bearing in mind the responsibilities it shares with the provinces and territories.

Supporting research efforts and developing scientific expertise and the transfer of knowledge and technology by promoting effective partnership among the various parties concerned and co-operation at the national and international level are major components of the role the federal government intends to play. One of the most important areas identified by the federal government for the development and transfer of water management technologies in municipal infrastructures is waste water treatment.

Together with the provinces and municipalities, the federal government promotes pricing of water consumption by publishing findings, data and studies on water pricing. In line with this policy, Mr. Speaker, the federal government, through its waste water technology centre in Burlington, is involved in research and promoting the development and transfer of new technologies in the treatment of municipal and industrial waste.

Careful management of our water resources depends on a thorough knowledge of these resources and their utilization. Data collecting and scientific research are essential to appropriate decision-making on water management, which requires the co-operation of all levels of government and the private sector. The increasing number and complexity of problems encountered in water management has made it necessary to go beyond strictly local considerations to develop skills commensurate with regional, national and international requirements.

Furthermore, most of the major issues in Canada at this time that represent a challenge to scientific research, for instance, climatic changes and toxic contaminants, require both a multidisciplinary approach and effective co-operation among the various members of the scientific community and the decision-makers, as well as between the government and the private sector, and also increased emphasis on international co-operation.

Environment Canada supports a large part of federal water research which, in most cases, is carried out by the Inland Waters Directorate and its two research institutes. These institutes total 328 person-years and have a research budget of $25 million.

The National Water Research Institute located in Burlington, Ontario, is the largest centre for fresh water research in Canada. The research carried out by the institute is aimed at improving knowledge and skills in the area of water quality, in order to play a leading role in upgrading aquatic resources and promoting the transfer of these skills and technologies in the perspective of sustainable economic development.

Mr. Speaker, the institute's research program covers many fields but focusses on the following national and international issues: toxic contamination of the Great Lakes; contamination of underground waters; acid rain; deterioration of Earth's atmosphere; contaminated sediments; restoration of lakes; pesticide evaluation; and evaluation and modeling.

The National Hydrology Research Institute, in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, has the mandate to study various aspects of the hydrologic cycle with a view ensuring a more efficient management and a better protection of Canadian water resources.

Research projects are grouped under three main programs: hydrological processes and climatic changes; impact of human activities on the environment; and Northern watersheds.

The institutes try different ways of regionalizing research projects. Scientific expertise is available to conduct research projects in many areas of the country where problems vary more by their magnitude than by their nature. For example, National Water Research Institute technicians have begun tests in Prince Edward Island to find out whether Aldicarb, a pasticide used in potato fields, has any effect on underground water levels.

• (1750)

The NWRI technicians have also develpped new lake water clean-up techniques in Alberta and Ontario. Mr. Speaker, on the northern edge of the riding of Charles-bourg, in the middle of the Parc des Laurentides, we have the calibrated basin of Lake Laflamme, something which can best be described as an open air laboratory.

In their survey on atmospheric pollutants drifting over long distances, Environment Canada and three Quebec universities—Laval, McGill, Université du Québec—have been working for more than three years on a complex model to predict the impact of acid water from melted snow and ice on the water habitat and the organisms that live there.

Thanks to the work of this dedicated team the integrated model's quantitative and qualitative parameters have been checked against the on-site data collected during the spring thaw at Lake Laflamme.

Research has been extended outside the calibrated basin because the model is now being used in a project to find out the effect of spring run-offs mixed with acid rain over Quebec's southern regions.

This open air laboratory also enables Environment Canada researchers to monitor rain and surface water quality, thus highlighting the beneficial effects of the federal-provincial sulphur oxide emissions.

Considerable progress has been made in dealing with the most important water problems such as the effect of acid rain on water ecosystems, toxic contamination, climate changes and municipal and industrial water demand management.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government is committed to maintaining its leadership role in science and to promoting continued co-operation with the provinces in order to co-ordinate efforts.

The St. Lawrence action plan and the establishment of the St. Lawrence Centre in Montreal through which the federal government will spend $100 million over five years to clean up, protect and preserve this river symbolize the intensification of federal-provincial efforts to promote efficient co-operation and consultations among multiple partners.

The government also recognizes the water-savings aspect and will focus its efforts on maintaining a balance between growing socio-economic demands and the continued capacity of our freshwater resources within the context of sustainable development.

[English]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is no surprise that the member for Okanagan—Shuswap feels compelled to put such a motion, given this government's bad record on water.

In November 1984, $45 million was chopped from the budget of Environment Canada, including a 25 per cent cut to the Canadian Wildlife Service and eliminating programs like the herring gull study in the Great Lakes. The government received good advice but chose to ignore it. In September 1985, the report of the inquiry on federal water policy, headed by Peter Pearse, provided the government with a blueprint for a federal water policy.

However, in 1987 the minister of the day released a flimsy collection of one-page statements optimistically called "A Federal Water Policy". It was descriptive of the problems facing Canadians but lacked substance. It promised to consider legislation to ensure safe drinking water but only in areas of federal jurisdiction. This promise was recycled in the Throne Speech in April 1989 and is recycled again in the present Minister of the Environment's recently released discussion paper. Unkept promises, that is the trademark of this government.

Today Canada does not yet have model legislation on water nor a clearly defined policy. The 1987 paper promised to strengthen federal legislation to prohibit the export of water. The 1987 paper promised to strengthen the approval process under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Two and a half years later the Oldman Dam is the subject of a court ruling. Why? Because the Minister of Transport fails to comply with the guidelines of environmental assessment.

After promising strength the government delivers weakness. To make matters worse, it has now been one month since the Federal Court decision and still this government refuses to comply with the ruling. What a degree of hypocrisy.

We must conclude that there is an alarming pattern emerging on the issue of water. This government reduces spending on research, has not kept promises of new legislation since 1985 and poorly enforces existing laws. Unfortunately, this pattern is typical of the over-all environmental policy of this government.

Take, for instance, the mythical environmental assessment legislation. It was promised by the Progressive Conservative Party in the 1984 election campaign. The second time was a promise of extensive public consultation during the spring of 1988—which actually did take place. The third time we heard an announcement of the main components of the draft legislation was during the 1988 election. Then we hear again about the environmental assessment legislation in April 1989 with a Throne Speech. The fifth time is the discussion paper released by the Minister of the Environment at the end of March 1990, and for the sixth time in a very fine speech on March 30 by the parliamentary secretary of the environment when he told us that it would be five weeks from that date.

I am glad to see him in the House because I am quoting him word for word when he said five weeks. We have six commitments over a period of six years. That is the period of time over which the Progressive Conservative government has promised environmental assessment legislation.

I know that one of my colleagues who would like to speak so I will conclude briefly by saying that the Tory record on the environment is highlighted by the debates today on water. It will be remembered at the next election because it was strong on promises but weak on action. It was good on public relations but weak on substance. It was successful at raising expectations but it was followed by widespread let-downs. No wonder the Tories are so low in public opinion polls.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a 10-minute speech to deliver in about two minutes. What I would like to do this afternoon is briefly outline some of the steps that the government has already taken.

I think we recognize the need to protect our water, as this motion suggests, and to safeguard our drinking water and protect the many waterways we have in our country. My colleagues have already outlined extremely well the valuable asset we have.

In my province of British Columbia we are currently discussing the sale of water to the Americans and across the Pacific. One of my colleagues across the aisle was showing me some of the statistics on the value of clean water. A gallon of fresh water has a value of $7 in Japan and $4 in the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the government says it is going to privatize Petro-Canada. In fact, it is going to sell it off for less than it is worth and it is going to increase foreign ownership and control of the Canadian energy industry. Furthermore, it is going to throw away what is potentially one of our best vehicles for positive environmental action, for moving Canada away from being one of the most irresponsible wasters of energy toward a more environmentally responsible energy future.

Who loses in this deal? The Canadian taxpayer. The government says it will start the privatization with a treasury issue of 15 per cent of the company. What will it do with the estimated $500 to $700 million expected from the sale of that 15 per cent share? In a brilliant marketing move cited in the February 21, 1990, Ottawa Citizen, unnamed finance department denizens speculated that it would all be ploughed back into the company. Such a deal!

Mr. Capitalist would buy shares knowing that the Tories would give him back the money he paid for the shares, in the form of equity in the company of which he had just become a shareholder. And equity assets built up in a Crown corporation on behalf of all Canadians would be torn out of public hands and given away. And these guys are known for their shrewd management of the public purse? It boggles the imagination.

Who, besides the eventual owners of the shares will benefit from this deal? RBC Dominion Securities and Wood Gundy Inc., the two firms that conducted the August, 1987, study for the government on whether or not Air Canada should be sold, themselves underwrote that privatization one year later, walking away with over $30 million for their troubles. The total brokerage fees, bonuses and miscellaneous payments on the Petro-Canada sell-off could amount to more than $170 million. Thanks, Canadian taxpayers.

Why are the Tories doing this? Their story is that the company needs capital but cannot assume any more debt. The question that confronts us is: Is Petro-Canada really lumbered with debt to the point where it cannot borrow any more? The answer is, no. As of the end of 1988, Petro-Canada's total debt was about $2 billion, of which about $1 billion was long-term debt. Its shareholder equity was about $4 billion.

In fact, Petro-Canada's long-term debt compares favourably with that of such other notables as TransCanada Pipelines Limited, at $2.4 billion; Amoco Canada Petroleum Company Limited, with a $4 billion long-term debt; Columbia Gas System Incorporated, at $1.3 billion; and one my favourites, Nova Corporation of Alberta, with a $4.2 billion long-term debt. Those are 1988 annual report figures.

More to the point, Petro-Canada's long-term debt to equity ratio, 1 to 4, is well within industry standards. With the exception of long-established multinational subsidiaries like Imperial Oil, with a 1 to 7 ratio, many industry players have ratios similar to or worse than Petro-Canada's. Canadian Oxidental Petroleum Limited at 1 to 3; Alberta Energy Company Limited at 1 to 1.2; Norcen Energy Resources at 1 to 2.3; Total Petroleum North America Limited at 1 to 1.8; and Pan-Canadian Petroleum Limited at 1 to 3.5 remain active participants in the industry. Indeed, one of the oldest, best established multinationals in Canada, Shell Canada Limited, has a long-term debt to equity ratio identical to Petro-Canada's.

So it was no real surprise when, last December, the well-known New York rating agency, Moody's Investor Service Incorporated, gave Petro-Canada a triple A rating on about $400 million of newly filed debt securities.

As the Toronto Star observed in its report:

> Such a rating, a shade lower than the highest designation for debts of the federal government, suggests strong borrowing status.

Indeed, "strong borrowing status". It would seem by all standards that Petro-Canada could comfortably assume a great deal more debt than it has now and still remain a healthy and vigorous player in the Canadian petroleum industry. In fact, as the Moody's rating shows, while in the public sector the company can support greater debt, because of lower service costs occasioned by its status as a federal treasury backed Crown corporation, than it could as a private sector player.

But what about the other side of the capitalization coin? What about all that money that can be made for Petro-Canada from the huge stock issue? Sorry. Unless the federal government is willing simply to give away money to the company by continuing to plough the proceeds of share sales back into Petro-Canada as the shares are sold, Petro-Canada will not get that money at all. Again, the taxpayers of Canada have about $4 billion worth of equity in Petro-Canada. If the company is to be sold, those taxpayers are quite reasonably going to want at least that $4 billion back.

• (1805)

As noted before, the government is already talking about giving back to the company the proceeds of the first offering, that 15 per cent share offering totalling somewhere between $500 million and $700 million. Presumably, the government would have serious political difficulty pursuing such wonderful generosity further, especially at a time when it is cutting back on health care, education and social services because of the fiscal holy crusade.

That leaves the energy equity markets having to absorb a subsequent issue of $3 billion to $3.5 billion, all of which has to go to the federal treasury before Petro-Canada can haul in so much as one more loonie.

The fact of the matter is that dumping Petro-Canada on to the energy equity markets, especially at a time when Imperial Oil will be struggling mightily with the capital task of swallowing Texaco Canada, seems to be just about the worst way one could go about raising the further money the company needs. It will be cumbersome, necessarily long term, and unavoidably entail a raid of some scale on the public purse. There is plenty of corporate elbow room for further debt financing anyway.

The question we have to ask ourselves, and the question I would put to the government this evening is simply this. How is it that you folks continue to so blindly choose the wrong options?

I will have more to say on this in debate on the bill which we have been promised for this session. For the time being, I will let it go at that.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Finance, I am happy to have this opportunity to respond to the questions raised by my hon. friend both here this evening and in the House on February 23 of this year.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is probably premature at this time to speculate on how much Petro-Canada is worth and how much it will be worth at the time at which it is offered to the Canadian public.

The actual value of the corporation will be determined at the time when the shares are offered to the public. I would suggest that that value will be determined by a number of factors, including the world oil price at that time, the corporation's expected performance and the state of the equity and bond markets.

Even then, the value will probably only be relevant for a short period and will fluctuate significantly over time as the government sells its shares.

The initial offering will be a treasury issue to be managed by Petro-Canada. The final details, including the size of the issue and the method of distribution, will be worked out with the underwriters after the legislation to which the hon. member has referred has passed this House. The size will certainly be no larger than the market is capable of absorbing.

On February 23 the hon. member referred to the net worth of Petro-Canada, by which I would assume he means the company's book value of assets less liabilities or shareholders' equity. I would point out that the number he quoted on that occasion is somewhat different from the amount appearing in Petro-Canada's most recent financial statements, which is approximately $2.7 billion.

In any event, I would assume that any market analyst would advise the hon. member that today's book net worth is only one of many criteria to be taken into account in determining the value the government will receive for Petro-Canada over the coming years.

In valuing Petro-Canada, potential investors will consider that the company has one of the largest holdings of Canadian oil and natural gas rights, is a leading producer of oil, natural gas and natural gas liquids and is one of the most active oil and gas explorers in Canada. With annual operating cash flow of some $800 million and plant and equipment of almost $5 billion we believe that Petro-Canada is well positioned to take advantage of discoveries in both western Canada and eastern frontiers.

We believe that the offer, when it is presented, will be well received and it will provide the company with the type of equity which it needs to enable it to be more active in the future.

WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight pursuant to a question that I posed in this Chamber last week relating to the funding of women's centres under the Women's Program of the Secretary of State.

This issue has become a cause célèbre for Canadian women. The basic core, if I may use that word, of the issue is the difference between core funding and project funding.

Core funding covers the kinds of expenses that keep these organizations open. In other words, it pays the rent, for lights, heat, incidentals of that nature and usually a part-time salary for a co-ordinator.

• (1810)

Project funding, as its name implies, covers a specific project put forward in a grant application by the organization to cover any number of things. It might have to do with studies relating to sexual assault victims. It might have to do with employment equity programs or short-term education programs. Various and sundry projects come under project funding.

The problem is that $1.6 million, which covered over 70 centres in this country, has been cut. The women who depend upon these centres, as well as the women who work and volunteer in these centres, have no security for their future endeavours.

We have heard the Secretary of State and the Minister responsible for the Status of Women say to us: "Don't worry, we are prepared to grant you project funding". But philosophically and practically, that is unacceptable.

We know the $1.6 million has been cut. Last year and in the years previous—ever since the Liberal government instituted these programs—women could look to core funding to keep their centres open and project funding to do the specific works they wished to perform. What has effectively taken place is that the government is asking these women and the women across Canada to share in a still smaller pot that relates to project funding, thus dividing and pitting women against each other right across this country.

I must say I am proud in the extreme of the women involved in these centres across the country. The Second Storey women's centre in my home province of Nova Scotia, in the riding of South Shore in Bridgewater, Nova Scotia was offered a cheque last Thursday. They have delayed its acceptance because they said they will not be used as a pawn, and compete with other women across this country for ever-decreasing funds.

There is a meeting this week with the Secretary of State when he will meet with representatives, as I understand it, of all the centres outside Quebec. That was not quite what the women were looking for. They wanted representatives from each of the affected centres. However, I suppose this meeting is better than nothing.

The problem is that we are not going to hear the answer that we need to hear, which is that core funding has been re-established.

In the 18 months since I have come to this Chamber, we have all heard and we all agree that there needs to be cut-backs in this country. No one disagrees that there is a need to reduce the deficit. But we are talking about $1.6 million. I must say that in my youth, growing up in Cape Breton and Halifax I never thought I could look at $1.6 million and say that it is peanuts, but in the grand scheme of things, it is not going to do a whole heck of a lot to help the government balance its budget. Yet it is going to do a whole lot of damage to a whole lot of women right across this country.

I know I have not much time, but I want to speak briefly about some of the things that I, in 20 years of working with women's groups like this, have seen in terms of what these centres do. These centres cover almost every possible crisis situation that affects women, much more so in rural Canada even than in the urban centres.

In the urban centres, although we are not terribly well off for support programs for women, there are places such as transition houses and emergency units of hospitals. There are doctors and legal aid centres and so on depending on what the problem is. There are universities which have certain programs. That is not enough and it does not cover it all but there is some recourse.

For the Canadian women living in rural areas, and I am thinking now particularly of Second Storey on the South Shore of Nova Scotia and the Antigonish Women's Centre, this is the only game in town. Women who are alienated and isolated do not know that they can get legal advice, medical advice, social work help or any kinds of help to pull them out of an untenable situation, whether it be an abusive situation physically, or a financial problem such as the inability to heat their homes or feed their children.

What they do know is that on the main street of the nearest town there is that place where women go, and they phone or drop in.

• (1815)

One of the groups I talked to yesterday told me that it had 400 phone calls last month and 200 drop in visits—600 women used one of those centres last month. With core funding gone those 600 women will have no place to turn. That 600 is multiplied by the 70-plus centres across this country that are in danger of closing down. The women of Canada do not deserve this. They deserve all the help they can get.

Why does the government not make it easier on itself and turn around and say: "We made a mistake. You can have your core funding back. We realize and we know how important women centres are to the full development of women in our society, to the search for gender equality"?

It is not a big request, but it will help so many women who are in situations where from their perspective there is no help or no way out. These are women who wake up in the morning and cannot see any future for themselves and for their children.

Some people might accuse me of overdramatizing. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the women who came to see me in my office today, and those who saw the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and the Secretary of State, will be able to assure you that this is not excessive. It is the truth. We need an answer, and we need it now.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's concerns conveyed on April 6, I can only reiterate that the Secretary of State expressed his commitment that day to the advancement of Canadian women and to organizations representing their interests.

Ours is a sensitivity balanced with the realization that all sectors in our society share a responsibility with us to put a sizeable dent into the crippling national debt which has become the legacy of our inheritance. We admit that we are asking a lot from Canadians. This is not a popularity contest, but a contest with time. The longer we wait, the less you and I will pay, Mr. Speaker, but it is our children and their children to come who will be stuck with our bills. We want to grant our children the financial security that the hon. member talked about.

It would actually be easiest to shield Canadians from the truth about the deficit. This government, however, does not subscribe to any blind eye school of accounting.

Our budget will reduce the deficit to $23.5 billion next year and cut it in half to $14 billion in three more years. We are bringing Canadians ever closer to the goal of cutting the deficit in half by 1993–94.

We are building an economy which will allow Canada to have the social programs and the opportunities needed truly to ensure equality for women, an equality backed with funding in the bank, not on credit.

The budget measures are not an abandonment of this government's promise to promote equality and justice for women. This government's record since 1984 is one of commitment to women. Funding reductions to the women's program of the Secretary of State do not break the promise to work for equality and justice for women. The women's program will still support more than 550 groups in this fiscal year.

The hon. member was quite correct in stating last week that the minister told us that women's groups now receive project funding. She even cited a women's centre, as she did tonight, in Nova Scotia that had just been granted $46,000 of project grants. If our colleagues on the other side do not listen to us, well maybe they will listen to the member for Halifax.

Let it be stated emphatically, and once again, that the women's program will continue to assist women's groups in Canada. Money is available for project funding for groups undertaking activities that meet the mandate of the program. An organization's overhead costs that are related to project activities can also be funded.

Clearly the Secretary of State will help the centres continue their activities and will be as flexible and as generous as possible in applying funding guidelines and eligibility to criteria.

• (1820)

During the four years that preceded our mandate the previous government spent $12 million on programs to assist women.

In 1984 this government decided that women's programs needed generous funding. Since that time we have more than quadrupled the amount to $56 million in the women's program support. We have added relevance to our partnership with women's organizations from coast to coast, and our partnership remains in place.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask the Minister of the Environment or his parliamentary secretary more questions about the famous Green Plan which was released a few weeks ago.

At that time, when I asked questions in the House, I even accused the government of talking a lot but doing little about environmental protection. I maintain the same accusation today because several weeks have passed since I last spoke in the House and I learned that not only does the 29-page Green Plan of fairly vague questions contain no financial commitment of the government, but in the last two weeks I also learned that many environmental groups have criticized the government very severely for its inaction.

I am particularly affected by the government's inaction since I personally was evacuated from Saint-Basile-le-Grand because of the PCB fire that night in August 1988. It was a real disaster and in the weeks that followed, many people lost a lot of money. They were very anxious, but during that time, the government, through the Department of Transport, the Department of the Environment and even the Prime Minister, assured them that the government would look after Saint-Basile-le-Grand, would solve the PCB problem throughout Canada and really deal with environmental problems, if they were trusted and given a second mandate. That was in 1988.

Mr. Speaker, we in Quebec had a singer called Félix Leclerc. He is dead now, but one of his songs goes like this: "Before the election, the candidate called me son, but after the election, he did not even know my name." Quebecers and, I think, Canadians rather have the feeling that after campaigning for the 1988 election on an environmental platform, this government has forgotten its promises. That is the reason why, when I directed my question concerning the environment to the Prime Minister a few weeks ago, I blamed the government for being all talk and no action.

At the national level, several environmental protection agencies have blamed the government for its lack of action, but in my Chambly riding the Richelieu River is completely polluted. As I said we are still waiting for the Federal Government to show leadership with this matter of PCBs by perhaps working in conjunction together with the Provincial Government to rid Quebec of various toxic wastes.

I wish to emphasize a point which is very important these days in connection with the Meech Lake Accord and other constitutional issues. Quebecers want to have proof that federalism is a cost effective political system within which the Federal and Provincial Governments can work together to solve serious problems. So far, Mr. Speaker, there has been no evidence of it and this is a two year old situation.

Finally, I should like to tell you a little story. I have been here now for eight weeks as the member for Chambly I can tell you that I campaigned for two years in an effort to get elected to the House of Commons and one of the points I always tried to make was that the Government was not doing enough for the Chambly environment. Goodness gracious, I received a great many visits from all sorts of ministers, including some Environment Ministers, the Prime Minister himself twice, and various Provincial Premiers. All the Federal Ministers told me to trust them for a few more weeks, because the Minister of Environment was going to reveal a great plan to deal with our problems. Yes, you guessed right! Mr. Speaker, the Minister came out not so much with a Green Plan as with an Empty Plan. That is the reason why today I say again to the Government that as far as the environment is concerned, it is all talk and no action.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): First of all, I wish to congragulate the Hon. Member for his by-election victory in the Chambly riding.

[English]

I would also like to welcome the hon. member to the House. This is the first opportunity I have had to do that and to say that I welcome his interest in environmental issues. I look forward to his participation in questions and debates during upcoming months and years.

The hon. member has made reference to the record of the government. I would like to make one or two points in return. Since the government was elected in 1984 there have been a number of very noteworthy achievements. Time does not permit me to be very extensive, but I would refer to two or three.

I would refer to the acid rain agreement by which the federal government and the seven most easterly provinces have agreed to reduce sulphur dioxide emissions by 50 per cent from 1980 levels by 1994. I am pleased that indeed we have made good progress in that regard.

I also look forward to the signing of an accord with the United States again with respect to acid rain abatement because I know that is vitally important to all of Canada, and I would suspect that it is of particular importance to the hon. member's constituency.

I would also make reference to the signing of the Montreal Protocol on the ozone layer. I think most of us in this House are very conscious of the fact that emissions of CFCs have proved to be extremely detrimental. The existence of the hole in Antarctica is well known. It is perhaps less well known that even if we take the kind of very substantial measures that are planned, that is the virtual reduction of CFC emissions by the year 2000, CFC residues in the atmosphere will continue to be a threat to mankind for the next 100 years. That is exceedingly chilling and only demonstrates how vital it is for Canada and all of the international communities to work together in furthering the achievement of that objective.

I also refer to the passage of the CEPA legislation in 1988 before the hon. member came to the House. I think that he would agree, however, that that legislation has broken new ground in Canada. It is the most definitive piece of legislation that we have had in place. I believe it will prove to be quite effective in the time hereafter.

With respect to The Green Plan I would suggest that what is most important about it is not whether it was issued last month, two months ago, three months ago or whatever it may have been. What is most important is the fact that there is now in place a very substantial process for consultation with the provinces, because they have a vital role to play in protecting the environment; with industry, because we are going to need its co-operation if we are going to achieve our objectives; and with special interest groups and the public at large.

I look forward to being a part of that process during the course of the next three or four months. I would hope that the hon. member for Chambly is also a part of the process, because with his enthusiasm and his own special interest in the environment I think he has a real contribution to make.

The hon. member referred to St-Basile-le-Grand. I would like to remind him that the federal government has agreed to be a part of the solution. We have agreed to pick up our share of the costs, but what we have not yet received from the province of Quebec is any final declaration on its part as to what the final bill may be. That is what we are waiting for. When that bill arrives there is indeed a formula by which the federal government will participate in the cost sharing. I know that will be good news for his constituents and for all citizens within Canada.

CANADA POST

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, the people from Brantville, 780 strong, are opposed to the fusion of the post offices of Brantville and Tabusintac.

The community of Brantville is francophone and wants to maintain postal service in French. Brantville has always had its own post office and rural postal service. Brantville citizens are not second class citizens. Brantville citizens do not want to be annexed to another community. Since 1970, Brantville has progressed and wants to continue in that direction. A good postal service is essential to that end. This is the message from the people of Brantville.

When I see such unilateral decisions without any kind of consultation, I wonder why it is that those of us who do not know the communities or circumstances always want to fix that which is already working.

I ask the minister, Sir, to put a stop to this nonsense that is going on in Canada Post.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, as we look forward to the traditional break in the proceedings of the House, I hope all Canadians will reflect on the universal message of hope and peace that so many religions and cultures focus on at this time of the year.

It is important for us in our multicultural tradition to recognize that this is not only the season when some of us who are Christian celebrate the resurrection and hope of Easter, but it is also the time when our Jewish friends celebrate the hope and freedom from persecution that is represented by the Passover.

Similarly, on Friday the Sikh community will be celebrating Baisakhi. We join with them as they share their traditions of individual equality, community sharing, and peace.

Our Moslem friends will soon be celebrating the end of Ramadan.

Whatever our religious or cultural tradition, this is certainly a time for new beginnings. I encourage all Canadians to share with each other the new hope and aspirations that they derive from their own cultural and religious backgrounds.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, recently the Vancouver harbour witnessed a collision between a bulk grain carrier and a fishing trawler that led to a 40,000 litre diesel fuel spill, the largest oil spill in some 17 years.

Hundreds of marine animals, including ducks, were killed by this spill. Many more were saved, thanks only to the dedicated volunteers from the Wildlife Rescue Association and members of the Environment Youth Corps.

This accident demonstrates clearly that we must implement a ban on tanker traffic in the inlet, such as the 105,000 dead weight tonne tanker that recently loaded crude oil at the Westridge Terminal in Burnaby, until there has been a full environmental impact assessment of the risks involved from tanker traffic in Burrard Inlet.

I join with Burnaby and Vancouver Councils in calling for this long overdue environmental risk assessment before we have an even bigger oil spill that could destroy our fishery, wildlife and have a devastating impact on the B.C. environment. We must act before it is too late.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise to advise the House of Commons of the sudden loss of 600 textile jobs in the city of Woodstock as a result of the closure announced yesterday of the two Harvey Woods plants which have been that city's largest employer for many years.

Due to problems unrelated to either local plant management or free trade with the United States, TAG Apparel Groups Incorporated of Mississauga went into receivership on February 28. We understand that the receiver has not seen fit to accept any offers which will allow the local plants to continue in operation.

While we acknowledge that the over-all economy of southwestern Ontario is not suffering, an island of unemployment of significant degree has developed, causing untold hardships and anxiety for countless workers and their families.

We look forward to any assistance that may be forthcoming from the federal Department of Employment and Immigration through its local Canada Manpower office, using appropriate components of the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

At the same time, however, we call upon the government to recognize islands of acute hardship by offering financial help to local small businesses, textile or otherwise, that might be able to expand and absorb many of the recently laid-off workers.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Commission on Passenger Transport in Canada announced that it would hold public hearings.

Yesterday I wrote to the chairman of the commission, Louis Hyndman, as follows: "Allow me to tell you that I find it inequitable, discriminatory and unfair that the commission will not go to the remote areas of Quebec, such as ours, and I feel that the commission has excluded northern Quebec."

However, I would like to tell you that the way rail transport in the Abitibi, with National Transportation Agency Decision No. 45-R-1990; passenger transport by Via from Montreal to Senneterre and La Sarre; air transport, with the departure of Air Canada; highway transport, with the Trans-Canada 117 North; and marine transport on the coast of Hudson Bay and Ungava Bay is handled is instructive and says a lot about passenger transport in Canada.

The people of Abitibi—Témiscamingue cannot legislate their geography, but they have serious reasons, based on their past and present experience, to want to live decently in the future and to be able to attend hearings where they live.

Mr. Speaker, is it possible this commission is afraid to come to Abitibi and hear from northerners?

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, it is with great honour that I make the following statement.

History was made in the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories last week. The N.W.T's six aboriginal languages have been recognized as official languages in the Northwest Territories.

Chipewyan, Cree, Dogrib, Gwich'in, Inuktitut and Slavey, as well as English and French, now have official status in the N.W.T.

The new N.W.T. Official Languages Act recognizes the presence of aboriginal peoples, centred in the N.W.T., but also present elsewhere in Canada, as a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

It also states that the existence of aboriginal peoples, speaking aboriginal languages, makes the N.W.T. a distinct society within Canada.

By recognizing the languages of its first peoples, the N.W.T. has provided important national leadership for all of Canada.

When we accommodate our differences with respect and goodwill, we contribute to the building of a nation which truly reflects its constituent peoples; a nation which is strong and secure in its diversity and confident about its future.

LABOUR FORCE DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, a year ago today the Minister of Employment and Immigration tabled a Labour Force Development Strategy, the government's plan to ensure that Canadians have the best labour market adjustment programs in the world.

Building on the success of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the Labour Force Development Strategy promotes a thoroughly national effort to improve Canadians' skills and a means by which their full potential can be realized.

Although essential to our future, this strategy will not just happen. It cannot be without the passage of Bill C-21. Without Bill C-21 the strategy is an idle thing. With Bill C-21, it is a rational plan for the 1990s, an essential part of our future prosperity.

I urge all members of the House and those in the other place to support the passage of Bill C-21.

EASTERN EUROPE

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the success of the recent elections in eastern Europe have shown that even those who have never been exposed to participatory democracy are still eager to exercise their aspirations and dreams in a peaceful and open way. The democratic movement, which began in Poland and Hungary and which has spread throughout Eastern Europe, will soon be joined by people in the Republic of Croatia.

On April 22 and 23, Croatians will be going to the polls to participate in their first multi-party elections in over 40 years. These elections will allow the more than 20 new political organizations, representing a wide variety of political expression, to compete directly with the Communist party.

It is important that western enthusiasm and support for political change in eastern Europe be also extended to the struggle of the many communities and peoples in Yugoslavia to throw off the chains of oppression and become full partners in the democratic political process.

I am confident that all members of the House will join me in welcoming these changes in the Croation Parliament and wish them a peaceful and successful transition from a one-party state into a multi-party democracy.

NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP WEEK

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, National Citizenship Week will be celebrated everywhere in Canada during the week of April 15 to April 21.

It is a wonderful opportunity for every Canadian in this country, young and less young, whether we live in the Atlantic provinces, central Canada, the great north or the western provinces, and whether we come from aboriginal, French, English, other new Canadian ancestry or combinations of such, to examine this great gift which has been given to us: our country Canada and our Canadian citizenship.

This is an appropriate time for each of us to stand up and to oppose vigorously all forms of racism and bigotry, and all statements and actions which denigrate any fellow Canadian.

During the last few months T-shirts, pins, calendars and reward posters with inappropriate and insensitive slogans, quite apart from linguistic statements and activities showing intolerance, in both Quebec and in other parts of Canada have contributed significantly to the weakening of the Canadian fabric, including our qualities of generosity and tolerance.

Let us stand up for Canada for what it has become as a country and what it can be: a leader among nations.

[Translation]

Let us all be proud of our country and work together to make it a symbol of tolerance and generosity.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question.

At a time when the country is experiencing great tension and division, I think it is the role and duty of all members of the government without exception to make statements encouraging dialogue and understanding among all Canadians in all regions. Therefore I ask the Prime Minister to take the opportunity to explain the controversial statement made by his environment minister last Friday to the effect that Canada will have to choose between Newfoundland and Quebec. Can the Prime Minister explain this to us?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition talked about those who make statements encouraging dialogue and tolerance in Canada. Quite obviously, he is not talking about the completely unacceptable statement made by his member from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte who yesterday caused an unacceptable situation by insulting and offending a member of this government and this House. But, knowing the parliamentary spirit of my friend from Newfoundland, I am told that he quickly retracted that disgraceful comment about a member of this House.

As for the comments made by the Minister of the Environment, this is the second or third time that the Leader of the Opposition has come with the same question. I told him the other day that the minister had indeed said that, but that he also said something else which, taken in context, could only lead a reasonable person to conclude that the Minister of the Environment favours national unity and the inclusion in this country of all provinces, be it Quebec or Newfoundland and Labrador. I find it deplorable under such circumstances that, despite my specific answers to the Leader of the Opposition, he persists in raising this question so as to spread misunderstanding here in the House and throughout Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: And I would ask the Leader of the Opposition to stop acting like an agent of disunity, because that is not like him. I would ask him to stop making such statements that are offensive, inaccurate and insulting to all members of this House.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I deplore the tone of the Prime Minister. I gave him an opportunity to speak for a united Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I gave him an opportunity to speak for a united Canada and he missed it. His answer to me was crass politics, and I would suggest I speak on behalf of all Canadians when I say that we must deplore the tone and gist of his response today.

[English]

On November 23, 1984 the Office of the Prime Minister sent a letter to all ministers and deputy ministers which said in part:

> —Ministers, not only individually but collectively as Cabinet, will continue to be the primary spokespersons for the Government of Canada.

On Monday when I asked the Prime Minister about the statement of the Minister of the Environment that "we can now imagine a scenario where English Canada will have to choose between Quebec and Newfoundland", he replied to me in part by saying: "The Minister of the Environment also said nobody thinks Newfoundland should leave Confederation".

I ask the Prime Minister exactly what did the Minister of the Environment mean, speaking for himself and I presume for the government when he used the words: "We can now imagine a scenario where English Canada will have to choose between Quebec and Newfoundland".

I invite the Prime Minister, in a spirit of unity and reconciliation, to explain those words.

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition urges me to speak for a united Canada. The Meech Lake Accord proposes a united Canada, at last. Will all Liberals support the Meech Lake Accord?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes!

Mr. Mulroney: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier says yes, and I believe him because he has been a faithful supporter in all votes in favour of the Meech Lake Accord. He knows very well that, when the people of Quebec heard the promise of the Prime Minister of Canada in 1980, they knew a no vote meant renewed federalism. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier understood, as did all Quebecers, that it meant a Constitution including Quebec, not with Quebec on the sideline.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, it is therefore comforting to see in the House of Commons French- and English-speaking Canadians of various origins who are here because they are Canadians, who come from different regions and who represent different provinces. But they are here in the House because they are all Canadians. I think it is unacceptable that the Leader of the Opposition should be making distinctions pertaining to the integrity of citizenship. We are all Canadians, all proud to be Canadians, and the Leader of the Opposition ought to refrain from spreading discord over major national issues.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister would know that, both inside and outside the House, I have always advocated a united country where we are all Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): This is why we supported the Prime Minister's own suggestion to strike a special committee to study the companions resolution of New Brunswick Premier McKenna. I am asking the Prime Minister why he is not prepared to say, in his name and on behalf of all his Cabinet colleagues, the same thing that the New Brunswick Premier said, that as far as he is concerned it is not a matter of choice between Quebec and Newfoundland and that he is prepared to choose Canada. Why can the Prime Minister not give the same answer here?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, surely the Leader of the Opposition is not suggesting that he has the slightest doubt in his mind as to whether I and all my colleagues stand for a united Canada. Surely there can be no doubt in his mind about that.

Given what my hon. friend has mentioned, it is true that in 1980 when the question was put to Quebecers: "Do you support federalism, or do you support sovereignty association", almost 50 per cent of the French speaking voters of the province of Quebec voted on the yes side. They voted for sovereignty association. They lost in that referendum. The option was either to let them be on the outside forever as losers or to try to bring the population that had voted yes, namely voted against Canada, back into a generous and open-hearted Canadian family.

After the 1981-82 experience, the members and the leaders of all parties began the Meech Lake Accord. It is true that there are members who sit on this front bench who supported the yes side in the referendum, and I am proud to have them here as members of the Government of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: What they did in 1984 and what they did in 1988 was to say: "While we did vote yes for sovereignty association, we believe that circumstances have changed and there is now a chance for a new and a better Canada. It is true that we French Canadians who voted against Canada want to be part of a new Canada".

That is why all members of this House virtually without exception supported the Meech Lake Accord, because it brought Canadians together and it made that 40 per cent of the vote, but 50 per cent of French speaking Quebecers, feel first-class citizens of Canada.

That is why the Meech Lake Accord was such an important national statement of unity. That is why it was so important that it was supported by all three major political parties. That is why I know that my hon. friend will salute the presence in this party and perhaps in others of people who may have voted in a different way, in different circumstances, but today are doing their very best to build a brand new Canada in which they can feel first-class citizens so that we can get on with building another kind of Canada into the next century.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians are looking for the Prime Minister's assurance that no matter where they are from in Canada they are also first-class Canadians.

My question is for the acting Minister of Finance. The government has cut off debate on the goods and services tax. It has embarked on a propaganda campaign trying to sell the goods and services tax to Canadians when it has not been fully passed by Parliament.

I would like to know whether the acting Minister of Finance will admit to Canadians that the only reason they are trying to ram through this goods and services tax in the way they are by January 1991 is because they think Canadians might be stupid enough to forget about it in time for the next election.

• (1430)

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that not only the Auditor General, but the precedent-setting examples in this House, as well as an all-party resolution of the finance committee of this House of Commons, quite categorically concluded in a signed statement that any matters relating to the GST should "publicize the details of the new tax".

What we are doing is following normal procedures. We are making certain that Canadians are prepared in advance of the change from the regressive federal sales tax to the fairer GST. We are progressing along those lines for the benefit of Canadians, particularly the small business sector that has to prepare now for the transition from a bad tax to a much better tax.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

An inappropriate GST ad campaign cost Canadians $800,000 in 1989. Today, just 24 hours after the third reading of the GST bill, a new multi-million dollar propaganda blitz has commenced. This blitz circumvents the parliamentary process by prejudging the scope and implementation of the GST.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pickard: Will the minister tell this House and Canadians that the government truly respects the parliamentary process by withdrawing this brainwash campaign and allowing the Senate to fulfil its parliamentary obligations?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the member read the story in The Ottawa Citizen today written by Deborah Dowling. I told Miss Dowling this morning that there is really nothing new in the story that she printed because in the finance committee of March 13 I pointed out to the all-party committee that in mid-April a pre-registration kit containing an information booklet and a volunteer pre-registration form will be mailed to some 2 million potential registrants explaining how to pre-register for the GST and what assistance can be provided in preparation for the new tax.

I went on to say: "The sooner one registers the sooner one can prepare for the transition".

That is what we are doing and that is what I told the committee on March 13. We are doing it so that businesses can prepare in advance, as has been a tradition of the parliamentary system in this country and in other parliamentary systems, and as the Auditor General has pointed out time and time again. We must advise Canadians, particularly the business community, in a responsible way how best to adjust to this better tax.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Yesterday in Toronto we were told the Prime Minister and the President of the United States discussed talks about talks on an acid rain proposal. On the same day the International Joint Commission issued its report on the future of the Great Lakes, a report that was extremely critical of the lack of action by successive Canadian governments. We know that Canadians want action on the environment, not just more talk.

Will the Prime Minister accept the recommendations of the International Joint Commission to stop the flow of all toxic substances into the Great Lakes, and act now on that recommendation?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we agree with the concern expressed in the report addressed to both countries. As a matter of fact both countries are moving ahead together to address the issues raised in the report. For example, we have just announced in Canada a $125 million additional plan for the Great Lakes, providing for 42 remedial action plans, 17 of them in Canada.

We have also set up the basis of what will be The Green Plan in terms of regulating all industries discharging toxics into the Great Lakes. We have also set up a priority list of substances under CEPA, according to which we will assess, in priority, the toxicity of the main toxic substances discharged in the Great Lakes. We are doing what we can, which is a lot, but never enough, and that is why The Green Plan will complete the work we are doing.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement which the minister knows was signed, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, the Fisheries Act and the recommendations of the international joint commission since 1972 have all raised the issue of the Great Lakes and whether there is really going to be a future for the Great Lakes. The minister in his discussion paper on the environment says we need more discussion.

Why more discussion, I ask the minister? We need some action. The International Joint Commission has made clear recommendations, and has said that the government has not acted in face of the evidence. What commitment does the minister give to act on the Great Lakes pollution now? He knows that $25 million a year will not be sufficient. What plan does he have for the Great Lakes?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, two years ago this government strengthened the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement providing for all the new measures I just mentioned. The Green Plan, the consultation document, proposes to build up the basis of the regulation process whereby we will regulate major industries such as metal mines and smelters, power-generating plants, hazardous waste facilities, textile factories, petroleum refineries, chemical pollution plants and steel plants. We will enact national standards under CEPA. This is very ambitious, very tough and I would like the Opposition to support us when the time comes to enact those measures.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my last question is directed also to the Minister of the Environment. Now that negotiations have started again with the Americans on acid rain, it is finally possible to believe that progress will be made. Is the Government going at last to face up to its responsibilities? Will the Government make the funds available to implement an action plan concerning acid rain? Funds must be —available for implementing a program on acid rain. Is the government prepared to do this now?

[English]

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we all know that one of the main reasons the United States has finally decided to adopt those measures and which are now before the U.S. Congress is that Canada showed leadership and set up a program aimed at reducing its own emissions by 50 per cent. We are all aware that at least $500 million have been spent on that program. I suggest we should be proud of our efforts. We must now make sure that in the other three provinces which are not involved in the reduction plan, we can control the emissions and implement an action plan to complete this whole effort. But we have achieved the essential, because we know, on the basis of scientific reports, that with the measures already implemented and which will be completed by 1994, 14,000 Canadian lakes which had died because of sulfur oxyde will live again. As Easter Sunday is approaching, I think we should be satisfied and congragulate one another for the progress already made concerning acid rain.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment knows very well that under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act only 44 chemicals out of 30,000 are to be dealt with. The Minister of the Environment also knows that while $125 million may sound like a large sum here, it is inadequate to deal with the problem.

Since the Commission raised a very crucial question yesterday with regard to the health of millions of Canadians and Americans, what are the new measures that the minister intends to put into place to deal with this emergency?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has mentioned the 44 substances priority list. It is important to put this into perspective because the figures can be distorted if they are not put into perspective. It means, in reality, that there is a regrouping of hundreds and hundreds of substances within those 44 priority substances. Those substances happen to be the main ones, the most toxic and dangerous ones. It means that when the process of assessment is over we will be in a position to enact a whole set of new regulations to control those very important sources of pollution.

• (1440)

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment is wrong in thinking that by controlling 44 chemicals he can deal with the problem outlined by the International Joint Commission.

The commission states that there is a threat to the health of our children emanating from our exposure to persistent toxic substances, even at a very low ambient level. Therefore, we want to know what are the immediate steps that the minister has in mind in order to cope with this emergency.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): The commission's report makes two main points. First, it mentions that we have made progress, mainly with regard to the sewage treatment facilities and the elimination of DDT and high profile chemicals like PCBs.

The hon. member rightly states that we need to know much more in terms of research and regulations. All this will be addressed in The Green Plan, because the main part of The Green Plan will be devoted to science and technology. Then we will be able to address the issue raised by the report.

Second, as far as regulations are concerned, The Green Plan is proposing a whole set of regulations. I think that we have whatever we need to address those main issues.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Finance).

Once again the Governor of the Bank of Canada hits hard the average Canadian and small business by increasing interest rates. Will the government stop this policy of high interest rates, and help small business progress instead of helping small business to go bankrupt?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member knows full well that there are various ways of lowering the interest rates.

Mr. Fontana: Try one.

Mr. Loiselle: We could do it by pressing a button to bring them down. We would see them go up again. There are, within our economy, very strong inflationary pressures. There is great danger that if our policies are not handled properly, we could end up in a situation which the Liberals should know very well, because they put us in that particular situation in the early 1980s.

We are in a difficult situation. We are dealing with both fiscally and economically. We will continue to do that until such time as the pressures diminish and we can bring down interest rates in a way that they will stay down.

[Translation]

M. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the Minister should listen to the Conseil du Patronat du Québec which is precisely recommending that the interest rates be immediately lowered. In the last Budget, the Minister of Finance forecasted a rate of 11.1 per cent for 1990. Since each time the interest rate increases by one point the deficit increases by $1.7 billion, why does the government persist in increasing the deficit and the national debt? Would it not be better to lower the interest rate so as to reduce the deficit and the national debt?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Of course it would, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member came close to giving away the answer in his question. It is obvious that we do not like high interest rates any more than he does and that we are monitoring that situation closely because we want to act responsibly. We have also done that in our Budget by cutting our expenditures so that the fiscal policy could make some capital available. But for the time being, for a little longer than what was initially planned, there are still pressures on the economy. Canadians have kept buying more than we had expected. So, we have to keep trying to contain those pressures because a reduction in the interests rates may be desirable, but it must be brought about in a responsible manner. There are not fifty ways to go about it and there is no easy way. We fully support the policy according to which interest rates should be reduced in a responsible manner and for good.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Government of British Columbia announced plans to log the upper half of the Carmanah Valley.

As the Minister of the Environment knows, the all-party Standing Committee on Environment unanimously calls for the accurate and complete inventory of old growth forests on Vancouver Island, including Carmanah, and that is a legal responsibility of the federal government.

Since permanent publicly supportable decisions can only be made when the facts are put on the table, and since the B.C. government has purposely withheld the real facts on both inventory and the impact of logging in Carmanah, will the minister arrange for the completion of such an inventory and a complete impact assessment so that Carmanah and other Vancouver Island watersheds can be protected?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has noted, the decision calls first for the establishment of a park to protect the giant trees in the upper part of the valley. For this we are pleased, of course, but it also mentions that there could be logging in the other part of the valley.

The decision says that this will be done provided studies are conducted to authorize the logging. We are concerned with the other part of the decision. We should be vigilant to make sure the conclusion of the studies justifies the logging of trees. If it is not possible to log any trees there without endangering the other part of the park, then we must be very vigilant.

In terms of assessment, I have asked my department to look into the possibility of being involved. I am waiting for a report to know what the federal jurisdiction is.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also to the Minister of the Environment. He is aware that the Government of British Columbia has admitted that the necessary studies to determine whether or not logging in the upper half of the valley would have a negative consequence on the giant spruce at the bottom of the valley have simply not been done.

During this past 18 months, while Canadians have waited for the announcement of a decision on the Carmanah Valley, the studies have not been done. I think it is clear that Canadians expect proper environmental impact studies to be done before, not after projects.

Would the minister, who has spoken positively about the Carmanah in British Columbia and elsewhere in Canada, take this opportunity to lay to rest the issue of conflict in British Columbia and announce that the necessary studies will be done now, not once logging begins?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has offered to the B.C. government to participate in the cost and operation of the study for that part of the valley. We have not received a positive answer as yet.

That is why I have asked my department to look into what the federal jurisdiction is to determine if we have ways to step in and participate in the process. When I have an answer, I will be able to report to the House.

COMPETITION BUREAU

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Yesterday we learned that the Quebec Superior Court ruled that the Competition Bureau was unconstitutional. This has the potential of rendering the Competition Bureau completely impotent. When you add this to the questions that the Canadian consumers and the business community have regarding the whole competition process, this is a great concern.

Will the government be appealing this ruling? In the interim, will the government be implementing and abiding by the rulings already made by the Competition Tribunal on this matter? If not, there is going to be a tremendous amount of chaos in the competition area.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the seriousness with which the hon. member has approached this question. On behalf of the minister, who is out of the House on government business, let me say that the government is taking this judgment very seriously, along with the Department of Justice. Departments are evaluating the implications as to what course of action will come from that. Obviously the government will have to look at it at that time. It would not be appropriate for me to say anything further.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, with due respect to the Minister of Energy, mergers and applications are not going to stop. In fact, they could accelerate because of the chaos that now exists.

Are the rulings that the tribunal has already made going to be implemented and abided by? There are questions dealing with Texaco and Imperial for which we must have answers. Will further questions be referred to the tribunal, or is the director of the Competition Bureau going to be the final judge on these matters? Is the government not going to deal with any of these questions at all? The government should be prepared to tell us right now.

• (1450)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's attempt to elicit an answer from me, but he will also understand that the reasons I gave him in my first answer stand. That is obviously now on the record. I am sure the appropriate ministers are going to look at the representations he has made and will report in due course.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week, the Minister for International Trade told the House that he and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would be going to Brussels and Ireland for meetings dealing with the foreign overfishing off Newfoundland.

Can the minister tell us now if the meetings took place and with what results? In particular, did the ministers of trade and fisheries indicate to the European Economic Community that, if necessary, Canada would be prepared to follow the Harris recommendation and take unilateral action to see that the straggling fish stocks are properly protected?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. My colleagues, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister for International Trade, had very useful discussions both with the Irish ministers who are in the chair of the Community Council on Fisheries and with Mr. Marin who is the Commissioner for the European Community on fisheries matters.

It was helpful to their presentation that the Harris report had been published, because that added authority to the Canadian claims with regard to the problems of stocks.

Discussions are continuing, but I think it is fair to say that the discussions which occurred last week were among the most positive we have had with the Community and with its member nations. In the circumstances, we did not think it was wise for Canada to take actions which would appear to be actions of unilateral threat because we think we are making progress in the discussions. That has not yet been achieved, but I can report to the House that we had more effective meetings than have been the custom in dealings with the Community and we intend to have more regular meetings frequently.

I should also make the point that in addition to those meetings involving the ministers directly involved, the Prime Minister has been very actively involved in these questions, including having pressures brought to bear upon the leaders of the member countries of the Community.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister and, while he is in such a forthcoming mood, maybe he could also indicate to us the answer to another question.

He will know that since last October, I and others have been raising the question of a fisheries aid package for plant workers and fishermen who are devastated by the current situation. He will know that during the last two weeks, his colleagues, the Minister for International Trade from St. John's West and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, have both been making the appropriate noises in the press that the announcement is imminent.

Can he tell us when the government is going to stop what amounts to a fairly cruel joke on the fishermen and plant workers who have been waiting much too long for this? Can he tell us if the package is ready or when it will be ready? Is it not true that it is sitting there just waiting for the return of the Minister for International Trade so he can get his picture in the paper and have his photo opportunity? Is that all that is hanging it up at the moment?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister for International Trade have been doing is engaging in consultations with leaders of the fishing industry, the unions, and the provincial governments that are involved to ensure that when we bring forward a package, which we hope to do fairly shortly, it will not only be an effective federal response, but it will be a position that is able to take advantage of the real interests and the jurisdictions of provincial governments which are interested in the matter.

While I am in such a forthcoming mood, Mr. Speaker, perhaps in relation to a question that was put to me by the member for Gander—Grand Falls the other day, I could quote from a letter I received from Mr. Bill Berry, the president of a—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —fishing company in Newfoundland, who said: "Last night I caught your response on Soviet fishing—"

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): "—in Canadian waters in the House of Commons. We are a Newfoundland company doing large business with the East Bloc, especially the U.S.S.R. They are good business partners. I am—"

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Minister could send a copy of the letter across the aisle.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who said the details of the $1 billion worth of direct farm aid to grain producers in Canada would be available before Easter. Since this is the last opportunity to inform the House, can the minister give details of the program so that farmers and bankers can know specifically how the payment will be made, what it will be based on, when the cheques can be received at the farm, and approximately what each farmer will receive?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the federal government announced its intention to provide assistance to meet the shortfall in income that has been experienced by farmers in the projected year 1990. We are engaged in discussions with the provinces at the present time. I personally met with the premier of the province of Saskatchewan. They are looking at some proposals. We have had discussions as well with the provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan and Manitoba at the officials level. We consider this to be a very top priority.

I say to the hon. member from Nova Scotia, she will be pleased to know that meetings are either taking place today or tomorrow with respect to the fur industry on behalf of which she has made many representations, and I thank her for that. I can advise the hon. member that this is a top priority. We are working very hard on developing packages that will be adaptable to each of the respective provinces to meet that multi-dimensional need.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, since the purpose of this program is to offset programs being offered by the Americans and the Europeans, who make their support programs available through their central governments, why did this government decide to shift the focus on to the provinces instead of directly approaching the problem and providing assistance directly to farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is suggesting that we should have provided $140 million such as the United States has provided in the current EEP program, the Export Enhancement Program, I would certainly take that as a representation. But we thought that the need was far more serious than that and we have offered up $500 million.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, the Royal Commission on Passenger Transport in Canada issued its schedule of hearings in Canada. To our surprise and dismay, people in the Abitibi, Témiscamingue and Northern Quebec areas have once more been ignored.

Can the minister confirm in this House that the Commission will review its position and hold hearings in those remote areas for the purpose of listening to the people in the Abitibi, Témiscamingue and Northern Quebec areas on transportation matters?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, royal commissions of inquiry operate at arm's length. The government does not give them instructions. I would suggest to the hon. member that he take this opportunity to make his views known to the commission directly.

TREASURY BOARD

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. A report issued this week by Statistics Canada shows that, while the government was laying off employees in important areas such as air safety, food inspection, energy conservation and environmental research, it was hiring an army of tax promoters and collectors. Why is this government downsizing important areas of the Public Service, while hiring thousands of tax collectors ready to pick the last cents from the pockets of Canadians?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, let me set the hon. member for Ottawa West straight. The statistics published by Statistics Canada include all public servants in agencies and departments throughout the government. This is also a statistical population where Statistics Canada uses spot sampling. Those statistics are quite different from those we collect on person-years, which are controlled by the government employer, namely the President of the Treasury Board. Person-years, which are under the direct control of the employer, have indeed come down, as announced by the Hon. Minister of Finance in his Budget. And all this without affecting in any way the safety and well-being of Canadians, Mr. Speaker.

• (1500)

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, if the minister does not like Statistics Canada's figures, perhaps he would do his own accounting to the Canadian public on the cost of contracting out new hirings and old hirings.

Will the minister admit that he has been conning Canadians, that he has slashed services and turned the lives of 25,000 public servants upside down with no gain to the taxpayers?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ROBERT VAIVE

Mr. Speaker: I wish to advise hon. members that today is the last day at the table for one of our newest Table Officers, Mr. Robert Vaive.

[Translation]

Mr. Vaive began his career in the House in 1976 as a procedural clerk and since 1987 he has been acting as Deputy Principal Clerk in the Committees Directorate and the Table Research Branch.

[English]

He was recently appointed Deputy Clerk of the Saskatchewan Legislature and will be leaving soon to take up his new duties.

I am sure the House will want to join with me in wishing you, sir, all the very best in Regina. Come back and see us whenever you can.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: While I have the attention of the House, please join me for refreshments in Room 216-N after the House rises today to celebrate the adjournment.

I wish all of you a very happy and wonderful Easter holiday.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have a notice of a question of privilege. I will hear the hon. member now.

PRIVILEGE

DISTURBANCE IN GALLERIES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because I believe a prima facie case of contempt of the House can be and must be made against the hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt. If you so find, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to move the necessary motion.

All members were subjected to a contempt yesterday, and I mean contempt as described in our authority, Maingot's Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, when two visitors to a gallery here, vouched for by a card signed to the Sergeant-at-Arms by the hon. member, disrupted proceedings and threw objects onto members in their places. I understand that has been confirmed by the Sergeant-at-Arms, as well as evidence from talking with other people that would confirm that as well.

I refer you, Sir, and remind all members that one of the 13 categories which Maingot sets out as "acts or conduct constituting breach of privilege or contempt" is stated very clearly at page 203 of the 1982 edition. He said:

> All kinds of misconduct in the presence of the House or of a committee may be treated as contempts on the ground that they partake of an affront to the dignity of the House.

Then he is more specific when he states:

> Misconduct or misbehaviour in the traditional sense would include acts that disrupt or have a tendency to disrupt or interrupt the House or committees by such acts as shouting, throwing objects, waving placards.

As I said, Sir, at least two of these three things happened here yesterday, done by, among others, guests signed for by the hon. member.

The question, which I think is one of natural justice, to ask next is one which, of course, only the member can answer: Did he have any knowledge that these guests intended to so behave, when he signed for them? I submit that the already broadcast testimony of one of them—which made it clear he did not come here from a distance to observe but, rather, to make a last desperate and disruptive display of opposition to what the House was doing—indicates the hon. member owes the House at least an explanation, then an apology and, as I ask for, an appearance at the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I conclude by asserting that the House cannot do its work, or maintain essential dignity, if what we call "strangers" disrupt proceedings in an abusive way. In such cases, there is both a prima facie breach of privilege and a prima facie contempt. In this case the responsibility must lie with the hon. member whom I have indicated.

If the House does not, or is not given the opportunity, to assert itself on this principle which has now been called into question, then we have all failed to take appropriate steps to assert and protect our privileges. I do not relish the future and the consequences in such an event.

This House would get disreputable treatment which it had deserved, which it had tolerated before and which it had authorized by its own inaction in the present case.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we were all very upset yesterday. We all deplore incidents such as disorder in the House, with people throwing things to the floor of the House.

After the incident which took place in the opposition west gallery, I immediately asked the Clerk of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms for a report on the incident as to how the people got into the gallery and who had authorized their entrance.

The Sergeant-at-Arms came to my office at about 5.30 p.m. and showed me the admission passes which were stamped with the name of the member of Scarborough—Agincourt, J. Karygiannis, MP.

As Whip, I proceeded then to call the member of this caucus and asked him, first, if he had knowledge that these people were in the gallery. He said yes. I asked then if he had been aware that they were going to demonstrate. He said no.

I take the man to be an honourable person and therefore I believe that he had no knowledge that these people were going to cause a disturbance.

If we are to send something to a committee we must have a prima facie case before us. We must have evidence that damage or disorder was planned. In this case I think it would be unfair at this time, given the member's statement to me, to send such a matter to a committee of this House for examination.

I also ask the House to give the member, whose reputation and possibly actions are being placed into doubt by some members of this House, a chance to defend himself in this House at an appropriate time. He is not here today.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you reserve on your judgment until the member has had a chance to explain to the House what happened that day. I think that would be a fair way to proceed.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene briefly in this matter.

At the outset, I want to echo the words of the Opposition House Leader in saying that we all deplore what happened in the gallery yesterday. This House is not a place for that kind of activity. We regret that some of the other spectators in the gallery were perhaps not only inconvenienced but in danger during the course of those events.

I believe it is appropriate for us to wait until the member for Scarborough—Agincourt is in the House in order that he may rise in his place to offer his own defence to the suggestion or allegation that he knowingly permitted such an event to occur.

• (1510)

I would, however, suggest that there is a broader issue here. Members of both the government and the opposition have the privilege of having their guests seated in special galleries. The procedures of the House and the procedures of security allow us to have our guests escorted by security people. They need not go through the metal detector. They need not go through the screening that is required of those individuals who sit in the public galleries. We might wish to examine that as a part of a broader issue.

My final point, which may be considered as a separate intervention, is that members of the government, particularly those who sit opposite the New Democratic Party benches, by actions and words last night, although not recorded in Hansard, clearly impugned the motives of members of this side of the House. I am told by other members, in particular the member for Skeena, that members of the Conservative caucus approached him and suggested that he was responsible for that occurrence.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member would accept the Chair's suggestion that if there is another issue, and there may well be, that it ought to be raised at another time.

However, we have a very specific difficulty in front of the House. I have listened very carefully to the hon. parliamentary secretary who has given us a statement of facts with which I think all hon. members are in agreement.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has put forward a qualification that the member who may or may not have been implicated in this matter is not here. At the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier this matter should at least be adjourned until our colleague can come into the House. I noticed that that suggestion met with very marked approval on both sides of the House.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan raises some matters which I think are of very acute concern to this House and to the Speaker with respect to security. I think that that might well be looked into at some appropriate time, depending on how I may ultimately rule.

The hon. member is making another point. I know that the hon. member will go along with the Speaker in resting that point, at least for the moment. He may want to raise it as a separate point at another time.

The hon. House Leader for the government wishes to rise, and I would be most prepared to hear him.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say very quickly that I concur with the recommendation of the House leader of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, that in fact until the hon. member has an opportunity to make his statement in the House we should forgo any judgment as to evidence.

I would also underline as you did, Sir, in your comments, that this reminds us of security questions because what was paper could well have been something else by virtue of the fact that we as members have the privilege of bypassing the metal detectors and other security measures for the general public when we bring in or allow guests to come in under our passes. That is something that may well have to be re-examined in view of the circumstances.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about the procedure of this matter in that the matter was raised perhaps without the member himself being forewarned or even asked about it before it was raised.

We have here a situation of procedure in which we are not asking about the member's behaviour but about the consequences of someone else's behaviour. We may, as a result of this procedure, be leaving an impression, perhaps over a number of hours, that the member had some knowledge of it, when it is a third person who has taken the action that we are talking about.

I am concerned about the procedure. Is it proper to raise this matter without having forewarned the member concerned that the matter was going to be raised and giving that member a chance to speak to it before it was raised? What we leave is an impression that the member knew about it. I think that procedure is threatening to every single member.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to raise a quick point.

The government House leader and the Whip for our party have both raised a concern about the metal detectors. I must say that I have some concern, which I know is shared by some of my colleagues in this corner of the House, at this matter being raised publicly in this way at this time.

Therefore it seems to me it is important that a decision be made quickly as to what is going to happen in response to it. The country now knows of our security arrangements here and the possible loopholes in it. I would urge the government and yourself, Sir, to deal with this matter promptly.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I think the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has a very good point about a third party being involved.

With respect to the issue of security, I thought we had a Management and Members' Services Committee and a board of "eternal" economy. I still get irritated by the fact that I think both of those committees have more cobwebs around their ears than the House of Commons, in many ways.

Be that as it may, I do take exception—and I most likely stand alone on this business—to the mention of members taking their own guests quickly to the gallery and not going through the metal detectors. That is the way it happens. A member does not send a guest for whom he has signed who can avoid the metal detector. The member has to take him personally.

With all the rules that are coming down internally around this place, hon. members are becoming less honourable because they cannot take their constituents with whom they are physically into the gallery quickly when sometimes time is of the essence.

Quite frankly, as the one little perk left around this place, I would like the Board of Internal Economy or the Management and Members' Services Committee to look at this question, not because of the problem of getting around security in the absence of a member, but to make sure that when the member is with a guest that that member takes the guest to wherever he wants to go, thereby taking responsibility for the actions of that guest. That is the key.

This business of muddying the waters with security and/or metal detectors in the absence of members is really, with respect, a red herring. My God, if we are hon. members, surely we can look after our own guests in our own gallery, when they come to this place.

I would not want the knee-jerk reaction of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, who is obviously and quite properly worried about security, to start to muddy the waters about who I take into the gallery. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, and you used to be a member yourself—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan —you get long line-ups—

An Hon. Member: What do you mean by "used to be"?

Mr. Nowlan: Now you are more than the first of equals.

If it applies to us, dear Sir, then you will have to take your guest from Room 16, where you have had your little lunch, and put them through the lie detector to come to sit in the Speaker's gallery, if you are going to do this thing holus-bolus.

Some Hon. Members: Lie detector?

Mr. Nowlan: So, beware, otherwise I will be raising another point of privilege.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I notice the hon. government House leader is suggesting I should look around for someone to speak on my behalf, but I will let it go for the moment.

I noticed that the Board of Internal Economy was referred to as the board of "eternal" economy. That is something for which some citizens would very much compliment us for.

The incident that happened is not amusing. I think that especially for the public watching this particular exchange it does little credit to anybody in this country to use whatever subterfuge they can to come into this place, which is symbolic of our democracies, our freedoms and our liberties, and abuse them.

The incident that happened, so far as the person involved in this incident is concerned, is of course absolutely inexcusable. It was not brave. It was cowardly and sneaky. It goes against everything we believe in.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has raised an absolutely legitimate point, and it was commented upon further by the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

With respect to procedure, the fact of the matter is that under our rules, if it is a question of privilege or contempt of the House, there is an obligation that it be raised at the first opportunity. The hon. parliamentary secretary has followed that. However, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, who has been very frank with us all has made a suggestion, which has been especially confirmed now by the hon. House leader of the government, that this matter should be stood down until the hon. member whose passes apparently were used has a chance to speak to the Chamber.

I am very conscious of the fact that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier as House leader of the Official Opposition had contacted the hon. member. He has stood up in this House and said that the hon. member said that he did not know that this was going to happen. That is there in front of us, but I think it is appropriate that we invite our colleague to address us further in the matter.

Again, I say, because ultimately I am responsible for the security in this place, that I am deeply disturbed that this could happen.

I say to any other Canadians who think it is smart to pull a stunt like this, that while they break the law they abuse their privileges. If they are ever in trouble, they will be calling on all of us to protect them very rapidly.

DISTURBANCE IN GALLERIES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we have appreciated your words, as usual.

I am hesitant to raise a related matter first raised by my hon. friend from Thunder Bay—Atikokan, but I feel I must.

Yesterday, immediately following the incident, a number of members opposite, some of whom are here today, accused members of the New Democratic Party, as we were leaving, of having orchestrated this event. That occurred when I left the Chamber, and it apparently went on with others. Others brought to my attention this morning that as early as this morning they were being accosted, again, by a number of members from the government side who were accusing our party of being a party to this organized demonstration.

I do not raise this as a question of privilege. I do not even know if it is a point of order, quite frankly.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, it was very offending to all of us to be accused of doing something that we feel so strongly about in a most negative way.

I do not know if it would be appropriate for the government House leader to say something at this time. I do not want to make a big issue out of this. It is not worthy of that.

But, as I say, our party members were certainly offended. We would just as soon drop the whole matter, but I would expect some comments.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that I cannot comment on whether individual members may have accused individual members of the New Democratic Party of being party to this incident.

On behalf of my party let me say there is no such accusation. At the time we did not know what happened. In fact I met my colleague, the House leader of the Liberal Party, in the middle of the floor as he was approaching the Clerk to find out what was going on.

I might say this, and I do not want to start an argument, the hon. member will recall that during that vote his members all had placards in contravention of the privilege—

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): What do you mean by placards?

Mr. McDermid: Props.

Mr. Andre: If he reads the intervention of my friend, the member for Peace River, in terms of what constitutes disorder in the House, he will see that props and so on are mentioned in that.

It was not that big a deal. We did not raise a question of privilege on that or comment on it, but one can understand that in the heat of the moment on a very vital issue, when his members stood up with props, that invites the accusation that perhaps they were doing other things as well.

If it has offended, I say on behalf of my party, without qualification, we apologize if there were any intentions of blaming the hon. member for that demonstration.

Mr. Brewin: You're a total jerk, Andre.

Mr. Andre: I just ask him to understand what might have motivated some of our members to think that way.

Mr. Speaker: I think that properly ends the matter.

The hon. House leader of the government has made an absolutely clear statement that in no respect whatsoever is it the position of the government that the New Democratic Party was in any way involved in that altercation. I think that ends the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, today, Wednesday, April 11, the House will adjourn later this afternoon. I wonder whether the Government House Leader would be prepared to tell hon. members what the legislative program will be when we return on April 23 so that they can prepare for the debate on it.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention, when we return on Monday, April 23, to call Bill C-69, the expenditures reduction bill and to continue with that on Tuesday, April 24. I will be in discussions with my colleagues in terms of future business.

I might have been inclined to bring forward a message in terms of Bill C-21 for the Senate, but I understand it has gone on vacation until some time in May.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: There is a rule about saying uncomplimentary things about the other place. I do not know whether that fits or not.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but rise to the bait here.

I just wonder if the House leader is telling us that he will bring a message in before you, Sir, rule on the point of order before the House. We think we should wait for the Speaker to rule on the point before the minister brings in a message.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to keep us out of Room 216 too long.

No, that is not my intention, but perhaps the Chair could offer some advice, as suggested by one of my colleagues, about how one says something uncomplimentary about the other place.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I think we probably better close off this exchange which apparently I started. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do have a question for my hon. friend. He referred to the other place as being on vacation. Would the minister explain how it is possible to be on a vacation from a vacation?

Mr. Speaker: I am glad I do not have to reserve on that question.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 98 petitions.

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I am pleased to table on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Western Economic Diversification and the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, two copies, in both official languages, of the annual report on the administration of the Small Business Loans Act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1989.

If I may, I would like to add my sincere appreciation to all members of the House and to hon. senators in the other place for the speedy passage given to Bill C-56, which extends for three more years the Small Business Loans Act.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): It is a great pleasure for me to table in the House today, in both official languages, the Orders in Council announcing appointments made recently by the government.

Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), these orders are deemed to have been referred to the standing committees named in the appendix.

HOUSING

FEDERAL LAND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, last October I had the pleasure of announcing the release for development of a second parcel of surplus federal land in the Toronto area, in an effort to address the imbalance between the supply of suitable building sites and the demand for new housing in that area.

• (1530)

Our commitment with both the Downsview lands and the Vaughan site is to created fully integrated communities with a broad range of incomes and to ensure by providing a mix of housing forms and types that at least 25 per cent of the 7,500 new homes would be affordable.

[Translation]

Today, I am pleased to announce to the House the implementation by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Canadian agency responsible for housing development, of two new projects which will contribute to alleviate further the shortage of affordable housing both in Toronto and Vancouver. The significance of these two inititiatives lies not only in the number of housing units involved, but in the leadership they provide to others.

[English]

In the Kitsilano community of Vancouver, CMHC presently owns and operates two housing projects comprising 349 units on 16 sites—the Vancouver Terraces and Broadway Apartments. The buildings are in need of upgrading and no longer meet the changing needs of their aging occupants. Redevelopment is essential but at the same time the very word "redevelopment" has negative implications for many people. Our approach will hopefully become a model for other residential property owners.

A week ago last Friday in Vancouver, I announced the start of an in-depth and comprehensive consultation in which the residents and neighbours will be fully involved. We will endeavour to show that it is possible to plan redevelopment in a manner which is consistent with local views and which is truly sensitive to the needs of those affected.

A week ago yesterday in Toronto, I announced the details of our plans to redevelop the lands where the CMHC Toronto branch office has been located since the 1950s so as to create an additional 150 dwellings.

In Toronto and in Vancouver we are demonstrating that it is possible to make better use of our resources. In both cases the land was originally developed many years ago at very low densities and the surrounding areas now feature higher densities. It is our expectation that these initiatives will be completely self-financing and could in fact result in some return on the government's investment.

In Vancouver, we are showing how redevelopment can occur in complete sympathy with the neighbourhood, and in Toronto we will be showing the potential for public-private partnerships as we call for proposals from industry to participate with us in the redevelopment of the lands.

[Translation]

In Canada, we continue to be seriously concerned about the problem of affordable housing, especially in such demand driven markets as Toronto and Vancouver. Alone, the Federal Government lacks the land resources necessary to deal with the problem. However, we are looking quite closely at all the possibilities open to us to utilize our land resources to the maximum.

[English]

Recognizing that we need a concentrated effort to deal with the situation in demand driven markets, I have called upon representatives of the provincial and municipal governments to join with us in local committees to co-ordinate our efforts in addressing the concerns of affordable housing. These committees are already working on this challenge in many of the urban areas of our country, including Toronto and Vancouver.

As well, the federal government is sponsoring a four-year program aimed at improving housing affordability and choice. That is called ACT, for Affordability and Choice Today. This program, jointly managed by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, the Canadian Home Builders and the Canadian Housing and Renewal Associations, will provide funding to eliminate barriers to new solutions to housing needs and to reduce the costly delays in obtaining development approvals.

Because we cannot resolve housing affordability concerns alone, we have acted to build co-operation with other levels of government and private industry. We need to tear down the road blocks to the solutions and set the right examples. I believe that our recent undertakings, particularly in Vancouver and Toronto, are important steps in this direction.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, it is an indication of just how little the government has done in the field of affordable housing that the announcement that the minister has just made constitutes a major initiative for the government.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, this is an indication of the poor performance of this government in the region of housing which it just announced as a major initiative.

[English]

I would applaud the government for its announcement that it is now prepared to co-operate with municipalities and the private sector in order to develop some kind of an effort in the field of affordable housing.

Unfortunately all we have heard from the government since this minister was appointed, and indeed since the government took power, has been rhetoric and very little action. Despite the promises and grand statements, as the minister repeated for the umpteenth time his initiative in the case of Downsview and Vaughan, there is no construction and there is no initiative. How many more times is the minister going to make the same announcement without some action on his part?

There are thousands of people in Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal, and right across the country who are demanding social housing, co-operative housing, and subsidized housing. Nonetheless, the lists of the homeless and those needing shelter continue to rise.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, this Government has not really cut all the funds earmarked for housing. The lists of the homeless continue to grow. The Government still continues to ignore that fact.

[English]

There are over 1.2 million people in the country who have to devote more than 30 per cent of their revenue to lodging. That is simply unacceptable in a country as rich and prosperous as this one. The government has cut the programs for renovation, which has severely cut a number of the lowest income people in the country away from the possibility of having any kind of decent housing in which to live.

We are living through a crisis. The government is simply not responding. Yet, municipality after municipality, provincial government after provincial government across the country, cry out for national leadership and they are not getting it. Mayor Eggleton has called for a national conference on homelessness. There has been no decent response from the government. Indeed, the initiatives being taken by Mayor Eggleton are ones that should be taken by this minister and the government.

Some 20 per cent of the children of the country live in poverty. The root cause of poverty is homelessness. I ask you, Madam Speaker: what kind of a government would talk about co-operation with the private sector and non-profit organizations and yet would continue, time after time, to withdraw the funds that previous government have made available?

Leadership is more than a question of simple rhetoric and inane announcements. Leadership is action. We have seen none of it. When is the government going to begin to put money into subsidized housing, non-profit housing, and co-operative housing? When is the government going to face up to its responsibilities?

When are the government and this minister going to stop crowing about the fact that it has contributed $340 million back into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, while hundreds of thousands of Canadians are homeless? There are 250,000 homeless Canadians, 80,000 homeless children in the country, and the only major announcement the government can make is that in the last five years it has given back $340 million of the money that ought to have been allocated to housing to the Consolidated Revenue Fund to make corporate grants. This is simply unacceptable.

Homelessness is the root cause of poverty. We all know that. The government has an opportunity to take a leadership role. We see an interim ministry in a caretaker government, and it is really more in sorrow than in anger that I stand here. I applaud this announcement by the minister. It is unfortunately the crumbs of an overfilled table. Canadian people have the right to expect more.

• (1540)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have been in the House now for about 18 months, the same length of time the hon. minister has been Minister of State for Housing. I have watched a crisis in affordable housing develop into a chronic problem that now affects at least 30 per cent to 40 per cent of Canadians who are living poverty. They are either being driven into poverty by the high cost of housing, or because of poverty they are unable to afford adequate housing.

This was a recycled announcement. All three of these announcements have been made by the minister before. In this time of environmental consciousness it is nice to recycle things, but I really think that the Canadian public and those in difficulty in housing need more than simply recycled press announcements.

All of those announcements are totally hollow. The government has not announced anything that any other large developer in this country would be forced to do. In Toronto, they would be forced by provincial legislation to provide 25 per cent affordable housing, which is what they are going to provide. Their definition of affordable housing is $175,000 a unit. That is not affordable to the vast majority of Canadians.

In Vancouver it is the same thing. They are going to sell off part of their land in order to redevelop, increasing the density. They must get the permission of the residents, the neighbourhood and city council, the same as any other developer would have to do in Vancouver. They are doing nothing more than what is having to be done by Li Ka-shing on the Expo lands.

Yes, the minister has confirmed that the government thinks like a corporation. We are going to get a return on investment. The government is going to make a profit on trying to provide housing to people. They have not in any way committed any government money to alleviating the problem of affordability.

When I was told this morning that the minister was going to make an announcement, I sat down and made a little list of things I thought he was going to announce that I could stand up in this House and congratulate him on.

First, I thought he was going to make some announcement on dealing with the high interest rate that is killing the housing industry. There was nothing there.

Then I thought he was going to announce a restoration of moneys cut back from social housing. There was nothing there.

Then I thought, for goodness sake, at least he is going to announce that they are going to restore the 5,000 units a year committed in 1985 to co-operative housing. There was nothing there.

Then I thought he was going to announce the restoration of the RRAP, but there was nothing there.

I thought he was going to guarantee that the urban native housing program was going to build at least 1,000 units this year. There was nothing there.

Then I thought maybe he was going to announce his pet, that they were going to bring in a speculator's tax. There was nothing there. The government now says it cannot do it, but I can show it how. The same way as the government developed the clawback on senior's pensions, it can develop a clawback for developers and land flippers.

I thought certainly he must be going to announce that the government was going to provide money to municipal governments for infrastructure of sewers, roads, and sidewalks in order to allow for development, but nothing there.

Then I thought at least he was going to say the government is going to deal, not with the people who have housing that is inadequate or unaffordable but with the homeless. In fact there was nothing there.

I sit and wonder why there was a minister's statement. In his statement he says that one of the significances of these two initiatives lies not only in the number of dwelling units involved but in the example that they provide for others.

The example the government has provided since this member has been minister has been retreat and abandonment of its obligation to ensure housing for Canadians.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF THE CANADIAN BRANCH OF THE COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Erie and the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association of the official parliamentary delegation which represented Canada at the Caribbean Parliamentary Seminar in Barbados and Dominica from February 23 to March 5, 1990.

BILL C-57

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-57, an act to provide for the protection of integrated circuit topographies and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, with amendments.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-295, an act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, on June 25, 1986, the then Minister of Justice, the hon. member for St. John's West, announced a series of amendments to the Criminal Code setting out new procedures for dealing with mentally disordered persons. To date nothing has been done.

This bill is merely the draft legislation then put forward by the Minister of Justice. I am proposing it to the House as a private member's bill today so that discussion can go forward in the House and across the country and, perhaps, by putting this item on the Order Paper we will be able to get the government to act more speedily in this important matter.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, REGIONAL AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the three parties and I believe that you will find unanimous consent for the following two motions. I will put them one at a time. I move:

That the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development be authorized to travel to Halifax, St. John's, Charlottetown and Moncton from April 29 to May 4, 1990; and to Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Calgary, Vancouver and Yellowknife from May 27 to June 2, 1990, in relation to its study of a science and technology strategy, and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the House give consent for the Parliamentary Secretary to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, we have also had discussions on this motion and you should find unanimous consent for it as well. I move:

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade be authorized to travel to Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, East Berlin, West Berlin and Bonn for the period April 19 to May 7, 1990, for the purpose of continuing its examination of Canada's changing role in east–west relations; and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

• (1550)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

CONCURRENCE IN ELEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I believe there is disposition in the House that when I move the following motion, it will be carried without debate:

That the eleventh report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, tabled March 19, 1990, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier rises on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Because I had to leave the House for a few moments, Madam Speaker, I was not here during the Daily Routine of Business when the time came for committee reports. If the House agreed to revert to that item of our proceedings, perhaps I could table a report of a committee chaired by the Hon. Member for Beauséjour on Bill C-53?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the House consent to revert to the presentation of committee reports?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

WOMEN'S CENTRES

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition on behalf of the Ère des centres de femmes du Québec and of the Regroupement provincial des maisons d'hébergement et de transition pour femmes victimes de violence conjugale who, with the help of other groups, have collected 3929 signatures on this petition. Those people humbly call upon the Parliament to reinstate the level of financing for the Equal Opportunities for Women Program, indexing the amount to the cost of living, and to maintain the support funds for women's groups.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise to present petitions in the House on behalf of my constituents of the Western Arctic.

One of these petitions is on the effect that the goods and services tax will have on skating. The petitioners consider instruction in skating to be an educational service and, therefore, ask the government to exempt skating educational expenses from the proposed goods and services tax.

This petition is from the community of Fort Simpson in the Northwest Territories.

I have a number of other petitions in which the petitioners say that they feel that the goods and services tax will have an onerous burden on the cost of transportation. It will result in a cascading tax because there is already a fuel tax and a transportation tax of 10 per cent.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions so I will not go into each one of them individually.

The first one contains the signatures of 177 people who are calling on Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment, guarantee VIA sufficiency, and support and carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, the second petition contains a further 606 names of people who, even though third reading of the bill on the goods and services tax is passed, are still indicating their disagreement with it.

They are asking the government to cease with the proposal that shifts the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax rather than introducing real tax reform.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, the third petition is of interest to many people across Canada. The petitioners are asking Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Inuit of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing the use of their lands for NATO and NORAD attack training and for low-level flight training in Canada.

They ask that Canada redirect NATO-NORAD funding towards enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am tabling today a petition from Chibougamau, in the riding of Roberval and one from Lebel-sur-Quévillon, in the riding of Abitibi, in the province of Quebec, concerning the recommendations of the Tax Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

These communities are without question in an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners consider the Brunelle recommendation to be discriminatory, unfair and inefficient with regard to the purpose of the Northern tax benefit system. It does not encourage settlement in the North and offers no incentive to develop northern resources.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present several petitions containing the names of 300 or 400 people opposing the goods and services tax from communities across the Algoma riding, including the city of Sault Ste. Marie, the town of Bruce Mines, Elliot Lake, Blind River, Espanola, McKerrow, and Massey. There are signatures from several communities on Manitoulin Island as well: Mindemoya, Kagawong, Tehkummah, West Bay, Gore Bay and several other communities.

The petitioners point out that the goods and services tax will have an adverse impact on the regions of the country, that it comes on top of some 31 new taxes already imposed on the Canadian people and that it will have an adverse impact on low income families, on tourism and on small business.

[Translation]

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by residents of Black Lake, Thetford, Saint-Jean-de-Brébeuf, Kitchener and several other communities, who humbly pray that Parliament reject the tax on goods and services which is entirely unfair and disregards people's ability to pay.

[English]

Also, Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a further petition opposing the goods and services tax from a number of residents of British Columbia who are totally opposed to this goods and services tax because it certainly has no conscience or regard for ability to pay.

The petitioners humbly beseech Parliament to reject this whole tax idea.

CANADA POST

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I have a petition with 272 signatures from the good people of Loggieville in Miramichi, who are asking Parliament to cease and desist the action of Canada Post in closing rural post offices, thus making the citizens of those communities second class citizens in their own land. This idiocy of Canada Post must stop.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. One is from a number of grain farmers in Saskatchewan who are very concerned with the work that the government is doing on orderly marketing and the dismantling of the Canadian Wheat Board.

They call upon the government to reinstate oats under the Canadian Wheat Board and to give it the same status that barley and wheat now have under the wheat board.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I have another petition with about 1,000 names from my constituency, which is a small representation of the number of petitions I have received concerning the goods and services tax.

The petitioners are very concerned and upset that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system that currently is in place in this country which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing lower and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

They call upon the government to immediately implement a fair taxation system in this country.

• (1600)

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour of tabling a number of petitions signed by Canadians across this country.

[English]

These citizens are against the goods and services tax because they believe that if it is implemented it would create economic disruption, increase taxes on average families, introduce an unprecedented level of complexity in the tax system, and impose further hardship on low-income Canadians.

[Translation]

They ask us to reject this new tax.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, it is said "It ain't over 'til the fat lady sings" and without further reference to the other place I would like to present today under Standing Order 36 a number of petitions signed by a total of 3,341 Edmontonians who continue to call on the government to junk the GST.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and the privilege of tabling 63 additional petitions bearing 1,837 signatures of citizens throughout the province of Quebec. Your petitioners humbly pray Parliament that the government reject the new goods and services tax which will create incredible hardship for people on low and modest incomes.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege of presenting a number of petitions. The first group has been signed by hundreds of Canadians from one end of the country to the other. They are still angry and upset by the decision to reduce VIA Rail services by half and they call upon the government to guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger services by upgrading the equipment and putting the system back in place.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): The second group of petitions, Madam Speaker, is signed by 389 residents primarily in the riding of Thunder Bay—Atikokan. They all object to the still-proposed goods and services tax which has yet to go through the other place. I just want to thank the United Steel Workers of America, Gary's Esso Service, Consolidated Press, Dr. Vtipil, Venice Grill, Len's RV Sales, and Old Dutch Foods for their help in collecting these petitions.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions signed by many Canadians from Hamilton and Windsor, Ontario, but most particularly from the metropolitan area of Halifax, including the ridings of Halifax and Halifax West. By these petitions with over 3,000 names these people pray to Parliament that the imposition of the goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians, and particularly to those Canadians in Atlantic Canada.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 36 to present petitions today. The first petition I have is a petition that has been circulated by small business people in my constituency. They ask that this government get rid of the goods and services tax. They say that it forces small business to carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden, and they pray that this government will reject the goods and services tax, consult with business, labour and consumer groups, and reach a consensus on reform of the tax system before implementing the GST. That is signed by over 30 small business operators in New Westminster—Burnaby.

My second petition, Madam Speaker, is a petition that is signed by Canadians in the lower mainland area of Vancouver, British Columbia, and they are also asking for the goods and services tax to be rejected. They say that it lacks regard for a taxpayer's ability to pay and they ask this government to reject it and to reform the tax system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): My third petition, Madam Speaker, is one that has been circulated by the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu of Labrador. They oppose the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training and demand that the Canadian government end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada. They also oppose the establishment of NATO operations in Canada and, in particular, the proposed training centre at Goose Bay, Labrador. This is a petition signed by almost 100 Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I have the honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon. It concerns the government's decision to eliminate many of VIA Rail's existing routes and thousands of jobs across this country.

The petitioners from Thunder Bay note that Canada deserves a high quality passenger rail service, including modernized equipment throughout the network, and a rapid rail service for the corridor, that rail passenger service is the safest and most environmentally friendly mode of travel, that annual subsidies from the Government of Canada are not disproportionate to subsidies for other modes of transport, that many rural communities rely exclusively on rail passenger service, and that the tourism industry relies on rail transportation services. These petitioners pray that Parliament will restore rail passenger service to its full integrity throughout this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36. I have the honour and privilege to present two groups of petitions, one from the town of Paris, Ontario, in my constituency, which was collected by the staff, customers, and operators of the Happy Time Video store in Paris, Ontario.

This petition severely criticizes the government for the GST and calls upon this House to force the government to withdraw the GST as it is a regressive form of taxation, and put in its place a more progressive income tax regime.

The other group of petitions contains names of citizens from all over Ontario, mainly southwestern Ontario, who also beseech the House of Commons to force the government to withdraw the GST in favour of a more equitable tax system.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, like so many of my colleagues before me, I have the pleasure and duty of presenting several petitions from citizens who are opposed to the goods and services tax. These petitions bear the signatures of hundreds of Manitobans, including many who reside in my constituency of Winnipeg—St. James. These petitions cite the usual criticisms of the GST, including its regressivity and the fact that it will be a burden on millions and millions of Canadian taxpayers. While I recognize that the GST passed third reading in this House just yesterday, I think that millions of Canadians will never say die with respect to the GST. To quote that famous Yankee: "It's not over until it's over".

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition, signed by about 300 people from different parts of Canada—Manitoba, Alberta, British Columbia, and Saskatchewan—who support Canada's aboriginal people in the traditional use of their lands and seek new Canadian initiatives for peace through common security and disarmament rather than NATO-NORAD preparation for low-level, deep-strike attacks.

Therefore, they demand that the Canadian government end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada. They especially oppose the establishment of NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed tactical fighter and weapons training centre at Goose Bay, Labrador.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I have a second petition signed by several hundred residents of my constituency in northern Saskatchewan. These people are very much aware that the goods and services tax will fall even more heavily on northern residents than on Canadians in other parts of the country due to their higher cost of living. Therefore, they call on the government to withdraw that tax and to introduce a fair taxation system based on ability to pay.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I have a third petition, also from residents of northern Saskatchewan. These people are calling on the government to reject the proposals of the task force on northern benefits which would take away the tax benefits from approximately 150 communities in Saskatchewan. They call on the government to introduce a tax benefit system that recognizes the higher cost of living in northern Saskatchewan and to implement a tax system which will recognize those costs and to implement that immediately.

• (1610)

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to present from my riding another petition which refers to the proposed goods and services tax. Had it not been for the procedures of the House, I would have had the opportunity to present these petitions sooner.

The people who are represented in these petitions from all parts of my riding ask that the government withdraw this tax. They believe, in the words of an octogenarian from my riding, that it will have a very bad effect on our economy, lead to a recession, and will be the straw that breaks the camel's back for many of the consumers in my riding.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from over 2,000 people, primarily from Victoria, on the subject of the GST.

The petition urges Parliament to reject the GST. The message, while too late for the House of Commons on this round, is still a viable issue for the other House of Parliament. I present these petitions to the House in the hope that the government will finally listen.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty on behalf of the citizens of Canada to present a number of petitions on the goods and services tax.

They point out that the goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because it lacks regard for the taxpayers' ability to pay. They call upon Parliament to reject the current proposals and to put in place tax reform which is valid for all people of Canada.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of residents of my constituency, Kamloops, Clearwater, Barrier, Logan Lake, Chase, Savona, and a number of other communities as well.

They also point out their concerns regarding the proposed goods and services tax and presumably are now asking Parliament to oppose this tax once it comes back from the Upper House.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, my second petition refers to the number of children living in poverty in Canada. The petitioners point out that the number of these children is actually increasing and call upon the government of Canada to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT OF THE PROPOSED GOLD MINE IN SHOAL LAKE

Question No. 237—Mr. Harvard:

Does the government intend to take any action in the environmental assessment of the proposed gold mine in Shoal Lake and, if so, what action?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Yes, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is applying the Environmental Assessment and Review Process to the proposal. In addition, if there is a requirement for an approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the Department of Transport will also apply the process.

Ontario has designated the project under its Environmental Assessment Act. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans and Environment Canada are both providing input to the provincial process. Moreover, Environment Canada officials will participate actively in Ontario's public hearing process and will also ensure that the project meets the requirements of the federal Metal Mining Liquid Effluent Regulations.

HERITAGE CLUB

Question No. 249—Mr. Keyes:

Is the government aware of a retirement group inside Canada Post known as the Heritage Club and, if so (a) what is the ratio between members of the club who are management retirees and those who were regular employees of Canada Post (b) is there a board of directors of the club and, if so, are they paid and, if so, by whom (c) who pays the cost of club events?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): (a) Actually, there is 21,428 members to the Heritage Club. The breakdown is as follows:

Active members (25 years or more of service) 1,466

Retirees 19,962

At this time, it is not possible to determine the proportion of members who are management or other.

(b) Heritage Club does not have a Board of Directors. However, there is an Executive Committee of 4 unpaid members.

c) Canada Post Corporation pays for periodical ceremonies designed to recognize employees and/or retirees with long service records.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-51, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I wish to inform the House that because of ministerial statements Government Orders will be extended by 15 minutes.

Is there debate?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House is ready for the question. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, may I say to all staff of the House of Commons, the pages, the table officers, the Speaker's office, the members of the House, a very good Easter, and may we call it 6.15 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): May I extend my own best wishes to everyone and to our public. Maybe all of us will hope that it is the Wednesday before Easter more often.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I just want to join with my colleagues and say that we have gone through some tough days and we look forward to a more pleasant House when we return.

May I use this occasion before we recess to say that some days ago I was accused of making some disparaging remarks about the Speaker. I did make those remarks. I apologize.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do thank the hon. member for Kamloops. It is very much appreciated and I realize that sometimes things are said in a moment of debate. His gesture today is very much appreciated.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

FUNDING

The House resumed from Monday, April 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Keyes:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reinstating funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased today to have the opportunity to speak in favour of the motion of my hon. colleague from Hamilton West urging the government to reinstate funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

As the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is located in Hamilton, the concern of my colleague from Hamilton West is obvious and well-founded. The fact that this motion was selected by the Standing Committee on Private Members' Business as a votable motion suggests that my colleague's concern is shared by many other members of this House.

The issue is the government's decision to withdraw funding from the centre. Established in 1978 by an act of Parliament, the centre has evolved into an internationally recognized institution.

In 1986–87, the government began cost recovery measures. Cabinet decided that the centre should be self-sufficient by the beginning of fiscal year 1991–92. The centre has been increasing its revenues through user-fees, and the government has been withdrawing its funding.

The centre has been operating on a budget of about $10 million a year.

This year the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety will try to recover $5.3 million of its operating costs through service fees and sales of its products.

The mandate of the centre is to promote the fundamental right of Canadians to a healthy and safe working environment.

A tripartite organization, the centre's governing council, consists of a chairman and governors representing governments—federal, provincial, territorial—employers and labour.

The centre is the national information resource in occupational health and safety. It responds to inquiries. It provides a cross-Canada electronic service; and it produces and distributes publications.

Its clients are labour, management, government, health and safety organizations, media, educational institutions and professionals.

It collaborates with Canadian and foreign organizations in developing its data base collection. The centre's INFO disc was selected by the World Health Organization and the International Development Research Centre as the information vehicle for an international poison control project.

The World Health Organization has requested copies of the centre's publications to assist a series of discussions aimed at international terminology standardization. The Occupational Health and Safety Information Agency of the International Labour Office wants to distribute the centre's information throughout the developing world.

• (1310)

The centre's objectives are to provide Canadians with information about occupational health and safety which is trustworthy, comprehensive and intelligible, to facilitate responsible decision-making, promote change in the workplace, increase awareness of the need for a healthy and safe working environment and support education and training. These objectives are cited in the government's own Main Estimates for this year.

The concern of many is that these objectives are being compromised by the government's decision to eliminate funding to the centre and to have the centre become self-sufficient.

The centre's mandate is now a commercial one. This is confirmed in the centre's business plan which covers the five-year period from April, 1990 to April, 1995. The plan was developed to respond to the decision of the Minister of Labour that the government will substantially reduce and ultimately discontinue its funding of the centre.

This plan calls for price increases on most existing products and services. It is the centre's plan for financial self-sufficiency.

The key service provided by the centre is a free access service for workers and other individuals. This, apparently, for the moment, will not be subject to a user fee. But what guarantees are there that this will not happen at some point in the future?

One of the strategies outlined in the business plan clearly states that the sale of products rather than the delivery of services will be favoured because the profit potential is greater. The great concern is that profits will be displacing the ability and right of workers and small employers to important information.

The centre's new commercial mandate affects the centre's credibility. Contributors which provide information free of charge to the centre for dissemination are concerned that user fees are going to be applied.

The application of user fees violates universal access to health and safety information. These fees are regressive. People who can afford to pay for the information will get it. Those who cannot afford to pay will not get access to vital information.

Surely safe and healthy workplaces are fundamental rights of Canadian workers. The government should be protecting this right, not diminishing it.

The great danger is that vital and necessary information becomes privileged and access also becomes privileged.

The move by the government endangers the future of the centre. It is wrong. I urge the government to reinstate its funding to the centre, as recommended in the motion of my hon. colleague from Hamilton West. Let us not punish success by withdrawing support.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion presented by the hon. member for Hamilton West, which asks the government to reconsider its decision on cutbacks at the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

My constituents may find it somewhat surprising to see me addressing this subject, Madam Speaker.

Nevertheless, I think it is important for those watching us, as it is for my constituents, to realize that our role here in Ottawa is not only to defend the interests of our constituency but to take an interest in all national issues. The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is certainly one of the most important Canadian institutions that is engaged in promoting and providing the kind of information that is so vital to the labour world.

This is our fourth day of debate on this motion. I think we should recall that the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was established some 12 years ago, and that every year, as the previous speaker mentioned, this organization has received, mostly from the federal government, the sum of $10 million to meet its objectives and inform Canadians. Recently, however, in accordance with our policy to put our financial house in order, the government of which I am a member decided to ask all Crown corporations to do their share, so that the clean-up of our public finance strategy will be shared by all agencies receiving funding from the Crown. That is why, I repeat, this government has, I would say almost reluctantly, asked the centre to do what all other agencies are doing to help put our financial house in order.

This morning, Madam Speaker, I was reading Hansard for the three days we debated this issue. I read all this with great interest, but I must admit that before this morning, I was not familiar with the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, and I must say the range of the centre's activities was a revelation. Thanks to the speeches by previous speakers, including members of the opposition, I was able to acquire a good understanding of the indispensable role played by this national institution. Our opposition friends all agree that we should cut spending. We have a considerable debt, and we are told that we should cut into the bureaucracy. However, every time we mention one area where we are asking people to improve spending controls, the opposition's attitude, and I think this is rather depressing, is always the same: They say we are not cutting the right things. They say we should not cut spending. However, if we listened to them, we would never do anything at all.

Mr. Côté: Let's cut the opposition!

Mr. DeBlois: I certainly wouldn't mind cutting the opposition as the hon. member just suggested, but after all, under our democratic system we have to accept the fact of our hon. friends opposite—is it partisanship or petty politics? Who knows! However, I can tell you that we have the guts, and I say this without hesitation, I think we have the guts to try, and even to succeed. I think we shall succeed in putting our financial house in order. What are we asking the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety to do? Just this: Try and upgrade your cost recovery policy. It is entirely normal that an agency funded by the government, by your taxes and mine, in which employers and the unions participate jointly with the federal government, that that agency recover its costs when it provides information to people who want that information. In any case, the centre is not the only agency that works on a cost recovery, fee-for-service basis. I don't think this measure is intended to kill an agency that has provided excellent service. Its purpose is simply to get everyone more involved, starting with the unions, the employers and those who receive these services.

Madam Speaker, we are almost caught in a vicious circle. They tell us: Put your financial house in order. Because of the deficit we are cutting back on funding for the centre, and if we do not apply this strategy, our social programs will be at risk. In my riding, there are senior citizens who disagree with me and say: You are cutting some of the things we get, like the old age pension clawback for people with gross incomes around $70,000, or a net income of $50,000. However, I tell my senior citizens: Listen! You are lucky. Who knows whether in 15 or 20 years, when a Liberal government from which the Lord preserve us is in power again, we will still be able to afford old age pensions? I am not sure, Madam Speaker, even though I am old enough. I am not sure than when I am 65, I will be able to collect my old age pension, not because I will be one of the fortunate whose gross income is over $50,000 or $70,000, but if we do not put our financial house in order, if we do not make some unpleasant cuts—I am always struck by the fact that everyone agrees with cuts, but no one wants cuts in areas that affect them.

It is the same with the GST. We had a lot of organizations come here to tell us, regarding our proposed goods and services tax, that they agreed with changing the federal tax. They said, "The present tax is inefficient and full of loopholes. We agree with your plan, but exempt us. Don't touch us!" In other words, they agree with restoring the government's finances and making cuts, but they say, "Please don't make cuts that affect us!"

I understand why the hon. member for Hamilton West defends the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, which is probably in his riding. I would do so the same thing if I were in his place. If this centre were in the beautiful riding of Montmorency—Orléans, I would certainly be hurt. I think that he is defending it well and skilfully.

That said, I think that beyond our own riding, we must see the national interest. The national interest now requires all organizations receiving federal funds to make an effort. No federal agency, no organization that depends on the federal government, should be spared from this collective effort which applies to everything under federal jurisdiction.

Madam Speaker, I do not want to dwell on it. I think we are talking calmly and dispassionately and saying, "Can this very important organization in Canadian life not—" and I think people understand. From what I have read, people who deal with the CCOSH are not surprised that they have to pay part of the costs related to the documentation and information they receive.

For all these reasons, I do not think it is necessary to ask the government to reconsider its policy of requiring this agency to cover more of its costs. Therefore, I must unfortunately vote against the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton West and support the government in its decision to require more financial responsibility of the directors of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I feel privileged to have the opportunity to speak on this Private Member's motion presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West.

I want to start by addressing the hon. member opposite, the member for Montmorency—Orléans. In his speech he asked the question: "Are we doing this for partisan reasons?" I want to tell him straight off that this is not an issue with which we can afford to play partisan politics.

This centre for occupational health and safety has been useful not only to the constituents of the hon. member for Hamilton West, but it has probably been used by constituents of every member of the House.

Before I came to speak on this private members' motion today, I reviewed the annual report of the centre. There are, perhaps, a lot of Canadians out there who do not know what the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety does. It is a centre which provides Canadians with information about occupational health and safety which is trustworthy and comprehensive. It is there to facilitate responsible decision making, to promote change in the work place, to increase awareness of the need for a healthy and safe-working environment, and to support education and training.

The hon. member mentioned in his speech that the centre has been open for 10 years. During that period it has developed a trust, not only nationally but internationally. It has been putting out publications and providing tips to various publications. Every year the centre has been touching close to four million Canadians who work in the workplace.

The centre has developed relations with Agriculture Canada to provide regulatory information about pesticide products, as well as with the Australian Centre for Health and Safety, the Canadian Hospital Association, Environment Canada and universities across Canada.

This institution was built over a period of many years and is a corner-stone for business and labour in our country. The motion comes from the hon. member for Hamilton West and one may think that, because it is a private members' motion, it involves just his riding. That is not so. It is a national service as well as an international service.

As the hon. member opposite stated in his speech, I realize that we do have a deficit and a debt problem in this country. He should never think that we on this side of the House ignore that.

When looking at making cuts in the national government, it becomes a game of options and priorities. It seems to me that one of the priorities of the government, alongside fiscal responsibility, is a deep and passionate commitment to matters environmental.

I read last week the Minister of the Environment's framework for discussion on the environment, the Green Plan.

Mr. Gardiner: It probably didn't take you long.

Mr. Mills: It took me a fair bit of time to read it.

I, for one, think that the Minister of the Environment is deeply committed to this issue. I found him to be sincere in trying to get his head around how we can get people involved in an activist way with the environmental issue. It is not an easy job.

My own experience in my own riding has been that there are a lot of people who talk about getting involved in the environmental movement but, generally speaking, it is mostly the children in the country who get involved. It is tougher to get parents and adults motivated.

I concede that he has a tough job. But in his objective paper, the Minister of the Environment stated: "To reach this objective we believe that the Government of Canada must lead by example. We believe that a healthy environment and a strong economy must be recognized as being mutually dependent."

The minister talked about his impatience to act and how we have to make up for decades of environmental oversight. This is all pretty good as far as I am concerned. He stated further that the Government of Canada plans to upgrade its ability to provide more timely and effective warnings of natural hazards such as blizzards, tornadoes and marine storms, and hazards that are themselves linked to pollution emergencies. He talked about improved techniques for understanding and detecting these hazards, bettercommunications, enhanced public education, as well as matters related to health.

The Minister of the Environment has received a lot of criticism in the last few days about his discussion paper. But I think that tactically he is doing the right thing. He has put a document out there which is causing people to react. He said that by September he would come up with a specific action plan.

• (1330)

With this request to restore funding to the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety we are asking this government to be consistent with its priority commitment to the environment because if this centre is in any way jeopardized or fractured, it is going against this action plan presented by the Minister of the Environment.

This is the problem that Canadians have right now. There is a lot of confusion out there and it hinges on the issue of trust. On one hand the government talks about its commitment to the environment. On the other hand you see cuts—although not large, an amount of money we could find from within the system—to an institution that has been on the leading edge of providing guidelines and regulations for the workplace and preparing it as an environment that is safe and without hazard.

In order to maintain consistency on its priority issue the government should not be looking at an institution that has basically been an environmental institution since 1978. It has been on the leading edge. I commend my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton—West, for taking the initiative on this. In government there are hundreds of Crown corporations and services which, because they do not have a high profile in terms of service, do not get on that priority sheet, and this will be another such agency. It is an automatic cut. In other words, the Minister of Finance will say: "I want all Crown corporations to be cut by 15 to 20 per cent", and there will be no sensitivity to some of the smaller agencies of government.

The Minister of the Environment, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance should get together and realize that this is an institution that provides national service. Every one of us in this House have people in our ridings seeking advice on how to create a more healthy and safe workplace. I think that if they understood this they would reconsider their position.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, it is a particular pleasure for me, as a representative from Hamilton, to be addressing this House on one of my city's worthiest institutions. We in the greater Hamilton-Wentworth area are not the only proud beneficiaries of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. All of Ontario and indeed all of Canada should treasure this project.

We all agree today that we face enormous challenges in the area of occupational health and safety in Canada. Fortunately we are now equipped with a vital information centre on occupational health and safety. This was envisaged 12 years go by labour, business and governments in order to meet the future challenges which are now upon us.

In the past decade the number of occupational accidents and illnesses in Canada has continued to be a major concern to employers, workers and government. During this 10 year period we have seen an increasing willingness and capacity on the part of organizations, employers, workers, government and everyone else to co-operate in efforts to reduce these losses.

We are talking about losses in terms of human suffering and economic losses as well. We must increase our efforts. We must continue to work together to ensure a safe and healthy working environment for all Canadians. As recently as this past weekend we saw 140 nations involved in Earth and World Environment Day. We are greatly concerned about our environment and about its effects on the health of Canadians. Canadian workplaces are a vital part of this total environment, so we must be equally concerned with the effects of the workplace on the health and well-being of the workers.

Occupational safety and health in Canada is a pretty complex field. We are talking about a combination of economic, scientific and ethical issues. The field is further complicated by the fact that we are dealing with 13 governments—10 provinces, 2 territories and Ottawa, and they are all trying to do something.

The importance of this field in Canada and in other countries is becoming more and more recognized because of the impact of economic, social, technological and demographic trends on this area of activity as well as the impact of trends related to the working environment.

This involves the whole health field in general so we are talking about a very serious problem here.

The current economy in Canada does dictate a critical need to reduce government deficits and to improve productivity and efficiency. The need to compete internationally also highlights and adds impetus to greater productivity and efficiency. So all levels of government in Canada are finding it necessary to cut back on some of their social services and programs.

Employers are more acutely aware of their changing social responsibilities. Because of the current shortage of skilled workers in some geographic areas of this country, some corporations are increasing their chances to attract and retain the best employees by demonstrating attention to factors such as occupational health and safety.

The rising cost of the workers compensation programs, of health care in Canada and the need to improve the health status of Canadians are making us insist more and more on health promotion, disease prevention and accident prevention.

The impact that these trends are having on the field of occupational safety and health is also opening many opportunities for the CCOHS in performing its mandate. The rising awareness and understanding of health, occupational and general environmental issues is creating an increased demand for information on these subject areas. The business plan submitted clearly shows that the centre is conscious of these rising demands and that it can become financially self-sufficient. It can do this but, at the same time, it has to meet the mandate of serving Canadian workers in matters of occupational health and safety.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is ready to face these new challenges. In fact, it is because the centre could successfully meet challenges in the past that it is renowned, both throughout Canada and internationally. It is known for its reliable source of unbiased and highly professional information on occupational health and safety matters. The CCOHS has done an excellent job, a superb job in my view, in meeting its mandate, under the guidance and control of its three social partners—a demonstration that tripartism works.

The government is very much committed to all aspects of occupational health and safety in Canada and, specifically, to the work of this centre. This commitment has not and will not change. The government is confident that the CCOHS will meet this key challenge and become a self-sufficient organization while operating under the basic mandate of serving Canadian workers in matters of occupational health and safety.

In closing, I want to say that there is no question that the centre and its staff have proven their managerial excellence. As a Hamiltonian, I am proud to salute the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety and, like my distinguished colleague from Hamilton West, I am sure all other members in this House will do likewise.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, today we learned of a remarkably inept statement made by the Minister of Energy to the Canadian Coal Association; that Canada would have to ban cars in its major cities to meet national targets for cutting air pollution.

The minister is using scare tactics to justify inaction. The fact is that energy efficiency alone, as confirmed by experts, can meet or exceed the target of a 20 per cent reduction in carbon dioxide pollution by 2005, as proposed in Toronto at the Changing Atmosphere Conference.

The Minister of Energy shows an abysmal ignorance of the facts. In addition, energy efficiency makes good economic sense. We have a long way to go in Canada to become energy efficient. Therefore, the minister is failing to grasp a political opportunity which a seven year old would readily understand. What a pity!

RAILWAY TRANSPORT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, on March 30, Canada's National Transportation Agency published the report on its investigation of the inspection practices for Canadian National Railways tank cars in the Montreal-Sarnia corridor.

The investigation highlighted three main points. First, Transport Canada's safety standards are not enforced as they should be; second, the railway's operating procedures show that some of the standards are probably unnecessary, as a result of progress made; finally, in view of the two previous factors, new standards should be developed. Furthermore, it seems that staff cuts in the Sarnia yards are adding to the pressure on railway inspectors to do more in less time.

Madam Speaker, this is not the first time I have spoken about tank cars in this House and Transport Canada must impose strict penalties on railways that do not meet the safety requirements in effect for tank and freight cars.

FISHERIES

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, last week the Minister of Fisheries delivered a speech obviously written for him in the boardrooms of the corporate fishing giants.

It is clear that the minister has ignored the people of Canso, Grand Bank, Digby and hundreds of other communities who depend upon the fishery. It is clear he has ignored the findings of the Harris report, which identified as one of the major contributors to the collapse of the fish stocks the technology used by large offshore corporate fishing fleets.

One of the federal government's own advisory councils had this to say about the consequences of failing to aid the communities hit by the fishing crisis: "hundreds of Atlantic communities will lose their only industry. Thousands of families, left without adequate incomes will be forced to rely on welfare, or to uproot their lives for the dubious promise of mainland wealth."

On two occasions the Prime Minister has told Atlantic Canadians that there will be an assistance package for them. But last week the Minister of Fisheries told them that there would be an aid package only. If what the Minister of Fisheries has said is correct, what does that make the Prime Minister? If the minister is incorrect, his resignation should be demanded immediately.

What Atlantic Canadians want is a future in the fishery which has sustained their communities for hundreds of years. This government is more concerned about the balance sheets of their corporate friends than about the lifeblood of hundreds of communities and thousands of families.

EARTH DAY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, as all hon. members will know, yesterday was a great day in Canada, and in fact around the world, when we celebrated Earth Day.

There was a great rally on Parliament Hill. I know that all members and all levels of government are going to do their best to see that the earth is going to be cleaned up.

We are privileged today to have in the gallery the founder of Earth Day and the designer of the Earth Day flag, Mr. John McConnell of New York City. I am pleased to welcome him here.

S. O. 31

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, across Canada farmers are seeing ominous signs as to what the future holds for them under this government's international trade policy.

In 1989, they saw the GATT overturn import quotas for yogurt and ice cream, and the United States slap a 3.6 cents a pound duty on pork exports.

This year, Canadian dairy farmers have been confused and concerned by the refusal of the federal government to increase the price of industrial milk on February 1, causing their levels of income to fall even further behind their costs of production. In Nova Scotia, milk producers have been further troubled by the drop in the value of their 1990 quota as compared to 1989, showing uncertainty in an area of agriculture that should be stable and healthy.

Canadian farmers are growing worried that the government is not acting forcefully in international negotiations to protect their interests. Increasingly they fear that these developments foreshadow a general erosion of the supply management systems on which they depend for a profit. I call on the government to take the kind of action that will reassure and protect the thousands of farmers who feel that they are being forgotten at the international bargaining table.

MUSEUMS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, the National Geographic Society has billed a recent fossil find near Parrsboro, Nova Scotia, as the biggest fossil find in North America. The discovery included over 100,000 pieces of fossil bones, as well as a 300 million year old fossilized insect, possibly the oldest ever found.

The people of the Parrsboro area have put together a plan for a museum and research centre which involves funding from the private sector, the province, the municipality and the federal government. The proposal would not only provide a museum to display the fossils, but will also be a research facility to eliminate further shipment of these valuable fossils to the United States.

I strongly urge members of the Treasury Board to approve the application of the Department of Communications for funding when the proposal for this museum comes before it. The museum will save the fossils and provide much-needed work in this area of high unemployment.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, this is National Volunteer Week, a week devoted to recognizing the varied and invaluable contribution of volunteers across Canada.

Volunteers are the backbone of many of our country's non-profit organizations. Religious organizations, sports and recreational activities, education, youth development and health account for fully 57 per cent of Canada's volunteer experience. Our society is greatly enriched by the generous participation of these volunteers in hospitals, seniors' homes, boy scouts and girl guides, or wherever their zeal may take them.

We in the Liberal opposition hope that volunteers will not be deterred in their work by the imposition of a 7 per cent tax on their contributed out-of-pocket expenses as proposed by the mean-spirited government opposite.

EARTH DAY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, as all members will know, yesterday marked the twentieth anniversary of the original Earth Day.

Thousands of Canadians from coast to coast joined millions of people around the world who participated in thousands of separate activities. Themes, such as reforestation, stop acid rain, energy conservation, recycling, reuse, responsible waste disposal, and water conservation were heard across my riding of Sarnia—Lambton as well as around the globe.

However, yesterday must be more than a celebration to be effectively the first day of a green future. What we need is a change in basic habits, not simply attitudes. For the remainder of the year, Canadians including those of Sarnia—Lambton have to recognize that just about everything we do can have an effect on our environment. Let us have Earth Day on our minds every day. We, as elected representatives, must lead by example. If enough of us made a commitment to choose to do the things that are better for the environment whenever possible, collectively we could make a difference.

Madam Speaker, on Earth Day 1991 I look forward to hearing about the progress which we have made through 1990. For my part, in 1990 and beyond I will be working actively toward being part of the solution.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, yesterday was the twentieth anniversary of Earth Day, and was probably the biggest celebration of the event in history. Canadians and people all over the world helped our environment by planting trees and making their contribution to fighting global warming and reforesting our over-harvested lands.

Everyone except this government is planting trees. Our own federal government has allowed tree planting agreements in B.C., Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario to expire and there is only lip service to our forests in the government's so-called Green Plan.

I call on this government to catch up to everybody else's interest in Earth Day and renew those tree-planting agreements today.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, this week is National Volunteer Week in Canada. This is an ideal time to pay tribute to the millions of volunteers throughout this land who have given their time to enrich the lives of others.

Thirteen million Canadians, roughly two-thirds of our adult population, devote their time and energy to one of Canada's many volunteer services.

Volunteers carry out a variety of tasks in our communities. In fact, Canadian society as we know it today could not function without volunteers. Through their time and commitment volunteers bring our communities together and build a spirit that is Canada.

On behalf of all Canadians I would like to salute volunteers from coast to coast during this national volunteer week in Canada for the important contributions they make to our Canadian way of life.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, Canadians wonder what on earth this government is doing to save the environment. After millions of us took part in Earth Day ceremonies yesterday, Canadians realize this government's action is only hot air and recycled promises mired in delay.

For example, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act was trumpeted as the toughest law in the western hemisphere, yet fewer than 3 per cent of companies were charged after being caught breaking the law. There is only one lonely inspector for all of Ontario and yet the Tories will hire 4,000 people for the GST. Clean-up of the Great Lakes gets a paltry $25 million this year while the GST gets $111 million, part of a $1.5 billion total.

The IJC says the health of our children is threatened by exposure to even low levels of toxic wastes in the Great Lakes and yet the minister of health says more study is needed. Canadians are demanding strong, tough national action that puts the environment first.

SOCIAL BENEFITS

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, people in my riding, as so many others in Canada, have a high unemployment rate. Special assistance and training are the best means for these people to get ahead and to create the lifestyle that they and every other person in Canada deserve. Five months ago the federal government sought through Bill C-21 to provide for better adjustment measures and more training and support and all in all, a fairer UI system.

This assistance which is needed and necessary cannot wait. I ask all members to do what they can to speed the passage of this bill through the other House.

PENITENTIARIES

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, on Friday a comprehensive study of the treatment of female offenders was released. The report of the Task Force on Federally Sentenced Women is the fourteenth report to recommend the closing of the Kingston Prison for Women.

Canada's prison system discriminates against women. Minimum and medium security prisoners are locked up in Kingston's outdated, inhumane maximum security facility.

I have been there and have seen the deplorable conditions. The prison cuts women off totally from the outside world. Some live literally thousands of kilometres from their families, making it all the more difficult for them to reintegrate into society.

Some of these women have small children. They are allowed only one 15-minute phone call per month to their kids. Inmate after inmate has committed suicide. The 1970 Royal Commission on the Status of Women also recommended the closure of this prison.

I urge the government to finally listen and to shut down the Kingston Penitentiary for Women.

TRADE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Madam Speaker, there was good news for all of Canada last week, resulting directly from our free trade agreement with the United States. On Thursday the president of Proctor and Gamble announced the company's plans for rationalizing its production to serve the entire North American market. As a result, 200 new jobs will be created in the company's plants at Hamilton, Belleville and Brockville in Ontario, and the once threatened jobs of 140 employees at Pointe Claire, Quebec, are now preserved. As well, $11 million will be spent on plant renovations and new equipment. Exports of these products to the United States will have an annual value of $53 million.

The president stated:

> This development can be attributed in large part to the new trade environment between Canada and the United States. Free trade has given the company a better environment in which to make long-term plans and we are confident in a free environment and we can do better.

Madam Speaker, this is very good news—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

PERLY BRIDGE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the Perley bridge between Hawkesbury, Ontario and Grenville, Quebec, clearly must be replaced. The bridge was built in 1931, and the subject was first raised 15 years ago when the then Minister of Public Works said that a new bridge should be built.

According to a report published in 1986 by the engineering firm McNeely and Boileau, the bridge was already obsolete and should be replaced within five years. So far, however, no agreement to that effect has been signed by the federal government and the province. Worse, Treasury Board has yet to allocate funding for holding the government hearings that are required before a new bridge is built.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Government of Canada to ensure that a federal-provincial agreement is signed very shortly on replacing the Perley bridge. I also want to take this opportunity to ask the President of the Treasury Board to at least allocate the necessary funding for the environmental assessment which is compulsory before the Perley bridge can be replaced.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Before the Minister of Finance introduced his budget last February, the Prime Minister said that interest rates would start going down after the budget was introduced. This has not happened. They have kept going up. In fact, last Thursday the Bank of Canada raised its rate to 13.77 per cent. This caused the banks and mortgage companies to increase greatly the rates for consumer loans, business loans and for mortgages.

Why has the minister allowed these rates to go up when he should know what a disastrous effect this is having on Canadian consumers, businesses and workers? Why is he allowing this to happen?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first let me point out that, as is normal, what the Leader of the Opposition said about the Prime Minister's statement is a distorted.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. members opposite say no. I suggest they read it, and read it carefully, and they will understand precisely what I have just said.

The question that the hon. member asked should be put in a somewhat different way. If we do not take these actions today, if we do not deal with the inflation problem today, and if we let the inflation problem get out of control, what will happen a year or two down the road when the problems will be far, far more serious than if we did follow that course? We will be looking at higher interest rates. We would be getting right back into the mess that the hon. member presided over when he was part of the government in 1981–82 when we had the worst recession since the 1930s.

An hon. member: You are creating it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That is what we are trying to avoid with the policies we are following today.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance should realize that it is his own tax increases—over 32 tax increases since this government took office—that have been creating the inflation he claims to be concerned about. If he is so concerned, why is he causing it through his own tax policies?

More specifically, does he not know that his high interest rates are helping to drive up the value of our Canadian dollar, something that is having a disastrous effect on export industries which are the corner-stone of the Canadian economy?

Some hon. members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I ask the minister again, why is he allowing our interest rates and the value of our dollar to be so high? Why are he and his government leading the country into a recession?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what we are trying to do now is to avoid leading ourselves into a recession by dealing with the inflation problem today.

I am sympathetic. I understand the concerns that people in the export business have about the level of the dollar. I understand that. I also say to them that if we ignore the problem, as did the government that he supported in the early 1980s and the late 1970s, the problem for the manufacturers and exporters in the country will be far more serious. That is precisely why we are following the policies we are following today. If we do that, we will go through a difficult period now. But the future will be far brighter than a future where we damage our competitive position on a permanent basis and in a far more serious way than has been the case by what we hope is a short-term higher level of interest rates than either my hon. friend or I would like to see. The problem is that we have to deal with this problem today.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Exporters' Association says that the minister's high dollar and high interest rate policies have already damaged severely the competitive position of Canadian exporters.

• (1420)

After the interest rates went up last week, Mr. James Taylor, President of the Canadian Exporters' Association said: "It's more bad news." If the minister was providing a message that was so acceptable and understandable by Canadian business, why would the Canadian Exporters' Association call his policies more bad news?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, last week's increase in interest rates penalized small business and all consumers and may drag the Canadian economy into a recession. Once again, I want to ask why the government insists on wanting to create a recession. When will the Minister of Finance put a stop to this policy and start reducing interest rates in order to avoid the disastrous impact the policy will have on our economy?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to what people like Mr. Taylor said about the current policies of the government. But if we ignore this problem today, the problem will get out of hand because inflation pressures are rising.

We had a 4 per cent inflation rate in 1988. We had a 5 per cent inflation rate in 1989. For the first part of this year, it has been in the 5.25 per cent or 5.5 per cent range. Unit labour costs rose at 6.3 per cent last year and, in the last quarter of 1989, at 6.9 per cent. So it is a problem that we have to deal with.

The hon. member is frowning in wondering about this high interest rate policy. I remind him that, when he and I sat together with Mr. Morton Shulman side by side, Mr. Shulman asked my colleague what would he do if interest rates continued to go up. Would he resign? The hon. member for Windsor West said: "Yes, I would resign." That was in early February of 1980.

What happened? Interest rates went to 20 per cent to 25 per cent. What did he do? He stayed right in his place in the House. He did not resign. He was just playing politics.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

I would like to ask the minister what initiative he has taken in light of the three CF–18 crashes in the last week?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and his tone.

We have suspended operational training in Canada until 900 hours on April 25. During that time, the Commander of Air Command, the Commander of Fighters, the Commanders of both Bagotville and CFB Cold Lake, and the squadron leaders will be meeting with regard to the process and recommendations that can be made to the minister to ensure the security and safety of the men and women who fly on behalf of Canada.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, there is a perception out there in the Canadian public that there is something terribly wrong either with the CF–18 or the manner in which it is flown.

I have a supplementary question for the hon. minister. Would the minister consider getting together a "tiger–team" of experts to gather up all the information that is available about the previous CF–18 crashes, putting it under a microscope, getting in the room with the microscope, and staying there until we come up with the answers as to precisely what the reasons are for these tragic losses and the remedial action that should be taken.

Also, would the hon. minister consider making this information available to the Canadian public to address their concerns in a timely manner, and keeping at least the training flights of the CF–18s grounded until this occurs?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the "tiger–team" my hon. colleague suggests would be a team that is made up of squadron leaders, base commanders, and those involved in instruction in CF–18 Air Command.

The process that will be undertaken over the next 48 hours will arrive at a conclusion. When that conclusion, based on the best of military advice, has been communicated to me, I will inform the House, the hon. member, and the Canadian public. The hon. member knows as I do that there is no one more concerned about the safety of the men and women who fly than the Commander of Air Command, the squadron leaders, and those men and women who serve with them.

Everything that can will be done to identify what may be a shortcoming in the realism that we use today which may have crossed the line of safety. The Air Command has instituted that type of study. There will be a report by the end of May and when we have concluded these reports I will communicate to the House and to the hon. member.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question as well is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Certainly my party wants to express our sadness and deepest sympathy to the families who have lost pilots in recent crashes in Canada.

I appreciated the minister's response to the previous question, but there are a number of outstanding questions about the computer systems, possible cutbacks to training, and the purchase. There are a number of questions about the whole issue of the CF-18s. Would the minister go beyond having an internal inquiry and have a full public inquiry on the CF-18s and their safety?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to address some of the outstanding questions.

There has been the allegation that there has been a reduction—some have suggested by 3 per cent—in the hours flown by CF-18 pilots. That is not accurate. What has been reduced is the number of pilots who are flying. Therefore, the reduction of 3 per cent does not affect fighter pilots and their ability to train.

I am not aware of the problems of the purchase that the hon. member has mentioned. There is a full review done by the standing committee whose responsibility this is over the lifetime of the purchase. This purchase was undertaken in 1979. The Hon. Allan McKinnon was the member responsible for the Department of National Defence when I first recall discussions on CF-18s. We have rectified some problems that were identified. We have communicated with McDonnell Douglas. We have suspended the shipment during the purchase time until some faults that had been identified were corrected.

Again, I say to the hon. member that there is no one more concerned about the safety of the men and women who fly on behalf of Canada than the Air Command, the Fighter Command leaders, and the squadron leaders.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. I am sure that the Minister himself is also concerned about safety and I would not in any way suggest that he is not, nor are the members of our Armed Forces.

But I am also told by my colleague that there has been no reference to the standing committee in six years to discuss the CF-18s. We know that there are double the number of fatalities and accidents in Canada with the CF-18s than there are in the U.S. with the same planes.

[Translation]

My question is for the Minister of National Defence. These fighter planes are dangerous; that is obvious. People have died, lives are in danger. Will the minister announce today that he will immediately cancel low-level tactical training flights of these planes until a public inquiry is held on the CF-18s and the accidents in which these fighters have been involved?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the moratorium is on operational training which will take place in Canada. That moratorium is for the next 48 hours until 0900 hours on April 25.

The hon. member suggests that there has been no scrutiny by the standing committee of the purchase of the CF-18s. The standing committee does the Estimates every year and has every opportunity to ask questions of the minister and the department. The standing committee is the master of its own destiny and can decide what it will do and when it will do it.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Defence. I would hope then, as the minister has outlined, that the standing committee will review the CF-18s and support a public inquiry.

There is another much larger issue. Canada continues to spend millions of dollars building such things as forward operating bases in the Northwest Territories, the need for which has disappeared as has the need for Cruise missile testing and low-level attack training.

Will the minister admit that now is the time for the government to open up to full public inquiry not just the question of the CF-18s but our full defence policy in Canada? We know the 1987 White Paper is outdated. Is it not time now for a public inquiry into the whole defence policy for Canada?

• (1430)

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, all members of the House recognize the geopolitical change that is taking place in the world and we all welcome it. Some of us may not be as confident as the hon. member that the instability that we see today, caused by these changes, can best be addressed by all of us carrying an umbrella and saying that peace has been declared.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, this morning in a public forum the former Secretary General of the Brundtland Commission said:

> When I hear we are world leaders on the environment, I cringe with embarrassment.

It is no wonder that tens of thousands of Canadians felt they had to demonstrate in defence of the earth yesterday. The government has acted only seven times to charge polluters under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act since it was passed.

When is the Prime Minister going to take change of a divided cabinet and set some national direction on the environment?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any divisions in the Liberal Party I cannot take responsibility for.

I can speak, however, for a strong, united cabinet and government behind a Minister of the Environment whose record was approved by Mrs. Brundtland.

My friend referred to the Secretary General of the Brundtland Commission. She should refer to the Chairman of the Brundtland Commission, the former Prime Minister of Norway, Mrs. Brundtland, who said that Canada's record in the environment was one of which all Canadians should be proud.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. He is obviously not aware that Madam Brundtland very recently said it was time for Canada to act instead of just talk.

The minister of energy says we have to wait for international action before we move on emissions reduction. The Minister of the Environment says the price of inaction is too high to wait. Now, which of these ministers speaks for the cabinet? Will the Prime Minister tell us which of these ministers is expressing the environmental policy of his government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to look at any quote that my hon. friend purports to have from Mrs. Brundtland. I may read an official statement by Mrs. Brundtland. When she was Prime Minister and chairman of the UN commission, she noted and I quote: "There is the leadership role that Canada plays in international affairs and, in particular, in the ongoing international work to achieve sustainable development—We did have a hard time on the commission and we were very fortunate to have the complete support and leadership of the Canadian Government".

I would also draw to my hon. friend's attention a statement by Foreign Minister Shevardnadze, last December, who said that "Canada, however, was one of the first to place questions of environmental protection on the international agenda and has achieved remarkable successes in this area".

All international leaders recognize that while our record is not perfect, it is one of which all Canadians should be proud, and I think all Canadians are, except certain people in the Liberal party.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries.

Last week, the minister made most insulting statements about Atlantic fishing communities to the effect that the workers and fishermen use fishing only to qualify for unemployment insurance.

Is the minister prepared today to take this opportunity to apologize to these communities and to withdraw these most offensive remarks?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that a Liberal rises in the House to express indignation when someone talks about unemployment insurance. Those people left the Atlantic region, like Newfoundland, with an unemployment rate of 23 per cent when they left power in 1984. Today we have got the rate down to around 18 per cent. It is still too high, we want to do more and we are disgusted with those who want to encourage the defeated politicians in the Senate to try to block a bill which would provide training for our Atlantic workers so they can earn a living like everyone else.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. A minister who, in addition to wanting to close down the fishing industry, insults the fishing community certainly no longer deserves their respect.

Will the Prime Minister apologize for the insulting remarks of the Minister of Fisheries—who has just repeated them, incidentally—and will he ask for the immediate resignation of that minister and appoint a new minister who will restore peace in the fishing sector instead of stirring up trouble?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to give the hon. member a copy of my Halifax statement to the people of the fishing industry.

He is trying to make the residents of the Atlantic provinces believe that the government wants to keep people on the unemployment insurance rolls. What I said in Halifax, and I do not apologize for my remarks, is that in the past and particularly under the previous administration the only option left to the people of the Atlantic provinces was to be unemployed.

Well, I know the people of the Atlantic provinces, Mr. Speaker, they are brave and they want to work.

Mr. Robichaud: You do not know them very well!

Mr. Valcourt: There he goes again, he thinks they are lazy. Mr. Speaker, members opposite seem to think that the residents of the Atlantic provinces should be quite satisfied with drawing unemployment benefits. What I said, as the royal commission of inquiry had stated in Newfoundland, is that our system has let down the people of Atlantic Canada and that we want to correct the situation but not on the backs of the fishermen!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Apparently in celebration of earth day, the Minister of Energy said that Canada would have to ban cars in major cities to meet national standards for cutting air pollution. The minister of energy has rejected Canada's international commitment to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases, a threat described by the Toronto conference as one greater than that of nuclear war, and rejected a report that found that every man, woman and child in Canada could save $5,000 in energy costs while reducing emissions of the greenhouse gas carbon dioxide.

Will the Minister of the Environment today, following Earth Day, take this opportunity to revoke and reject those dangerous and false points of view put out by his colleague and implement now those steps that the minister knows are cost-effective and available now to reduce greenhouse gas emissions in Canada?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I had the pleasure and the honour to attend the White House conference on the environment last week. The minister of energy and I were together when I made the commitment in front of the conference that Canada would include targets and schedules to reduce CO_2 emissions in The Green Plan next fall.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. I take it that he accepts the three statements that have been made publicly by his colleague which will not warm the hearts of the majority of Canadians.

During the celebration of Earth Day over the weekend, many British Columbians protested federal policies which allow our ports and coastal waters to be used by nuclear powered and nuclear armed vessels. Since the United States plans to use and access Back Island in Alaska, making use of Canadian waters, will the minister launch a full environmental impact assessment into the health and safety potential impacts of an accident from one of these vessels on Canadians, or does the minister view this as an issue less serious than that of oil tanker safety?

• (1440)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member frequently in this House has made statements designed to create alarm on the west coast and elsewhere about policies with respect to the United States.

There are discussions with the United States with regard to plans that they might have concerning transit of their vessels in our waters. We are monitoring those discussions. We are making sure that Canadian interests are taken fully account of, and we are certainly going to ensure that Canadian interests are protected, including Canada's interest in being part of an effective international defence alliance of which port visits are an important part.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. He seems to be under some confusion as to what he said in Halifax and I will tell him. I have got the transcript. He said: "They, fish plant workers and fishermen, will all work for 10 weeks and then sit down for 42 weeks". He said in Halifax: "All they got going for them is enough patience to qualify for UI". That is what he said. I want to tell him something else. In Rose Blanche as an example, 147 fishermen caught 4 million pounds, Prime Minister, in three months—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Simmons: As I was saying, they work for 12 months in Rose Blanche and elsewhere, not 10 weeks.

How does the minister square his silly statement with the facts? The only sin of those people is that they want to work year round, which they could do if his government had the guts to drive the French, the Spanish and the Portuguese out so they could catch the fish.

An hon. member: What was the question?

Mr. Simmons: How does he square the two?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it will give me great pleasure to give the hon. member a copy of my speech.

Mr. Simmons: I have it.

Mr. Valcourt: Well, I think you will need a good researcher. I have never said that.

Atlantic Canadians have been listening to these people in the last few weeks. What people in Atlantic Canada are telling us is that the fishery is an important part of our heritage and our economic life and people want to keep fishing. The fishermen and the plant workers should have the chance and should be given the ability to develop this trade as a skilful one by which they can earn a decent income.

In the past we have seen other branches of government at all levels, municipal, provincial and federal use the fishery as the scapegoat for all the economic problems. I say as the representative of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada that we in the fishing industry are tired of being the scapegoat for others and we will not endure it any longer.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): The minister can squirm and twist all he wants. He said: "I never said it". This is a transcript of the question and his answer and I tell him he said it. He said that they want to sit down for 42 weeks—

Some hon. members: Question!

Mr. Simmons: I can't let him mislead the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that no members would want to mislead the House. I notice that the hon. member has certainly not said "deliberately", but I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple question for the minister. After his two weeks of homework and field-tripping across this great country, is this the result? Is his decision and strategy for dealing with the crisis and the disaster in the Atlantic fishery that he is going to kick those people when they are down? Is that his response, or is he going to recognize that those people have been working year-round until this government's policies made them sit at home because there are no fish left to catch? Is he going to come to their rescue with an aid program and then get on with flicking out the foreigners before they take all of our fish?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member go back to his own riding and talk to the people in Gaultois—

Mr. Simmons: I did, two days ago.

Mr. Valcourt: —and ask them if this is what we are doing. We have introduced measures in Atlantic Canada to help these communities and these people. The difference is that this government will not impose anything on these people. We will get them to be the architects of their own development by participating in it. We are going to be helpful, that is what we are going to do.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. It is almost a month now since the minister announced an aid program both for western farmers and farmers right across the country who are facing serious financial difficulties. Saskatchewan farmers face an 87 per cent reduction in net farm income this year. Seeding is about to begin in many parts of the prairies. I wonder why the government has set up such a complicated formula for getting assistance to these farmers in such a cynical way. Why has the government set up a formula which is not getting the money to the farmers now when they need it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, of course we are eager to get assistance into the hands of the farmers, particularly for seeding time. The hon. member might do well to encourage his friends in the provincial governments across the country to join with the federal government in putting together a comprehensive program because that has been our style.

We have been working very closely, because agriculture is a shared responsibility between the two levels of government, and that is indicative of a process that we are going through in terms of a very comprehensive review in respect of agriculture policies in the future.

Our five-point program is on the table, $500 million is there, and we are asking the provinces to help in the process to provide this kind of interim support that our farmers need at this particular time so they can get their crops into the ground.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, surely enough the minister has put the money on the table. The problem is that many provinces cannot afford to match those funds. The money is desperately needed, not in July, not in September, not in November, it is needed now.

Is the minister prepared to pay out that money from the federal government right now because it is needed for the seeding across the west and in other parts of the country, without waiting until the provinces work out a very complicated process?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that progress is being made. It is not all negative as the hon. member suggests. Discussions are going on at the official level and at the ministerial level.

It is interesting to note that some of the provinces are coming through with balanced budgets. I think the hon. member may want to reflect on whether they have the ability to support. If agriculture is important to the provinces such as Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta, and others, then they should be in a position to support it as we have and as we are as a federal government that has stood behind the farmers in good times and bad times. We are there today and we will be there tomorrow.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In addition to the problems which my colleague from Algoma has put before the minister, the minister has been quick to tell the farmers that there were three very recent hikes in Farm Credit Corporation interest. The farmers are still waiting for any kind of word as to when they will receive the federal funds in this emergency program.

Can the minister tell us if he has reached any agreement with any of the provinces and when will those cheques be in the hands of the farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, the discussions are ongoing and a number of the provinces have indicated a willingness to participate with the federal government. We have indicated, in turn, that we would be very flexible in terms of giving the provinces credit for programs that they have come up with that will help in bringing the income level of the farmers up for the very disastrous year that we face in 1990.

Our money is on the table, it is ready to be there as soon as we can finalize the respective agreements with each of the provinces. It is a multifaceted problem. There is a different range of problems in each of the provinces and as we develop agreements on those, the money will be available, I can assure the hon. member.

• (1450)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that the federal contribution in itself is inadequate. Consequently, there is a need for more money and a need for money out there right now.

The farmers are already in the fields. They are already planting in southern Saskatchewan, even as far north as Saskatoon.

Will the farmers now have to wait while there is more federal-provincial wrangling to even receive this minimal assistance? Why does the minister not pay out the money that he has available and do his bickering with the provinces later?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we felt it was important from the standpoint of the federal government to come forth and indicate our willingness, in the form of a five-point very comprehensive program, to assist agriculture in the difficulties that it is undergoing at the present time.

In addition to that, as the hon. member knows, with respect to a future comprehensive safety net program, there is an important review that is taking place in that regard. We expect our first report by this particular committee by the end of April. We hope that will provide the basis from which we can establish a new comprehensive safety net program.

In the meantime, this money and the other proposals that were advanced in our announcement at the end of March, are available. We want to work very closely with the provinces and we are.

I can assure the hon. member that our discussions are ongoing. I met with the Minister of Agriculture from the province of Alberta a couple of days ago. We will be meeting with Manitoba. Discussions are ongoing with Ontario. I can assure him that we consider this to be a very major priority. We want to get the money into the hands of farmers as soon as we possibly can.

BILL C-21

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. There is a growing concern by my constituents and people right across Canada about the fate of the many good programs that we promised in Bill C-21, the many training and adjustment programs that are so sorely needed right across the country.

Will the minister give us the status of that bill and indicate when she feels we will be able to deliver on those promises to my constituents.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, it is over a year since we introduced this important piece of legislation which is part of our ongoing commitment to labour adjustment and training that has been a part of our agenda since 1984.

There are many things which I would like to be able to deliver to the hon. member, his constituents, and the constituents of all of us in this House. These include $350 million per year, ready to be spent on training for UI recipients; further assistance for welfare recipients, something which is very important for urban members particularly; increased allowances for those who are already being trained; a one-third increase which is ready for the Community Futures Program which is important for the hon. member from Newfoundland; $100 million which is ready to go to older workers and there is more assistance ready for co-op education and apprenticeship.

I realize that these programs are not only important to the people in the House, but the majority of Canadians approve of the direction in which we are going with unemployment insurance.

We were elected to the House not to watch things stand still, but to do better things for Canadians. I am very anxious to see that too.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. On April 14, his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, was quoted as saying that in acquiring the British firm Plessey and thus Canada's Leigh Instruments, General Electric and Siemens, "failed to show any regard for their obligations to their employees in Canada".

Would the minister tell the House why financial conditions were not imposed by Investment Canada to protect Canadian workers prior to approving the indirect acquisition of Leigh?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first let me say that Canada has always welcomed new investors and will continue to do so. We believe that it is responsible for a lot of job creation in this country. Unlike what the former government did we believe that we can be helpful. Once again we welcome those investments.

What happened with Leigh Instruments is that it was the subject of a takeover in 1988 by Plessey. It was a takeover well accepted by the company because it opened markets and new technology for the company, particularly with Micronav Landing System.

The latest takeover in 1989 by the General Electric Company has been made out to be an indirect takeover. It was done in a way that Canada could not do anything about at that time. To link that to the fact that Leigh Instruments had to declare bankruptcy last week is false. I prefer that my friend wait for the report by the trustee to know exactly what the cause of the bankruptcy is.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, Canada's willingness to welcome foreign investors in the circumstances has to be questioned when some of our best firms are being scooped up by foreign buyers and stripped of their technology and their cash.

The question from a policy point of view is this: Why is the government permitting foreign buyers to clean out strategic high technology firms like Leigh Instruments of their cash and of their intellectual wealth, leaving Canadians out of work and Canada out to lunch in the field of high technology?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I never trust Liberal policy in terms of investment and I will not start today. We know exactly what it gave in 1982, 1983, 1984. My friend is wrong. The Plessey takeover was good and was requested by Leigh Instruments for new technology. The best example, Mr. Speaker, is that Micronav got the contract about MLS because they had the expertise and technology of Plessey. If it is a bad deal we should have had that kind of deal 10 years ago; it would have been better for Canada.

TRADE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I have confirmation from industry sources that a large Toronto-based vegetable oil refinery has purchased 10 million pounds of subsidized soya bean oil from the European Common Market.

In view of the fact that Canadian supplies are adequate, Ontario soya bean processing plants are running at less than capacity, and some western oilseeds plants are shut down, can the minister advise this House what action will be taken to stop this dumping and to protect the Canadian-based oilseed producers and processors?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look into that and perhaps the hon. member would allow me to take that question as notice.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, a short supplemental.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Spain has imported the soya beans from Brazil, United States or Paraguay, processed them and used the meal as a protein supplement in livestock and poultry feeds and yet are exporting the oil to protect their own olive oil industry, can the minister assure this House that those beans were not produced using pesticides, herbicides and chemicals that are banned in Canada and could create a health hazard for Canadian consumers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the question has an undertone of a lot of allegations which I would want to check into very carefully. I am sure the hon. member would not want to leave the impression that there are some allegations which may or may not be substantiated.

FUNDING FOR WOMEN'S CENTRES

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In 1987 his government endorsed the Fairness and Funding report of the Standing Committee of the Secretary of State. This report recommended operational funding for women's organizations. After he left his meeting last week with women's centres representatives, his under-secretary called the Fairness and Funding report a worthless piece of paper.

Does the Secretary of State agree with his deputy's analysis of a government-endorsed report and, if so, what other government-endorsed reports are also worthless pieces of paper?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I accept neither the premise nor the hypothesis of the question.

• (1500)

A meeting was held between myself and representatives of women's centres from coast to coast. It was a very good meeting. Together we have agreed to try to work out a process for a future for the women's centres in partnership, of course, with the provinces and with others who may have a strong interest in the matter. I believe they understand very clearly what the reality of the current situation is: that there is less money now available. That is why core funding was discontinued. We have agreed to get back to them as early as possible after we have had a thorough review of the suggestions we are looking at together.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State indicated that he discussed with these women a process for funding women's centres. In the meantime, centre after centre is locking its doors and closing down. They are unable to help the women coming to them for information and referrals for battered women.

When is the Secretary of State going to ensure that these women's centres that are now closed will be opened and continue to serve the needs of women in this country?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the process is well under way. The meeting I was privileged to participate in went very well. From what I understand the representatives of women's centres appeared to be pleased as well.

I do not preclude that the people working in women's centres may not be desirous of putting in applications right now for project funding, which is available. If applications are completed right now, we will be very helpful in seeing that they are expedited, and funds for projects can continue to roll even while we examine whatever process they want me to look at.

PRIVILEGE

HOUSE OF COMMONS STATIONERY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege on a matter that I brought to the attention of the Chair last week. Mr. Speaker, you will recall that on April 18, 1990 I wrote to you concerning what I believe to be a matter of privilege. On that date a story appeared in The Toronto Star alleging that a letter printed on House of Commons stationery signed by someone who is not a current member of the House of Commons had been circulating in the United States and some 100,000 copies of this letter had been sent to a number of American citizens.

Upon verification, I did obtain a copy of the material in question and I will take a moment or two to summarize it for the benefit of the Chair.

I want to say at the outset—

Mr. Andre: Point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Since when does a point of order—

Mr. Milliken: A point of order does not take precedence over a question of privilege, Harvie. Learn the rules.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interfere with a legitimate point of privilege.

An hon. member: Sit down.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, as I am aware and as the hon. member is aware, Mr. Stewart, upon hearing this accusation faxed a letter—

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I think I should tell the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that probably I have the material to which he is referring. In all fairness, except for the letter I have not heard the point of privilege set out. If the hon. member is referring to a text I will continue to hear him.

I do want to say this to the hon. member. The content of the letter does not concern me because various members may have different views of this. A letter could be sent that all members would think is completely appropriate. The question is whether or not it is appropriate to send it out, or for somebody to send it out, apparently under the guise of House of Commons stationery. That is the point.

I know what the hon. House Leader is getting at. I do not think at this stage it is appropriate to bring into the discussion any reflection on the former hon. member. The point I have to decide is whether whoever put this out has done something which breaches the privileges of the House.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you for your assistance. Perhaps the Government House Leader can listen attentively and then will find out what I am saying and who I am accusing and not accusing. For anyone to come to that judgment before I speak is somewhat premature. But, of course, he wouldn't know that.

First of all, let us review the definition of privilege. As Mr. Speaker will know, parliamentary privilege according to Erskine May's twenty-first edition, page 69 is stated as being:

> —the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House—

At issue here is whether or not there has been an offence against the House or against any member of Parliament individually. Of course, the House itself enjoys privilege as well as individual members. I do think that this is an important point to raise at the beginning of this discussion.

It is not my intention to comment on the content of the letter in question. What I want to bring to the attention of the Speaker is the form of the letter. I have brought this to the attention of the Speaker and I do believe I have given him a copy of the letter. If not, of course, I am willing to provide a copy of the material immediately at the conclusion of my remarks.

Basically described, the material is as follows: it has a letterhead of the House of Commons and the Arms of Canada. At the top, left-hand side is an inscription which states, "Ronald A. Stewart, M.P., Simcoe South". On the right-hand side is: Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services. Carrying on to the signature block of the letter it states: "Ron Stewart, M.P. (Ret)".

Mr. Speaker, that is perhaps the first point that we should discuss. There are a number of points and I intend to be brief. The Oxford American Dictionary, 1982 gives three meanings for ret., retain, retire or return.

The point I am making to you, Mr. Speaker, is that there is at least a difference between the signature block and the top of the letter in question. That difference is attributed by a spokesperson on behalf of the group known as English First to the fact that they themselves superimpose the House of Commons crest inscription along with the indications at the top of the letter on material already provided to them by Mr. Ronald Stewart.

I would like to draw a parallel for a moment so that all members of this House understand. If, for instance, a group in Canada, say the Alliance for the Preservation of English decided to use the Arms of the President of the United States in material that it was circulating here in Canada, I am sure that we would hear of it and I believe rightfully so, just as we are, rightfully in my opinion, raising this issue today. First there is the issue of the member of Parliament, Ret. I do not believe that it is the custom in this country, and perhaps you can verify it, as to whether or not there is a precedent for using the term Member of Parliament, Ret. After all, as I indicated in my correspondence with Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs does not describe himself, that I have ever heard, as the Prime Minister Ret., even though at one point he did hold that position.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member for a moment. Not to take anything away from the cogency of his argument, but the hon. member is inviting the Chair to look at three different definitions of the abbreviation.

I have to say that unless there was some very cogent evidence indeed, I would take the view that that meant retired, unless the hon. member has some other strong argument. The difficulty again is that I would like the hon. member to stick to the basic story. Then what I have to decide eventually is if there is sufficient prima facie evidence to put the very kind of question to a committee. Hon. members will realize that it is not the place of the Speaker to delve into all the intricacies of what might eventually be a proposition of evidence or an argument on it.

• (1510)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, let me move on to the next point that I want to bring to the attention of the Chairman.

First of all, Your Honour will recall that on May 6, 1985 there was a case which was decided upon by Mr. Speaker at that time, wherein an ad had been placed in a newspaper in Toronto by someone acting on behalf of another individual who no longer was a member of Parliament. About this particular ad the Chairman ruled—I read from Hansard of May 6, 1985 at page 4439:

> It should go without saying that a Member of Parliament needs to perform his function effectively and that anything tending to cause confusion as to a Member's identity, creates the possibility of an impediment to the fulfilment of that Member's functions.

If that argument applies to a member of Parliament individually, then I suggest that it apply similarly to the House collectively. I read further from Mr. Speaker's decision at that time:

> Any action which impedes or tends to impede a Member in the discharge of his duties is a breach of privilege.

That was the decision with regard to that case, which was ruled on by Mr. Speaker on May 6, 1985.

I want to bring two more matters, very quickly, to the attention of the Chairman. First, Section 80 of the Parliament of Canada Act makes it against the rules for anyone to call any kind of a business establishment "Parliament Hill", the implication being that you cannot associate something with this Parliament when it does not have anything to do with this Parliament.

By extension, the group in the United States, by utilizing the material in question for promotional purposes in that country, I would suggest what it is doing is inappropriate.

There are two more issues that I want to bring to your attention. One is the fact that a spokesperson, acting on behalf of English First, stated with regard to the use of the title block that I have just described, and the signature of the former MP in the following way: "It certainly gets the point across that this is a legitimate Canadian spokesman who has an important message."

Even the people who put this message together in the United States were doing so to let people believe that someone in Canada in an office of authority was responsible for getting this message across.

When information is disseminated in this manner, either in Canada or abroad, by someone who is not a member of Parliament but who is, as he described himself in one section of the letter, "Member of Parliament, Ret.", or if one looks at the letterhead—granted, some people have admitted that they superimposed this—the implication is that this House or a member of this House either, while in office or after being out of office but still with the use of the letterhead and therefore claiming to have something to do with this institution, then I believe that all the privileges of members of Parliament and this House have been affected by what has happened.

There is a further matter, and that is the matter of the envelope in question that was utilized, wherein the Coat of Arms of Canada was employed without the inscription "House of Commons." That could be an issue involving the law rather than this House, so I will not discuss it any further except to state that I hope that the Secretary of State, who is responsible for the keeping of the Coat of Arms of Canada, will address that issue, because after all, he is the custodian of it.

Also, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should be made aware of the provisions of the Trademarks Act, which prevents the utilization of our Coat of Arms for anything else than official government purposes.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to express to you that if you deem that there is a prima facie case of privilege in this case, with the information that I brought to the attention of the House today, and with the information provided in correspondence last week, that I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

There is just one final point that I wanted to bring to the attention of the Chair. The House of Commons Members' Manual, chapter H-3, page 13, dated November, 1988 states the following about the unauthorized use of parliamentary stationery, and these are instructions for members of parliament who are retiring.

> In order to preclude the unauthorized use by others of official materials, (e.g. stationery containing the Members's letterhead) supplied to Members by the House, former Members are advised to safely dispose of such material after the election.

This is the House of Commons Members' Manual from which I just quoted.

The individual in question, Mr. Ronald Stewart, is quoted by the media as stating that he had a "hunk" of this material and that there was nothing against the law in him using it. Well, the House does not concern itself with the legal aspects, but with whether or not our privileges are affected by someone who may use such material later.

I suggest to you that, notwithstanding any law, instructions are quite clear to former Members of Parliament that they are to dispose of such material. Hence, it should not be used either by them or by any other person acting on their behalf, wilfully or otherwise.

I want to thank the House for its indulgence in allowing me to bring this matter to the attention of all Members of Parliament. I close by saying that my purpose here is not to refer to the comments of the member. I happen to disagree with them, but I suppose we have a right to agree or disagree with each other in the House from time to time. That is what debate is all about. That is not the point.

Nor is it the point to state that Mr. Stewart himself caused those blocks to be at the top of the letter. After all, he says he did not do it and someone else has actually said that they did. The point is that that material, in several thousands of copies, has been distributed to individuals, misleading them to believe that in some way the House, or a representative of the House, was associated with it. In that way, I do believe that the privileges of the House collectively have been affected.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to hear the hon. Government House Leader and then I will come to the hon. member for Kamloops.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this matter could have been dealt with 10 or 12 minutes ago if the hon. member had allowed it.

Mr. Boudria: If you hadn't interrupted. Do you like being interrupted?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was listened to courteously and gave his argument. The hon. House leader did rise on a point of order but—

Mr. Boudria: To interrupt!

Mr. Speaker: Well, he may have interrupted but he made his point and then sat down. He certainly gave the hon. member every chance to make his argument and I think the same courtesy must be extended to the hon. House leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the newspaper article in question, which alleged that a former member of the House had sent out on House of Commons stationery a letter to an American organization proffering advice on how it might treat a certain issue in the U.S., was immediately reacted to by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell with some concern that this should happen and an indication that he intended to raise a question of privilege in the House.

That former member of the House, Ron Stewart, then faxed to Your Honour, to me, and to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, a letter categorically denying that he, on stationery of the House of Commons, sent out that letter—

Mr. Boudria: Did I say he had?

Mr. Andre: —and, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Boudria: Try again!

Mr. McDermid: Shut up!

Mr. Speaker: Please! I think hon. members should listen. The hon. House Leader.

Mr. Boudria: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Andre: The rat pack just can't help behaving like a rodent. Mr. Speaker, the—

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: It would help the Chair if I was allowed to listen to the hon. House leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the former member of the House, Mr. Stewart, wrote a letter to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the Chair, myself, and others, categorically denying the contents of that news story.

• (1520)

Furthermore, the recipient of the letter, who dispersed it apparently throughout his membership in the United States, wrote to the Speaker and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, myself, and others stating explicitly that he, in fact, had taken the letter from Ron Stewart on plain stationery, had affixed to it the letterhead of the House of Commons with the title of former parliamentary secretary, had affixed to it the block, and had himself sent out bogus propaganda material. This is an American citizen who did this.

He said to the hon. member that he had done that. He said that in no way, shape or form did he ask Mr. Stewart's permission to do that. For the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, in view of that information—

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the best way to proceed would be to let the hon. House leader finish. I will come back to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

I must remind all hon. members that in these matters it is a prima facie case that the Speaker must decide. It is not necessary for the Speaker to sort out all the facts.

Will the hon. House leader continue, please.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there has been the categorical denial by the former member of the House. There has been the categorical admission by the American who received this letter that he was the one who had improperly affixed the Coat of Arms of the House of Commons, and so on, to a letter received by him on plain white stationery. And, it seems pretty obviously, there is the original concern about which the hon. member had expressed his indignation is his raising of November 1988 members' manual—interestingly enough a manual that was released to Members of Parliament after Mr. Stewart was no longer here. He was supposed to somehow anticipate what was in the future manual to be given to members, had he run for election. That notwithstanding, it is a side issue.

It is pretty clear that it is not acceptable for Americans, Australians, Indonesians or anybody else to take the stationery of the Canadian House of Commons and, on the basis of that, to fraudulently put onto a letter of any sort this Coat of Arms, to claim that it was sent out under some official status, and to use that for their purposes. That is obvious.

While the privileges of the House are very important, I do not know how we can extend those beyond the borders of Canada. If there is a way, I would certainly have no objection to getting that American up to the Bar of the House of Commons and having him explain how he has abused the privileges of the House, because he most certainly has. But it is an American who has done something in the United States. This is not a Canadian.

I think it is less than honourable and I am disappointed that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell should seek to malign the former member by raising a point of privilege about his activities, which is not justified in this case. This American has abused the House, to be sure. There is no problem in that regard. By what means would he propose that we could somehow bring our privileges to bear on people who live outside the boundaries of this country?

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, after interrupting me six times, is still not hearing what I have to say because he keeps talking. He cannot hear without his mouth in action, apparently.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: The unfortunate situation, I thought, was closed, and should have been closed. In an earlier day of more honourable behaviour, it would have been closed a long time ago.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as you know I, too, filed a notice with you on April 18 after reading the report in the newspaper.

I listened with interest when the government House leader said that, yes, indeed, he agrees that the privileges of the House have been breached. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker—and I take him for his word—I think this is a serious matter. How we deal with it most appropriately would be open to some question. The fact that the government House leader has indicated that he, too, sees this as a breach of privilege indicates the seriousness of what we are discussing.

Some may argue that since the member in question is no longer a member from Simcoe South, there is no risk of confusion in terms of what the member has or has not done and, therefore, there are likely no privileges that have been breached. I would argue to the contrary, that as long as there is some confusion over who is and who is not a member, it affects all of our abilities to perform as members. In that sense, any individual appearing to—

Mr. Speaker: There seem to be some salient facts here. There does not seem to be any doubt at the moment, at least in the Chamber, that the hon. former member referred to is no longer a member. There may have been some doubt in the United States as to whether he was or was not, but has there been any doubt here?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there has ever been any doubt. As a matter of fact, there no longer is a member for Simcoe South, so the matter has changed significantly.

Joseph Maingot's Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, at page 195, describes one class of contempt as being "the interference with the corporate rights of the House". It states:

> When the corporate rights of the House are interfered with in some way, the "breach of privilege" could result in the offender being held in contempt of the House—

Surely, the House of Commons shares the same corporate rights as other corporate bodies, including the important right to claim sole use of our Coat of Arms, stationery, and freedom from the misrepresentation of our views by others.

What has become clear, as a result of communications from a variety of people, is that someone decided to masquerade as a Member of Parliament, or to set up a previous Member of Parliament as being an existing Member of Parliament and having advocated something most of us find unacceptable—the opposition to linguistic duality in our country. Thousands of these letters have been sent out, allegedly signed by the previous member from Simcoe South with the use of his name and stationery in one form or another.

Surely, when someone has misrepresented a previous member, it is something that we ought to be very concerned about. Therefore, I think the reference of this matter to the appropriate committee would be more than appropriate. If we do not, are we in a sense saying that any organization that wants to manufacture a letterhead using the names of existing or previous members of Parliament, the Coat of Arms of Canada, or whatever other set of symbols, is appropriate? Are we simply going to say that we have nothing to say about the misrepresentation and misuse of stationery, and, by implication, a former member's or perhaps even a present member's name? I think it is very serious and something must be done.

Since we have had new information, whether or not there has been a contempt of the House by the previous member, I think, can be set aside. Nevertheless, someone or some organization is masquerading as a previous Member of Parliament in expressing a very disgusting viewpoint. At least, I would like to think that everyone here would consider it disgusting.

I support the views put forward by my hon. friend speaking on behalf of the Liberals. As I indicated in my letter to you of April 18, if you find a prima facie case of contempt of the House in this case, I, too, would encourage the appropriate motion to be put.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to argument and I promised the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that I would give him a short reply. I point out to him that I think I have the salient facts, also the argument and issue.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I only want to take one or two moments and I would like to get the attention of the government House leader briefly.

It is against the Standing Orders of this House to say that someone else has maligned, is guilty of malignity, or deliberately maligned. I do believe that that remark was made about me by the government House leader in reference to Mr. Stewart.

In no way did I say that Mr. Stewart was—

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may very well have a point. In order to keep this tidy, I would ask him to not make it in the midst of this argument. He has put the argument with respect to the publication in cogent terms and that is what I have to decide. If there is another matter that may have to be raised as a consequence of some comment made in the argument, I will hear that at the appropriate time.

Mr. Boudria: There is just one final argument that I want to present to the Chair and to all hon. members on this issue and that is the following: Whether the offence has been committed in this country or anywhere else is not what should concern the House at this point. It may very well be that in the end the parliamentary committee looking into the issue will determine that it is not able to obtain redress, but that is a matter which I do not believe the Speaker should be looking at, with respect, at this point.

I think the Speaker should be concerned with whether or not there is a prima facie case of privilege and then an appropriate motion could be moved and the parliamentary committee could obtain information or seek to obtain redress. If it deems that there are appropriate measures, it can decide so at that point.

The Government House Leader did state in his remarks that he believed as well, and I am paraphrasing what he said, that there could be an offence against the privileges of this House but that the offence, I believe he said, was committed outside of the borders of this country. There seems at least to be unanimity on all sides of the House from those remarks, if I am paraphrasing correctly what the minister said, to the effect that there is indeed a prima facie case of privilege. I wanted to bring those concluding remarks to the attention of the Chairman and I want to bring the other matter once these deliberations have concluded.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to hon. members, the Government House Leader, the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I have the material in front of me. I have looked at it and I will look at it again in light of the comments that have been made. It would seem very clear that with respect to our former colleague that it would seem to be at the first opportunity he extended to hon. members an explanation as to his position on that matter. In any event I will consider the matter carefully and report back to the House as soon as I can.

I have another question of privilege. I think looking at this in the terms of the priorities I will hear the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

REMARKS MADE IN HALIFAX BY THE HON. MEMBER FOR YORK SOUTH—WESTON

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, during a Liberal leadership forum held yesterday in Halifax, the hon. member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) made remarks that were widely reported in Canada,—

Mr. Milliken: He is not here. It should wait.

Mr. Gérin: —slanders Quebecers as a whole, insults and violates the privileges of many members of this House, even though they have not been named. The remarks that were made and reported are that Quebec separatists are traitors to Canada and no better than racists and bigots, that they are therefore guilty of treason, which is perhaps the most serious crime in our Criminal Code. He even had the nerve to name specific Members of this House to illustrate what he had just said.

Mr. Speaker, Quebecers as a whole were shocked by the remarks made by the Hon. Member.

Mr. Saint-Julien: It is disgusting!

Mr. Gérin: To all these Quebecers, it is another insult in the current Constitutional debate.

Mr. Speaker, in 1980, over 40 per cent of Quebecers voted democratically in favor of sovereignty for Quebec and many members of this House also voted yes to the question asked in the referendum. Today that number could be as high or perhaps even much higher.

That debate was extremely democratic. By levelling charges of treason, a crime defined in the Criminal Code as involving violence, the hon. member for York South—Weston and Liberal leadership candidate, attacks certain members of this House and puts them and all of us under a cloud. It is a very serious problem, Mr. Speaker. I know that the hon. member is not here today and that that statement was not made in this House. It is nonetheless an issue and, based on the case law and precedents set in this House, any statement affecting a number of members of this House, even if it was made outside the House, constitutes a problem which must be considered immediately by the Chair and by the House.

Mr. Speaker, Quebec's right to self-determination is fundamental. It is a sacred right, and inalienable right and a capital right in the present Constitutional debate. However, that debate must be democratic. Those who believe in it will work democratically and believe in the sovereinty of a Canadian province. That is in no way criminal, nor is it racist or bigot.

I therefore request three things, Mr. Speaker: that the whole of this House immediately denounce the terms used by the member for York South—Weston; that the House immediately demand public apologies from the member and that the House solemnly reaffirm Quebec's right to self-determination.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened rather carefully to the Hon. Member's comments. However, we have a problem today because the Hon. Member for York South—Weston is absent. He is no doubt occupied elsewhere and I think that the Chair, is keeping with our tradition should request the House's permission to now ajourn the matter until such time as arrangements can be made with the other Hon. Member to secure his presence here. For this reason, I ask all Hon. Members to allow the Chair to make arrangements with the Hon. Member for York South—Weston to secure his presence here at a later date. I understand that other Hon. Members wish to deal with this issue, which would certainly be proper, but I would ask them to wait until the Hon. Member for York South—Weston is present.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. The Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead clearly referred to a comment which was made outside the House and which has not affected any Hon. Member, either individually or collectively.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: I do not understand. I said that the comment was made outside the House, which is absolutely true.

Mr. Blais: Indirectly!

Mr. Gauthier: No Member of the House has been affected—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

An hon. member: Read again the newspaper articles!

Mr. Gauthier: —either directly or indirectly.

• (1540)

Mr. Speaker: I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, but the point he raised is in fact that on which the House must reach a decision and on which the Speaker must provide a ruling. That is why I would ask all hon. members to allow me to adjourn this matter now, so that the Chairman can have a conversation with the hon. member and agree on how the matter should be pursued. During the debate, of course, all other members will have a chance to make themselves heard.

I see that a number of members would like to speak now. If it is really urgent, perhaps, but—

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I realize that you want the hon. member to be present, but there should not be a delay in terms of weeks or months. I think tomorrow should be the latest.

This man attacked democracy itself by calling those who are considering constitutional options criminals. That is unacceptable!

Mr. Speaker: All right. We have a tradition that is very clear cut, a tradition has been consistently applied for many years, which is to give a member the opportunity to be present when certain charges are made against him. This is an age-old principle which has customarily been applied in this House.

Of course I would need the consent of hon. members, but I would ask you to give the Chairman a chance to make a telephone call and make certain arrangements and secure the presence of the other member.

I don't think there will be a delay in terms of a week, two weeks or a month. I agree this is a very important matter, not only for the hon. member who raised the issue and for other members who have very strong feelings about the matter, but for all members of this House.

That is why I would ask all members to give the Chair a chance to make arrangements immediately, as soon as possible, so that we can pursue this very important matter tomorrow or perhaps Wednesday.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I think your suggestion is very reasonable, but since this is a very serious matter, perhaps you could let us know tomorrow after Question Period, when questions of privilege are discussed what the possibilities are, so that hon. members and especially our Quebec members, many of whom were shocked by what happened, will be able to decide, with the Chair, when the debate will take place. If the debate could take place tomorrow, that would be ideal, and otherwise Wednesday.

Perhaps we could now adjourn this debate immediately until tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's suggestion is entirely appropriate. Perhaps after Question Period tomorrow, I will be in a position to report to the hon. member. I agree this is a very urgent matter, but we also have another very important principle, which is that all members of this House should be treated fairly. We shall wait until tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, during the question of privilege that I raised earlier today there was a response from the hon. Government House Leader in which, and again I must paraphrase in the absence of the Hansard, he clearly accused me of maligning the former member for the riding of Simcoe South.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, to accuse someone of deliberately maligning is against the rules of this House as stated under Beauchesne. I bring it to your attention that Beauchesne's Citation 320 specifically identifies "malign" as being a word that is inappropriate.

Second, Mr. Speaker, you will also be aware that I indicated to the Chairman that I had received material which led me to believe that it was an organization in the United States which had claimed itself to have placed the letterhead on the material in question.

No where did I in fact state that Mr. Ronald Stewart had committed this act deliberately and wilfully himself, save and except the signature portion which identifies himself as a member of Parliament, RET. The other portions I attributed to that organization in the United States. Second, even if I had said that, which I did not, I do not believe that the House leader is justified in making his accusation which is against the rules of the House in any case.

Mr. Milliken: Certainly not. Very improper and Harvie, you should have known better.

Mr. Andre: It is a day for the Liberals to give me lectures on decorum. Mr. Speaker, I have the Sixth Edition of Beauchesne's and I could not find malign in there. It is not in the Sixth edition. The hon. member has the Fifth edition. It does not appear in the Sixth edition. Knowing the hon. member's sensitive nature, I certainly would not want to offend him. After all, he has enough to bear.

While I am on my feet, in the interests of not denying hon. members the right to debate important legislation which I know hon. members have strong feelings about, perhaps I could ask if there is unanimous consent of the House to add the 45 minutes we have taken up on these points to the remainder of this day. In this way members will have an opportunity to do what we were elected to do, and that is to debate the important issues facing the country.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. House leader has made a suggestion. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any negative?

Mr. Riis: Yes.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): I thank the Speaker for his indulgence. I rise on a question of privilege arising from Question Period. I want to see the actual transcript, but I believe there will be a basis for me to raise a question of privilege arising out of a response that the minister of fisheries gave me during Question Period today. I wanted now not to sit on my rights but to give notice to Mr. Speaker that I will raise it as soon as I have an opportunity to see the transcript.

NATIONAL CONSUMER WEEK

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased today to proclaim the week of April 23 to 29 National Consumer Week. This is the first time it has been observed, Madam Speaker. From now on, it will be held the last full week of April every year.

The main purpose of this very special week is to highlight the partnership that must exist in the Canadian market between governments, the private sector and consumers.

This Week is the result of many initiatives taken by the ministers responsible for consumers at the federal, provincial and territorial levels. It is inspired by the many activities organized by consumers' groups in the last several years to protect Canadian consumers and improve the many products available to them on the market.

[English]

Businesses, business associations, consumer groups, schools, community groups, trade and professional associations as well as municipal governments are organizing a wide variety of activities that will further increase the public's awareness of consumer issues.

To this end Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada has put together and published an organizers' manual that was distributed to all those interested in organizing special events in their community on the theme of National Consumer Week.

The theme chosen for this first National Consumer Week is "Team Up for a Stronger Marketplace: Consumers, Business, Government". We want to show the extent to which the co–operation of all sectors is essential for an efficient and functional marketplace.

[Translation]

Throughout the week, Madam Speaker, I will participate in many activities across the country. Tomorrow in Montreal, I will take part in the launching of a food labelling guide. This is a very practical small guide designed to help consumers better understand the sometimes arcane language of labels.

This guide has been produced jointly by my department and many companies in the private sector and a million copies of it will be distributed everywhere during the National Week. I cannot overemphasize the co–operation and partnership behind this initiative.

Still on Tuesday, I will give a speech in Toronto to a conference on intellectual property. I will be in Western Canada on Wednesday and Thursday, where I will address the Environmentally Sound Packaging Coalition in Vancouver. I also plan to visit the various offices of my department throughout the country and to meet many of my provincial colleagues to further strengthen the partnership required to make the Canadian market more dynamic.

This year, for the third time since 1982, we organized a consumers' fair for members of this House. Ministers, members and senators had the opportunity, and still have an opportunity for a few more minutes, I think, to go right to the source of the information they can use to answer hundreds of requests from their constituents thoroughly and effectively.

More than 20 federal government departments and agencies took part in this event. I met several of my colleagues at noon today. We hope that all those who took the trouble to go among the displays were satisfied with this event today. It was an opportunity to chat with colleagues, to exchange information and also to add to one's knowledge of the services the federal government provides to help Canadian consumers.

Excellence of products and services must be our main concern and fundamental objective.

We are convinced that a well-informed consumer is more demanding, Madam Speaker. A more demanding consumer asks for better products. This in turn opens up the market more and strengthens competition, a goal we must all strive for to improve the quality of life, both for individuals and for society in general.

That is our position and our commitment. That, Madam Speaker, is the purpose of National Consumer Week. Thank you for your attention and I invite all hon. members here to promote this Week all week long.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the Minister for his speech on National Consumer Week. However, I think he made a mistake when he said it was the first time this week was held.

According to his own text, on page 3:

> This year, for the third time since 1982, we organized a consumer exhibition for parliamentarians.

It definitely was a mistake.

According to the minister's text, on page 2: Tomorrow—

[English]

Tomorrow the minister will be in Montreal for the send-off of a food labelling guide. I congratulate him on that. Finally, we will see simpler language than what is presently on labels. I would suggest to the minister that after sending off this booklet perhaps he could make some modifications to the labelling law.

Some health claims about certain foreign products are untrue. We need to correct our laws. The processed food companies are not listing any of the contents that constitute less than 5 per cent. There are some products which can be deadly to some consumers. In the past few years we have seen children dying from eating certain products containing foods they are allergic to.

I see that this booklet will be limited to one million copies. I would suggest that the population of Canada is well over 25 million, and perhaps we should have more copies.

On the same day that the minister will be in Toronto rushing to speak to The Intellectual Property Conference, I hope he will mention that a legislative committee is presently in session on the topography of integrated circuits. This is a rather interesting legislative committee, which very few members of the government have been attending. They did attend en masse the last meeting to prevent me from having an expert from Osgoode Hall in Toronto come in to make a critique of the proposed law.

I congratulate the minister for his booklet; "Team up for a Stronger Marketplace".

[Translation]

Faisons équipe à un marché dynamique. I wonder whether the minister is changing the course of events by having two brochures, one for Francophones and one for Anglophones. I noticed that before, we had guides with the English version on one side and the French on the reverse, so we didn't have to write to the department twice.

[English]

In this particular booklet, "Team up for a Stronger Marketplace", which was produced for National Consumer Week, I find it rather interesting that on one of the first pages signed by the minister it states: "National Consumer Week is an opportunity to encourage a higher level of consumer awareness, education and participation in the marketplace by consumers, business and government. The goal of the week is to emphasize the marketplace partnership among these groups".

I ask the minister: What is the government doing to be a partner?

There is an an acknowledgement on the front page, thanking the National Consumer Council of the United Kingdom and the United States for all of their good suggestions. This is the source of the information for this booklet.

On page 5 there are ideas to inspire educators which I find very interesting, as will the rest of Canada. It tells educators to conduct taste tests on products such as soft drinks, snack foods, candies and so on. They are to compare name brands with generic no-name bulk foods. In other words, they can do taste tests on junk foods.

I do not know how long the minister has been out of school, but soft drinks and junk food are not part of the educational standards of schools today. Imagine suggesting these as ideas to inspire educators. I am really surprised that this kind of junk is being produced in the name of National Consumer Week.

• (1600)

When will the minister bring in a new Bankruptcy Act? It is an act which has not been changed in 43 years. His ministry has a revised Bankruptcy Act which has been ready for review since February of 1988, according to my sources.

[Translation]

I would like to point out to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that it is the first time, in the history of Canada and the world, that a country has two consumer taxes, one at the provincial level and one at the federal level.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, I wonder what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did last week to encourage consumers, when the bank rate went up again.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make a few comments about consumers in this week, National Consumers Week.

The minister has his own message for consumers. He talks about teaming up the business community, consumers and the government for a more effective marketplace.

I have a message that I would like consumers to think about this week. I want consumers to think about how this government has treated consumers, not just this week but for the last six years.

First, this government through the Governor of the Bank of Canada, John Crow, has followed a high interest rate policy. Think about the effects of a high interest rate policy on consumers—not only the consumers who are working but the ones who are unemployed.

Since the government was re-elected in 1988 it has increased interest rates 20 times. Some 71,000 jobs have disappeared in the manufacturing sector of this country. Some 47,599 consumers and small businesses have declared bankruptcy.

Mr. McDermid: How many new ones have been created?

Mr. Rodriguez: News ones created—created where? They are all working for McDonald's and Harvey's in the service sector. These are low paying jobs, jobs with no guarantee that they will be there tomorrow. We are trading in some good, solid, challenging, interesting and well-paying jobs for a pittance. That is what we are trading them in for.

Second, how has this government treated consumers? I ask Canadians to think about it this week.

It has pursued a privatization and deregulation policy. All of this was to create a more competitive marketplace.

Madam Speaker, let us take a look at the airline industry. I think of my own municipality which wrote to the Minister of Transport since deregulation and the privatization of Air Canada in the Sudbury area. We do not have a proliferation of airlines to provide competition. What we have got are two national airlines where before we had four.

Has the price come down? No, the price has escalated. Imagine paying $350 return from Sudbury to Toronto—some 240 miles. You can fly to London, England and return for $350.

Have consumers received any more assurance of safety in the air? Not on your bippy, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McDermid: Not on her what?

Mr. Rodriguez: I am glad the minister is here. He is the minister who promised that if we got free trade it would result in lower prices to consumers. That is the third thing it promised. There is no evidence that that is happening—none at all. In fact prices are going up and up.

Fourth, the latest blow to consumers is this government's headlong dash to implement the goods and services tax on January 1, 1991. There is no more regressive tax than a sales tax. That is what the member for Mississauga South said in a speech in 1980. He said there is a no more regressive tax. Why? Because it does not respect the ability of the consumer to pay. In this particular situation the government has said: "We are removing the manufacturers' sales tax of 13.5 per cent". Are the consumers being given any assurance that they are going to get the net benefit when the 13.5 per cent is removed? No sirree, not at all.

What are we going to get? The minister said; "We are going to give you a new version". This is the 1990 version of the Beryl Plumptre committee. Do you remember that committee which the Trudeau Liberal government set up to monitor prices during the wage and price control period?

We know that that watch-dog did not bite. That watch-dog could only whimper. Yet this government is going to set up a watch-dog that will have no power to bite. It will only be able to whimper at the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax.

Finally, the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, in June, 1988, tabled a unanimous report with 33 recommendations on misleading advertising, all designed to protect consumers as they forage for food, services and goods in the marketplace. Not one of these recommendations has been put into effect—not one, and there are 33 of them which are absolutely unanimous.

The minister said the theme of his week is: "Team up for a stronger marketplace, consumers, business and government". I suggest that the theme should be: "Team up to get rid of the Mulroney government, consumers, small businesses and trade unions," providing we have any left by 1993.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-296, an Act to change the name of the electoral district of Montmorency—Orléans.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. DeBlois: Madam Speaker, today I would like to introduce a Private Members' Bill aimed at changing the name of the electoral district of Montmorency—Orléans so that it more adequately reflects the riding's demographic profile and geography.

If my bill is passed, the riding will be known as Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans.

I may point out that nearly 70 per cent of the residents of my riding live in Beauport, the fourteenth largest town in Quebec. In a recent survey of my constituents, a substantial majority replied they agreed with the new designation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour and, indeed, a privilege to present petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of residents of the constituency of Kamloops.

The petitioners point out a whole set of reasons why they oppose the government's goods and services tax that is now before the Senate. They suggest that the Parliament of Canada should do whatever it can to encourage the government to drop this very oppressive tax, go back to the drawing-board and introduce a tax reform that is fair and just, as opposed to this very cruel goods and services tax.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another issue I have petitions from people who are calling upon the government to take action against the situation of so many children in Canada who live in poverty. They are asking the government to support motion M-254, which calls upon the government to negotiate with the provinces the provision of a comprehensive bill of rights for children. However, the government voted against proceeding with that initiative.

• (1610)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present to the House of Commons a petition from a number of my constituents in connection with the unjust and improper imprisonment of Yi-Shih Leo, who is a Canadian citizen, by the government of Taiwan.

Mr. Leo has been in jail for speaking about democratic rights in Taiwan. His only offence is to have exercised freedom of speech, which we are told exists in Taiwan, but which apparently exists in such a fashion so that when it is exercised it puts one in jail. On behalf of my constituents, I present this petition.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands who are protesting the government's goods and services tax in so far as the tax will apply to books, magazines and newspapers. These items are currently untaxed.

Under the proposed goods and services tax that is now before the other place, the government proposes to tax these items as though they were some common commodity when in fact, as Your Honour will know, they are the printed word and normally have been exempt from government taxation, not just in Canada but in other lands.

I am sure that these petitioners who call upon Parliament to reject the tax in so far as it applies to such publications either in the statutes or the regulations would be appalled to know that their rights now depend on the other place and not on this House. Nevertheless, they call on this House, if it should get an opportunity, to express its displeasure at the government's actions in respect of this unfair tax.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to rise under Standing Order 36 to present to this House a petition signed by 335 Canadians.

These Canadians are essentially low-income earners who are very concerned about the effect that the GST will have on them. Essentially, they are in the $20,000 a year income bracket. They will be spending between 93 per cent and 95 per cent of their money on consumption, whereas those in higher income brackets will be spending about 50 per cent.

The petitioners feel that it is blatantly unfair for them to be burdened with the goods and services tax. They are also concerned about other aspects as well. However, they are concerned mostly with the fact that the burden will be on their shoulders. Despite what some hon. members on the other side of the House who are sitting here today have said, they will not be better off, and they are pretty sure of that.

It is my honour to present this petition to you, Madam Speaker, for your consideration.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon the House of Commons and the other House to reject this goods and services tax.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I am happy today to be presenting another petition against the goods and the services tax. This petition was sent to me in February of this year. However, this is the first chance I have had to present it.

The petitioners are totally opposed to the goods and services tax. They are especially worried about the tax as it relates to a levy on skating expenses, including instructor fees, facility rentals, equipment purchases and other related skating expenses.

They are also concerned that the proposed tax will place a significant financial burden on the families of young athletes, thereby deterring them from entering and continuing in this sport. They point out that this sport significantly contributes to the physical and mental health of our youth.

They ask that this government not impose this goods and services tax, especially on any of the services related to skating.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am happy to present to the House pursuant to Standing Order 36 a petition on behalf of hundreds of residents in my riding and around Toronto who have relatives and friends who live in Atlantic Canada.

They are asking the government to please hurry in its design to set a clear agenda to correct the current problems in Atlantic Canada so that the people there can begin developing a game plan in order to ensure that future prosperity will exist in Atlantic Canada. We are concerned about this happening in every other part of Canada as well.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition. This is the first occasion we have had in quite some time to present petitions. I do so on behalf of many citizens from the Toronto area who implore the government to intercede on behalf of Mr. Yi-Shih Leo who is being detained by the government of Taiwan.

The petition calls on the Canadian government to take immediate and effective measures to secure Mr. Leo's release, including the issuing of public statements, instructing the Canadian Embassy in Japan or the High Commission office in Hong Kong to intercede, to appoint a lawyer to handle the case, and to request Canada's allies to assist in the case itself.

WOMEN'S PROGRAMS

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise to present a petition in accordance with the Standing Orders. It is from 31 people from the communities of Port aux Basques, Rose Blanche, Doyles and St. Andrew's.

The petitioners, in making their prayer, point out that the cuts in women's funding will undermine a very well-established program to provide supportive services to women and families in crisis situations, which are often life threatening and violent.

They call upon Parliament, and I support them in this call, to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that the funding for the operation of women's centres, such as the ones in Port aux Basques, Stephenville and the others across the country, so that these centres can continue to provide the services and support to women and families who are so much in need of that type of service.

Following the forum, the Quebec Region decided to organize a similar type of forum, in residence, for all supervisors in the Quebec Region. The objectives of this forum were as follows:

—To enable each supervisor to understand the foundation and evolution of the strategy.

—To assure an adequate comprehension of the concepts and principles of this Strategy and the mandate of Employment and Immigration Canada.

—To examine the approach and the methods to be used through exchanges and discussions on the means available, taking into consideration each of CEC's own characteristics.

—To allow supervisors to familiarize themselves with the results of the pilot projects.

—To outline the overall network, a plan and timetable for its execution.

CONTRIBUTIONS OR GRANTS FOR ANIMAL PROTECTION SERVICES

Question No. 256—Miss Grey (Beaver River):

Has the government provided any contributions or grants through the Department of the Environment to organizations which have the goals or objectives of promoting or defending animal rights or animal welfare, or which are responsible for animal protection services and, if so, in each case, what is (a) the name of the organization (b) the (i) amount (ii) purpose (iii) duration of the contribution or grant?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Environment Canada has not provided grants or contributions to organizations which have goals or objectives of promoting or defending animal rights or animal welfare or responsibility for animal protection services.

UNITED STATES INVASION OF PANAMA

Question No. 266—Ms. Hunter:

Did the government support the United States invasion of Panama and, if so, did it seek legal opinion before taking this step and, if so (a) who provided the advice (b) at what stage was it sought (c) did it include arguments (i) in favour of (ii) against the invasion and, if so, what were they?

Right Hon. Charles Joseph Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Government of Canada, on December 20, 1989, expressed support for the USA action in Panama since: (a) all reasonable and extraordinary diplomatic efforts to negotiate a solution to the crisis in Panama had failed, and (b) the killing of an off-duty U.S. military officer and threats to the families of other U.S. servicemen had demonstrated that the lives of American citizens, in Panama by right of treaty, were in jeopardy. On December 16, 1989, the Panamanian National Assembly declared the country to be in a "state of war" with the United States. In the circumstances, the United States' Government invoked Article 51 of the United Nations' Charter, which permits states to use force in self defence. The Government of Canada expressed regret that the situation had deteriorated to the extent that force was required. The Government of Canada acknowledged that the use of force presented a dangerous precedent, but recognized that the situation in Panama was unique.

The question of whether the Government of Canada sought a legal opinion before expressing support for the United States' military intervention in Panama, and related questions concerning the nature of any such opinion constitute a request to render public the confidential advice provided by the Government to the Prime Minister. The confidentiality of this information is protected under the Access to Information Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The questions as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–69, an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have two quick points of order to raise.

Earlier in the day the government House leader asked whether there was unanimous consent to extend the sitting by, perhaps, an extra hour considering that we had taken up some time with Routine Proceedings. At that time I might have been a dissenting voice. I think what I said may have been misrepresented.

I, too, am prepared to consent to extend the hour of sitting tonight.

Mr. Speaker: I asked the House if there were any negatives and the hon. member for Kamloops said: "Yes". It led to some confusion. However, I am glad that the hon. member has now clarified it.

Mr. Milliken: No, we are not agreeing to that.

Mr. Speaker: Oh, he has clarified his own position.

We have consent on the government side and we have the consent of the NDP. Do we have the consent of the Official Opposition?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not prepared to give that consent right now. I wish to consult with my colleagues briefly and report back to the government House Leader or the deputy government House Leader. But, at the present time, I am not willing to provide that consent without any form of prior discussions having taken place.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the consultations.

I have another point of order. We are about to resume debate on Bill C–69. Now that the government House leader is here, I would like to bring to his attention Standing Order 113(1) which reads:

> Without anticipating the decision of the House, within five sitting days after the commencement of debate on second reading of a bill which is to be referred to a legislative committee, the Striking Committee shall meet to prepare, and shall report not later than the following Thursday, a list of members of such a legislative committee—

• (1620)

Mr. Speaker, as you well know 11 sitting days have elapsed since the commencement of debate on Bill C–69. That is more than twice the maximum time allowed under this Standing Order. The question to the government House Leader is this. Why has appropriate action not been taken since the debate on Bill C–69 commenced some days ago?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, let me say, first, in terms of the question of extending the hours, the offer still stands.

In terms of the second question, I will have to look into it. Presumably it had something to do with the break and other preoccupations, but I will look into the matter and get back to the hon. member.

This is of course a finance bill. As has been the habit concerning all bills coming out of budgets and so on, we have been sending them to the Standing Committee on Finance which, of course, would be the most expeditious way to proceed.

If there is unanimous consent of the House at this point, we can deal with the matter and have the bill referred to the Standing Committee on Finance which is set up and experienced. The appropriate members from each party are members of it. It can be dealt with in a most expeditious fashion by that committee.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, first, that is not a good excuse for the government not doing what it was required to do under the Standing Orders. I would encourage the government House leader to be a bit more attentive to what is expected of the government in terms of dealing with legislation. If the government wants to expedite legislation, the least it can do is follow the Standing Orders and do what is required.

The request which has come is this: Will we be prepared to send this bill to the Standing Committee on Finance? Perhaps I will use this occasion to make the following point, since I notice that my friend, the chairman of that committee, is present.

Members of the New Democratic Party argued long and hard that we felt that what had transpired in the Standing Committee on Finance was unacceptable. It was not the way in which a committee should be conducted. I think I said at that time that we would not be inclined to refer legislation that was destined by our Standing Orders to a legislative committee to go to the standing committee.

That situation still stands. I understand that nothing has changed. Our concern in terms of the implications of those decisions remain and, consequently—

Mr. Speaker: I would like to respond to the hon. member, and I will hear the hon. House leader in a moment.

What he says may very well be, but it is really not a matter to raise here in front of the Speaker. I cannot become involved in that. I know the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party would want to conduct his discussions on that subject with the hon. House leader and others.

I will now hear the hon. House Leader.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate that Standing Order 113, which talks about setting up a legislative committee, states as well: "—the Striking Committee shall meet—". I have not seen a letter from the New Democratic members of the Striking Committee asking that this committee meet. If it is in my files, I will get to it and make sure that the chairman is aware of it so that this committee can, in fact, meet.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I misunderstood that it was up to the New Democratic Party to provide all of the leadership in terms of moving legislation through the House of Commons. I made the error of expecting the government to take some initiative in terms of providing leadership. I will not make that mistake again.

Mr. Speaker: Whether there is consent or not, I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 16 minutes.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On March 27, 1990, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands rose on a point of order to question the procedural acceptability of attaching a royal recommendation to the government's expenditures restraint bill, Bill C-69. The hon. member delivered a well researched argument, citing several precedents and making references to learned parliamentary authorities.

The hon. members for Kamloops and Gloucester, as well as the Minister of State for Finance, also made contributions on this issue.

That exchange assisted the Chairman in considering this complex issue which relates to a very fundamental element of our parliamentary system of government—the financial initiative of the Crown.

To many of our viewing audience, and indeed many of the hon. members of the House, the subject matter of the financial initiative of the Crown sounds like an extremely Byzantine and hopelessly complicated matter. However, if you will bear with me for a few moments, the Chairman will attempt to set out the issue in straightforward terms because it does have a serious impact on how the House conducts its business.

I wish to begin this explanation by quoting from page 247 of the Annotated Standing Orders which reads:

> In our system of parliamentary government, the Sovereign, as represented by the Governor General, and acting on the advice of His or Her responsible ministers,—

—that is, the Cabinet—

> —is charged with the management of all revenues of the State and the payment of all public expenditures. The appropriation—

—that is, the spending—

> —of money for these payments has to be first recommended by the Governor General to the House (known as a Royal Recommendation) and then approved by Parliament.

In other words, before the House can introduce any bill which would result in an expense to the Treasury, it must obtain a statement from the Government General indicating that he or she recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue as set out in the bill. This is what is known as the royal recommendation.

[Translation]

This requirement for a royal recommendation is enshrined in our constitution. As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands explained, section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867 absolutely requires that a royal message of recommendation be obtained for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or any tax prior to the adoption of a bill.

[English]

Prior to the significant changes in our Standing Orders relating to financial procedures, which occurred in 1968, a bill such as Bill C-69 would have been preceded by a motion adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

Under this procedure, it was fairly easy to ascertain whether any amendment proposed to the bill was in order or not because it had to comply with the detailed motion adopted in Committee of the Whole. That is a committee of the whole House with all members who are interested in that particular matter in attendance. It is not a committee meeting outside the Chamber.

However, the major complaint about this procedure was that it was too lengthy. It involved a debate to go into Committee of the Whole, another debate in committee on the motion, called the resolution stage, and further debates on the various stages of the bill.

In December, 1968, this procedure was changed. The resolution stage in Committee of the Whole was eliminated, as was the Committee of Supply and the Committee of Ways and Means. The royal recommendation was given to the House thereafter simply as a printed notice, pursuant to Standing Order 79(2), which reads as follows:

> The message and recommendation of the Governor General in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

[Translation]

For several years following the changes, the form of the royal recommendation remained a detailed expression of the spending authority given by the Crown. There were occasions when hon. members complained about the scope and adequacy of the royal recommendation, or that it was poorly drafted.

This prompted Speaker Lamoureux to make the following comment on November 2, 1970 at page 782 of Hansard:

> I have very often felt it should not be necessary that our recommendations should attempt to go into all details of the bill because we are bound to get into difficulties. We want to know whether His Excellency thinks this is a bill with which we can proceed. If he tells us that in three words, we should take his word for it.

[English]

By 1976, the wording of the royal recommendation had changed. Bills introduced in the House from this point on bore a brief and abbreviated recommendation such as the following: "His or Her Excellency, the Governor General, recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances in the manner and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled—" and then the name of the particular bill would follow. Under these conditions, the bill itself must now be used to determine the amount of the charge, the objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications set by the royal recommendation.

At first glance, one might think one could easily discern whether any new charge is placed on the Treasury. If a rate is increased, then it would appear to be obvious that an additional charge is placed on the Treasury and a royal recommendation must be obtained.

According to citation 540 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, however, the amount of the charge is not the only consideration. It states:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of the charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown not only if it increases the amount but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

• (1630)

[Translation]

As Beauchesne explains, there are instances where the objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications may be affected in such a manner as to involve financial implications. For instance, if a program is extended to cover an additional period of time or if the parameters of a program are broadened to cover more applicants, then a royal recommendation is necessary.

[English]

With this background having been explained, I would like to return now to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. In his presentation the hon. member suggests that the government expenditures restraint bill reduces government spending. It does not involve any new charge on the Treasury and, therefore, requires no royal recommendation. Furthermore, he suggested these recommendations are included in bills "in an attempt by the government to stifle amendment by members of the opposition, amendments which members—are entitled to put".

[Translation]

In reply, the Hon. Minister of State for Finance explained that the royal recommendation was obtained for this bill on the advice of the Office of the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel because some provisions in the bill widened existing conditions. He referred in particular to clause 2.

The Government Expenditures Restraint Bill is an extremely complex piece of legislation. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands himself described the bill as containing "all kinds of formulae that I do not understand". The Chair has a great deal of sympathy for all hon. members on both sides of the House who attempt to glean some understanding from bills of this kind.

[English]

A review of clause 2 shows a formula for calculating limits on the 1991 contributions under the Canada Assistance Plan. Clause 5 provides for an escalator formula in the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

There is no doubt in the Chairman's mind that the proposals in Bill C–69, which is an amending bill, will change the conditions and qualifications that were attached to the original legislation recommended by the Governor General. The result from the calculation of any of the formulae may or may not cost the Treasury less money but the manner and the elements used to arrive at such results are certainly new.

The Chairman would therefore conclude that a royal recommendation was appropriate.

As for the hon. member's concern that the presence of a royal recommendation might restrict the opportunities for amendment, it is my view that this should not preclude any hon. members from moving amendments to clauses of the bill at committee and report stages subject to our normal rules and practices. In committee, hon. members can propose amendments to any clauses. If any amendment is thought to be irregular, there is normally opportunity for procedural debate, followed by a decision of the chairman.

Furthermore, report stage provides another opportunity to put forward amendments. As hon. members know, there are normally consultations on the selection of amendments as well as on the groupings for debate and division. Any proposed amendment will, however, be subject to our practice that it cannot affect the objects, purposes, conditions or qualifications of the financial initiative.

Speaker's Ruling

I wish to thank the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for raising this issue and providing the Chairman with an opportunity to clarify our practice with regard to the royal recommendation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before resuming debate, I wish to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex—Agriculture; the hon. member for South West Nova—Fisheries; the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby—Women's Centres.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, before the debate on Bill C-69 adjourned on March 27, I was in the process of discussing the impact of the Expenditures Restraint Act. I suggest that after the minister's tabling today we should perhaps call it the "Consumers' Restraint Act".

When I was discussing Bill C-69 I discussed the fact that social assistance services cannot now meet the demands of low income Canadians and their families. We have witnessed a rise in the number of Canadian families forced to go to food banks. Forty per cent of all food bank users are children. Not your children, not my children, but Canadian children are forced regularly to the food banks for their very subsistence.

This government has done nothing to help low-income Canadians and has, in fact, abandoned its responsibility to ensure that social assistance programs are available to all of those in need.

When I last spoke, I spoke about the fact that welfare rates are not adequate in my home province of British Columbia. I also mentioned that, in my view, this is because the British Columbia government is strangling the welfare system and leaving a province that should have a normal economy in the enviable position of being a have province.

Indeed, just this week, the province brought down a budget which purported to be a balanced budget but, in fact, was another smoke and mirrors budgets which is so often the case in British Columbia.

On March 27 I read into the record statistics from a 1989 report from the Social Planning and Research Council of British Columbia. Those statistics outlined that the shortfall for welfare recipients in British Columbia ranges from 83 per cent for a single male person to 44 per cent for a single mother with one child. One example is that a single mother with two teenaged children would find a shortfall of 66 per cent. She receives $986 but needs $1,633. That is a hypothetical example, but you could couple that with the housing crisis, not just in British Columbia but across the country.

Life for a social service recipient in any province in this country is extremely difficult. The Canada Assistance Plan represents the principle that regardless of where one lives in Canada, whether it is on Vancouver Island, the lower mainland, the prairie provinces, eastern Canada or northern Canada, one should be eligible to receive support payments that will meet the basic needs. In fact, the proposal under Bill C-69, the capping of the Canada Assistance Program in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, denies that basic philosophy and sends us down a different path for the future with regard to support for Canadians.

The ceiling on CAP expenditures is a transfer of responsibility from the federal to the provincial government. That will reduce the federal government's ability to ensure equal treatment in the delivery of social services. A cap on the Canada Assistance Plan means fewer and reduced services in those provinces in which the cap is applied.

A cap on the Canada Assistance Plan means less flexibility for the provinces in the delivery of service as no new moneys will be available. This measure could cut short Ontario's plan, for example, to redesign its social services. There will be fewer services at a time when cuts in the unemployment insurance program will force more people on to the welfare rolls. Less money will mean lower relative welfare rates and a greater reliance on food banks and other charitable sources.

Let us not forget the clawback on family allowance and old age pensions that has already been put forward by this government in Bill C-28.

This is the same kind of pulling away from a national commitment, in this case to seniors and again to mothers and children. Those who will bear the brunt of these measures are those who are already being squeezed by the provincial governments, particularly in Ontario by cuts to food banks, in Alberta by the Alberta budget of 1990 and in British Columbia by the low welfare rates, the health care expenditure cut-backs and rising tuition fees.

If we take a look at the throne speech and the 1990-91 budget that has just come down in British Columbia, again we will see further squeezing on those who were dependent upon the government. Is this the kind of federal-provincial co-operation that we can continue to expect from this government, or is there a genuine and serious commitment to co-operation that will ensure that which every Canadian has the right to expect, an equitable and basic income?

I will only speak briefly to the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program Act, which is also amended in Bill C-69, because I think there are members from Alberta who will be speaking at great length on this matter. The value of the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program Act to Alberta is approximately $47.3 million. Of the total cut, about 30 per cent is in the oil and gas industry, 90 per cent of which would be accounted for in Alberta.

Then there is OSLO, Madam Speaker. The same government that is willing to give an over $1 billion, absolutely free, no strings attached grant to Hibernia has decided to axe OSLO. That is another $650 million right out of the pockets of Albertans.

I would now like to address clause 5 of this bill, the cap on the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. This is the third attack by this government on the EPF. In 1986 the EPF formula was adjusted downward by 2 per cent, further eroding the funding base for the provinces in the face of inflation. In 1989, the formula was again adjusted downward by a further 1 per cent. It must be noted that these cuts affect all provinces. Now we see the three provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario facing a further limit on transfers of 5 per cent. This amounts to a substantial reduction in transfers in real terms to those provinces.

The EPF is the largest social program financed by the federal government. The money is transferred to the provinces to pay for hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education. This bill effectively freezes transfers to the three provinces given an inflation rate of 5 per cent. The cumulative effect of the past cuts and the proposed freeze are phenomenal. For Alberta it means a loss of $999.4 million. For Ontario it means a loss of $3.9 billion, and for British Columiba it means a loss of $1.3 billion over the next five years. When federal money is cut the provinces have only two choices— raise taxes or cut services. Well, the provincial government of British Columbia has just announced in its budget that it will not be increasing taxes, so the alternative is to cut services.

We will see increasing pressure to create a two-tiered health care system such as the recent proposal that came out in Alberta where basic health care is insured but "extras" such as drug plans, physiotherapy and chiropractic care are not.

In education, where the percentage of federal funding is even higher, 65 per cent of provincial expenditure on higher education is provided by federal money. These cuts pose a direct threat to both the quality of and accessibility to universities and colleges. At a time when our whole society is moving ahead and advancing dramatically in this new age of technology, this new age of information, our children are having a harder and harder time going to university because of higher tuition rates. The universities are having a harder and harder time keeping up to the changing technology, the changing information and the increasing numbers of students who are coming to their doors.

These cuts must be considered in light of the government's other attacks on regional subsidies such as VIA, the fisheries, agriculture and unemployment insurance, and also in light of the continental restructuring taking place since free trade. The smaller the federal presence in these programs, the greater the pressure to privatize these services. This must be recognized as a deliberate side effect of cuts to provincial transfers.

The National Federation of Nurses Union have said:

> It is our belief that Canada's health care system is under siege. Every time we look around someone else is taking a swipe at health care in this country.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers comment:

> Higher education is in fact an investment as much as an expenditure. The finance minister talked in his budget about the effects on future generations. The effect of failing to compete with the Americans, the Japanese and many European countries in educational investment will be to ensure a future for our youth as hamburger flippers rather than as meaningful participants in the technological era that is upon us.

That was a response to the 1989 Budget by Professor Peter King. One would wonder how many hamburger flippers Canada can afford to turn out.

The theme of Bill C-69 and of the other legislation that has been introduced by this government in the area of social services, is one of cruelty and hypocrisy. There is Liberal hypocrisy as well because under 6 and 5 in 1977 the requirement that health and post secondary funding had to be spent on health and post secondary education was abandoned.

In British Columbia, in particular, the popular belief and oft-cited allegation is that the money is spent not on services and education but in fact on pavement.

When the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley asked the Secretary of State if they had studied this problem and to tell us that this was not the case, the reply was: "You will have to trust us". The member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley has a private member's bill calling for a return to the pre-1977 era when we had accountability for the expenditure of these funds. We would hope that members opposite, on the government side of the House, and the Liberals, would support this initiative.

Women will be hurt by this freeze. Yet again women are caught in the squeeze and the freeze when it comes to funding. It will mean a loss of jobs for women who are the majority of health care workers.

When looking at the whole picture of how this government handles money there are a couple of figures that I have trouble getting out of my mind. One is $1,721,170. That is the amount of the smallest of three government grants given to Noranda in 1988. Noranda is the giant natural resources holding company. In 1988, it made $603 million in profits. It also deferred $233 million in taxes that it will probably never pay, and it does not even have to pay interest on those deferred taxes. The $1,721,170 is more than the $1.6 million cut from 80 women's centres across Canada. It is as much as many programs in Canada need to survive. That $1,700 million would go a long way in any province where welfare cuts are happening because of the capping of the federal program.

The Prime Minister stated during the 1988 election campaign that the free trade agreement fully protects and preserves all of our existing social programs and places no restrictions whatsoever on our ability to improve and expand upon them.

We have seen, over the mandate of this Parliament, one after another of our social programs attacked and cut back. I am waiting, as I am sure every member on this side of the House is waiting, to see one improvement and one expansion of social programs.

In November of 1988, the Prime Minister said: "Why would I do anything other than ensure that my mother and all the mothers of this country get the programs to which they are entitled and richly deserve? The simple unvarnished truth is that medicare, pensions and social programs are not at risk". That from the mouth of the Prime Minister in 1988.

Well my mother is not impressed. Many mothers in Canada are not impressed, particularly women who are elderly and mothers of young children. Yet, we have seen clawbacks to the old age pension and child allowance. We have seen a cap on the Canada Assistance Program as represented in this bill. We have also seen the UI cuts.

Mr. McDermid: Your mother is making $80,000 a year then.

Ms. Langan: My mother is not making $80,000 a year. My mother is a pensioner.

Mr. McDermid: Well then she's not caught in the clawback.

Ms. Langan: I have obviously touched a nerve on the government side of the House and have awakened a bunch of members who were busily mumbling in their beards up until now. I am telling you that there is not a mother in this country, possibly with the exception of the Prime Minister's mother, who is impressed by the agenda of this government.

You cannot even get a handle on it. You cannot go out and say, "this is the government's agenda". It is so insidious.

Bill C-69 is so bad that I would like to move the following amendment:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:
>
> Bill C-69, an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME FOR CONSIDERATION AT THE SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-69

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have two notices to give to you and to the House.

I stress that it was not possible to reach an agreement pursuant to Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2) regarding allocation of time for second reading of Bill C-69, the Government Expenditures Restraint Act.

Pursuant to Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days, or one day, for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the second reading stage of the above-mentioned bill.

NOTICE OF MOTION PURSUANT TO S. O. 57

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Also, Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 57, I give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming the debate on the motion by the Minister of Finance for second reading and referral to a legislative committee of Bill C-69, the Government Expenditures Restraint Act, and any amendments thereon, I shall move a motion that the debate not be further adjourned.

Of course, Madam Speaker, if agreement is reached with the opposition parties, we will review the procedure.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-69, an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I am here to speak today to Bill C-69, a bill implementing four measures for budget restrictions announced in the February, 1990, Budget. I am going to repeat them so that we can be very clear on exactly what we are debating here today.

The first one freezes federal transfer payments to the provinces under Established Programs Financing. It freezes transfer payments for post-secondary education and health care.

The second one limits the increase of federal transfer payments to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta under the Canada Assistance Plan, which affects social programs.

The third one eliminates the Canada Exploration Incentive Program, which affects mining, gas and oil industries.

The fourth one freezes public utilities income tax transfers over the next two years.

At first glance this might seem to be innocuous language and taxpayers might say that since they are not getting an increase in taxes it may not be so bad. But the people of Canada are very well informed and they are very much aware that a cutback in transfers will probably translate into increased taxes.

I was reading the March 1990 issue of Policy Options. In an article in that publication Grattan Gray says:

> The government camouflages regressive changes to trick Canadians into believing that tax increases are tax cuts and that benefit cuts are increases.
