pension commission was rather restrictive. We all know—and we need not hide this knowledge—that the initial handling of veterans pensions was rather difficult. Fortunately there has been a change of philosophy and a change of mentality so that veterans now get a better break. The condition is not quite the same with veterans of world war II. Their documentation is in much better shape and they receive much better medical examinations.

For instance, upon coming out of prisoner of war camp I underwent four days of extensive medical examination, and within three months I went through another three days of examination prior to discharge. So there is plenty on record in so far as I am concerned. I am sure that is the experience of most men who came out of the forces after world war II. It is to the credit of the Department of National Defence, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the authorities that this was done. I am sure it is going to save a great deal of trouble in the future.

I wish to come back to the position of these elderly veterans of world war I, and particularly this matter of the 50 per cent disability and whether the widow is entitled to a continuing pension. If her husband did not receive a 50 per cent disability pension, or unless he dies of wounds directly attributable to his war service she is not entitled to any pension. This has caused a great deal of hardship and I am sure there are many, many cases where a little more humane, a little more intelligent interpretation of the facts and a little more generous interpretation of the benefit of the doubt clause would relieve a great deal of this hardship. After all, the alternative for a great many of these people is to become a charge on the state somewhere along the line. Why not bring them under their proper category here under veterans affairs? The cost all comes out of the same pocket eventually, that of the taxpayer.

There is only one thing further I wish to say in this connection. In many cases when the decision of the pension commission is anounced that the disability is not attributable to war service, or that the condition is not aggravated by war service, there has been a long lapse of time. I would put it to the members of this house that in world war II particularly there were large numbers of prisoners of war. I know from personal experience that many of my fellow prisoners of war are now developing symptoms of maladies which are attributable to the time they spent as prisoners of war. They were told by doctors that this might happen. I remember in my own case I was told I was perfectly all right, but that perhaps 15 or 20 years hence something might develop.

I would underline this particular point. That in the case of former prisoners of war or men who have undergone rather rigorous experiences where the after-effects may be delayed, a good, hard look should be given to their present circumstances, and their conditions should be interpreted in the light of those circumstances.

As a member of the Montgomery branch No. 24 of the Canadian Legion, which lays claim to the largest membership of any Canadian Legion branch in Canada, it is my great pleasure to address the members of this house this afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am rising simply because of a statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo, who I am sure had no intention of misrepresenting the record when he said there had been no change since 1952 in the scale of pensions until this government came into power. Of course, the hon. gentleman overlooked the change that was made and announced in Mr. Harris' budget in 1957. I feel, therefore, that in order to have the record straight I should put on Hansard the paragraph from Mr. Harris' budget speech. This will be found in Hansard for May 14, 1957, at page 2221. The then minister of finance said:

> We propose to increase the scales of payments under the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act. In brief, the basic monthly scale for total disability under the Pension Act will be increased from $125 to $150, or if married from $170 to $200. The widow's pension will be raised from $100 to $115. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act the increase in the married rate will be from $108 to $120 a month. The increased payments will be as from July 1 and the total cost will be about $25 million in a full year and $19 million in this fiscal year.

I think it is all the more important to put this on the record as it has been the systematic policy of the propagandists of the present government to make comparisons between what happened in the last full fiscal year when the Liberals were in office with what has happened since, so that they can by that devious method lay claim to all the changes that were made in that budget of 1957 which, if added together, will be found to be a more substantial increase in social security in that one budget than has been made ever since by the present government.

An hon. Member: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman last evening, and we on this side of the house have taken very little of the time of the committee. It does seem to me I should be allowed to make this statement without interruption, because we have listened to one member after another getting up in this committee and saying what a tremendous amount has been done by the present government.

I have never failed to give the present government credit for the few achievements it has accomplished, but I do deplore and object to this utter misrepresentation of the record—

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: —and to the fact—

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I thought we were discussing a resolution, and not the records of either the past or the present government.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. There has been a certain leniency here because I felt the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was making a correction, as to what he thought had been said incorrectly before. However, I would ask the hon. member not to develop this into a full speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I will certainly not go beyond the scope of the debate as it has taken place up to now and I promise you that I will make no eulogies of former ministers or the present minister, or introduce any of the other extraneous things that have been introduced in practically every speech today.

I am dealing with a statement that was made by an hon. member, and I think by some other hon. members. I shall in a very few minutes deal with this statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo, a statement that was not correct, and I am sure he did not mean to make a statement that was not correct.

Very substantial changes were made to the Pension Act and other veterans' legislation in 1957 by the former administration, and this pretence that there were no changes should not be allowed to continue.

Mr. Matthews: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would like at this time to thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. It is quite interesting to see the change in this attitude—he is quite worried now—from what it was when he was occupying a bench on the other side of the house.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member would please tell me what is his point of order.

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a very short time to say a few words on this resolution. I wish to congratulate the minister on bringing this matter to this stage at the present time.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

I have received many letters and some resolutions, and there were a great many discussions last year in my constituency concerning this matter. The same activity is again evident this year and Canadian Legion members are waiting with anticipation and are hoping that something of value will come out of this session. I am informed that 30 per cent of all Canada's war veterans allowance recipients live in British Columbia, and many of those are in the lower Fraser Valley and on the coast. There are six very active Legion branches in the Fraser valley, and we have been able to be of some assistance to quite a few members. The members are delighted that this act is to be amended and, like many others, wait with anticipation to see what these amendments will bring forth. I, too, am very much in favour of having an amendment made to the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Mr. Webb: I, too, would like to say a few words at this time on behalf of the veterans of Canada. In the riding I have the honour to represent there are 16 branches of the Canadian Legion. It has been my privilege on many occasions to visit meetings of these branches and attend their social gatherings, and may I say right now that there is no finer group of Canadians today than the members of the Canadian Legion. I have had heart to heart talks with many of these men and I know that if another war were to start tomorrow these same men would be willing to defend their country and loved ones again.

I cannot stress too strongly the importance of this measure. As has been stated already in this committee, I am sure that all the Canadian people will be proud to share their portion of the cost of this legislation.

May I now turn to another urgent question and one which I think merits immediate consideration, namely the need to give re-boards to many of our Canadian veterans? I know many veterans who are definitely entitled to a pension but who, because of previous decisions and red tape which is apparently insurmountable, have been unable to qualify. As a result, they have been deprived of justice. I am certain that consideration of this question is uppermost in the mind of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, a man who can and will speak from authority becauses of his own personal experience.

The Chairman: Shall the motion carry? The Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Churchill: There may be someone else who would like to speak. If so, I will give the floor to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister does not close the debate.

Mr. Churchill: I was hoping that perhaps I might, that is all.

(Translation):

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to associate myself with previous speakers in commending the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) for introducing this resolution to increase the pensions paid to disabled veterans and their dependents.

A great many veterans in the house have taken an active part in this discussion. I am proud of their stand, because they have really shown the interest they take in their former comrades at arms.

In my riding of Richmond-Wolfe there are four branches of the Canadian Legion; they are very active and look with particular care after the interests of our veterans. If one of them is in a plight, the local Legion branch hastens to his help and finds the necessary means of alleviating his sufferings or of helping him financially.

At this point, I should like to make a suggestion. Once this bill is passed by the house, there will be a splendid opportunity of directly informing veterans who live far from any branch of the Canadian Legion of the benefits which this government grants to those who fought overseas to save this Canada of ours from the horrors of war.

Mr. Chairman, once again, I congratulate the minister and all those who have taken part in the debate on this resolution.

(Text):

Mr. Churchill: I shall try to make my remarks somewhat brief, but I should like to thank those hon. members who have taken part in the debate so far. They have numbered, I think, 48; a clear indication to the veterans of Canada that their interests are being well represented here in parliament on both sides of the house. I thank those hon. members who have been very kind in their remarks in so far as I myself am concerned, and I am thankful that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is not going to eulogise me, because that is one risk I do not want to run in life.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might do it on another occasion.

Mr. Churchill: There has been general acceptance of this resolution. The committee has expressed itself in favour of increases being made in pensions for disabled veterans and of certain other alterations being made to the act. Details in this respect will be before us shortly, I hope. The debate, as it has proceeded, and the many cases which have been cited, have shown that the problem of veterans is a continuing one.

We still have a few survivors of the South African war. There are the veterans of the first world war, the veterans of the second world war and the veterans of the Korean war. Then, of course, there are those who have served or are serving in various posts throughout the world either under NATO or for the United Nations and who, though not necessarily engaged in conflict, are running certain risks with regard to health. Then, again, we must not forget those who suffer injury or disablement in the course of their regular duties in the armed forces. These eventually end up within the scope of this particular act in some instances because of the dangerous nature of the occupations in which they are engaged. Thus we have a continuing problem which must be faced and met by parliament, and which has been met by parliament over the years.

At the same time we have to recognize that the problems which continually arise are not easily solved. Example after example has been given to us in the course of the last two days of difficult, marginal cases where in the opinion of the hon. member speaking something further should have been done. So although the Pension Act has been in existence for a long time and although about 40 years of experience has been acquired with regard to dealing with veterans, in the year 1961 we are nevertheless still made aware of the problems of veterans.

We have not reached final solution with regard to some of these matters. I think it is commendable that so many members have taken an interest in this piece of legislation. It is commendable that the Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations have presented briefs to whichever government was in power, year after year, bringing to the attention of the government the problems of veterans and suggestions as to solving those problems.

The veterans' contribution, either through members here in the House of Commons, or through organizations across the country, has been of substantial assistance to our comrades in arms who suffered more than most of us during the course of their service overseas. We have a continuing obligation to them, which we can fulfil in part through our activity here in the House of Commons and through amending legislation where that appears to be necessary.

Time will not permit me, Mr. Chairman, to deal with some of the particular problems which were raised by many who spoke. The problem raised by the members from Newfoundland, although it perhaps should have been decided long before this, is something that is rather new to me; it has come to my attention within the last few months and I have been looking into it. The standing committee on veterans affairs should look at this problem again this session.

The same thing applies to war veterans allowances. Although many members mentioned that that act is not under consideration at this moment, there is a danger of confusing people's minds in a discussion of the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Pension Act. Nevertheless, again the standing committee on veterans affairs can consider it and make suggestions. I will go this far and say that already commencing in November, I have instituted a study of the War Veterans Allowance Act to see what is required in the way of amendments thereto and to consider how quickly those amendments might be undertaken. I can make no promises; I am making no promises at this time. I am indicating that I have the matter under advisement and have instituted the necessary study, and I am making a study myself of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

With regard to other problems of veterans that were mentioned, such as merchant seamen, gallantry awards, South African veterans and so on, those are problems which we cannot discuss adequately when we are dealing with amendments to the Pension Act, but the standing committee on veterans affairs can look at these matters and bring them to the attention of myself and of the house. There will be another opportunity, of course, and that is when the estimates of the Departmet of Veterans Affairs are before the committee.

There is one subject that was touched upon by most of the members who spoke in the course of the debate, and that is the application of the benefit of the doubt clause in the Pension Act. They did this, as I understand it, not in criticism of the pension commission, which is held in high regard by members of parliament. Over the years the pension commission and its predecessor, the board of pension commissioners, performed a very valuable service and an extremely arduous one in assessing the cases that came before them. I do not think anyone is critical in a serious way of the pension commission.

On the other hand, the members, as I assess what they have been saying during the last two days, think that the pension commission perhaps has not interpreted the benefit of the doubt clause in the way in which people have expected it to be interpreted. I think it has been said on many occasions that the benefit of the doubt clause has entered into the consideration of the pension commissioners whenever they have had a case before them; but this is an old and continuing problem, and I hope that we can look at it again this year in the standing committee on veterans affairs and in consultation with the pension commission.

As hon. members have rightly pointed out, the commission is an independent body, and properly so. It derives its authority from parliament. It is not subject to the influence of the minister or of any member and makes its own decision and its own interpretation of the act which grants it authority. That being so, our job here as members of the House of Commons is to give assistance to the pension commission, either by amendment of the act under which they operate or by indicating to them the purpose and intent of parliament, as we understand it, with regard to their interpretation of the act. They may not accept our advice, but, on the other hand, I think it would not hurt for them to be aware of the understanding that members of parliament have with regard to this particular clause, clause 70, of the Pension Act. The clause has a long history. I have looked into that history. In 1930 a special committee sat on the problems of pensions and returned soldiers' problems and reported in 1930. The chairman of that committee was the Hon. C. G. Power. It was as a result of that committee's investigation that the benefit of the doubt clause was incorporated in the statutes. When the committee submitted its report, and I am quoting now from page 420 of the report of the special committee on pensions and returned soldiers' problems, it stated as follows:

> In addition to the foregoing questions of organization and procedure the committee proposes the enactment of a general rule governing the commission, the pension tribunal and the appeal court, whereby all reasonable inferences are to be drawn in favour of the applicant, who is to be given the benefit of the doubt, the rules stating that the applicant is to be relieved from the obligation of giving conclusive evidence in favour of his right, an obligation which it is in many cases quite impossible for him to discharge.

Before reaching this conclusion the committee heard from many eminent witnesses. Some of the examples that we have heard in the house today are similar to the examples given 31 years ago by people who appeared before that committee. General Sir Arthur Currie, who was then living, gave an example of a signaller, and I quote:

> He was 37 years of age, big, strong and in perfect physical condition.

That is when he enlisted. General Currie then went on to describe the conditions under which he served in France, as follows:

> Day and night, rain or shine, he must get out and keep the lines repaired. It is not a case of eight or 10 hours a day, it is a case of 24 hours a day, and for days on end, always working in the battle area. His shelter at the best of times is nothing more than a thin sheet of corrugated iron or an old piece of tarpaulin; it may be nothing more than a shell hole in the broken and poisoned earth. Yet that man must be out all the time in all kinds of weather, wet to the skin, cold, lousy. If he does occupy a rude dug-out the chances are he has rats for companions. He is always in the battle area, shelled and bombed. Do you mean to tell me that those conditions will not affect adversely a man's health?

Then he went on to give the subsequent history of this chap who suffered certain pains and extreme nervousness and was considered to have sciatica for which he received a pension. Subsequently his case was looked at again and was diagnosed as spinal arthritis for which no permanent cure could be effected. In those bad days the board had to reach the conclusion that they could not recognize spinal arthritis as a pensionable disability, so the man lost his pension for sciatica and received nothing at all. The benefit of the doubt clause was incorporated into the act in order to remove that type of difficulty.

The second case, and the only other one I will give, was recalled to my mind by the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West who mentioned prisoners of war. There was an instance given in 1930 of a man who had enlisted at the age of 35. In front of Regina trench down on the Somme he received three machine gun bullets in the right leg, fracturing the tibia, and he also received one in the right shoulder. He lay in a shell hole under terrible conditions for four days. The only thing he had to drink was poisoned water in the shell hole. There were two other men in the shell hole with him and one died and the other went mad. This man was hit on Sunday and taken prisoner on the following Thursday. He was treated in Germany, had six operations, was repatriated through Switzerland and had one operation there and one in England. He was returned as a stretcher case to Canada and discharged in 1919 with a 15 per cent pension for the wound in his leg. During his time as a prisoner he developed a stomach condition. No record is available of his medical history while he was a prisoner of war. It is not available to anyone. He developed a stroke. It was decided by the federal appeal board that it was hemiplegia from which he suffered and they gave their orders as follows:

After consideration of the evidence and record the board finds that cerebral hemorrhage resulting in hemiplegia is not attributed to military service. The appeal is disallowed.

These are two examples from that year. Members today have given other examples from the present time. The benefit of the doubt clause was incorporated into the act to make provision for men who could not provide documentary evidence as to the hazards they underwent when they were overseas, whether in the first war or the second, and many men in the second world war suffered just as grievously as men in the first war and suffered from exposure in just the same way. In 1930 that clause was introduced into the act and subsequently it has been amended on three occasions. It will not take me very long to put on the record the four versions of the benefit of the doubt clause so that anyone looking at this debate in the future will have a ready reference. In the 1930 statutes of Canada the section read as follows:

73. Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant shall be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which shall mean that it shall not be necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall be entitled to draw and shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences in favour of the applicant.

In 1946 an amendment was made, the section was renumbered 63 and it read as follows:

63. Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant shall be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which shall mean that it shall not be necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall be entitled to draw and shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences and presumptions in favour of the applicant.

The change there was the addition of the words "and presumptions". In 1948 a further change was made, and section 63 of the 1948 statutes read as follows:

63. Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant shall be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which shall mean that it shall not be necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences and presumptions in favour of the applicant.

The change there was from "shall be entitled to draw" to "shall draw". Finally in 1952 another change was made. The section now is numbered 70 and it reads as follows:

70. Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant is entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which means that it is not necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences and presumptions in favour of the applicant.

The change there is the introduction of the words "is entitled to" instead of "shall be entitled to". I put these four versions on the record for the benefit of those who are interested in this problem to show the effort that has been made from 1930 to 1952 to amend the benefit of the doubt clause so that it will be more suitable in the circumstances in which the board of pension commissioners has to apply it. My judgment is that no matter how frequently we amend the clause the question will still be determined on the basis of interpretation, and that is precisely what General Currie said in 1930. That is how it is applied.

All that I can say further in regard to this matter is that from the number of members who have spoken about the benefit of the doubt clause and from the interest that has been shown in the application of that clause the pension commissioners may reasonably reach the conclusion that parliament is seriously interested in—what shall I say—a generous application of the benefit of the doubt clause. In the ten years that I have been here I have heard no complaint about the pension commission being overgenerous in granting money from the treasury to applicants for pension, and I think they have been very sound in that regard. We are not asking them to lower the barriers and let anybody in. Bona fide cases, as they have considered them in the past, should be the ones on which the board will finally adjudicate, but in these bona fide cases where men have actually served and have suffered from their service I think it is the opinion of parliament that the benefit of the doubt clause should apply.

As some members have said, it certainly should apply in the case of the older world war I veterans. Many of these men, because of an independence of character that cynical people do not sometimes recognize, have refused over the years to accept a pension or to report for pension purposes and now that they are in their 70's they are beginning to find that it might have been wiser to report for examination in days gone by.

A very close friend of mine who has since died comes to my mind. He was a 30 per cent pensioner and should have been an 80 per cent pensioner all his life but he never gave up during the course of his experience from 1917 until just two or three years ago. He was granted an 80 per cent pension when he finally appeared at an advanced age before a board of examiners. He was typical of many men who served overseas in the first world war, men who simply would not admit that they needed assistance from anyone. These older veterans of the first world war cannot produce documents. There were no filing cabinets available on the field of action during the first world war, and I think it is the feeling of the committee that those men who cannot produce evidence should have the benefit of the doubt. I say this, bearing in mind these two cases which were brought before the commission in 1930.

I argued this matter in the House of Commons in 1953, 1954 and before the estimates committee in 1955. I have argued at different times that the benefit of the doubt should be applied to first world war veterans who suffered from the effects of gas. Many men who suffered gas attacks in the first world war ended up in the hospital. Others got as far as the dressing station and were returned to their units, while still others did not report at all. Who is to say that years later the effects of this poison gas do not seriously destroy their physical functions? Medical opinion may say that there are no after effects of poison gas. Unless medical opinion will quite flatly state that, then I used to argue, and I would be inclined to argue now, that the pension commission should give the benefit of the doubt to a man who could show, through the action in which his regiment was engaged or through affidavits from his companions that he was subjected to the effects of poison gas.

This is just another example that relates to veterans of the first world war. As time goes on I think there will be less trouble with second world war veterans because the records have been much more adequately kept. The hon. member for Greenwood will recall that when he returned in 1918 or 1919, I suppose, like the rest of us, all he had to say was that he was A-1 and he could get on board ship. If he did not say he was A-1 he had to stay in England or France until further notice. This was the easy way, I think, of getting discharged in 1919. In 1946 it was not nearly as easy. You had to go through a very stiff medical board before you were released, so I think we will have less trouble in the future with the veterans of the second world war than we have had with those in the earlier conflict whose records were not complete.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman I would just say that the veterans of Canada should be pleased at the interest the committee has taken in this problem during the last two days. I believe the veterans of Canada are well represented here on both sides of the house. There has been a serious interest in this measure, and we have not engaged in more than just a mild flurry of political interchange. I would have loved to have taken part in one exchange that occurred a while ago, but I thought I would abstain and save it for some other occasion because we are not in a controversial field when we are dealing with veterans problems. I feel that all of us here, no matter what party we represent, have an interest in veterans. We recognize what they have done and the service that they have given to their country.

I feel it was a privilege to serve. This is not said very often by veterans, but now I am getting to an age where I think perhaps I can say some of these things. It is a privilege to serve. Many men who would have liked to have served were denied that privilege. I think veterans should recognize that fact and consider it a real privilege to have been physically fit and able to serve their country in time of distress. Nobody would think now of glorifying war or anything of that nature. We hope that our efforts during this twentieth century will result in permanent peace. At the same time we have to stand ready to cope with whatever perils may confront us in the future.

These men whom we have been considering during the last few days, the disability pensioners, the men who actually suffered, are the ones who have set the example for young Canada to follow. May we not forget them or their dependents during the course of their lives. They gave in the service of their country, and it is up to the country to play its part now. The Pension Act which we are amending will in part, and only in part, repay to our disability pensioners the debt that Canada owes them.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I am not seeking to prolong the debate. I merely rise to express my thanks to the minister for the statement he has just made. I am grateful to him for the attitude which he has displayed toward the veteran, but in particular I want to express my appreciation for the statement which he made with respect to the veterans of Newfoundland, the forestry veterans, and the special problems that we have brought before him during this debate.

At the same time, I should like to express my personal regret that at this resolution stage preceding the introduction of the bill the two members from Newfoundland who sit with the government have not intervened in support of the representations which were made. We hope that they will do so on another occasion.

Resolution reported, and concurred in.

Mr. Churchill thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-67, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

The Chairman: Citizenship and immigration, vote No. 47—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, not in any contentious spirit at all. I should like to make exactly the same suggestion as I made last year. I wonder if the minister would be agreeable to having the administration item stood over until the end of the consideration of her estimates, on the understanding that no general debate would be resumed on the various branches of the department under the departmental administration item. It seems to me that during the last two years this course has made for more orderly debate.

If I may go further, I would express a preference and our preference would be to start with item No. 51, the immigration branch. We feel the greater part of the debate will be on that item and that course will probably reduce the debate on the citizenship items.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am quite agreeable to that. However, I believe we got into a rather confusing situation last year, if my memory serves me well. We could not decide whether or not the departmental administration item should stand until the conclusion of the consideration of the Indian affairs branch. However, I would suggest that we start with items 51, 52, 53 and 54, then take items 48, 49 and 50 and then take item 47 because there is an administrative item also under Indian affairs branch. I would suggest that procedure if it meets with the approval of the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: That procedure would be quite agreeable to us.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we proceed as indicated by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Immigration branch—

51. Administration of the Immigration Act, $1,388,640.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Chairman, it is only eight months since the debate took place on my department's estimates for the fiscal year 1960-61. At that time I reviewed and explained in some detail the attitude and general policy of this government, so far as immigration is concerned. The report on my remarks at that time will be found commencing on page 4711 of Hansard for June 9, 1960. The outline of policy which I presented at that time is still valid and I do not think that I need to take the time of the committee by repeating now what I said on that occasion. I shall therefore limit my remarks to a few brief comments on the most significant developments in the immigration field during the period which has elapsed since we last discussed these estimates.

The final reports for 1960 show that the total of immigrants admitted to Canada during the calendar year was 104,111. This figure shows very little change from the previous year, 1959, when 106,928 immigrants came forward. During the discussion of estimates in June last I indicated that it was then my expectation that the numbers coming forward in 1960 would be slightly in excess of those for the previous year. On a month to month basis the actual number of immigrants coming forward during 1960 was slightly ahead of 1959 up to the end of September. From that point on the figures took a downward turn, owing in part to the prevalence of buoyant economic and employment conditions in the European countries from which we draw most of our immigrants; and also in part to the fact that many of the sponsors in Canada, faced with uncertainty as to their own employment situation in Canada during the winter months, were less inclined to press forward with their applications to bring forward their relatives from overseas. This situation is normal and understandable in view of the difficulty economic circumstances through which we are now passing in this country, contrasted with the usual economic and employment opportunities reported from so many of the countries of Europe.

Despite the over-all slight decrease in the total movement of immigrants to Canada, we experienced in 1960 in certain sectors small gains, which are gratifying and give encouragement for the future. There was a slight upturn during 1960 in the movements from the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Germany. Traditionally we look to the United Kingdom to supply a larger number of immigrants annually than we usually receive from any other country; and during 1960 the position of the United Kingdom was very largely, though not completely, restored to its accustomed position in first place among the countries of origin of our immigrant population. Actually the final totals for the year show that 20,853 British immigrants came to Canada in 1960 which was an increase of approximately 1,500 over 1959, whereas 21,308 Italian immigrants were admitted—they were the second group—with the Italian movement slipping past the British total by a small margin during the final month of 1960.

The most noteworthy decreases were in the movement of Italian and Chinese immigrants, the last mentioned decline being undoubtedly the result of a sharp falling off in the number of applications for admission, which in turn was probably a consequence of the investigation into illegal Chinese immigration, which was actively under way during most of 1960. Other small but encouraging increases took place in the movements from Austria, Finland, France, Portugal and Yugoslavia. With one or two exceptions, there is probably nothing particularly significant about these individual fluctuations, except to show that there is a continuing interest in the possibilities of continued emigration to Canada among the nationals of many countries, and that we continue to be in a position where we can encourage and stimulate suitable increases in these movements when economic and other circumstances justify.

I am sure that there will be general agreement with the proposition that Canada should continue to maintain its position over the years as a country which welcomes considerable numbers of suitable immigrants to its shores and I am personally satisfied that, even in the face of formidable economic difficulties, we have succeeded in maintaining our position in this regard during 1960.

I think it is important for us to keep in mind in this connection that, by maintaining a suitable flow of immigrants to Canada, we not only provide better economic opportunities for these immigrants themselves, but we also add to the economic productivity, the employment opportunities and the national wealth of Canada as a whole.

A great deal of emphasis has been placed in recent months on the question of employment and unemployment, and concern has been expressed that we should not develop a situation in Canada which through large scale immigration increases the difficulties of providing employment for those already in Canada. This is a legitimate concern but there are other aspects to this question which need to be taken into account if the situation is to be viewed in the proper perspective.

It is, for example, significant to note that of the 104,000 persons who came to Canada as immigrants in 1960 almost half were persons, chiefly wives and other dependants, who were not destined to the labour force. Over 8,000 of the 53,000 immigrants destined to the labour force were in the managerial and professional categories. Large numbers of the others were in the clerical, commercial, service and agricultural fields, with a sharp decline in the labourer classification, most of whom, of course, came forward as close relatives of persons already in Canada and not because of their selection on any occupational basis.

More significant still, we brought forward in 1960, 1,583 newcomers who established themselves in their own businesses and provided employment for 6,189 individuals. The value of the businesses established by these newcomers is known to be in excess of $18½ million and down payments were made in connection with these businesses in excess of $9½ million.

So far as agriculture is concerned, reports were received in 1960 of some 647 newcomers who had bought farms of their own, while 101 had rented agricultural land. Some 786 immigrant owners or operators became established in this manner and the total number of persons employed in these enterprises numbered 1,072. The value of the agricultural land involved amounted to $11.7 million and down payments on these purchases amounted to more than $4½ million.

From what I have just said, Mr. Chairman, it will be evident that the immigrants who have come to Canada continue to show the initiative, industry and enterprise which enlarge and increase the employment opportunities, productive capacities and national wealth of this country.

What I have said with respect to our activities in this field during 1960 is, of course, only a continuation of what has been the continuing objective in the field of immigration over a long period of years. For example, in the past ten years 6,000 businesses have been established and 5,400 farms purchased by post-war newcomers to Canada. The value of these farms and businesses amounts to $140 million. It is conservatively estimated that they have provided employment for 35,000 persons.

It is well known that most immigrants are willing to work hard and sacrifice much in order to establish themselves securely in Canada. This is borne out by figures which indicate that they paid $69 million, or almost half the value of their businesses and farms, in cash down payments. This would indicate that not only do some immigrants—for example, United States citizens—bring substantial savings with them to Canada but also that immigrants are hard savers.

There has been a very marked upswing in the number of immigrants establishing businesses in the past two or three years. Roughly one quarter of the businesses established during the last ten years were bought in 1960.

There are certain patterns emerging from the statistics for business and farm settlements. In the business field just over 40 per cent of the settlements have been in Ontario, 30 per cent in British Columbia and 20 per cent in Quebec. Germans have established the largest number of businesses, followed by Dutch, British and Italians. The average immigrant makes his purchase from three to six years after his arrival in Canada.

In agriculture just over 50 per cent of the immigrant farmers favoured Ontario. Next popular are British Columbia and Quebec. The average farmer spends five years working for someone else before buying his own property. Out of nearly 7,000 farms bought by immigrants over the last ten years, nearly 4,000 were in Ontario, just over 1,000 in British Columbia and 600 in Quebec. Dutch people bought two thirds of the farms and have brought experience, skill and new techniques to Canadian agriculture. The Canadian economy has been widened and strengthened by the influx of these new businessmen and farmers.

I should like now to make a brief reference to one of the special features of our activities in the immigration field during 1960, namely the special movements connected with world refugee year. During world refugee year, which officially ended on June 30, 1960, there was a most heartening response on the part of community groups, private and church organizations, and governments generally, to the special appeal launched under the leadership of the United Nations high commissioner for refugees. These efforts, many of them of a special nature, have continued throughout the period following the close of world refugee year, and the special facilities and arrangements made by the government through the immigration branch to encourage and foster this nation-wide response have been continued up to the present time and are being continued in suitable fashion.

During the 18 month period from the beginning of world refugee year to the end of 1960 more than 4,500 individuals were admitted to Canada under special refugee arrangements. The most notable feature of these arrangements was, of course, the special movements of tubercular refugees. The first of these movements, consisting of 100 selected t.b. cases, together with their dependents, entered Canada in the latter part of 1959 and the early part of 1960. A second movement, consisting of slightly more than 100 tubercular refugees and their dependents, came forward to Canada in the summer months of July and August.

Here I must pay tribute to the co-operation and help extended to the government by the various provincial governments and health departments throughout the country. These governments assumed the responsibility for the health and hospital care of the individuals brought forward and it is most reassuring to note that so far as the first two movements are concerned, well over two thirds of the t.b. refugees themselves had completed their active treatment and been discharged from hospital before the end of 1960. Only a relatively small number continued to require institutional care as of December 31 last.

In consequence of these most encouraging results the government has recently announced, with the co-operation and consent of the provinces concerned, that it is prepared to admit a third group of tubercular refugees, together with their dependents, under the special arrangements which were established for the previous movements. The selection of this third group is now under way and it is expected that the movement will have been completed before the end of March, 1961.

I should like finally to say a word about the Immigration Act itself. It will be recalled that the speech from the throne referred to the expectation that a revised Immigration Act would be laid before parliament for consideration. Inquiries have been made from time to time as to when a draft bill is likely to be brought down. No one is more concerned about this than I am, and every effort has been directed toward the achievement of the desired objective of a full and complete revision of the act; but I am afraid there is very little I can add at this time to what I have said on previous occasions in reply to questions about the timing of this matter.

It will be appreciated, I am sure, that the timing of the presentation of any draft bill for consideration depends on a great number of factors which I am not in a position to predict at the moment. Chief among these is the general timetable for the business of the house and the progress of the government's legislative program as a whole.

Representations and inquiries have also been received in recent months from a number of important national organizations, notably the Canadian Welfare Council, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Labour Congress. Some of the representations received urged that more time be taken to complete the revision of the legislation and to make it possible for them to undertake a more complete and thorough study of the issues involved.

In connection I should like to repeat the assurances which I gave on this matter during the discussion of our estimates at the last session. The fullest opportunity will be given to all interested organizations to present their views on the general questions relating to immigration policy, and also on the form and content of the draft legislation itself.

The government will be only too glad to receive whatever help and advice these important and responsible organizations can give in order to ensure that the form and content of the legislation, when it is finally passed by parliament, will be as satisfactory as it is humanly possible to make it.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, like all other members of this house I was certainly very pleased to hear the report of the minister, especially in reference to the activities of the department and the government with respect to world refugee year. Of course, when the announcement was first made in the house it was received and acclaimed as indeed being an effort by the department to deal with the problems with what we like to refer to as the humane touch; the human touch, in fact. We certainly greet that with much pleasure and we are very glad to note that an announcement will be made that another group will be admitted very shortly.

Of course, dealing with hard core cases of immigrants is always a problem and the country is aware of it. It is certainly encouraging that the first effort has turned out very successfully, and this certainly augurs well for the treatment of further hard core cases whenever the humane touch requires it.

On the other hand, I was rather disappointed that the minister's report to the house seemed to be one purely of statistics. It was a statistical report as to how many came in from various places. Perhaps such a report should be made to the house in a statistical form, although we can get this information in the printed reports that reach our desks from the various departments. I had hoped that the minister would put a little of that humaneness into her report which the country had hoped would be ever present when she was summoned to that portfolio. The statistics she gave to the house, however, are completely devoid, apart from the question of world refugee year, of the humane touch which is required in dealing with human beings.

Mr. Grafftey: You could not have been listening to the speech.

Mr. Crestohl: I would like to say to the hon. member for Brome—

Mr. Grafftey: Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Crestohl: —Brome-Missisquoi, who has a reputation for being very erudite, that he should certainly know and remember the old adage that children should be seen and not heard, unless they are very wet; and the hon. member is very wet.

Mr. Grafftey: That is very smart; that is quite funny.

An hon. Member: He will be here long after you have gone.

Mr. Crestohl: That, too, remains to be seen. I do not know who undertakes to prophesy. You know the old saying "only fools prophesy". I am wondering whether members of the government are concerned because I said that the minister—I may have touched her sensitivities, or theirs; I am sure I have not touched hers—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Crestohl: I did not crown her with that glory which she probably expected to receive, because the country had hoped that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, as a woman, would bring a little more of that understanding, that family understanding, that motherly understanding, which I found was completely absent from her report.

The hon. lady's reference to the revision of the act was expected, but I am again disturbed by the fact that the minister has served notice that this revision may not come as soon as was expected. The country has been clamouring continuously for a revision of this act, and I think the time has come. The minister would certainly disappoint not only parliament but the whole country if a revision of the act is not brought down. It was mentioned on several occasions by the hon. lady during the last session. It was promised in the speech from the throne. Certainly we are expecting it. The minister has said that other organizations and people will have an opportunity to be heard, and that is true, but I am hoping that the hon. lady will also see to it that a parliamentary committee is appointed to study the proposed draft bill and that such a committee will be empowered to hear witnesses and receive representations from the various organizations in the country which might be interested.

All this certainly makes it clear that the minister and the government have not yet adopted a consistent policy with regard to immigration. I have been in rather close touch with immigration activities and it has been interesting to observe the minister's constant shifting from one position to another. Her juggling, her almost mercury-like policy with regard to immigration shows she is unable to keep her course steady in any shape, form or manner. It is a vacillating policy. The hon. lady sometimes takes one position and then, by order in council, she shifts that position and annuls the position she had taken.

During the past 12 months the minister has claimed she has been misquoted with regard to statements she is deemed to have made as to policy. She has blamed the press. She has blamed officials in her department, who are completely blameless, for errors in understanding her policy. She has been blaming others right and left.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I have listened in patience to this, and I expect the hon. member to criticize me, but if he says I have criticized members of my department I really must take exception to that remark.

Mr. Crestohl: I do not know whether to call it criticism but at one time the minister did make a statement that her policy was misunderstood because of officials in her department.

Mrs. Fairclough: I never did.

Mr. Crestohl: I am speaking, now, of the Italian problem, the problem of Italian immigration. There was a very delicate position there, and I think the hon. lady said—I do not remember the language—that someone in her department with Liberal leanings might have sabotaged her at that time. I cannot recall her precise words, but I shall put the exact item on record if necessary. That is what I was referring to at the time.

Just let us see how these things add up and what the country thinks about it. I am reading from the Montreal Star of April 28, 1959. This is an article with a very interesting heading: "Mrs. Fairclough's Immigration Fumble". It reads, in part:

> The government and Mrs. Fairclough have acquired a great big black eye over that fiasco about limiting immigration of the "sponsored" category. Mrs. Fairclough was forced into the rather galling position of backing down in public, although perhaps the decision to do so was dictated to her from on high. And Mrs. Fairclough did not cover her retreat in glory when she claimed that the limiting order was rescinded because "the propagandists of the Liberal party have created an atmosphere of distrust and apprehension in which it is impossible to work."

Mr. Lambert: That is pure punditry based on conjecture.

Mr. Crestohl: I am reading from an editorial which appeared in a very prominent paper in this country. It continues:

> To the Italian community here and to many others, the obvious intent was a drastic curtailment of Italian immigration.

Of course, the minister faced a problem there and she quickly had to retrace her steps, which is not an easy thing to do. Some newspapers have said it was probably a very brave thing for the minister to have done. Let us see what the Toronto Daily Star said on April 23, 1959 under a big headline: "Mrs. Fairclough Retreats in Disorder":

> That was an amazing performance by Hon. Ellen Fairclough in announcing the withdrawal of the order in council banning immigration of relatives of some Canadian residents. It was good riddance of a bad order. But Mrs. Fairclough's petulant tone and attempt to throw a smokescreen over the government's retreat made her sound like a little girl who had lost a piece of candy.

The Chairman: May I suggest the hon. member call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I was talking about the vacillating government policy on immigration. Perhaps in modern language I could describe it in this way. The government seems to be playing its immigration policy by ear, meeting conditions as it sees them without having any fixed guide in its policy on immigration. If the government is playing it by ear I would consider it pitiable because the consequences are not reflected in any other tones than groans and anguish from heartaches and heartbreaks in preventing the linking together of broken families, and by increasing human sorrow. That is very clearly reflected in just a few headlines that I should like to read into the record. In the Toronto Telegram of April 3 we find the following:

Immigrant family curb aimed at limiting influx of Italians.

An hon. Member: What year?

Mr. Crestohl: The year 1959. In the Globe and Mail of April 3, 1959, we find the following:

New curbs put on immigration for relatives.

In the issue of April 2, 1959, we find the following:

New immigration bar shocks city newcomers.

Again, the Globe and Mail of April 6, 1959:

Skill before kinship new immigration rule.

The Toronto Daily Star, April 3, 1959:

Sixty three thousand Italians hit by immigration cut.

Again, we have the Globe and Mail of June 23, 1960, with a smiling photograph of the minister with the following head note:

She deals in human beings counted in dry statistics.

This, Mr. Chairman, is how the country has been accepting this curb that is being placed on the linking together of families. As I said before, when a motherly woman was assigned to the portfolio it was generally hoped that she would bring to her office an understanding family touch and with benevolence she would help to unite separated families. In fact, when she first took office she declared that that would be one of her main objectives. We were hopeful, Mr. Chairman, but the hopeful were soon disillusioned when with almost Draconian rigidity she enforced the complex and confusing regulations and, unlike ministers before her, she did not often temper mercy with justice, as it was hoped she would.

[The Chairman.]

During her almost four years in office the record shows that she did very little to modify the procedure to join families on the basis of relationship, age, or country of origin. I feel that after almost four years in office the minister should have something more to show in that regard. And now something new has been presented to us. Recently, a new requirement was apparently set up. This was announced by the minister in Guelph only a short while ago when she spoke of immigrants with skills. To make certain that I shall not misquote her, Mr. Chairman, I have her speech and I shall read from page 8 of the text that was provided. This is what she said:

We are doing a great disservice both to the immigrant and to our own community, when we bring to this country people who lack any kind of craft, skill or profession, who have no technical or other form of training suited to the demands of an increasing technical world.

If I were asked what I think is a real test of what makes a desirable immigrant, I think I should have to answer that it is a matter of what he has to contribute to Canadian progress and the strength and welfare of the Canadian community. At first blush that may sound like a selfish yardstick, but I am sure that if you give it a little careful thought you will agree that it is the only honest and sensible one.

No one will disagree very much with that, but will the minister tell the committee—and she has left the country unaware of this fact—whether this is now the top priority of immigration policy, or whether this is in addition to all the other complex problems which exist in the regulations? Does one replace the others, or are they to be dealt with together? In other words, must a person who now wants to immigrate to Canada fall into one of those complicated categories and in addition also be a skilled person?

I should like to illustrate it in another way. For example, can a Canadian citizen bring his father to Canada if his father is not a skilled worker, or can he bring his father to Canada only if he is a skilled worker? I hope the minister will clarify this. Surely it would be harsh to believe that the minister intends to place the importance or the emphasis on skills in preference to close relationship of relatives. Of course, I am of the opinion that it will simply complicate the situation.

Hon. members should be aware in detail of the complications which now exist in our immigration regulations. I have mentioned them on previous occasions and I should like to repeat them now. It is really an academic study so that all hon. members can understand and wrestle with the problem. The act sets out various types of citizens, or gives to different citizens different rights and privileges. I will give a few examples. Citizen A can bring certain relatives to Canada. Citizen B cannot bring people of the same relationship to Canada simply because they happen to live in another country, and when I speak of another country I am excluding countries behind the iron curtain. I am now speaking of other European or mid-eastern countries. Here is another illustration. Citizen A can bring to Canada certain relatives under certain conditions. Citizen B, who is equally a citizen, cannot bring to Canada people having the same relationship under any conditions. That too results from the fact that his relatives live in another country.

Here is another illustration. Citizen A can bring his parents to Canada regardless of their age. Citizen B, who is equal so far as citizenship is concerned, can only bring his parents to Canada if his father is over 65 and his mother is over 60. That too stems from the fact that they live in another country. Another illustration: Citizen A can bring a brother or a sister to Canada. Citizen B cannot bring a brother or sister simply because they happen to live in another country. Citizen A can bring his fiancée while Citizen B does not have the right to bring his fiancée to this country.

These are only some examples. There are many more similar complications and computations that one must conform with before one can really follow and understand a straightforward policy. Why should all citizens not have the same rights to bring their fathers or mothers to this country? Whether one lives in one country and another lives in another country, they are still fathers and mothers. Why should one citizen not be able to bring his father or mother to this country if they are not of a certain age? Are they different? Is their love or affection different? No.

All these, I say, are matters which require sound and careful study and analysis, and that is why the act should be revised.

Mrs. Fairclough: While my hon. friend is pausing may I ask him a question?

Mr. Crestohl: If I will not lose any of the time allotted to me by allowing the question.

Mrs. Fairclough: As I understand the rules, you only have to sit down and you can get up and speak for another 30 minutes. Would my hon. friend tell me who was the instigator of these regulations against which he is railing and is it not true that they were instituted by the government of which he was a supporter until 1957?

Mr. Crestohl: I was hoping, in fact I was expecting that the minister would ask that question. We once discussed that point on a previous occasion. I said then that some genius concocted all these combinations and computations which the minister certainly did not think were very nice at that time. However, she has been in office for four years and, having these complaints and knowing about them she is the only one who has been in a position to do anything about them. I have not given credit to whoever that genius was in years gone by. I do not necessarily have to accept or agree with what was done at that time because I am pleased to say that we on this side have no fear of saying that we disagree with a colleague. It may have been a good policy then and perhaps it was the work of a genius. He may have shown signs of genius at that time but the policy is outdated and outmoded. I blame the minister directly because she has been in a position to do something about the matter. I will put the argument this way. Since the minister has done nothing about it, perhaps she agrees with the genius who introduced these regulations.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the hon. member would answer a question.

Mr. Crestohl: I will only answer a question, Mr. Chairman, if I will be allowed 30 minutes from the time I sit down.

Mr. Woolliams: I was wondering, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I must draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that unless there is unanimous consent it is not possible to take into consideration the time used up by questions. Therefore, if the hon. member does not yield the floor, I will ask the hon. member for Bow River to resume his seat.

Mr. Crestohl: All right, ask the question.

Mr. Woolliams: Now that the hon. member has agreed to answer my question, I wonder whether he would identify this genius. Is it the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate?

Mr. Crestohl: I have not identified him. If the hon. member wants to do it, if he thinks he knows who it was, let him do it. I think the minister did it last year on one occasion. It was admitted. Nobody denied it. We recognize genius when we see it.

An hon. Member: In the Liberal party?

Mr. Crestohl: Indeed, only in the Liberal party. I should like to draw something to the attention of the minister now that may surprise her a little. I refer to the question of a new policy. Is the minister aware, does she know, did she ever hear, do hon. members of the Conservative party know or are they aware of the immigration credo of their own party laid down at a party convention? Let us see what that credo is. It is quite possible that very few of them have heard about it. I am now referring to Senate Hansard of April 4, 1960, page 498 and a speech made by a member of the other place. At that time this was said:

> The Progressive Conservative convention, I notice, adopted the following resolution:
> "Whereas a healthy and judicious immigration policy is necessary in order to provide a guaranteed market for Canada's vast natural resources and to reduce our vulnerability in the export market; whereas there are still thousands of refugees desirable as citizens who are not admissible to Canada under current immigration regulations; whereas this convention notes with satisfaction the efforts at the United Nations of Canada's minister of external affairs on behalf of refugees; that this national convention of the Progressive Conservative party recommend to the government—"

I ask members of the government to please note. I continue:

> "—that the immigration regulations be amended, to enlarge the categories of admissible immigrants; to redefine the term 'refugee' so as to widen and extend the qualifications for admissibility under this category; consider and if deemed advisable increase and extend the existing facilities and personnel for the processing of immigrants in foreign countries."

Here is a credo on immigration that was approved by the Conservative convention and I ask the minister this question. What has her department done to implement any one of these orders, so to speak, contained in this resolution?

Now these tenets have in no way been implemented. They are noble tenets. I believe this is a good policy for immigration, and that is the program of the Conservative party. What have they done to implement any one of these provisions? For example, the resolution says that it failed to amend the act to enlarge the categories of admissible immigrants. Here, hon. members will note, is an order from the party to enlarge the categories of admissible immigrants. Did the minister do that? Did she do anything in that direction? No, she did nothing.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is wrong.

Mr. Crestohl: The resolution calls for the definition of refugee to be redefined. Did the government redefine the meaning of the term "refugee" as instructed by its own convention? No, it did not.

Mrs. Fairclough: The answer is yes.

Mr. Crestohl: Oh, there has been a modification of it, but not a redefinition. I asked the minister on the floor of this house if she would define now what "refugee" meant and her answer was, what the high commissioner for refugees says is a refugee we will acknowledge. It has never been otherwise. There has been no change as she was instructed. The implications, as hon. members should know, are very wide if there were a redefinition of "refugee".

Mr. Matthews: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Crestohl: Certainly.

The Chairman: Before the hon. member puts his question, I would mention that the time of the hon. member has expired. If the committee is willing to give unanimous consent, he may continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Matthews: He is talking about the directions of a political convention to the government. I wonder if he would let the house know if the Liberals have put in their platform all the directions of the recent Liberal convention, and the resolutions that were passed there?

Mr. Crestohl: Is that not typical of hon. gentlemen shying away from their own responsibilities? They say that we did not do it and because the other fellow fails to do it, they should not do it. Surely the hon. gentleman who just asked the question knows as well as I do that the mere fact the other fellow does not do what he should do is no reason for me not to do it. I want to say that I know of nothing in the Liberal platform which will not be implemented as soon as the Liberal party has the power and authority to do so, which I hope will not be very long.

Then there is a third plank in the Conservative platform. This resolution instructs or authorizes the government to increase and extend the existing facilities and personnel for the processing of immigrants in foreign countries.

Mr. Ricard: From what are you reading?

Mr. Crestohl: From the very same document that I read before.

Mr. Ricard: What is it?

Mr. Crestohl: I will repeat it. Will the hon. gentleman please note it. It is a page out of the Senate Hansard for April 4, 1960, which is quite recent.

An hon. Member: From whose speech?

Mr. Crestohl: I think it was Senator Cairine Wilson. She was quoting a resolution right out of the records of the Conservative party. Surely hon. members opposite should know whether or not there is such a resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: They do not know; they were never published.

Mr. Crestohl: Of course they were never published. They do not know, and it is obvious from their behaviour they do not know.

I should like to get to the third point. This is a direct instruction or authorization to the government and to the minister. She was authorized and instructed by her own party to extend the existing facilities and personnel for the processing of immigrants in foreign countries. Those of us who are in communication with immigrants constantly hear the government say, we have no facilities in that country. This may be so; it is quite possible. The government says, we cannot deal with this immigrant because we have no facilities for processing. Surely when instructions are given to remedy that situation the minister is in default and is failing to do her duty as minister of immigration when she does not remedy the situation. As a consequence, the whole country suffers.

I should like to point out too that I am one of those who believe in an active immigration policy. As the committee well knows I have been propagating that for the last 11 years. Like the minister herself, I believe that immigrants make jobs and immigrants do not take away jobs from Canadians. On a number of occasions the minister has very eloquently and very forcefully told the country that the immigrants who come to this country are a blessing. They create jobs; they create industry; they encourage work. I believe as the minister does. But what does the record show? The record shows a pitiful reduction in immigration in the last three or four years. In fact, we were told today that 104,000 immigrants came in during the past year. I have not in front of me the figures to indicate how many immigrants left Canada, but I feel sure if you were to strike a balance there would certainly not be a very great net gain for our country.

I have the feeling that if the government were to implement an immigration program—I know the minister is in some difficulty now. She is on the eve of revising the Immigration Act. I believe this is one of the finest things that the minister can do for her department, her officials and the country. I feel I have had some training in the law, but by no stretch of the imagination could I set down clearly what the policy of the immigration department is now. The officials of this department are eminently able, well experienced men, and desirous as they are of being of assistance they come up against confusion in this act which the minister should eliminate once and for all.

I am beginning to be sceptical of whether the minister is serious about revising the act. As I said, the revision was promised last year and it was promised in the speech from the throne. I hope the minister is not waiting until the end of the session to try to rush it through or, alternatively, to say that there is not sufficient time to do so. Tonight she did say that it will depend upon the business of the house as to whether we will be able to have the act revised. Everything will depend upon circumstances. I say to the minister that she will be delinquent in her responsibilities if she does not introduce a revision of this act, have a parliamentary committee appointed to study it and give that committee authority to summon witnesses and hear representations.

Surely the minister is aware of the fact that the country is clamouring for the overhaul of this act. I should like to quote from an article in the Montreal Star of January 4, 1960, which is headed, "Time for an Overhaul".

> Without delay, the Immigration Act should be reviewed and the operations of the immigration department surveyed. Either, if not both, is in need of liberalization. Arbitrary behaviour on the part of department personnel would lead one to think sometimes that they are constitutionally hostile to immigration. It is a question whether they should have the power of discretion they sometimes exereise.

I could quote any number of newspaper authorities who are urging the overhauling of the Immigration Act. As I said before, I think there should be an overhauling or revising of this act that would really place the entire policy into simple language, not complicated language, and would set it out clearly so that everybody with intelligence, would be able to understand it. If this were done it would relieve the country and it would certainly relieve the department. I speak for the officials of the department who I know are anxious to do their duty completely and thoroughly but who are sometimes hamstrung by the difficulty of understanding the language of the act.

The Chairman: Shall item 51 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is seriously thought that the most important item in the estimates of the immigration branch would be carried without any reply by the hon. lady to the indictment made by the hon. member for Cartier, not merely of the current practice but of some of the regulations that have been in existence for quite some time and some of the practices that have been in existence for quite some time and which, in some cases, are anachronistic today. I may say that I was minister for about the same length of time or perhaps a little bit longer as the hon. lady has been in office. However, I changed the regulations or caused them to be changed or persuaded my colleagues to have them changed four or five times during that period. I must say that my attitude has been a sort of mixture of feeling flattered that the hon. lady considered my regulations to be so good that she has not been able to change them at all significantly and of feeling that they ought in some respects to have been changed in order to meet changing conditions. That has been my attitude to them.

In extenuation of my own conduct may I say this, and I am not going to defend it more. Nearly all of the instances given by the hon. member for Cartier—and he would perhaps recall this if I went further—were cases in which liberalizations of the regulations were made and not cases in which restrictions were made. The hon. gentlemen did not point out that the reason that the parents of Canadian citizens can only be applied for when the father is over 65 years of age and the mother is over 60 years of age is that in those cases they are iron curtain countries and as long as the government sees fit—and this is not the fault of the immigration department; this was a decision that was made by the previous government and is presumably being carried on by the present government—and as long as the government feels that in the state of the world as it is at the present time it is necessary to have some security screen of immigrants and as long as it is impossible, as it is, to carry on security screening in countries behind the iron curtain it was felt that the highest considerations of the security of the state made it inadvisable to relax the regulations more than that.

Whether that is suitable to conditions in 1961, as we felt it was the only thing that it was proper to do at the time when I was minister, I should not like to express an offhand opinion. But that is the reason and the sole reason why there is a difference between, say, the parents of a Canadian citizen who happens to be living in a country behind the iron curtain and those who do not. I think perhaps that consideration ought to be put on the record.

I must say that it seems to me that the fundamental criticism that one could make at the present time of the state of our immigration to this country is this, and the hon. member for Cartier put his finger on it when, during his remarks he said he wondered whether there had been very much net gain in population in Canada in the last year or two from immigration. We do not have statistics, and I do not see any practicable way of collecting statistics on the number of people who leave Canada to settle permanently somewhere else unless we turn this country into a sort of police state, which is not something I would like to see. I would not like to see us starting to ask every Canadian or every resident of Canada who leaves Canada questions such as these; why are you leaving the country? Are you going to stay permanently or are you just going down to Florida? Or things of that sort.

In the first place, I think it would slow up border crossings to such a degree that we would be obliged to have an army of immigration officers instead of the number we now have. I must say that I am glad that we live in a country in which we can have a fairly open border and I am not a bit in favour of changing that situation just for the sake of collecting statistics.

But there is something we can tell from the statistics of immigration into the United States, into the United Kingdom and into one or two other countries that keep records, those being the principal ones. We know that a regrettably large number of residents of Canada have left this country in the last two or three years and that there has been a good deal of comment about that in the press. That has been particularly true in the case of the United Kingdom and Germany in the last couple of years.

But the root cause of that situation, of course, is not any failure of immigration policy or of immigration administration. The root causes of that situation is the unemployment situation with which we are faced. I quite agree with the hon. member for Cartier that if there were some way of keeping people alive indefinitely until they could get jobs it would be desirable to keep up a flow of immigration even when it was difficult to get employment. However, I administered the department and I must say that I do not believe the Canadian people would support such a policy. I do not believe it is a practical policy to encourage people to come to Canada, when those people have no employment and have no real chance of getting employment. From experience that I have had and from studying the experience that the government has had since that time I know that nothing does more to spoil the prospects of future immigration than to have a considerable number of people come to this country with high hopes of getting jobs, spend two or three months here without getting a job and then go back and inevitably blame this country for their experience. As is commonly known, people do not like to blame themselves. I do not think there is any single thing that did so much to discourage British immigration, and will continue to discourage it just as long as the present government is in office, as the brutal cancellation of the Arrow contract and all the consequences it had on the destruction of that complex which had been built up in the Toronto area of industrial research and development which was just by the stroke of a pen in a fit of irritation by the Prime Minister ended on a Friday when these people were brutally thrown out of work.

Mr. Harkness: That is absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it was absolutely ridiculous and it was utterly irresponsible.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member's remarks are utterly ridiculous and irresponsible.

Mr. Pickersgill: No better comment could be made upon it than that which has just been made by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member's remarks are ridiculous and irresponsible.

Mr. Pickersgill: That comment was typical of the hon. gentleman who usually speaks first and thinks afterward, if at all.

Mr. Harkness: Abuse will get the hon. gentleman nowhere.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that as a practical matter it does seem to me that there cannot be any permanently productive immigration, in the sense of bringing people here who will stay here, who will be contented and who will add to the upbuilding of the country, unless we can maintain the growth of the country, which is not being done at the present time. That is the basic problem, and it is not something that can be blamed on the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, much less on the department. Having said that, there have been one or two other—

An hon. Member: Tell us something about second-class babies.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman may be a better authority on that subject than I would be. If the child is the father of the man, I would not be surprised if he is.

There is one aspect—

An hon. Member: Are you talking about the Horners?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one aspect of this subject about which I asked a question early in the session and received no answer. I feel it ought to be pursued because we have been told by a distinguished member of the government, a fairly recent recruit to the government, that when this government came into office there was a profound change in the immigration policy of this country. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. gentleman, the Secretary of State—who is not in the committee at the moment, I regret to say—but I want to read a press dispatch and I intend to read it first from the Toronto Star and then from La Presse, because I feel we should have both on the record as here were two reputable newspapermen writing in newspapers in both languages, reporting the same meeting and reporting it in virtually identical terms.

I think we are entitled to some serious explanation of this from the Secretary of State and also from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. The Secretary of State undertook in a by-election campaign in the county of Labelle last October to say this. This appears in the Toronto Star of October 18, 1960, and I read the part that is relevant:

> Mr. Dorion maintained stepped-up immigration under the Liberals, particularly the 240,000 admitted in 1956—

The 240,000 admitted in 1956; of course, the Liberals were to blame for that.

> —when there were 292,000 unemployed,—

I do not know where the hon. gentleman got that figure. He certainly did not get it from the bureau of statistics:

> —was largely responsible for current unemployment.

That is a remarkable statement; but after all that is just a matter of opinion. I do not hold the government collectively responsible for that extraordinary opinion expressed by the Secretary of State. I go on:

> He accused the Liberals of trying to "anglicize" French-Canada by bringing over more immigrants from the British Isles than from any other European country.

I ask the minister whether she thinks that is a very helpful way for any minister of the crown to be talking in any part of this country. Then he went on, and this is in quotation marks:

> "They tried to eliminate the French-Canadians for the benefit of the English," he said.

Then he said this, and this is the part that the minister should answer for:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker, he added, had promptly closed the door on this immigration—

That is the English immigration:

> —and was trying to offset the Liberal "anglicization" by fostering immigration from Italy.

That is a statement made by a minister of the crown, as a member of the government, in support of an unsuccessful candidate for election to this house, regarding what the Prime Minister had done and what the hon. lady is administering. I just repeat it because—

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some amazement to my hon. friend, but it is possible that he was not in the house when the hon. member for Bellechasse disclaimed this and, as a matter of fact, stated—

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to yield the floor. I was in the house when the hon. member for Bellechasse was very careful not to deny this. He did not deny it at all. If the hon. lady can find any denial of these words, she understands the English language and the French language better than I do, because the hon. gentleman did not deny it. He evaded the question and gave a long quotation from something Mr. Harris had said, which had nothing to do with the case at all; but he did not deny this.

It would be very hard for him to deny it, for two reasons; because it appeared not only in the Toronto Star but in practically the same language in La Presse, and there are at least two or three members of this house who were present on the occasion on which the hon. gentleman uttered these remarks and heard them.

An hon. Member: You were not there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not there, I never said I was.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I have in front of me Hansard for November 18, 1960 and the English translation of the remarks made by the Secretary of State, read as follows:

Mr. Speaker, fortunately, I have here the exact text of my statement, and I find that the reports—

Mr. Bourget: He did not have a text.

Mr. Churchill: If I may continue, Mr. Chairman:

—appearing in some newspapers are substantially at variance with what I said.

Mr. Forgie: "Substantially", that is the word.

Mr. Churchill: The minister's statement in this house with regard to the inaccuracy of the statement appearing in the press is to be accepted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no doubt that reports in the newspapers were substantially at variance with the hon. gentleman's notes, but that has nothing to do with the case. Either the hon. gentleman denied using those words, or he did not; and there is no denial there of the words I have read. All the hon. gentleman did was say that some of the press reports were at variance with the notes he had. He did not say they were at variance with the things he said; he said they were at variance with the notes he had. We know he is not the only member of the treasury benches who finds that the things reported in the newspapers are at variance with the notes they have.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; there is no mention of the notes that he had. He said:

—are substantially at variance with what I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I accept that.

An hon. Member: Why did you not take it up when he was here?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did take it up when he was here. Why is he not here, incidentally, where he ought to be?

An hon. Member: Why weren't you here yesterday?

Mr. Drysdale: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am speaking on the point of order raised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

The Chairman: Order. I understand that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is speaking to the point of order raised by the house leader, and I cannot entertain more than one point of order at the same time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Precisely, Mr. Chairman, I say that the Secretary of State did not deny the express words I read. All he said was that some of the press reports were at variance with what he had said, as the hon. gentleman has just read. That may well be; but that is not a denial that the words I read were the words he uttered. And, of course, it happens that those words were heard by several members who are in this chamber at this present moment.

If the hon. gentleman wants to come into the house and say that he did not say those words, I shall be obliged, under the rule, to accept his word. But up to now he has not done that.

Mr. Drysdale: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; I would like to have that clarified. The hon. member seems to be rambling a bit. The point of order I wish to raise is referred to by Beauchesne in paragraph 148 (3) where it is stated:

Reference to debates of the current session is discouraged even if such reference is not irrelevant, as it tends to reopen matters already decided.

Again subparagraph (2) of the same paragraph states:

It is irregular to reflect upon, argue against, or in any manner call in question, in debate, the past acts or proceedings of the house, on the obvious ground that, besides tending to revise discussion upon questions which have already been once decided—

And so on. I suggest this is what the hon. member has been doing. He has done it on two occasions. The first was in connection with the Arrow, and this is the second occasion. The question was discussed in the house and decided, and I suggest we should act in accordance with this rule and try to get the hon. member back to order.

Mr. Pickersgill: It has never been recognized that questions asked on the orders of the day are previous debates. The purpose of asking questions on the orders of the day or placing them on the order paper is precisely in order to get material for use in debate. Therefore this is not reopening a matter previously debated. I am not aware that there has been any debate previously this session about the Arrow, though I know there was a debate in another session.

Mr. Drysdale: Further to that point of order, since the hon. member has rambled on I would refer him to paragraph 157 (6) which states:

> A member quoting a newspaper in debate was ruled out of order by the Deputy Speaker who said: "The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house, either directly or indirectly is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others."

I suggest we ask the hon. member to carry on the debate instead of continuing to make the irrelevant observations he has been making.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member has finished reading from Beauchesne perhaps we could get back to the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I can go on to corroborate what I am saying from this dispatch of La Presse of the same date. Perhaps the house would be a little quieter, because it is more difficult for me to do this in a language which is not my habitual language. If I might have the attention of the house, I shall read what La Presse has to say:

> He said also that present unemployment is a heritage from the Liberals, because the former government admitted 240,000 immigrants in Canada in 1956, when we had 292,000 unemployed.
> Mr. Dorion said Mr. Diefenbaker closed the door on that immigration, adding that the Liberals "wanted, by this immigration, to eliminate the French Canadians to the benefit of the English", while . . .

(Text):

This is in quotation marks.

(Translation):

> ". . . while under Mr. Diefenbaker, we admitted more Italians to the detriment of English immigration."

(Text):

I say, is it not quite remarkable that reputable correspondents of two of the leading newspapers in this country, one in French and one in English, should have given the same account of this situation in almost exactly the same words? Would it not be remarkable if both of them had imagined these words and if those who were there and heard them had also imagined them? If that is what the Secretary of State—

Mr. Ricard: You are very brave to attack him when he is not here.

Mr. Pickersgill: Bring him here. I am not in the least concerned about that. Anyway I am not attacking him. The minister said the Prime Minister had changed the immigration policy, that he had stopped British immigration and increased Italian immigration to prevent the anglicization of our country which was being perpetrated by the Liberals and restore the balance. I asked the hon. lady a rhetorical question: is that true? But I am not going to press her for an answer because I know perfectly well it is not true.

An hon. Member: Then why did you bring it up?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will tell you why I brought it up. I did so because I think that kind of speech is a disgrace to this country. It is a disgrace for a minister of the crown to make this kind of cheap appeal and cheap misrepresentation calculated to promote disunity in other parts of Canada. I think it is an improper way to behave and when a performance of this kind comes to light it seems to me it should be denounced and a record of it should be kept as an example of what many hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends have done in this country ever since 1911, and the moment the Secretary of State appeared on that platform he began doing it all over again. I say we should stop this kind of talk about whether one kind of immigrant is better than another. The plain fact of the matter is that we know from our experience, having had immigrants from nearly every country in the world, that those immigrants from nearly every country in the world and their descendants have become good Canadians; just as good Canadians as the descendants of the original inhabitants of this country or the descendants of the French or the English. If we are going to have a united country the sooner we have a stop to that kind of thing the better. That is the only reason and the only excuse I have for bringing this up.

If the hon. member for Bellechasse, the Secretary of State, had, when I asked my question first, got up and said without equivocation that he had never made that statement I would have had to accept his answer and I would not have mentioned the subject again. But he did not say that. He used words which were calculated to give that impression, but he did not say that because the hon. gentleman knew it would not have been correct if he had. That is why I raised this matter. I have no apology whatever to make for bringing up this question and I hope this will put a stop to that kind of speech by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house.

Mrs. Fairclough: It had not been my intention to reply in any detail to the observations made by the hon. member for Cartier but since I have been challenged to do so by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate perhaps I should say a few words.

The hon. member quoted from my speech in Guelph which was made available to him last week. I fail to understand why he cannot read what was written in that speech. He purported to tell this house that by saying Canada wanted skilled immigrants I had inferred that none but skilled workers would be admitted. As he very well knows, I denied that first press report and if he had read my speech he would have been able to ascertain for himself what the facts are. I did not say in my speech that relatives would not be admitted, and he should know that, too, if he had read the speech. I fail to understand the hon. member's motives in imputing to me statements other than those I did make.

In so far as his other remarks are concerned, when he accuses me of being inhuman and vacillating and, I think he said, playing the immigration policy by ear, I should like to say to him, that if by that he means that my ear is open to the pleas which are made to me he is right. I have pursued and tried to pursue a flexible policy in so far as immigration is concerned. I do not like the act; I have said so on many occasions, but I have also said that I am not going to bring into this house some half-baked instrument to take its place.

I might say that some of the organizations to which the hon. member belongs are amongst those who plead most frequently for special consideration and, as hon. members know, special consideration can only be given by order in council. I make no apology whatsoever for having used the instrument of order in council to accede to some of the heartbreaking pleas of some of my hon. friends own friends.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to the fact that on a number of occasions he had altered the regulations—

Mr. Pickersgill: Or asked to have them altered.

Mrs. Fairclough: —or made some variation in their application, I take it. That has been done by this government also on a number of occasions. We are not operating under exactly the same terms as those which he left to us when he left this office. I could name a number of regulations which have been altered somewhat or modified. To call one to mind, I am thinking of the elimination of the bond which had formerly been required by fiancées, usually Chinese fiancées.

In answer to my hon. friend from Cartier who said that there had been no new definition of refugees—he called it a modification —well, whether it was a modification or not may I say we had a warm letter of thanks from the Canadian Jewish congress expressing their deep appreciation of the steps which were taken to make it permissible for those persons who might be classified as economic refugees, not normally recognized by the high commissioner for refugees, to enter this country.

As I said a moment ago, I make no apologies for the changes which have been made. I make no apologies for the fact that I have tried to pursue a flexible policy. I do apologize for not having brought in a new act before now, but I can assure hon. members that there were circumstances completely beyond my control which have prevented my bringing it in before now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Because I think there would be a very general interest in this question I wonder whether the hon. lady can tell us just precisely where the investigation into the Chinese question is at the present time?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I cannot give a precise answer to that.

Mr. Pickersgill: A progress report.

Mrs. Fairclough: The investigation is proceeding; a number of Chinese have come forward and have given information by means of which we are in the process of regularizing their status. A few have already been regularized. Some of the others are awaiting further information, but we expect that we will be able to deal with their cases.

In so far as the prosecutions are concerned, of course, those come under my colleague the Minister of Justice. I might say, though, that I am a little disappointed that more of the Chinese have not taken advantage of the offer which has been made to them by means of which they might have come forward and given us the true circumstances of their entry and their true names, and thus have been in a position to pass on to their children their proper identity. I think it is a mistake for them not to do so, and I am sure that in the years to come those who do not will bitterly regret it. I do hope that even yet a great many of them will come forward and establish themselves as bona fide immigrants and citizens of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I noticed from the statistics that the hon. lady gave us, and I also noticed this in the newspapers, that immigration from China was about half of what it was in 1959. Is the hon. lady now satisfied that all the people who are now coming are bona fide immigrants in the sense that they are the persons whom they represent themselves to be, and that the situation which was being investigated is now being completely cleared up so far as all the current cases in Hong Kong are concerned?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can undertake to make any such statement. We hope that we have investigated and traced all of the current entrants to the places where we know they pretend to be. I think the very fact that immigration from China has been cut in half—and which I might say is the direct result of fewer applications, not of action on the part of this department—will indicate that those who are coming forward now are the ones that are sure of their own bona fides. I do not think that under the present circumstances someone would come forward who knew that he was deliberately misrepresenting himself. In fact, he would be a very brash individual indeed to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady took some credit to herself with regard to changing the regulations with respect to fiancées. I am not sure that I entirely approve of the change which was made but that is a matter of opinion. She knows the reason why the original provision was made. Those fiancées from China were all admitted when I was minister as a matter of grace and not under the regulations at all. But it did happen occasionally that the passion that had prompted the application did not survive the encounter, and sometimes there was no marriage. It seemed to me that in those circumstances it was only fair that they should have a return ticket so that they could get back, because I do not think it is beyond the hon. lady's imagination—and perhaps she does not even need to imagine it—that sometimes some people who alleged they were applying for fiancées were applying for women for some other purpose. Is the hon. lady quite satisfied that the people she is admitting now as fiancées really are all bona fide cases, and can she give any figure as to whether the number has increased or decreased in the last year?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am very happy to inform my hon. friend that we have not had one Chinese fiancée come forward who has not fulfilled the marriage contract subsequently and since the bond was removed. I wish I could say the same for the fiancées who come from all other countries. That was one of the grievances when we removed the bond. We felt it was an unjust condition directed against the Chinese when possibly the Chinese more than any others were observing the conditions of their entry. Consequently I am very glad to say there have been no culprits since the bond was removed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think there were many of the return tickets used even before, if the hon. lady will recall the figures.

In view of the discussion we have had so far, I think it might be useful if either now or later the hon. lady would give us a record of the respects, not in which the practice has been changed, but in which the actual regulations have been changed since the present government came into office, and what the nature of the changes was and what the effect of them has been. If it could be done right away it would be all the better.

Mrs. Fairclough: I can give my hon. friend some. The regulations were amended to enable Canadian residents of Asian origin to sponsor admission of their spouses, children and parents. Previously such sponsors had to wait until they acquired Canadian citizenship. This change enabled the reunion of families who would otherwise have been separated for five years.

Mr. Pickersgill: In some cases.

Mrs. Fairclough: Well, having regard to the fact that I was accused earlier of separating families I think maybe I might stress the point that this was done specifically to reunite families.

Then there was the order in council which amended the regulations to provide for the landing under minister's permit of persons who marry Canadian citizens or residents. This was intended to provide a little more control over the admission of fiancées by providing, if necessary, for the removal from Canada without formality of those who did not marry. I am sure my hon. friend will remember cases when he was minister where one person would bring forward successive fiancées, none of whom ever actually entered into marriage with him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly not with me.

Mrs. Fairclough: I meant with the applicant. I am sorry. I have mentioned already the elimination of the bonding requirement and I have already mentioned the amended definition of refugees. These are the ones that come immediately to mind. There are other minor changes that I could secure for my hon. friend but these are the ones that are the most prominent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the hon. lady say how many refugees were admitted to Canada during refugee year apart from those who were brought in under the government's scheme, so to speak, the tubercular ones?

Mrs. Fairclough: In round figures about 4,500, including some 700 or more who came in under the tubercular refugee scheme.

Mr. Pickersgill: How many is it contemplated are coming under the extension of the direct government sponsorship?

Mrs. Fairclough: At the present time we have made arrangements for 114 in hospitals. With their families I cannot say exactly what the number will be but it will probably be about 450.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can it be said that, practically speaking, all the tubercular people in the refugee camps in Europe who would be willing to migrate at all have now been taken care of?

Mrs. Fairclough: We have altogether only 96 left that we know of who can be brought forward.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think this has been one of the most humane and commendable things that has been done since the Hungarian situation and, as the minister knows, I have never failed to commend what the government has done in this matter. I know there were people who felt that there was quite a danger to the public health. Some quite eminent doctors who are friends of mine have said to me that there are various kinds of tuberculosis and we might start a new strain in this country. However, there does not seem to be any evidence that any harm has been done or that there has been any infection of anyone already here as the result of this movement, and it undoubtedly has changed the very lives of a lot of people in a way of which I think every Canadian who has contributed to it ought to be rather proud of having had some part. I must say I am very happy indeed to commend the government for having done this.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, much as I should like to take all the commendation myself I must in all fairness pay tribute to the provincial governments who in their turn participated in this scheme by making hospital beds available and by entering into arrangements with the federal authorities for the care of these people. I think we can truly say that this has been a Canadian scheme which touched all classes and kinds of people because in addition to the part played in the scheme by the provincial governments a number of these people were brought forward by individuals, by groups of individuals and by organizations such as churches and service clubs. Altogether I think it has been a most heart-warming effort.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make a few observations but I see the hon. member for Kootenay West rising.

Mr. Herridge: I was simply going to ask a question. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member's line of thought.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was really going on to make some observations about a different subject. I gather from what the minister has said about the revision of the Immigration Act that it is very far indeed from being in a final form for submission to the house. Therefore it may be that the minister would be interested in having my views as to some changes and improvements that I think should be made in the act. I would be very glad to mention a few of them.

The reason I am doing so right now is that the question of tuberculosis is one of them. I think that certain of the prohibitions now in the act should be removed. I could do a Pontius Pilate act over this because when the act was before parliament I was not a member of the house although the hon. lady was, so I had no direct responsibility whatsoever for what is in the act. When that prohibition was put in the act there were justifiable fears about contagion that are no longer justified at all. I know that I came pretty close to breaking the law on a good many occasions when I was the minister by actually admitting people to this country who, strictly speaking, were not admissible because they still had a spot on a lung that some doctor certified might still be active. I did not do it very often and, of course, I never landed them as immigrants.

I do not need to tell the minister that painful situations of this sort arise all the time because the law itself in my opinion is quite unnecessarily harsh. I do think that not only that particular prohibition but all the other prohibitions including the one about insanity should be examined. I feel very keenly about the one regarding insanity. As every hon. member knows, there are many kinds of mental disorder, particularly those kinds which young people have from which they recover and which make them no more prone to mental disease in the future than someone who has never had any mental disease. I think that the prohibition in that field is utterly out of accord with what would now be the public view of what would be appropriate. I would hope that there would be some relaxation in that field as well.

I also hope that the minister, though she certainly is under no obligation to do so, will carry out the pledge that I made to the welfare association that if I ever introduced amendments to the act I would take out the provision for the deportation of persons who become public charges. I think that is a relic of the old days when the municipalities had to bear the whole burden in the case of any person who went on relief and they were unwilling to do so. But now that we have unemployment assistance, half of which is contributed by the federal treasury, for all kinds of Canadians and which applies not merely to unemployed persons but to everyone who is on relief for any reason, I certainly see no earthly reason why that provision should be there.

I am now going to embark on a subject which is much more difficult and about which I have done a lot of reflecting since I ceased being the minister.

Mr. Churchill: You have had more time.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the Minister of Veterans Affairs has pointed out, I have had a little more time, and I have had to find other means of occupying my time that were more lucrative than just thinking.

Mrs. Fairclough: You had better edit that statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Than just thinking? Perhaps with the permission of the hon. lady and of the house I might look at it and edit it to the extent that I think is necessary.

To come back to my point, one of the most difficult things was this whole problem of adjudication of deportation cases. When I was the minister I had the governor in council set up an appeal board in respect of the deportation of landed immigrants who I felt had rights. From the time I set up that board every landed immigrant was asked to opt—I do not know whether the minister follows this course—whether he wanted his case settled finally by the board or by the minister. Of course, under the law, the minister has to settle it. There is no escape because parliament has said so. If the person said, I want it settled by the board, then I did not alter the board's decision. If the person said, I want it settled by the minister, then I asked for the board's advice and while I generally followed it I felt I was under an obligation to exercise a certain measure of judgment myself. I think this course was quite legal, and I was advised it was quite legal.

However I would much rather have had a board that had the final jurisdiction and, if necessary, an appeal to the courts. I do not believe such a right of appeal to the courts would have been exercised very often. I have the view that once we accept a person as a landed immigrant he has certain rights. It is true he has not the same rights a Canadian citizen has but he has broken his ties with another country and we have said, you look like a likely citizen. We have accepted him and we have, therefore, incurred some kind of obligation.

I think it would be very much better to have these cases adjudicated by a tribunal. It would make the life of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a good deal more tolerable if she had no power to deal with these cases at all, just as she has no power to deal with citizenship cases. I do not believe the minister differs with me in the view that the amount of discretion that can be exercised should be reduced to the minimum.

The only reason there is any discretion under the act—at least in my experience during the whole time I administered it—is so that it can be exercised for the benefit of the applicant. I have never known discretion to be exercised the other way. In fact, I do not believe it could be exercised the other way. Either a person is legally admissible or he is a borderline case, and if you admit him you are exercising the discretion in his favour. The question is, do you want to retain any discretion of that sort. I think that unless we are going to have a quota system or a complete open door policy there has to be a measure of discretion exercised somewhere. I do not believe the Canadian people would ever accept the open door policy, and I am very much against a general quota system. I say this not as a final opinion, but I just offer this gratuitous advice to the minister and to her officials for consideration before the act is revised.

I have come to the conclusion that on balance there ought to be a provision in the act for the establishment of an appeal board to consider any appeals in sponsorship cases. This is a very difficult task for a minister. A minister is under all kinds of pressure from all kinds of people, some of them benevolent and some of them quite mercenary. It does seem to me that if we could lay down rules for sponsorship and then create an independent tribunal to consider any cases that were appealed by the legal sponsor in Canada, it would make this portfolio supportable. I must say I have a good deal of sympathy for whoever has this task at the present time because there are too many decisions that nobody but the minister has the right under the law to make for one human being to be expected to make them, to be able to make them conscientiously and live a normal life. I speak rather feelingly about this. I tried to administer the act exceedingly conscientiously, perhaps too conscientiously. At any rate I am honestly trying to make some suggestions which I think might make the law more tolerable from every point of view.

I must confess that in the case of applicants for admission to Canada who have no sponsors, who have no previous connection with Canada, I do not believe their cases are capable of being adjudicated by any kind of tribunal or board any better than they can be handled by the officials of the department. When it comes to a question of selecting from the outside world those people we want or do not want to be residents of Canada, who have no connection or relationship of any sort with this country, I do not think we should do anything which would confer a right upon other people. I do not believe that would work. I believe the moment you did it you would have the administrative machinery and the adjudicative machinery clogged with so many cases, most of them I am afraid I would have to say unworthy cases, the whole process would break down.

We have had some experience with those who have got into the courts. The hon. lady will remember a certain person by the name of George Christian Hanna who was of great help to her party in Vancouver in the general election of 1957. I think before she had ceased to hear about him she was as sick of his name as I was. It is true there are a number of undesirable people, and there is no earthly reason why we should have them in Canada. The notion that anyone who is not very welcome in his own country but who wants to come here should be able to come here is one that I do not believe the Canadian people would accept for one moment. I think a clear-cut distinction could be made. I say this after a lot of reflection about the difference between immigrants of that type and sponsored immigrants. This would, I believe, involve extending to the English and the French, who do not have it now, the right to sponsorship which is given to other people. These people did not have it in my time because they were relatively freely admissible anyway. I think that would have to be modified.

There is one other matter which I suppose, in a sense, more properly comes under citizenship than under immigration, but is closely related to it. In view of the rather higher degree of literacy, the rather higher educational qualifications generally, and the greater need there is going to be in the future if we are to provide for good immigration and to make things agreeable to immigrants in Canada, I have been wondering if we should not give consideration to reducing the five-year waiting period for Canadian citizenship. At the present time I think it is really more attractive for most people to stay in Europe than it is to come to Canada. I think we might give consideration to the question of whether five years is too long a period to wait for citizenship. I have not any fixed views on this subject but I think it is one that perhaps merits some consideration.

There is one other question and I come back to it because I omitted it earlier. There were also these other deportations. I suggest to the minister that she change the nomenclature in the act so that a clear distinction is drawn, by using a different word, between what you do with landed immigrants and what you do with people who are here as visitors. Much of the misunderstanding that exists at the present time about the administration of the act is due to the confusion in people's minds between the deportation of immigrants and the deportation of visitors.

I must say that on balance, having regard to all the circumstances, I think that some advisory body should have the capacity to review deportation orders of visitors as well. My own opinion is this; and may I say that I have an extremely high regard for the officers of the department. I do not think they have ever deserved much of the abuse that has been heaped upon them with regard to being inhuman bureaucrats and so on. That has not been my experience and it has not been the experience of most of my friends. But for all that, there is no doubt that when a decision is made by a single individual in Sydney and another one is made in Victoria, there is the possibility of a good deal of difference in the interpretation of the law. I think it would be a good thing if there were in existence some formal advisory body that would consider cases—and they would be relatively few—in which there was a desire for an appeal to the minister and give an opinion which could be made public, if necessary. Once this appeal is taken I think the information should be publishable. If the person does not want it published, he should not appeal. If he feels he has grounds for appeal, he should take the risks of publication. I think the minister understands thoroughly what I mean. Many of these visitors are deported for reasons to which they would not wish to have much publicity given.

I suggest that this procedure would also serve a useful purpose. But I say to the minister that if she can think of some other word it might be helpful. I do not care which one she calls deportation and which one she does not. On the whole I would use the word "deportation" for immigrants and I would get another word that had a different connotation for those people who are just visitors in the country and who have no right whatever to stay here if they are objectionable in any way.

These remarks were not very well organized. They are rather a wide-ranging expression of opinions but I hope they may be a little bit helpful in the drafting of legislation.

Mrs. Fairclough: Just before my hon. friend asks his question I should like to thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and tell him that practically all of the suggestions he has made have been under consideration. I cannot find too much wrong with what he has said. If he has any other ideas on the subject I hope he will not hesitate to send them along to the department. Out of the wealth of his own experience in this branch I know that he must have some definite ideas, as he has just demonstrated.

Mr. Herridge: I just wish to make a few observations on this item. First of all let me say I think all of us appreciate the extremely difficult task confronting the officials of the immigration branch because of the pressure from various groups to get people admitted and often pressure by members of parliament in contradiction sometimes to things they say in the House of Commons. I want to say publicly that in travelling through the country and in talking to a good number of persons, including some members of this House of Commons, I find that there is a general appreciation of the good work being undertaken by the present deputy minister and of his generally fair, sympathetic and humane approach.

In listening to the remarks of the hon. member from Bonavista-Twillingate who speaks with considerable experience I must say this, although it rather pains me at times to be compelled to agree with him. I must say that he put up a reasoned case with respect to various groups of immigrants, and particularly with respect to the admissibility of sponsored immigrants who are coming to relatives who will provide for them so that they are not going to be a public charge. I think his suggestions in that respect were quite sound.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, while I realize all the difficulties, it appears that we still have not a planned immigration policy in which we bring forward people on the whole when they can be absorbed into the economy without displacing Canadian workers or, shall I say, competing with Canadians for short housing and things of that sort. In the opinion of the members of this group who have always advocated a planned immigration policy, immigrants' applications should be processed in the country of origin and then they should be brought forward as they can be fitted into the stream of employment satisfactorily in this country.

I want to say a word or two about landed immigrants. This matter has been a sore point with some members of this group and other members in this House of Commons. I refer to the abuse of this term "landed immigrants". The minister has had brought to her attention on a number of occasions where people come in from the United States, as they have done in British Columbia in recent years, as landed immigrants. I have had them tell me after they have arrived here that they have used the term "landed immigrants" only to come in and work for three months. They come in as landed immigrants not intending to stay as immigrants and take employment on that basis away from Canadian workers; they come in and work on pipe lines and things of that sort. I think there is considerable abuse of the opportunity to come into Canada as a landed immigrant. I think there should be some consideration of that term and I think that something should be done to make certain, as far as possible, that a person who comes to Canada as a landed immigrant is a genuine settler and intends to try to establish himself or herself in this country and intends to make a living here. We have had numerous cases of that kind in the interior of British Columbia, particularly in the building of pipe lines.

Then we have another abuse of the immigration facilities and in one case I found the officers of an international union cooperating with men in the United States, to the disadvantage of the Canadian workers, in making application for men to come into this country on the assumption that there was no Canadian capable of doing the job. They come in as technicians of a certain type and inside of a week they were driving a truck. I think that is a question that requires careful looking into and I think something should be done with respect to regulations in order to strengthen our officers at the ports of entry.

Then there is the question of securing employment for immigrants and I have raised this question previously. I think it is entirely wrong that, shall I say, the seeking of employment for Canadians and for immigrants should be in the hands of two departments. Here we have the employment service of Canada carrying on its functions normally with its officials largely tied to offices, with inability to travel. We have these officers dealing with registrations and applications of workers for employment in the region which the office serves, and we have the immigration officer doing his duty, able to travel all around the country. He receives a wire to say there are 20 immigrants coming tomorrow, and one immigration officer told me this was a proper headache.

I know several instances where he has just happened to meet an employer who wanted a man in a small community in my constituency and who had not time to register at the national employment office at Nelson or Trail. The immigration officer said, "I have certain men coming at a certain time, I can provide you with men", and one or two, or a number of immigrants obtain employment within a day or two of arrival in Canada.

At the same time there are in that community men who have had applications in the employment office for six months, married men with children, veterans who fought for this country in the second world war particularly. I know of cases where there has been hard feeling among the Canadian citizens affected in this way.

It is also unfair to the immigrant, who is sometimes subjected to a kind of disfavour, to put it very politely indeed, in a small community because he walks into that village —I do not blame him—and takes a job which other men are seeking, because they have been unemployed for some period of time.

I do think consideration should be given to bringing this question of employment under the unemployment service of Canada so that they can place applicants, as they register for jobs, in positions which are vacant. If someones arrives rather late, there is provision made for these people to be cared for and looked after in other ways for a certain time. I think that would be better than having this unfortunate state of affairs that causes a considerable amount of annoyance, to say the least, at certain times.

I want to ask the minister, at the request of a number of my constituents, what happens to an immigrant who has not become a Canadian citizen and who has committed a criminal offence or offences and has been sentenced to penitentiary for two years or more. What happens in the case of an immigrant who is sentenced to a year in jail, or six months in jail? In a case brought to my attention in the city of Revelstoke an immigrant spent six months in jail on three occasions, and the chap came back and went to work, and so on. What is the policy of the department in respect to immigrants who commit crimes, who are not Canadian citizens and who obviously, from their records, are not suitable citizens? What does the department do upon their release from penitentiary?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the usual practice is this. If a person who has not yet acquired domicile—which means residence, after being landed, for five years—commits an offence and is charged and sentenced, he then becomes liable to deportation. There is the odd case where, if he is a first offender, he might be given a chance to see whether he can make good. But his period of residence toward the establishment of domicile stops when he gets into trouble with the law, in most cases.

Mr. Herridge: Do you mean by that he has to start his five years over again?

Mrs. Fairclough: In the event that he has more than one conviction, of course in the average case he would be immediately deported. I might say, though—as my hon. friend probably knows—it is difficult to deport a person who comes from an iron curtain country, because the matter of deportation requires the consent of the country to which he will be deported. So I cannot give my hon. friend an over-all answer; but the general rule is that a person who has not yet acquired domicile and who has committed an offence for which he is convicted and serves a sentence would be deportable.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister mind commenting on my suggestion that this search for employment for both Canadian citizens and immigrants be brought under the Department of Labour.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, this is not at all a new suggestion. Not only my hon. friend but many other persons from time to time have made this suggestion.

Mr. Herridge: Even Conservatives, when they were in opposition.

Mrs. Fairclough: If the immigrant concerned comes from the United States or from some other English speaking country to an English community, or a French speaking country to a French community, he could probably report to the local national employment service and take his chances with others who are making application. However, it must be borne in mind that the immigration department is responsible for these people, or has made itself responsible for them for a year after their arrival. Many of them require an interpreter at first. They certainly require to be told the conditions under which they would seek employment in this country. In other words, they need to be guided for a considerable length of time after they arrive in Canada.

These are just a few of the reasons why we consider it necessary to do what we can to assist them. Moreover, if they are not employed they become more or less a charge on the immigration department. Consequently we do what we can to assist them to find housing, to find employment and to generally guide them in their first days in this country.

It is not our intention at any time to take work away from Canadians. In fact we have bent over backwards in that regard. The remarks which I made indicating the manner in which we are proceeding to try to circumvent such circumstances are the very remarks for which I was roundly criticized in this house today and in some of the newspapers of the country. But that is the very reason why we believe we should only bring into the country such workmen as have skills which are required at the present time and for which there are vacancies.

I might draw to the attention of my hon. friend that it is quite possible—I have said this on other occasions—that in a certain line of work there may be vacancies in the city of Toronto and surplus workers in Vancouver. The surplus workers in Vancouver, particularly if they are family people, are very loath to pull up stakes and go following the call of a job in the city of Toronto; and vice versa. We have these situations all the time.

So regardless of the fact that there may be unemployment in the country, there are always vacancies which are crying to be filled in some parts of the country. We do our best not to cause any difficulties in this regard, and we certainly try not to take jobs away from Canadians.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, could I just ask the minister one more question. I have been very patient indeed today, because I have been absent a great deal of the time. Has the minister given consideration to doing something to strengthen this section that permits immigrants to come in as landed immigrants when it is obvious that they are coming in under false pretences? It happens repeatedly. I want to explain this to the minister. I thought she was a bit snippy with me the other day when I asked a question, but I have forgiven her that already. I must say that this was brought to my attention and I suggested that the R.C.M.P. should check on this matter.

This is what I did. There were half a dozen men who came across from the United States at either Paterson or Newgate in my constituency, the ports along the Kootenay border. These men had come in as landed immigrants. I got in touch with the R.C.M.P. and told them these men claimed to be landed immigrants. They had come in as settlers and were working on the pipe line. I told the R.C.M.P. that it had been brought to my attention by other employees that they were boasting of the fact that they were only going to work while the pipe line was being constructed and then they were going back to the United States.

I had the R.C.M.P. check their licences. They were staying in British Columbia and using their United States licences because they were claiming to be only visitors. My suggestion was that the R.C.M.P. should check some of these cases. If they found a man had come in and was still using his United States licence under the pretext that he was a visitor on the one hand, in order to avoid taking out a British Columbia licence, claiming exemption as a visitor for six months and was claiming to be a landed immigrant on the other hand, there would be clear proof that there had been an entry under false pretences. I made that suggestion then, and now I make it again seriously. I think a few checks might do something to stop this practice which is very annoying for Canadian workers looking for employment on the same jobs.

Mrs. Fairclough: I find it a little difficult to understand the situation, because these people who come in as landed immigrants must, after all, undergo a certain examination, a health examination, and so on. I do not see any number of them doing that for the sake of being here for three months. On the other hand, if they come in as landed immigrants I think their automobiles would be listed as part of their household goods. I do not know what the regulations may be in British Columbia but in other provinces they are not allowed to use their cars after a stated period of time before securing a licence so I think it would be fairly easy to check. If a person comes in as an immigrant and brings his car as household goods, surely the provincial licensing authorities would be hot on his trail to make sure he lives up to his obligations. We have from time to time checked the reports which have come to us with respect to visitors working, particularly on pipe lines and on this one project at Cranbrook spread—is that the one the hon. gentleman was referring to?

Mr. Herridge: That is right. That is the most recent one.

Mrs. Fairclough: Just recently we checked that and there were only eight men working on it who were in the category of landed immigrants. All the others were Canadians.

Mr. Herridge: The minister mentioned Cranbrook spread and I notice that the leader of the official opposition made a speech in Cranbrook quite recently, touring around having certain designs in view, and one of the things brought to his attention at that meeting was this very matter, and I understand there were some vehement complaints made. There may have been only eight landed immigrants working at the time the minister made her check, but there were many more than that. In my district the number went up to hundreds when the pipe line was being built from Penticton to the southern portion of British Columbia. Incidentally the contractor refused to hire men through the national employment service. The manager told me the United States contractor told him he was not going to be bothered by this potty national employment service, but said: I am going to bring in the men I need, and the rest will line up outside the office door so I can pick the ones I want. One group was put to work for a week or two and then that group was fired and a new group was taken on, and so on. It was most unsatisfactory.

Mrs. Fairclough: We have a complete report on this, and if the hon. gentleman wishes to pursue the matter further we shall be glad to give it to him.

On the general question, I would remind the hon. member that it is one thing to ascertain what a person does and quite another to ascertain his intentions. All these people come forward as landed immigrants and fulfil the requirements of the act and bring their household goods. I do not know how we could possibly say to some of them: you are obviously not landed immigrants and obviously you do not want to stay in Canada. If it were obvious, we would not let them in.

Mr. Rapp: I wish to ask a short question. Are any immigrants landing in this country from behind the iron curtain, and are there many inquiries from people living behind the iron curtain about immigration to this country?

Mrs. Fairclough: Only from those who have relatives in Canada. We get inquiries from persons who have relatives behind the iron curtain in various countries who would like to bring their relatives to Canada. We get such inquiries from time to time. I would not say the volume is great, but we get quite a few.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member also asked whether there had been any immigrants landed from any countries behind the iron curtain.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh yes, there have been.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a subject I should like to pursue a little further. There have been periods, as the hon. lady well knows, when in certain of these iron curtain countries there may be a temporary relaxation and it would be somewhat easier for Canadian citizens who had left relatives there to get, say, their parents out of those countries. At the time I ceased to be minister that was certainly true of Poland. That was just after the troubles of 1956. A great many people managed to get out at that time. There have been one or two periods when it has been possible for a few people to get out of Russia but not very many. I understand there have been one or two cases where parents have even been allowed out of Hungary, but I am not sure if that is correct. I wonder if the hon. lady has any statistical information and if she could indicate what the prospects are and also what procedure has to be followed.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am afraid I cannot describe the procedure in sufficient detail at this time to be useful, but in answer to an earlier question, I now have the figures. Last year 4,426 persons came in from a number of iron curtain countries.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a factual question? Does that include Yugoslavia?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, there are two views about whether Yugoslavia is an iron curtain country and that is why I asked that question. Does that number also include people from China?

Mrs. Fairclough: No. There were 881 from Yugoslavia. Poland has from time to time permitted persons to leave; not all who wished to, but most of them come forward. When there are indications that a certain country is relaxing its procedures with regard to permitting its nationals to leave we try to hurry visas for those persons who have waited, probably for a long time, so that they may rejoin their people in this country. It is a spasmodic thing. Sometimes a country will permit persons to leave, and then, all of a sudden, close the gates and allow none out. These are situations which again require some flexibility in the policy of the government.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Will the house be dealing with these estimates tomorrow and, if so, what will the business be for next week?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will commence with second reading of the bill based on the resolution dealing with the Pension Act and in view of the lengthy discussion we had on the resolution stage it might be that second reading of that bill will pass the house fairly quickly; also in view of the fact that it is our intention to move that following second reading the bill be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs where the clauses may be studied in detail. That will be followed by the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

On Thursday, I generally attempt to forecast the following week's business, which is subject to change, but next week it will be this: on Monday we will have a private members' day; Tuesday will be government business with these items called, No. 9 on today's order paper, a resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport dealing with a proposed railway to Mattagami lake in the province of Quebec. The second item on Tuesday would be No. 3 on today's order paper, the second reading of Bill No. S-3, to repeal certain laws relating to the signal station at Halifax. This is also under the Minister of Transport. The third item on Tuesday would be item No. 5 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. C-61, to amend the Indian Act. I have no knowledge of whether the whole day would be spent on these three items or not. If there were any spare time on Tuesday we would then take up item No. 7 on today's order paper, the motion to set up a select committee on research.

For Wednesday, the first item to be called would be item No. 11 on today's order paper, referring the report of the Canada council to the public accounts committee. The second item on Wednesday would be item No. 12 on today's order paper, referring the public accounts and so forth to the standing committee on public accounts. That would be followed by the continuation of the debate on the budget resolutions.

On Thursday, we would continue the budget resolutions if they are not concluded on Wednesday.

On Friday we would take up estimates. If we have not finished citizenship and immigration we would start with those again on Friday and then carry on with agriculture.

Mr. Winch: If it is at all possible, since there is not likely to be any debate on these matters, would the minister have the two motions of reference to the public accounts brought up on Tuesday instead of Wednesday because the committee is desirous of meeting at 9.30 on Wednesday morning.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate that fact but unfortunately the Minister of Finance will not be here on Tuesday and I think he should be here when these items are brought forward.

At five minutes past ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 10, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

THE MINISTRY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESIGNATION OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have to announce the resignation of the hon. member for Victoria, (Ont.) (Mr. Hodgson) as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport. The resignation was received and I accepted it with regret. The hon. member has performed his duties in a manner befitting the responsibilities of his office. I can only say that it was with regret that the resignation was accepted, consequent upon the prospective acceptance by him of a position which in no way interferes with his right to sit as a member of parliament but might be inconsistent with the responsibilities of a parliamentary secretary.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, all members will have heard this announcement with great regret. The hon. member has been in the house a long time, and he has never hesitated to speak his mind frankly when he felt like doing so. However, he has always been able to do so without forfeiting the respect of his friends in the house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): We all listened with interest to this announcement by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has transferred his affection from mechanical to four-legged horses. We wish him every success in the new work he has undertaken.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have resigned as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport. One reason for doing so is that my health is not sufficiently good to cope with the amount of work the minister lays on your back. Nevertheless, I have got along well with the members of the department with whom I have worked. I never worked with anybody I enjoyed more than the Minister of Transport. Anything I have done for any of the members of the House of Commons has been a pleasure. I have other duties that will call me from this duty, and that will take some of my time. I believe a man can only do so much work; therefore I thought I might better serve my people in the agricultural industry of Canada in this other appointment.

I appreciate what was said by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, and also the leader of the C.C.F. party. I note that the hon. member for Kootenay West is shaking his head, but after all he has more to say than all the rest of the C.C.F. party, and sometimes three or four times as much. If he has not that portfolio, probably he should have it. I should like to advise him that I am not the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton; I am the hon. member for the electoral district of Victoria, Ontario, which includes Victoria, Haliburton and north Ontario counties, in area the largest riding in southern Ontario.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND SECRECY PROVISIONS TO FILES AND RECORDS

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-68, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, section 12 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act sets out the requirement that trials of children shall take place without publicity and separately and apart from the trials of adults. The act prohibits newspapers and all other publications published anywhere in Canada from publishing the names or disclosing the identity of anyone being prosecuted under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. The act therefore provides for secrecy in regard to the actual trial or hearing, but it does not provide this same secrecy in regard to the files and records respecting the trial.

The purpose of this bill is to extend the secrecy provisions of the act to these files and records, and to provide further that these records and files shall be destroyed after a period of five years from the date of the hearing or trial, if no new trial respecting such child or juvenile has taken place during the said period of five years.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AIR DEFENCE AND PRODUCTION SHARING—REPORTED CANADIAN PROPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he can confirm the fact that the Secretary of Defence of the United States government has received a formal proposal from the Canadian government concerning the air defence of the North American continent and production sharing. If so, can he give the house any indication of the nature of this proposal?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what proposal the Leader of the Opposition is referring.

Mr. Pearson: I am referring to a proposal which has been announced in Washington in a press release from the defence department dated February 6, which reads:

> The Secretary of Defence received a formal proposal from the Canadian government concerning the air defence of the North American continent and production sharing.

It is that proposal in this official announcement of the department of defence of the United States that I have asked the minister whether he can confirm; and if so, can he give any indication of the nature of the proposal.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions going on with the United States in connection with defence sharing, and various proposals have been put forward as far as Canada is concerned. I am not in a position to give any details to the house at the present time in this connection.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Defence Production arising out of this matter. Do these proposals referred to in the press release just quoted by the Leader of the Opposition, and also commented on by the Minister of National Defence, contain consideration of the exchange of the CL-44 transport plane for the Voodoo interceptor?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, we are always interested in getting production sharing to encourage all our industries in Canada.

BOMARC BASES—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister comment on a report in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday by Charles Lynch that the minister's initiative at the United Nations has been eroded by the establishment of Bomarc bases in Canada?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): That is a quite improper question for orders of the day.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLACEMENTS FOR RETIRING JUDGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the compulsory retirement of 13 judges on March 1, because of age, can the Prime Minister say whether these positions will be filled on that date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, naturally there are always available outstanding members of the legal profession who are prepared to serve as judges, even at great personal sacrifice. I hope that, generally speaking, the vacancies will be filled as considered appropriate, having regard to the necessity of there being no break in the administration of justice.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

MARITIMES—RESTORATION OF SCHOONER "ST. ROCHE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister in view of his known interest in matters that have historical value. Can the Prime Minister advise the house if he has noted the press reports that the famed R.C.M.P. schooner St. Roche is becoming a rotting hulk in the maritime museum and money is urgently needed for its restoration? If so, will consideration be given to financial aid to preserve this historic ship?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a specific answer to the question, naturally, having had no notice. However, I do appreciate the reference the hon. member made to the fact that I am intensely interested in the preservation of those historic things which, unless preserved, will be lost to Canadian generations to come. They are of the essence of Canadian history, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that anything that can be done to maintain and preserve these monuments will be done.

In so far as this specific question is concerned, I will ascertain the facts and report to the house at the earliest possible date.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the Prime Minister's obvious interest in maintaining these historic relics of the past, would the Prime Minister, while giving consideration to the schooner mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East, also give consideration to maintaining that historical monument, the last of the stern-wheelers now in the Kootenays, the Moyie, now moored at Kaslo?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that it is the last of the stern-wheelers. It was the last of the stern-wheelers. However, that is a matter that in the ordinary course of events will receive the attention it deserves.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister, now that all these historical matters are being discussed, also look into preserving the canoe of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker)?

TRANSPORT

NOVA SCOTIA—CONTINUATION OF FERRY SERVICE TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the importance of providing a constant supply of Nova Scotia groundfish, lobsters and scallops to the United States market, will the minister inform the house whether any action has been taken to assist Nova Scotia fishermen in transporting these items to the United States while the ferry Bluenose is undergoing her refit?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I am pleased to announce that following continued efforts by my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg and also by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, this service will be carried out by a vessel named O.K. Service 5 which belongs to the Himmelman Supply Company. This vessel is being prepared at the present time, and the first trip will be made on Monday, February 13.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the minister a related question. In view of the importance of maintaining good communications with Newfoundland, can the minister say when he expects the east coast ferry will be completed?

Mr. Balcer: I am sorry, but I cannot give the precise date at the moment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO AREAS OF CHRONIC UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister, and ask him whether a list of areas where unemployment is chronic has been prepared by various departmental officials and submitted to the cabinet for consideration and approval.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sure the hon. gentleman, with the experience he has had in the cabinet, realizes that that question is improper.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not realize any such thing, but if that is the answer which the Prime Minister is giving me I should like to ask him a supplementary question. My supplementary question in this. Has the Prime Minister taken note of an article which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald under the heading "Top Priority for Mining Communities" which reads:

> Top priority has been given Nova Scotia's mining communities and the Ontario uranium centre of Elliot Lake in a list of areas of chronic unemployment—

The article goes on to state that this list of areas where there is chronic unemployment includes Glace Bay, Sydney Mines, Inverness, Florence, New Waterford, the mining communities in Pictou, and so on. Since this information has appeared in a newspaper article, I am asking the Prime Minister if he has any comment to make on it and whether it is a correct statement of what is being done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not seen the article. One thing that I seem to be able to recall above everything else is that successive prime ministers have answered in these circumstances that in no circumstances is government policy introduced, or notice of it given to the House of Commons, by an observation on some speculative article.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of mounting unemployment is it the intention of the government to order a series of on the spot inspections of conditions in the hard-hit areas of Canada, along the lines of action presently being taken in the United States?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No such decision has been arrived at by the government.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RELEASE OF BILL TO PRESS BEFORE INTRODUCTION IN CHAMBER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the Prime Minister's anxiety to ensure that parliamentary business is conducted in the proper way, will the right hon. gentleman explain why a press release was issued by the Department of Veterans Affairs yesterday giving the details of the bill concerning veterans pensions before that bill was introduced in the House of Commons?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of a press release being issued prior to first reading of the bill in the House of Commons.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, this press release was issued yesterday and appears in the press this morning. The bill in question was circulated to hon. members after it appeared in the press.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was circulated just this morning.

Mr. H. F. Jones (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): If I may be permitted to comment on this matter, Mr. Speaker, my information is that the copies of the press release were distributed after the bill was introduced in the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: But before it was available to hon. members.

Mr. Jones: It was introduced in the house, however.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am informed, and indeed the record shows, that full details of the bill were available to the press and the public before copies of the bill were made available to hon. members of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: The release is headed "For immediate release".

Mr. Speaker: Unless the Leader of the Opposition suggests that there is a question of privilege involved—

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there is; affecting all hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: —if I am correct in my interpretation of what has been said, the bill was read the first time in the house and was therefore in the hands of the house before the press release was given.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister if he would comment on the fact that the details in regard to this bill appeared in the press release and were given to the public yesterday before copies of the bill were available to hon. members of the house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this is another of the hon. gentleman's duds. As a matter of fact, according to the parliamentary secretary first reading was given in this house yesterday. My hon. friend opposite has before him this morning's edition of the Globe and Mail—

Mr. Cardin: Which was published last night.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and of course any newspaper would have available to it the full details of the bill to which first reading was given last evening at 5.30, I understand.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Well, Mr. Speaker, I happened to be in the house when first reading was given to the bill. The bill has only this morning—since the sitting started this morning—been made available to hon. members

Mr. Speaker: I thought this matter was being raised as a question of privilege, but I think it is a question of the administrative acts of the minister and the parliamentary secretary. If the matter has been sufficiently aired we will pass to other business.

Mr. Chevrier: But it has not.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, just so the record is clear, let me say I was informed by officials of the House of Commons that 150 copies of the bill were available yesterday at noon for distribution to hon. members if the bill was required for second reading yesterday.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Churchill: I am not responsible for the actual distribution of copies of bills in the House of Commons.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the minister when his departmental news release No. 68 on this matter headed "for immediate release" was issued?

Mr. Jones: It was issued, Mr. Speaker, right after first reading of the bill which then became a matter of public record—

Mr. Pickersgill: But not available to hon. members of the house.

Mr. Jones: —and available, as the minister said, to hon. members of this house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question the desirability of having a debate on this matter. There have been several questions and several supplementaries and it seems to me the facts have been sufficiently elicited. If there is comment to be made it should be made at a time when debate is permitted.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the only reason it was raised in the first place was because of the answer which the Prime Minister gave in connection with the areas of chronic unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that the reasons for raising it are of concern. It seems to me there have been sufficient questions on the topic.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on this question, and I ask Your Honour for permission to make a statement in answer to what the parliamentary secretary has said. We on this side of the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member makes a statement he must lay a foundation for it either by a point of order or a question of privilege. Otherwise the hon. gentleman has no right to the floor.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the foundation for the point I intend to make is that the statement made by the parliamentary secretary is inaccurate. The hon. member may have made it involuntarily but it is inaccurate nevertheless, because we on this side of the house communicated with the distribution office and the bill in question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The answers which are given in response to questions asked at this period of the proceedings of the house are not subject to comment or debate. They may be inaccurate or they may be incorrect, but unless it is done by way of supplementary question to clarify the accuracy it is not open to the hon. member to follow the course he is following.

Mr. Chevrier: It is a question of the privileges of the house and whether the house has been misled.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a question of privilege I will hear him, of course, but this matter has arisen out of the normal process of asking questions of a minister under his administrative responsibility. If there is a question of privilege, will the hon. member state it first and then we will see whether it is one that should be pursued.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to state the privilege as being this, that at ten o'clock this morning we inquired of the distribution office whether the bill was available and we were told it was not. That is a question of fact. Then, as I was asking a question on orders of the day, the bill was put on my desk by a page boy, so this completely contradicts what has been said by the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Speaker: It may be contradictory, but I see no question of privilege. Bills are distributed in the ordinary course of events, and I consider the matter closed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege surely arises out of the fact that the parliamentary secretary said the bill was available to us last evening, when the fact is that we ascertained from the distribution office at ten o'clock this morning that the bill was not available.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I see no question of privilege involved. The parliamentary secretary may or may not be correct. If he wants to make the matter clear he may have the floor, but surely it is not a question of the privileges of the house that such a statement is inaccurate or not.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO ANALYSIS OF WEIGHT REDUCING PREPARATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I sent notice of this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but perhaps in his absence I might direct it to the parliamentary secretary or the acting minister. Can the minister indicate to the house whether any analyses have been made of the so-called weight reducing preparations such as Metrecal and Quota and their effects. If so, can he make a report on the results of such analyses?

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Minister of National Health and Welfare should be back on Monday, and I will take notice of the question.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1959-60 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing absence of the Minister of Agriculture and the absence of his parliamentary secretary, I wonder whether I might ask the Acting Minister of Agriculture if he can tell the house when an announcement will be made of an interim payment on last year's wheat crop?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. Not having had any notice of the question, I think the hon. member will realize that I am not in a position to give that information. In fact, I have not got it.

Mr. Argue: Perhaps the minister would do so on Monday if his colleague is still away.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will raise the matter on Monday.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING PAYMENTS PERMITTING APPEALS, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-67, to amend the Pension Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to deal at length with the new bill now before us, in view of the fact that we had a lengthy discussion at the resolution stage of the bill and, second, because it is one of those amending bills containing a number of clauses which does not lend itself to the discussion of a general principle on second reading at which time, under the rules of the house—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order at this stage. A bill has been put on our desks without a number on it, and the bill that has been called for discussion is Bill No. C-67 under item No. 6 on the order paper. I am wondering whether the bill that has been distributed is the same as the one now under discussion. How is the bill to be identified?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, my responsibilities do not go so far as to encompass the numbering of bills, which is a matter for the general administration of the House of Commons. The bill which has been distributed this morning and which I presume will be given a number deals with amendments to the Pension Act, as is stated on the cover. That is the one which is under discussion at the present time and for which I hope there will be general approval. I am now informed that it is Bill No. C-67.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure what the explanation is for the absence of the number, to which the hon. member for Ottawa West properly draws attention, but the bill which is placed before the house for second reading as Bill No. C-67 is the printed bill in the hands of members entitled "an act to amend the Pension Act". There has perhaps been some error on the part of the administration in not having the number placed on the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps the matter can be clarified if the minister will assure us that there were no changes made in the bill after it was printed and before first reading.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Churchill: There have been no changes made. This is the bill which received first reading yesterday and the copy I have in my hand on the face of it reads "Bill C-67". Other copies which do not have that number on it are, I judge, ones that were made available earlier today.

Mr. Howard: I should like to raise another point of order. I do not wish to be objectionable about it, but perhaps it is a matter on which the house should make a determination. It is my understanding that bills cannot be proceeded with unless they are printed in English and French and it is so indicated on the order paper. I notice that under order No. 6 there is no such indication that the bill has been printed in English and French. Perhaps that matter should also be cleared up.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of the bill with no number on it. However, I asked for two copies, one in French and one in English, because I generally like to compare them, and I was told that there are French copies left but that there are no more English copies available. I do not think it is fair to members of the house to have only one side of the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caron: You can laugh but you do not understand much about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is clear that under the rules the bill cannot be proceeded with unless it is printed in both English and French. I was asking for the assurance of the officials of the house, and perhaps the minister will give me a minute to make sure that the bill is available in both languages.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it appears from the remarks from both parties on the other side of the house that they do not wish to proceed with the bill today.

Mr. Caron: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I object to what has been said by the minister. I do not object to continuing with the bill. I simply want to state that the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may properly take exception to the remark, but I am endeavouring to verify that the bill is available in the hands of the house in both languages.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of the bill in French. At the same time, may I say that I am informed by Mr. Ollivier, the parliamentary counsel, that the bill was available to members yesterday immediately after its introduction and first reading.

Mr. Pearson: Tell your distribution office.

Mr. Speaker: I am advised that there are copies of the bill available in English and in French, but that the number of copies is limited. If the house does not wish to proceed in the absence of a copy in each language for every member, then a point might be taken. Is the house prepared to proceed under the circumstances?

Mr. Caron: I think we should proceed. I just wanted to show that the government has no respect for the rights of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is apparent that there is some endeavour being made to hold up this matter. The statements that have been made from various sections of the house this morning, and the questions asked earlier, indicate a disregard for the proceedings on the part of the opposition. Therefore I suggest that in view of their apparent opposition to this going on today we should proceed to another order of business.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister, as has happened before, has completely misrepresented the position of the opposition. We are anxious to get ahead with this bill.

An hon. Member: Let us get ahead, then.

Mr. Pearson: We are anxious to get ahead with the bill, even though the bill is not numbered and even though at ten o'clock this morning we were told by the distribution office that the bill was not available. We are willing to overlook these technicalities and get ahead with the bill.

Mr. Speaker: There have been some charges and counter-charges made, perhaps not strictly in accordance with the matter before the house. Second reading has been moved, and the house will proceed with the second reading unless it makes another direction. I think it would require the unanimous consent of the house to defer the matter. Will the minister proceed?

Mr. Diefenbaker: They ran for cover.

Mr. Speaker: Before the minister does proceed, perhaps the Prime Minister's suggestion is one that has to be determined by the house, because in the absence of a copy in each language—oh, the Clerk advises me now that there are copies available in each language for each member, and that disposes of any point of order.

Mr. Pearson: Notwithstanding this technical difficulty that there is not a copy in each language available—

Some hon. Members: There is.

Mr. Pearson: —for every member, as you have observed, Mr. Speaker, and notwithstanding the fact that the bill I have is just "C-blank", and notwithstanding the fact that copies of the bill were not available until 10.30 this morning, I think we should press ahead and perhaps the government's procedure will be more regular next time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Notwithstanding what the Leader of the Opposition now says, the question before the house is whether or not we shall go ahead. The attitude taken by hon. members was indicative of a desire to raise a storm concerning a matter of no importance—

Mr. Caron: The Prime Minister should not—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think if the house will review the course of proceedings since this matter was raised first as a question on orders of the day, it will decide to proceed without further reference to any of these matters. The Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Churchill: It would seem, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Howard: I have a question of privilege to raise, but I waited until the initial point of order had been settled. My question of privilege relates to the remarks of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and also the remarks of the Prime Minister, both of whom imputed motives to myself for having raised this point of order in the first place. I refer to the incorrect accusation of both hon. gentlemen that there was something nefarious and underhanded about this point.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I heard no reference to the hon. member, and I see no question of privilege. There have been statements made on both sides of the house which in my opinion would have been better not made. However, I do not see any question of privilege.

Mr. Howard: May I rise on a point of order and ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs to withdraw their underhanded and scurrilous remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will be placing himself in a position where he will be asked to withdraw if he does not observe the Speaker's rulings.

Mr. Howard: I would only be on an equal basis—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think even the hon. member should be required to withdraw those last statements. It is customary with him to use language like that on occasion, and I think it should be withdrawn. There is nothing of a scurrilous nature in pointing out that the points that have been raised apparently had a design in mind. If he did not have a design I am sure no one would suggest that he did, but these latter remarks of his cannot go unchallenged. The words "scurrilous" and "underhanded"—not that I have any sensitivity about anything the hon. gentleman says —go against the rules of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: The words complained of were not directed to any specific individual.

An hon. Member: They were directed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Well, perhaps the Prime Minister would indicate—I agree that if the word "scurrilous" was applied to the Prime Minister it should be withdrawn. Does the hon. member who had the floor accept the responsibility for applying the word "scurrilous" to a particular member of the house?

Mr. Howard: I am sure the record is clear in itself. I might say that I accept the withdrawal of the remarks of the Prime Minister in his initial statement, in any event.

Mr. Speaker: Well, before I insist on withdrawal I should like to be satisfied as to the application of the word. I think perhaps the application was clear enough. I would ask the hon. member for Skeena to reconsider and withdraw the words "scurrilous", and "underhanded" as applied to statements from the government side of the house, because in my view that is unparliamentary and should not be made a precedent. I hope he will recognize the force and the meaning of the word "scurrilous". If he wishes to refer to a dictionary he will find that the implications of it are not such as should be applied between hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Pearson: May I, in view of this statement of yours, Mr. Speaker, ask the Prime Minister to withdraw the observation that the opposition had any design in raising this matter. The opposition's design is to proceed as quickly as possible with this bill, but perhaps the Prime Minister will withdraw his observation that we had something in mind—

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Another point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): This has nothing at all to do with the matter that was raised—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition perhaps was rising on a point of order. I do not know upon what other grounds he would have the floor. He cannot be interrupted on a point of order, and a point of order cannot be raised while another point of order is being taken.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Pearson: I just want to repeat that the Prime Minister might be asked to withdraw his observation that we had some sinister design in mind—

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; there was a question before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member resume his seat and allow the Leader of the Opposition to continue.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Speaker, I think there is a point of order that intervened in the present point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member resume his seat and allow the Leader of the Opposition to make his point of order. One point of order cannot be made while another point of order is being considered.

Mr. Drysdale: But there was a point being considered—

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I could resume my remarks if the hon. member would sit down.

Mr. Drysdale: There was a question of privilege before the house, and I do not believe a point of order can intervene.

Mr. Pearson: You have given your decision, Mr. Speaker, and I assume it is not going to be upset by the member on my left. I said, speaking to my point of order—

Mr. Drysdale: There was a question of privilege before the house.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the hon. member would sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the Leader of the Opposition give me the floor?

An hon. Member: One thing at a time.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that it is in order to resume the proper consideration of the matter which is before the house. A little bit of restraint and perhaps a little bit of give and take are necessary. Feelings have been aroused by statements which were made from one side and from the other. I did not feel it necessary to intervene. Charges are made from time to time that hon. members are delaying proceedings. It is questionable whether that raises a matter of privilege. On the other hand, charges have been levelled at the government benches and there is the question of a statement made by the hon. member for Skeena. It was an improper statement, as I have indicated to him.

I would suggest that all hon. members who have participated in this fruitless debate to this point allow me to accept their withdrawal of any remarks that might be offensive, and that we proceed. Is it agreed that we proceed on that basis?

Some hon. Members: Proceed.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): On this question may I say that a clearly slanderous remark has been made against the Prime Minister of this country. As a member of this House of Commons I demand that it be withdrawn unqualifiedly and immediately, and suggest that no other matter should be allowed to intervene until it is dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: As my suggestion apparently has not met with acceptance, I must come back to the Prime Minister's objection to the words "scurrilous and underhanded" which I take it the Prime Minister asserts were directed toward him.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: Will the Prime Minister please assist me in this matter of the words complained of and the party to whom they were directed?

Mr. Churchill: I can assist you, Mr. Speaker, in that matter. The words "scurrilous and underhanded" were directed by the hon. member for Skeena against the Prime Minister and myself.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: I am giving the hon. member for Skeena an opportunity to deal with the matter.

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is quite true that I used the words. I consider them to be on an equal footing with the imputation of sinister motives by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs against me.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has not availed himself of the opportunity of dealing with the request which I made for reconsideration of these words as applied to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Unless he advises me that he did not intend those words to be directed to the two hon. members, I shall order him to withdraw them.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to indicate that the remarks apply to the imputations themselves.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Howard: I do not know why I should be asked to withdraw when the Prime Minister can sit there in his seat without doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I can deal with only one matter at a time. I am asking the hon. member either to deny that those remarks were intended to refer to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs or to withdraw them unconditionally.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Howard: Inasmuch as Your Honour can deal with only one matter at a time, I suggest with deference that you deal with the matter originally raised in objection to imputation of sinister motives.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will give the hon. member one more chance before I name him.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, out of deference to you and my respect for the position you hold in this House of Commons, but out of no respect for the comments and the gleeful applause of hon. members for the other side of the house, may I say this. In the absence of such gleeful applause I certainly would without hesitation withdraw the remarks. However, with no disrespect to Your Honour, I think I must take the latter course you suggest.

Mr. Speaker: In that event it is my duty, painful though it is, to name the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister would now withdraw the imputation of motives attributed to this side in attempting to get this bill proceeded with in a proper way.

Mr. Speaker: I have named the hon. member. Of course it is the duty of the house leader to consider what appropriate action should be taken. I shall deal in due course with the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Churchill: In view of your decision, Mr. Speaker, concerning the reluctance of the hon. member for Skeena to withdraw his words I now move, seconded by the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton):

> That the hon. member for Skeena be suspended for the duration of this day's sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say aye.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I would ask whether or not this motion can be discussed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Argue: Then on a point of order we shall call for a recorded vote on this motion, because we feel it is unjustified.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion that has been moved by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and seconded by the Postmaster General is:

That the hon. member for Skeena be suspended for the duration of this day's sitting.

Mr. Argue: In the 16 years I have been here I have never seen this happen previously.

Mr. Speaker: Fortunately this is not the kind of thing which has arisen previously in my experience or I suppose, in that of most hon. members of the house. I am advised that at the time the motion is put the hon. member concerned might be permitted to make such extenuating remarks as he wishes to make, if he desires to do so. If not, the motion will be put.

Mr. Howard: I do know, Mr. Speaker, what is meant by the words "extenuating remarks".

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising to speak on a point of order?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Reading from the fourth edition of Beauchesne, paragraph 134, it would appear that the procedure which has been laid down in a case like this is that the hon. member is to offer such explanation as is forthcoming before any motion is made for him to withdraw. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that such opportunity was offered to the hon. member and he made certain explanations. According to Beauchesne, following the motion which has been made by the house leader the hon. member, in accordance with practice, withdraws immediately; and there is a procedure set forth if he does not withdraw which involves the Sergeant-at-Arms. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps we should follow this procedure which has been followed in the past.

Mr. Speaker: What the hon. member says does not indicate any practice against allowing the hon. member whose conduct is in question to make an extenuating statement if he wishes to do so. That was the course followed the last time this procedure was used.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, not to abuse the privilege that I have at the moment I may just say briefly that as hon. members will know, I think, this arose from comments of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Prime Minister, following that, to the effect that those of us in the opposition who raised the initial point of order as to whether or not the bills were printed in English and French were engaging in delaying tactics and did not want to proceed with this particular bill today.

It was the imputation of that motive to which I objected and which occasioned the remarks I made, as I tried to indicate earlier. I think it is extremely unfortunate, of course, that in the heat of debate, perhaps, the Minister of Veterans Affairs initially said something he would not normally have said upon more calm reflection and would not have imputed these motives to me. That is why I made the other comments.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has indicated the provocation which induced him to engage in the conduct just now complained of, but if he has nothing to say about his own conduct I shall put the motion.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to say a word on behalf of the official opposition with regard to this painful matter. I understand it is possible—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry; the motion is not debatable. The only precedent is that the person involved may make a statement. The subject matter of the motion itself is not debatable and must be put.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, for clarification, could you confirm the fact that the hon. member was named solely because, whatever provocation he may have had, he used the words, "scurrilous and underhanded" as applied to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and there is no other issue involved in this matter?

Mr. Speaker: I can confirm that the words now used by the Leader of the Opposition, "scurrilous and underhanded", as applied to the hon. members on the government side who made statements in the course of the discussion, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs, were the words which I thought ought not to have been used and should have been withdrawn.

Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: The question is as follows:

That the hon. member for Skeena be suspended for the duration of this day's sitting.

Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, before the vote is called, I have not had an opportunity as yet to say what I would have said earlier. As the ruling has been made—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I get the leave of the house for the Prime Minister to speak—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: —because after the vote has been called, the Prime Minister may speak only by leave of the house—

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It has no reference at all to this matter. I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Would the Prime Minister give me an opportunity to consider this? Standing order No. 8 provides that when hon. members have been called in preparatory to a division no further debate is permitted. As I understand it, the Prime Minister was not rising for the purpose of debate but to raise a question of privilege. In our practice in the past I think the Speaker has not allowed any point to be raised in the course of a division but has dealt with it afterward, and that is why I suggested that the Prime Minister might have the leave of the house. I shall ask the house again if it is prepared to give the Prime Minister leave to interrupt the division.

Mr. Argue: All right: let us hear him.

Mr. Pearson: On that point, Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister interrupts the division by unanimous consent and makes a statement I assume that other hon. members will have an opportunity to comment on that statement at once, before the division is taken.

Mr. Speaker: In the circumstances, as there is not unanimous consent, I think perhaps the proper course to follow is to proceed with the motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Churchill) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. The Prime Minister was rising on a question of privilege in the course of the division.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, earlier today there was some objection raised as to an alleged allegation on my part that what had taken place this morning had been designed to hold up the bill in the question. Any implication of that kind was the farthest thing from my mind. There was no design in that regard, and I want to make it unequivocally clear so there will be no misunderstanding whatsoever in that connection. After all, I would not suggest a design. I could think of a thoughtless result, but I am sure that a design cannot be and would not be attributed to hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Prime Minister has dealt with this point of order which we on this side raised earlier with regard to imputations that we thought were made as to the motives for the point we raised in connection with the bill. It seems to me that if this withdrawal could have taken place earlier the whole unhappy business would not have arisen.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, naturally we accept the word of the Prime Minister when he says that he did not wish to impute to opposition members motives designed to hold up the progress of the bill in question. I think these remarks might better have been made much earlier, although they are acceptable at this time. If that had been done I am quite sure that the vote that has been taken would not have been necessary.

The rules of this house are important, Mr. Speaker. The rules of the house must be sustained if parliament is to carry on its business in a democratic way, but I suggest there is a well known practice and it is well established that rulings and decisions must be meted out fairly to all members on both sides of the house at all times. If I may venture to suggest something, Your Honour, I suggest that in considering statements by members of the house every effort must be made to consider the statements in the light of the actual words used, and that the consideration should not in any way be influenced by the person or the office of the person who uses the words.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member now seems to me to be addressing his remarks not only to the Chair but about the Chair, and I hope he will not continue in that vein.

Mr. Argue: All I was saying was that in dealing with members of the house an effort must be made—history and the record of previous Speakers show this—to deal with members on both sides of the house on equal terms and, Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: —the Prime Minister should have said earlier what he has just said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. member to resume his seat if that is the substance of his remarks. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has the floor.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, in introducing the second reading of Bill No. C-67, an act to amend the Pension Act, I am sure all members will wish to proceed with the second reading stage as expeditiously as possible in view of the fact that we had a lengthy discussion at the resolution stage and in view of the fact that as the bill is an amending bill it deals with a number of particulars which can be more readily discussed in committee. There is also the fact that after second reading of the bill it is my intention to move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs so the members of that committee may examine it in all its details and have available to them the expert advice of officials of the department in case there are any matters that require further explanation.

Without discussing the various segments of the bill I might, however, emphasize that its main purpose is to increase the pensions that are being paid to disabled veterans. I will just indicate the extent of the support which our country is giving the men who suffered disability in wartime. Reading from the annual report of the Department of Veterans Affairs for the fiscal year 1959-60, page 73, I note that for world war I the number of people drawing disability pensions as of March 31, 1960 was 47,845, and their dependents numbered 14,812. The total on the rolls for world war I is 62,657. In so far as world war II is concerned, the number drawing disability pension is 104,911 and their dependents number 17,546, for a total of 122,457.

The annual liability as of March 31, 1960 for both wars was $144,899,781. It might be of interest to the house to put on Hansard the figures with regard to service in the first and second world wars as well as Korea, and indicate the number who became pensioners as a result of these wars. The number who served in world war I totalled 619,636 men and women. Of these 110,000 became pensioners, and of these pensioners 56,002 have since died and 46,482 are still on the pension rolls. In so far as world war II was concerned there were 1,086,343 men and women who served. Of these, 124,401 became pensioners and 11,338 of these pensioners have since died, leaving 105,294 who are still receiving pensions. In so far as the Korean war is concerned there were 26,791 men and women who served. Of these, 2,032 became pensioners and 49 of these pensioners have since died, leaving 1,636 who are still receiving pensions.

Each year the pension commission, pursuing a constant task, has found it necessary to add people to the pension rolls. During the fiscal year 1959-60, 219 new pensions were awarded to veterans of world war I; 1,981 new pensions were awarded to veterans of world war II and 62 new pensions were awarded to veterans of the Korean war. Of course each year the number who die and pass off the pension rolls increases. So far as world war I veterans are concerned, they are passing off the pension rolls now at the rate of about 2,500 per year.

The problem, however, continues and will continue for many years, and the financial obligation undertaken by the people of Canada is as I have indicated. It was a larger burden on the country some years ago when our population was smaller. In 1930 the financial obligation for pensions was about 9 per cent of the total government expenditures. In 1960, with the great increase in government income and the great increase in government expenditures, the pension commitment represented 2 per cent of total government expenditures.

The bill before us, Mr. Speaker, indicates an increase of approximately $30 million. It deals with all categories who come on the pension rolls, graduated according to the percentage of disability from 100 per cent down to 10 per cent. The bill deals also with the dependents of pensioners and with additional pensions for children. It would be improper, perhaps, to deal in detail with each one of the changes that have been made in these various categories. This can be done in committee. The bill as printed indicates quite clearly the new scale of pensions and gives a comparison with the old scale. Most of our pensioners are below the 50 per cent rating but there are, of course, large numbers who are in the heavier disability classes from 50 per cent up to 100 per cent.

We hope that through this measure the payments to our disability pensioners will be kept somewhat in accord with the general increase in the cost of living that has occurred over the years, and that they will be placed in a position where they are able to look after themselves, as they all want to do, without being dependent upon other sources for support.

As I mentioned yesterday, the contribution made by our disabled pensioners has been great. They will carry a burden all their lives from the service they performed, and the people of Canada try to compensate them in part for some of that burden by the pensions that have been in operation over the years and by the increases which we are now presenting to the house.

I hope the house will accept the suggestions in this bill, examine it with care in the standing committee and in committee of the whole when the bill comes back to the house, and pass it as early as is conveniently possible. Then the bill can go to the other place for consideration. I commend Bill No. C-67 to the consideration of the house, and I hope it will meet with general approval.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, on second reading we debate the principle of the bill. The principle of this bill is the same as that of the resolution which preceded it and to which we have already given unreserved support. It would seem unnecessary to repeat what we have already said at the resolution stage. We have not had this bill in our hands long enough to study it and find out how the principle has been actually applied to the various categories of veterans and their dependents.

Here, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should raise a point of order, because the bill which I have in my hand seems to be different from the one the minister has. Section 1 of my bill says:

> Schedules A and B of the Pension Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

There is nothing substituted therefor in my bill; it is just blank. On the following page the explanatory note states:

> Schedules A and B at present read as follows:

The schedules in my bill are those showing the present rates. Hence we are at a loss to know just what change has been made in the regular scales by this bill.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If I may, I should like to speak to the point of order that has been raised. If the hon. member looks at page 2 he will find the new schedule. It takes up the whole page.

Mr. Carter: I am grateful for the explanation, Mr. Chairman. I accept the correction.

We learn from the press that the percentage increase is somewhere about 20 per cent. That figure, of course, is a great deal below the figure of 33⅓ per cent recommended by the Canadian Legion. Perhaps this is all that can be afforded at the present time. However, we feel that the veterans will be grateful for even this increase, which is urgently needed in many cases. We are hoping that before too long it will be possible to increase the rates again in order to bring them up to the level recommended by the Canadian Legion.

I am glad to know that the bill is to be studied by the standing committee on veterans affairs. No doubt, as usual, many worth-while suggestions will be coming forward from that committee, and we hope the government and the minister will see fit to incorporate them into amendments to the bill now before us.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to make a few brief observations on the bill. As the minister said, this bill to amend the Pension Act has as its main purpose the increasing of disability pensions. The representations recently made to the government by the Canadian Legion recommended that the rates payable under schedules A and B of the Pension Act be increased so that pensioners will regain the position of equality of income, as compared with custom guards, cleaners, helpers and army privates, that was in effect in 1920. In order to achieve that objective the Canadian Legion suggested that a 33⅓ per cent increase in disability pensions would be required.

However, in the bill we notice that the increase is only approximately 20 per cent. That figure is considerably below what the Legion and other organizations thought was necessary at this time in order to compensate veterans and their dependents for the increase in the cost of living and bring them more into line with the increase in wages and so on.

In that connection I would say this. While I am sure the increase will be welcomed by veterans and their dependents across Canada and by members of this House of Commons, it nevertheless falls considerably short, shall I say, of the amount sought by the veterans organizations and of the expectations raised in view of the use of the word "substantial". Of course, Mr. Chairman, that is a relative term. The word "substantial" can mean different things depending on whether you are on the paying end or on the receiving end of any question. It can have different meanings to different people, of course.

I also noticed that in the bill there are a number of other amendments which I am sure will be welcomed by the veterans organizations and by the veterans and their dependants. They are useful and purposeful amendments. However, there again we notice that a number of amendments recommended by the Canadian Legion, the national council of veterans and other veterans organizations have been, shall I say, overlooked. To that extent I presume there will be some disappointment.

When the minister was speaking I listened most attentively, as I usually do to the Minister of Veterans Affairs when he is speaking on veterans affairs. He mentioned that the percentage of the national income that was required to meet the obligations to veterans in Canada in 1930 was about 9 per cent, if I heard him correctly.

Mr. Churchill: Nine per cent of the national expenditure.

Mr. Herridge: That was my mistake; I should have said 9 per cent of the national expenditure. He also stated that the amount required in 1960 was about 2 per cent of the national expenditure. This clearly indicates that while there has been an enormous increase in our production, in tax collection and consequently in national expenditure, apparently the financial responsibility accepted by the federal government for the veterans and their welfare has declined to a considerable extent in percentage since 1930.

Therefore we must remember that in 1930, in the depression years, the government was able to afford 9 per cent of the national expenditure, according to the minister. We spent, in 1960, only 2 per cent. I think that is a rather good argument in support of the representations made by the Legion and other veterans organizations for the increase they requested. I think it is at least a clear illustration of the modest demands made by the Canadian Legion and of their responsible approach to this problem at this time.

During his remarks the minister paid to the veterans of Canada a tribute which we all heartily endorse. I will say little more at this time. I am going to conclude these few brief remarks because the minister has said that the bill is going to the veterans affairs committee, where the veterans organizations will have an opportunity to make their representations and their points and the members of the committee will have an opportunity to ask questions. I am sure that as in the past, as all members of the committee regardless of party have the interests of the veterans at heart, there will be the usual close study of this legislation and serious consideration of the representations made by representatives of the veterans organization. There is therefore, in my opinion, no occasion for a lengthy debate on the motion for second reading of this bill at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The question is the following: Mr. Churchill, seconded by Mr. Balcer moves that—

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I could be permitted to speak now, it will take me just one minute or two.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very well.

Mr. Churchill: Could we carry on for five minutes, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps finish this business?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Does the house give unanimous consent to carrying on?

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I had no intention of speaking on the second reading of this bill and I should, of course, have made these remarks at the resolution stage. But I was out of the house yesterday when the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Jones), the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, spoke and it was only this morning that my attention was drawn to what he had to say at the resolution stage as reported at page 1886 of yesterday's Hansard.

I have no desire to enter into any kind of controversy with the hon. member or anyone else. The hon. member referred to a statement I had made the day before in which I had said, as reported at page 1867 of Hansard:

> It may well be asked what right have I to get up and say anything on this subject because from 1953 to 1957 I was a member of the government and was the representative in the government of the province of Newfoundland. While I admit all that, as my friend the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, pointed out this problem was not brought to our attention at that time by these people.

I think if the hon. member for Saskatoon would look carefully at the preceding paragraph he would see that when I made that observation I was referring to the Newfoundland forestry corps, and that the letter to which he drew attention—which I must confess, quite frankly, I had forgotten having written—which I addressed to my then colleague, Mr. Lapointe, had reference to army veterans who had enlisted in the British forces, which I maintained in my letter ought to be considered as being tantamount to having served in the forces of their own country. I say this because the British forces were, at the time they served in them, the forces of their own country. On reading what the hon. member put on Hansard I recollected the circumstances very well indeed. I admit that I was somewhat irritated by the reply I received at that time, but that problem, of course, has been very largely rectified.

I do not know precisely—I confess it; I have no record to check—when the plight of the forestry corps was first drawn to my attention. The hon. member, I am sure quite rightly, pointed out that it had been drawn to the attention of the government before I was a member of it. I do not remember precisely; but it was brought to my own attention quite some time afterwards. However, I stand by what I said later at the resolution stage, that whatever the deficiencies of the previous government may have been in this matter—and personally I think there were deficiencies—I think those deficiencies should be corrected now with the least possible delay.

There is just one other point I want to add to reinforce again what I said the other day. I do not think that the forestry corps comes within the ambit of section 38 of the terms of union, but I do think it is not a matter of their rights under the constitution. It is a matter of the spirit of confederation and the proper assimilation, under the principles of natural justice, of these veterans who though they were not enlisted men served in exactly the same way, under exactly the same hazards as the Canadian forestry corps, who were enlisted men.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have been very interested in following the debate of this matter for the last two or three days. I am impressed by the statements that have been made by hon. members on both sides of the house and the support that has been given to the legislation we now have before us.

But I am concerned about one matter. I am very concerned about something that happened earlier this day that would indicate that it may not be advantageous for the members of the house, for the members of the veterans affairs committee, or for the organizations that are interested in veterans affairs to have in the bill this clause which indicates that the act will only become law the first of the month following the passing of the bill. I would suggest that the government should amend this so that the bill will come into force on the day of first reading. If this is not done, it seems to me that the committee is going to be working against the end of February as a deadline to see that all readings of this bill are given prior to that date so this date of March 1 can be the qualifying date.

I suggest that this may be the result. It may not, but it may and therefore I think it is a bad thing if it prevents any organization making the full representation that they may wish to make in relation to any segment of this legislation. I am aware of the requests that have been made by many of the organizations, and I am aware that this bill does not completely satisfy those requests.

While I agree that it is more than people can expect—when they ask for something, they do not necessarily always expect to get it—I think they do expect the opportunity of preparing an argument to indicate that they would like, and for good reasons, more to be done than is being done, no matter how much that may be.

It is for this reason that I hope the government will give serious consideration to withdrawing that clause which puts a deadline in the bill, and will put in a very simple clause which would mean that this legislation would be retroactive to the day of first reading. If the government does not see fit to do that then there may be other methods open to me as a private member to try to accomplish it.

But I would strongly urge the government to eliminate any unpleasantness that may have arisen and any fear that may have been indicated in people's minds, that if the deadline of the end of this month were not met it would produce hardship and would eliminate the payment of the increase in pensions which the veterans need very, very badly. Also, this would afford full discussion in committee and other stages of this bill.

Mr. J. M. Forgie (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, with reference to this question of the act being retroactive, I think it should be made retroactive to January 1 this year instead of the day of first reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I must advise the house that if the minister speaks now he closes the debate.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I just wish to say one or two words, Mr. Speaker. The suggestions which have now been brought to the attention of the house will, I think, be given very serious consideration by the committee. It would appear at this moment that there is ample time to conclude all other stages of the bill before the end of February. I am sure the committee when it considers the matter will give attention to the remarks which have just been made by hon. members on the other side.

In concluding the debate I want to correct what appears to have been a misapprehension. Remarks were made this morning to the effect that the Canadian Legion had asked for a higher percentage increase than is proposed in the bill. My understanding is that the Canadian Legion asked for an increase of 33⅓ per cent some time ago based on the situation which prevailed in 1956, and in the fall session of 1957 legislation was passed retroactive to July 1 of that year which raised the pension rates on a graduated scale. For the 100 per cent disability pensioner the increase was 20 per cent; for the married person with no children it was 17.6 per cent; for the pensioned widow with no children, 15 per cent; for the dependent parent it was 16 per cent. No increase was granted in respect of the children. The bill now before us makes an increase of 20 per cent across the board and a 33⅓ per cent increase for the children, so that over-all the increases suggested in the bill exceed the request made by the Canadian Legion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Immigration branch—

51. Administration of the Immigration Act, $1,388,640.

Mr. Badanai: I should like to make a few observations before this item is passed, and I should like to preface my remarks on this important and vital subject with a brief quotation from an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 31, 1951. I shall use it as a text, because it wraps up the whole question in just a few words which I should like to see transcribed in large letters and placed, preferably, on the wall of the office of the minister of immigration. I quote:

> What Canada needs is a vigorous immigration policy, selective in the sense that it encourages those who are most likely to take advantage of the opportunities which Canada offers. These will not necessarily be persons who come here to work in a particular trade or profession; they will include persons of energy and initiative who are ready to build a new career in Canada by enterprise and hard work.

According to the Toronto Telegram, our present Prime Minister made the following statement on April 26, 1957:

> Increased population was required if Canada's development was to keep pace with her vast resources. A Conservative government would apply a vigorous immigration policy in co-operation with the provinces. The Immigration Act would be overhauled—"Canada must populate or perish".

That is a noble statement, and it is one which people who are devoid of prejudice and who have at heart the interests of Canada and her development will, indeed, applaud. The people of Canada gave the right hon. gentleman a mandate to do just that, among other things which I intend to mention today, but nearly four years have gone by and no one has seen a vigorous immigration policy put into effect, nor have we seen a glimpse of the overhaul, so long promised, of the Immigration Act.

What did we see? It will be recalled that actions to restrict immigration were among the first acts of this administration when it took office in June, 1957. The right hon. gentleman's principal minister, that is the Minister of Finance, made the following observations in the course of the budget debate in 1958 and I quote:

> Population growth itself does not ensure progress, but in a country the size of ours it has a special significance. It provides a greater market for our agricultural produce and for the products of our factories and reduces vulnerability to changes in external demand. It brings us a greater diversity of talent and the means to employ it to better advantage. It reduces the per capita cost of supplying excellent services in this great land. There can be no doubt that the population growth of the post-war period has had these effects.

If the minister meant what he said, then I would assume he was not in favour of the restrictive measures which were imposed at that time. Now I come to what the minister responsible for immigration has been saying. Bless her heart, I rather like her. The hon. lady's heart was, no doubt, set on introducing changes to the act long before this, but I suspect that restraining influences have upset her earlier intentions which, indeed, have run very much counter to her frequently expressed conviction that unemployment is not increased by bringing immigrants into this country. Last year, during discussion of the estimates of her department the hon. lady promised a thorough revision of the Immigration Act but declared she was anxious not to bring in a half baked piece of legislation which would not stand the test of time. I wonder if this proposed legislation is about burned out?

At the present time Canada's immigration policy, if one can call it a policy, is based on a premise composed of two factors; first, the employment situation at a given time and, second, the racial composition of the country. In practical terms the present regulations mean that the government controls the flow of immigration from year to year and from month to month in accordance with estimates of the economic climate while at the same time favouring immigrants from certain countries. I think this is an unworkable and discriminatory practice, in addition to being unrealistic.

How can we reconcile declarations against racial discrimination with what is happening in Canada today when, in actual practice, though we do not reject people on an individual basis, we follow a policy of discrimination against whole nations? It is a policy which is indeed hard to explain, especially to friends in Asiatic countries. Take for instance, the case of Chinese refugees. That of the Japanese is not better. By and large these people make excellent citizens. Most of them are noted for their almost unimpeachable character. A few months ago I came across a news item which dealt with a tribute to a Chinese who ran for alderman in the city of Calgary. He topped the polls and no one will be surprised if in the future he is elected mayor.

Contributions in specialized fields have been made by countless newcomers from many lands. Take, for instance, the case of Mr. Ernest Hakka, an immigrant who came to Canada from Finland eight years ago. Since his arrival here he has invented a machine which will melt snow off city streets for 60 cents a ton, which ordinarily would cost $12 per ton to remove by truck. An appreciable number of Japanese live in Fort William and surrounding districts. It is a matter of record that their conduct as citizens is well above the average, and we could do with more of them. In an interview in Winnipeg two or three months ago the minister made the statement that:

> —fears of rising unemployment this winter will not influence the federal government to cut back its immigration program.

She then proceeded to say that:

> —every winter the government does its best to persuade immigrants not to come here during the winter.

I wonder what the hon. lady meant by persuasion? If she had said that immigrants were not allowed to come in the winter it would have been a statement closer to the facts. We have the government immigration policy for this winter, at any rate. Simply stated it appears to be a policy of not discouraging immigrants from coming to Canada. The government is just discouraging them, period.

The country needs a policy to encourage immigration rather than to discourage it. It is a matter of record that periods of peacetime prosperity and least unemployment have invariably been identified with a high flow of immigrants. The United States began a vigorous immigration program at a time when that country was poor and backward. The people they brought in without the restrictions and red tape now in use brought about the great wealth and power which the republic to the south now enjoys. The same story is being repeated today in Australia.

West Germany, comparatively small in territorial size and very densely populated, received an influx of more than 9 million refugees from eastern Europe in a period of just a few years after the war and the flow is still continuing at a rate of more than 200,000 a year. Yet, notwithstanding the addition of this great number of destitute people, these immigrants turned out to be one of Germany's major assets in the rapid recovery of that country. Today the living standard of West Germany is higher than it has ever been and unemployment is practically non-existent.

I have often expressed the conviction that we are losing a good bet when we ignore the advantage of admitting immigrants who will settle on the land. On previous occasions I have indicated the success which several Dutch families have made in farming in the district of Thunder bay. As population increases and as more and more people flock to urban centres the need for an expansion of agriculture will become apparent.

Every person or family who will undertake to work and develop land suitable for agriculture—extensive tracks of virgin land are available, in my constituency, at least—will not only be choosing a sane and profitable way of life but will also be conferring a benefit on Canada, and since so few native born Canadians will take up farming as their life's work the only answer is to bring in willing hands, farm people from as many countries as possible and as many of them as can be induced to come.

Canada has the potential to handle at least a quarter of a million newcomers every year for an indefinite period of time. Let us now lay the foundation for a worth-while immigration policy which will give our country the shot in the arm she sorely needs.

According to the minister's recent pronouncement, future immigrants are to be selected according to skills and education. The minister has since denied having made that statement and her denial has been accepted. Immigration officials nevertheless appear mainly to favour university graduates. The forefathers of most Canadians came to Canada with anything but university degrees; indeed, they come with few skills and for the most part the degrees they carried were those of qualified hard workers.

It is true, of course, that with the present advance in technology, heavy physical work is no longer the predominant occupation of our labour force but if we are going to open up our northern frontiers—more popularly known as the northern vision—we will need many hardy pioneers of a fibre which will stand up to northern hardships. It will be easier to attract newcomers to these areas than it will be to find among our native Canadians the necessary number of people to develop the north.

Premier Frost of Ontario speaking to the good roads association annual meeting on October 20, 1960 said in part:

> Canada is only at her beginning of opportunity and a greater and more useful population is essential to this country if these opportunities are to be developed.

At this point I should congratulate the minister on the excellent address which she delivered on January 26, 1961 to the Winnipeg real estate board on the subject "How the Immigrants Are Helping Canada".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Badanai: I gather from the applause that other hon. members have already read the statement but if there are hon. members of this committee who have not read the address, a copy of which was furnished to me, I commend it to their attention because it is a good document and my unreserved congratulations are extended to the minister.

In addition to the pertinent facts pointed out by the minister in her address concerning the contribution to Canada made by immigrants I wish to add a word about the tremendous purchasing power which our new Canadians have infused into the Canadian economy. Newcomers to our shores since 1946 have created a new market equal to a city of the size of metropolitan Toronto. I venture to say that the success of many businesses in the future may well rest in large measure upon their ability to attract these new customers, especially since these new arrivals happen to be in the age group of buyers who make large expenditures. According to reliable estimates 282,164 men, women and children from 50 different countries were admitted to Canada in 1957 which was the greatest year of immigration since 1913. These immigrants created in one single year a consumer demand of approximately $200 million.

The eventual need for motor vehicles and household appliances in one single year may exceed, in round figures, 60,000 automobiles, 70,000 radios, 60,000 washing machines, 60,000 refrigerators, 60,000 sewing machines, 40,000 vacuum cleaners, 30,000 electric stoves, 30,000 television sets, 20,000 oil furnaces, 12,000 coal and coke furnaces, 4,000 gas stoves and 4,000 home freezers, to say nothing of the need for housing which will give a great boost to the housing industry. Each of these people creates a demand for new housing.

You will agree, Mr. Chairman, that this is an impressive list of consumer goods running into many millions of dollars and employing thousands of people in producing them. These are, I repeat, estimated requirements of only one year's influx of immigrants, and there is every reason to expect that this market will be renewed year after year. Unfortunately the only immigrants allowed into the country since 1959 were, with some exceptions, mainly dependents who joined relatives already established here and some workers who came over to take sponsored employment.

The present selective system is not designed to populate and develop Canada. When a government rejects willing and healthy persons it is becoming too selective with the inevitable result that it will retard the economic expansion needed now more than ever to re-establish a climate of confidence and prosperity in the country.

Economists have been saying that there is no connection between immigration and unemployment. A recent analysis of immigration and unemployment made by the Canadian Labour Congress established the opinion that immigration cannot be considered a factor in the present high unemployment situation. In other words, it discounts the notion that today's unemployment is the result of the number of immigrants admitted in recent years. This is an important admission by labour since some of their pronouncements in the past have not been too favourable to immigration.

I was very much interested in what the minister had to say last night about her policy of flexibility in view of the rigid formula of the present act and her statement that before long amendments to the act will be introduced. Her flexible attitude on the interpretation of the present regulations is very commendable, and I would urge that this flexibility be extended to allow prospective brides of Canadian citizens, which brides live in European or Asiatic countries, to be admitted without undue delay. I have known of cases in my own constituency where long delays have caused considerable distress to young people in love and, as you know, lovers are a rather impatient lot.

I listened with more than passing interest to the valuable suggestions made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, a former minister of citizenship and immigration, who on occasion does not hesitate to admit mistakes made under the act relative to restrictions when he occupied that position and who has also stated that immigrants admitted from nearly every country in the world and their descendants have made their contribution to Canada as good Canadians. That was a really fine statement.

I have indicated at various times that I favour a more generous and positive immigration policy but I wish to point out that at no time have I advocated an open door policy. However, the need for revision of our thinking with regard to the number of new citizens Canada can absorb in each calendar year should be quite in order. The basis for selecting a new immigrant should not be national origin or academic accomplishments, desirable though they may be, but rather his character and willingness to work. I wish to conclude my brief remarks with another short quotation from the editorial page of the often quoted Globe and Mail. It is in these words:

> What Canada offers today is room and scope for the person of adventurous ambition, and we shall not select them—they will select us.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I have a limited number of matters that I should like to deal with at this time. I should like to refer the minister to the speech from the throne on November 17 last in the concluding paragraph of which I note the following pledge:

> The estimates of amounts required for the public service and the payments authorized by parliament will be laid before you. These will include an appropriation for the work of the royal commission on government organization which has been recently established to recommend improvements in the organization and methods of operation of the departments and agencies of the government which it thinks will best promote efficiency, economy and improved service in the dispatch of public business.

This commission is commonly referred to as a Hoover-type commission along the lines of the Hoover commission which was so active across the border for a period extending over many years. I notice that in the immigration branch the minister is asking for a total of $13,294,321. This amount exceeds last year's total by $448,507 and there may be supplementary estimates which will add to the increase in the forthcoming fiscal year. What I should like to know is whether the so-called Hoover-type commission has yet investigated the operations of the immigration branch and if it has not whether the minister expects such an examination of this branch of her department to take place at an early date.

I do not have the statistics here but the number of immigrants now being allowed into Canada is only about half of what it was a number of years ago, and I wonder how the decline in the number of immigrants has been reflected in the annual amounts asked for by the immigration branch. When you divide the total of $13 million by some 100,000 proposed immigrants you arrive at an overhead cost for the immigration branch approximating $130 for every man, woman and child and in the case of a family of five, which I am sure is a normal household, would run to $650. This seems like an extraordinarily high overhead.

I notice that there are some 2,000 employees in the branch and 100,000 immigrants divided by 2,000 means that the average immigration officer, if he alone is involved in the processing of an application, is only able to accomplish the necessary work involved at the rate of one per week. I would not have the feeling, if I were an immigration official, that I was operating at the height of efficiency if I averaged only one immigrant each week. I should like to ask the minister, in the light of the fact that the number of immigrants was only half what it was in other years, has there been any drastic reduction in the amount of money requested for the operation of the branch. Has the operation of the branch been subjected to the government commission as we understood, by implication at least, all branches would be in the years ahead?

I should like to refer the minister also to another matter and to ask her for a report. I regret that I shall have to be out of the committee for about one hour, but I hope the minister will not forget and I can see the reply in Hansard if the reply is given during that hour. I noticed when the Prime Minister was speaking on the bill of rights on July 1, 1960 and as recorded at page 5646 of Hansard for that date—this is the only reference to what I am about to say that I can easily find but there were others which were even more distinct—the Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, that is very necessary. There will be some statutes in existence which will have to be changed and which will be interpreted accordingly.

The Prime Minister left an understanding with this house that if the bill of rights became law every order in council that existed at that time, every item of legislation that was in existence and every item of regulation of the various ministries would have to be carefully reviewed in order to ensure that they complied with the spirit and intent of the bill of rights. I believe the minister has continually denied that any of the regulations of her department violate the bill of rights. We have contended that these regulations are based, in part at least, on racial discrimination. I should like the minister to indicate at this time whether the regulations of the department have yet been reviewed by some department or officer of the government to ensure that they do not continue to violate the intent and spirit of the bill of rights that was enacted last year.

I am asking the minister in effect, therefore, whether her department has been submitted to the Hoover-type commission for scrutiny and whether any of the regulations, in particular, have yet been submitted to some department or officer of government to ensure that they comply with the provisions of the bill of rights.

Mrs. Fairclough: Perhaps inasmuch as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has indicated that he will not be in the committee I might answer his questions now. To take the last one first, I think he would agree with me that it was new orders and acts which were to be reviewed by the Minister of Justice. I understand that any alleged variance with the spirit of the bill of rights or letter of the bill of rights is to be decided by the courts. In so far as existing legislation is concerned, we are taking a very hard look at it ourselves. I might add that that is one of the things that is holding up the introduction of the new act. We are being very careful indeed to make sure we do nothing that would in any way run contrary to either the letter or the spirit of the bill of rights.

Now with reference to the increase of $448,500 which my hon. friend noted, I might tell him that $410,000 of this is the result of increases in wages and salaries. If he will refer to the details on pages 144 to 151 he will find therein the notation that we actually, within those votes, have one less employee than we had previously. As he knows, however, there have been pay increases during the past year which have necessitated this additional amount of money.

It is impossible to break down the costs of immigration according to the number of immigrants who are landed because, in addition to those who come into this country as immigrants there are many people who come as visitors. All of these people have to be examined. There are businessmen coming into this country all the time. There are returning Canadian citizens, and there are 58 million border crossings. All of these people have to pass through the hands of the immigration department. It is, therefore, clearly improper to try to divide the number of landed immigrants into the cost and say that costs are rising because there are fewer immigrants and there is an increase in the cost of administration.

We have been very careful to keep the costs at a minimum. I do feel that if the costs could be broken down completely having regard not only to salaries and wages but the efforts of others which require remuneration, it would be found that the actual costs have decreased. What increases there are—with the exception of Indian affairs—are entirely reflected in increases in salaries and wages, a matter over which we have no control departmentally. I think those were the only matters brought up by my hon. friend.

He has referred to the commission which is headed by Mr. Glassco. I can tell him that the deputy minister has been called to testify before this commission and we have been in communication with them. I do not believe for a moment that their investigation of the affairs of our department is at an end, in fact I think they have just touched the surface. We are most happy to co-operate with them. After all, this is a sizable department with some 5,000 employees. We are just as anxious as anyone else to see it streamlined to the extent possible consistent with proper service to the public.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, my remarks on this department will be very brief because I believe that the policy being followed by the department is very sensible and humane. I am really prompted to rise because of what I consider to be the rather incredible position taken by the Liberal party during this debate. It shows a complete lack of consistency or cohesion, just as is the case in so many other departments with which we deal. They have been up so many times complaining about unemployment in the country, and during those debates they profess to have great faith in what is said by the Canadian Labour Congress, which speaks for organized labour in this country.

However when something else seems to be politically expedient during the course of another debate, when they feel there might be some other group of voters to whom they could appeal, they take an entirely different course. Both the hon. member for Cartier and the hon. member for Fort William have complained about the reduction in immigration. They have complained, too, that the minister has said she has tried to discourage certain types of immigrant, particularly during the wintertime when jobs are rather scarce. I should like to bring to the attention of the committee what the Canadian Labour Congress has put forth as the official position of labour with regard to immigration. I think it should be put on Hansard. This is a memorandum to the government of Canada, dated January 22, 1959, and I am quoting from page 34 of that document:

> So far as the number of immigrants to be admitted is concerned, this cannot be as readily solved by using any one arbitrary figure. Obviously the figure that is good for one year may not be good for another. We are in agreement with the general economic immigration policy that the flow of immigrants should be regulated by the country's absorptive capacity. We agree further that to bring in immigrants during a period of high unemployment is to do an injustice both to the immigrants and to Canadian citizens who are looking for and unable to find work. As we have said before, organized labour is not opposed to immigration but it is opposed to bringing in immigrants when there are no jobs for them except at the expense of Canadian workers.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what I said last night.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was certainly in a hurry to get to his feet and deny what some of his colleagues had said and I do not blame him for that because I am sure that the views which they expressed will not be very popular in this country. I do not blame him for wanting to get that statement on the record as quickly as possible. However, it is quite clear that he is not expressing the views of the entire Liberal party by any means.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I do not think the views that are being expressed by the Liberal party are going to be very popular. It is not a selfish thing I am suggesting but rather it is a humane thing to curtail immigration at times of unemployment and particularly during the winter. I am not suggesting it only as a protection for Canadian workers; I think it is a completely inhuman policy to bring in immigrants when there is no work for them and when it may result in such a struggle for them. We have had that experience too. We can recall that in 1956, when a period of unemployment quite evidently was approaching, the largest number of immigrants were brought in that had ever been brought into this country in one year and that action no doubt added to the great difficulties with which we were faced at that time. Subsequently, many of those people were faced with a good deal of hardship because they could not find employment and they were obliged to make their way back to their own countries.

I think it is quite clear that in suggesting some of these measures that have been taken to curtail immigration at times and for specific purposes, there is nothing selfish in any way about it but that it is actually as much for the protection of those who would come here as immigrants as for any other reason. Certainly as the country is able to absorb immigrants I am sure that all parties and all members of the house and the people of the country will want to welcome just as many as possible. Many of the various nationalities that have come here have made great contributions to this country and they will continue to do so in the future. However, it is neither fair to them nor fair to Canadians who are here and who are unemployed to bring them in at a time when the country is not in a position to absorb them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to reply immediately, Mr. Chairman, to some of the things that were said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and I will deal first with the last thing he said. He talked about the number of immigrants brought into this country in the year 1956. I can tell the hon. gentleman that as to the immigrants that were brought in, the records of the department as well as statements made by the acting minister in 1957, which appear in Hansard in reply to questions and everything else will show that the immigrants who were brought in in the year 1956 had no difficulty whatsoever in finding employment. In fact in the winter of 1956-57 there was not even the normal amount of seasonal unemployment in this country and no restriction was put on the movement of immigrants that winter; in fact the situation was quite the reverse.

What is more, the unemployment figures which have often been given for the month of June, 1957, when the previous government went out of office, indicate quite clearly that the level of unemployment was so low that it was what is usually regarded as full employment. Therefore, these statements that have been made are completely and entirely at variance with the facts that have been placed on the records by members of the present administration since they took office and before they realized the situation was changing.

It is true that after the beginning of 1958, when there was a good deal of unemployment, instead of trying to deal with the problem as they should have done and as it was their duty to do, members of the government from the Prime Minister down tried to find someone else to blame for unemployment and they have been doing that ever since. But I might remind the hon. gentleman that in the 1957 election campaign the Prime Minister was so unaware of the fact that immigration was causing unemployment that he promised to triple the immigration which the Liberals were carrying on at that time, as shown by a quotation put on the record by the hon. member for Fort William.

Of course, the Prime Minister was rather selective with regard to the localities in which he made these statements. He made them mostly to people at ethnic organizations and to their organizations but he did not go out and make them in the rural parts of Ontario where some of his friends were going around and complaining about what the previous government had done in the great crisis in Austria in 1956, the great Hungarian movement which, as the hon. lady pointed out last year when I asked her a question, had been an entirely successful effort. When I asked her a question she pointed out that so few of these Hungarian immigrants, most of whom came out without anything except the clothes on their back, have need of help from the government that no separate statistics were being kept of the number.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): They put Canadians out of work.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman now says that they put Canadians out of work. The minister did not say that in the speech she made in Winnipeg that was quoted by the hon. member for Fort William a few minutes ago.

The other thing that touched me particularly about the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who talks about one Liberal expressing one set of views and another Liberal expressing another set of views, is this. He obviously did not consult with his neighbour the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. Had he done so he would have found out, unless that hon. gentleman is talking differently from the way in which he talked a short time ago, that this was a brutal, inhumane department staffed with bureaucrats who were not fit to be in the public service. That is how that hon. gentleman got into this House of Commons, namely by the most shocking misrepresentation of a situation which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway knows very well and which provided a legacy that the hon. lady was obliged to deal with somewhat later.

The hon. gentleman talks about their being difference of view in the Liberal party. Of course there are differences of view in the Liberal party and we are not ashamed of those differences of view. However, there is no difference of view about this one basic fact namely that immigration is necessary for the healthy growth and development of this country. But you must have the two things proceeding hand in hand, namely the growth and the immigration.

A proper and well worked out immigration policy can contribute to growth. But if the growth does not take place, confidence is destroyed. If there is a depressed condition in the country it will be impossible, whatever immigration policy there is, to attract immigrants to the country because whatever one may or may not think desirable, immigrants seeking work are not going to come to a country in which there is not any work. I do not think anyone would argue about that statement at all. Our view is that the sooner we get back to a government that knows how to administer this country and its finances, to restore order with regard to business and employment and to get back growth once more, the sooner we shall have healthy immigration. Until we do the one, we shall not have the other.

Mr. Crestohl: I have two questions to ask the minister. The figures indicate that since 1957 there has been a great decline in immigration into Canada. It will be of interest if the minister will offer some explanation as to why that decline in immigration took place since 1957.

The second question I should like to ask her is this. In speaking yesterday about the revision of the act she mentioned that she did not want to bring into the house a half baked instrument. I should like to ask the minister whether the result of her culinary art will be ready for serving to the house before the end of the present session.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, of course I cannot answer the second question. I have hopes. But with regard to the decline since 1957, of course my hon. friend will agree that 1957 was a most abnormal year.

Mr. Pickersgill: In many ways.

Mrs. Fairclough: There was—as I think the hon. member for Fort William said—the largest influx since 1913. It was about twice as much as the average in the last 10 or 15 years. I claim no credit for the views which have been expressed by more than one economist to the effect that when you have a year in which you have a tremendous influx for one reason or another, you thereafter have a digestive process which goes on for a period of time. This is because, as is obvious, the motivation for the abnormal influx brought with it many immigrants who in the normal course of planning would have come in subsequent years, but for reasons which might be personal, which might be economic or otherwise, they accelerated their plans in order to take advantage of certain circumstances or avoid others and consequently came perhaps two or three years ahead of the time they had normally planned to come.

In the subsequent period, of course, those persons were already in Canada and the ones who were left formed the retinue of the group that had come originally in the boom year. That is the only explanation I can offer, other than that in the subsequent years of course, in so far as Europe is concerned, we all know that economic conditions were very bright, other conditions were favourable, and people do not move away from what is to them a satisfactory condition.

Despite that we have had respectable numbers coming out to Canada. I do not lay claim to any great success in the matter of numbers. I will say that we have not encouraged people to come forward who had little chance of settling in Canada without difficulty. It would not be fair to them; it is not fair to the Canadians who are here.

I think the original explanation of the great influx resulting in a digestive process for two or three years is coupled with the economic condition of Europe and is quite likely the answer to the question.

Mr. Crestohl: Could the minister say whether there were fewer applicants in those recent three years than there were before?

Mrs. Fairclough: I think I would be safe in saying that is the case. There may be one or two countries where this does not apply and where the number of applications increased substantially, but with a couple of exceptions I would say yes, there were fewer applications.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to give the minister an opportunity, because I think it would be very helpful to have this on Hansard, to make a statement—not a lengthy statement, but a simple one—about the conditions under which students from other countries are allowed to attend Canadian universities. I think there has been a good deal of misunderstanding about this subject and I think it would be helpful to many hon. members to have something authoritative on Hansard so that this matter could be dealt with.

Mrs. Fairclough: I had anticipated some interest in this subject, but I do not seem to be able to lay my hand immediately on the notes I had. However, I think I can do very well from memory.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have one or two other questions, if the minister would like to look for her notes in the meantime.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think I can answer the question. Apart from those schemes like the Colombo plan or some of these other scholarship schemes under the United Nations, the students who come forward to Canada are first of all, of course, required to be accepted by a university, a degree granting educational institution. If they are going to be here for more than a year they are required to submit to medical examination. They are also required to give evidence of their ability to pay their fees and maintain themselves while they are here without engaging in either full or part-time employment.

There has been some misunderstanding with reference to the seeking of employment by some of these students. If the employment which the student seeks is in line with his course of study, if it is something that contributes to the education which he is seeking, such as internship in the case of doctors, or possibly work in a library in the case of a person pursuing that type of course, and if that employment does not take a job away from a Canadian who is dependent upon it for his livelihood, then the student is granted permission to accept that employment.

This is far removed from the student who is possibly taking a pre-med course and goes out and takes a job driving a truck, thereby putting some truck driver out of a job. This is the type of thing we try to avoid. I hope I am making myself clear. If the employment is in line with his course of study, he is granted permission to take it.

However, we must come back to the original condition under which he came into the country, and that is that he had attested to the fact that he had sufficient funds to maintain himself and to pay his fees during the course of study.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are no restrictions on the travel of these students in Canada, are there? There were what turned out to be some quite erroneous stories to that effect. There are no other restrictions on the movement of students throughout Canada, are there?

Mrs. Fairclough: That is true; there are absolutely no restrictions. Of course, if a student comes here to attend the University of Manitoba and decides to quit his course there and go to McGill, we like to know where he is and we would ask him to report to us in that respect.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who would go from the University of Manitoba to McGill?

Mrs. Fairclough: Vice versa, then. Since I have agreement on both sides of the house I had better go along with it. But in so far as casual travel, holiday travel or any other kind of casual travel is concerned, there are no restrictions at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister received some time late in July, when I think most other members received a copy, a memorandum from the Japanese Canadian citizens association making certain representations respecting relatives of Japanese Canadians. Could the minister say what attention has been paid to these representations and whether any change has been made in the situation?

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mrs. Fairclough: I think there were 12 cases involved, if I am not mistaken. We have undertaken a complete review of them. Some of them have now been admitted; the others are under review.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that in the case of the relatives of Japanese Canadian citizens, in the case of the categories of relatives who apply in that country, there is no other restriction of any kind; there is no restriction as to age?

There were certain cases that I am not very proud of, and I have never pretended to be, where Canadian citizens of Japanese origin renounced their citizenship in 1945 or 1946 and went back to Japan. Notwithstanding that fact there would be no bar today to their admission to Canada, if they were otherwise admissible, would there?

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh no, there is not. I might say, harking back to this brief, the majority of these cases had never before been reported to the department. It was all news to us, and consequently we hurried the investigation. But I think in several of those cases it was just a matter of being known in the Japanese community and they had not made the proper application for consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has there been any thought given to the re-establishment of the gentleman's agreement or to the establishment of any quota or other arrangement of that kind for Japan? Perhaps I might take this opportunity to ask a related question on this subject. The minister will remember that the last time her estimates were before the committee there was some question of Japanese technicians going into Saskatchewan in connection with the establishment of an industry. Can the minister tell us if there has been any development in that field?

Mrs. Fairclough: With reference to the last question, this matter is still pending. We have had some discussion with the ambassador but the scheme has not yet come to fruition.

We have had no representations at all with reference to the other matter which the hon. member brought up, the reinstatement of these people. I would agree with what my hon. friend said last night that in so far as quotas are concerned I am not one who thinks they will solve the problem. I doubt very much whether any quota for Japan would solve any problem which exists there. However, we are on very friendly terms with these people and would give full consideration to any representations which might be made.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, as I have said over and over again, I would not be in favour of any general quotas but I could hardly agree that the gentleman's agreement did not for a long period of time meet a very real problem. I am not suggesting for one minute there is any reason we should take an initiative in this matter, if the Japanese government, or the Japanese themselves do not show any interest in the question.

But the minister is aware of the fact, and everyone is aware of the fact, that Japan is already our second largest customer for wheat, notwithstanding the spectacular exploit of the Minister of Agriculture the other day, and probably a more reliable market than the one the hon. gentleman found on that occasion, or at least we hope it is a more reliable market. It is a market which needs to be cultivated. Anyone who looks at the world situation in wheat today is bound to see that we should certainly look upon any new or expanding market with a jealous eye, and I think that any initiative we could reasonably take which would result in an orderly and progressive expansion of our commercial and other ties with Japan would be very valuable, looked at purely from the point of view of Canadian interest. I am sure that the hon. lady and her colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs would not be insensible to the importance and the political implications of maintaining the contact between Japan and the free world on the most harmonious basis possible.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I assure the hon. member that discussions are proceeding on a most amicable basis. What the ambassador is pursuing with us is not so much the question of immigration as the extension of non-immigrant visas and schemes by which such extensions might be given.

Mr. Southam: We have a situation developing in my riding which could possibly exist in other boundary areas just adjacent to the United States. Quite a number of American friends, citizens of the United States, have been coming into Canada, bringing their agricultural implements with them, and leasing land and farms adjacent to the international boundary. I think this situation has developed in the last several years due to the agricultural policy being followed in the United States where certain regions have been classified as coming within the arrangements for the soil bank system. The operation of this system has left a good deal of spare time on the hands of American farmers who, it must be remembered, have a lot of money invested in machinery. As a result of the fact that they are not farming their own land they have come to Canada and have been leasing fairly large tracts of Canadian farm land. Sometimes they have even been bringing in American help with them.

I am wondering whether this situation has been brought to the minister's attention. I have had a number of inquiries about it but I have been unable to discuss the situation too intelligently because it is something which has developed only recently. I do know that there is a certain amount of concern in the minds of merchants and business people along the line because they find that our American friends stay here for only a short period of the year before going back across the line.

I am wondering whether any plan exists to encourage these people to come in, and possibly, to become permanent residents. We talk about the desirability of increasing our population, and this is a region where large tracts of land are available. It seems to me these people should be encouraged to become permanent residents rather than temporary visitors.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think that in his last sentence the hon. member has probably hit on the only aspect of the problem which would affect my department. I would not like to say whose responsibility the rest of the problem is, but it certainly does not affect this department in any way. As far as residence is concerned, I do not think we have the facilities to coerce these people in any way. Possibly the neighbours in the vicinity could do as much as anyone to welcome these people and suggest to them that they might become landed immigrants.

Mr. Crestohl: I want to ask a question which may be somewhat academic. I am addressing myself to section 20 of the act. In section 20 (a) (b) (c) the language says "a person who is a British subject by birth or naturalization". But in (d) the language merely refers to a person who is a subject of a country; it does not say "by birth or naturalization". Perhaps there is some reason for expressing the section in this way but I cannot understand what other form of British subject you could have other than by birth or naturalization. My point is this: why use both terms, and then only one term in subparagraph (d).

Mrs. Fairclough: I am afraid I cannot answer that. There is such a thing as registration. I do not like section 20, and I have said so before. This is one of the things we propose to deal with.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could answer the question. As the hon. gentleman has said, in describing me before, I am the genius. Originally that section read "citizens by birth" and it was amended to read "birth or naturalization". The other section was never amended. This is purely historical. It was the quickest and shortest way to amend it, and until the hon. gentleman mentioned it, the rather idiotic aspect of it had never occurred to me. It would have been much easier to amend it by striking out "by birth". If the hon. gentleman had been my legal adviser, undoubtedly that is what would have been done.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to thank the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Perhaps this is a good opportunity for me to point out to the minister further emphatic reasons why the act needs revision at an early date.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have another inquiry or two to make of the minister before the vote carries. I have in my hand a clipping from the October 7, 1960 issue of the Vancouver Sun, a newspaper of which I am sure the minister is very fond. It shows a picture of three very handsome young men and says, "Yugoslavs Expect Punishment—Canada to Return Deserters". I am not going to read the whole article but the last paragraph states:

> A spokesman for Empire Shipping Company, the agent which was asked to arrange deportation of the deserters, said the men would leave on the freighter Goranka.

There are two or three questions I should like to ask the minister about this. First of all I should like to ask if that great humanitarian, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, made any attempt to keep these deserters in Canada. Knowing what a great heart he has and how concerned he has been over people of this sort, I should be interested as a matter of history to know whether his interest in people of this kind subsists. If so, was any attention paid to the hon. member's representations?

The next and much more serious question I put to the minister is this. Were these young men deported and did the department check up to see whether they did in fact have any punishment inflicted on them as a result of the deportation, if it took place?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, we have no means of checking on their subsequent fate. Two of them were deported and the third one disappeared, as sometimes happens. He has not yet come to light but no doubt he will. I would have no way of knowing whether any representations had been made by a particular individual in a given case without looking at the files. I think that probably answers the hon. member.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady does too little honour to her colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. He is not the sort of person whose representations one forgets. However, I recognize the hon. lady's embarrassment—

Mrs. Fairclough: I am not embarrassed.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and I will not press that point further.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not embarrass that easily.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite seriously concerned. As the hon. lady knows it was the practice in the department, and I hope it still is, not to deport people to countries where it was thought that they would meet with serious penalties as a result merely of desertion from a ship. I do not know whether that would now be the case in Yugoslavia. I can readily understand a deserter saying it would be and that that would not necessarily make it a fact, but I should not like to think that the department did not satisfy itself that that was highly unlikely to happen before a deportation took place.

Mrs. Fairclough: We really were pretty well satisfied, Mr. Chairman. In fact, one of the young men was not at all reluctant to say he wanted to go back. I do not think they would meet with any serious punishment on their return to their homeland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have here a clipping from the Windsor Star. I suppose I really ought to apologize for bringing this up because it goes back to last July and I ought to have dealt with it when the estimates were before us the last time.

Mrs. Fairclough: This is wonderful. This is the first one I have heard since 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: The first one from the Windsor Star since 1959?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, the first one that has been quoted from 1959 in this debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must have mislaid my clippings for 1960. In any event, this has reference to a subject that was aired considerably in the last session of parliament when the question came up of delays at Quebec as a result of the examination of people at the new immigration building there as opposed to examinations on board ship. As I had a good deal to do with the decision to build the new immigration building in Quebec I should be quite interested to know just how it is working out, what the arrangements are and if all the difficulties about which I have heard nothing for a long time, have been cleared up?

Mrs. Fairclough: My hon. friend has heard nothing because there do not appear to be any difficulties.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what I rather hoped.

Mrs. Fairclough: We had, of course, a flurry of them at first, probably because it was a new arrangement, but when statistics were actually compiled it was found that less time was being taken by landing at Quebec. We have a system under which we examine returning residents on board and the others in the centre there. After a little while the irritation wore off and now we find things are operating quite smoothly.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister last year was kind enough, in response to a motion which I undoubtedly could put on the order paper again, to table a copy of the occupational counselling guide. The one I have in my hand is for the period April 15 to May 15, 1960. I wonder if she would mind making available the latest copy of this document if it is still in use.

Mrs. Fairclough: We have not used this particular form since last August. The current system is by way of memorandum outlining what the situation is in various parts of the country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. lady furnish a copy of the latest memorandum?

Mrs. Fairclough: I would have to inquire about this. It is a departmental document.

Mr. Pickersgill: So was this.

Mrs. Fairclough: It does not issue entirely from the department. However, I shall look into the matter. I would rather think the answer would be yes but I would not want to definitely commit myself.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do hope the answer is yes because I should not like to think that this proliferation of secret documents of which some of the hon. lady's colleagues seem to be so fond has extended into her department in this particular field.

Mrs. Fairclough: I might add that the reason for my reluctance in committing myself on this matter is that the document we are now using is not really a document of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration but emanates from the national employment service. One of the reasons why we discontinued the occupational counselling guide was that we were getting to the place where in many cases we were slightly out of step with the national employment service and now we are using their documents.

Mr. Pickersgill: That, of course, brings up a perennial question. I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has temporarily left the chamber because I should like to ask him if, since he seems to be so much in agreement with the Canadian Labour Congress, the hon. member supports their view that the placement service of the immigration branch should be discontinued and transferred to the national employment service. I apologize to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I see that he is sitting on the other side of the chamber. I wanted to ask the hon. gentleman if, as a great exponent of the views of the Canadian Labour Congress, he also concurred with their view that the placement service of the immigration branch should be abolished and its work transferred to the national employment service.

I know that the minister touched on this subject briefly last night. I think myself that the placement problem must be very different from what it was two or three years ago as a result of the decline in the number of immigrants and in the proportion of immigrants who are actually seeking the kind of employment that the national employment service offers. I am wondering precisely what is the relationship at the present time and whether indeed there would be room here for some further integration from which at the time I considered it I did not see that there was anything substantial to be gained, because there was quite a great deal of difference between the kind of activities and the kind of approach to the activities of the two organizations.

Mrs. Fairclough: Possibly I could enlarge a little on what I said last evening because I have here a copy of a letter which I had occasion to write in answer to this particular suggestion and perhaps I might take five minutes to read it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it would be helpful.

Mrs. Fairclough: The letter reads in part as follows:

> The suggestion is not new.

I pointed that out last night. I continue:

> It has been put forward several times since the national employment service was established and it has been reviewed and discussed on various occasions.
> Speaking historically, the department charged with the responsibility for immigration has always been responsible for the satisfactory establishment of immigrants in Canada, including their placement, as required. The immigration branch of this department is responsible for the implementation of government policy on immigration and the functions of the branch in this respect include: programming; recruiting, counselling; documentation; reception; distribution and placement; establishing the admissibility of immigrants; developing settlement opportunities in rural areas as well as urban centres; and establishment of self-employed persons.

Reception is one of the most important phases in the implementation of the Canadian immigration policy. A dissatisfied immigrant, in addition to the problems he may cause in Canada, may through his letters home frustrate our future immigration prospects. Successful immigrants are our most important recruiting factors.

Initial placement is an essential part of the reception of the imigrant who is in need of services which are not generally provided to other Canadian residents through a government agency, i.e., locating temporary accommodation, financial assistance while awaiting employment, arrangements with employers to make advances of salary to meet the migrant's initial needs, explanation of immigrants' background and training to employers, interpreter services, etc. It is important for the immigrants to know that they have a service of the government to turn to in time of need for they are not, like other residents in Canada, aware of the multiplicity of services made available, and it would create confusion, disappointment and hardship if upon arrival they had to consult with several of the agencies of governments in Canada.

One important aspect is that a significant portion of the immigrants come to Canada to establish themselves in small businesses or on farms. The immigration branch has a program of guidance and counselling for these cases. Such immigrants are placed in employment which will acquaint them with Canadian methods of operation, marketing and buying practices, before they embark on their own enterprises. These cases are followed up by the immigration officers at regular intervals, and at the appropriate time the immigrants are given the proper counselling which permits them to establish their own business or purchase their own farm. One important factor of this phase of the immigration program is the relation of friendship and trust between the immigrants and the immigration officers.

It is not the department's policy to accept responsibility for the placement of immigrants who have been in Canada for more than a year. However, officials of the national employment service have been informed that they may always, if they so wish, refer problem cases to the immigration branch. This department is also responsible to assist indigent immigrants until they are eligible for municipal and provincial welfare benefits up to a period of one year after their arrival in Canada. It seems normal therefore that the officers of the immigration branch should make the necessary effort to place those who are unemployed instead of providing them with financial assistance.

The question of duplication between the immigration branch and the national employment service and the possibility of financial saving was considered in 1955 by the treasury board on instructions of the then minister of finance. It was established that if the immigration branch were to cease to look after the initial placement of immigrants this would not result in any financial saving, as the immigration branch must retain its staff to carry out other essential immigration services. The conclusion was reached that this service was essential to the reception of the immigrants and should remain as a function of the immigration branch.

Notwithstanding the importance of the placement service of the immigration branch in the reception of immigrants, it remains a fact that they are encouraged wherever possible to use the facilities of the national employment service and this is a general practice followed by immigration officers. In this connection the excellent co-operation received by the immigration branch from the national employment service must be acknowledged.

I think that describes the situation very well in so far as the thinking of the department is concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have just one last question of a general character although on one of the other items I may have other questions. Would the minister explain precisely what the legal situation was, what the practice and administrative situation were with respect to the admission of Chinese fiancées at the time the present government took office and what precisely is the nature of the change made since?

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think I could answer that right now. I was not the first minister of this department after the change of government, and I am afraid I cannot even recall from memory precisely what the situation was when I became minister. I do know that we have abolished the bond—

Mr. Pickersgill: Which was just a return ticket.

Mrs. Fairclough: —which we formerly required. I do know also that we have brought in by authority of order in council a great many Chinese fiancées. I must admit, as I think my hon. friend would, that in some cases, having regard to the difference in the marriage laws of the two countries, we are reasonably certain that we are bringing in wives but that is a matter, of course, that is a little difficult to establish. However, we have pursued the most humanitarian attitude possible and have attempted to unite these young people whenever it is possible for us to do so. From time to time circumstances arise where there is some doubt as to the bona fides of the principals.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was merely concerned about the changes that had been made.

Mrs. Fairclough: I could not set that out by chapter and verse from memory. I would have to investigate it because three or four years does things to one's memory.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is true, of course, as I am sure the hon. lady will agree, that fiancées were admitted when the previous government was in office, that at that time they were required to have a return ticket in case the marriage did not take place and that a return ticket is now no longer required. That is a change that was made by the present government and I acknowledge it right away. I have not examined the regulations any more than the hon. lady has but my recollection is that when I was the minister these applications were considered as a matter of grace, each one on its merit; that the regulations had not yet been changed to admit them under the regulations and that therefore each case had to be dealt with by order in council but that the present government had changed the regulations so that they were admissible as a category.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not true. The former situation still obtains.

Mr. Pickersgill: The former situation still obtains. What I am really trying to get at is that I have a statement in my hands that one of the acts of the present Progressive Conservative government at Ottawa was to modify the regulation respecting the admission of fiancées who are now permitted entry as non-immigrants and granted permanent status when marriage takes place. That statement is obviously in error.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would not say it is in error. What it refers to, of course, is the abolition of the bond.

Mr. Pickersgill: It does not say a word about that.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is perhaps a misinterpretation. I would not say it is completely in error.

Mr. Pickersgill: At any rate, the hon. lady does agree that these fiancées were admitted as non-immigrants before the present government came in and that when they married they were given permanent status.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes:

Item agreed to.

53. Field and inspectional service, abroad, $2,298,599.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it would be helpful if the hon. lady could give us the total staff in each of the offices abroad and the number of immigrants admitted through each such office in 1960.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think we would have that information yet. It is only a month since the end of the year. I would be very glad to procure it for my hon. friend at the first opportunity. I will see what we have here.

Mr. Pickersgill: Up to whatever might be the latest available date?

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think we have the information in the form in which my hon. friend requires it, but I would be glad to get it for him. I should draw this to his attention or to his memory. You cannot always judge the production of an office by the number of immigrants who are admitted because in some of the offices there are a great many interviews that never result in immigration at all. They are casual inquiries. A person may be inadmissible for reasons of health, and he may come back several times before being finally passed by the health officer. However, I will procure the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do have the impression that this may be one area in which there could be a considerable saving. I have no doubt this will be looked into by the investigating commission. I know that I did close one or two offices, and then subsequently opened them again when there was an increased interest in immigration. There are certainly one or two countries to my knowledge at the present time where we had offices the last time I checked—they may have been closed since—and where it struck me that the game was not worth the candle any longer. After all, in practically all of these places where we have offices, except one or two countries in which there is large scale immigration like the United Kingdom, the only office is in the capital of the country and we have a diplomatic mission there.

Notwithstanding the fact that I was once a third secretary in external affairs myself I am not convinced that the junior staff are so overworked that if there were an occasional inquiry about immigration they could not handle it, just as they do in some countries in South America. I agreed with the hon. lady's answer to the more general inquiry of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam because there is no doubt that the border crossings go on, and they go on in increasing volume every year. The bulk of the staff of the immigration branch is in Canada and does not deal with immigrants at all but with visitors and Canadians. These officers abroad are largely for immigrants.

I am not sure that it would not be possible, as a result of a really careful review, to use these officials somewhere else and allow the diplomatic staff to do the job, perhaps with an occasional visit from an immigration officer to deal with the difficult cases. It is hardly reasonable to maintain an office with four or five people, and all the other attendant expenses, and get 30 or 40 immigrants from that country during a whole year.

Item agreed to.

54. Trans-oceanic and inland transportation and other assistance for immigrants and settlers, subject to the approval of treasury board including care en route and while awaiting employment; and payments to the provinces pursuant to agreements entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, in respect of expenses incurred by the provinces for indigent immigrants, $2,100,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister just explain precisely what is contained in this vote now? This was the vote under which we made provision, of course, for the very considerable expenses in connection with the movement of Hungarian refugees a few years ago.

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course, one of the things taken care of under this vote is family assistance and assisted passage payment of transportation for immigrants and settlers who require it from a provisional destination in Canada to another locale where employment is available; for the absorption of the differential in the cost of rail transportation from Winnipeg to points west of Winnipeg; a survey of potential areas for farm settlement in connection with provincial government land settlement schemes. There is a long list of these things, but I think that is a general description. It does not include assisted passage, but it does include these other items.

Mr. Pickersgill: It does not include assisted passage?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, that is from the revolving fund.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is perhaps the only place where we can properly ask a question about the state of the revolving fund. I think it would be desirable if the latest totals were put on the record so that we can see how this is working. Can the minister tell us at the same time whether it is still the practice to give an assisted passage loan to dependents as well as to wage earners?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, it is, Mr. Chairman. My officials do not have the figures here, but again I would be glad to procure them.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no hurry about that. At the same time I would be very much interested in knowing whether it is still necessary to give assisted passage to settlers as opposed to immigrants and how many such cases there have been in the last three years. I do not know whether the hon. lady has really ever encountered that problem. Settlers are Canadian citizens.

Mrs. Fairclough: As indicated in the description of vote 54 which I read, we use these funds for taking settlers to different parts of Canada to explore the possibilities, and so on. In so far as assisted passage is concerned, I will see if we have that information.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady understands what a settler is from the point of view of assisted passage? It is a Canadian citizen who cannot qualify as an immigrant. We had to change the law a few years ago to put in the word "settler" so we could assist Canadian citizens. This is not a very important matter financially, but it is a matter of some interest.

I wonder if the hon. lady could tell us—it is probably in the annual report—how many persons are in receipt of family assistance at the present time.

Mrs. Fairclough: In so far as settlers are concerned, we do not have any figures as distinct from immigrants. There are approximately 27,000, in reply to the other question.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is 27,000 children?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: This would mean there are 27,000 children who have not been in Canada a year?

Mrs. Fairclough: That would be right.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister could tell us how much the allowances are that are granted, and how they compare with the level of social welfare allowances being granted in the different parts of Canada to Canadians who happen to have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits and have to live on welfare. How does an immigrant qualify?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am informed that the amounts are based on the provincial assistance rates and they vary from province to province according to the variations in the amounts stipulated by the provincial authorities.

Mr. Winch: Could we ask for an explanation as to how an immigrant who has not got employment qualifies for this assistance? I know I have read in the newspapers time after time, and I have had cases come to my attention, which indicate if you happen to come from a certain European country or come in a certain year, then you can get assistance. If you happen to come from the United Kingdom, then you have to get on your way back home. I understand the hon. member for Kootenay West has knowledge of cases like this, too.

Mrs. Fairclough: This is news to me. If my hon. friends want to give me chapter and verse I shall have the matter investigated. It may be that the individuals concerned did not make the proper application to the department or it may be that they had been in Canada for more than a year. We only assume responsibility up to one year. There certainly is no difference in so far as the United Kingdom immigrants are concerned and those from any other country.

Mr. Regier: I hope the minister was adequately advised when she intimated that the level of the assistance granted is identical with that which happens to prevail with regard to social welfare cases within any particular province. This situation leads to some grave misunderstanding in Canada if an immigrant is in receipt of a higher level of what is in effect assistance of a welfare nature than is the local resident who may well be a taxpayer in the municipality. I hope the minister was accurate. In any event, I hope that she will ensure that in no case will this assistance exceed the assistance which will be available to Canadians who may be on our welfare rolls at the present time.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is no such intention. As a matter of fact, wherever possible we try to get the provincial authorities to assume responsibility for the dispensation of welfare benefits and then be reimbursed in turn from our department. We have not always been able to do that. The same thing applies with regard to unemployment assistance.

Mr. Regier: As the minister has adopted a completely adequate approach to this matter, all I can say is that I hope her wishes are going to be implemented in all areas of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Following up the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East with regard to immigrants from the United Kingdom, may I say this. On one occasion I had come to me an immigrant from the United Kingdom who had been a major in the Life Guards, who came to this country, served in the second world war and, through some unfortunate circumstance had some extremely heavy expenses. I personally went with him to see the minister's officer. He said, "We do not expect immigrants from the United Kingdom to ask for assistance, they are expected to have enough stability and so on to stand on their own feet". I was present when that was said. I will supply the minister with the full details.

As a matter of fact, this immigrant was a senior official in the immigration service of Great Britain when he came to this country and he had recommendations of the highest kind from the colonel of his regiment and from the British ministry that had charge of the department for which he worked. That is one particular instance of which I have knowledge. It took place some year or two ago. I have had the matter brought to my attention a number of times by a number of immigrants.

This is the only case of which I can speak from personal experience because I went to the immigrant concerned. As a consequence, he was able to borrow sufficient funds from Great Britain and returned to Great Britain. He was a man of excellent education, and had given excellent service to the commonwealth and had fought for the things we believe in. However, he was obliged to return to Great Britain because he was denied two or three months assistance to tide him over a rocky period after he had suffered a series of most unfortunate experiences. I bring that matter to the minister's attention. I will look up the file and give her the details. If my memory serves me correctly, this incident took place during the administration of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mrs. Fairclough: This is news to me. If the hon. member will supply us with the chapter and verse of his complaint I shall be glad to look into it. Do I understand him to imply that the gentleman in question had been here less than a year?

Mr. Herridge: He had been here about six months; and he arrived here at a period when things went flat all of a sudden.

Mrs. Fairclough: If the hon. member will give me the particulars I will look into the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: If in fact this incident occurred when I was minister I might ask the hon. member if he will give me the information also because I should be glad to have it. I ran into one or two cases in which people thought they had been badly treated by the citizenship and immigration officers. I always tried to investigate those cases. I was on very good terms with the hon. gentleman at that time. If he had brought the matter to my attention, I am sure that I would have looked at it then.

Mr. Herridge: I shall be only too glad to give the information to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as well. I think it was just in this period of flux when this catastrophe happened in 1957 and on that account I did not bring the matter to the minister's attention, because the gentleman to whom I am referring had returned to Britain and has asked me not to press him any further. I am not blaming the former minister, but I know that on several occasions immigrants from Great Britain came to me and said that they were discouraged from seeking assistance by the officers concerned.

Mr. Regier: Since we are speaking of the subject of assistance while awaiting employment may I ask the minister this question. Are there any communications between the immigration branch or the minister and the regional offices of the unemployment insurance commission with regard to replacement of immigrants in Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I think that matter was explained in the letter which I read within the last hour having regard to the placement service of the department.

Mr. Regier: Did this information have anything specifically to do with the category of immigrants known as displaced persons? Was there any communication with the unemployment insurance offices in which specific mention was made of displaced persons.

Mrs. Fairclough: It has been so long since we have had a category definitely known as displaced persons that I really could not answer that question. It is not a term that is in common use today in the department.

Mr. Regier: If the minister will not identify what I mean, I imagine that her officers will do so. I have had representations from three ratepayers organizations and from a political organization in the area. They are greatly concerned about a charge that has been levelled at a local regional office of the unemployment insurance commission. An unemployed man asserts that he read the letter that was handed to him, although not for keeping—he was obliged to return it—in which it was stated that a federal department had issued orders to this regional office to grant preference to displaced persons in the matter of recommending places of employment. Is the minister able to deny that any letter of that kind emanated out of the immigration department.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am entirely unaware of it. I am told the term "displaced person" has not been used in this department for five years. I am therefore quite certain that no such letter would have been written along those lines certainly within the last few years.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one other question I should like to ask the minister. Can she say how many provincial governments she has been able to make this agreement with or how many provincial governments agreements have been made to provide welfare services and whether there is any prospect of making any further agreement? Perhaps it is unnecessary for me to say that I heartily approve of this policy since I initiated it.

Mrs. Fairclough: To date we have three, namely Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta. We are working on the rest of them.

48. Citizenship registration branch, $845,871.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make one or two observations about this item. The citizenship registration branch is, of course, concerned with persons who have come here as immigrants in main, although not all of them are in that category; some are returning Canadians who want to have their citizenship restored. Except in one respect it is largely simply a great registry in the department here in Ottawa. But since 1954 or 1955—I ought to remember the year but I am not quite sure of it—the department has set up a number of citizenship courts in various parts of the country because we found that there were such concentrations when I was in office—and the minister has found this situation also—in a number of places, such concentrations of potential citizens in certain places that the local county courts or their equivalent in the other provinces could not handle the volume of traffic. I think it would be interesting to have for the last two years the global figures of the number of persons who have become citizens in each of these areas, and any other observations the minister would like to make about this situation; that is, whether there are any other places where there is a backlog.

One thing that always interested me when I was minister was that I managed to make a reasonable profit for the treasury on the operations in Toronto, and even in Montreal. I wonder whether the minister, being an accountant, has a balance sheet for all the courts and can say whether the fee is sufficient to pay the full cost of these courts.

Mrs. Fairclough: Most of these courts have not been in operation long enough for us to have decided that. I might also say that the primary purpose for the establishment of the courts, in so far as I am concerned, is to have uniform treatment rather than making money. It stands to reason that we do not intend to open courts in areas where traffic does not warrant it. However, I do have a small statement here and possibly it will answer some of the questions I have been asked.

During the calendar year 1960 courts of Canadian citizenship were opened in London, Ontario; Winnipeg, Manitoba; Edmonton, Alberta and Vancouver, British Columbia. In addition we have in this current calendar year appointed a court of Canadian citizenship in Moncton, New Brunswick. This brings to eight the number of courts of Canadian citizenship now in operation. I might also add that it is hoped to open a court of Canadian citizenship in Ottawa later this year. It is also planned to hold a meeting of the presiding officers of these courts in the near future to help them to arrive at a more uniform system in dealing with applicants for Canadian citizenship.

To date the complete statistical returns on the granting of certificates of Canadian citizenship are not available. However, it appears that there will be a slight decrease from last year in the number of persons who have applied for and been granted Canadian citizenship. Information available for the first three quarters of 1960 shows that 46,000 persons were granted Canadian citizenship compared with 49,000 for the same period in 1959.

During these same periods the number of certificates of Canadian citizenship and miniature certificates of Canadian citizenship issued to persons who are already Canadian citizens has decreased from 32,381 in the first three quarters of 1959 to 31,542 in the first three quarters of 1960. Of course, that is not much of a decrease. The issue of the miniature certificates of Canadian citizenship continued to be the more popular during 1960.

The total revenue from all sources for the branch for the calendar year 1960 amounts to $327,623. This is mainly from the operations of the courts of Canadian citizenship.

To answer my hon. friend's question, in 1960 the court in Toronto had 9,686 applications; Montreal had 5,871; Hamilton had 1,995; London, which was only opened May 1, had 453; Moncton of course has just opened; Winnipeg, which opened on October 3, had 288; Edmonton, opened October 18, had 205; and Vancouver, which opened August 15, had 798. So I think it will be another year or so before we can really properly assess the traffic and the expenses of the courts. But I am sure that with the amount of money that has come in during the past year we certainly will not be operating at a loss. For 1961-62 we forecast about $427,500 altogether.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, reverting to the claim of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as to a profit made on these courts when he was minister, does the minister, who is an accountant, know whether in fact the claim of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who is not an accountant, is valid?

Mrs. Fairclough: I did not audit his accounts, but I would be willing to attest to the fact that in so far as the records of the department show, he is quite correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one problem that the minister knows has been quite troublesome. There is a great incentive, of course, for persons of foreign nationality to seek to become Canadian citizens because that is the way in which they get the franchise in this country. But British subjects who emigrate to Canada have only to be here a year and they get the franchise without becoming Canadian citizens. Therefore they—at least, I say "therefore"; I am not imputing motives to anyone in the house—presumably have less incentive to seek citizenship than persons of foreign nationality. In fact, the records did show up until the last time I checked them that these British subjects did not become Canadian citizens in quite the same number. Has there been any improvement in that respect in the past year?

Mrs. Fairclough: I could not really say there has been. I wish I could report that there had been an improvement, because I think these people should become Canadian citizens. But apart from encouraging them whenever we run into them, I do not think there is very much else we can do. I have just been reminded of something that I should have mentioned. In the current year we are producing a film which we hope will be some encouragement to them.

Mr. Winch: I can understand the viewpoint of the minister in wishing to encourage uniformity and perhaps a standard ceremony in the application or the granting of papers of citizenship. However, I would like to ask the minister whether any thought has been given to a rather serious aspect on the other side of the picture. I have reference to people who have been here the required five years and who have made the required application, but who come from a country whereby almost by nature they have a temperament of being high-strung, emotional and excitable.

From my own personal experience I know people who have been good citizens and in my estimation they are entitled to citizenship. On many occasions I had visited them in their homes. I can sit down and talk to them and they can talk to me. I understand them; they understand me. I have actually sponsored some of these people. But immediately they get in the courtroom, with the judge up on the bench and the spectators all around, they freeze. Their mind goes blank; they are back to the language and the customs of the country from which they came.

Although I have been speaking to them for perhaps two years in English, right then and there they do not know English; they cannot understand it; they cannot speak it. I have seen that happen. I know it happened only recently in Vancouver. I know of cases in the interior of exactly the same thing. As a matter of fact I drew one to the attention of the deputy minister and he was very, very kind about it. This does happen.

Is consideration given to that situation, to this emotionalism and blankness which under those circumstances overcomes these people? I think we know it. I think the majority of us, if we have to face even a traffic charge, have a feeling of nervousness when we go before the judge. Therefore I think it is understandable and I think it is important that something be done to help these people.

Mrs. Fairclough: This is, of course, a recognized human failing. This is one of the reasons we want to have these courts wherever possible, because we can speak to our own presiding officers; we can draw these matters to their attention and plead for their tolerance and understanding.

If the applicant comes before the county court judge—I make no aspersions on his motives—it is true that we cannot speak to that judge because we have no jurisdiction whatsoever over him. I may say, however, that the applicant is not judged entirely on what happens to him in court. We do have a pre-examination and I think it has been our experience in our own courts that by the time the applicant comes to court he has had such friendly relationships with the staff of the court and has received such kindness from them that to some extent he loses his fear. We hope he loses all his fear. It stands to reason he is going to be excited. His enunciation in repeating the oath may not be as clear as we would expect of a Canadian but I am sure we are gradually overcoming these difficulties and we hope we shall overcome them completely.

Mr. Pickersgill: It did seem to me strange, having in mind the number of immigrants and the population of various places, that Calgary should not have been included in that list.

Mrs. Fairclough: We have a court in Edmonton. I am not sure what we are going to do, but we did not consider there was sufficient traffic to make it worth while having one court in Edmonton and another in Calgary. In some of these places we have in mind making a travelling court out of the existing court. Courts will be held at intervals in different places in the same area.

Mr. Brunsden: I should like to emphasize the point made by my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. There is a great deal of confusion in Alberta with respect to this court in Edmonton. There is a feeling it is a temporary court. There is a feeling that someone from Medicine Hat might have to go to Edmonton to appear before it, and I suggest to the hon. lady, whom we all admire, that it might be well to clear up this situation.

I have another question to raise and it has to do with refusal to grant citizenship. I am thinking at the moment of one individual of central European birth who has a European name. He has applied continually for citizenship and his application has been approved by the district court, but when his file comes to Ottawa he has been refused. I have been told by the registrar that the reason for refusal is a secret. I feel that as a member of parliament I am entitled to some confidence. I am not going to betray it. But on behalf of this man's sponsors and on behalf of the court in Medicine Hat who are most interested in this man I should like to know why he should continually apply, continually pay a $10 fee and continually be refused. It seems to me that that is not Canadian. If the man has some mark against him, should not some of us know what that mark is?

Mrs. Fairclough: There are some aspects of this type of case which cannot be divulged but if my hon. friend would like to bring his specific case before me I should be very glad to have a look at it and I will tell him what I can tell him, in any event.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Can the minister give the approximate date when the citizenship court will be established in Ottawa, and will she indicate the field of its jurisdiction? Over what other counties in eastern Ontario would it have jurisdiction in addition to the historic county of Carleton?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am afraid I shall have to leave that question for the time being because it has several facets. We have an allotment for it in next year's estimates so I hope we shall get it open during the current calendar year.

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to express appreciation to the minister and to the officials of her department for what they have done in connection with the appointment of what I might term ad hoc judges in districts far removed from places where the courts usually sit. That has happened in the area of Fort Vermilion which is some 300 miles from Peace River where the nearest district court holds regular sittings. The arrangement has proved of great value. Frequently during the summer and fall when rivers cannot be crossed it is impossible to get down to these courts other than by air. The practice has proved very useful and I hope it will be increasingly followed.

I believe the minister advised me in her last letter that a member of the R.C.M.P.

had been appointed there. That is all very well. I think they are an admirable body although I have had my differences with them professionally at various times. But they are frequently moved. Sometimes a constable is appointed to be an ad hoc judge. Then, he is moved and there is a vacancy. I would suggest that thought be given to making appointments of a more permanent nature; to choosing someone who is residing in the area for some time.

I should like to take this opportunity to make some reference to the observations of the hon. member for Vancouver East. I have appeared before the courts at different times for a quarter of a century. During that time in district courts I have heard many judges dealing with the applications of those who wish to become citizens of this country and I do not think I have come across one occasion in all that period when the judge concerned has not been sympathetic, courteous and considerate, careful to see that he has put these people at their ease. I am confident that the new courts and the judges appointed by the minister will continue that practice.

Mr. Badanai: Following the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East with regard to applicants for citizenship, may I say that when they appear before the judge they usually get tongue-tied in answering questions. I have here in my hand a questionnaire with 41 questions on it which the judge asks the applicants in court. Needless to say, some of these questions are difficult even for Canadians to answer. I will read one or two as examples.

One question reads: What written document is the basis of the constitution of Canada? Another is: What is the name of the most recent act of parliament affecting our constitution? Another question is: Why is the Statute of Westminster important?

Mr. Winch: How many school children, or even adult, could answer those?

Mr. Badanai: Some of those questions are difficult for even Canadians to answer, let alone for these people who appear before a judge with a meagre knowledge of English. They become tongue-tied, unable to say a word, and are turned down. Once they are turned down they are asked to file another application within two years. That is accompanied by a request for another fee of $5. A situation of this kind is surely to be regretted, and some reasonable attitude should be taken by the judges when they examine these people. I have had several cases in my constituency; in fact they come up after every citizenship court. People come to me and say they could not get citizenship papers. They got tongue-tied in court; yet they can speak to me, in broken English, it may be, but I can understand them very well.

Then there is the case of the man who may have lived in Canada for 20 years and who will never acquire a substantial knowledge of the English language. Yet he is a good citizen and has probably raised a family. He, and others like him, are unable to obtain citizenship papers simply because they cannot answer the questions which are asked of him.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, these questions do not emanate from this department. This must have been a list of questions compiled by the judge himself. In any event, I should inform the hon. member for Fort William that we do have text books which are made available to all applicants for citizenship. These text books answer most of these questions and certainly the ones the hon. member read off.

We think it is advisable that applicants for citizenship should know a little about the country. I agree with him that possibly some of our own Canadian citizens do not know this either but after all they were born here and were supposedly educated in this country and have probably forgotten much of what they learned in school as is the case with all of us.

With respect to long term residents and a lack of knowledge of the language, there is usually some leniency exercised by the judges in the cases of persons who have been here an extended length of time and who have not had an opportunity of learning one of Canada's two basic languages. I think of persons who have been here 20 years and who demonstrate that by reason of circumstances they have been unable to take language courses or to mingle with their neighbours to the extent of having acquired fluency in English or French. Such persons are usually given special treatment by the judge of the court.

Perhaps I may be permitted to relate to the committee an amusing incident that came to my own attention. A young lady of my acquaintance was taking a language course. She came to me with a book which I must admit was a product of my own department. She asked me what is a very small animal with six legs. I said I did not know. She was able to show me the question in the book: What is a very small animal with six legs? We got out the encyclopedia, the dictionary and some books on animals that I have, but we were unable to find an answer to the question.

With great glee I brought the question to my departmental officials and they were as much in the dark as I was. I believe the answer turned out to be an ant. I am sure none of the hon. members of this committee would consider an ant an animal but apparently in strict terms it is. However, if none of us could answer that question I am sure we can have every sympathy when a question of this nature is put to a person who is attempting to learn the English language.

The other side of that matter, of course, is that there was a book of instructions from which she could have secured the necessary information but in directing her studies the teacher had neglected to give her the book of instructions and had given her only the book containing the questions.

Mr. Badanai: I agree that there are books of instructions, Mr. Chairman, but often when these people appear before the judge, even though they know the answers to the questions, they cannot talk, become mute and are turned down. That is the difficulty. I wonder if the minister could instruct, advise, or suggest to the judges concerned that they use a little discretion in the matter.

Mrs. Fairclough: In February we are having our own presiding officers in and will be making some of these suggestions to them. I am sorry to inform the hon. member that we cannot make suggestions to county court judges.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what the procedures are now when an applicant appears before a judge and has to answer possibly 48 questions. I can recall my own application for citizenship. Although there were 48 questions I am happy to say that we were supplied with 48 answers too.

Item agreed to.

49. Citizenship branch, $808,322.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, because it is only a few minutes before five o'clock, perhaps I may be permitted to make a statement on this subject so that we could start next day from this point.

As I presented an outline of the continuing activities of the citizenship branch only eight months ago, I shall confine my remarks today to reporting on a few significant developments that have occurred since that time.

First of all, I should like to speak of language classes. Special language classes for newly landed immigrants, who would otherwise have to await the opening of the fall term, were made available in the summer in an increased number of centres. Notably popular and successful this year were the classes organized for the first time in Winnipeg. In Toronto a publicity campaign conducted through spot announcements on radio in a variety of languages produced most gratifying results. Nearly 1,000 students enrolled in an intensive six-week course involving five evenings each week.

In the field of teacher training, a total of 45 teachers of immigrants attended the special summer course conducted by the Ontario department of education during July and August. At the instigation of the citizenship branch, arrangements were made between provincial governments for the first time to permit the attendance of nine supervisors and senior teachers from outside Ontario. The course, which is intended to improve the standards of instruction in language classes, is now well established and will be expanded somewhat this summer.

With the assistance of the branch, initial steps are now being taken to provide special courses for teachers of French to immigrants. The first of such courses will be held in Montreal the latter part of February.

A meeting is being planned by the branch for this summer of leading experts from the various provinces in the field of language and citizenship instruction for immigrants. The meeting will provide the first opportunity for such experts to exchange views and experiences and to discuss problems of mutual interest.

Increased efforts have also been made by the branch to promote the filing of citizenship applications by those eligible to do so. A series of advertisements have been run in the ethnic press. A poster on this subject was also prepared and, with the co-operation of the Post Office Department, displayed in all post offices throughout the country. Articles on the steps to citizenship and the advantages of acquiring citizenship were prepared for the use of ethnic newspapers across Canada.

In order to reach as many people as possible of those newcomers who, although eligible, have delayed in applying for Canadian citizenship, a film on the subject is now in process. It is intended for use with ethnic groups and voluntary organizations working with newcomers. The film will outline the factors involved in reaching such an important decision as changing allegiance, as well as the main court procedures.

At present, plans are being completed for a revised booklet to assist applicants for citizenship in preparing themselves for examination before the courts. It is anticipated that the new booklet will assist applicants and the courts, in achieving and maintaining a desirable standard in respect of citizenship examinations.

I would like to refer also to the work of the citizenship branch in the promotion of citizenship activities among Canadians generally. Last summer the branch concentrated its efforts on the organization of impressive and colourful Dominion day celebrations in a few major centres. I mention only two. Through the united efforts of civic government, business and industry, voluntary and ethnic organizations, Winnipeg had a most distinctive and successful program. In Ottawa events centred around parliament hill. Members will recall the trooping of the colour, the special carillon recitals, the sunset ceremony and the very moving citizenship ceremony over which I had the honour to preside. This year, along with the more formal observances, the branch is encouraging broader community participation in the Dominion day festivities, in gradual preparation for the celebrations that will take place during centennial year.

Two significant events with which the branch has been closely associated recently were a national Y.M.C.A. conference of young adults who met last summer to discuss the role of responsible Canadian citizenship in the next decade, and a conference sponsored by the home and school associations for community leaders in New Brunswick on the conditions of bicultural co-operation in the region.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING FINANCIAL STATEMENT

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-16, to amend the Companies Act (financial statements).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Companies Act so that if the foreign parent of a Canadian subsidiary is deemed to be under Canadian law a public company the Canadian subsidiary must also be classed as a public company. There are now 11 Canadian companies acts, one federal and ten provincial. Canadian law does not require private companies to publish financial statements and, among other things, a private company is one which has less than 50 shareholders. Public companies are required by the federal act to publish annual statements of income, expenditures, profit or loss, debts, assets, inventories and surpluses. On the other hand, a wholly owned subsidiary of any company, whether foreign or Canadian, is considered under the law to be a single corporate person and therefore can qualify as a private company and will not have to make its financial statements public.

It can be argued with reason that the right granted to private companies to keep their financial affairs safe from public scrutiny was intended as a guarantee of privacy for natural, not corporate, persons. Wholly owned subsidiaries are ultimately owned by the shareholders of the parent company; if there are more than 50 shareholders of the parent company then it can be argued that there are more than 50 shareholders of the subsidiary. It would therefore be in the spirit of the law to require wholly owned subsidiaries to submit separate financial statements both to the Secretary of State and to their parent corporation. It is my contention that this is the spirit of the law but that the letter of the law does not say this.

The amendment proposed in the bill will, of course, only affect companies incorporated by an act of parliament, but if this parliament gives a lead in this direction I think the provincial acts will be changed accordingly in due course. These provincial acts are not exactly similar to the federal act but generally speaking they make the same distinction between private and public companies.

The Canadian-American committee sponsored by the national planning association of the United States and the private planning association of Canada has recently published a booklet entitled "Policies and Practices of United States Subsidiaries in Canada" written by John Lindeman and Donald Armstrong. Mr. John Lindeman has wide experience in the field of international economic affairs with the United States government and as a private economic consultant. He is the author of earlier studies on United States business performance abroad published by the national planning association, and he is currently a partner in International Economic Consultants, Incorporated, in Washington. Professor Armstrong has had broad experience as an economic consultant in Canada and has recently been appointed director of the school of commerce at McGill University in Montreal.

The Canadian-American committee was established in 1957 to study problems arising from the growing interdependence between Canada and the United States. It has approximately equal representation from coast to coast. Its 60 members are business, labour, agricultural and professional leaders drawn in equal numbers from the United States and Canada. The committee was founded to foster good relations between Canada and the United States and to study any problems which are in the common interests of both countries.

The booklet deals with the sale of equity stock in subsidiaries to Canadians, the use of Canadian personnel in these subsidiaries, how well or how badly such subsidiaries contribute to charity and education, and one chapter deals with the subject of the bill, that is, the publication of financial data of such subsidiaries. On page 46 the authors state as follows:

> Complaints have come from financial, academic and professional sources that the failure of so many foreign owned companies to publish financial data imposes a factual blackout for them over much of the economy, and thus inhibits research. An analyst examining a problem of the concentration of industry, for example, will have much more difficulty studying the problem in Canada than would a student of the same problem in the United States or England. Even civil servants do not always have access to the financial data of individual companies. An economist in the Department of Trade and Commerce or in the Bank of Canada, who might be trying to assess the significance of a sample survey made of a particular industry, would have access to no more individual financial company data than would anyone else. Under existing rules, the information made available to the income tax division or the dominion bureau of statistics is not generally available to any other government department on an individual company basis. Market analysts report difficulty in trying to assess the future of an industry or of the individual companies that do sell shares, since in some cases they lack sufficient data for comparing companies and have no way of putting together financial statistics for an industry as a whole.

These complaints, Mr. Speaker, are quite legitimate when you consider the degree of ownership and control of Canadian industry exercised by foreign corporations. As far as control is concerned, according to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects 95 per cent of our automobile industry, 84 per cent of our rubber industry, 51 per cent of our chemical industry, 68 per cent of our petroleum industry and 55 per cent of our mining industry are controlled by United States capital alone. In the booklet I have referred to previously this statement is made:

> Today well over one quarter of all industry in Canada is controlled in the United States. In manufacturing the proportion is approximately one half, and in the primary mineral resource industries —mining, smelting and petroleum—United States ownership is close to two thirds of the total. These are dramatic figures.

No other industrialized country has such a large share of its industry controlled by concerns beyond its border. By comparison foreign investment in the United States reached a peak before world war I but it only amounted to the equivalent of 15 per cent of the United States gross national product. As of today, foreign investment in the United States is down to 3 per cent of the gross national product. On the other hand, foreign investment in Canada is now almost 61 per cent of the Canadian gross national product.

It almost seems fantastic, Mr. Speaker, that in so many areas of government legislation the cards have been stacked against companies which are either wholly Canadian or have Canadian participation. For example, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his recent budget has corrected the situation which gave a tax advantage to foreign companies which would not permit any Canadian participation, and penalized foreign subsidiaries which did allow Canadian participation. The budget has eliminated this advantage and removed one barrier to further Canadian participation in these foreign owned subsidiaries.

This bill attempts to amend the Companies Act so that wholly owned subsidiaries of foreign companies will not be able to operate in secrecy but will have to publish the same financial information required of Canadian companies, and the same information which is required of foreign subsidiaries which have some Canadian participation. For instance, the royal commission on price spreads in food products, in its report dated September, 1959, page 52, recommended that private companies be required by law to publish the same information as public companies of their financial operations. The commission stated that information on the operation of the Canadian economy is necessary to the proper conduct of public affairs. They felt that if this information were available it would be a corrective to some of the abuses they found in the food industry. The royal commission on Canada's economic prospects in their final report at page 393, made the following recommendations:

> (1) wherever possible, such concerns should employ Canadians in senior management and technical positions,—

They are here referring to foreign owned subsidiaries.

> —should retain Canadian engineering and other professional and service personnel, and should do their purchasing of supplies, materials and equipment in this country;
> (2) they should publish their financial statements and make full disclosure of the results of their Canadian operations;
> (3) they should include on their boards of directors a number of independent Canadians and they should sell an appreciable interest in their equity stock to Canadians.

The subject matter of another bill which I will be introducing, Mr. Speaker, will deal with the question of Canadian participation on the boards of directors of the companies. It is of note that the second recommendation of this royal commision is in line with the purpose of this bill.

It is interesting to note also that in the United Kingdom wholly owned subsidiaries are required by law to publish financial statements. Vauxhall, which is a General Motors subsidiary in the United Kingdom, regularly publishes complete details of its financial operations. According to the press there has been over the past five years a major flow of United States capital into the United Kingdom in order to build branch plants to service that market. It would seem, therefore, that foreign capital is not too concerned about this requirement, but is quite willing to take advantage of the fact there is no requirement so long as we are willing to give this advantage.

In the Canadian-American booklet to which I referred before I find that the authors interviewed some 150 officials of United States parent companies with subsidiaries in Canada and the operations of more than 50 United States companies operating in Canada. They state that most of the professional and governmental officials interviewed in Canada were firmly convinced that wholly owned subsidiaries should publish these financial statements. On the basis of these interviews they found that the management of most of the wholly owned United States subsidiaries in Canada had no strong opposition to the publication of the financial data in the detail now required of public companies. Incidentally it is well to note here that the data required under Canadian law is neither as extensive nor as detailed as that required under United States law, and which is furnished by the parent corporations of these same subsidiaries. The authors have come to the conclusion that the reason more of these wholly owned subsidiaries do not publish statements must be attributed more to inertia than any strong desire to keep their financial results away from public scrutiny. If this is so, then only through government legislation can we bring about this result.

In the Ottawa Journal of January 18 there was an interesting editorial referring to a speech made by Mr. Kennedy when he was given an honorary degree by the University of New Brunswick. In speaking about Canada-United States relations, Mr. Kennedy said:

> It would be a pity to rigidify the Canadian economy merely for the sake of breaking lances with a phantom American colonialism. In return, American businessmen with substantial investments in Canada should be required by the dictates of self-preservation, if not simple equity, to increase the participation of Canadian money and personnel in the development of Canadian resources.

I would suggest, in the light of that statement, that Mr. Kennedy would be in agreement with the principle of this bill.

This bill was introduced for the first time in 1959 and was debated in this house. The government, through the speech from the throne, has indicated that there will be measures relating to this problem. These measures may very well cover a wider field than can be covered in this bill. As I stated before, this bill simply amends the federal act and has no amending effect on any of the provincial companies acts. I do suggest, however, that if the bill when first introduced had been sent to a committee for study much valuable information would now be in the hands of the officials who have the job of drafting the proposed legislation. I suspect that these same officials will be referring to the debate which took place on this bill at that time as well as to the debate which I have just initiated.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has introduced a most interesting bill, namely an act to amend the Companies Act in which he specifies that companies operating in Canada but owned privately outside of Canada should have to give to the government and the people of Canada information relating to their annual operations. I believe it is safe to say there has been over the years a growing and widespread concern in our country at the fact that companies which would be covered by the proposed bill have not had to give information as to their operations in Canada. This widespread criticism has undoubtedly grown as a result of the information being made public as to the number of Canadian industries and manufacturing concerns that are owned outside our country, and with the knowledge that as a rule these subsidiaries do not publish their financial statements or offer the public any kind of information.

I was most interested in the fact that the proposer of this bill quoted at some length from the document "Policies and Practices of United States Subsidiaries in Canada" as published by the Canada-United States committee. It is indeed most opportune that this publication should have come off the press just in time for it to be studied prior to the discussion of this bill.

Mr. Broome: I also think so.

Mr. Winch: It arrived only two days ago as far as my own post office box is concerned. I want to say that it is without doubt one of the finest and most exhaustive of the studies that have been made by responsible people and a responsible organization into the matter of the policies and the practices of United States subsidiaries in Canada. To those who may at this moment feel that there are objections to the bill may I say that if they were to read this publication I feel they will find that all their objections are met, answered and disposed of.

In addition, of course, there is the positive approach in this exhaustive analysis, and that is the reason why this information should be available to the Canadian government and to the Canadian people. In my own reading of this pamphlet I was most interested to note the conclusion that the reason for the non-publication of statements by the wholly owned subsidiaries was very simple, namely that the Canadian law does not require it. That was the major reason given by all those who were interviewed: As the Canadian law does not require it, why do it? However I was most interested to note that all those who were interviewed in the main stated that they could see no valid objection to the filing of such a return, that there was no reason at all why it should not be done and that it would not be very difficult to do. But why do it if the Canadian law does not require it?

However, one answer given as contained in this pamphlet put forward an objection and stated why at least two of the large companies did not want to have a Canadian law under which they would be obliged to file their financial statements and to give information as to their Canadian operations. The answer given by these two large concerns in Canada but wholly owned in the United States was this. First, there was the approach of one executive who objected to the publication of financial data on the ground that labour unions would be provided with information, and he did not want labour unions to be provided with information with regard to the operations of his company in Canada. Here is a company using our resources, our country and our labour and profiting by being allowed to operate in our country. But this executive did not want the men who do the work or their organizations known as trade unions to know about the financial affairs of his company. The reason he gave for this stand, as quoted by the authors of this most valuable pamphlet which I have mentioned, was that if the workers knew how much money the company was making it might make it difficult for the company in negotiations with the union with regard to improving the conditions of the workers. I think it is disgraceful that an executive of a company with an attitude like that should be allowed to continue without being obliged to make this information available.

On the other side of the picture, something that was also extremely interesting, was the approach of an executive of another company who did not want to be obliged to issue any financial statement or information because, if that were done, the workers might want to unionize and he did not want them to unionize.

I think that this is a rather remarkable approach and that it is one we should consider. I believe that almost every argument definitely should be in favour of making it obligatory for these companies operating in Canada but owned outside of Canada to make public their operations, their financial status, their profit or loss and their depreciation.

The only other thing that I should like to add, Mr. Chairman, is the result of all the interviews that were undertaken by these two most responsible men, one from the United States and one from Canada, who did the research and the writing on behalf of this joint United States-Canada committee. This was their conclusion, and I think it should be noted. As a result of all their consultations with management and with executives and with many companies they were forced to the conclusion that, if it was felt in Canada that there should be the publishing of these financial statements, by far the vast majority of these companies would have no objection to doing so. If that is the conclusion, or the reaction, namely that fundamentally they have no objection to doing it but they are not doing it because it is not Canadian law, then I think that the hon. member who sponsored this bill has done the correct and proper thing in introducing legislation to make it Canadian law that these companies in the future will be obliged to operate in the same way as does any other company in Canada.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to follow the two distinguished members from British Columbia; I refer to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome), I am also happy to observe that all is calm in the province of British Columbia because on this occasion they seem to be in agreement.

Before going into the merits of the bill I think we should ask one question and then endeavour to answer it. The question is this: Why file a financial return at all? In order to answer that question I think one must look at the legal foundation of a corporation and see why some companies file financial returns and must do so under the law and why some companies do not file financial returns.

There are two distinct types of corporation. One is a private corporation and the other is a public corporation. Some are incorporated under the federal law, depending on their aims and objectives, and some are incorporated under the provincial law depending on their aims and objectives. Of course, to determine whether it is a private corporation or a public corporation two points are involved. One is the number of shareholders and the other is how the stock is sold. If it is a private company it must have less than 50 shareholders. If it is a public company, it can be larger. Of course, the public then invests its money and subscribes for its shares.

That brings me to the particular answer of the question: Why file a financial statement at all? The reason why this practice grew up is briefly this. When the public are subscribing for shares there is an obligation on the corporation and on the directors of the corporation which is a public corporation to file a financial report so that investors in this country and in other countries who are investing in a corporation in Canada may get a fair shake for their money.

I am one of those Canadians who believes that Canadians and other investors in this country should get a fair shake for their money. That is the principle behind filing a financial statement. I do not think it was ever anticipated, with the greatest respect to the two members for Vancouver, that the reason why—if I understood their remarks correctly—a financial statement is filed is to give some state control over any corporation.

I am one of those Canadians who is always a little sceptical when I see state control either over a corporation or an individual, because it leads me back to the feeling of what might be the manifesto of the socialists.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly.

Mr. Broome: Does he consider state control to be exercised through the government requiring companies to make returns to the dominion bureau of statistics, to the unemployment insurance commission and through the various reports that have to be filed? Is this state control? What control is there in asking for financial statements? This is not trying to tell them how to run their companies; it is asking them for a financial record of their operations, as they are now being asked for a record of their operations in other ways. I would like to see some logic on the part of the hon. member, that is all.

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad to see that my good friend for Vancouver South wants to make a speech at the same time as myself, and I am very happy to answer this question.

Companies file financial balance sheets with the income tax authorities, and that is confidential. The same thing applies to the other departments he has mentioned. He may know more about that than myself.

Before being interrupted I was dealing with this particular subject. I agree on many occasions with what the hon. member for Vancouver East has to say, and with his ideas on many subjects, and I have always admired his oratorial ability and his ability to analyse a subject. Because you always know on which side of a subject he stands, and that is sometimes not always easy to determine with some other members of this house.

But when I was talking about control I was thinking back to the Regina manifesto. This is the kind of thing you have to guard against. I am not saying it is bad in itself, but any kind of state control, as I said at the beginning, reduces freedom of enterprise and competition, which I as a Canadian stand for. I know there must be some degree of control, but it is that degree with which I am concerned.

Back in 1933 a group of 131 C.C.F. delegates met in Regina, and this is what they had to say:

> We aim to replace the present capitalist system, with its inherent injustice and inhumanity, by a social order from which the domination of one class by another will be eliminated, in which economic planning will supersede unregulated private enterprise and competition, and in which genuine democratic self-government, based upon economic equality will be possible—

It goes on to say this:

> No C.C.F. government will rest content until it has eradicated capitalism and put into operation the full program of socialized planning which will lead to the establishment in Canada of the co-operative commonwealth.

I am not digressing from the bill when talking about control, and I repeat the last paragraph:

> No C.C.F. government will rest content until it has eradicated capitalism—

I suppose to eradicate capitalism you have to get some control over those enterprises that are capitalistic. Once you get some control you may be able to eradicate them. Of course, history has shown that the C.C.F. has not eradicated capitalism; capitalism has eradicated the C.C.F.

I might say this also. They have somewhat softened the blow, because they found that their appeal over the years with regard to this kind of control was not popular. That is what I certainly oppose, when they start talking about a certain kind of control, companies must do this and that and individuals must do this and that. They have somewhat changed their tune, because in August of 1956 they met in Winnipeg, which is a little east, of course, of Regina and things got a little softer, because I understand—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I think it is time I suggested to the hon. member that he come back to Bill No. C-16.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to come back to Bill No. C-16 because the very element of the bill is asking certain companies to do certain things and is placing them under control. That is the very element that I do not like about the bill, and that is the very element I am trying to discuss in this debate before the house. Perhaps I might proceed, Mr. Speaker, if I am not out of order.

I feel that the element of control in this bill is a serious matter because, as I said in my remarks, the objective of the C.C.F. was to eradicate capitalism. It may be the very element of control that that particular party wants if they get into power. Perhaps they would eradicate capitalism by eradicating corporations and people engaged in enterprise. That is what I had in mind.

Coming back to what I was saying, they have somewhat changed their ideas in regard to the element of degree of control, because they then said:

The C.C.F. has always recognized public ownership—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I am afraid I must remind the hon. member that on second reading we are discussing the principle of the bill. The principle seems to be whether or not companies should make a financial statement to the government. We are not discussing socialism; we are discussing Bill No. C-16. I would ask the hon. member to please come back to the bill.

Mr. Winch: He has got to talk it out somehow.

Mr. Woolliams: I wish to thank the hon. member for Vancouver East for those remarks. In view of the ruling of the Chair I will naturally, as a backbencher, abide by the ruling of the Chair. Therefore I will come to another subject in reference to this particular bill.

In my introductory remarks I was saying that the reason why a financial statement was filed was to protect the investor and the shareholder. The reason financial statements are filed by certain companies is not to control the company. That was the main purport of the impression I was trying to leave in my opening remarks. That is true whether it happens to be a federally incorporated company or a provincially incorporated company.

I now wish to come to something else and I submit, Your Honour, that this refers to the matter under discussion, because my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver East dealt with the subject of subsidiary companies.

This bill appears to be aimed at corporations. Certain companies are able to go under the guise of a private company because the company owns the shares, but you may have so many shareholders that it is really a public company and not a private company in the true sense. That differentiates those who file financial returns and those who do not.

I have listened to debates in this house on this and other matters, and I do not think this particular government, looking back in the past, has ever been anti-American in any way. All this government has ever done, it seems to me, is this. I have listened to the members of the treasury benches and members of the government and they have said that Canadian capital must have equal competition with United States capital, wherever it exists.

I would like to draw this analogy when we are dealing with United States subsidiaries that have been doing business in Canada, and particularly in western Canada. Over a number of years in Alberta we have developed a very healthy oil industry. Some of those are subsidiaries in the same class and category to which my good friend referred in his remarks. It would seem to me that if we are to do anything we should be very cautious not to kill any kind of business or any chance that capital may come in from the United States to Canada.

We have only to compare the economy of the province of Alberta over the last 30 years with that of the province of Saskatchewan to illustrate my point. In the province of Alberta we have not had control or regulation to any degree such as is suggested in this bill, and we have a very expansive enterprise. Therefore the government is able to budget each year eventually, because of the oil industry, to very much better advantage than is the socialist government of the province of Saskatchewan. As a result, we get better enterprise, better roads and everything that goes along with it. I am one of those people who would oppose any feeling or suggestion at any time of anti-Americanism in this country.

I am one of those who believe we should always encourage American or any other foreign capital to come into this country and develop our resources so that we can get full employment. There is always a lot of talk about this, that and the other, but the fact is that if business is healthy and making a profit, a man has a job and there is prosperity in this country. In that manner it seems to me we can get full employment.

Let us take the industrial development of the province of Saskatchewan and compare it with the province of Alberta. You have a greater degree of prosperity in that province. People flocked into Alberta, while they left Saskatchewan, and this is because of the capital pouring in from the United States. So I say we should treat with caution any bill which might impose a kind of control which scares out capital. We are killing business, and when we kill business we lose jobs for Canadians.

Mr. Winch: What are they trying to hide, then?

Mr. Woolliams: I will come to that. I am glad the hon. member raised that question. The hon. member for Vancouver East is always decent, and very honest with his facts. He referred to the "Policies and Practices of United States Subsidiaries in Canada." I just want to read from that document for a few moments. I say that the purpose of filing financial reports is not to exercise a degree of control; it is not to show labour or any other class of people what a corporation is making. The purpose behind it is to protect the investors and shareholders. If we are to come to a point where we say this data must be filed for a different purpose, if management must file this information for another purpose, then it may be that certain labour organizations which, in their turn, are sometimes subsidiaries of United States unions, would have to lay bare their financial reports to the people of this country. This has got to be a two-way street between management and labour.

It does seem to me after talking to the workers of this country—and I was one myself—that the workers today appreciate as never before that when management is making a dollar they have a job and are being paid a decent wage. I say that if this is going to apply to corporations it should apply to labour unions also. This has got to be a two-way street.

I want to refer to this particular article which the hon. member mentioned a few moments ago. I was just as happy as he was to have it on my desk so that I should have a few facts at my disposal this evening, because I did not have a speech prepared. I am quoting from this article "Policies and Practices of United States Subsidiaries in Canada" on page 40 and it says this in the last paragraph and I think it will answer the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Winch: Read the second last paragraph.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, I will do that too. Here is what is said, actually on page 48:

> The fact that the concept introduced by this argument is a new one does not mean that it is a bad one. But it seems useful to face the fact that when Canadians call for publication of financial data by wholly owned subsidiaries, they are asserting a public interest whose definition is still in the process of evolution.

In other words, this is a new idea. We used to file financial reports in order to protect the shareholders and investors. If we change that idea we are stepping out on a new path. That is the evolution the author is talking about. The passage continues:

> It may well be argued that when the operations of any entity—business, government, private foundations, labour unions—affect the public interest, then those operations should be open to public scrutiny.

The important phrase there is the phrase "affect the public interest". So, the writer argues, it may well be that business, the crown corporation and the labour unions should be treated in the same way, because they do affect the public interest, and that these legal entities should have to produce a balance sheet open to public scrutiny.

If this were done, if it were a two-way street, then I might go along with the mover of this bill—I might go along with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) as long as he has forgotten the Regina manifesto, and say it might be a good idea. I felt that when the hon. member was speaking today he rose in his place in the interests of union members and of the public. I go along with the need to protect the public, to protect the little man in the unions against—

An hon. Member: And the little shareholder.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, and the little shareholder. I am coming to him. I say that when it becomes a matter of public importance, and if this were made to cover the whole field I might go along with this bill, but you cannot give cake to one and not to the other. Now I would point out to hon. members that the passage on page 48 of this book continues:

> But as far as we know, the public interest in knowing the financial details of business operations which do not involve direct investment by the public has never been asserted.

That is evolution. That is new thought. I develop that idea to point out it is a new thought, and when we enter on a new thought we must cover the whole field.

I have said a lot in reference to this particular matter, but I should like to repeat this: I believe that in dealing with any of these questions, where we pick out one group, whether United States subsidiaries or any other kind, we should remember that they are up here, as any one who is in business in Canada is in business for one reason, namely to make a dollar. When capital and management are making a dollar, labour also is making a dollar. When you can encourage that philosophy and really get it moving you have full employment in this country. So, I say, it is easy to point out the difference between Alberta—

An hon. Member: Not again.

Mr. Woolliams: I know you do not like it, but I know what is going on in Saskatchewan, because I lived there. It is easy to see the difference between Alberta and Saskatchewan. Capital was invited, and enterprise was encouraged and in that atmosphere you have there full employment and you do not have to listen to a lot of drivel and nonsense.

Mr. Winch: Could I ask the hon. member a question? Is he referring to the speech of my colleague from Vancouver South who introduced this bill as being a lot of drivel and nonsense?

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): I enter this debate with some trepidation in the light of the interpretation which has been placed on the purpose of it. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) has said, we must bear in mind the implication of the suggestion we have before us.

First, I should like to discuss this bill as it affects the private Canadian companies before commenting on its affect on the United States Canadian companies, because I think there is some difference in the attitude one could take. At the present time the private companies must file their income tax statements. That is a private matter between them and the government. Then they are required, in most instances, to make reports to their shareholders.

They are also required to make certain company returns. They are required to make their returns to the shareholders because it is of interest to the shareholders in a private company to know what is taking place in the firm but it is not necessarily a matter of public interest requiring that the affairs of a company—especially of a family company—be made public. For that reason I would rather hesitate to support the implication of this bill in so far as it affects private Canadian companies. I think that to do so would perhaps discourage the investment that is needed.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question or an observation? When the hon. member speaks of discouraging investment is he aware that the wholly owned United States subsidiary—

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. The hon. member rose to ask a question, not to make a statement.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, I said "Is the hon. member aware" which is the prelude to a question. Is he aware that this company turns out one of the finest financial statements in an endeavour to keep the Canadian people informed and to establish good public relations? I will send this over to the hon. member so that he may look at it.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Speaker, I was referring solely to privately owned Canadian companies and especially to family owned companies. Many firms issue financial statements when it is in their interest to do so. I was saying that I hesitate to make the application of this bill so wide as to cover certain privately owned or family owned companies.

When dealing with non-Canadian companies that are investing in Canada a matter of greater concern must be taken into consideration, namely the control and use of Canadian assets by non-Canadian companies. While we welcome foreign investment to assist us in the development of our country we are anxious to ensure that there is no abuse and that Canadians are given an adequate share in the development of our assets. We must ensure, too, that there is no undue exploitation contrary to the interests of Canadians. That is why I commend the government for the statement earlier this year that non-Canadian companies and unions shall be required to make public their financial statements because the public and those interested in these companies and unions should know what profits and assets are being sent out of the country. I am, therefore, in accord with the principle of this bill as it affects non-Canadian companies.

It would perhaps be of interest to quote from the booklet referred to by previous speakers, entitled "Policies and Practices of United States Subsidiaries in Canada" by Mr. John Lindeman and Mr. Donald Armstrong and published by the Canadian-American committee. At page 14 there is shown a table illustrating the investment in Canada of countries all around the world. The total investment from all countries amounts to $20,675 million of which $15,725 million is represented by United States investments and $3,250 million by United Kingdom investments. It would appear that the development of this country is in large part dependent on investment from outside Canada. At page 15 of this booklet the following statement is found:

> During the post-war years the Canadian economy grew at an average rate of 4.3 per cent a year, and along with this Canada has had a population increase of 4.6 million and a per capita improvement in the gross national product of 1.5 per cent a year.

There is a fair comment at the top of page 16 of this booklet:

> It would be a gross exaggeration to say that United States capital has been entirely responsible for Canada's economic growth. But it would be a gross inaccuracy to deny that the United States contribution to Canadian economic expansion, especially during the post-war years, has been of crucial importance. Most of Canada's new capital formation has been financed by Canadian internal savings; the net inflow of new funds from abroad during the 1950's has been equivalent to only 11 per cent of the total.

The booklet goes on to point out that United States investment in addition to contributing capital funds has brought technical know-how, etc., to this country.

As this booklet has indicated it is important to realize that generally speaking the various firms interviewed were in favour of being required to publish financial statements. It appears that the attempt to make voluntary statements has not been successful, and for obvious reasons. Many companies will not publish information unless required to, yet there is no great opposition to the publication of financial statements.

It is in keeping with our desire for national development that we should keep track of those companies that are making contributions to the development of Canada. This does not represent an anti-American attitude since all non-Canadian companies are included. We should have information as to what assets are being taken out of Canada by those who have invested here. As has been stated, the proposal in all fairness includes in addition to industries, organizations such as unions.

If Canadians are going to be able to control the resources of this country for the benefit of Canadians we should have some knowledge of how our assets are being developed. Of course, we should not treat unjustly those who are good enough to invest in this country but there should be no real objection to their filing these statements.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I presume the house leader has no change to suggest in the order of business?

Mr. Churchill: There is no change, Mr. Speaker, in the program as announced last night.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Trans-oceanic and inland transportation and other assistance for immigrants and settlers, subject to the approval of treasury board including care en route and while awaiting employment; and payments to the provinces pursuant to agreements entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, in respect of expenses incurred by the provinces for indigent immigrants, $2,100,000.

GRAIN

OATS—FINAL PAYMENT ON 1959-60 POOL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement to make to the house in regard to the 1959-60 oat pool.

The Canadian wheat board has completed an accounting in respect of this pool as at December 31, 1960. The 1959-60 oat pool has now been closed, and the government has authorized the distribution of the final surplus. Producers delivered 23,660,976 bushels of oats to the 1959-60 pool. The final surplus is $3,852,323.70 after deducting the prairie farm assistance levy and final payment costs and after adding estimated additional interest earnings. The average final payment on the 1959-60 oat account will be 16.281 cents per bushel. This is double the average final payment of 8.138 cents per bushel in the case of the 1958-59 pool.

The final oat payments for the principal grades delivered to the 1959-60 pool are as follows:

No. 2 Canada western	17.146	cents	per	bushel
Extra No. 3 Canada western	17.110	"	"	"
No. 3 Canada western	15.916	"	"	"
Extra No. 1 feed	15.285	"	"	"
No. 1 feed	16.045	"	"	"
No. 2 feed	19.451	"	"	"

The final oat payment will commence today and cheques will be in the mail shortly.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—INSTRUCTIONS RESPECTING DISPLACED PERSONS

Motion No. 42—Mr. Regier:

For a copy of all correspondence and instructions issued by the Department of Labour to the regional offices of the unemployment insurance commission having to do with displaced persons since January 1, 1957.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have made inquiries from the Department of Labour as to whether any correspondence and instructions have been issued by them to the regional offices of the unemployment insurance commission having to do with displaced persons since January 1, 1957.

I have been advised that no correspondence or instructions have been issued by the Department of Labour respecting this matter. In view of that fact I would ask whether the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member signifies his willingness to withdraw the motion. Has the hon. member leave to do so?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

LIVESTOCK PEDIGREE ACT—HOLSTEIN CATTLE REGISTRATIONS

Motion No. 45—Mr. Peters:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the federal government, or any agency or department thereof, with any other government, organization, or person since January 1, 1952, dealing with the administration, violations or alleged violations of the Livestock Pedigree Act with respect to the registration of Holstein cattle.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): With the usual reservations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—REPLY TO REPORTED REQUEST FOR SUBWAY LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he could inform the house whether any reply has been made to the request of the metropolitan area of Toronto for financial assistance in connection with the subway; and if so, could he tell us the nature of that reply?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reply is being drafted at the present time, and as soon as it is ready to be forwarded and has been forwarded, the house will be made aware of the answer.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE OF MANAGEMENT AND LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of his recent statement to the C.L.C. that employment depends to a large extent on management and labour. Would the minister care to say whether the government would be prepared to call a conference of management and labour to discuss this question, as has been requested by Mr. Douglas Hamilton, the secretary of the Ontario federation of labour.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the statement just made by the hon. member for Assiniboia is incorrect. What I did say was that the government had put forward certain measures to stimulate that aspect of the economy in order to provide jobs in the manufacturing and secondary industries, and that the government is prepared to accept any other reasonable suggestions and implement them; that the government will bring about further measures, but this also necessitates the co-operation of industry and labour to bring about productivity and bring the cost of that productivity down to the level where our goods can compete not only in the foreign market but in the domestic market.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would say whether he is prepared to call a conference of industry and labour so that he may put his views before the conference in order that they might consider appropriate action?

Mr. Starr: This government does not wish to interfere with the affairs of management and labour in their respective spheres. We feel the initiative should lie with them alone, because they too have a responsibility with respect to the affairs of this country.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

RESULTS OF ANALYSES OF WEIGHT REDUCING PREPARATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My attention has been drawn to a question asked by the hon. member for Skeena on Friday last pertaining to so-called weight reducing preparations such as Metrecal and Quota. Some analyses of the constituents of these and similar products have been carried out in our food and drug laboratories, following the normal procedure when new products of this kind come on the market.

I am advised that after careful examination the conclusion has been reached that claims made in advertising appear to be reasonable in so far as the normal individual is concerned.

[Mr. Argue.]

FISHERIES

LAKE SUPERIOR—INQUIRY AS TO LAMPREY CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether the lamprey control program on lake Superior has been successful, and if it is true that a proposal has been made to ban completely any trout fishing on lake Superior next year?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I do not wish to be dogmatic with regard to the success of our lamprey control measures on the great lakes, but I can say that considerable success has been achieved by the use of specific poisons known as lampreycides which destroy the larvae of the lamprey in the streams without endangering other forms of life. There has been a fairly extensive program in the course of which lamprey producing streams in this country have been treated with this selective poison.

I do not want to comment on the second part of the question before seeing it in Hansard, but I will take it as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

U.S. ARMY POSTS IN CANADA—PUBLIC RELATIONS OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that Major General G. R. Pearkes, the former member for Esquimalt-Saanich, while a member of the opposition insisted that those responsible for dealing with the public at United States army posts in Canada should be Canadian citizens, can the minister assure the house that General Pearkes' recommendations have been carried into effect.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): There are no United States army bases in Canada. There are two United States army detachments at Fort Churchill but the base, and everything connected with it, is under Canadian over-all command and Canadian control.

TRADE

RUSSIA—STATEMENT ON REPORTED ABILITY TO UNDERCUT CANADIAN MINERAL EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On Thursday last the hon. member for Laurier asked the following question:

Inquiries of the Ministry

Has the minister seen the statement by the president of the Asbestos corporation before the Senate manpower committee that Russia is in a position to undercut Canadian exports of minerals to western Europe with low price offerings from communist sources? If so, has he any comment to make thereon?

I have seen the Canadian Press report on statements made to the Senate manpower committee by the president of Asbestos Corporation Limited to the effect that competition from the Soviet union is threatening Canada's export position in Europe, especially with offerings of asbestos.

We have been aware for some time that Canada's position in world markets for asbestos has been challenged due to competition from other sources, but this competition has not come only from the U.S.S.R.

Marketing conditions for Canadian asbestos in western Europe have improved since 1958 and 1959, when competition was most intense. In 1960, for example, exports of Canadian asbestos reached an all time high, and included shipments to Soviet bloc countries.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO INTERCITY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. On January 30 last in reply to a question directed to him by the hon. member for Medicine Hat dealing with the intercity traffic between various western Canadian cities, the minister made reference to the fact that if it appeared necessary and desirable in dealing with this problem, public hearings might be decided upon. I wonder if I might ask the minister, in view of the interest of a number of western cities, whether a decision has yet been reached to hold these public hearings.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to correct the previous answer I gave. I can state definitely today that prior to the transfer of the licence to operate this milk run, as it is known, there will certainly be public hearings.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will those public hearings be held in western Canada or in Ottawa? Can the minister give any indication when they will be held?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I should not like to state definitely the location of the public hearings. As far as the time is concerned, as I said they will be held prior to the changeover.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REPORTED DEATH OF MR. LUMUMBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I apologize for not sending him notice, but this news came to our attention only a short time ago.

Has the minister any information to give the house with respect to the reported death of Patrice Lumumba of the Congo? Has the government given consideration to what contribution we will make to meet the situation that will flow from this unfortunate incident?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the radio report that Mr. Patrice Lumumba and two companions have been killed in circumstances which still remain to be clarified. If this report is accurate we deplore very much this act of violence. While Mr. Lumumba has been a controversial figure, the fact remains that he was a duly elected member of parliament and formed the first government of the newly independent republic of the Congo. His death, if it has taken place, is unlikely to settle anything. Indeed, it is more likely to complicate the already difficult task of the United Nations in the Congo and the process of conciliation and pacification which it is seeking to foster. For this reason and of course also, as I have mentioned, on humanitarian grounds the government is very much upset about this reported act of violence.

It is our hope that all parties will exercise restraint in this dangerous situation. As the hon. member knows, Canada is a member of the Congo committee at the United Nations, and throughout has tried to pour oil on troubled waters. We will continue to follow that course if this death has actually taken place.

I believe that the Secretary General of the United Nations asked today for instructions to make an investigation. That request was supported, for example, by the representative of the United States, and an investigation is now under way. The security council will be meeting on the question, I think, on Wednesday.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—REPORTED SALE OF SECURITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the appropriate minister I wonder if I may ask the Prime Minister whether consultations were held between the government and the Bank of Canada concerning the recent sale by the bank of unusually large amounts of bonds and securities, thereby reducing the available money supply in Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that cannot be dealt with on the orders of the day. I will give consideration to the question and an answer will be forthcoming at the earliest possible time.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister if he is yet in a position to table the correspondence with the provincial premiers.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I said I would table it as soon as I heard from all of the premiers. I think that one or two have not yet replied. If I do not have any replies from them I take it that it will be in order to table the others.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1959-60 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house when he will be able to make an announcement as to the size of the interim payment on the 1959-60 wheat crop?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hope to have more good news for the farmers tomorrow or Wednesday.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED REDUCTION IN ADVERTISING RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue; I am sorry, but I was not able to send the minister notice. Are reports true that there have been serious advertising rate slashes on the part of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire from the C.B.C. with respect to this matter, and I will advise the house in due course.

AGRICULTURE

SNAILS—INQUIRY AS TO PROMOTION OF HELICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Again I apologize for failing to send notice, but some information have just come to hand in a letter from the United States. In view of the government's interest in the development of the family farm and in view of the increased importations into Canada of snails for culinary purposes, is the government giving any consideration to the promotion of heliculture in this country?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will get a dictionary and take this question as notice.

Mr. Pickersgill: And answer it at a snail's pace.

PRIVATE BILLS

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chown (for Mr. Woolliams) for the second reading of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Peters.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to inform the house that the members of our group will oppose the bill now under discussion. We think a mistake has been made in asking the house to give second reading to the Aurora pipe line bill.

It has been said that what the house is being asked to do today is to give routine approval to a bill that will subsequently go before a committee of this house, and that after the company is incorporated it will then have to get approval from the national energy board before it can in fact export gas, oil or condensates to the United States. While this statement is true, Mr. Speaker, the responsibility of this house to deal with this question cannot be handed over quite so easily to a committee of the house or to a board.

It has been already pointed out on a number of occasions in this debate that a bill passed by this house established a Canadian company which has power to provide a pipe line for the exportation to the United States of products which are covered by the bill under discussion.

Our main objection to the bill now before the house, Mr. Speaker, is based on the very ground that the Conservative party and the C.C.F. took in this house in 1956 during the pipe line debate, in opposition to the trans-Canada pipe line bill. The bill before us provides for the incorporation of another company that will be under United States control. About two thirds of the shares of the company will be controlled by a United States company, the Continental Oil Company. This is another instance of a great natural resource being controlled in its transportation by a United States company.

We think there are on record, on previous occasions, adequate reasons why this bill should be opposed. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and other members of the house on a former occasion objected to the Texas buccaneers having a large part of the control of the trans-Canada pipe line company. The Texas buccaneers are involved in this measure. There has been in my judgment, a complete reversal of the stand that was taken by the Conservative party in 1956. By supporting this bill hon. members will turn the ownership, and control of this pipe line over to a United States company. Back in 1956, on June 4, the leader of the opposition at that time, Hon. George Drew, put forward a very important proposition by way of an amendment to the trans-Canada pipe line bill then before the house. I should like to read, if I may, the provisions of that amendment, because I think they might be made applicable at this time to this bill. The amendment is found on page 4673 of Hansard for that date, and reads as follows:

That the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have the power to amend sections 5, 6 and 7 thereof to include the agreements made with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited as schedules to the bill and add other sections necessary to ensure that the bill shall give effect to one of the following principles.

First, the immediate agreement of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to reorganize as a company under effective Canadian ownership and control and to undertake construction without a grant of public money, in accordance with the assurances upon which its charter was granted by parliament;

The proposition was that the trans-Canada pipe line company should be reorganized under Canadian control.

Second, failing such agreement, the immediate consideration of other proposals submitted by any other persons or companies for the immediate financing and construction of the pipe line under effective Canadian ownership and control and without a grant of public money;

There is a company already in existence that can do this work and I suggest that this United States proposal to which we are being asked to agree at this time should be opposed by the members of the house, and this bill should be defeated.

Third, enlarge the powers of the crown corporation so that the entire pipe line may be constructed immediately under public ownership.

The Conservatives of that day, Mr. Speaker, went so far as to say that if the government refused to accept the first two propositions then, as a third alternative, the pipe line should be publicly owned. The bill we are being asked to pass today repudiates the whole policy and position taken by the Conservative party in those days. It makes a mockery—

Mr. Nugent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the present speaker is not confining himself to the principle involved in this bill, according to the ruling you made as recorded on page 1818 of Hansard. You said:

As I see it, the principle of the bill is whether this group of individuals petitioning parliament shall be given corporate capacity. I see no principle other than this involved in this bill, whether this particular group of individuals shall be given corporate capacity.

I would ask you, sir, to enforce that ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The remarks, as I followed them, did not seem to me to call for intervention. The hon. member was discussing the desirability of giving corporate powers to this particular group, having regard to the fact that control would be in the United States, as possibly was indicated earlier in the debate. I would not think it proper to interfere.

Mr. Argue: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your ruling.

Mr. Chown: Would the hon. member permit a question before he continues? He said earlier in the debate, with some authority, that the shares would be two thirds United States owned. I was going to ask him how he could make that suggestion to the house in the light of the fact that section 3, (a) and (b), simply provides for share capital. No one in this chamber can presume what the apportionment of ownership will be as between the United States and Canada, or as between any particular groups of individuals no matter where they reside.

Mr. Argue: This is a very interesting observation from the hon. member. I think it can only mean one thing, that he is challenging what I have said as not being a statement of fact. It will be very interesting to see, if this motion should pass and the bill come out of the committee, that we have been wrong and this is a Canadian company. I hope I am in error, but I am afraid I am not.

One of my reasons for thinking I am not in error is that the gentleman who introduced this bill in the other place, when explaining it said that the company was owned one third by the Hudson's Bay Company and two thirds by the Continental Oil Company, the latter being one of the large integrated oil companies in the United States. I am prepared to accept the word of the hon. senator. I hope he is in error. I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg South, who has just asked the question, is right. However, I believe the evidence is that this company is in fact controlled by a United States company.

Mr. Lambert: May I raise a point of order? I think those words used by the hon. member for Assiniboia run counter to citations 482 and 483 of Beauchesne, to the effect that the facts cannot be questioned in the house during the debate on a private bill. These are matters for the committee. There is no question that the facts cannot be discussed during the discussion on second reading.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to speak to that point of order, Mr. Speaker, if I may. In support of the argument, and even going beyond the authority cited by my colleague, I would say that at the time the earlier debate on the pipe line took place the National Energy Act, which is chapter 46 of the statutes of 1959, had not been enacted. If you refer to section 44 of that act, Mr. Speaker, you will find that when a company makes an application to export gas, even if they are incorporated by a bill they have to be certified by the national energy board. This is the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is coming to the point of order I would be glad to have his assistance. It seems to me he is answering the argument of the hon. member who had the floor.

Mr. Woolliams: I am coming to the point of order. I think the hon. member is confined more than he would have been in the previous debate because one of the circumstances to be taken into consideration by the energy board is the very fact to which the hon. member has referred. We have this legislation on the books, and that goes beyond the principle of the bill. All we are asking here is the incorporation of a legal entity, not for permission to construct a pipe line or export anything through the pipe line; merely the right to be incorporated. The other right is a right for a court of record, namely the national energy board, to decide when circumstances are set out by evidence, and they make that decision. That is my point.

Mr. Argue: You just want to sell the country to the Americans.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might be allowed to say a word on the point of order that has been raised. Do I understand hon. gentlemen opposite to be seeking to restrict debate in this chamber on a pipe line?

Mr. Argue: A point of order has been raised as to whether hon. members may discuss the ownership of the proposed pipe line on second reading, since the national energy board has power, according to section 44 of the act, to take into account the extent to which the Canadians will have the opportunity to participate in the financing. I would point out that in the National Energy Board Act there is no provision which requires Canadian ownership of a pipe line of this description. It is obvious that this pipe line is not to be Canadian owned. For that reason I am expressing opposition to the passage of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The parliamentary secretary has raised a point of order which draws a distinction between the scope of debate on a public bill and that on a private bill. I think I might read citation 482 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, to which I am referred:

> A public bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the house, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons; but the expediency of a private bill, being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the house, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee. Where, irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable, the house will not consent to the second reading; but otherwise, the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee. This is the first occasion on which the bill is before the house otherwise than pro forma or in connection with the standing orders; and if the bill be opposed, upon its principle, it is the proper time for attempting its defeat.

Citation 483 is to somewhat the same effect. Undoubtedly there is a narrower margin for debate on a private bill than on a public bill. This is a private bill. At an earlier stage in this debate I endeavoured to prevent the house from embarking upon a general debate on the economics of the oil industry. However, it seems to me that it is relevant for an hon. member to express some views on the question of whether another pipe line company should be formed on such material as is before the house. It is true that the future and the intentions of this company are not relevant so much as the powers which it seeks to acquire. The powers are relevant because that is the principle of the bill; this particular group of petitioners have come before parliament asking to be given as a corporation the power to operate a pipe line company.

As certain facts have been discussed in debate in this house and the hon. member has quoted from what has been said in debate—it is true in the other place—if he does not attempt to extend his allegation of facts to too great a degree, I think I should allow him to proceed.

Mr. Argue: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The house is being asked to give second reading to this bill, which is approval in principle. It is perfectly true that it is a conditional type of approval, in that the bill will be placed before a committee of this house for detailed examination. The bill might be killed in the committee; it might be referred back to the house in a different form.

Mr. Speaker, what we are objecting to is any kind of approval of this bill, whether conditional or unconditional. We think it is a thoroughly bad bill. We think the people of Canada in the past, when they have had a chance to make a judgment, have shown that they favour Canadian development of gas pipe lines in this country. The Conservative government is in power today in this country to a substantial degree because of the public support that was given to the opposition parties of the day in opposing pipe lines in this country being owned and controlled by outside capital. Today I am opposing this bill, as is the C.C.F.-New party, because we think it is a thoroughly bad bill, an un-Canadian bill, and one that goes counter to the public statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance made on many occasions. We think the passage of this bill to set up another United States company is not in the interests of Canadians at this time. For the life of me I cannot understand why there appears to be—and only a vote on this matter will show whether or not I am correct—such general and widespread approval of United States buccaneers owning this pipe line in opposition to the stand taken by Conservative members of parliament in this House of Commons on so many occasions.

Mr. Woolliams: Will the hon. member permit a question.

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member say that the Hudson's Bay Company of Canada is a United States buccaneer company.

Mr. Argue: Yes; not the Hudson's Bay Company but the Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited. I am saying that the Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited is a company that is controlled by United States interests.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit another question.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Bow River can make his own speech. He will have an opportunity to show how much he loves the Texas buccaneers. The Tories did not formerly love them, as you know, Mr. Speaker, but they have changed. Since the Tories got into office the Texas buccaneers became fine fellows. The Tories are for them now. Even though a Canadian company could do the job, they are rising in their places in a unified chorus today giving their "Amen" to a bill which will turn a pipe line over to United States control.

I commend to the consideration of hon. members opposite the words of Senator Brunt when this bill was discussed at the second reading stage. It is true that he did not come out in full opposition to the bill, but he set forth some grave doubts and the reasons for his doubts as to the effect of this kind of procedure.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is going beyond our practice in quoting opinions expressed in the other place. After all, we are supposed to make up our own minds. It is permissible to read from the records of the other place, but not to quote opinions expressed in debate in the other place.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, until this moment we seem to have had one consistent rule in this debate, namely to keep on doing in the future what had already been done in this debate. Reference has been made to the hon. senator, and quotations have been made. That is the reason why I referred to him at this time. You are perfectly, correct, Mr. Speaker, in saying that it is not the custom of the house to quote statements made in the other place, nor do I think it is in order to do so. The records can be quoted, but Hansard is not the official record of the other place. Since these statements by this hon. gentleman have already been placed on the record I felt that at least in this debate this kind of thing was proper and was being accepted.

The motion before the house is to give this bill the six months' hoist. This is the normal practice to show strong opposition to such a measure. We will vote for the six months' hoist; we will vote to kill this bill, because we think gas pipe lines in this country should be Canadian owned. We would go further. We would say that in the building of pipe lines in this country there is a place for public ownership, for public investment. We prefer, as a first choice, a publicly owned utility. If that is not possible, if it does not seem practical, we suggest there should be a measure of public investment in all these pipe lines; but the very minimum we insist upon is Canadian ownership and Canadian control. We object to this government's about face from the commendable stand it took in this house on a former occasion.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Peters) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we are asked by means of a private bill to endorse in principle the organization of another pipe line. As we understand it, this pipe line is going to be largely owned outside of Canada, and if permitted to be built the operation of this pipe line will injure the interests of an existing pipe line that has already been authorized to do this work by a previous parliament.

I find it difficult to understand why hon. members would endorse the principle of inviting a foreign owned pipe line into Canada in order to ruin a bona fide Canadian company. I also have difficulty understanding why a private bill should become a matter of party politics. I do not see that the life of the government is involved in this bill. There is a growing tendency in Canada to make even private legislation a matter of party politics. I regret that development. The government's life is not involved here. This is not a government sponsored bill. I cannot understand why political parties have to take party line positions with respect to private bills, and I deplore this development.

Legislation offered to us by the government, if it is not of major significance, ought not to be subject to the whips of the parties. This is not a new tendency but it is a growing one. Party lines are the determining factor with respect to legislation even including private bills. I conclude my remarks with this observation. I believe that political parties ought to be cut down to size and members of parliament restored to their proper status so they can make up their own minds whether this bill and others of a similar nature are in the interests of the nation rather than of the political parties.

Mr. John Pallett (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, just so there will be no misunderstanding, let me say that the hon. member who has just spoken and who has had some experience in this house should know better than to make the suggestion he just made. The party whip is in no way involved in the decisions that are taken by hon. members in the private members' hour.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I thank the chief whip of the Conservative party for making abundantly clear the position of hon. members opposite, namely that members have complete freedom to vote any way they see fit on a bill like this without pressure being exerted in any way. That makes the position of hon. members opposite all the more amazing to me. It is a matter of amazement to me that in a case where the whip has no opinion and says "Vote as you like", all but one hon. gentleman of the government party have voted in favour of turning over this utility to United States interests. This is a black day for Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is miscontruing the scope of the debate. To discuss what is the undoubted privilege of hon. members to vote as they see fit is quite outside the scope of this debate. Perhaps I should have intervened when the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam began in that line. It is not relevant to this bill, and it contravenes our practice to have the course of action of hon. members in voting, and their decision when it has been taken, challenged in that way.

Mr. Argue: By their vote hon. members opposite have shown that they are in support of this bill. This is amazing to me. I cannot understand it. It is a dark day for Canada when hon. members vote for a bill which if given the approval of this house in all its stages will turn over to foreign interests a Canadian utility. This is a depicable decision—

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My understanding was that we were voting on giving this bill a six months' hoist, not on the principle of the bill. We were voting on the C.C.F. amendment. That is certainly the basis on which I voted. I do not like the imputation the hon. member for Assiniboia is making. I do not like the inference he draws as to why I voted in a given way, and I ask him to withdraw his imputation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: I have nothing to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I attempted to follow what the hon. member said. What was the imputation the hon. gentleman felt should be withdrawn?

Mr. Pugh: The hon. member for Assiniboia stated that all hon. members of this house who did not vote his way were in favour of turning over this resource or utility to United States or Texas buccaneers—whatever he chose to call them—and the fact is that the vote took place only on the C.C.F. amendment.

Mr. Argue: Are you in favour of the bill or against it?

Mr. Pugh: I am in favour of having a decision reached and nothing else.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is stretching the rule in asking for that interpretation. The point he made in correcting the hon. member was appropriate enough, but to draw conclusions from the fact that hon. members vote a certain way is the privilege of every hon. member of the house, provided it does not reflect on the personal conduct of the individual, and I see nothing of that kind.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I think the word employed by the hon. member in describing the conduct of hon. members was "despicable". That is strong language to use with respect to a vote on an amendment to give the six months' hoist to this bill. I take exception to the hon. member's remarks. My stand with respect to Canadian control of industry is well known in this house, and I have objected to the loss of Canadian control more strongly than hon. members of the opposition have done.

Mr. Argue: We are getting too thin skinned around here. It is not my practice in this house to jump up every time forceful language is used. On one occasion I used the word "baloney" and I had to withdraw it because it was said to be unparliamentary and undignified.

I was challenged earlier on my statement that this company was United States controlled. I used as evidence—and Your Honour pointed out that I could not quote someone in the other place—a statement that had been made on the introduction of this bill there. However, I think I am in order in referring to the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver East, whose statement has been unchallenged. I am quoting from page 1130 of Hansard of January 17, where the hon. member is reported as having said:

> I sent for the last report of Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, on page 14 of which I find that the Continental Oil Company of Houston is said to own 67.8 per cent of the common stock of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited. The remainder is owned 22.6 per cent by Hudson's Bay Company of England and 9.6 per cent by the United States and Canadian public.

Could anything be clearer than that to demonstrate that this company is controlled by United States interests? I have another authority that I should like to quote whom hon. members opposite might find even more interesting than the quotation from the hon. member for Vancouver East, who read the annual report of the company. I refer to the statement made in this house in 1956 by Hon. George Drew, as recorded at page 2177 of Hansard, as follows:

> The present distribution of the ownership of this enterprise shows also that the control is in the hands of financial interests in the United States; that it is definitely under the control of these immensely powerful financial interests: Canadian Gulf, Hudson Bay Oil and Gas and Tennessee Gas Transmission.

Therefore if hon. members opposite did not know that Americans own this company, the former leader of their party in 1956 knew the composition of the ownership of it and objected in a strenuous way to the company having greater and greater control over pipe lines in Canada. I have a further quotation that I should like to use, and it is Hon. George Drew once again in the pipe line debate, as recorded at page 2181 of Hansard of 1956, as follows:

> Contrary to what the minister of trade and commerce has said, this is the occasion to focus attention on our resources. This is the only place to do so, and this is an opportunity to declare our economic independence of the United States.

This is what the leader of the Conservative party said at that time:

> This is the only place to do so, and this is an opportunity to declare our economic independence of the United States. This is the time to plan to make full use of the resources that God has given us.

Instead of following their former leader, hon. members opposite are fighting for a principle which, when carried out, will increase the extent to which the Canadian economy is shackled to the United States giant. What a reversal of policy. The leader of the opposition of that day went on to state, and I quote from the same page of Hansard:

> No matter how friendly any other nation may be, I submit that it is our duty as the representatives of the people of Canada to follow a course that will assure Canada's economic, as well as political, independence. That cause is not served by the resolution now presented to us.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the cause of Canadian economic and political independence is not served by the bill now before us, and that it should be rejected by this house. I have other quotations from other members of the Conservative party of that day which show that the Conservative party when in opposition was very much in favour of a Canada that was economically independent and free of economic control by United States interests in utilities so important as a gas line.

The hon. member for Rosthern has shown by his vote today that he too is concerned over the growing United States control of this industry. I commend him on having voted that way on the motion calling for a six months' hoist. I express the confident hope that he will be consistent and oppose the second reading of this measure. I am sure that if Hon. George Drew were in the house today he would not lend his support to the passage of this iniquitous bill.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for Bow River speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support my own bill I would first like to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown) for his assistance during the time I was unavoidably absent from the house.

I should like to deal first with the references to the principle of the bill which we are debating. The petitioners, the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, are simply asking for the incorporation of a federal company. They are not asking for the right to build a pipe line; they are not asking for the right to export any commodity through a pipe line; they are merely asking this House of Commons for a certificate of incorporation to incorporate a company. I think that is the first principle we should consider in reference to this bill.

It may be of some interest to look at the record for a few moments in reference to the bill itself. I am going to review this matter very briefly. The petitioners are the two vice presidents, and council as I just said, of the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company. Approximately 10 per cent of the shares of the company is held by 12,000 public shareholders; 22 per cent is held by the Hudson's Bay company; and 68 per cent is held by the Continental Oil Company.

Let us take a look first of all at the 10 per cent that is held by the public shareholders. I am not sure who those shareholders are, or will be, but there are some Canadian investors. Twenty two per cent is owned by the Hudson's Bay Company which, of course, as everyone knows, received a charter to operate its business in Canada by royal declaration. I would say it is wholly a Canadian company. The Continental Oil Company have 68 per cent of the stock. This is how the shares are distributed.

The company is interested in this project and it is designed to assist in the solution of a problem which has arisen in that part of Alberta which is the Pincher Creek area, the southern part. In the process of making natural gas there are different by-products and condensates produced. Let us put it in ordinary layman's language. Condensate is similar to crude oil, the only difference being that you can make one and one half times more gasoline from condensates.

In answer to some of the arguments in the debate, there have been discussions with reference to the obtaining of a market for petroleum in the province of Alberta. Since I come from the province of Alberta I should like to see an enlarged market. I am one who wants to see condensate exported, and the cheapest and the only way in which it can be exported from the fields in Alberta is of course, by pipe line.

Therefore when we start talking about by-products we are talking about something the average man uses. It is gasoline for his automobile; that is the by-products. It is interesting to note also that if this company is able to sell, transport and export those by-products from the province of Alberta, then the consumer of natural gas would get a reduction in rates and would thereby make a saving.

I should like now to refer to this red herring, as I call it, which relates to our position in so far as United States capital and United States companies operating in Canada are concerned. My answer to that is briefly this. I have never considered any words used by any members of the cabinet or any members of the government as being against capital coming from anywhere, whether it was from the United States or any country in Europe. The only thing for which this government has stood, and I am proud to be a Conservative in that regard, is that Canadians can compete on equal terms with capital coming into this country from other sources. There have been times in the history of this country, such as 1915 and the boom in the 1920's and the 1950's, during which United States capital and capital from other countries was needed in order to develop the resources of this country. I say that is a red herring when they talk about turning our industry over to the buccaneers.

The truth is that the buccaneers of the province of Saskatchewan, the socialist government, chased capital out of that province so that now they have not industry comparable to that of the province of Alberta. The truth is that the budget of the province of Alberta is three or four times greater than that of the province of Saskatchewan because we have encouraged capital, not only Canadian but other capital, to pour into that province and develop our resources so that Canadians in that province will have employment. Those people over in that corner are always talking about unemployment. I am one of those who believe that if we can develop our industry, then one of the first things to do is incorporate a company for a purpose. Once that company is incorporated for a purpose it gets into business and, with the proper flow of capital, provides jobs for Canadians. These C.C.F. people talk about unemployment, but they merely give lip service to the problem of unemployment for the purpose of buying votes and not for the purpose of getting industry going to develop the resources of this country.

I should like to answer two or three remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver East. As I said the other day, there is one thing that differentiates the hon. member from the other seven in that group. Even though I disagree with him, he always has something to say. He did say this, as recorded on page 1129 of Hansard for January 17, 1961:

> —I simply cannot understand how a Tory could sponsor this bill when one calls to mind the principles expounded with such verbosity by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his baby budget relating to Canadian control and Canadian development of Canadian companies.

First of all, I have answered part of that statement. I should like to make my own position clear. I am a backbencher, but as a backbencher I am not a seal. I am not one who always goes along with everything that someone else may suggest, whether it comes from the front benches or some of the back benches. I say that any political party will be healthy, Mr. Speaker, if it has men such as we have in our party who are independent thinkers. They can consider a problem and arrive at a compromise. I moved this bill as a private member, and it has nothing to do with the government. I moved it as a private member because I believe in the economic welfare of my province.

If we have this company incorporated, then it will have the right to go to the energy board. Let us look at that argument for a few minutes. If I followed the argument of hon. gentlemen correctly, and it is sometimes difficult to follow them, they were opposed to this bill because 68 per cent of the stock of the petitioner is owned by a company in which the majority shareholders are from the United States. These gentlemen believe, therefore, that these petitioners should not be granted the right to incorporate a company because there might be United States capital used.

Let me put this to you. If the Foothills Pipe Line Company is incorporated, they can go before the Alberta conservation board. Then they may go before the national energy board. There may be other pipe line companies in Alberta that have the same interests as this company seeking incorporation through this bill. Other companies, already incorporated, can go before the national energy board. If this house does not approve this bill, then are we not discriminating against these petitioners? I believe that kind of discrimination will kill industry and, of course, cause unemployment.

Let us look at the national energy board. If this company is incorporated, the terms of incorporation do not give it the right to build a pipe line or to export condensate through a pipe line to Montana or somewhere else. This will merely create a legal entity, and that legal entity will then be able to go before the national energy board. If my memory serves me right, those men in the corner who spoke this afternoon supported the establishment of the national energy board. Why was it set up? What was its purpose? If I may take a few minutes, I should like to review that because it does somewhat answer the arguments put forward by the opposition to this particular petition.

If you refer to section 10 of the National Energy Board Act—I am not going to read it—it describes the board as a court of record. What is a court of record? Let us get our facts straight.

Mr. Peters: Tell us; do not beat around the bush.

Mr. Woolliams: I will not beat around the bush as you have been doing for years. If you listen you will learn something. A court of record weighs the evidence, pro and con, with relation to an application. Let us look at section 27 of the National Energy Board Act.

Mr. Peters: Tell us the first one; do not go on to something else.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Timiskaming is not called upon to comment upon everything that is said. He will have his opportunity to speak.

Mr. Woolliams: Before a pipe line can be built in this country, approval of the national energy board must be obtained under section 27 of the said act. The applicant must receive the right to export a commodity through a pipe line. This company or the Foothills Pipe Line Company or any other company that is incorporated which desires to export condensates or any other by-product must get a certificate from the board.

Let us analyse section 44. When the government introduced the bill to establish the national energy board, all these points that have been raised by my good friends in the corner must be considered by the board. This is now a question of law. Let us look at some of these things this court of record will consider. They will consider, first, the availability of oil or gas to the pipe line or power to the international power line; second, the existence of markets, actual or potential; third, the economic feasibility of the pipe line or international power line; fourth, the financial responsibility and the financial structure of the applicant, the method of financing the line and the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity to participate in the financing, engineering and construction of the line.

When these people in the corner refer to this party as supporting United States buccaneers, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what they mean by that statement. This is one of the things spelled out in the National Energy Board Act by this government and by this party in order to protect Canadian interests, to ensure that Canadian interests have a fair shake with any other financial interests in this land of ours in the development of our resources, whether it be petroleum, natural gas or any other resource.

This board is made up of reliable personnel. Before they would consider an application by this company in question they would take into consideration all the factors set out in section 44 of the said act.

I therefore, say, Mr. Speaker, that all this talk by the C.C.F. in this debate about handing over our resources to the Americans or to anyone else is plain hogwash. The fact is that the national energy board was set up by this party and by this government for the sole purpose of protecting Canadians in Canada operating in competition with United States capital or with capital coming in from anywhere else. Surely that is fair and square treatment. That is why many hon. members in this house rose on points of order in order to state that all we are asking for is merely the right to incorporate a company which will go before a board governed by certain principles of law and brought into being by this party for the protection of Canadians, in order to obtain that certificate. The function of the energy board is to determine who shall build pipe lines and who shall export products.

We might go back for a moment to the question of the debate on the national energy board. I should like to read from my own remarks in that regard as follows, as reported at page 3980 of Hansard of May 25, 1959:

> In brief, I commend this legislation to hon. members because the authority to permit the building of a pipe line and the obtaining of an export licence are under the jurisdiction of one body, the energy board.

As found at page 3981 of Hansard of 1959 I pointed out that was the very reason the board was set up, and provision was made for flexibility. The right to build a pipe line and the right to export whatever it is you are going to export through the pipe line can be determined by the board expeditiously by using the same evidence and the same records, something which makes this board, as I have said before, a court of record. Therefore to these people who have been critical in reference to this matter I say that this is no move on my part personally or on the part of anyone who may have supported me in this regard. We are merely asking—and I am going to repeat the request—for the right to incorporate a company.

I often wonder what might happen in this country in the future if men like those seven or eight in the corner had an opportunity to form a government and keep out capital that developed the resources of this country in order to give Canadians jobs. Those people merely give lip service to principles. They live in the hope that there might be a recession or depression in this country so they can say, "Here we have unemployment; you people are to blame".

Mr. Howard: That is not so.

Mr. Argue: That is a despicable statement.

Mr. Woolliams: I say to those hon. gentlemen that history will bear me out in that regard. As they said in their Regina manifesto, their job was to go out and eradicate capitalism in any form they might find it. The fact is that Canadians have eradicated the C.C.F. To the men in the corner who have been so critical and who have tried to blackmail this party through presenting this bill to create a company, as a matter of fact all they have done is to drag a red herring through the whole debate in order to get a little bit of publicity, which they love on this occasion as on other occasions, and in the hope of being able to increase their little flock, like a mother hen, when the next vote is called in this country.

I have said all I wish to say on this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Argue: You laid an egg this afternoon.

Mr. Woolliams: I may lay eggs and I may say that I have seen the hon. member for Assiniboia lay a great many eggs, but many times they are bad eggs as far as our economy is concerned.

INCOME TAX ACT

PROPOSED EXEMPTION FOR COSTS OF TUITION, BOOKS, ETC.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act so as to provide for the exemption from income taxes of tuition fees paid to universities, vocational training schools, military colleges, academies and other institutions of higher learning, as well as the costs of all textbooks and scientific equipment necessary to the courses followed in these institutions of learning.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member begins, I wonder whether he would agree with me that to some extent his motion is anticipated by the budget resolution which now stands before the committee of ways and means and which covers tuition fees. That, of course, does not apply to the remainder of the hon. member's motion, but to that extent the debate would be somewhat curtailed.

Mr. Crestohl: If I may I should like to point out at the outset that in my humble opinion they are altogether different motions. It is true that in the course of the discussion the question of university fees or higher education may come up, but the objectives these motions seek are as far apart as could be imagined.

I respectfully point out at once in what way I think they are so vastly different, and I should like to do this at the outset in order to emphasize that we are not covering the same ground. I find, for example, that the resolution which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has on the order paper refers to an exemption for students only; exclusively those students who are attending a university, and those students who are making income tax returns. My resolution suggests income tax relief for anyone who pays income tax; it might be, for instance, a father, or it might be an uncle who wishes to educate a nephew, or a niece.

There is a second difference which is basic. The minister's resolution exempts the fees only. My resolution seeks an exemption in respect of the cost of textbooks and scientific instruments and equipment used in scientific institutions. Take, for example, students of medicine who must use microscopes. These instruments can be very costly indeed. I am asking for exemption in this sphere, too.

There is a third difference which is also very important. The minister's resolution refers to full time students only, meaning students who are attending universities all day and taking a full course. My resolution goes beyond that. It calls for an exemption in respect of fees paid by everyone including students who are following courses in the evening, those who have to work during the day and who are attempting to improve their education. These are the people who really need such assistance as I am proposing. My resolution also refers to part-time students, not necessarily to students who are taking the full course.

Then again, the minister's resolution refers to exemptions only in respect of courses leading to a degree. Now there are schools of higher education whose courses do not always lead to a degree. For example, a student might be taking a post-graduate course in languages, without aspiring to a degree; or he might be taking a partial course in one branch of higher education or another which would not lead to a degree. Again, he might be attending a conservatory of music, which does not confer degrees.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. Is the hon. gentleman not aware of the second phrase in the resolution referring to a student in full-time attendance at a college or other educational institution in Canada in a course at a post-secondary school level? The hon. member is referring only to the first phrase in the resolution.

Mr. Crestohl: That clause reads very peculiarly. If it is intended to allow courses to be taken at universities which courses do not necessarily lead to a degree, then why not include it in the first part of the resolution? You therefore create a conflict. How will it be interpreted when the time arrives for interpretation? I see a serious doubt arising from the wording in the minister's resolution. I hoped that my resolution would make the situation abundantly clear.

While the resolution of the minister goes some distance toward meeting the problem of higher education I should like to see specified, for example, vocational training schools which do not give a degree as well as seminaries that lead to advances in religious training. Schools and seminaries are contributing in an important way in the field of education and should be assisted.

I hope I have made abundantly clear that there is some merit in discussing my resolution to a point without treading on the ground covered by the other resolution existing on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has drawn a good many distinctions between the income tax resolution on a similar subject and his own motion. There is some area which is coincidental and it may not be necessary to debate the issue of the deduction of the fees of full-time students in courses leading to degrees. I raised the question so that we would not have to interrupt the debate after it got started in applying any rule against anticipation. It would be better practice, of course, not to advocate in this motion or debate the precise matters which are already on the order paper and before the house in another capacity but I think that will be found to be not too restrictive.

Mr. Crestohl: I shall certainly be circumspect about that, Mr. Speaker. It was not my intention to do that.

Interestingly enough, my resolution has been on the order paper for a number of years. Had the minister's resolution appeared on the order paper before mine I might have considered the matter in a different light. It is quite possible, too, that the existence of my resolution on the order paper for a number of years served to nudge the minister into the direction of thinking there might be some merit in the proposal. The hon. gentleman did incorporate only a small part of my resolution. I wish the minister had gone further. I should have been glad to withdraw my resolution. However since he has not gone further, perhaps we are entitled to conclude that we have nudged him a little way and at the conclusion of this debate we might succeed in nudging him a little further.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I do not think the hon. member can take that responsibility.

Mr. Crestohl: I must also point out that I have no other way of proceeding in this matter. There is no other way open to me to induce the minister to accept the additional features contained in my resolution. I cannot move an amendment to a money measure. If the house should favourably consider my resolution perhaps the minister could be persuaded to be more consistent and to cover the whole ground at a later time.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. How long has he had his resolution on the order paper? Starting in what year?

Mr. Crestohl: If I could hazard a guess, at least five years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the hon. member for Halifax was here.

Mr. Crestohl: The hon. gentleman who raised this question is familiar with the fact that there is some difficulty connected with private members' resolutions finding their way and being reached on the order paper. Rarely are they reached on the order paper in the same session in which they are submitted. When the time comes close for them to be discussed they are chosen by some form of rotation or lot. Consequently there is no opportunity for an hon. member to have his resolution proceeded with until a lapse of some time has transpired even though he conceived the proposal as many as five years before.

I do not propose to review the importance of higher education. It is important to the future of a progressive country. If I remember correctly, there was a private hon. member's bill debated in the last session which gave an opportunity for a full dress debate on the subject. At this point I should like to read into the record my resolution which is in the following words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act so as to provide for the exemption from income taxes of tuition fees paid to universities, vocational training schools, military colleges, academies and other institutions of higher learning, as well as the costs of all textbooks and scientific equipment necessary to the courses followed in these institutions of learning.

Under our constitution the field of education comes under the jurisdiction of provincial government. There has been a progressive and growing tendency in the last few years for the federal government to concern itself with the importance of higher education and an effort has been made to make higher education available to as many students as possible. Not long ago this house passed a measure providing assistance to universities. We as hon. members of this house should do what we can to make higher education available to as many as possible. One direct way of doing it would be to amend the Income Tax Act in the way envisaged in my resolution.

There are some countries—and one notable one—where students pay no fees for university education. That is an ideal situation in a country that is concerned with making education as widespread and readily available as possible. In other countries students fees are nominal. The fees students in Canada are called upon to pay are higher than those paid in most countries including the United States.

We are approaching a period—if it has not already arrived—where higher education is vital and where scientific training and training in various skills assume increasing importance. If we make prohibitive the cost of obtaining education in any of these fields we are not going as far as legislators should go in this area. We have the obligation as public men to make available to students increased opportunity of acquiring education. The steps represented by the resolution will be of some assistance in achieving this desirable end.

University education will certainly be available to many more young men and women. As I said a moment ago, an education is no longer a luxury. It is a necessity. First of all, all parents are anxious to give their children an education, but a great many of them find it a struggle. We constantly hear stories, and facts have been presented to us, that children must be taken out of school. Promising and successful students must be taken out of college because their parents cannot afford to keep them there.

The adoption of this resolution would make it possible for relatives to assist in the education of children. An uncle or an aunt who may not be blessed with children of their own, may be in the position where they have a nephew or a niece whom they might wish to educate, and I am sure they would be prompted to do this if they could get exemption from income tax on the amount spent to educate students. Then, too, large corporations or employers of labour would arrange to see that promising children would be able to go to university. Certainly, those organizations will help to pay school fees if they know that they will be exempt from income tax on the amount spent in that way.

I do not wish to belabour this point very much. I know that people all across the country are concerned with the possibility of getting relief by way of income tax on the amounts paid in school fees, and so forth. It might be of interest to refer to some correspondence which I have received. I will read a letter from the students administrative council of the University of Toronto:

Dear Mr. Crestohl:

I am directed by the students' administrative council to advise you that the council, representing the undergraduates of the University of Toronto, supports wholeheartedly the private bill which they understand you intend to introduce in the House of Commons. We understand this bill suggests the government consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act in order to provide exemption from income taxes of tuition fees paid to universities as well as the cost to students of all textbooks and scientific equipment necessary to the courses followed in these institutions of learning.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May we have the date of that letter?

Mr. Crestohl: The date of the letter is February 10, 1954, just about the time that my resolution appeared for the first time. I have another letter from a civil servant in the city of Verdun, which reads as follows:

(Translation):

Dear Mr. Crestohl: I read with much interest the motion which is to be presented to the Ottawa legislature with regard to the exemption from income taxes of tuition fees, etc. for young people who are studying at a university, technical school or the like.

The gesture will be much appreciated by salaried heads of families, like myself. I have three sons pursuing their higher education, which costs me something like $3,000 a year.

You can see what sacrifices we have to make. It is a case of social justice, because I know of heads of families in my constituency who had to take their sons away from their studies for that reason.

(Text):

I have another letter from Mitchell, Ontario, which reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Crestohl:

You have my sincere thanks for taking up the matter of tax exemption in connection with university education costs.

I can give you a lead to some excellent material on the subject, a source which you may not know about. Less than a year ago the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in a T.V. address made the following statement. (My figures are approximately right) "In Britain the percentage of university students aided by bursaries is 70 per cent; in the United States the figure stands at 50 per cent; in Canada it stands at 14 per cent."

I am aware that you are not asking for more bursaries, but for some tax relief for people who are trying to finance students at university. May you keep up the fight. Thousands of parents will thank you or anybody who can achieve something. They will appreciate that your attitude is not the smug attitude of your opponent the finance minister.

He was not referring to the present Minister of Finance; he was referring to the minister of finance at the time, and I assume he could easily be referring to any finance minister who does not allow sufficient exemption from income tax. The next letter I have is from Lumsden, Saskatchewan, which reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Crestohl:

An item in the December 9th issue of the Leader-Post interested me. This item mentioned a resolution to be proposed by you calling for the exemption from income tax of tuition fees and expenses.

On behalf of my daughter and the many other young people, who first must earn the money to pay for further education of any kind, I hope this resolution will be favourably received and acted upon.

I have next a telegram from Toronto, which reads:

Strongly support your proposed motion to provide exemption from income taxes of university fees. Would be real help to many paying own way.

My next quotation is from Lestock, Saskatchewan. Although it is on a telegram form, I think it came through the mail. It reads:

Dear Mr. Crestohl:

Note by Canadian Press dispatch in the Winnipeg Tribune of the 9th December issue that you intend to bring into parliament resolution asking for exemption of certain higher education costs. I certainly hope that you are able to get this passed.

Certainly in Canada a higher education can be absolutely nothing but an asset to the country. I have a boy going through for a doctor, now in fourth year at university, and it is costing me roughly $1,600 a year to keep him there, which is a lot of money to take out of one's salary every year, plus income tax and 10 per cent pension fund for old age, which also helps keep one off the country's unemployment rolls. A child under the present system is unable to attend university or other school of higher learning and there must be a lot of children across Canada who are unable to go higher for financial reasons. I wish you every success,

And so on. These letters and telegrams are an indication that the people across the country are seeking this relief. Those of us who have had children or have children at universities know how difficult it is to keep them there, and this is especially true of a man on a yearly salary. The parents have to work hard and make sacrifices; they have to forgo a great many things themselves in the hope of being able to educate their children. I think this gesture by the House of Commons of exempting the tuition fees paid by fathers and mothers would be most welcome, and I also think it is one that we should not hesitate to make.

I am concerned with the fact that while I believe every member of the House of Commons would support the principle of a resolution of this kind, yet the Minister of Finance —who refers to it in his budget and says that in principle it is the type of tax exemption that should be given—does not go far enough.

I believe the members of this house, if they had their choice, would support this resolution, not only with their speeches but with their vote. However, I am a little concerned that hon. members might be so enthusiastic about this thing that they will, to use an expression, kill it with kindness. I am afraid members will get up one after the other and support the motion, saying what a good thing it is but they will kill it with kindness by talking it out.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give a few very brief quotations from pedagogues. One says:

Education is a debt due from the present to future generations.

Let us as legislators, acknowledge that. The next one says:

Education is the cheapest defence of nations.

The third is:

Education is a better safeguard of liberty than a standing army. If we retrench the wages of the schoolmaster, we must raise those of the recruiting sergeant.

These are very forceful statements, and I commend their meaning to all the members of the house and ask that they be guided by them.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): First of all, may I congratulate the hon. member upon his sincerity and determination over a long period of time in bringing this matter to the attention of the house. I am sure he will not mind if I poke a little fun at his theory, and the way in which it works. It seems to be that you do not get anywhere with the minister of finance in the House of Commons until you sit in opposition. If this theory were to be expanded to full flower it would mean there should be one minister of finance in the house and 264 people sitting in opposition giving him suggestions from one end of the day to the other about good measures for the well-being of the country. The fact is, as the hon. member has pointed out, he brought this matter before the house in 1954, perhaps in the same form, but the idea fell upon deaf ears.

Subsequently, as the result of the benevolent changes that were wrought in 1957, at least a part of his objective is being met. I think myself some of the credit for this should go to the people who came here in 1957 and 1958 with fresh ideas, some of which undoubtedly happened to coincide with those of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. There are good parts to this resolution, and also some poor parts, parts which contain dangers. I should like to mention those without, however, attempting to throw cold water on the idea the hon. member has put forward but rather with a view to pointing out the things which would have to be considered if the second part of his resolution were to be implemented.

First, I should like to say a word about the good things in the resolution. I think the idea of extending income tax exemptions to those who are not students, as we accept that term, is a good one. I presume the hon. member has in mind covering students who go to summer schools or night schools. I certainly commend this idea and I would wholeheartedly endorse it.

Then he put forward the idea that this type of income tax relief would provide an incentive to the people to sponsor students. This, again, is a good idea. This would expand our present notion of the parent being responsible for the education of his child and would include the family circle or even, as I understood the hon. member's remarks, people outside the family. I know there are many people who do make a point of assisting worthy young students at universities. This would be some recognition of what has been, up to now, a rather selfless attitude on their part.

No one would quarrel with that idea that we must get along with education as quickly as possible. The dramatic events over the week end have shown the great lag in scientific achievement in our country as compared with another unfriendly economy. This would make anyone seize upon any possible alternative to meet such a challenge. These are the good points that I would wholeheartedly support.

It is the second half of the hon. member's resolution which gives the difficulty. Perhaps I could read it this way:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act so as to provide for the exemption from income taxes... of the costs of all text books and scientific equipment necessary to the courses followed in these institutions of learning.

This is the part that causes me to pause and consider. I believe this would give a wide open field for abuse unless the regulations were carefully drafted. In the first place, institutions of higher learning would be difficult to define. Then, too, the phrase "costs of all textbooks and scientific equipment necessary to the courses followed" is used. I do not know the hon. member's alma mater in law, although I realize he is one of the distinguished members of the Montreal bar. I pose this problem to the hon. member. As he knows, there are two main theories for the teaching of law. One is what we at Dalhousie University law school, the best one in Canada, call the case method. This method is used also by Harvard University. There is another approach to legal training which is known as the textbook method, which is more in line with the tradition of a liberal arts education.

I think that one could argue, under this resolution, that a law student who followed the case method would be entitled to deduct the expenses of buying the books in which these cases are to be found. As the hon. member realizes, there are thousands of such books, the Canadian reports, the British reports and the reports of the Canadian provinces. These are all the sources of material for the study of law by the case method. I use this merely as an illustration, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to pursue it ad nauseam. It would appear to me that one could use the spirit of this resolution, if one were a gifted law student with a rather sharp eye for a technicality, to march forth from law school with one's law library completely assembled.

An engineering student, with a legal bent, could go forth from the engineering school with the equipment he needs for a professional practice already purchased, using the plea that this was scientific equipment necessary to his course. One could even go a step farther and imagine some graduate of the Ontario agricultural college marching forth from that institution with harrows, plowshares, and harvesting machinery, again using the excuse that this was a part of the equipment necessary to study his course.

I realize that is stretching the point too far and that one could fairly well draw a line perhaps with regard to the agriculture graduate. But how do you draw the line in the first case I mentioned, namely that of the lawyer? After all, he is expected to read through thousands of cases in the three years of study and these thousands of cases are contained in thousands of law books. Or again, students of the liberal arts at the undergraduate level in the university may wish to buy one thousand great books or one hundred great books or ten thousand great books, to all of which he may refer during his education, on the plea that these books are necessary.

Admittedly the argument is disproportionate and one realizes that there is an absurdity somewhere. The difficulty is in ascertaining where common sense stops and absurdity begins. I say that in no niggling spirit against the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). I think this particular point I have raised could be cured by some rather careful draftsmanship of the regulations involved. At least I have pointed out that there are problems in the carrying out of such a resolution. I think the Minister of Finance is to be commended for his budget approach and for solving the problem in a fairly workable manner. I hope the hon. member for Cartier will present his resolution again and again until most, if not all, of its spirit is met. I thoroughly enjoyed listening to his contribution to the debate as I am sure I shall enjoy the ones that will follow.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part for a few minutes in this debate on this resolution this afternoon. I am particularly interested in the field of education as it affects those people who can least afford an education for their families. For this reason I should like to make one or two points this afternoon. First of all, I want to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for the steps he has taken with respect to the income tax laws as they affected university students prior to this year. I am sure the people of Canada generally have accepted the principle introduced in the budget for the solution of some of these problems.

I want to bring before the house a few specific cases I have in mind. One is that of an older couple who may have three or four growing children. There comes a time when these children have finished their public schooling and have reached the age in life when they wish to attend university. Not too many years ago I was one of those who, after serving some time in the armed forces, was able to come out and take advantage of the veterans legislation with regard to education. This advantage, of course, is not available to our younger people. I am just wondering whether we could not have gone a little further with regard to the amount deductible from a student's earnings.

I have a letter from a young married man in the city of Edmonton. He tells me that while he was working at what he referred to as an ordinary job, although he was not able to get along too well on this basis, he decided that he would like to make an attempt at some other field of endeavour. He chose the field of accountancy. The necessity of his going back to school made it obligatory for his wife to go to work. She now has a job by means of which she is able to supplement the earnings sufficiently so that they are able to get along. Their baby sitter fees are something in the neighbourhood of $60 a month. I am wondering whether we could not have gone a little further and have included provision for deduction of these fees in our amendments to the Income Tax Act.

I am not too sure whether this resolution, as it reads, would be of a great deal of benefit, particularly to the students in the province of Alberta. I am aware of the fact that in some provinces a great deal of the cost of text books must be looked after by the students. In Alberta this is not entirely the situation. A great number of books are provided by the school boards. The important thing, therefore, is the amount of the tuition fees, a matter which is at present looked after in the amendments to the Income Tax Act.

In his remarks the minister stated that some students, in pursuing their university courses, earned sufficient money to incur income tax liability. He is proposing that a student in full-time attendance at a university, if he is proceeding toward a degree, be allowed to deduct the tuition fees he pays to the university when computing his taxable income. I am wondering whether we could not be a little more kind and make the total amount of the tuition fees and the total cost of the books involved in sending a student to school deductible in gross from the earnings of the married man in question. I only pass this thought on as a suggestion. This matter has been brought to my attention and I thought this was a good time to raise it.

I hope that the hon. member for Cartier will bring this bill before the house at another time so as to afford us the opportunity to refer it to a committee for further study. As I say, I am greatly interested in this problem. I wonder whether this bill is sufficiently clear to look after the problem in its entirety. I am not too sure about that matter but I should like to have the opportunity to look into it in a committee where we could study it further to the end that we might find a proper solution to the question of assistance to higher education.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to make a few comments on this resolution put forward by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). In these days of keen competition in trade, in armaments and in ideologies we must not lose sight of the advantages of higher education extended to every individual in this country of ours.

This is a very interesting resolution. It proposes to encourage education by increasing the exemptions from income tax. I notice a tendency on the part of many people—not only the hon. member for Cartier—and many organizations to suggest adjustments in income tax every time they wish to encourage some socially desirable objective.

I would submit that a graduated income tax is the fairest of all methods of financing our government and furthermore of sharing some portion of our national income with those people who receive the least benefit from our national income. That being the case, I would suggest that all alternatives to reductions in income tax should be thoroughly scrutinized, examined and considered with a view to determining whether or not income tax should be reduced.

The present government have indicated great sympathy with the furtherance of higher learning in Canada. Since this government came into power in 1957 and accepted the responsibility of government they have encouraged higher learning in several important ways. First, may I say that they have increased the grants to universities from a basis of $1 per capita in the provinces to a basis of $1.50. That is an increase of 50 per cent and a very substantial increase in federal assistance to higher learning.

By legislation this year, through the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act, very substantial grants are being made to the provinces to assist higher education of all kinds. Also corporations have been encouraged to increase their contributions to universities through actions by this government.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) indicated his support of federal assistance to higher learning with these words which are to be found at page 1012 of Hansard for December 20, 1960. The Minister of Finance used these words when introducing the last budget:

> Many deserving students require financial aid in order to attend university. Some provinces have inaugurated systems of loans to worthy students in need of direct financial assistance. These commendable plans are producing very beneficial results. The government is giving continuing study to this important aspect of the problem.
> The other aspect concerns the income tax position of students and those on whom they are dependent. I propose a measure of tax relief for university students and their parents.
> Some students, while pursuing their university courses, earn sufficient money to incur an income tax liability. I am proposing that a student in full time attendance at a university, if he is proceeding toward a degree, be allowed to deduct the tuition fees he pays to the university when computing his taxable income.
> The income tax law already provides special assistance to parents who are supporting children at university by allowing them to claim a deduction in respect of such children even after they have attained the age of twenty one years. However, if the student of any age has income in excess of $950 he ceases to qualify as a dependent, and his parent then forfeits the $500 exemption otherwise accorded to him by the law, even though he may be giving financial support to the student. I propose that the student's tuition fees be allowed as a deduction from his earnings in determining whether he qualifies as a dependent. If his income after deduction of his fees falls below $950 the parent will recover the $500 exemption.
> These changes will become effective on January 1, 1961.

I have indicated that all alternatives should be examined before deciding to reduce income tax. I would like to refer to a suggestion brought forward by the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Casselman) who in her very fine speech in connection with the last budget debate made this suggestion, as reported at page 1355 of Hansard of January 24, 1961:

> I should like to see federal loan banks for education available to all, young and old Canadians, not particularly based on need or the highest excellence in scholastic achievement, but on the prime requirement of a desire to learn. A revolving fund should be kept replenished by those who benefit most in this generation for those of the next generation, and we should be the first to recognize the enormous cost of university buildings, laboratories and libraries, and the competition for the best brains in the world, teachers and professors. It seems to me that if we have industrial loans, farm loans and loans for small business we should certainly have loans for the development of the brains—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the house is very much interested by the quotation the hon. member is giving, but I draw to his attention the fact that the motion before us speaks only of an amendment to the Income Tax Act to provide for the exemption from income tax of tuition fees, and so on. No alternative method is mentioned. Therefore, although I think references can be made to other methods of helping students, it would be irrelevant in my opinion to discuss any such methods in detail.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not particularly want to raise a point of order, because the subject we are discussing has general acceptance, I think, in all sections of the house, but it did occur to me that in addition to the point Your Honour raised the hon. member was referring to a previous debate in the current session.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, I shall observe your ruling, but I was trying to make the point that before deciding on such a method of assisting students as a reduction of income tax other alternatives should be reviewed. If that is out of order, I shall go on with one or two other observations.

The cost of education is ever on the increase. With our accumulation of knowledge increasing from generation to generation it becomes more difficult for each succeeding generation to master it, or at least it requires more time to impart that knowledge. Not only does it require more time on the part of the teachers, but it requires more time on the part of the students who are the recipients of that knowledge. Because more time is required the whole process of handing on this accumulated knowledge of the ages becomes more expensive. In making our national financial plan we should keep this fact in mind, and no doubt the hon. member for Cartier had that in mind when he made this proposal to encourage higher education by making certain reductions in income tax. However, since we cannot pursue the question of alternatives, I will close with just the statement that reduction in income tax is not the only way of achieving the objectives which the hon. member has in mind. Because we must have revenue in order to operate our system of government and carry on the services of the country I would suggest that alternatives be explored including the suggestion of loans to university students.

Mr. J. C. MacRae (York-Sunbury): I should like to speak briefly on this resolution this afternoon. First, I should like to compliment the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) on having brought this resolution forward. I believe he is very sincere in what he is proposing. I believe it is not being done for publicity, but that the hon. member is sincere in his intentions with respect to the proposal before us.

I am deeply interested in this question, because I believe that all Canadians in this day and age should be interested in education. The education of our young men and women today presents a special problem. I am interested because I am a member of the teaching profession—I have been all my life—and because I have seen a great deal of some of the things the hon. member is advocating.

Third, I am interested because in the constituency which I represent is one of Canada's finest universities—a university which is rapidly expanding. I should like to speak briefly about the growth of our university. I can remember 25 years ago attending school at Fredericton at a time when the University of New Brunswick had only 400 students or less. Today that university is filled beyond capacity with over 1,800. That is a situation which exists in practically every school and university across this country.

Even so there are many hundreds and perhaps many thousands of young people who cannot get a university education such as they and this country so vitally need, because of financial circumstances. Every one of us could give from personal experience examples of students who were able to obtain an education because they received just that little bit of extra help. I can well remember a young lad who was in my class at school, a boy who was orphaned at 12. His father was killed in a tragic accident. He was the only boy in the family and when he graduated from high school, having matriculated with high marks, he was able to obtain a Beaverbrook scholarship. At that time the sum of money which this scholarship represented was not very great, but the boy was nevertheless able to go to university and get a degree in electrical engineering. Today he is one of eastern Canada's ablest engineers. It would have been impossible for this boy to have gone on to a university if he had not received this little bit of extra help.

At the present time there is a most important committee sitting in the other place, and the activities of this committee are perhaps the most important of those going on in this parliament at the present time. I refer to the committee on manpower and employment. A short time ago a report was made before that committee by Dr. James, discussing the question of education today. He pointed out plainly that the great bulk of those people who have an employment problem today are those who have received little or no education. The figures put forward are probably accurate,—Dr. James said about 2 per cent of those seeking employment had received university educations. I think perhaps that figure of 2 per cent is a bit high.

The measures brought down by this government to date in the field of education, including assistance to the technical schools and in the building of technical schools will, I am sure, have a most beneficial effect. Indeed, that effect is being felt already in this country.

I am sorry the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) was not able to pursue his discussion of alternatives to the suggestions made in this particular resolution. I had wished to discuss very fully the question of loans to students, a subject which was covered in an exceptionally fine speech by the hon. lady for Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Casselman). Possibly we shall have some other opportunity in the future to deal with this particular point and put forward the view that the making of loans to students would be an effective way of helping young men and women through university and, of course, other schools.

This government—as I am sure all governments have been in past years—is always under pressure for exemptions under the Income Tax Act, many of which are undoubtedly worthwhile. I am sure the government will give the import of this resolution every consideration. It seems to me the important thing about the discussion of this resolution is that it draws out the views of the representatives of the people of this country and for this reason there is a great value in having such resolutions debated.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise at this time to say a few words with respect to the resolution now before the house. As I listened to the introductory remarks of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) I could not help but feel that the legislation already in existence meets the objectives he advances in this resolution. As the hon. member read letters and telegrams, most of which I believe were dated back in 1954, it occurred to me that the hon. gentleman should have taken them to the then minister of finance of the Liberal government and read them to him. If that course was followed then the hon. member's representations must have fallen on deaf ears because very little was done by the former administration in this field compared with the record of this Conservative government since it came into power in 1957.

To appreciate the record of achievement of the present government one has only to briefly review some of the measures it has introduced. The hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) made mention of the increase in per capita grants for universities from $1 to $1.50. Another significant step taken by the present government is represented by the recent legislation providing for grants to universities for the construction of student residences. The government has now come along with legislation to exempt tuition fees for income tax purposes. One also recalls the grants that have been given by this government in the training and vocational field. One also thinks of the assistance that has been given for the provision of vocational training for the unemployed in conjunction with the provinces. In the light of this brief review I am very happy to be a member of a government that has seen fit to make such significant contributions to the furtherance of education.

I am pleased to speak in support of the legislation already passed in this field. In my riding we have two important colleges, the only two of their kind in the British commonwealth and second to none in the world, the Ontario agricultural college and the Ontario veterinary college. In my riding we also have MacDonald institute where we train some of the finest wives to be found any place in Canada. The exemption from income tax of tuition fees will be of great assistance to students attending these universities. In brief, I think the aims of the hon. member's resolution have already been met by legislation introduced by this government.

The hon. member's resolution also calls for the exemption from income tax of the cost of textbooks and scientific equipment. I should be happy to see these items included as I am sure the students would who are attending the colleges I have mentioned, but I am afraid a great administrative problem would arise from the implementation of such a provision. The following questions immediately come to my mind. How would you arrive at a means of establishing the deductions? Many textbooks are used over and over again and students often purchase secondhand books. How would you designate what was necessary equipment and what was unnecessary? The equipment used by a student engineer is very different from that used by a medical student. The implementation of such a provision would mean that the department would be confronted with a complex administrative problem.

In conclusion let me say that I am proud of the legislation in this field introduced by this government and I am happy to take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on doing what has been done thus far.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution supported by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). I believe that all people in this country today recognize not only the advantage to the individual of higher education but also this country's great need for it.

[Mr. Hales.]

Not long ago in reading a report from the Canadian medical association I noticed that there was a great need for doctors all across this country. For the last four or five years we have heard much about the great need for engineers. Some of the reports we have read have imbued us with the fear that other countries are exceeding us in the training of technical and professional men.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat praised the work done by his government in increasing university grants. I agree with him in part but in doing so I must also remind the hon. gentleman that it was in 1955 under the former administration that these grants to universities were initiated, then at the rate of 50 cents per capita. A year or two later they were increased to $1 per capita. While the present administration has done a good deal for higher education I think hon. members opposite must not lay claim to the credit for all the interest that has been shown in higher education in Canada over the last few years.

I am interested in the number of times the hon. member for Cartier has placed this resolution on the order paper and in the number of times he has mentioned this subject in the house. Last year in the budget debate he made reference to his contention that there should be some income tax deduction for the expenses of a higher education. After concluding a speech similar to the one the hon. member made today, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), as reported at page 5169 of Hansard of June 20, 1960, said:

> As to the matter raised by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl), may I say that this matter was discussed fully last year. He is aware of the additional burden we are carrying in the federal treasury now by reason of our increase from $1 to $1.50 in the per capita federal grants to the universities; that is per capita of population in each province. These are substantial additions that we have undertaken. I think there is little to be gained now in reviewing this question again. It could have been raised in the budget discussion but I do not believe it was raised there. It was discussed fully a year ago and I think the situation has not changed since that time.

That was only approximately a year ago. We now have amendments to the Income Tax Act which I am sure every hon. member will welcome and recognize as desirable.

I do not wish to labour the point but there is one thought I should like to leave with hon. members. I have had some experience in the field of education. It has always been and still is my opinion that in any country that pays attention to its educational system there will always be sufficient care given to the average student.

There are two types of students for whom special care should be undertaken. First, there are those who have the ability to attend university, and then there are those who have ability far below the average. With respect to those who have ability far below the average the state might just as well train them to do some job because it is going to have to look after them anyway, whether they are children or adults. With respect to those who are above the average in ability, the state should look after them, particularly a democracy which needs that type of leadership in the different professions that these young men are able to fill.

Let us suppose, for example, that a father sends his son to university. Unless he is a very wealthy man he will have to make some sacrifice in order to do that. When the young lad is through university and he goes out to take up a job in whatever field of training he happens to choose he may be a source of great pride to his father, he may be a source of great pride to his own home town; he may have equipped himself to make a good living, but there is one fact that remains. The people who get the greatest advantage out of the training that that young man has acquired is the state itself. If the state is going to get the advantage of that young man's training, then it should be responsible for paying a part of the cost. Whether the method suggested by the hon. member for Cartier is the best method for assisting university students is another matter. It is certainly one way. I myself have some leaning toward a student loan plan, and I believe that a student loan plan would be welcomed in this country provided, of course, that there were no strings attached and those who are actually in need of loans to get themselves through university are able to get them.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I do recognize the worth of the resolution which we now have before us. I support the hon. member for Cartier in his bringing it forth and I commend him for being so persistent in his idea of trying to provide help for university students in this country.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that the Income Tax Act would be amended with a view to assisting university students was received with applause. Besides, authorities of our Canadian universities have commended the minister for such a decision.

Nevertheless, the resolution of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) is a worthy one and goes to prove, I believe, that it is possible to provide assistance to education without infringing upon provincial rights in the field of education.

I was very much surprised during the recent Liberal rally at the stand taken by the opposition which tends increasingly to infringe upon the rights of the provinces in the matter of education.

This resolution introduced by the hon. member for Cartier provides a means of assisting universities, of assisting education in general, without violating the legitimate rights of the provinces in the field of education.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the house has had the opportunity for a good general discussion of this resolution. A number of hon. members have made thoughtful and useful contributions. As the house knows, the budget resolutions will be called for discussion on Wednesday. Included among them is a proposal in resolution No. 12 which will enact a substantial part of this resolution. Recognizing the general undesirability of duplicating debates, particularly in the same week, and since there are many other resolutions on the order paper which merit discussion, and for which no other opportunity will be provided for, as in this resolution, I am proposing to move the adjournment of the debate. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne):

That this debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

PROPOSED EXTENSION TO NEW YORK VIA RICHELIEU RIVER

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of the appointment of a board of engineers for the purpose of studying and reporting upon the linking of the St. Lawrence seaway (river) with the port of New York via the Richelieu river, lake Champlain and the Hudson river.

(Text):

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution that is now before the house is not a new one. It has been on the order paper now for three sessions and it has been in the minds of many Canadians as well as many people of the United States for a considerably longer period. However, I am happy to be able to move this resolution this evening in order, not only to be able to describe more fully than I have been able to do up until now the Richelieu-Champlain waterway but also to give the house reasons that I feel make the Champlain waterway economically advantageous to Canada.

The Richelieu-Champlain waterway would provide a practicable water route some 400 miles long from the St. Lawrence river in Quebec up the Richelieu river to the international boundary, then across lake Champlain and down the Hudson river to Albany and New York. Hon. members may be interested to know that the Richelieu river, in spite of the many natural obstacles to be found in it, has served Canadians and Canadian-United States commercial traffic ever since 1609. It was only in 1843 that the locks, situated now at St. Ours and the locks in the Chambly canal, were first built. At that time a six-foot barge canal was built and played an important part in the economic development of that area.

The Chambly canal, which marks the southern end of the Canadian section of the waterway, is 11.8 miles long and it has nine consecutive and very antiquated locks with a controlling length of 118 feet and a controlling depth over the sills of 6.5 feet. No major changes have been made to the canal since it was first built, and I think the canal is understandably outmoded and although completely inadequate for modern transportation it is still being used.

One of the pioneers, whom I should like to mention tonight, is Guy Tombs Limited. They have been using this waterway, in spite of the difficulties, for many years and, in order to use it, have had to build special barges. In 1937 the first step toward construction of a practicable water route from the St. Lawrence to New York was the construction of a lock at St. Ours at the northern end of the waterway. It is some 339 feet long, 45 feet wide, with a depth of 12.5 feet over the sills.

At the same time a dam across the Richelieu river at Fryers island was built in order to control the flow of the river and to maintain the level of the waterway in lake Champlain. This dam has not been utilized because the project did not go ahead, but it is a necessary step that has already been taken in order to achieve a practicable water route through the Richelieu river. Except for the dredging of the Richelieu river from six feet to 12 feet which was done in 1946 from Sorel to St. Ours, no major changes were made in the Canadian section of the waterway.

The United States section of this route starts, of course, at the international boundary and goes through lake Champlain to Whitehall, a distance of 112 miles with a controlling depth of 12 feet. From Whitehall to Troy, a distance of some 63 miles, the depth is 12 feet and from Troy to Albany, a distance of 8.5 miles, the depth is 13¼ feet. From Albany to New York, a distance of 143.5 miles, it has a depth of 27 feet. Over the years prior to 1937 a considerable amount of interest had been shown in the Richelieu-Champlain waterway. In 1936 the government of Canada and the government of the United States concurred in referring the project to the international joint commission for study. The commission made its report in 1938, and I should like to place on Hansard the recommendations of the international joint commission, found in the report of that commission on the Champlain waterway, page 17. The recommendations are, and I quote:

> —the commission recommends that the present report be considered an interim report, and that it be authorized to retain jurisdiction over the matter until the St. Lawrence waterway has become an accomplished fact and the commission has had an opportunity of studying the effect of its operation upon the proposed Champlain waterway.

There are, of course, two points that must be noted in this recommendation. First of all, it is an interim report of the international joint commission, and not a final report.

Second, the commission recommend that it be authorized to retain jurisdiction over the matter until the St. Lawrence seaway had been completed. Hon. members will agree that in 1938 the St. Lawrence seaway was far from being an accomplished fact. The economic picture of the area involved in the project was very far from being what it is today. For the past 25 years, in spite of the difficulties caused by nine antiquated locks, a canal with a controlling depth of only six feet in the Canadian section and the necessity of specially built barges, an average of 50,000 tons of freight per year has been carried over this route. Over half of that tonnage was newsprint going to New York. The total Richelieu river tonnage including bulk shipments to points in the Richelieu valley delivered by local barges has been as high as 135,000 tons under conditions which can only be described as terrible.

There is no limit to the southbound Quebec newsprint tonnage available. Competent engineers and economists have estimated that there would be 10 to 20 times the present through tonnage to New York if the waterway were enlarged and modernized to permit the passage of modern and practicable canallers. Moreover, with improved transportation facilities, a very considerable amount of ore from the lower St. Lawrence in Quebec and in Labrador would also move along the Richelieu-Champlain waterway to its destination in the United States.

The undertaking and the eventual completion of the St. Lawrence seaway accompanied by a rapid industrial development on the south shore of the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Sorel accentuated the economic potential of the Richelieu project. It is because of the economic potential and the necessity for Canada to maintain an ever-expanding economy that Canadians, whether as individuals or whether organized in groups such as municipalities, chambers of commerce, boards of trade in Canada or the New York-Vermont interstate commission, have taken an extremely active part in preparing and sending to the government well documented briefs on the economic justifiability of the Richelieu-Champlain waterway. These briefs were the result of studies made first of all of the interim report of the international joint commission of 1937 and subsequent studies made by engineers and economists both in this country and in the United States.

Organizations such as those I mentioned a moment ago have spent considerable time and money from their own resources in a most commendable effort to obtain the economic and technical information necessary with regard to the Canadian as well as the United States section of this waterway. Many of the international meetings were held both in Canada and in the United States on an unofficial but extremely useful basis so as to coordinate the studies of both countries toward this project which can only be realized on an international basis. All of the studies that have been made pointed distinctly and emphatically, if not to an immediate start on the project for which there is as yet no definite plans at least to the advisability of both Canada and the United States undertaking a joint study of the project on a governmental level as they did in 1937 through the international joint commission.

In April of 1957, the United States congress voted an amount of money to begin a study of the project and Canada was invited to take part in that joint study. As a result of a motion I had placed on the order paper, I asked the government to table all the correspondence exchanged between the federal government and the authorities of the state of New York and Washington concerning the Richelieu river waterway which would link the St. Lawrence with the Hudson river. As a result, I was handed sessional paper No. 250, dated Tuesday, April 26, 1960, and I should like to place this on Hansard. On April 30, 1957, the United States embassy in Ottawa sent a letter to the Department of External Affairs which reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Cleveland:

Reference is made to the Department of External Affairs' note No. X-215 of August 15, 1952 and the embassy's note No. 297 of June 3, 1952, concerning the Richelieu river-lake Champlain waterway.

It will be recalled that in this exchange of notes the Canadian government was asked whether it would join the United States in a request to the international joint commission to re-study this subject with a view to determining the possibilities of deepening the waterway to accommodate 12-foot navigation. In its response, the Department of External Affairs took note of a comment made in a January 4, 1938 report of the international joint commission to the effect that a recommendation concerning the development of the proposed waterway could only be determined after the St. Lawrence waterway had been constructed and put into operation. The Department of External Affairs' note concluded that it would not be appropriate to refer this matter to the international joint commission for further study.

In this connection, the attention of the United States government has recently been invited to resolutions adopted by the general assembly of Vermont and by the city council of Burlington expressing the view that, as a result of the progress that has been made in the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway, it is desirable to have both the United States and Canadian governments ask the international joint commission to renew its investigation and study of the construction of the Richelieu river-lake Champlain waterway.

While the United States government does not wish at this time to propose to the Canadian government that it join with the United States in a renewed reference to the international joint commission, the United States would appreciate ascertaining whether or not the Canadian government's views on this question have changed in any respect since they were last made known in the Department of External Affairs' note No. X-215 of August 15, 1952.

Sincerely yours,

Milton C. Rewinkel,
Counselor of Embassy.

There was no answer to this letter that was tabled but on October 30, 1958 the governor of New York namely Averill Harriman sent a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) which reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

The congress of the United States has allocated $15,000 to the United States army corps of engineers for the current fiscal year to begin a study of a possible Richelieu-Champlain waterway. As you know, the 1937 study of the international joint commission determined that such a waterway was engineeringly feasible. The questions of depth (12'-14'-27') and economic benefits now need re-examination.

Because of the recent economic changes in Canada, it is my feeling that a similar study should be made on the Canadian side. If your engineers could initiate a similar undertaking, the two studies could be consolidated into a single substantial report which would certainly point the way for an inland waterway of great economic benefit to both the Dominion of Canada and the state of New York.

Sincerely,

Averill Harriman.

To this letter the Canadian government replied on November 13, 1958, as follows:

My dear Governor:

In the absence of the Prime Minister, I wish to thank you cordially for your letter of October 30, in which you inform the Prime Minister of the action which the U.S. congress has taken recently in allocating monies to the U.S. army corps of engineers for the current fiscal year to begin a study of a possible Richelieu-Champlain waterway. May I say that this matter has already been informally drawn to the attention of our department by the department of state.

Yours sincerely,
N. A. Robertson.

On December 22, 1958 the foreign service of the United States sent a letter to the Department of External Affairs of Canada. It is addressed to Mr. Cleveland and it reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Cleveland:

The department of state has requested the embassy to ascertain the present views of the Canadian government concerning possible joint studies of the Richelieu canal-lake Champlain waterway.

In this connection it may be of interest to Canadian authorities that under section 112 of the United States public law 85-500, the secretary of the army was authorized and directed to study a "water route from Albany, New York, into lake Champlain, New York and Vermont, including the advisability of modifying existing federal and state improvements, with due consideration of ultimate connection with the Saint Lawrence River in Canada". The chief of the United States army corps of engineers has initiated the activities in the United States necessary for submission of a report to congress as directed. Consideration of an ultimate connection with the St. Lawrence river would require, of course, the co-operation of appropriate agencies of the Canadian government.

If the Canadian government should find it agreeable to engage in a co-operative or joint study, an established procedure for arrangements, as you know, is available under article IX of the boundary waters treaty of 1909. In such an event the international joint commission could be requested to resume consideration of the reference of January 2, 1936, in which the two governments asked the commission to investigate the advisability of the improvement of a waterway from Montreal through lake Champlain to connect with the Hudson river. Under the reference the commission submitted an interim report to the two governments in 1937. As you will recall, that report recommended, in effect, that no further consideration be given to development of such a waterway until the possibilities could be analysed in relation to an improved channel in the St. Lawrence river.

Alternately, of course, a new reference to the international joint commission could be formulated defining the nature and scope of any study desired at this time. The department of state understands that the department of the army is prepared to move forward with studies of the Champlain waterway in the United States, as well as with joint studies of a possible connection with the St. Lawrence if the Canadian government should deem joint studies desirable. The department of state further understands that the department of the army can adjust within reasonable limits the time and rate of studies in the United States to conform with reviews of the Canadian government regarding any joint studies. It is for this reason, as well as the other considerations cited above, that the embassy would be most appreciative of the general views of the Canadian government.

Sincerely, yours,
Milton C. Rewinkel,
Counselor of Embassy.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Almost one year later the Department of External Affairs answered the letter on November 17, 1959:

Dear Mr. Smith:

Since receipt of Mr. Rewinkel's letter of December 22, 1958, concerning studies of the Champlain-Richelieu waterway, this matter has been under further examination.

As you will recall, the Minister of Transport on June 11, 1959, read in the House of Commons an extract from an interim report which had been made to him on this subject. This extract read as follows:

"The previous cost estimates are now being revised in the light of recent alternative plans and present day costs by the Department of Public Works, and when these are completed, some estimate can be made of the volume of traffic required to justify improvements to the present canals and studies will be made to determine probable traffic available".

The cost revisions are proceeding but it is not possible to say, at this moment, when the results will be ready.

Yours sincerely,
J. H. Cleveland,
American Division.

Several things become clear as a result of the correspondence I have just read. First of all, that very little interest has been shown by the government in the project. Second, the government had no intention of undertaking a joint study with the United States of the project which could have meant a possible government expenditure for Canada of some $15,000. I strongly suspect that the private organizations in Canada to which I referred a while ago have spent two or three times that amount in the preparation of the economic and engineering studies that they had made at their own expense.

But the government did not even include one cent in the estimates for the study of the project over the past three years, as is evidenced by the remarks by the then minister of transport which are to be found in Hansard of June 11, 1959, on page 4565. In speaking to the hon. member for Laurier the then minister of transport had this to say:

The hon. member spoke about the Richelieu canal, and I should like to read him a short report made to me by the members of our economics division and the public works engineers who are working on this project at the present time. It reads as follows:

From there it goes on to the part that was included in the correspondence I have just read. Then the hon. member for Laurier said:

May I ask who are the members of the committee dealing with this matter?

Mr. Hees: There are no specific members. It is our regular economics staff and the engineering staff of the Department of Public Works. Between the two of them they are handling it. If the hon. member wishes I can find out later who they are.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to insist, but were they given terms of reference to deal with the report of the board of engineers of 1937?

Mr. Hees: These are the terms of reference under which they are working. First of all, we are trying to find out what the economic justification might be for proceeding with work of this kind, and the probable engineering costs.

From all appearances the government has chosen to utilize the engineers and the economists that are already in the departments, without having a special study made of this project. I have certainly the greatest respect for the engineers and economists in the departments, but I respectfully submit that with the amount of work that they have in the Department of Transport and in the Department of Public Works it would be almost impossible for them to make the thorough study that such a huge project would require.

All through the discussion of the Champlain waterway in the reports and studies a most confusing and exasperating veil of secrecy was drawn over the whole subject and it became absolutely impossible for members of the opposition to obtain any information as to what type of study was being carried out and who had the responsibility of carrying out these particular studies.

If you refer to Hansard of February 4, 1960, you will have an idea of what I mean when I say it was impossible to obtain any information as to the work or study that was being carried out. At page 717 of Hansard I am reported as having asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) this question:

Now that the Prime Minister has had an opportunity of travelling along, if not on, the Richelieu river from Sorel to the United States border, can he say whether a study of the economic and technical feasibility of the Richelieu waterway is under way or is being contemplated by the government?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been a continuing study, apparently for quite a number of years, of this question. Indeed, an examination of the records would indicate that when the last government was in power there was an investigation, and that is still continuing.

Mr. Cardin: Can the Prime Minister say whether or not he has received any invitation or representation from the state of New York or from Washington concerning a combined study of this project?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to answer that question with complete certainty. However, speaking subject to the usual uncertainties of memory, I may say I have no recollection of such a representation from the state of New York.

Then at page 866 of Hansard for February 9, 1960 I am reported as having asked this question:

Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. On Thursday last I asked him whether the government was making a study of the economic and technical feasibility of the Richelieu waterway, and the Prime Minister answered that when the last government was in power there was an investigation which was still under way. Did the Prime Minister mean that the government has asked the international joint commission to resume the investigation the commission was carrying out and which was interrupted until the St. Lawrence seaway had been completely finished?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer is no.

Mr. Cardin: Can the Prime Minister tell the house what department of government is making such a study of the Richelieu waterway?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as in the past, several departments are engaged in this work.

Mr. Cardin: May I direct another question to the Prime Minister. I did not get the chance to put this as a supplementary to the questions asked a while ago. Would the Prime Minister inform the house to what department questions on the Richelieu waterway could be addressed, and which department has responsibility for the study mentioned in the Prime Minister's statement?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if questions are directed to me I will see that they are redirected to the proper department.

In the light of this exchange I think the Prime Minister will forgive me if I entertain certain suspicions that no serious consideration has been given to the project of the Richelieu waterway.

Yet on December 7 the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) announced the results of the studies the government claims had been continuing in several departments. The minister did not of course make the announcement in the House of Commons, where the subject had been brought up on innumerable occasions. The minister chose to make the announcement at a banquet given by the Montreal board of trade and la chambre de commerce at the close of a day's conference on the Richelieu-Champlain waterway. By an extraordinary coincidence the study of the project, which according to the Prime Minister had been going on for some years, just happened to finish in time for the banquet, because otherwise the Prime Minister would surely have seen to it that the rights and prerogative of parliament were preserved and the decision made known to the House of Commons first.

During the whole day of the conference on December 7 the members of the conference—and that included members of the United States congress—had listened to well prepared and well documented briefs read by competent people who had been interested in the project for several years. There had been a great deal of enthusiasm, hope and interest shown, and it was unanimously agreed that the very least that could be done would be for the Canadian government and the United States government to engage in a joint study on a program.

One of the speakers at the conference was Mr. Holubowicz from the port of New York authority. His statement can in no way be considered as an exaggerated, or ill-thought out one. I think it is a very moderate and useful statement and I should like to put it on record in Hansard at this time. It is taken from a copy of a speech he made on December 7 at a meeting in Montreal of the Quebec chamber of commerce and it reads as follows:

> At this point, perhaps it will be helpful for me to recapitulate for you the attitude of the principal United States proponents of the Champlain waterway study.
> It should be understood clearly that the efforts being carried out in the United States are limited for the present to the carrying out of a comprehensive study of the project, and not at obtaining authorization on or funds for any actual improvement as yet. At present, no one has sufficient information or technical data on which to base a judgment as to the economic feasibility or justification of any improvement. There has been talk of a 12 ft., 14 ft., 16 ft., 27 ft., and even a 35 ft. waterway. Obviously, no judgment can be made as to which of these depths should be provided, or for that matter whether any improvement at all can be justified, until a full study is completed, which will, among other things, relate economic benefit to the cost of construction.
> Therefore, our point of view is that a comprehensive study is needed, similar in scope to the study conducted by the international joint commission in 1937. In our opinion, this is a rational and sound approach to the problem of development.

He concludes by saying:

> Many interests in the United States are hopeful that the Canadian government will decide to join in studying this project which holds out such a great promise for the economic future of both our countries. We earnestly believe that if competent studies indicate the need for improvement of this transportation artery it would form yet another link between our two countries and do much to enhance the friendship and spirit of cooperation that now exists between us.

That was one of the points of view put forward at the conference. There was, also, another viewpoint which was put forward by Lieutenant Colonel Dansereau, a member of the international joint commission. He had this to say as reported in La Presse of December 7, 1960.

(Translation):

> It is certainly possible to come to an agreement with the United States in the near future concerning 12 feet navigation on the Richelieu river.

(Text):

I have every reason to believe Lieutenant Colonel Dansereau because last summer I attended a meeting of the New York interstate commission which was discussing the project, and at a dinner which was given the governor of Vermont, Governor Stafford, stated toward the end of his speech that Vermont was ready to go ahead with the project but was waiting to see what steps the Canadian government proposed to take. On December 7, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) answered the governor of Vermont in no uncertain terms. The hon. gentleman answered the interstate commission, the board of trade and all those who were interested when he said at that banquet, and I quote from page 3 of:

(Translation):

> Excerpts from a speech delivered by the Hon. Leon Balcer, Minister of Transport, before the chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec, in Montreal, on December 7, 1960.

I quote from page 3:

> In my capacity as Minister of Transport, I should have liked to be able to inform you tonight that the federal government is willing to carry out such a project without delay, or still that we have decided to have the matter carefully looked into by the boundary waters commission. Unfortunately, I am not in a position to make such a statement, but this does not mean however that the government and my department in particular are not following with great interest the work accomplished by you people and that they are not impressed by the enthusiasm and interest shown in this project by such responsible people as you.

(Text):

The kindest thing I can say about the minister's statement that night is that it is the bluntest brush-off I have ever heard a minister of the crown address to any group. On page 7 of that same extract, the Minister of Transport had this to say, and I quote:

(Translation):

> The problem that the government, and more particularly the Department of Transport, have to face is to make the most of the taxpayers' money, with only one purpose in mind, to give public interest precedence over all other interests.

(Text):

That is a very profound and acceptable statement, but it is extremely difficult to see the application of that principle by a government which is willing to spend, for instance, $5,500,000 on military bands in this country but which refuses to pay some $15,000 for a joint study of the economic advantages to be derived from one of the country's economic assets at a time when our standard of living and prosperity depends so essentially upon our capacity for keeping our economy continually expanding. The government's attitude reminds me of a modern version of fiddling while Rome burns.

After the announcement in Montreal by the Minister of Transport of the government's policy with regard to Richelieu-Champlain waterway it was only natural that members of the opposition should try to obtain some pertinent information with respect to the study which was supposed to have been made by the government. Together with the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) and others, I wanted to know, for instance, who had made the reports; what alternative routes had been studied; at what different depths had the project been considered; what consultations had taken place with the United States in connection with a project which is international in scope; on what basis was the potential volume of traffic on the waterway estimated; and, lastly, what was the estimated cost of the alternative routes and the depths of those waterways.

In order to get some information which I felt was of public interest a motion was made for the tabling of the report, but here again a cloak of secrecy fell once more over the report, this time not by means of double-talk but in the form of a procedural technicality—it was argued that interdepartmental reports are considered confidential and cannot be tabled. The result was that the house was given no information whatever on the type of study which had been made and was asked to accept that the project is not economically feasible in spite of several available reports to the contrary.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman mind telling the house what steps were taken in connection with this project at the time the hon. member for Laurier was minister of transport?

Mr. Cardin: That is a simple question to answer, and if the parliamentary secretary had listened carefully he would have heard that in 1937 the international joint commission had stated they were going to discontinue the study which was being made until the St. Lawrence seaway had been completed. The difference which exists between now and then is that the St. Lawrence seaway is now completed.

It is a somewhat ridiculous situation that the government should be reluctant to make public the result of an economic and engineering study or survey of a public project on which a start was made in 1937, on the grounds that it is confidential in nature while at the same time the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) without batting an eyelid will announce to the world that half of our CF-100's will be phased out and that he is not yet sure whether or not the phased-out planes will be replaced. There seems to me to be an inconsistency in the two points of view. On the one hand the government declines to divulge to the house the results of a study of a public project but, on the other hand it can inform the world that we intend to cut by half our force of CF-100's.

Perhaps more than ever before in our economic history will it be necessary to study very seriously and to implement—

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. Was this matter brought up at the recent Liberal convention? If so, what was the reaction to it?

Mr. Cardin: I believe it was. It was not dealt with in my committee but I believe it was brought up.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): What was the official reaction to it?

Mr. Cardin: The official reaction was very good. I only hoped it would be as good here in the house.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): May I take it that this is the official policy from now on?

Mr. Cardin: I think the hon. member will have an opportunity of presenting his views and of discussing these matters on a later occasion. It seems to me our present and future economic difficulties and our unemployment problem will not be solved by one over-all solution. It will be necessary to study general economic and unemployment problems in terms of specific solutions for specific problems in specific areas. Although it is certainly commendable it is not sufficient to determine and to define distressed areas in our economy which must be given special help. This, of course, is good and needed but can only be considered an emergency measure to prevent the possible economic collapse of these areas. If we are to really ensure continued over-all prosperity by means of a continuing expanding economy we must pinpoint and utilize to the fullest possible extent all the natural assets with which our country has been so readily endowed.

I submit that the Richelieu river being connected with lake Champlain and the Hudson river is one of Canada's natural assets which could definitely bolster our economy and help to keep our economy growing. Although the government may be reluctant to give the basis on which it claims the Richelieu-Champlain waterway is not economically feasible, I have no hesitation in putting forth the arguments which I feel make the waterway not only feasible but a necessity if we are to exploit our natural assets intelligently and strengthen our over-all economy.

I mentioned earlier the rapid industrial expansion that is taking place between Montreal and Sorel. Apart from Marine Industries, a shipyard on the Richelieu at Sorel, and Sorel Industries which date back some 25 years, a number of heavy industries have been established in the area within the past 10 years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Standing order 31 says:

When Mr. Speaker is in the Chair, no member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of no confidence in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I submit that the exceptions to this standing order do not apply in the circumstances; but I gather that the consensus of the house is to allow the hon. member to continue his speech.

(Text):

Is it agreeable that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): By unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, not on the interpretation of the rule.

Mr. Cardin: I thank hon. members for giving me extra time. I will try to conclude as quickly as I can.

As I was saying, in the past 10 years on the south shore between Montreal and Sorel a considerable number of heavy industries have flourished. There is, for instance, Quebec Iron and Titanium which started to roll in 1950. The Steel Company of Canada is now established there. Others include Quebec Titanium Pigment, St. Maurice Chemicals, the ore reduction plant at Contrecœur and Crucible Steel of Canada. British Titanium Pigments are now constructing a huge plant and plans for a rolling mill are being prepared. The result of all this is that the mouth of the Richelieu river falls within a highly industrialized area. Furthermore, there is east of Montreal and Sorel the paper mills and the ore mines on the north shore of Quebec and Labrador.

The present water transportation systems between this highly industrialized section of western Quebec and the industrialized section of the United States immediately to the south are (a) a very long, circuitous water route by the gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic ocean, some 1,800 miles in length, or (b) the present six-foot waterway by way of the Richelieu river, a distance of some 650 miles.

A practicable waterway on the Richelieu would reduce the distance between the industrialized sections of Quebec and the United States by well over 1,000 miles. Adequate and modern canals and lakes on the Richelieu would mean a substantial reduction in transportation cost and would greatly increase the quantity and variety of the tonnage now moving on the Richelieu.

If the Richelieu were properly canalized it may be expected that there would be a large tonnage of concentrates to New Jersey, a greatly increased tonnage of newsprint, a substantial quantity of pig iron from the ore reduction plants and quantities of lumber, and wood pulp. There would also be quantities of semi-finished steels moving on the Richelieu. It may be expected that the northbound traffic would comprise raw cotton, clay products, raw sugar, molding sand, phosphate rock and structural steel.

It was estimated in 1949 that with a 12-foot waterway the total tonnage on the Richelieu waterway would aggregate two million tons. With the unexpected industrial development of the past 10 years in that area I am convinced that the aggregate tonnage would be far greater than that. I cannot help but think that the government judged the project as economically unfeasible on the basis of the present tonnage moving on the six-foot waterway and on the basis of the incalculable obstacles to transportation. Surely the government could not have taken into account the industrial expansion that has taken place in the area since the international joint commission made its report in 1937. I submit that the whole south shore from Montreal to Sorel within 10 to 15 years will become the Pittsburgh of Canada in the heavy iron and steel industries.

I hope the government does not believe that additional tonnage on the waterway can be achieved under the present impossible conditions that obtain there. Even the government, I think, must agree that increased traffic on the waterway and industrial expansion will follow the development of the waterway but cannot and will not precede it. I feel that an appropriate and adequate waterway would not only increase the tonnage of traffic on the Richelieu but would encourage the building of secondary industries along the seaway and give rise to a great increase in the number of tourists by yachts. This in itself is also becoming an important industry. In turn this would promote innumerable service trades on the shores of the Richelieu. Canada cannot and should not ignore any of these potential developments at this time.

Having stated some of the reasons why I feel that the Richelieu waterway is not only economically justifiable but even advisable at this time—an opinion which is shared by economists and engineers both in Canada and the United States—I should like to say a few words concerning the possible routes of the waterway.

To my mind, of all the routes that have been considered over the years and recently, the natural route, that of following the Richelieu river to meet the St. Lawrence river at Sorel offers the greatest advantage both from an economic and an engineering point of view. I believe that the work that was started in 1937 to build a 12-foot waterway to Sorel should be completed as a first step. Then, if outbound and inbound traffic directed to Montreal from the United States would not foul up shipping on the St. Lawrence river, a cut-off from St. Jean to Laprairie might be constructed as a second step. The reasons I have to support my suggestions are to be found in the international joint commission interim report on the Champlain waterway at page 15, where the commission's conclusions are set out, as follows:

That there are five possible routes for a waterway from Montreal to the Hudson river by way of lake Champlain, the last mentioned being an all-water route and the remainder overland routes, as follows:

(a) From lake St. Francis on the St. Lawrence river to lake Champlain via the Chazy river.

(c) From Caughnawaga, on the St. Lawrence river, to Fryer's island on the Richelieu river.

In the case of all five routes the existing waterway would be followed through lake Champlain and by way of the Champlain canal to the Hudson river at Albany.

That of these five routes, the last mentioned (e) is the most practicable from an engineering standpoint and the least impracticable from an economic point of view.

As a second reason for supporting my suggestion I would say that this particular route is the only all water route of all those that I have mentioned. Recently there has also been talk of a canal between St. Jean and Laprairie, but that also would be an overland route and I shall have something more to say about that particular suggestion in a minute.

One of the strongest reasons for the suggestion I have made is that the greatest volume of traffic now contemplated would come from points below Montreal and the access to the Richelieu river at Sorel is not only unencumbered, but it also offers the shortest route to in-shipping coming from points east of Montreal and destined for New York.

The fourth reason is that when the St. Lawrence seaway was first planned the canal was to pass on the Montreal side of the St. Lawrence. However, subsequently the plans were changed and the canal now passes on the south shore. A canal from St. Jean to Laprairie would necessarily fall in the St. Lawrence seaway traffic and as there are enough tie-ups in the St. Lawrence seaway, any cross traffic on the seaway should be considered very seriously.

Richelieu Waterway

My fifth reason is, as I said earlier, that Lieutenant Colonel Dansereau, who is a member of the international joint commission, stated that the United States was ready to go ahead with a 12-foot waterway and, from what I have heard on the subject from United States spokesmen I have every reason to believe that the United States would be ready to proceed with a 12-foot canal, but they do not at this time consider a 27-foot waterway.

If a canal is to be dug from St. Jean to Laprairie to my mind, it should be a 27-foot canal if it is going to have any economic value at all. However, a 12-foot waterway with adequate locking facilities could and would at this time immeasurably increase tonnage of traffic on the Richelieu and help the industrial expansion in the Richelieu valley, which in turn would contribute to Canada's over-all economic expansion until a 27-foot waterway is considered by both the United States and Canada and a 27-foot canal can be dug from St. Jean to Lapraire.

The Richelieu waterway is not the only national asset Canada possesses, and since we have to find a way to further expand our economy, then the Richelieu seaway and other such projects should be proceeded with without delay.

In solving the unemployment problem, short term measures must necessarily have to be taken into account, but the real solution of the unemployment problem is to plan for and create an atmosphere and conditions which will facilitate our industrial expansion, create more jobs and expand our economy.

Up until the announcement was made by the Minister of Transport on December 7, I, and many Canadians, had entertained very high hopes that the Richelieu-Champlain waterway would start almost immediately. I recall the summer of 1959, I think it was, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was making his political tour of the province of Quebec. He stopped off at Sorel for the purpose of examining the waterway and from all appearances he seemed to be very much impressed by it. In the report that appeared in the Canadian Shipping and Marine Engineering News of January, 1960. Mr. Plummer had this to say, and I quote:

At the conclusion of his inspection trip, the Prime Minister confided to the federated chamber of commerce heads and delegates accompanying him and to Dr. L. G. Tombs (vice president of Guy Tombs Limited, Montreal), chairman of the navigable waterways committee of la chambre de commerce de la province de Quebec:

"You may rest assured that if this project is capable of realizing a spur to the prosperity of the nation, it shall be studied with all the attention it merits."

In the light of what the Minister of Transport said on December 7 we are faced once again with the difference that exists between the Prime Minister's words and the government's action. It was very disappointing to those who were at the conference to hear that the government not only did not intend to start work on the project but was not even willing to go ahead with a joint study of the project through the international joint commission.

In this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I am asking not for a start immediately on construction of the seaway but for a serious study to be made by appointing a board of engineers to study, in connection with a United States board of engineers, the project so as to determine whether it is economically feasible. I am convinced that any study of that kind would show that the Richelieu waterway would be economically advantageous to Canada. If the government does not reconsider its decision of not having a full scale study made of the project, not only will it be brushing off countless citizens who have been interested in this project for many years but it will also be brushing off an opportunity to facilitate our industrial expansion, create employment and contribute to Canada's economic growth.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, for many years, there has been some talk about the Richelieu waterway. I was most surprised indeed that the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) did not mention his uncle, the late Hon. P. J. A. Cardin who, when he was Minister of Public Works, had a survey made in connection with the Richelieu waterway. Indeed, the international commission which was appointed at that time stated as follows:

> It is relevant to note that the Canadian government might decide to dredge the Richelieu river to a depth of 12 feet all along, from the international frontier to the St. Lawrence. In that case, the United States would only have to carry out minor dredging operations near Rouses Point to ensure a 12-foot deep navigation channel from the St. Lawrence to the Hudson.

At the time the uncle of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres did not think it appropriate, following certain recommendations by the international commission, that the Canadian government should proceed with the Richelieu waterway.

Moreover, was there under the former administration, under the minister of transport of the day, any study made of the Richelieu waterway scheme? The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) should know something about it, as he was responsible for the St. Lawrence seaway authority as its president, apart from having been minister of transport.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been easy at the time to examine a possible deepening of the Richelieu river when the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) was minister of transport and studied the St. Lawrence waterway project. It would certainly have been less costly for the Canadian government, because, when the St. Lawrence waterway was being built, there was a team of engineers at work who could have studied the project and drawn up the required plans.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Laurier was not living in the province of Quebec and probably was not interested in considering the problem. But now that the hon. gentlemen are sitting in the opposition, they have an entirely different outlook and are trying to hurry up the project and exert pressure on the government. Yet, the hon. member for Laurier failed in his duty in refusing at the time to have this project seriously studied by the same team of engineers who had worked out plans for the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres said, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) visited the area, thus showing his strong interest in the matter, because never in the past had a Prime Minister of Canada gone to Sorel to study the issue. The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres was very happy about it, because he himself went to greet him.

Mr. Speaker, I am most surprised, as I said a moment ago, to see that while there is so much talk about it today nothing was said four, five or six years ago, and that in fact, the hon. member for Laurier did not deem it advisable to study the problem at the time.

Mr. Speaker, I only wanted to say a few words on this project and to state that the Canadian government always gives serious consideration to the problems which are submitted to it. There is certainly a hope that in the near future, more positive work will be done with regard to the Richelieu waterway.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in all the time I have been a member of this house, I have noticed one thing in particular, and that is the fact that members who know practically nothing about some matter or other are the first ones to talk about it. I have also noticed that on many occasions those who dealt with a project such as this one were not conversant with the subject. This has been made evident in the remarks of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat.

He talked without any knowledge of what has gone on before, and especially, without have listened closely to what has been said by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin).

Mr. Speaker, he sought to give the house the impression that the man who bore the name Cardin, that is the late Pierre-Joseph-Arthur Cardin, had not seen fit, at the time he was minister of marine, and later minister of public works, to consider developing the Richelieu river waterway.

As for me, I say with full knowledge of the facts that few members and ministers in this house have taken more interest in this matter of the Richelieu waterway, and have considered it with greater enthusiasm than did the former member for Richelieu-Vercheres, the late Mr. Cardin.

Due to his efforts, the Richelieu has been deepened to a depth not of 12 feet but of 25 feet, over a distance of a mile and a half above Sorel. Thanks to his perseverance, the St. Ours canal has been deepened by several feet, and during all the years that this hon. member was a minister of the crown in this house, he proved clearly that not only he understood the situation, but that he could take action. He did a lot more than many members and ministers opposite. He was not satisfied with just discussing the project; he backed his word with actions. He achieved something—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question to the hon. member for Laurier?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Pigeon: Could the hon. member tell me why, when the international commission was created for this purpose and made recommendations to the government at the time, the Hon. P. J. A. Cardin did not follow them and deepen Richelieu canal to a depth of 12 feet?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, my answer to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is that his question is as stupid as was the speech he just made. And I will tell you why—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I ask the hon. member for Laurier to withdraw this unparliamentary remark.

Mr. Robichaud: Oh, no. It is too evident.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the question is so stupid—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Pigeon: I am, Mr. Speaker.

If the hon. member for Laurier knew the French meaning of the word he used, he certainly would not have used it, and I beg you to request the hon. member for Laurier to withdraw this word.

My question is based on information I have read in the paper Le Marin Canadien, where it is clearly stated—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said earlier, that not only is the question stupid, but so is the member who just made a speech, and I will tell you why—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Abuse will get you nowhere.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for Laurier has just established the difference between a parliamentary word and an unparliamentary one. The hon. member for Laurier first said that the question was as stupid as the hon. member's speech, but just now he said that the hon. member is stupid—

Mr. Habel: Absolutely.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That, in my opinion, is an unparliamentary statement, and I ask the hon. member for Laurier to withdraw the remark.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would ask you to show me under what section of the standing orders of the house a member is debarred from saying that another member is stupid, and I will remind you exactly of what happened at the time the budget was brought down. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), referring to the budget, described as stupid an interruption by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming); yet the chairman did not consider it appropriate at the time to ask the Leader of the Opposition to withdraw.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, to supplement the statement just made by hon. member for Laurier, I recall that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member for Laurier tell me what page of Hansard reports the incident to which he is referring—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I cannot at this moment give you the page number—I would have to look for it, but it was during the debate on the budget.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I should like to go on with my remarks, and if the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Hold on.

Mr. Speaker, I am still on the question of privilege. If you feel that the word "stupid", which I used with reference to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, is unparliamentary, I have no hesitation in withdrawing it; however, I repeat that his question was stupid, just as was his speech, in any case, and I shall tell you why. It is because the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres indicated that in the report of the international joint commission, it was clearly established that the commission was not to deal with the matter of the Richelieu seaway until the St. Lawrence seaway had been completed.

Now, the member who has just interrupted me should have known that; and if he did not know, he should not have made the statement he made a moment ago.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. In order to correct what the hon. member for Laurier has just said—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would point out to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm that if he merely wishes tc correct the interpretation which the hon. member for Laurier has put on his remarks, he may do so when the hon. member for Laurier has finished; there is no actual question of privilege involved.

Mr. Robichaud: He does not know the standing orders.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, when reference is made to the Richelieu seaway, one should at least take time to study the matter and learn what it is all about, because according to what the previous speaker said, it is obvious that he did not know what he was talking about.

(Text):

I should now like to come back to the subject under consideration by the house, if I may be allowed to do so. The first thing I should like to do is to congratulate the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) who made an excellent presentation of this resolution this evening. During the course of at least 60 minutes he indicated to the house not only that he understood the purport of the resolution but also that he knew whereof he spoke.

It seems to me that this is a simple resolution. All it does is to ask the government to set up a board of engineers to consider the feasibility of the route from the St. Lawrence to New York via the Richelieu river and lake Champlain. That is not asking such a terrible thing. The government from time to time, sets up commissions of this kind.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres during the course of his remarks has indicated that this is a matter which would cost perhaps something in the neighbourhood of $15,000. When one realizes that not only the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) but the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) and the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) went down to the area and when they were there certainly led the people to believe that something would be done about this waterway. A year or two or more has gone by, and absolutely nothing is being done about the matter.

What is the position? Why should this resolution not be agreed to? Why should not the government give immediate consideration to this resolution and implement it? The international joint commission in a report referred to by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres which was brought down in 1937 made it quite clear, and that is an answer to the question put by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), that until the St. Lawrence seaway had been completed the commission asked for permission to suspend the whole matter and when the St. Lawrence seaway was completed then consideration should be given to the project. That is all that is being asked by those of us who sit on this side of the house. There is nothing contradictory in what the hon. member has said to what was done by those who were in office prior to the present administration.

The St. Lawrence seaway has now had two complete years of operation and in my opinion they have been two successful years of operation. Why then has not the time arrived—to use the language of the international joint commission—to give consideration to this matter? It is an international project. It is one which requires the concurrence of both the government of the United States and the government of Canada. It is a matter in which several states south of the border are interested. It is a matter in which, north of the border, the province of Quebec has a particular interest.

As the situation stands now I am informed on good authority—and I believe this to be the case—that a large sum of money has been set aside by the United States government authorizing the United States corps of engineers to make borings and studies of the whole project. In fact the United States corps of engineers since this government has been in office have obtained information in connection with this project in relation to the territory of Canada. If that is the case and if the information which I have is correct, then there is no reason why those who sit on the other side of the house should not co-operate with the United States corps of engineers in setting up a board which would study the economics of this route.

The government is giving consideration to and is studying the Ottawa river waterway. That is a subject which several of us who sit on this side of the house have approved. We think that a study of the Ottawa river or of the canalization of the Ottawa river is one which should be undertaken and I believe that the government has given consideration to it.

An hon. Member: It is doing it.

Mr. Chevrier: If it is doing it in so far as the Ottawa river is concerned, why not do it equally in so far as the Richelieu river is concerned down to the United States boundary? It would cost much less to study the economics of the Richelieu than it would to study those of the other routes, although that consideration should not make any difference. Both of them will be linked to the St. Lawrence in this way: one will be moving its traffic down to the St. Lawrence and the other will derive a great deal of its traffic from the St. Lawrence. If the one is a matter which should be studied by this house, it strikes me that the other is also a matter which should be studied.

Another question which comes to my mind is this. What should the board study? The board should study the various routes. It should study the cost and it should study the economics of this waterway. The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres referred to five routes that were considered by the report of the international joint commission. Because they are now known to the house I shall not go into those routes except to say this. Since the report of 1937 was made the economy of the province of Quebec in that area has changed completely. It has changed in so far as the St. Lawrence seaway is concerned. It has changed in so far as the development of the north shore as well as the south shore of the St. Lawrence is concerned. With the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and the building of the two turning basins in the Laprairie basin, it is now only a short distance from either of those two turning basins to the city of St. Johns. It may be some nine miles, 10 miles or 11 miles.

The experience we gathered from the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway was that excavation costs in the dry were, of course, much less than dredging costs. That is a reason why this study should be undertaken, namely to ascertain which of these five routes, six routes or more is the most economical one having regard to circumstances as we find them today.

Then the potential is entirely different. It is the discovery of iron ore in the mines of Labrador and of northern Quebec that tilted the balance in favour of the St. Lawrence seaway. Since iron ore has been discovered, two railways have been constructed on the north shore, one from Schefferville to Seven Islands and another from Gagnon to Port Cartier. Several developments of not only iron ore but by-products coming from the manufacture of ore have resulted in industry being established in the triangle of Montreal-Sorel-Beauharnois. Because of that the potential of the Richelieu cut-off is far greater in 1961 than it ever was in 1937, when this report was made.

I need not tell this house that water transportation is perhaps the cheapest form of transportation in the world. That was one of the main reasons why the great lakes system was developed, in order to bring the inland carriers down to the ports of Montreal and the St. Lawrence river.

Here we have inland ships carrying large cargoes that used to come down to Port Colborne and Prescott for transshipment who because of the construction of a 27-foot channel through the international section of the St. Lawrence river are able to come right down with their huge cargoes, thereby reducing the cost of transportation tremendously.

Such will be the case also if there is development of the Richelieu-Champlain cut-off. Whether it be 14 feet or whether it be more there can be no doubt that the cost of transportation by water of the iron ore, if such be the case, or the products derived from iron ore, or titanium, or such other industries as have been established at Contrecœur, Varennes and Sorel, from the St. Lawrence either by way of Montreal or Sorel will be much lower than the cost of transporting them by rail or even by sea, since the difference is 1,000 miles greater along the coast of the Atlantic ocean.

Therefore it seems to me that this project is one that should commend itself to the house. It should commend itself to the house for another reason, because I believe that if a board of engineers were to find in favour of the economics of this project they would recommend it on a self-liquidating basis. They would of necessity have to treat it in the same way as the St. Lawrence seaway was treated, namely that the cost of construction, whether it be $50 million or more, should be repaid by the imposition of tolls. It would of course be illogical, in my opinion—and I may be mistaken—to have tolls on the St. Lawrence river and not the Richelieu, which because of the amount of the expenditure involved would of course be much less than now obtaining on the St. Lawrence canals.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres has indicated the attitude of the government. I hold in my hand a memorandum which was presented to the Prime Minister by a delegation which waited upon him in June of 1958, which sets out the reasons why this project should be completed. I know that this submission was well received at the time. Not only was it well received by the Prime Minister, but it was also well received by those of his ministers who are from the province of Quebec. I am somewhat surprised that the Minister of Transport is not in his seat this evening. I presume he has other business of importance to attend to, otherwise he would be here. But I am glad to see that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is here, because this is his district and he has already declared himself in the matter.

I hold in my hand a clipping which appeared in La Presse of October 28, 1957, entitled:

(Translation):

The digging of the Richelieu channel to a depth of 12 feet.

(Text):

And, in quotes:

(Translation):

"Absolutely necessary", states the Hon. Paul Comtois.

(Text):

And, a little further down in the report, this is what follows:

(Translation):

The Hon. Paul Comtois, minister of mines in the Diefenbaker government, stated that this "project is absolutely necessary for the economic life of the Richelieu area".

"If I am given the opportunity of contributing to the success of that undertaking", went on the representative of Nicolet-Yamaska in the commons, "I shall consider it my duty to associate myself to all those who are promoting it."

And a little later on, in quotation marks, always quoting the minister:

"It is certain that we need that seaway", added Mr. Comtois, who referred to it as a "magnificent project", which is of great interest to us.

(Text):

I congratulate the minister and commend him for the statement which he made. It is an excellent statement and one that I am sure would receive favourable comment from not only his own constituents but all those who reside in the area. However I must tell the minister that he could not have had a great deal of influence with his colleague the Minister of Transport, because the Minister of Transport made it quite clear when he spoke at this banquet in Montreal that no action was to be taken by the government. Not only did he say that no action was to be taken by the government, but he found that the study indicated that the economics were against the project. Having said that the least that could be done by the Minister of Transport would be to produce in the House of Commons the study which indicates this so we would know why the government came to that conclusion.

But when the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres moved to have produced the papers there was complete secrecy; the government fell back on the question of interdepartmental papers which are not producible. If that is the case the minister should not be making the statements that he does make. After all, if it is a fact that the economics are against the project let us see what the economics say. Surely the house has a right to know on what basis and on what foundation the minister places himself when he makes statements of that character.

It is quite clear to those of us who sit on this side of the house that the government has no intention of implementing this project either by way of construction or by way of the establishment of a board of engineers. The least that the government could and should do is to set up a board of engineers to study the question so that we would know which of the five routes is feasible, the cost of the route, the savings in transportation costs and whether or not the project is justified economically.

But they will not set up a board. They tell us the economics are against the project, and they will not produce the documents to substantiate this. But they go down to the area and get the people all excited, as they did in the 1957 and 1958 campaign. They went across this country from region to region, from province to province, and indicated to many people in Canada that they were going to carry out a number of great projects. However, when they got into the house many of those projects fell flat, just as this one is now falling flat. I can tell the members of the government that the people who reside in this area are not going to forget all the fuss and thunder made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and those associated with him when they went down to the area and certainly led the public to believe that something was going to be done.

At least, if a board of engineers had been established surely there could have been no criticism in the house; surely there could have been no objection to a measure which would have cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $15,000. That is why I say the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres was well advised in moving the resolution which he did, and if the government is ready to vote on this, then let us have the vote because then we shall let parliament decide whether hon. members opposite were justified in acting as they did, and whether the motion of my hon. friend the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres was well founded.

Again I commend him for having given the time and study which he has to this subject, along with the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis). Both these hon. members have spent a great deal of time in studying not only the economics but the historical aspects of this project.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer you to rule 37 of the standing orders of the house. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said something about being stupid in his speech—

Mr. Dupuis: He withdrew the expression.

Mr. Pigeon: Rule 37 authorizes me to tell the hon. member for Laurier that my information was reliable and correct, because it was taken from the publication Le Marin Canadien of April 16, 1960, and what I said was printed there in quotation marks.

The hon. member insulted me and also insulted all the seamen of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Nevertheless, you are stupid.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member is a nitwit. He had to change ridings.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): The hon. member who sponsored the resolution, and the former minister of transport are very anxious for a vote on this resolution and I just thought that speaking for our party we would support the resolution, not with any particular enthusiasm for what might come beyond it because we cannot really say, but the resolution does seem to ask for something fairly moderate and within range—it is only a question of a board of engineers.

In so far as the actual project is concerned, it seems to me some part of Canada is always being captivated by some great public works project which is going to make that region bloom like a rose. I know we had a great dream at Port Arthur of what the seaway was going to do for us. I understand there are people around Saint John who have a great dream of what the Chignecto canal is going to do for them and the K. C. Irving interests. I know that my colleague from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and his friends have great hopes for Moosonee as an industrial port once $50 million or $100 million have been devoted to it. I know the hon. member for Carleton looks forward to the day when he can look out on to the new driveway along the Ottawa river and see heavy tankers and ore barges transporting material here and everywhere. These are all dreams which members of parliament, particularly in their own regions, never go against, but I should just like to suggest we might be realistic enough to allow one grandiose project every five years.

I will give this government credit for initiating a grandiose project in the South Saskatchewan dam. John R. MacNicol, a Toronto man, was a great enthusiast and supporter of this project. He used to come into a library where I worked and look up files and records referring to it. He said: They will not listen in Ottawa but some day they will and we shall have that dam. He said: It will change the whole face of the prairies; it will make Saskatchewan the garden of the west. And on he went.

This is grand stuff, part of the Canadian tradition, but we come down to the fact that so many of these grandiose dreams when they become reality are not quite as fine as we expect. I see the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Campbell) in the house and, of course, the former minister of transport came from Stormont, and we know that Cornwall, the city of Stormont, was affected very much by the St. Lawrence seaway. We know that Cornwall is not as prosperous as it was a few years ago because of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Chevrier: No. May I interrupt the hon. member to tell him that if Cornwall is not as prosperous today it is not because of the St. Lawrence seaway but because of other and very different reasons.

Mr. Fisher: My point is that we get these grand dreams. To read Creighton's book "The Commercial Empire of the St. Lawrence", Montreal has been dreaming of shipping to both the American and the western market ever since the 1780's and 1790's. The whole of the canal building along the St. Lawrence, the Welland canal, the railway to the west, all these things were designed to make Montreal the centrepiece of the Canadian economy and I should like to suggest that while it has made a great contribution, today the shift in transport is towards other means rather than water. I would like to suggest that those people who see canals as being a great solution to any area's economy perhaps are probably 50 or 60 years behind the times. It seems to me we should be looking more to airports and facilities in that line or smoothing out of railway problems, or better highways for our trucks because I cannot believe that water shipping and the difference today in the return you get from it is really that vital. I know that if you get grain shipped to the west by water and rail, or by all rail there is very little advantage in it. It has been one of the great complaints of the prairie provinces that despite the fact you have the St. Lawrence seaway and shipping right to the heart of the country you cannot get freight moved from east to west with the savings you might expect.

All I am saying really is that it seems to me we as Canadians have tended to over-exaggerate the importance to our economy of these advances in the building of canals and waterways just as we have tended to do the same thing to some extent in the case of railways. I think it is about time we looked more toward highways and airports which seem to me to fit into a more rounded picture of transportation at this time.

But this leads me away from the resolution, and to return to it we would support the resolution although not with any tremendous enthusiasm for the project as it seems to stand here, but in the hope that a good report would indicate to us more solidly the economic and other advantages of the scheme.

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I intended to make a rather elaborate speech, but I see that time flies and that the people from the west are taking over the Richelieu. I shall therefore be brief.

I would be angry with myself if I went right to the point without referring to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm who for us has become the inevitable member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, the petulant and childish member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. I know he will not ask me to retract my words, because he is not aware of their meaning.

Mr. Pigeon: You are following in the footsteps of the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Dupuis: The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm made a speech in which he strayed away—I would not say from the track—but from the river.

The hon. member told us how proud he was that his chief, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker), visited the Richelieu river in September 1959, to see what was going on there.

Once again, we realize that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm should have been better informed before speaking.

Mr. Pigeon: I was on the spot.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. Dupuis: Yes, the hon. member was there and I shall tell him what he saw.

When the Prime Minister left Ottawa he told the newspaper correspondents that he was going to sail down the Richelieu to see the possibilities of digging a channel in that beautiful waterway.

He was due to arrive at Sorel. Everybody was waiting. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was waiting too.

At a given time, about 3 p.m., according to a report published in La Presse of September 22, 1959, the crowd massed on the banks saw the ferry arriving. "There he is", the people said. The member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm comes first and shouts: "Hail! Here comes the great man." Well, instead of the Prime Minister there came two big Percherons, again according to the report of La Presse.

Do you know what happened afterwards Mr. Speaker, while the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and his friends were waiting for their leader? It happened that the Prime Minister came two hours late. He was them put aboard a small craft which took him on a small 20-minute tour and left him on the other shore. He then got into a blue convertible and was driven to the Quebec region where he made political speeches all the way. He completely forgot the Richelieu river.

That is what happened in September 1959 and I thank the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm for having given me this opportunity to recall such an occasion.

Mr. Speaker, now I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) who made tonight in this House of Commons a truly serious speech including complete statistics and a careful documentation.

The proposed Richelieu waterway is a project worth doing. The hon. member's speech stands out against the remarks made on the other side of the house.

It is in fact a serious matter. Mr. Speaker, the member for Richelieu-Vercheres knows what he is talking about. He lives in a constituency bordering the Richelieu river. He does not live on the shore of the small Assomption river. He knows the Richelieu and, besides, he represents here the constituency so named.

Mr. Pigeon: That is an insult to the people of the Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm constituency.

Mr. Dupuis: The fact that you are here.

Mr. Pigeon: I am not changing ridings, and do not worry, I will not move.

Mr. Dupuis: Anyway, if you stay there you will die there.

So, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the member for Richelieu-Vercheres, who lives in a bordering constituency, takes an interest in the waterway. Tonight, you have heard in this house the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres and the former minister of transport, the member for Laurier, who set forth to the house the serious reasons in support of the waterway.

What did the government members offer us? I say it is an insult to the province of Quebec that from the Conservative side, we hear nothing but a Pigeon.

Some members opposite have responsibilities. While the matter of the deepening of the Richelieu river, which concerns his department, is being discussed, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) is not even in his seat. The member for the neighbouring constituency of Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) whose riding borders on the Richelieu river, is not even in his seat tonight. The member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Comtois), the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, who makes high-sounding electoral statements throughout the province, suggesting that the Richelieu waterway is an important matter, is in his seat tonight, but he is almost asleep while the matter is being discussed in this house.

Mr. Pigeon: You are very polite.

Mr. Dupuis: And just where is the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), whose constituency borders on the Richelieu river? He is nowhere to be found, he is elsewhere.

While we, on behalf of our area, call for the deepening of the Richelieu river, something which would attract industries and provide jobs for Canadians in that area, as the member for Richelieu-Vercheres has made abundantly clear earlier, while we argue in this house for this waterway, while we call for action and deeds, we note that the Associate Minister of National Defence who is directly concerned in this waterway, because his constituency is next to the Richelieu river and he is a resident of the province of Quebec, made the following statement as reported in this evening's issue of La Presse:

> In my riding, I organize dances, fashion shows, etc.; under the Roman empire, you know how the Caesars ruled over their subjects: "with bread and games". When no bread was available, then games were organized. You know that the federal government is unable to grant all kinds of favours. If there is no bread, then there will be games.

I believe it is time the province of Quebec realized that the ministers in the present government do not represent the aspirations of our province.

In fact, when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) came to the Queen Elizabeth hotel last December to address the members of the chambers of commerce gathered for a day's study of the deepening of the Richelieu river, he threw cold water on the enthusiasm of those who have worked for years towards the implementation of this great project. The Minister of Transport came before the members of the chambers of commerce saying: "I have an interesting statement to make." Here is the statement: "You may be hoping that the government is going to ask the international joint commission to consider the deepening of the river, but unfortunately, I cannot tell you that it will."

Well, Mr. Speaker, in the Liberal party, and I am happy to recall it tonight to the house, we have members who look after the interests of their area. They look after the interests of their province, while the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) never said a word in favour of the waterway. He is not even here tonight, when we are discussing that matter, one which affects each and every elector in Chambly-Rouville.

When the Minister of Transport is absent, when the Associate Minister of National Defence is absent, we, Liberals, rise in this house to say that we have been active.

The member for Richelieu-Vercheres and I went to the United States to attend the interstate conference in the state of New York. In 1959, we went to the interstate conference in Vermont, and to the 1960 conference, again in Vermont—

Mr. Pigeon: Neither of you did much.

Mr. Dupuis: —where we have met engineers, American experts and the governor of Vermont who told us why they were for the immediate deepening of the Richelieu river and lake Champlain. Not so long ago, we went to a town in our ridings and called a meeting of six members from ridings bordering on the river.

We explained to them the reasons in favour of the Richelieu waterway. We asked the Quebec provincial government that the committee or the Quebec board of economic planning look into the economic advantages of that waterway for our area and our province, and forward their report to the federal Minister of Transport. We formed a responsible committee of six riparian members and called a conference at Beloeil, in early December, when we invited an internationally known planner to address the conference on the advisability of the Richelieu waterway.

What happened? Our friends opposite sent us delegates to tell us: "Do not organize that conference with this great planner, you invited. Postpone it, because next December the federal Minister of Transport will address the chambers of commerce of Montreal and make an important statement about the Richelieu". Therefore, at their request, we cancelled our meeting, even though it was important, and waited for December. Then on December 7, 1960 we heard the Minister of Transport woefully confess that he had no intention of considering a problem that everybody wished would be looked into immediately.

Now, as we are discussing tonight a problem as important as the waterway, I say that we are tired to see that no minister nor Conservative member of parliament from Quebec is prepared to accept his responsibilities. We have had enough of ministers gadding about making political statements. We have had enough of seeing, as we do tonight, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, a nice chap, a wonderful chap, an extremely charming and courteous fellow, sitting here in silence and making his statements only outside the house.

When the time comes to speak in the house he stands there, candidly grinning at us and then he merely deputizes the inevitable member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm who dips both his feet into the river.

Mr. Pigeon: Twenty two years of silence, only to talk nonsense in the opposition.

Mr. Denis: It did not take you that long.

Mr. Dupuis: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat this: the Minister of Transport told us that the Richelieu waterway would not be economically feasible. I asked him here a few days ago what he based his statement on. He replied that it was based on reports from his department's economists and engineers. I put on the order paper a motion for return, asking him to table the reports on which he based his statement that the waterway would not be economically feasible. The Minister of Transport replied that he would like me to withdraw the motion as he could not give an answer, because, as he said, the matter came under several departments.

Well, I would say tonight that it is time that the minister take his responsibilities and say here or elsewhere why he does not wish to encourage the study of the Richelieu waterway.

Many distinguished engineers, commissions of enquiry, renowned persons in the United States, all have admitted that the project was sound. They based their—

Mr. Fisher: Don't kill the motion.

(Text):

If hon. members did not take our places when we are talking about Quebec matters, and if they did not waste our time I would have sufficient time to conclude my remarks in order to take a vote.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the American engineers and the governor of Vermont are in favour of the Richelieu waterway.

The United States government is voting important sums of money to have army engineers undertake studies in that connection and, meanwhile, on this side of the border, our government is doing absolutely nothing in this field.

Following the statements made by my friends from Richelieu-Vercheres and Laurier, I repeat that the Richelieu waterway would shorten the distance between Montreal and New York from 1,800 miles to 400 miles.

The Richelieu waterway would also attract all transport vessels of low tonnage, and thus would clear the St. Lawrence seaway.

Manufacturers and industrialists would find it less costly to transport their merchandises through the Richelieu waterway, precisely on account of the greatly reduced distance.

Mr. Speaker, in our area of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, of Brome-Missisquoi—and I am wondering where is the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi—possibly the Richelieu waterway project is not a matter of interest to him—in our area of Chambly-Rouville, Richelieu-Vercheres, Longueuil, Chateauguay-Laprairie, all people have their eyes set on this House of Commons. Tomorrow, they will read the papers and say: What did Mr. Balcer have to say? Nothing. What did the member for Chambly-Rouville say? Nothing. What did the member for Longueuil say? Nothing. What did the member for Brome-Missisquoi say? Nothing. What did the member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie say? Nothing. Who represented Conservative aspirations in the House of Commons? The inevitable member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon).

Well, Mr. Speaker, the people of the province of Quebec will be in a position to see the difference between a Liberal team and a Conservative one.

Mr. Pigeon: What did the hon. member for Laurier do when he was minister of transport?

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, would you please call the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to order?

And now, Mr. Speaker, here is what Mr. Bennett said, on June 24, 1930, as recorded in the London Free Press of the same date:

If we come to power, we will undertake and complete the St. Lawrence seaway.

He came to power and he did nothing. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) came into our area. He told us: I came here to admire the fine scenery of the Richelieu. He went into lower Quebec and did nothing

Mr. Speaker, there are three minutes left before the house adjourns. If our friends are sincere, I shall resume my seat and ask them to vote in favour of the Richelieu waterway project.

Mr. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, we heard the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) state that government members should stir up the people of the Richelieu area about the opportunity of developing a waterway. It seems to me, in view of his behaviour, that we have succeeded in stirring up the hon. member for Laurier.

If I had any advice to give to the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), I would tell him that it is not by indulging in buffoonery or talking as he did tonight that we will bring the government to consider the opportunity of constructing the Richelieu cut-off.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) gave a rather complete account of the situation. However I believe that he is putting the cart before the horse when he suggests the establishment of a board of engineers to study the matter. I believe it would be more realistic to establish a commission made up of representatives of manufacturing organizations, labour unions, shipping interests, railways, as well as of industrialists and economists, to study the opportunity of developing such a project.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that I know much more about existing unused canals than about future ones. When it is a matter of coming to a decision on the construction of such an important waterway, requiring a very large investment, it should not be taken without due consideration. A study made on the spot by engineers would not show whether the project is economically feasible not only for the Quebec region but for the country as a whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dupuis: Another bill talked out by a Conservative member from Quebec.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

(Text):

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what the business will be for the rest of the week, if it is possible to give it?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the business for the week that I outlined last Thursday still holds, but I will recapitulate. For Tuesday, the first item will be item No. 9 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport referring to the proposed railway line to Mattagami lake in the province of Quebec. The second item will be item No. 3 on today's order paper, the second reading of Bill No. S-3, to repeal certain laws relating to the signal station at Halifax. The third item will be item No. 5 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. C-61, to amend the Indian Act. If time permits we would take as the fourth item the setting up of the select committee on research and other related matters.

For Wednesday, I see no change in the program as announced.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

INDENTURED APPRENTICES—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Question No. 97—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Are indentured apprentices included in schedule M of the federal Vocational Training Act?
2. If not, has the government taken any steps to make indentured apprentices eligible to collect unemployment insurance benefits during their necessary training period in technical institutes?
3. Have representations been received from any group requesting that indentured apprentices be permitted to draw unemployment insurance benefits during their training period in technical institutes?
4. If so, from whom have such representations been received, and what reply was made?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. No. The training for indentured apprentices is provided under a special federal-provincial apprenticeship training agreement.

2. Yes. If an apprentice is unemployed and eligible for U.I.C. benefits before entering his regular training period in a training centre he may continue to draw these benefits.

3. Yes.

4. The minister of labour for Saskatchewan, Hon. C. C. Williams. In reply he was informed that this matter was under consideration, and as soon as a final decision was reached by the unemployment insurance commission, he would be advised.

GAETAN LALUMIERE

Question No. 98—Mr. Denis:

1. Is one Gaetan Lalumiere employed by the government at Laprairie, county of Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie, province of Quebec, in the unemployment insurance commission local office?
2. If so, what is his salary?
3. Are premises placed at Mr. Lalumiere's disposal by the government for the discharge of his duties?
4. If so: (a) what is the rental cost of such premises? (b) what is the name of the owner?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. Mr. Gaetan Lalumiere is not an employee of our local office but an agent of the commission at Laprairie.

2. $1 per application of benefit claimants.

3. No.

4. Not applicable.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 14, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

BOBCAT VEHICLE—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ORDER FOR PILOT MODELS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that a light armoured tracked carrier, known as the Bobcat, has been under development for the Canadian army for some time.

The Bobcat vehicle is designed in three basic forms; as an armoured personnel carrier, a cargo carrier and a self-propelled mount for the 105 millimetre howitzer, all built on a common chassis. These three basic types are further adaptable to meet many needs of the army such as weapons carriers, communications vehicles, ambulances, and for other operational and supply purposes.

In the past, mobility was provided by foot, wheels and tracks. The various components of the army moved separately but fought together. Now, because of the requirement to fight in widely dispersed small battle teams, this is no longer acceptable or practical, and battle teams must move, fight and live together. Therefore the basic philosophy behind the development of a family of vehicles with similar characteristics is to provide all parts of the team with an equal capability of movement.

The main features of these vehicles permit battle groups to move cross-country at 25 miles per hour, cross water obstacles without delay, and be protected from such battle hazards as small arms fire and shell fragments. In addition, a measure of protection is provided from effects of nuclear weapons.

Development having been successfully completed, it has now been decided to go into production of this vehicle. An initial order for 20 pilot models has been given to the original development contractor, the Canadian Car Company. The cost of the pilot models, plus production tooling, is estimated to be $3½ million. It is expected that the pilot models and production tooling will be completed in about two years. At that time open tenders will be called for the production of a further 480 vehicles.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Defence Production a question arising out of the statement of the Minister of National Defence with regard to the production of 20 pilot models of the Bobcat. Can the Minister of Defence Production indicate whether the development work will go to the Canadian Car Company in Fort William, inasmuch as it was indicated several years ago that this was a possibility?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): The indication that was given several years ago was as to possible production. Construction of the 20 pilot models will be confined to the Canadian Car Company in Montreal.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1959-60 POOL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement to make to the house regarding the 1959-60 wheat pool. This account is in a surplus position and the government, on the recommendation of the Canadian wheat board, is authorizing an interim payment of 10 cents per bushel on all grades of wheat delivered to the pool between August 1, 1959, and July 31, 1960. I might add that producers delivered 377,438,000 bushels to the pool. The interim payment of 10 cents per bushel will therefore result in the distribution of approximately $37,744,000 to producers.

Yesterday I announced that the 1959-60 oat pool had been closed and a final payment would be made of $3,852,323. The interim wheat payment and the final oat payment will result in the distribution of approximately $41,600,000 to producers in the very near future. The oat payment is being made now, and cheques will be issued immediately for the interim wheat payment. Of the total wheat payment $23,678,000 will go to producers in Saskatchewan, $9,213,000 to Alberta and British Columbia, and $4,894,000 to Manitoba and Ontario.

The 1959-60 barley pool will be closed sooner than expected because of recent sales. Consequently the Canadian wheat board will report to the government on the conclusion of the interim wheat payment in regard to a possible closing date for the 1959-60 barley account.

I might add that I would have had copies of this announcement available for the press gallery but there has been a little smoke and confusion in the Confederation building this morning.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): As I recall similar statements made last year and the year before, the actual gross amount of the payments will be practically the same. Nevertheless they will be welcome, at this time of year, to the western Canadian economy. I believe the per bushel rate of 10 cents is identical with what is customary at this time of the year, and I think the time of the payment does not vary much from past practice.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The announcement today will come as no surprise. In recent years it has become rather a routine thing to make an interim payment of this size at about this time of year in respect to the previous year.

It is my opinion that the new Minister of Agriculture might try to make such payments at an earlier date. It is also my opinion that the minister should make greater haste in concluding the crop year in question, and make the final payment available in the very near future.

I can only say that the size of this payment and the likely size of the final payment emphasize again that at a time when agricultural costs continue to rise, the price of wheat remains almost identical with that in previous years, and the farmers' request for deficiency payments is to that extent strengthened.

UNITED NATIONS

EXPRESSIONS OF SUPPORT FOR SECRETARY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs; I am not sure who would like to deal with it. It is whether the government would reject the vicious attack made, according to reports, on the Secretary General of the United Nations by Moscow this morning, and repudiate this effort to destroy his position and give an assurance of the strong support of this parliament for the work of this dedicated international servant.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): About noon today there were disturbing press reports, attributed to the Tass agency and as yet unconfirmed officially, that the Soviet union had withdrawn its recognition of Mr. Hammarskjold as United Nations secretary general and called for his dismissal. In addition, the Soviet statement demanded an end to the United Nations operation in the Congo within a month and the withdrawal of all foreign troops. It condemned Belgium and called for the disarming and removal of all Belgian troops stationed in the Congo and for the arrest and trial of Mr. Tshombe and Colonel Mobutu.

The measures demanded are linked to the death of Mr. Lumumba and his two companions. The secretary general has been described as "an accessory to and organizer of" that act of violence. This Soviet statement appears to be a culmination of the bitter but unfounded attack launched by the Soviet union against the secretary general late last summer and all during the autumn session of the general assembly.

Under the charter the Secretary General of the United Nations is appointed by the general assembly upon the recommendation of the security council. Mr. Hammarskjold's reappointment in 1957 for a further five-year term had the support of all five permanent members of the security council, whose recommendation was approved by the general assembly.

Any unilateral action by the Soviet government can have no legal effect on the position of Mr. Hammarskjold, but it is of course deplorable that at a time of grave crisis for the United Nations one of the permanent members of the security council should choose to withdraw its support and recognition from the chief administrative officer of the organization. This can only add greatly to the difficulties facing the United Nations in the Congo.

This is not the first time that the Soviet union has acted in this way. Mr. Hammarskjold's predecessor suffered much the same treatment, mainly because of the part which he necessarily played in relation to the United Nations action in Korea. Happily the United Nations survived that Soviet assault on its integrity, and the world's best hope lies in its survival of the present crisis.

For its part the Canadian government will continue its firm support for the United Nations effort in the Congo and for Mr. Hammarskjold, who in the face of the greatest difficulty has served the high principles and purposes of the charter with courage, determination and endless patience. His devotion to duty merits strong and full support from all member states who have the best interests of the United Nations at heart.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I thank the minister for the statement he has just made and ask if he does not agree that a major—though not, of course, the only—difficulty facing the United Nations intervention in the Congo has been the policy of the U.S.S.R. itself?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, throughout there have been attempts made time after time to prevent the effective conduct of the United Nations operation in the Congo. The Leader of the Opposition is quite right when he draws attention to what has been done practically from the beginning of that United Nations operation.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister arising out of the informative statement he has made in support of the Secretary General of the United Nations and of the United Nations organization itself. If I may be out of order for one sentence, I should like to say to the minister that I am certain that in the government's support of Dag Hammarskjold in carrying out the policy of the United Nations the government has the support of all Canadians.

As a supplementary question I should like to ask the minister if he could inform the house whether or not Canada has arrived at an opinion as to the advisability of setting up a Congo trusteeship under the United Nations in order to bring peace to this land.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, there have been suggestions made that a course of that kind should be followed, but it is too soon yet to say what actual plan will be adopted. We are consulting various other governments about the situation and are also letting the Soviet government know our views concerning the action they have taken today.

Mr. Argue: Canada has not an opinion formulated at this moment as to the need of strengthening the United Nations in the Congo through support of a trusteeship?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker, we have not decided as yet whether a course of that kind should be followed.

CONGO—REQUEST THAT SPECIAL ALLOWANCES FOR SERVICE PERSONNEL BE RETROACTIVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Defence assure the house that the special allowances introduced for Canadian service personnel in the Congo will be made retroactive to the time of arrival of such personnel in that country?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the announcement was made some time ago that these allowances would be effective as from December 1 last. I think that is quite definite.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does that mean that personnel who arrived, say in October, would not receive their supplementary allowances until December?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, practically all the force that went out to the Congo has served there for six months, or will have served there for six months or more. Therefore, except for a relatively small number of people who returned in the early stages after being there for only a short time, they will all qualify for these allowances.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether he has received a request from Colonel Smith, officer commanding the Canadian signal unit in Leopoldville, for reconsideration of the December 1 date.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I have not received any request along that line, though I did see a newspaper account to the effect that such a request would be made.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—SUBSIDY FORMULA RESPECTING TERMINAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. At the present time the council of the city of Vancouver is considering the alternatives of either financing the $15 million terminal building required at the Vancouver international airport itself, or submitting another referendum to the Vancouver city voters on the question of selling the city-owned portion of the airport to the federal government so the federal government could construct the airport terminal.

Can the Minister of Transport indicate the subsidy formula of the federal government if the city undertakes to finance the construction of the terminal building itself?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at municipally operated airports served by scheduled service, the municipality may ask for a grant to assist in the construction of a municipal terminal building. We require to be satisfied that the plan for the building is reasonable in relation to traffic requirements. Subject to this, any grant would cover the cost of providing the space in the building required for federal government staff—for example, customs, immigration and health staff—as well as working space for the Department of Transport employees who may be required to carry on functions in the building, primarily meteorological offices, air traffic control offices, and telecommunications offices.

This is not the policy which was in effect originally when discusions were first initiated by the city of Vancouver about sale of the airport some eight or nine years ago, but it is the policy we have now been following for several years.

In the case of Vancouver, my department already has its own building on the airport which we are in the process of extending, and which provides office space for virtually all Department of Transport personnel. The principal space for which a grant might be given under the foregoing formula, therefore, in the case of a new terminal building at Vancouver would in all probability be space required for inspection services.

RAILWAY SERVICE BETWEEN DORVAL AIR TERMINAL AND MONTREAL

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question.

Could the minister tell the house whether he has read a report published in the week end newspaper Dimanche-Matin of February 12 that the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. might operate a passenger train on their tracks between the airport and downtown Montreal, to provide a very much faster service than by car or by bus.

If so, would the minister state his opinion to the house on that suggestion?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I might say that off-hand the hon. member's suggestion certainly seems to have much merit, and I want to tell him that I will be pleased to pass it on to the C.N.R. and C.P.R. managements.

DORVAL—ORDER IN COUNCIL RESPECTING HANDLING OF LUGGAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Some time ago I asked him about the petition of the professional Sky-Caps at Dorval airport—

An hon. Member: Why don't you ask it in French?

Mr. Chevrier: —and if it had received—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Laurier has the floor and I would hope hon. members, particularly those who are sitting behind him, will not make it impossible for him to exercise his right as a member to speak.

Mr. Chevrier: I desire to interrupt the question I was asking, to raise a question of privilege. You have interrupted the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, because this is not the first time that he has not only interrupted those of us who ask questions here but has addressed improper remarks to those who sit on the front benches.

The remark he used a moment ago was to the effect why do I do not ask the question in French? I should like to say it is my privilege to speak in either of the official languages, and I am not to be threatened or told which of the two languages I should use.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Would the house please give a hearing to the hon. member, who is raising a point of some consequence?

Mr. Chevrier: I use the word "threatened" knowing its full meaning, because the threats have come from the rear of us on repeated occasions. I do not intend to go into them, but I can if I am asked. I have a list of all the interruptions. Unfortunately it has not been possible for Your Honour to hear them because they are made in such a low tone that only those of us who sit here can understand them. I hope Your Honour will put an end to this foolishness.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member proceeds, may I say that I heard an interruption but I did not identify the member who made it, nor has the hon. member for Laurier done so; but in view of what he has said I think it is proper to indicate to the house that it is entirely contrary to the rules for members to interrupt from their seats. If members have an interruption which they feel they could properly make, they should rise; and it is particularly important in view of the arrangement of the seats in the house that hon. members in the section referred to should observe the proprieties when a member is speaking from the front bench.

Mr. Ricard: On this point, I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that time and time again the hon. member for Gloucester speaks from his seat, interjecting remarks that are sometimes very bad.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe will agree with me that such rules as there are apply equally to all hon. members. I hope it will not be necessary for me to draw attention again in the house to what, in the view of the hon. member for Laurier and from my own observations, has caused some degree of difficulty in conducting debate in the way it should be conducted.

Mr. Chevrier: The question I desire to ask the Minister of Transport is whether he has had an opportunity to consider the petition which was placed before him by a delegation of professional Sky-Caps at Dorval airport; what the reaction to that petition has been, and whether the order in council which was drawn up by his department has been considered with a view to determining if it infringes the bill of rights as well as property and civil rights in the province of Quebec?

(Translation):

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have examined with great interest the brief handed to me by the people concerned, and I have submitted it to my legal department. However, we shall continue the talks with members of this association, as well as with their former employers; I hope to be in a position to report to the house on this matter in a near future.

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): I should like to put a supplementary question. Could the Minister of Transport send a translation of this question to the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier)?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Transport a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether in addition to referring this case to his own legal officials he is referring it to the Department of Justice to see whether it is in keeping with the provisions of the bill of rights?

Mr. Balcer: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister consider doing such a thing and referring it to the Department of Justice?

Mr. Balcer: This is under examination. If we see the need we shall not hesitate to do so.

Mr. Argue: Perhaps I might address a question to the Prime Minister, then. Is it not in keeping with the bill of rights that an order in council which takes legislative—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Assiniboia knows that an opinion, particularly a legal opinion as to the interpretation of the bill of rights, is not an appropriate subject for a question and cannot properly be sought on the orders of the day.

Mr. Argue: I might, then, put the question in another way having to do with government practice. Is it the practice of the government at any time to refer orders in council to the Department of Justice so that it may be determined whether they are in keeping with the spirit of the bill of rights?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): It is not. The Department of Justice, through the Minister of Justice, examines all orders in council that are passed. If in the opinion of the minister or of his department they contradict or invade the terms of the bill of rights, a report is made to the house accordingly.

Mr. Argue: Then I should like to put a further supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. On what grounds has he referred the order in council to the legal officers of his department if it has already been approved by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to me to be undertaking to cross-examine the minister. I thought the initial question asked by the hon. member was not in order because, as I said, it involved a legal interpretation.

TRADE

EUROPEAN TRADING GROUPS—STEPS TO PROTECT CANADA'S POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the meeting being held by the United Kingdom and the members of the outer Seven with the members of the common market countries to discuss closer co-operation, if not union, between these two regional blocs, what steps has Canada taken to protect its trade position with these two groups?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, our representatives in Europe have for some time been studying these matters closely and keeping us informed on developments. I can assure the hon. member that the government is watching the development very closely.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question. Is the minister aware that in the communique issued by the common market after its meeting the other day there appeared the following words:

> The six governments are desirous of seeking, in the spirit of good will and friendship, all agreements susceptible of maintaining and developing exchanges with other European countries, in particular with Great Britain, as well as with the other countries of the world.

Does the government intend to take up this offer?

Mr. Hees: We have not waited until this time to take up this offer. Our representatives in Europe, particularly at Geneva, have been making it known to the countries of the Six and the Seven all along and for many months that we are very anxious to maintain our present trading relationship, and to increase trade with the members of the Six and the Seven.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF A NORTH AMERICAN COMMON MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Trade and Commerce any comment to make on the proposal made yesterday in Toronto by the former secretary of defence of the United States for the establishment of a North American common market?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, I have not, Mr. Speaker. Obviously Mr. McElroy was speaking in his capacity as a private citizen. As always, the members of this government and myself are interested in speeches and statements made by distinguished gentlemen like Mr. McElroy. I do not wish to make any comment.

JAPAN—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the minister inform the house whether the Japanese Canadian trade negotiations are still in progress, and could he report to the house whether any agreement or understanding has been reached?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, these negotiations come more directly under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Finance. Perhaps the hon. member for Assiniboia would direct his question to the Minister of Finance when he returns to the house. I am sure he will be back tomorrow.

COAL

RAND REPORT—STUDY BY INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Can the minister advise the house whether the interdepartmental committee set up to advise the government on the Rand report has completed its study? If so, if the minister in a position to report to the house on the recommendations made by the said committee?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I was advised this morning by one of the officials of my department, Dr. W. E. van Steenburgh, who is on that committee, that they are progressing with their study and he expects that the recommendations to the cabinet will be made within a few weeks.

Mr. Robichaud: In view of the urgency of the situation, can the minister ask this committee to rush its report? A few weeks will still delay the action of the government.

Mr. Comtois: I have made this request of the committee much more often than the hon. member for Gloucester has asked the question in this house.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question arising out of this one which I would like to direct to the Prime Minister. In view of the recent announcement made by the Prime Minister, or someone on behalf of the government, that assistance will be given to keep certain collieries open in Cape Breton until May 31, may I ask whether a decision has been reached by the government not to accept the recommendation of Mr. Justice Rand that any mine closures should be spread out over a period of five to 10 years?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is a proper question on this occasion before the orders of the day. I will simply say that when we are in a position to announce a policy based on the Rand report or otherwise it will be announced.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO THE GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS VOTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to put a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. La Presse was the first paper to announce yesterday that the Associate Minister of National Defence is supposed to preside at a card game tonight in the Maisonneuve-Rosemont riding.

Can the minister tell us whether the government has decided to provide the voters with games for lack of bread?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, I must say that I am unable to attend the card game over which I have been asked to preside in his constituency. It would have given me great pleasure to meet many of his voters.

In reply to the second part of his question, it is a fact that the party of which I am a member seeks whenever possible to look after the welfare of the people. We also try, when the opportunity arises, to spread around us happiness, pleasure and hope.

Such a position obviously stands out against the policy of sadness and despair professed by our opponents.

[Later:]

DISPENSATION OF FAVOURS TO ELECTION ORGANIZERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Has he read in yesterday's La Presse the account of a meeting where the minister is reported to have said that, in order to win an election, one has to dispense favours and that he himself, in his own organization, has 32 vice prisidents.

Could he—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fortin: You are being utterly ridiculous.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not just sure at what stage the hon. member's comments would be relevant, but certainly not at this stage.

(Translation):

[Later:]

PROFICIENCY OF ORGANIZERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I should like to raise a question of privilege. It has to do with a question asked a moment ago by my good friend, the member for St. Denis. The hon. member asked me to comment on a report which appeared, he said, in La Presse of yesterday and which dealt with a speech I delivered in Montreal Sunday afternoon.

In the first place, I was not aware that reporters from La Presse were attending. In the second place, I feel I must state that, as far as my organizers are concerned, I said I could count on at least 32 vice-presidents, members of my organization being so able.

And now, Mr. Speaker, as regards my own ability and that of my fellow organizers—

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister is taking some time to arrive at a question of privilege which merits presentation in the house. If there is some reflection on his conduct which in his view amounts to a question of privilege, perhaps he will state it.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, the question of personal privilege I raised is simply this. I wish to dispel the false impression that may have been created among the public and the members of the House of Commons by an item which was published in yesterday's issue of La Presse and which was not an accurate report of what was actually said.

My second question of personal privilege has to do with the apparent attempt by the member for St. Denis to cast doubts on my ability or that of my colleagues from an electoral point of view. I feel that he will find his answer merely by recalling what happened on March 31, 1958.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I think I am entitled to explain that the statement I quoted was in quotation marks—

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will please be seated. I see no question of privilege which warrants the taking of the time of the house, and I take it the matter requires no further comment.

[Later:]

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Associate Minister of National Defence whether he is now a member of the "Misquoted Club"?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day is not the time for questions of that kind to be introduced.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SCARBOROUGH-MARKHAM—CONTINUATION OF COMMUTER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he any comment to make concerning the application of Canadian National Railways to the board of transport commissioners to discontinue commuter service in the Scarborough and Markham sections of the Toronto to Belleville train service?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I am very pleased to advise the hon. member that following his repeated representations, the management of Canadian National Railways has decided to leave undisturbed for the time being the commuter service on this section of the Toronto-Peterborough-Belleville run.

PUBLIC WORKS

VANCOUVER—EXTENSION OF STANLEY PARK SEAWALL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received a letter from the Vancouver board of parks and public recreation with regard to the elimination from this year's estimates of provision for the further extension of the Stanley park seawall? If so, can the minister advise whether any action in this regard is contemplated?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the question clearly and I will accept it as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RAILWAY DISPUTES—SUGGESTED REVISION OF LABOUR LAWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. My question is based upon a news item in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that in its presentation to the MacPherson royal commission on transportation the C.N.R. has indicated that there is an urgent need to revise our labour laws in order to give better effect to the resolution of labour disputes in the railway industry. I wonder whether the minister is able to comment.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker it all depends on what way they want the labour law revised.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I allowed the hon. member to finish his question. It seems to me that he was asking on a matter of general policy a question which he could hardly expect to have answered on the orders of the day.

[Mr. McGee.]

HOUSING

SASKATOON—REPORTED POSTPONEMENT OF LOW RENTAL PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is he in a position to confirm or deny the news item that appeared in today's Globe and Mail to the effect that a postponement in construction of a 100-unit low rental housing project has resulted from a change in federal government policy?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have not received notice of this question but I have knowledge of the subject matter, I believe. Is this the matter in Saskatoon?

Mr. Garland: Yes.

Mr. Walker: Yes. There the limited dividend project was found to be larger than the needs of the community required at the present time, so it was cut down to 50 units, as a result of which the person who applied for the 100 did not wish to proceed with them. There has been no change in government policy since we made our announcement to the house on government policy with the ensuing legislation last November.

While I am on my feet may I answer a question asked by the hon. member for Nipissing last week as to why we did not go along with the United States program. In reply may I say this. We had the largest January in history in loans, whereas in the United States in the last month for which we have any figures, namely the month of December, their loans were down 50 per cent.

Mr. Garland: Now that several items have been introduced, Mr. Speaker, perhaps we can deal with them. However, I should like to come back to my question, which was based on an item in today's paper to the effect that this project had been cut as a result of government policy, and it refers to an increase in the equity—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Garland: —required from the contractor. I should be glad if the minister would comment on that particular item.

Mr. Walker: Yes. There has been no change in government policy. There was a winter work program in connection with limited dividend loans by which 10 per cent of the equity was required. This policy came to an end in January and we revert to the regular equity of 15 per cent. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. Garland: Yes. Is any consideration being given to maintaining that figure at 10 per cent?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, we consider at all times, all things and all possible matters incidental to housing, as my hon. friend must have appreciated by this time. However, we certainly have no intentions of again changing the program in connection with limited dividend projects.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED REFUSAL TO ACCEPT MACHINE PRINTED MONEY ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Will he comment on a report in yesterday's Ottawa Journal to the effect that the money orders issued and printed by the department's electrical machines are being refused when presented to postmasters all over Canada?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read the article carefully he would have noticed the final observation, which was to the effect that this was just an indication that the department is moving so quickly in its mechanization and development that in some cases, particularly in the United States, they are not aware of how fast we are going and have not caught up with us.

Mr. Denis: A trip to the moon.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I could ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question. Can the Postmaster General say how soon he expects to have no employees at all in the department?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO CHIROPRACTIC REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether the chiropractic profession will be represented on the royal commission studying health insurance, and also whether consideration is being given to the inclusion of chiropractic services in any national health program?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the first portion of the question is concerned, may I say that a number of professions have suggested the inclusion of their members in the personnel of the commission. I refer to the medical, dental, and nursing professions, chiropractors and the like. If representation were to be secured from each and every one which has a contribution to make to the commission, it would be a rather large commission. The omission of any one of the professions from the personnel of the commission will in no way constitute any suggestion that the profession in question is not making a good contribution.

As to the second portion of the question may I say this. When the commission has made its report the question of the problem of health insurance will have to be considered by the government in the light of the recommendations made.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—CONSIDERATION BY PARLIAMENT REGARDLESS OF B.C. AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government proposes to submit to parliament, and particularly to the committee on external affairs, for consideration during this session the Columbia river development treaty, regardless of the fact that an agreement may or may not have been reached with the British Columbia government on this matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the leader of the opposition will realize that it is too early as yet to say, in view of the course of events in British Columbia, whether the agreement in question should be submitted to the committee.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In view of the question asked by the leader of the official opposition, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister which I had intended to ask of the Minister of Justice.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Justice in a recent series of public orations has stated that the Columbia development will produce, not only initially but over many years to come, a greater quantity of power at lower cost than is available from any other presently known source in British Columbia; and in view of the fact that Hon. Ray Williston, minister of lands and forests, recently stated in the legislature of British Columbia that cheap power will not be available from the Columbia for 20 years, would the Prime Minister inform the house which of the hon. gentlemen is telling the truth?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have followed the hon. member's argument with interest. It seems to me that he is anticipating the debate which will occur in respect to Columbia river matters in asking for an explanation at this time.

SHIPPING

REPORTED "LOSS" OF ICEBREAKERS IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Can the Minister of Transport say whether the federal government has lost four icebreakers in the gulf of St. Lawrence?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister no answer to the question?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hardly think this is a question that is worthy of an answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister's attention been drawn to an advertisement which appears in the Cape Breton Post of February 9 headed "Lost, four federal government icebreakers", according to which some responsible citizens of that community are advertising for these icebreakers? If not, I shall be glad to send it to the minister.

AGRICULTURE

SNAILS—STATEMENT ON PROMOTION OF HELICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, now that the joke period is over I will get down to very serious business. The hon. member for Kootenay West asked yesterday whether the government is giving any consideration to the promotion of heliculture in this country.

I looked at the dictionary and found that this meant snails. I also found that the hon. member asked a question of similar import last year which can be found on page 2352 of Hansard for March 23, 1960. I would like to inform the hon. member that there has been no reason to change the answer of that date as of now.

USE OF WHEY MILK POWDER IN MAKING BREAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house whether an order in council has been passed to the effect that four pounds of dried whey milk powder can be used as a substitute for two pounds of skimmed milk powder in the bread industry?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I understand the hon. member he is asking about the contents of an order in council which presumably will be proclaimed in the Canada Gazette and available to all hon. members in the same way.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is not an obligation on the government to publish all orders in council, but only certain orders in council as prescribed under the Regulations Act. I would not know whether the one the hon. gentleman is inquiring about would fall into that category, but it would seem to me to be a proper question.

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: The question is also asking for detailed information on a matter which does not appear to me to have the urgency which would necesitate being asked on orders of the day. However, if the minister is in a position to answer I have no objection.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I will take this as notice, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

LAKE SUPERIOR—STATEMENT ON RESTRICTION OF TROUT FISHING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Fort William asked me whether a proposal had been made to ban completely any trout fishing on lake Superior next year. The short answer is no. However, I would like to add that the great lakes fisheries commission is considering the recommendation of quotas to protect the remaining trout stock, but no firm proposals have yet been made. In any case these proposals would have to be dealt with by the province of Ontario and the individual states of the United States which border on lake Superior.

PENSIONS

RECOMMENDATIONS OF ONTARIO COMMITTEE ON VESTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he has had an opportunity of seeing the report of the special select committee of the Ontario legislature on portable pensions; and if he has, could he indicate whether their recommendations on vesting have any implications for his department in its pension study?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity of reviewing the report.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

MR. JOHNSON—REFERENCE TO HIS REPORTED ABSENCE FROM THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Yesterday the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) referred to the alleged absence of some hon. members and, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member raising a question of privilege arising from something said yesterday in the house? In that case I must inform him that he is too late to refer to that matter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—AUTHORITY FOR CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the C.N.R. Railway Company may construct a line of railway from a point at or near mile 72 of the Kiask Falls subdivision to Mattagami lake, in the province of Quebec, and to authorize temporary loans to the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, not exceeding $9,660,000 to enable the work of construction and completion of the railway line to proceed forthwith; and to authorize the company to issue and the governor in council to guarantee securities to finance the expenditures upon the said line up to the said figure.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, my statement will be rather brief because I think the resolution is relatively self-explanatory. I will have more details to give on the bill when we reach second reading.

This resolution is to approve the introduction of a bill to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct a railway line in the province of Quebec from a point located about 72 miles north of Barraute on the line of the Canadian National between Barraute and Chibougamau, in a northwesterly direction to a point in Galinee township, a distance of about 60 miles. The main function of this line would be to carry base metals from properties owned by Mattagami Lake Mines Limited near Mattagami lake. The line would eventually also serve a townsite of 3,000 to 5,000 people and would aid in the development of a potentially large mineral and pulpwood area. Its cost of construction is estimated at $140,000 per mile, or a total of $8,400,000.

Mattagami Lake Mines Limited plans to begin its mine production at the end of 1962 and will need rail service by that time. Since the construction of the line would take about two years to complete the committee will appreciate the importance of giving consideration to the legislation as soon as possible.

The bill which will follow the resolution will empower the Canadian National Railways to spend a sum not exceeding $9,660,000 on the construction of the line. This sum represents the estimated cost of construction which I mentioned earlier, plus 15 per cent for contingencies. The bill will also contain financial provisions similar to those adopted in the past for railway branch lines, and provide for the making of temporary loans by the government to enable the work to proceed forthwith and for the government's guarantee of the railway's securities issued in respect of construction.

When, in the course of the last session, my predecessor spoke in support of a resolution for the construction of the Toronto project by the Canadian National, he indicated that the government viewed with favour and proposed to give continued encouragement to capital projects that are submitted by the railway management and that can be recognized as self liquidating. The present project is of that category. The economic appraisal that has been made demonstrates that the railway revenue to be received from traffic engendered by the line will not only meet all expenses of operation and maintenance, the cost of handling such traffic on the remainder of the system, and amortization and interest on the cost of construction of the line, but will also produce a substantial annual surplus. The proposal is therefore one which will help in developing the resources of this country, and is also a sound one from a purely economic standpoint. I trust it will commend itself to all hon. members.

Perhaps the committee will permit me to add that when the bill that will follow the resolution has been given second reading I propose to move that it be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the resolution now under discussion divides itself into three parts. The first concerns the construction by the Canadian National Railway Company of a line from mile 72 in the vicinity of Kiask falls to Mattagami lake. The next is the expenditure involved, namely $9,660,000. The third part of the resolution has to do with authorization to the Canadian National Railways to guarantee certain securities.

Since this is the first piece of legislation which the new Minister of Transport has brought before us I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating him upon his appointment. I do so because I think the hon. gentleman is fortunate in having what in my opinion is perhaps the best portfolio in the service of the government. The hon. gentleman is also fortunate, I believe, in the quality of the officers he has in that department. All of them, from the deputy minister, Mr. Baldwin, right down to those who have less important tasks are loyal officers, and if the minister follows their advice I am sure he will not often go wrong.

I should next like to thank the hon. member for Villeneuve, who will make the main contribution from the opposition but who has allowed me to speak before him because of an engagement I have outside the committee.

This railway line is one which immediately commends itself to the opposition and for obvious reasons, such as I shall outline in a moment.

The railway is being built in one of the most promising areas of Canada. From the standpoint of mineral and other natural resources it is one of the finest areas in the province of Quebec. I refer to the Abitibi country. That region is one of the richest in natural resources in our province. Almost anything can be found in that area. There are good agricultural lands, minerals of all sorts including gold, copper, lead and zinc; there are tremendous reserves of forests, and above all there is hydroelectric energy in great potential.

It is the variety of these natural resources of all kinds which make this region interesting from the point of view of transportation and railway development. However, in order to assist in the development of the area an adequate system of transportation is necessary, because this area is not only far removed from the markets to which their products go but also because the rivers flow in a northerly direction whereas the products must move to the south. The development of this area goes back to the mid 1930's. It proceeded rapidly in the beginning, but that progress was temporarily interrupted during the war years which were responsible for a scarcity of materials.

In the post-war years private groups in the area established themselves because they were extremely interested in the development of the region. They were interested in its economic development and in the wealth that the natural resources such as minerals and forests could bring to their area.

At this point I think it would be well to pause for a moment to pay tribute to those private groups as well as their leaders for the tremendous interest they took in the economic development of their region. There is one who particularly stands out among them, Mr. Jean-Baptiste Lebel. I should like to pay tribute to him for the interest he has shown in this area and for the devotion which he and those associated with him gave to the development of this country.

The former Liberal administration had for many years foreseen the tremendous development which was about to take place in this region. Immediately following the war they began to make plans for a transportation system which have since been implemented in large part. The railway now under discussion before the committee is a branch line thereof.

The year 1946 saw the completion of the first railway line from Barraute to Kiask falls. A few years later it was clear that this line would not suffice and that additional transportation facilities would have to be constructed. Following the discovery of new mineral deposits it was necessary to extend the line, and in 1954 the government decided to add to the first line another line as far east as Cache lake and from there to Chibougamau and later to the lake St. John area at St. Felicien.

Upon construction of a railway from Chibougamau to St. Felicien, even at that time, it was quite clear that that line of railway, even though it was 300 miles long and even though it did help to develop a large portion of the natural resources, was not sufficient to give the area the railway system it required to take full advantage of its great potential assets. It was equally clear, sir, at that time that the line of railway from Senneterre to Chibougamau would sooner or later have to be extended by a branch line running in the direction of Mattagami lake.

However, at that time it would have been premature to have undertaken the construction of this branch line because the geological studies which were under way were not complete; neither were they conclusive. Furthermore—and I have no hesitation in making this statement— the former premier of the province of Quebec, the late Mr. Duplessis, was positively opposed to the establishment of a paper mill in that area which would have permitted the export of forest products which are to be found in large quantities in the area of lake Mattagami. Under those conditions the construction of a branch line to Mattagami would not have been a profitable enterprise and, therefore, at that time would have been premature. Today, however, the situation in the province of Quebec is entirely different. It has changed materially to the point that the construction of this line is now a necessity.

We on this side of the house are happy to approve the resolution; we are happy to support it because, as I said earlier, it is a complement, it is an adjunct to the transportation system that was established during the years that we sat on the other side of the house. We are happy to support it not only because it is a good thing for the region but because it is the natural consequence of the railway line started by the former Liberal administration.

But, sir—and I say this without fear of contradiction—what we do object to, and object to strenuously, is that by the construction of this line the government is blowing its top and stating that it is inaugurating a great national policy as if nothing had been done in the way of railway development prior to the year 1957. My reason for making that statement is a speech made on television by the Prime Minister on January 18. In that speech he spoke of the great and extensive national development policy which was being inaugurated by this government to make Canada vigorous, vital and strong. When he came to the province of Quebec—he took each of the provinces in Canada one after the other to indicate what was being done by the government—here is what he had to say:

> Well, there 300 miles of railway have been built by private enterprise.

That statement is inaccurate. There have not been 300 miles of railway built by private enterprise since this government has been in office. The only railway in the province of Quebec built by private enterprise on the north shore is that known as the Quebec-Labrador railway. It is 360 miles in length, and it was opened to the public on July 31, 1954, three years before this government took office.

Mr. Balcer: What about the Port Cartier railway?

Mr. Chevrier: I will come to that. The question now being put to me is, what about the Quebec Cartier Railway? Well, the Quebec Cartier line linking Port Cartier to Gagnon was opened on December 30, 1960, and is 193 miles in length; it is not 300 miles, as the Prime Minister said on television to all the people of Canada. That statement, sir, was inaccurate and should be corrected in the house.

Furthermore, the Prime Minister went on to tell us about the new Mattagami branch project which was being inaugurated by the C.N.R. as if this was something extraordinary. Well, it is a line that we will support because it is a good thing for the area, but I suggest to those who sit on the other side of the house that in the first place they should not make inaccurate statements, and in the second place they should not get so excited about those tremendous developmental projects which were inaugurated long before they came into office.

This is another example of the way in which those who sit on the other side of the house proceed. Listen to this speech made by the Minister of Agriculture on television on February 19, 1960, when he was minister of northern affairs and national resources. Here is what he said, and this coming from a minister of the crown is really fantastic:

> Generally speaking, in the last 50 years, there has not been any new railroad building by government, with the exception of the railway to Churchill and the P.G.E. The provincial governments were busy building roads to meet the needs of the people who lived in their provinces. Therefore, the forward motion of our economic expansion had ceased, and the country was settling down to a consolidating in areas where people lived.

How a responsible minister of the crown could make a statement of that kind when he knew, or should have known, that the former government built at least 700 miles of railway during the few years they were in office.

Mr. Fortin: Twenty two.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to put on record what they did. First there was the branch line from Barraute to Kiask falls and Beattyville, 55 miles in length, authorized by parliament in 1946.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I was wondering whether we were not straying away from the resolution. The resolution refers to a railway from a certain point on the Kiask falls subdivision to Mattagami lake. I do not think it refers to other railways to other places.

Mr. Chevrier: I submit to you, sir, with deference that this line of railway is being built by the Canadian National Railways; and on a resolution which is being sponsored by the Minister of Transport on behalf of the Canadian National Railways I have the right to put on Hansard other railway lines which were built by the Canadian National Railways on behalf of the government, and that is what I am doing now.

I was saying, sir, that next there was the Sherridon to Lynn Lake branch line in Manitoba, 155 miles in length, authorized by parliament in 1951. Third, there was the line between Terrace and Kitimat, British Columbia, 40 miles in length, authorized by parliament in 1952. Fourth, there were two more lines authorized by parliament in 1954, namely the line between Hillsport and Manitouwadge lake in northern Ontario, 27 miles in length, and the line running from Beattyville to Chibougamau and St. Felicien, 294 miles in length. Fifth, there was the line from Bartibog to Tomogonops, New Brunswick, 22 miles in length, authorized by parliament in 1956. Then there were two other projects initiated by the Liberal government in 1957, both approved, however, in the 1957-58 session of parliament. These were, first, the line from Optic lake to Chisel lake, 52 miles in length and the line from Sipiwesk to Burntwood river, 30 miles in length. The total mileage of these several branch lines undertaken by Canadian National Railways to which I have referred amounted to exactly 681 miles, and in the case of each of the eight projects which I have mentioned the line was built in order to develop the natural resources of the country and the areas which these lines serve and tap.

How a minister of the crown can make a speech on "The Nation's Business" and say that over a period of 50 years no railway construction has been effected is more than I can understand. It is indicative of some of the statements that are made from time to time on the other side of the house.

I should like to refer to another statement made by the present Minister of Transport when he sat on this side of the house. I refer to a debate which took place on April 26, 1955 having to do with a resolution concerning Canadian National Railways sponsored by a former minister of transport. As found on page 3179 of Hansard the present minister is reported as having said:

> In my opinion, a member from the province of Quebec cannot help noting the more or less favourable attitude of the Canadian National Railways toward our province. Among the Canadian provinces, Quebec is the one with the least trackage having regard to its population and, after Newfoundland, the province with the least trackage having regard to its area. In view of this treatment inflicted upon the province of Quebec, whether deliberately or not, by the management of the national railways any legislation which could remove from the control of parliament certain activities of the management of the national railways cannot but cause concern.

The question that comes to my mind is this. Has the Minister of Transport changed his opinion? Does he think that Canadian National Railways is still unjust and unfair to the province of Quebec, as he then stated in his speech? Well, he delivered a speech on February 12, 1961 to the Chibougamau chamber of commerce, and I should like to refer to what he had to say with regard to this very matter. I have here a copy of his speech as released by his office on February 12 of this year, and in it I find the following:

> One fact which deserves note in passing is that Quebec province comes before all other Canadian provinces for the number of thousands of miles of railroad constructed by Canadian National Railways since the end of the war. Is not that a proof of the confidence felt in the wealth not only of our province but also of our whole country?

Oh, how a change of office can also change the opinion of an individual.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I see that my friends are rather annoyed. They are annoyed because of the fact that there was an earlier debate in this house when they tried to divide this country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: —and one of those who were responsible for that attempt was one who tried to say that the construction of the main line of this railway was such as to bring traffic from the Abitibi country into the city of Toronto rather than to a destination in the province of Quebec. I am sure the Minister of Transport does not agree with that. Certainly he did not believe it when he made this statement two days ago at Chibougamau, at which time he had changed his views considerably from those he had expressed formerly in this house.

Mr. Balcer: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would be good enough to say to whom he is referring when he says that members have been trying to divide the nation.

Mr. Chevrier: I will be very happy to indicate to whom I had reference, and in doing so the Minister of Transport is absolved immediately. I had reference to the debate which took place on the two lines that were to be built and which brought about interruptions from the rear by these stupid gentlemen who insist on interrupting anyone who speaks from the front benches. I refer to the member for Chicoutimi of that time and one other member whose constituency I have forgotten.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to speak without all these interruptions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think it was mentioned a little earlier today that the hon. member who has the floor is entitled to speak and to be heard by all other hon. members. The Chair has recognized only one hon. member and that is the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I should like to come back now to the measure before the house and give the house another statement made by the hon. member for Three Rivers, as he then was, during the consideration of a matter introduced by my predecessor. As found on page 3180 of Hansard for April 26, 1955 he is reported as having said:

> The Canadian National now has a wonderful opportunity to contribute to the development of the province of Quebec through the construction of a railway on the north shore, whose mining and forest resources are practically limitless and where it would be possible to develop nearly seven million horsepower.

I could quote further but I do not want to embarrass the minister unduly. Now that he is responsible for the operations of Canadian National Railways I hope it will be possible for him to introduce legislation in the not too distant future respecting the construction of a railway on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. If he does, I can asure him now that he will have the wholehearted support of those who sit on this side of the house.

I should like to conclude my remarks by saying that we support the construction of the Mattagami lake branch line. We support it not only because it is necessary to the area, not only because it would seem to be a profitable venture, but also because it is a logical complement to the three lines which we as the former government constructed when we were on the other side of the house. Because of the attitude we take on this legislation I have no doubt that, should the minister feel it desirable at any future time to bring in legislation of a similar character, it will meet with sympathetic consideration from this side of the house.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the positive role of Canadian National Railways is very well exemplified by the resolution preceding the introduction of this legislation. We will support it, and we look forward to receiving more details from the minister at a later stage of the debate with respect to the economic information that led him and the cabinet to approve the legislation.

In the grand recital of the eight great projects which the former minister of transport gave, he mentioned one that has turned out to be not very economical, the line into Manitouwadge. A goof seems to have been made by that magnificent Liberal administration, and we wound up having not one branch line but two branch lines into the base metal resource at Manitouwadge, neither of which is doing very well. Certainly there is not enough traffic for both of them. I raise this point simply to indicate that sometimes these grand schemes are not so good in the long run as they appear to be in the beginning.

One of the points that immediately come to mind, of course, is that this is a large base metal area into which the line is going. The minister probably knows that there are peaks and valleys in the world production of base metals. In recent years Canada has moved rapidly ahead in this field, and the long term prospects look good, but in the short run there is every indication that we may have a saturation of the markets for the very metals that are going to be coming from this particular area, something which may mean that the line will be built, the area will be opened up, yet the mines themselves will languish.

We should like to hear more about the economic projection in this particular direction. Certainly if the line is going to move pulpwood we should like to know more of what the prospects are of pulpwood delivery, to what mills the pulpwood will be going, and whether the crown lands in the Mattagami lake area are held by any particular concern; how they are being cut off, what is the cost of pulpwood that is coming out of there, and whether it can compete with the pulpwood that is much closer to the mills. One of the factors that we have discovered in our part of the country, where we have extensive pulp and paper production, as is the case in Quebec, is that the farther away you get from the mill, all the railway facilities in the world will not enable you to compete in putting your wood down at the mill. Once a wood haul gets to be over 150 miles or 175 miles in length it becomes an extremely high cost one, even with the most efficient kind of rail handling. Again perhaps the hon. member for Villeneuve can enlighten us on what the prospects are in this particular regard.

The cost of the railway line seems to be quite low per mile for the terrain that one normally encounters in the Laurentian area. We should like from the minister some assurance that this is the maximum figure of approximately $140,000 per mile.

The last point upon which I should like to comment in connection with this resolution is this. Before the royal commission on transportation the former Quebec government made a presentation—as I remember it, Hon. Daniel Johnson actually made it—and the brief it seemed to me certainly expressed a chip on the shoulder attitude, an attitude indicating that the Canadian National Railways, the railways in general and the federal government had failed to come through for the province of Quebec in opening up its resource areas.

This matter has already been dealt with by the hon. member for Laurier in his own unique and Liberal way. I should appreciate hearing more about the position of the province of Quebec in this regard as it was expressed to the royal commission. It seems to me that we have two opposite positions, clarification of which I certainly should appreciate having. On the one hand we have a claim by the former minister that really the extension of rail lines in this country owed a tremendous amount to the great Liberal party, and in no place perhaps more than in the province of Quebec. This is his position. Now we have the brief before the royal commission, with which I am sure the minister is familiar, which indicates a completely different story.

As the hon. member for Laurier has pointed out, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture in his former role have taken a good deal of credit for a change in policy which is giving Quebec what it needs and wants. I think this would be a good time and a good occasion on which to have one of the government spokesmen from the province of Quebec set the record straight from their point of view; that is to say, set the record straight for those of us who do not wish to go down any particular party line and who would like to consider whether Quebec has been forced to languish without rail facilities in these resource areas, and if so why, and why the situation has changed at this time.

We think the resolution is a good one. We think the C.N.R. has a most positive role to play, and we only wish that this positive role could be emphasized more at a time when the road is under such severe criticism in other areas, and indeed when all railways are under such severe criticism. In northwestern Ontario the Canadian National Railways has played a marvellous part in the development of the resource industries, especially that of mining. Indeed, it seems to me that it is mining and the mining development that have made the C.N.R. through that part of the country much less of a money drain than many people feared it might be.

The Canadian National Railways has been under criticism by some of us in the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping for what we think is a retrogressive tendency in its dealings with labour and with the communities that fall within its particular orbit. There is not likely to be any question from the communities that may be affected by this rail line about the need for it. I hope the minister is aware of the fact that disillusionment later comes to communities that get on rail lines. I refer to disillusionment as to the services they get, the number of employees that may be involved and the security of their employment. I hope the minister may be able to give us some indication later on in the debate with regard to the number of people who are going to be involved in work, the number of trains, the running crews, the maintenance crews and what this will mean in population and job terms for the area.

In summary, we should like to have more information than the minister has given us at this particular stage. If necessary we shall hope to bring this information out by questioning at a later stage when we are going through the bill section by section in committee.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, it was indeed quite gratifying a few moments ago to hear the hon. member for Laurier mention that his party, like himself, would favour this completion of a railway line leading to the Mattagami district. For a while during his speech his tone almost intimated that he would not come out with the well received statement which he made toward the end of his remarks and for a while we had the impression that the hon. member was almost willing to oppose the construction of this railway line.

This attitude would have been most surprising because this railway line, as was clearly explained by the Minister of Transport, has been essential for a good many years, and will help to develop this northern region which is so rich and promising for the future of the province of Quebec and also for all of Canada. This indeed is a worthwhile project which will be welcomed by all those interested in the national development policy of this government, which wishes actually to give as much wealth as possible to the citizens of the nation through the development of the northern regions and all the other unexplored or still virginal territories of this great land.

Actually what surprised me most of all in the comments made by the hon. member for Laurier was his reference to the fact that some hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party sitting behind him had at some point in the past possibly advocated a policy which might lead to national disunity. It was indeed rather surprising to hear him speak in that vein, and we are not yet quite clear as to what exactly he was referring to.

Mr. Chevrier: You had better read the debates and you will find out.

Mr. Sevigny: I am coming to that in a moment. It seems to me rather curious that he should have been speaking in such a vein, and I would indeed appreciate it if at a further sitting of this house, or whenever he feels like it, the hon. member would give us some examples of this national disunity which he claims has been spread by these two members.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the associate minister wish me to do it now?

Mr. Sevigny: If the hon. member does not mind, I would prefer to continue my remarks. Perhaps after I have finished my remarks we could—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the Chair has been quite lenient in allowing the Associate Minister of National Defence to refer to some remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier. However, the resolution before us does not involve the question of what two members may have done. I think now that I have allowed the matter to be answered, the associate minister should come back to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, you are quite right, and in fact it was my intention to come back to the resolution before the committee. That is exactly what I planned to do.

We do not deny that during its long tenure of office the former government at times did something in order to give this country certain railway lines which it needed. We actually compliment them for having done that which was essential, and which was in line with the mandate they had undertaken when they took office. We wish to commend the hon. members for indeed having at times built some railway lines which helped in the development of this nation.

However, we are at a loss to understand why hon. members opposite object to the fact that we are rather pleased at having ourselves been able to do our share in this respect, and at having been able, since we have been in office, to help in the development of the railways of our nation through the construction of a considerable length of railway line certainly surpassing 200 miles and very close, if my memory is correct, to 300 miles.

At present we are very pleased indeed to be able to announce to the people of this nation that a railway line will be built which will link the Mattagami region with the other regions of this nation. What we cannot understand is why the hon. member for Laurier objects so much, as he does, to our statement that perhaps we are doing what should have been done earlier—

Mr. Chevrier: I am not objecting; I am for it.

Mr. Sevigny: —and is being so vociferous in his objections.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Don't interrupt.

Mr. Chevrier: —the associate minister is misrepresenting what I have said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: He states that the hon. member for Laurier does not seem to be in favour of the legislation. He has said that now on two occasions, and it is quite clear from my remarks, as well as from the preamble to them and their conclusion, that we on this side of the house support this measure.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think that is a point of order. It is a matter of contradiction, which could be dealt with at the end of the associate minister's speech.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Laurier, allow me to say that he possibly misconstrued the tenor of my words. I said, at the beginning of my short remarks, that we, on this side of the house, were very happy to note that the hon. member for Laurier and his colleagues of the opposition were finally coming out in favour of the proposed construction of the Mattagami railway. What we fail to understand, however, is that he should find it so strange that certain members of the house should object to statements of his and occasionally interrupt him or decide to raise some objections to his statements. After all, the hon. member for Laurier should be inured to certain opposition practices. May I ask him to go back a few years ago when this matter of railways was being dealt with in this house, and he will perhaps recall a debate which took place on Wednesday, May 19, 1954, and whose tenor was such that the following morning, Le Devoir felt compelled—

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I have no objection to the associate minister introducing this element. A moment ago you asked the associate minister not to do it because he was out of order, but if he wishes to do it I claim the right to reply to what he is now saying. This statement is entirely out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The translation from French to English was off for a few minutes, so I did not hear what the associate minister said. However, if he has again strayed away from the resolution I would ask him once more to come back to it, please. The translation system is now back in operation.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Laurier I wish to simply tell him this. He seems to object to the fact that certain members of this house object to certain statements he has made. I am simply in the process of asking him why he objects, since he is quite familiar with the debates on this question of railways which have taken place from year to year in this house.

I was at the point of referring to one particular debate which took place in this house on May 19, 1954, when the hon. member for Laurier was a member of the government. During this debate there were a great many objections on the part of the members of the opposition to which the hon. member for Laurier objected. The nature of his objections gave rise to an article which appeared in Le Devoir the next day, May 20—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not quite understand the associate minister when he says he is speaking to a point of order. I do not understand to what point of order he is referring. He says he is speaking to a point of order and then refers to something that happened in 1954, which at the moment I cannot see has anything to do with this resolution. If the associate minister would show me how it does, I would be very happy to hear him.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I have difficulty in speaking to the point of order because I do not believe there is substance in what the hon. member for Laurier has said in his point of order. I am simply, once again, saying that the present members of the house have just as much right to answer the criticisms of the hon. member for Laurier as he had at the time to answer the criticisms of those who were attacking him. If you do not consider this in line with the rules of the house I shall refrain from further remarks in this vein. I will simply confine my remarks to the fact that we are indeed very pleased to note the attitude of the hon. member for Laurier, who approves of the measure that is before us. We are also pleased to note that he agrees that this a progressive government that is working in the better interests of the people.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, building that railway line will facilitate the development of natural resources in the lake Mattagami area.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) had only a few remarks to make on the matter. However, I noted that he proposed to supply further information when the legislation comes up for second reading.

It would be most interesting, for instance, to know the result of operations for the Barraute-Chibougamau line, and that other line which connects Chibougamau with St. Felicien.

Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to tell us, on second reading, the earnings of the Canadian National Railways over those two sections, namely the line from Barraute to Chibougamau, and from that point to St. Felicien. In short, I would like to know the earnings for each of those sections.

Mr. Chairman, for the last five years there has been heavy prospecting in the Mattagami lake area. In fact, some 50 mining companies have been spending over 10 million dollars on prospecting and development work of all kinds, chiefly in the lake Mattagami district.

About a hundred mining properties have been tested. Geophysical, magnetic and electromagnetic work has been done. Geological surveys also were conducted on those sites, and diamond drilling took place on about 50 of the properties.

Therefore, for the past five years, a total of $10 million was spent in proving that some of those properties were well worth developing.

Two companies, among others, made major discoveries. The first and major one, the Mattagami Lake Mines Limited struck a deposit of about 21 million tons of metallic ore containing the following percentages: zinc: 12.76 per cent; copper: 0.68 per cent; silver, approximately 1.3 ounces per ton. While the gold content is low, it is not altogether valueless, assaying 0.018 ounces per ton.

On property bordering on that company's territory and belonging to the Orchan Mines

Limited a deposit of 6 million tons of ore has been discovered, of the following content: zinc, about 13 per cent; copper, 1.3 per cent; silver, 1.3 ounce per ton and gold 0.02 ounce per ton.

The enormous value of those two deposits is therefore readily realized.

The Mattagami Lake Mines Limited intends to build a plant with a capacity of 2,000 tons per day; the Orchan Mines Limited, on the other hand, proposes to build one with a daily capacity of 1,000 tons. Once those two plants are in production, they will put out the following quantities of metal per day: 375 tons of zinc, which means 750,000 pounds; 60,000 pounds of copper; 6,000 ounces of silver and 60 ounces of gold. Altogether, this represents a yearly production of 137,000 tons of zinc, 11,000 tons of copper, 190,000 ounces of silver and 21,900 ounces of gold.

At current prices for those metals the total yearly production is valued at about $40 million.

The zinc production of 137,000 tons represents 35 per cent of the total Canadian production at this time, which means therefore, that the Mattagami lake deposits are of outstanding significance.

I hope the house will welcome this resolution so that we way have the text of the bill as soon as possible.

Moreover, let us hope that there will be no delay in enacting the legislation, so that the contractor who has to carry out the work may start clearing operations as soon as possible.

The mining companies propose to develop the two most important deposits in the Mattagami lake area, the Mattagami Lake Mines Limited in the fall of 1962 and the Orchan Mines Limited in the latter part of 1963.

If the railroad is not completed by that date, mining development will naturally be delayed. Therefore, I hope that everything will be done so that this legislation may be passed with all possible dispatch.

Mr. Chairman, I have personally taken part in the development of that area. I am still keenly interested in this matter, even if the area involved is outside the constituency of Villeneuve. It is in fact located in the neighbouring riding, that of Chapleau (Mr. Martel), a vast territory.

We have been hearing about Mattagami for several years. It was mentioned in this house in 1954 at the time the building of the Chibougamau railway was being considered, and the matter was raised on many other occasions when it was always pointed out that the natural resources of this area were practically unlimited. They are indeed almost unlimited because, besides the two deposits I mentioned earlier, in 1958, that is a year after the discovery of a deposit by the Mattagami Lake Mines Limited, another Canadian company, the New Hosco Mines, discovered another rather substantial copper deposit quite close to the Allard river, a few miles to the northwest of the Mattagami mines. This deposit will no doubt be also developed in the comparatively near future.

A little closer to Mattagami Lake Mines, to the northwest, another Canadian company, the Radio Uranium Mines Limited, made a fairly important discovery with diamond borings. I am convinced that at this place a workable copper and zinc deposit will also be discovered.

A bit farther to the northeast, the Connest company has traced another deposit which is not to be ignored since it contains a fairly high percentage of copper and zinc, even though of lower grade than others discovered so far.

As far as mining is concerned, this area has hardly been touched to this day.

And now, in addition to those mining resources, the Mattagami area has almost unlimited timber resources. As a matter of fact I read in a recent report that timber resources in the Mattagami area amounted to more than 50 million cords of wood immediately available. Hence the importance of making haste in trying to develop natural resources in this area.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) mentioned in his opening remarks one of the pioneers of northwestern Quebec who deserved all our admiration, Mr. Jean-Baptiste Lebel. In fact, Mr. Lebel, in the course of his numerous activities in northwestern Quebec, has always advocated development in the Mattagami lake area.

For years he has been dreaming of a pulpwood industry there. Well, I believe that his dream is about to come true, since there has been talk of a very large lumber company from Quebec considering in the coming months the possibility of building a plant quite near to Mattagami lake, close to the eastern part of the area with which we are concerned. If this pulp-mill or paper plant is to built, it will probably require the construction of another branch line, from a point close to the Bell river, where the line I am referring to should cross the river, then northeast and probably as far as Anita bay, on lake Mattagami, the probable location of the paper mill now being advocated by Mr. Lebel.

Apart from those forest resources, there are great possibilities for farming. Land in the Mattagami area is very good, as has already been pointed out. Hundreds of farmers could easily settle there.

Naturally, today, there is no large-scale settlement in new areas, but we must think of the future. Once our mining industries are permanently established there, and if we should manage to have paper mills too, in that area, large-scale settlement will unquestionably be possible at that time.

A few years ago, it was estimated that the Mattagami lake area could absorb 15,000 farmers. I think it would sound a bit over-optimistic to say that those farmers will settle there within the next few years, but I feel that, 15 or 20 years from now, that many farmers will probably have located there.

A few years ago, that is in 1957, while the construction of the Chibougamau railway was being discussed, I said that the population in that area would rapidly increase. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, at that date, Chibougamau could boast of very few citizens; today, however, it is a flourishing city with a population of 5,000. I am sure that in a few years Mattagami will have a population that will compare with that of Chibougamau.

There is no doubt that all those mining developments will have attracted people anxious to see for themselves the developments of the north.

For my part, I have the honour of working at the planning of a mining town at Mattagami, on the shore of the Bell river, and I am anxious to stake out the first lot on which a building will be constructed to accommodate people who will be working in the mining developments.

In the last two years, the provincial government has been building an all-weather road. Around 40 miles of it were built under the Union Nationale government, and Mr. Lesage's government is now adding another 50 or 60-mile stretch.

An hon. Member: Charging new taxes.

Mr. Fortin: What a good example.

[Mr. Dumas.]

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fortin: On a 50 per cent basis.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, some hon. members talk about new taxes. I wonder whether there had been no taxes before in Quebec.

Mr. Fortin: They were lower.

Mr. Johnson: They were lower. Taxes were being paid by people who could afford to pay them. Today, they are being paid by those who cannot afford to do so.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, that hard-surfaced road will be completed within a month. Everybody in northwestern Quebec hope that this permanent road will be extended further north so as to allow the development of huge hydraulic resources located along the Nottaway river.

As for the railway line that will be built in the next two years, there is no doubt that the C.N.R. will be asked to extend it as far as James bay, because we now feel that the Bell river, south of Mattagami and the Nottaway river north of that point—represent the nerve centre of the district. This is where we find adequate hydraulic power to ensure the prosperity of northwestern Quebec.

Furthermore, all the rivers flowing into James bay flow through vast forests that will one day be developed. Obviously the timber cut from those forests will be floated down those rivers as far as James bay, and much of it will be processed locally, where paper mills will be built. Needless to say that the manufactured product will have to be shipped either by boat for part of the year, or by rail in the winter months. Therefore, we expect the railroad to eventually reach James bay at Rupert bay.

A fact that must not be overlooked is that, in addition to the mining and large forest resources in the Mattagami area, that are found all along the major rivers flowing into James bay, there are also considerable iron ore deposits on the Great Whale river, a little farther north. Those deposits will one day be developed and the sensible procedure would be to transport the ore southward along the Nottaway river.

Thus, the construction of the Chibougamau railroad was simply the beachhead of the development of the natural resources in northwestern Quebec. By building this branch line to lake Mattagami, we are establishing a second beachhead. That is why I repeat, as I said in my opening remarks, that I hope the house will support this resolution and that the members will assist in hastening all stages of the bill, so that construction may start as soon as possible.

Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), referred to lumber concessions in the Mattagami lake area.

In the immediate area around Mattagami lake, there have been no forest concessions, as yet. Those which have been officially established were located along Bell river, about half way between Senneterre and Mattagami. However, there is no doubt that if some companies decided to put up pulp mills there, the government would be able to guarantee them some lumber concessions to supply the pulp or paper mills for several years to come. There is no need to worry about that angle as the forest lots in the district, starting about fifty miles south of Mattagami lake and stretching towards the great north, have not been conceded yet. There are enough lumber resources in that area, I would say, to supply three or four paper or pulp mills.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I think that hon. members who are not familiar with northwestern Quebec districts will realize the importance of building that railway line. The cost will be under $10 million, whereas the two corporations I named at the start of my remarks, i.e., the Mattagami Mines Limited and the Orchan Mines Limited propose to spend over $40 million during the next three years.

We should also remember that the two corporations are ready to develop their own deposits; they also want that part—or rather the greater part—of those underground resources to be processed locally or, at any rate, within the province of Quebec.

For that reason, the two companies intend to build a zinc refinery with a daily capacity of 400 tons. Those two firms alone will produce 375 tons a day. It is therefore quite understandable that a zinc refinery with a minimum capacity of 400 tons a day is required because, in addition to the facilities of Mattagami lake, 200 additional tons of zinc are produced daily in various mines located nearby, in northwestern Quebec. It is therefore highly important that the zinc refinery be established as soon as possible, and we hope that it will be built in the Mattagami lake district. However, there may be certain factors which could cause the companies to decide otherwise. As far as I know, however, the firms concerned believe that, if economic conditions are favourable, the refinery will be established in that area, or rather, we have been assured that it will, at any event, be erected in the province of Quebec, which is a most important decision.

Mr. Chairman, you can see how important is the development of the Mattagami area which, as I said, is the nerve centre of northwestern Quebec. I am convinced that with the co-operation of everyone, we could develop this area, not only for the benefit of its own residents, but also for the benefit of the citizens of the province of Quebec and of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permite a question?

Mr. Dumas: Yes.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, my question concerns the access roads which, according to the hon. member, have been built or are planned by the government of Mr. Lesage. Could he tell the house whether those roads are built under a federal-provincial agreement or built solely by the provincial government?

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue is aware that the Union Nationale, during its administration did not deem it appropriate to co-operate with the federal government toward the construction of that road from Amos to Mattagami under the roads to resources program. But last summer, Mr. Lesage hastened to correct this situation, and he stated that his government was willing to enter into negotiations with the federal government concerning the section still to be built between Amos and Mattagami as well as the one built many years ago but which is in need of repairs on a distance of some 40 miles, from Amos and running to the north. As the parliamentary secretary knows no doubt, the two governments entered into an agreement last November. That agreement was signed in Quebec by the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Dinsdale) and by the minister of mines of the province of Quebec.

That road is under construction at the present time. Under the Union Nationale government, 40 or 50 miles had been completed. The balance of the road is now being built between Amos and the Mattagami Lake Mines Limited, a distance of about 105 miles, and from that point there is about 10 miles to the Hosco mine. That road, then will cover a distance of about 115 miles. From the Mattagami Lake Mines Limited to the new Mattagami village, or to the location selected for the establishment of the new village, another streach of five or six miles will have to be built, and this will be done, I believe, under the existing agreements between the Quebec government and the federal government.

Mr. Martineau: I thank the hon. member for the information he supplied. I put that question to him because in the course of his remarks he made no mention of the Conservative government's contribution to this important project.

Mr. Asselin: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

The Chairman: I am sorry but the time allotted to the hon. member having expired, the unanimous consent of the house is required.

(Text):

Is the committee agreeable to permitting further questions?

(Translation):

Mr. Asselin: Could the hon. member tell us the name of the engineering firm which makes the survey for the joint project?

Mr. Dumas: This question makes me laugh, Mr. Chairman. To answer it I will tell the hon. member that the department's engineers are those who do the civil engineering work for the construction of the road. But I see what my hon. friend is aiming at, and I must say to him that, as a surveyor, the government of the province of Quebec has asked me to do the surveying for the expropriation of certain parcels of land bordering on this new road from Amos to Mattagami. So, to help ease my hon. friends concern on this matter, I will read to him—I think I might give this explanation—

Mr. Johnson: I suggest that you do not need the member for St. Jean to prompt you.

Mr. Dupuis: Very well, Danny boy.

[Mr. Dumas.]

Mr. Dumas: No, no, it is quite all right. I have here a copy of the agreement signed by the government of Canada and that of the province of Quebec with regard to the construction of the road between Amos and Mattagami and I find the following at clause 9 of this agreement:

> The cost of these works will not include any amount paid by the province of Quebec towards the project after March 31, 1966 and in all cases will not include the payments made by the province of Quebec towards—

And I now read subclause (B):

> The purchase of an interest or any land interest in connection with the execution of the project, including compensation or indemnification for the obligatory taking over of the land or for the unfavourable soil of other lands;

So, it happens that the cost of this land expropriation is entirely paid by the government of the province of Quebec; the federal government will not pay a cent in connection with land expropriation. So, because I am a surveyor, I have been asked to do this work, which is carried out by a surveyor of the province of Quebec who is now working for me.

I think the hon. member does not have to be overly concerned about that.

Mr. Asselin: I just wanted to find out if there was any patronage, but since there is none—

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, this resolution introducing a bill to provide for the construction by the C.N.R. of a line of railway from a point near mile 72 of the Kiask falls subdivision to Mattagami lake, in my constituency, is of particular interest to me.

In my opening remarks, Mr. Chairman, I should like to emphasize that it is through the action of the Conservative government that this project is made possible, whatever our opponents may think. I would even say that, in my humble opinion, this project is brought into being at least one year sooner through the policy of our government which, as early as 1957, has taken an interest in the northern regions, as was stated by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Evidently, at that time they tried to ridicule the northern vision of our government, saying that it was an igloo to igloo program, but the resolution now before us proves that the Conservative government not only spoke about it, but took action in this regard. Besides, it does so not only in the province of Quebec, in northern Quebec, or in that area of my constituency where this railway will be constructed, but also in western Canada and in several other provinces of this country. In fact, the government considers also the construction of a new railway to the north of Alberta in the Northwest Territories, and we shall no doubt be asked to consider a bill to that effect as soon as the study is completed.

Therefore, it is with pleasure that, as representative of the constituency of Chapleau, I give my unqualified support to this resolution and I thank our government for having decided to carry out right now this important project.

I wish to congratulate most particularly the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) who has always supported the construction of that railway line, even before he took up his present duties. In addition, he deserves hearty congratulations for having had this important item of legislation introduced in the speech from the throne at the beginning of the present session.

As I said a moment ago, that shows the interest of the Conservative government and its leader in the development of the northern country. I for one was interested in that question as soon as I was elected—or I should say even before, when I was doing some prospecting work in that area—but more particularly since I have the honour to represent this constituency in this house. Besides, I had the opportunity to mention that question here in 1958, as did my colleague from the adjoining constituency who indicated very clearly the mining potential of that large area when the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys were before the house.

Mr. Chairman, I see that it is five o'clock and I wonder if I might move the adjournment of this debate before I resume my seat.

(Text):

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed with the consideration of private and public bills pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to standing order.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE VOTING AGE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-15, to amend the Canada Elections Act (age of voters).

He said: Mr. Speaker, while the bill in its form contains a number of technical amendments, the end it seeks is relatively simple, namely to reduce the age of qualification of electors from the present 21 years to 18 years. During the last session of parliament a complete revision of the Canada Elections Act was undertaken. The standing committee on privileges and elections made a complete perusal and review of the act and in that committee this subject matter was dealt with to a considerable extent. However, the committee was not of the opinion that it should recommend such a reduction to parliament.

As a preliminary comment I might add that in the committee itself there was some discussion about the question of legal age, as I understand it, of a person. It was to the effect that one under the age of 21 was not able to enter into a valid contract of purchase and the like, and the thought expressed was that these things should go hand in hand. It was thought that if the voting age was lowered there should also be a consequent reduction in the legal age. However, it was subsequently pointed out by members of the committee who were of the legal profession that this latter matter of the legal age, so called, is one of provincial jurisdiction rather than of federal jurisdiction, and I think perhaps we may only look at it in that light and in a general way.

A variety of reasons are put forward, to which I subscribe, as to why the age of electors should be reduced to 18. Perhaps the first one that comes to mind is that we have improved educational facilities. Over the years the average grade reached in school has been steadily increasing. I understand that the average person now reaches grade 10 or thereabouts. I understand that grade may perhaps increase further or that it may have increased since the last census. Because of improved communications more immediate contact with political events in this country and those in other parts of the world we are in effect approaching what is described as a smaller world. All in all, it means that our younger generations have increased opportunities to have firsthand knowledge almost of public affairs and of political matters not only in this country but in other countries of the world as well. With improved communication systems such as television, for example, the events that take place in other parts of the world are known to us almost immediately as they occur. I say that this quick means of communication gives our younger people a much better insight into political and public affairs and a more immediate knowledge and better understanding of them than was possible 20 years or 30 years ago.

I made inquiries of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), who is in the teaching profession or who practised the teaching profession before he reached this place, although some people may doubt whether or not he engages in that sort of activity. Nevertheless, there is a situation that prevails in Ontario and I understand that it prevails in Manitoba, from information given to the committee last year by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk); and I am given to understand that it prevails in other provinces also. In Ontario, it is not uncommon to find people entering the teaching profession at the age of 17, 18 or 19 or thereabouts. These teachers in fact engage to some extent in the teaching of history and of current affairs but they themselves are not in a position to vote.

It is not uncommon to find university students of the age of 18 or 19 or thereabouts. In universities the question of political activities is gone into far more extensively. For instance, just the other day a group of political science students from Queen's University visited the parliament buildings. Many of them were under the age of 21. Mock parliaments are in existence in practically all the universities in the land and, I understand, to a slight extent even in the latter years of high school in some places. All of these things tend to put the individual who is under the age of 21—that is the legal age to vote—in closer and more immediate contact with public affairs and to give him a better understanding of those affairs than was possible a number of years ago.

We consider that a person of the age of 18 is mentally and physically capable of participating in the war effort when it has been necessary in the past to draw him into that field of activity, and we still think in those terms. Likewise, I think we should consider that he is capable of exercising the same degree or a similar degree of political judgment that a more mature person or a more elderly person might be capable of exercising.

[Mr. Howard.]

I realize that people who are in the armed forces can vote. However, I should perhaps emphasize that what I am getting at is this. If parliament is of the opinion that persons of the age of 18 have the abilities, mental and physical, necessary to participate in the armed forces, then we should also consider that they have the qualities and the abilities necessary to participate in electing candidates. I consider that extension of the right to vote is merely an extension of our right in a democracy by providing these persons of 18 years of age an opportunity to participate openly and fully in electing members of parliament to represent them in the House of Commons.

The speed-up in our economic activities coupled with intensified education tends to draw people into the working force at a younger age than formerly. It tends to draw them into marriage at a younger age. It tends to draw them into the taxation field at a younger age by their mere entry into the working force. I submit that it tends to draw them into political activity as well, especially in some provinces in Canada which have a lower voting age than that which is provided under our Canada Elections Act.

I might perhaps in that regard make brief reference to some information which was given to the committee on privileges and elections during the last session and which was also entered on the record in a specific debate in this house during the last session. In the province of British Columbia and the province of Alberta the voting age is 19. In the province of Saskatchewan it is 18. In the province of British Columbia I participated in a provincial election as a candidate when the voting age was 19 and since that time I have participated in a provincial election in which I was not a candidate but which was held just recently, and the voting age was still 19.

We have found—and I am sure the same things have been experienced both in Alberta and in Saskatchewan—that there is a feeling of greater satisfaction on the part of the people in this age group in having the opportunity to participate in the great democratic process of electing M.L.A.s and governments in those provinces. There do not appear to be any difficulties whatsoever that have flowed from the electors in those provinces having the right to vote at the ages I mentioned.

Perhaps I could also indicate briefly the situation in other countries and other states from the material which was placed on Hansard last session. I would point out that the voting age is 18 in the states of Georgia and Kentucky in the United States of America; in Bulgaria; in Venezuela; in Mexico, if married; Bolivia; in Costa Rica if one is married or a teacher; and also I understand in the Union of South Africa, although I would not use that political situation there as an argument to warrant our following suit.

In the state of Alaska it is 19; in Costa Rica, for other than married men and teachers, it is 20. There are a great many countries like Great Britain and New Zealand where the age is 21. There are some countries in which the age is higher than 21, notably Turkey, where it is 22; Denmark, where it is 23; and the Netherlands, where it is 25. This is information compiled from the Statesman's Year Book of 1959. I do not know what the current situation is, but I assume it is somewhat the same.

At the last session, Mr. Speaker, you will recall, as will other hon. members, that when we were considering third reading of the bill to amend the Canada Elections Act the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) moved a technical, procedural type of motion that the bill should not be read a third time then but should be referred back to committee for the purpose of reconsidering this question of lowering the voting age.

We had a division in the house on that amendment. The Liberals and ourselves voted together to, in effect, reduce the voting age. The Conservative members voted that it should not be reduced at that time, and there was some reasoning given as to why that course of action was followed by the Conservative members who participated in that division.

That reasoning was given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and perhaps I might be allowed to quote some of his remarks from Hansard of last year in this regard. I use them to say that I accept the invitation extended by the Prime Minister last session and think it is perhaps the course that we might well follow at this stage in order to bring a full, complete discussion and consideration of this matter in accordance with the time honoured practice of dealing with amendments to the Canada Elections Act.

I will quote from the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister as reported at page 6279 of Hansard of July 14, 1960. Here the Prime Minister, referring to the amendment to which I referred earlier, said:

> I think it is one of those things that might very well be studied in detail by a committee at a subsequent session of parliament,--

Then he said:

> In a subsequent session I will join with hon. members in giving the membership of the house an adequate opportunity to fully explore all the considerations relative to this question;—

I think the course suggested by the right hon. gentleman on July 14, 1960 should apply to this session. This is a subsequent session and I think this would be a proper course to be followed. I have indicated on other occasions this should be the course to be followed with all public bills introduced by private members, but especially is it so in this case because we have the endorsation of that course by the right hon. Prime Minister.

While he may quibble, as perhaps he sometimes does, as to precisely what he meant —he may quibble that this is not the subsequent session to which he referred—none the less this is a subsequent session and it is the first one since 1960. Because this is such an important matter, because it relates to the right of people in the nation to participate in electing members of parliament and governments, because of the reasons I expressed earlier, because this is so much an integral part of our maintenance of democracy I think this should be classified as the subsequent session to which the Prime Minister referred. While he and I may have differences of opinion about some things sometimes, on this one we are in complete accord. I think that after the bill has been given second reading—I do not think there is any doubt about its passage—it should properly be referred to the privileges and elections committee for adequate and detailed study.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, following the line of argument the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) was developing there is one matter that occurred to me following my perusal of the committee report of last year. I was a member of that committee. Unfortunately I was unable to be present the day this particular matter was discussed in the committee. However one thought occurred to me while the hon. member for Skeena was referring to the remarks of the Prime Minister. The hon. member made reference to what particular subsequent session might be the most appropriate time to examine this question. With the census being taken this year and with information which, to say the least, would be most pertinent to any examination of this question, perhaps the hon. member might restrain his enthusiasm for this inquiry until we have more comprehensive and more up-to-date information.

I recall that earlier in his remarks, when he was attempting to evaluate one aspect of this question, he made reference to the census and the fact that the results of that census would give us more complete and comprehensive information. I was interested both in reading the committee report last year and in the hon. member's discussion on the bill today.

One thing has always puzzled me, and perhaps the answer is available from some other hon. member who may be able to be of assistance in this regard. It has always been a source of mystery to me why the age of 21 came to be the age of legal responsibility. I can appreciate the relationship of the age of voting and the age of legal responsibility, but there seems to be a certain sanctity surrounding this particular age and I would be most interested if any hon. member could give me some assistance along this line.

The hon. member for Skeena referred to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). I was interested to find during a recent trip to Queen's University that a former student of the hon. member for Port Arthur was apparently unaffected by the socialistic leanings which one might expect to find in that hon. member's teachings. This student turns out to be a most active, lively, enthusiastic Conservative on the campus of Queen's. As a matter of fact, he happens to be the president or leader of the Conservative group on that campus.

Mr. Peters: It just shows the teacher was broadminded.

Mr. McGee: I have had occasion recently to examine at first hand some of the political activities in the various universities of Canada. Late last fall I had the great privilege of visiting St. Francis Xavier University, Dalhousie, the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton, and Mount Allison University in Sackville. Certainly, if one can judge from the calibre, intelligence and capacity, particularly of the Progressive Conservative student groups on these campuses, there is no question or doubt in my mind whatsoever that the reduced voting age should be applied to each and every one of these students.

I can think of several good examples where from every other point of view they are qualified with room to spare, even though some of them have not yet reached their eighteenth birthday. It is interesting to consider what one might find as a result of lowering the voting age to 18 years of age and the accompanying impact on student life, particularly if an election took place during the academic year.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I had nothing whatsoever to do with this, but shortly after my visit to Mount Allison University a movement was started which resulted in banning all political activity on that campus. As I say, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it had nothing to do with my visit; the incident which precipitated this action took place before I arrived.

However, it is of more than passing interest to find that on the occasion of a new Liberal government taking office in New Brunswick one of the first things to happen is that political speech is to some extent stifled within the boundaries of that province. However, that is perhaps stretching the point a little. Getting back to the point of the university itself, it has been argued, and it was argued during my time as a student at Carleton College, that extracurricula affairs and in particular extracurricula political affairs had a damaging effect on academic standards. Perhaps there is some merit in that. It would be interesting to hear from some of the faculty members and university administrators concerning this aspect of the question.

In developing his argument the hon. member for Skeena also suggested that education, and the fact that we have, obviously, better informed young people in our universities today, perhaps has another side to it. The most impressive argument in this whole question has to do with the relationship of responsibility and privileges, and the age-old cry from people all over the world concerning taxation and representation. It seems to me that there is an almost unanswerable case put forward by a young man who is married and who is earning a living and raising children. It seems to me that a person in that specific situation, having those qualifications, cannot be deprived of a vote without a measure of injustice being done. This is along the same lines as the case which the hon. member mentioned where we allow a young person to join the armed services where he would theoretically be exposed to the bullets of the enemy, and yet deprive him of his vote at the same time. I myself happen to have joined the air force at the age of 17½ and, frankly, some of my most vivid recollections are that on different occasions and in different situations I was deprived of certain rights and privileges which were extended to fellow citizens of 21 years of age.

Actually in practice most of the restraints of this kind were not rigidly enforced during the war years in this country to any extent, but the point is, as I say, that there is a strong case for the young man who is married and having children. But it seems to me, though perhaps the census figures might contradict this statement, that young persons particularly embarking on a university education do not take on the accompanying responsibilities until later in life, and the more specialized the various fields of education become, particularly as far as medicine and other faculties are concerned, the older, it seems to me, are our graduates from those institutions before they begin to earn money, pay taxes, get married and have children.

However, there are countertrends, I know, and particularly in recent years in the United States there is a growing number of young people who anticipate this problem. A great many of them marry while at university and a rather impressive number in high school as well.

So much for the points raised by the hon. member for Skeena. As far as knowledge and appreciation of the political facts of life are concerned, political activity at the various universities is at an astonishingly high level. As I mentioned, I have visited a number of universities in the maritimes, Queen's University, and more recently still the University of British Columbia, the branch of the University of Alberta in Calgary, the university itself in Edmonton, and the University of Saskatchewan at Saskatoon where a large number of young students turned out to hear a speech which I happened to be making.

I suspect, and said so at the time, that seeing a real live Tory from Toronto way out in Saskatchewan many were perhaps interested to see if I had any horns growing out of my head. I reassured them on that point, but the point I am making is that at the university there, and later on in Winnipeg, I found a very high level of knowledge, background and interest, and in any of the discussions which took place, either in political science classrooms or in meetings over the traditional cup of coffee, I found that the calibre and the degree of information would stand up against many hon. members in this house. As a matter of fact on a couple of occasions I was chased up a tree, so to speak, and I have had to do a little homework since returning to the house to provide the answers to the questions that were raised.

It is interesting, too, how this political interest can develop. In connection with Queen's University I had been looking forward for some time to the opportunity to visit the Joyceville institution and also the women's prison in that city. I mentioned those institutions to this young group of Conservative students and found that a substantial number both among the young men and the young women present in the group was most interested, concerned and stimulated by the activity in this field in recent years, and as a result of our visits to those institutions many of these young people have indicated a desire to follow this subject up further with discussion groups and guest speakers. The most encouraging thing of all, it seems to me, was the interest expressed in the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society.

On balance, as I say, I would certainly support this measure as it applies to the university students I have encountered in my own days at college and in more recent times. I notice that the hon. member who introduced the bill, the hon. member for Skeena, mentioned in the committee last year that he was not wedded to the idea of 18, that perhaps 19 would be an appropriate age. This is perhaps a matter purely of choice.

I examined this question and prepared a series of qualifications which perhaps it would be more desirable to follow if the voting age were to be lowered to 18; qualifications along the lines I have mentioned, such as being married or a breadwinner in a larger family or, at any rate, paying taxes in some form or other, but upon discussing this with several members and persons who have considerable experience in administrative aspects of government I find this would create more problems than it would solve.

Certain groups in our society which did not happen to be included would feel as some people felt concerning the advance poll before the committee on privileges and elections recommended amendments to the act concerning the question of voting at the advance poll. Hon. members will recall that this privilege was confined to fishermen, railway workers, and a few other select categories. When you make exceptions and establish certain categories you immediately create a situation wherein other groups feel they have an equal right and entitlement to this privilege and are being discriminated against if it is not granted to them. I think that trying to couple a reduction in the voting age with restrictions in qualifications would be, on balance, a fruitless pursuit.

Although I am in favour of the principle involved in this bill I feel it would be more prudent to follow the suggestion made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) during the last session and delay consideration of this question until we have the comprehensive, complete and up to date information which will be available when the census reports are published.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that I fully support the bill introduced by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

The reasons which urged him to introduce this bill are substantially the same as those which urged me, last year, to introduce a similar bill. Besides, I have again entered the same bill on the order paper this year.

The previous speaker said it would perhaps be a good thing to wait until after the national census in order to have more information. I think this national census will indeed give us more information: it will tell us among other things, that there are so many thousand young men of age 18; it will tell us that there are so many thousand young men of age 19. But I doubt very much it will tell us whether those who are 18 or 19 years old are qualified to vote.

Obviously, that would have no effect whatever on this bill. I recall that last year, a few days after I introduced this bill, La Presse of Montreal, made a sort of survey entitled:

What do you think of it?

The survey covered those who were directly concerned in having the right to vote at 18 years of age, that is to say students 18 years old, and I should like to mention briefly some of the impressions of those young people.

Among others, a young student said:

I would consider the right to vote at 18 as an absolutely sound move. A young man of that age has enough maturity of judgment to make up his mind on important issues of public interest... Sources of information are more numerous than formerly, easier of access and more efficient. The young man of today wants to affirm himself earlier than his forebears of a couple of generations ago.

And that same student added:

I think he should vote as soon as he reaches 18.

I shall now give you the impressions of another student:

For my part, I should like very much to be able to vote at 18. The young men of my age are able to take a useful interest in the social and economic policies of their country or province—Furthermore, in granting young people the right to vote at 18 years of age, they will be given an opportunity to feel they are of some concern to the government. When you trust someone, you automatically increase his self-confidence and his will to assert himself.

And the other two students who expressed their views in that same article of La Presse, said approximately the same thing as the other two I have just quoted.

I was reading in the newspaper Le Devoir for February 9, 1960:

Any group which does not have a solid core of youth is doomed.

I say that if you try to keep young people out of politics, you run the risk of having them sooner or later stay away from politics for good.

[Mr. Racine.]

The previous speaker has spoken at length about over 18 year old citizens and dealt mostly with university students. He probably forgot to mention that we have in this country an important group of 18 year old citizens who are on their own, who earn their living and pay taxes.

I am in agreement with the member for Skeena when he says that television, radio and other media for the dissemination of ideas have made such progress in the last 25 years that it can be said that our young people are generally more advanced today than before.

Thus, we have reason to believe that the citizen who for all practical purposes has left his home, is emancipated, legally speaking. If he goes to university, he is then attending an institution of higher learning and does not live at home any more. If, on the other hand, as I was saying, he has begun earning his living from this very moment and in a certain way he is considered as being of full age before the law and certainly in the eyes of his parents. Indeed, should a person marry before reaching 21, the mere fact of his marriage makes him fully entitled to emancipation, according to section 314 of the civil code, that is to say that the law considers him to be of full age. Moreover, section 314 of the civil code grants minors who are working the right to institute proceedings on their own behalf for recovering damages. In addition, a minor who is in business is considered to be of age in respect of any business deeds.

It is apparent that there is a tendency to emancipate those under age because it has been found by the legislator that today a youth of 18, unless he be a student, is already looking after himself. Therefore, if by what he is earning, he is having his share of the country's gross national revenue, he then becomes a buyer of goods and consequently a taxpayer. From the very fact that he is paying taxes directly or indirectly it may be argued that the minor is actually interested in public administration.

As the previous speaker said, there is a common saying, often quoted by the English and which moreover was one of the arguments for the great charter of the 13th century: No taxation without representation.

Let us not forget too that a minor who owns a car or holds a driving licence is liable to get entangled in legal situations no less seriously than those who have the right to vote.

I think it might be fitting also to add an argument that may sound rather sympathetic but is true nevertheless. Whenever the country is attacked, youths of 18 are the first called to defend it.

However, if the age of voters were brought down from 21 to 18, it would be necessary for the provincial government, at least for the government of Quebec, to amend section 324 of the civil code and set the majority age at 18 instead of 21.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, I support wholeheartedly the bill introduced by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), and I hope that in the not too distant future our 18 year old citizens will have the opportunity to take a greater interest in politics than they do at present and that they will be in a position, not only to serve political parties in their electoral campaigns but also to make their contribution to the administration of our country.

(Text):

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I suppose when this question is put to each one of us we already have an opinion and then must search around in our hearts and minds to determine what basis there is for the attitude we have. This is essentially a basic question.

As I listened to the contributions made by the previous speakers this afternoon I found my mind wavering back and forth. I first took the position that there should not be a lowering of the age limit from 21 to 18 but after listening to some of the arguments advanced I changed my mind slightly but again reverted to my original position. As I talk, perhaps I will change my mind again.

Based on the earnest remarks of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) it seems to me that one could make out an equally good case for the fact that the intellectual types he mentioned should not be accorded this specific privilege. I think there are two factors which must help us to determine voting ages or voting limits. One of these is the intellectual factor, the ability to study and comprehend public issues, and the other is the levelling of experience which puts some practicality in young men or young women. I do not think that factor should be taken lightly, Mr. Speaker.

There are gifted souls, very young ones and very old ones, who are able to grope intellectually and master problems, and yet there are also a large number of people—I wish I could phrase this much better than I am doing because I am doing it rather bluntly—who decide public issues from the rather practical standpoint, namely can the country afford to take this step, or would this be too costly to the taxpayers? Somewhere in between one reconciles these two points of view and, of course, that happens all the time.

We sit here in parliament. We have the eager visionary ready to dash in and cure any ill in the world with legislation and the massive spending of public money. Then, we have those who say, whoa, the remedy is not good enough. You will kill the taxpayer while you are doing it. I would think that this school of thought must have been in the minds of the legislators of Costa Rica and of Mexico when they reduced the voting age in their countries to 18 but applied certain strictures. For example, the people of Mexico who vote at the age of 18 must be married, and those from Costa Rica who vote at the age of 18 must be married men or teachers.

Without having the benefit of reading the debates of Mexico or of Costa Rica it seems to me that the legislators there had some serious thoughts on whether a person who had reached 18 was a fit and proper person to entrust with the most sacred privilege in a democracy, namely the right to vote. I think they came to the conclusion that somebody who had to go out and work for a living, scrape together the wherewithal to support a family was such a fit and proper person because he did have a certain amount of practical experience, knew something about handling budgets and all that sort of thing. I think that is an important thought to keep in mind and that is why I said, perhaps too bluntly, and perhaps I will get myself in trouble in the next university I go to and get run up a tree, as did the hon. member for York-Scarborough, that such a person who had intellectual gifts at 18 to weigh public issues may not have the practical experience to go along with them to justify the granting of the right to vote to him.

In the May 19 proceedings of the committee on privileges and elections, at page 323, is set forth the nine countries, states or provinces where they have the right to vote at the age of 18. I quote briefly from the record. The list includes two United States states, namely Georgia and Kentucky, one Canadian province, Saskatchewan; behind the iron curtain there is Bulgaria, although they might as well give them the vote from the cradle to the grave because it does not seem to make any difference in the turnout or the ratio at the polls. It is always 99 24/100 per cent for one party. I do not know how the other votes go. Most of the other countries are in North or South America, Venezuela, Mexico, Bolivia, Costa Rica and then the Union of South Africa. Therefore, by not adopting the measure this afternoon we will not exactly be turning our backs on a large and progressive step taken in a large number of countries. As I have indicated, only nine states have taken this step and two of them have applied certain strictures to the voting age of 18, namely Mexico and Costa Rica.

The hon. member who sponsored the bill also mentioned the matter of minority and majority, passing from the state of infancy to manhood or womanhood and said that it was purely a provincial matter. He fortified this view by some remarks made, I understand, by legal members of the committee on privileges and elections. I suppose this is a somewhat valid point except that it could cause confusion to split a person in two and say that legally he becomes of age when he is 21 but democratically he will become of age when he is 18. On balance I think it would be better to have either one or the other, that is, 18 for the legal and voting age or 21, but not both, because there is some pride in reaching manhood or womanhood and having a great measure of individual freedom. One of the great rights of freedom that we possess is that right to vote.

Then there is the question of the development of the human personality and the human body, the physical development and the physiological development. I suspect that 18 is too young an age to say that one has developed fully emotionally, mentally, physically or physiologically; perhaps 21 is too old, but I think 18 is too young.

If these thoughts still leave me in a quandary, Mr. Speaker, I would think that great care should be given to this measure. Whether we adopt it in principle or not, I still believe that the school of experience is an important one to evaluate and to take into account when we are considering the voting age of Canadians.

Mr. W. C. Henderson (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this resolution I would like to say that the country I come from is vastly different from this country. Out there you can pass a farm and see a young man on a tractor. Quite often he is 15 or probably 16 years old; he might be 14. He can run a combine. He can do things that a young fellow 40 years ago, or even 30 years ago would never dream of doing.

When I was a youngster I lived in Arthur Meighen's constituency. I can remember going to political meetings throughout the country. I used to be cheer leader. They did not think we were smart enough in those days to have anything to do with politics, but we could line up at the front. They were all joint meetings in those days. Mr. Meighen was one of the most powerful speakers a man ever listened to and when it came time for him to speak we would sing: "What's the matter with father? He's all right. I used to be a Liberal strong but now I see I'm in the wrong. What's the matter with Meighen? He's all right."

That was the extent of our political persuasions in those days and naturally we took a great interest in politics. But now we have the Indians voting and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) says that the young people should be able to vote. I come from the same kind of constituency that he does and I honestly believe that the young men and women should have the right to vote because a woman 18 years old is old enough to have a family and that is what counts. If the census had been made we could have learned a lot of things from it. I think that 18 is young but nevertheless I am in favour of the boy and girl of 18 having the right to vote. Perhaps we could reach a happy medium by setting the age at 19 or 19½.

Hon. members know what young people are like. Their ideas are vastly different from those of their elders and they are faster on the trigger. They want to get things done more quickly. About all I can say is that they should have the vote because the world is moving fast. Everything is on the go, on the jump. I hope the Conservatives will give the vote to the younger people because I am in favour of it and I am sure everybody else is.

(Translation):

Mr. Remi Paul (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to those who spoke either in favour or against extending voting rights to young people of 18. In my opinion, the right to vote is a sacred privilege that is used in this country after all due consideration by those who are periodically asked to elect new representatives every three, four or five years. Therefore, in the light of information they have obtained by listening to speakers at political rallies, after analysing the platforms of the parties, and often after discussing in private circles the platform of this or that party, they cast their votes according to the dictates of their conscience.

The mover of this bill showed a great interest in young people of 18 and asked us to grant them the right to vote.

I do not know whether a young person of 18 has enough maturity to use his vote in a way that is consistent with the general opinion. A party is often returned to power after a thorough analysis of the conduct of its leaders or because it has carried out its platform. The young people of today have to live in a modern era that, as was so rightly pointed out by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Henderson), induces them to quicken the pace of life. Therefore, I am wondering if we should not first of all give the young people in our high schools more schooling on the importance of the right to vote and its implications, particularly in view of the fact that a people always has the leaders it deserves. Before choosing those who will be responsible for running a country or a province, we must keep in mind that there are some responsibilities on the part of the voter, but think how much greater are the responsibilities of the politician who seeks a mandate from the people. In fact, during his term of office, he must quite often show endless devotion and courage. Well, today's youth do not show enough interest, unfortunately, in politics, because there may be a lack of information or education that prevents them from fully understanding the politician's role and duty.

Earlier, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine) referred to the effects such a franchise could have on the civil code of the province of Quebec. Majority, which is reached at 21 years of age, gives to the individual, at that time only, the legal personality which entitles him to do something of legal value. Well, when the hon. member for Beauce referred to section 314 of the civil code of the province of Quebec, which deals with the enfranchisement of under-age people, I believe that he made his point too rapidly, because an enfrachised minor is still under the guardianship of his tutor. And enfranchisement by marriage does not involve the right of absolute majority in the province of Quebec. The right of majority, as recognized and enacted by the civil code of the province of Quebec, can only be obtained at the age of 21.

Why is it that our legislators considered that the right of majority can be obtained only at the age of 21? We may wonder whether experience has not justified such a policy on the part of our legislators who considered that before that age, normally, the individual has not reached full intellectual maturity.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it is six o'clock.

The hour for the consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—AUTHORITY FOR CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Balcer—Mr. Rea in the chair:

Canadian National Railways

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the C.N.R. Railway Company may construct a line of railway from a point at or near mile 72 of the Kiask falls subdivision to Mattagami lake, in the province of Quebec, and to authorize temporary loans to the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, not exceeding $9,660,000, to enable the work of construction and completion of the railway line to proceed forthwith; and to authorize the company to issue and the governor in council to guarantee securities to finance the expenditures upon the said line up to the said figure.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, before the debate on the resolution dealing with the construction of a railroad to Mattagami lake was adjourned, I had pointed out my previous mention of that district, when the estimates of the department of mines were discussed at the session of 1958.

If I may be allowed a brief digression, I emphasized, in my first speech the existence of the Mattagami lake district, stating that it would become as important as the Pine Point area in the Northwest Territories.

Later on, I met some people of my constituency who pointed out that I was wrong in saying that the district would become as important as the Pine Point one. According to them, I should have said that the new sector would be more important than Pine Point.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the resolution before us proves that they were right in being so optimistic, for its object is to authorize the building of the railroad thus giving a final character to the establishment of the district.

I might also stress the fact that on March 11 last, I called the attention of the minister of transport of the day to a statement which can be found on page 2063 of the French edition of Hansard for 1960.

I believe that this resolution, when it is enacted, will help remedy the present unemployment situation to a considerable degree because of the proposed railway construction work, and the fact that it will facilitate the setting up of numerous industries in that area.

Employment in Canada, Mr. Chairman, and more particularly in the northern district, is subject to seasonal ups and downs.

It is therefore normal that the number of unemployed should increase during the winter months.

Consequently it would be essential to approve projects like this one which help open up new territories for our Canadian economy as well as prospects of a brighter future for Canada, especially for our young people.

The federal government, as everyone knows, enacted numerous pieces of legislation to curb unemployment and set the Canadian economy on the road to improvement. With the help of provincial and municipal authorities it will therefore be comparatively easy to create various temporary jobs, after those opened up by the winter works program. We expect business to pick up gradually. But this project will certainly contribute to increased employment. Because of its numerous possibilities, the proposal now before us will further help open up a good many territories, set up new industries and consequently increase employment.

In a general way, at various periods of our history, the mining industry has been subject to some fluctuations. It has had its good share of trouble. Yet, it has always managed to get out of trouble and take on new impetus. There are very extensive mineral deposits in the lake Mattagami area. As my colleague from the neighbouring riding pointed out in detail this afternoon, rather large deposits are to be found especially on the properties of the Mattagami Lake Mines, of the New Hoscoe Mines and the Orchan Mines. Up to now those three companies are the ones which have discovered the main deposits in the area.

Other companies too have made exploratory work and spent huge amounts of money for that purpose.

Other companies still might yet be successful, such as the Garon Lake Mines, east of Bell river.

All those companies, including the first three I mentioned and the Garon Lake Mines, have already found about one billion dollars worth of minerals in the area.

There are still other possibilities because many other mining companies have undertaken exploration work. I might even say that last fall a company made a new discovery some 30 miles west, according to the map I have here, southeast of lake Watson. This discovery which was mentioned during the debate this afternoon is likely to become rather important.

I think that the branch line that is being built right to the centre of this new mining district could be extended as far as Harricanaw river, up to the Joutel township where this other discovery was made.

There are also other great possibilities of forest development in this vast area where large forests are still untouched.

There are also opportunities in the basin of the Allard river where new parishes may be established in a few years. In this territory, the land is highly suitable to agriculture and the climate is unusual, even a little better, I have been told, than in the southern part of Abitibi.

No doubt, because of the elevation in the neighbourhood of the Allard river in relation to sea level, the altitude is not as high as in the vicinity of La Sarre, Macamic, Amos or Senneterre.

Mention has been made also of the possibility of building a zinc refinery there, if possible, which would bring about an increase in population and the establishment of other secondary industries. Some neswpapers recently referred to the possible addition of a zinc refining unit at the Noranda mine, right in Noranda which is located in our area.

This would be better than nothing, of course, but the ideal solution for the future of the north and of this region especially would be the building of a local zinc refinery.

If a refinery were built, a city as large as Rouyn-Noranda could spring up in this vast territory of Abitibi.

There are still great possibilities to the north, as was pointed out this afternoon, and more especially along the Bell river and other rivers farther north, namely Bell river which becomes Nottaway river north of lake Mattagami, and also the East Main, Rupert and Broad Back rivers. In fact, they all have a vast potential for power production.

I am sure that this railway will be a first step toward the building of a line into James bay which should also be opened on the Quebec side. And that is the wish of the great majority, indeed of the entire population of northwestern Quebec.

I might also mention at this stage another kind of project which made headlines last year and this fall, and particularly since the opening of the new session, and I mean the Harricanaw waterway project. This project is still under study so to speak, but I think that before too long, it will command the special attention of the proper authorities, let alone the fact that it could easily be linked to the development of this vast territory, the success of which could be facilitated by the new railway, particularly if it were extended to James bay.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to deal briefly with a particular point which was raised in the house a while ago. I raise this question because this afternoon, I listened to the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) who rather seemed to favour this project. This is a change in relation to what another member of his group, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) said in the house on May 23, 1958 as can be seen in Hansard for May 23, 1958.

The member for Timiskaming was then referring to the transfer of the Canadian National shops from Cochrane to Senneterre, due to the construction of the new branch line into Chibougamau. As a matter of fact, the new line to lake Mattagami would come under the new division in Senneterre. That is why I consider it advisable to mention the matter here, because there are in that text assertions which are altogether inaccurate and which must be corrected, in fairness, not only to the courageous population of Senneterre, but also to the entire population of Abitibi and to the proposed construction of the railway to Chibougamau.

Here is, in part, what he said on May 23, 1958, page 417 of Hansard:

For five years, the shop has serviced all the diesels and equipment operating in that division and the division in Quebec. It is now servicing 20 units a month and, with very little additional expenditure, those facilities could service 40 engines, more than are required in that area. To complete the modernization of the round-house would cost very little, but it is estimated it would cost about $1 million to build a new shop in Senneterre. This would represent $1 million more to be added to the loss which Canadian National is now incurring, in addition to these people being asked to move into a town which has no housing, no suitable schools and no facilities in general for their reception. They are being asked to leave a place in which they have lived for many years, the reason given being that a new line has been built north into Chibougamau. I think anyone who has studied the financial papers during the last year will appreciate that if there is no change in the basic price for copper, that line will not be of much value to anybody. If copper prices fall much further, the tracks will be rusting before very long.

Mr. Chairman, I was anxious to challenge the unkind statement made about the town of Senneterre in my riding. Senneterre is directly connected to the new railway branch line toward lake Chibougamau and it will profit by it. This is a city which has prospered a great deal over the last years, and particularly since the war. A radar station was built there by the R.C.A.F. It is therefore untrue that the town lacks any of the required facilities, such as schools, streets, or sidewalks. Nothing is further from the truth, and I had to challenge such an incorrect statement.

I now wish to say a few words about another point, which in this case was raised this afternoon. I refer to the construction of a paper mill at Mattagami lake.

It has been stated in this house that the building of such a mill had been prevented by Mr. Duplessis. I have here the 1959 report of the committee on mines, forests and waters and I can show that such was not the case.

During a sitting of the committee, on May 19, 1959, while evidence was being given by Mr. M. Ambridge, president of the Abitibi Power and Paper Company, I asked Mr. Ambridge a question pertaining directly to the building of that mill. Mr. Ambridge, having said that he had been contacted about it, added the following which I quote from the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on mines, forests and waters, No. 23 dated May 19, 1959:

I would say yes, in certain cases. I have in mind one in particular, in the province of Quebec. I cannot recall the name of the lake.

I thereupon suggested the name Mattagami and he said: Exactly, that is the area because the site proposed for the mill was too far away from transportation and no means of communication were then available. However, this problem will no longer exist after the construction of this branch line.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to straighten that out and if hon. members are interested in the report, I gave the date and they can easily refer to it. They will find that the directors of those companies could see no advantages then in building a mill at that place, not because there were no forest resources available—the contrary has been very well shown this afternoon—but because the place was too far away from transportation and because the climate precluded any quick growth of the forest. That was, in fact, Mr. Ambridge's statement before the committee.

Mr. Chairman, before I resume my seat, I want to pay tribute to the gigantic work performed by the pioneers in these vast territories. As a matter of fact, this area is more or less making its first appearance on the map and is just beginning to be spoken of. I think I am not exaggerating when I say that such a result is not the work of one man or of one government only. It is rather the work of a group of bold and clever men who settled in Abitibi, prospectors, engineers, mining promoters, professionals, forest workers, businessmen, farmers, and workers in all trades who made the development of our region possible.

It is to these pioneers that credit should be given for developing and expanding this part of the Abitibi. Not only should they be congratulated for it, but tribute should be paid to them, because there is still so much land yet to be developed, from the inhabited portion of Abitibi up to the James bay area. The possibilities of the area are outstanding and we are just beginning to be aware of them.

Thanks to the new railway, the first step will have been taken and the development of these lands will be continued up to James bay. Our region will then experience a great revival that will profit not only the region itself but also the daring youth of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, it must be recognized that our young men and women have shown that they are capable of initiative.

I am just back from a visit to the mining cities of Chibougamau and Chapais in the northern part of my riding. Ten years ago these towns were non-existent. I am sure that following the construction of this branch line, numerous mining cities will be established, where our youth will turn to account their skills and contribute to the development not only of this region but of the province of Quebec and of the whole of Canada.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, like every other member, I rise tonight to commend this government for the excellent plan provided by the resolution under discussion.

I think it is an eloquent refutation of the claims made by the opposition that the Conservative government is doing nothing.

This government realizes the importance of the northern development and is proving it by undertaking the construction of a railway as important as the one provided for in this resolution, that is from a point close to mile 72 to lake Mattagami.

Even if the Liberal party, through the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) still wants to suggest to the people that this project is a result of the Liberal administration, the fact remains that the project is being carried out under a Conservative government and I predict right now that it will also be operated under a Conservative administration.

Whenever he refers to some achievement of the present government, the hon. member always attempts—and this is possibly a peculiar quirk on the part of members of the opposition—to belittle accomplishments by saying—

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have no objection to letting the hon. member for Charlevoix carry on in that vein, but if he is allowed to play politics or to raise political matters or to digress from the subject matter, I should hope that we will be granted the same privilege.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, on that point of order, I would like to point out to the house that this afternoon, the former member for Stormont, that is the present member for Laurier, was granted all the latitude required to deal with the subject matter of the resolution introduced by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer). He then had the opportunity of examining various aspects of the whole railway policy and I would like to see the hon. member for Charlevoix get the same opportunity.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, again on this point of order, I cannot permit the hon. member who has just taken his seat to give his own peculiar version of what took place this afternoon.

This afternoon's debate was confined to the resolution under discussion and to nothing else.

If I dealt with other matters, it was only in reply to interruptions by the hon. member for Roberval and other Conservative back benchers.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks on that point of order.

I want to point out to the hon. member for Laurier that he read verbatim from a speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and from speeches by some other ministers, and what he tried to establish in this house was that the Prime Minister's statements on the government's railway policy were not accurate, and that the figures quoted were likewise inaccurate.

I believe that he wandered away from the subject far more than the hon. member for Charlevoix is doing at this moment, because the latter is precisely talking about railways, and he has only started his remarks.

I would think that the hon. member for Charlevoix is not the least bit out of order when he points out to the house the fact that this government is doing its share in the development of railways in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I did not object to what the hon. member for Charlevoix has said, at least up to this moment, and I have no intention of doing so. However, I wanted to make this point, so that the hon. member who has just taken his seat could not later on claim that I did not stick to the matter at hand. If I did not, it was because of the interruptions of Conservative back benchers.

Mr. Tremblay: You lost your temper.

The Chairman: Order. I was not in the chair when the hon. member for Laurier spoke this afternoon. However, from what I have heard of the discussion, it seems to me that hon. members covered quite a lot of ground and the hon. member for Levis will admit that it is difficult, without considerably restraining freedom of speech, to keep hon. members from talking politics or raising political matters in this house.

I must say that up to now at least it seemed that the hon. member for Charlevoix was attempting to refute the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Laurier. So far, I cannot see that he has gone beyond the scope of the measure.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I made that remark only to have an opportunity to reply to the hon. member for Charlevoix. I have no objection, if the hon. member wishes to get into that, I will be pleased to hear him.

The Chairman: In any case, I would suggest that we settle problems as they arise.

Mr. Asselin: I wish to thank the member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) for allowing me to continue my remarks with the consent of the house. I really believe that we on this side of the house, will give members of the opposition every opportunity to reply to our remarks. But when the members of the opposition indulge in petty politics, we should also be given an opportunity to reply.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I was saying that when the member for Laurier discusses an achievement of this government, he always tries to belittle the work of the government by saying that consideration of the proposal was started under the former administration. In my opinion, if there was a member of the opposition who at the time reminded the Liberal administration of its responsibilities in relation to the construction of a railway line, that member was the then member for Three Rivers who is now Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer). He never passed up an opportunity to demand that the Liberal government of the day build a branch line that would in due course bring about the development of northern Quebec. If the Liberal government had then met its responsibilities in the field of railway construction, the mining companies might have undertaken the development of that area 20 years earlier.

The hon. member for Laurier's assertion that the Mattagami branch line was not planned by the former government because geological surveys had not been completed makes no sense. The government should not wait until mining development has reached the half-way mark before taking action and contributing to its expansion. That is why the present administration, and I would also add, the member for Chapleau (Mr. Martel), deserve the highest praise for bringing about the construction of the Mattagami branch line.

While we are discussing railroad building, I would like to tell the Minister of Transport that I think urgent consideration should be given to building, in the near future, a railway linking the north shore and La Malbaie. I think there is not one hon. member of this house who is unaware of the huge development of our natural resources in northern Quebec.

The 1957 mining production reached $120 million, or 23.5 per cent of the total production of the province of Quebec, which amounted to $465 million.

By 1970, it is foreseen that 53 million tons of ore will be shipped from the north shore. Since 1952, the tonnage shipped has increased sixteenfold, topping 14 million tons in 1956.

Turning to hydraulic resources, they now represent 110 million horsepower, but this total could be increased by more than 4 million horsepower if the potential power of the Hamilton falls, Labrador, were put to use on the north shore. It is also believed that by 1970, more than 5 million horsepowers will be available following the development of the Bersimis and Manicouagan rivers.

I mentioned in 1958 that the industrial mining value amounted to $225,000,000 for the year 1957, and indications are that it will reach the $500,000,000 mark in 1970. All those developments on the north shore have induced industrialists to invest capital which will be of the order of hundreds of millions additional dollars in 1970.

However, transportation facilities for this iron ore from the Quebec northlands is completely inadequate. We have had evidence, this winter, that water-borne shipping was difficult and in several instances almost impossible.

Mr. Chairman, the north shore population was 62,000 in 1957, and is expected to be over 100,000 by 1970.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: May I ask the hon. member for Charlevoix to address himself more closely to the business at hand.

Mr. Asselin: I am coming back to it, but first, may I express the hope that the wishes of the Minister of Transport will come true and that he will do likewise for the northern districts and the Charlevoix area. I would ask him to set up a committee of consulting engineers who would consider the possibility of building such a railroad.

I hope the construction of the Mattagami railroad is the first step in a broad program of railroad development. While the member for Laurier states that the former Liberal government made a contribution in this field, the fact remains that the Liberal government left various economic areas in Quebec undeveloped. In my view, Liberal policy in this respect was lackadaisical and shortsighted, in relation to what was done in other provinces.

The hon. member for Laurier, in summing up the record of the former Liberal government this afternoon, made a great show of the fact that his government built 700 miles of railroad in the province of Quebec. What a record, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not say that. I stated that when we were in office we built 685 miles of railroad throughout Canada.

Mr. Asselin: That is even worse, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Laurier has corrected me and said that his government built 695 miles of railroad throughout Canada. If you divide it by 22 years, it is only 31.6 miles of railroad per year, whereas the Conservative government built 60 miles in a single year.

[Mr. Asselin.]

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. What I said just now was in reply to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), who stated that for 50 years no railway lines had been built in Canada. It was to prove the minister's ignorance.

Mr. Asselin: Following the correction made by the hon. member for Laurier, I just want to establish that the Liberal government did not do much when it was in power.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, the Mattagami railway is, I hope, only a start in a vast railway program, which will promote the expansion and development of those Canadian districts which are far from the large business centres.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier today, with this bad cold I did not intend to take part in this discussion. However, having heard the hon. member for Charlevoix accuse the Liberal party of doing nothing, I just remembered that during—

Mr. Asselin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I never said that the Liberal party had done nothing, I said it had not done enough, which is different.

Mr. Bourget: That is more or less the same thing, Mr. Chairman. I am no lawyer, just a plain engineer, and I thought the kind of argument the hon. member brought up a few moments ago was rather strange when he stated that the Liberal administration had only built 685 miles of railroad in 22 years. I do not know whether such arguments are used in the law courts, but I think no sensible man should resort to them because the minister now suggests for the first time—

Mr. Asselin: I never said that.

Mr. Bourget: I did not interrupt you a moment ago—

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Bourget: I did not interrupt the hon. member just now. I think that sort of argument is not valid, because it is the first time that the minister and the Conservative party have suggested the construction of a branch line.

Moreover, if that line can be built today, it is because the Liberal party thought of building a railway from Barraute to St. Felicien, in Roberval county. And if the Liberal party had not thought of building that railway, it would today be impossible for the Minister of Transport to suggest constructing a branch line from Kiask falls to Mattagami.

The hon. member for Charlevoix blamed us a few moments ago for not having done anything. Well, our hon. friends have now been three and a half years in office and I have here, Mr. Chairman, a statement made in Matane by the predecessor of the Minister of Transport, during the 1958 electoral campaign, as reported in Le Soleil for March 18, 1958. Here is what the former minister of transport, who is now Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) stated when addressing constituents of Matane:

Today, it is your responsibility to vote for yourself by voting Conservative, because you know that the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, has pledged to spend $1,185,000,000 in 1958 to develop our natural resources throughout Canada. Now, projects connected with the port of Matane and your railway are part of the program—

And the federal minister added: I know right now that you will vote to obtain those projects just as we, on our part, will be happy to award them to you as soon as we are returned to power on March 31 next.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. In my opinion, despite the phonetic similarity between the word Mattagami and the word Matane, there is no similarity whatsoever between what the hon. member discusses now and the subject matter now before the house.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, it is for a specific reason that I am making these observations. The reason I rose was because the hon. member for Charlevoix spoke, because I did not intend to participate in this debate since the situation had been intelligently explained by the members of our party. The hon. member for Charlevoix had the right to speak just as I have the same right. The same measure of justice must be applied to the hon. members of the opposition and to the government members.

Mr. Pigeon: You have a wrong concept of justice.

Mr. Bourget: You are not the one to teach me what justice is.

Mr. Pigeon: Nor shall we learn it from you or the hon. member for Laurier.

The Chairman: I think it is normal that hon. members be allowed to answer arguments put forward by members from either side provided it is not overdone. I am sure that the hon. member for Levis will not overdo it and that he will not go any further than necessary to support his arguments.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, you know as I do that I did not overdo it. If there was any exaggeration, it was on the part of the previous minister of transport (Mr. Hees) when he made that promise to the voters of Matane before the last elections. And I quote further:

And the federal minister added: I know right now that you will vote to obtain those projects just as we on our part will be happy to award them to you as soon as we are returned to power March 31 next.

That is to be noted, because it is of particular interest for the new Minister of Transport. Therefore I would urge him when he gives his instructions concerning those works in the harbour and the railway—

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. English) is now at his place and every session—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bourget: If you would only listen to me for a little while—I kept quiet when you spoke—listen to me because I do not make a habit of interrupting you.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, after realizing that the hon. member for Gaspe is now at his place, that I remember hearing him on several occasions urge his government and his party to build that railway which had been promised. In fact, that promise was made during the electoral campaign and God knows with what eloquence. I was not there when the Minister of Transport spoke—

Mr. English: Is is not true that the railway between Matane and St. Anne des Monts was promised for twenty-two years by the Liberal party which never built it? The Conservative party will certainly be the one to build that railway.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, it is always easy, as you know, to say that the Liberal party made promises. But I challenge the hon. member for Gaspe—he is now in his seat—to quote a newspaper article in which the former member for Gaspe, the Liberal party, the former minister of transport or his successor are said to have promised to build the railway between Matane and St. Anne des Monts. I challenge him to do so.

Mr. English: You were not in Gaspe at the time of the election.

Mr. Bourget: No, I was not there at the time.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member for Levis will admit that it is about time we should get back to lake Mattagami.

Mr. Bourget: Lake Mattagami is a bit far from Ottawa but I have no objection to coming back to it. However, the hon. member for Gaspe asked me a question, and I challenge him to quote a word to the effect that the former member for Gaspe, or the government, or the former minister of transport have promised to build that railway there, as the present Minister of Transport promised in 1958.

Mr. English: Mr. Chairman, it is so true that this railway was promised for 22 years and the voters in the Gaspe constituency got so sick and tired of it they ousted the government in 1957.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, after 22 years it is perhaps reasonable that people should consider a change of government; but I can tell the hon. member for Gaspe that the people of his constituency will also change their member at the next election.

Those are the remarks which I wanted to make. Perhaps the minister could give us some explanation on that matter.

I put the question to him the other day concerning the purchase of the Canada Gulf and Terminal Railway. I put the question to him on February 2, but as yet I have received no answer. Perhaps he could take this opportunity to answer my question.

In fact, I believe he has to go to Matane. I do not know whether he will make the same promise as did the former minister of transport. He would be well advised to elaborate on that rather than make all kinds of statements, as his colleagues have been doing for the last few weeks. He should tell us exactly what he intends to do and stop blaming the former government for having done nothing.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I know I am against the rules, but no more so than the previous speakers. In fact, we all strayed a little from the matter under study.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman. I apologize if I have been against the rules. And I hope the minister will tell us, before going to Matane, what he intends to do to develop that area and particularly if he intends to build the railway between Matane and Ste Anne des Monts.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I just heard the hon. member for Levis apologizing for being out of order. I do not think he should make any excuses. In fact, since he is usually rather dull, the irrelevant remarks which he just made formed the best part of his speech. There was a certain liveliness on his part, which is to his credit. I wish he would show the same vitality in his future speeches.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a brief contribution to this debate since my constituency is directly linked with this region which will benefit by the measure introduced by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer).

I should like to tell the minister that the introductory speech he made this afternoon will certainly not deserve to be described as an anti-Quebec speech like the one made by the previous hon. member for Stormont on May 19, 1954, when he dealt with the question of the St. Felicien-Chibougamau railway.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Transport, on behalf of the voters of my constituency, who, I am sure, will benefit by the construction of a railway which will supplement the one that already exists and will benefit the whole Chicoutimi and Lake St. John region.

Mr. Chairman, the bill introduced by the Minister of Transport is progressive. As a matter of fact, it is a progressive measure because it comes in due time and because the Conservative government did not wait to the very end to give an industrial region the facilities it needs for its development. We, of the Chicoutimi, Lake St. John and Chibougamau region, know from experience what administrative delays, and I dare say, the former government's lack of interest did cost us not so long ago.

Our region is particularly rich in mining resources. During the last 15 years, the government of the province of Quebec has made superhuman efforts to enable this region to develop its mining resources.

To that end, we needed communication facilities, especially railroad lines, because the region, being distant from the great centres, had to be connected with them by communication facilities, by adequate transportation facilities. We had to wait—and I refer more particularly here to the mining region of Chibougamau—for years before the Liberal government decided to build the railway we needed to carry the Chibougamau mining wealth to the Chicoutimi and Lake St. John region, as well as to the province of Ontario.

After having decided to give us that railway, the Liberal government haggled for months and wanted to deprive us of the benefits that would have meant for us the speedy construction of a railway, by deciding to build first the section that was to connect Chibougamau to Beattyville, and therefore, to the province of Ontario.

It had been decided to build the Chibougamau-St. Felicien line after the other one, and it is only after public organizations and various representative associations of our area and economic groups had brought pressure to bear that the government decided to change its way and agreed to build, or at least said it was to build both lines simultaneously from Chibougamau to Beattyville and from Chibougamau to St. Felicien.

In spite of the assurance that was given to us, we, of the Chibougamau and Lake St. John region, had to wait for more than three years for the completion of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien line.

That is why I was surprised this afternoon to hear the hon. former member for Stormont criticize the Conservative government—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think, that you should once and for all—

Mr. Valade: Are you rising on a point of order?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I rise on a point of order.

I say that we must not designate a member or the representative of a constituency by his former constituency. In fact, according to the rules of this house, the hon. member must refer to the member for Laurier and not to the former member for Stormont.

So I would ask you, Mr. Chairman to enforce the rules in this matter.

Mr. Pigeon: That is exactly what you are saying.

The Chairman: Order. I believe the rules of this house state that a member has to be designated by the name of his present constituency, and not by that of his former constituency.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to designate the hon. member for Laurier by his adopted constituency, but I was simply trying to use this expression to awaken in the always warm heart of the hon. member for Laurier that fondness that no doubt he still has—at least, I hope so—for his former electors of Stormont.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the subject matter of my speech. I was saying that our region, because of the delay caused by the then Liberal government in the construction of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway, has been deprived of economic advantages, of which all public organizations have noticed the unfortunate effects.

This is the reason why the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier, as we say, did not make much of an impression on me this afternoon.

I found, Mr. Chairman, that his indignation at the Conservative party's attitude was certainly not inspired by a true knowledge of the actual facts and, in particular, by a precise knowledge of past events; he used a quite valid argument in favour of the Mattagami railway, that is, the Mattagami region is a marvellous industrial region and one of the most promising of our province.

I quite agree with that, Mr. Chairman. But if this argument is valid in 1961, I wonder why it was not so in 1954 and 1955, when we discussed the very great mining potential and the tremendous resources of Chibougamau.

The argument he put forward this afternoon was precisely the one used in this house in 1954 by the former member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon), when he called for the immediate construction of the railway between Chibougamau and St. Felicien.

We are then led to believe that the phrase "promising area" has changed its meaning since the hon. member for Laurier has changed his place in this house.

In the debate during which the speech of the hon. member for Laurier was described as anti-Quebec, reference was made—

An hon. Member: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Tremblay: Reference was made, with supporting figures, to the mining potential of the Chibougamau area. To that, the hon. member for Laurier replied, in order to justify his government's intention to build first of all the Chibougamau-Beattyville line, that the other link was not then considered a paying proposition. It was a case of determining an industrial potential which later proved very important.

Today, the hon. member for Laurier is using the same argument to tell us that the Conservative government is doing the proper thing in providing the Mattagami area with all possible advantages, in building a railway.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I wish he had been as generous to the electors of our area when he decided that the Chibougamau railway should be built.

That is why I feel that the Liberals are ill-advised today to reproach anything to the Conservative party in the field of railways, precisely because the Conservative party is now proposing a measure all the more efficient because it is timely and that the operators of the Mattagami area will not have to wait as long as we did, at their own expense. Besides, economists are of the opinion that the recession which has affected the operations of the Chibougamau area was partly due to the delay in the construction of that railway.

In 1958, during the election campaign, I heard people detached from all political parties discuss the matter and use the arguments I have just put forward.

We, from the lake St. John and Chicoutimi area, are perfectly aware of the result of the Liberal government's carelessness.

A moment ago, the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) referred to the promises made by the Conservative party, and quoted the speech made by an hon. minister in this house.

How many times shall we have to repeat to the Liberal party that it has deluded the people. I come from an area where Liberal promises were made. We were promised, year after year, that the Chicoutimi-Quebec railway would be rebuilt.

Mr. Bourget: What are you doing now?

Mr. Tremblay: We were promised, year after year, that this railway line would be rebuilt. We made that request at a time when, the project was considered self-sustaining, that is to say during the best years of that artificial prosperity of which the Liberals benefited, that is during the war and immediately after the war. We then asked the Liberal party to rebuild the Chibougamau-Quebec railway, at a time when the project was self-sustaining.

Mr. Bourget: Would the hon. member permit a question? You have been in office three and a half years—

Some hon. Members: That same tune again.

Mr. Bourget: As far as you are concerned, you always have to retract, and you know it. Then, please shut up. You know that the Hon. Gerald Martineau has already told you to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to address a question to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay): You have now been in office three and a half years; have you made any changes in the Quebec-Chicoutimi line? Have you changed anything at all?

Mr. Pigeon: It is not after a few years in office that we can repair 22 years of inactivity.

Mr. Bourget: Naturally, you cannot even correct the mistakes you have made since you are in office.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the hon. member for Levis put that question to me. It will allow me to say that, since we took over, through pressures from our colleagues and the co-operation of the members of the Conservative government, we have obtained a marked improvement of the railway service on the Quebec-Chicoutimi route.

Ask the experts, look at the timetables, look into the freight problems on the Chicoutimi-Quebec line and you will realize the marked improvements the Conservative government has carried out in that field. However, it is right to say, as did one of my colleagues, that we cannot repair in three and a half years 20 years of neglect and maladministration.

Mr. Bourget: Is that what you undertook to accomplish?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, let me tell the hon. member for Levis that no member of the Conservative government came over into my riding, in 1957 or in 1958, to make promises. We promised the people that we would improve the condition of the Chicoutimi-Quebec railway, and that is what we have done. You could not find a single regular passenger, or any commercial traveller using that railway, who would not admit there has been improvement.

I am sure that in the future, the Minister of Transport, who looked into our problems, —the problems referred to him by my constituents in Chicoutimi and Lake St. John —will carry on the work undertaken by this government so that, as I said, we in the Chicoutimi and Lake St. John area will enjoy the share that was denied us by the Liberal party.

I am not afraid to say so in this house, because all the economic groups in our area, and all the organizations too, have for years deplored the Liberal government's lack of action in the matter of our railways.

That is why the sentimental rantings of the hon. member for Laurier leave me cold. He used the same stlye in 1954 when turning down our requests. I have here a statement which proves his knowledge of constitutional problems. Here is what he said, and I quote page 4890 of Hansard for May 19, 1954:

> My hon. friend is very much interested in the development of his own district; may I tell him this: it will cost $17 million to build the eastern section, that is the section from St. Felicien to Chibougamau.
> Now, if the government of the province of Quebec wants to pay half the cost of that project, that is to say $8½ million, I pledge to ask the Canadian National to spend the other half, which is $8,500,000. We shall see now who is sincere.

A haggling policy, Mr. Chairman, on an absolutely vital matter, on a question which is quite essential for our area. The hon. member for Laurier was haggling when he said to the government of the province of Quebec: "Co-operate with us, give us $8 million and we shall supply the rest to build that railway", which you need.

Yet, at that time, the government of Quebec had done its share, because it had built the highway and approaches to St. Felicien at Chibougamau to facilitate the development of our natural resources. We needed a railway. It was the federal government's responsibility. But all the federal government did was to suggest a petty bargain.

The present government's attitude is quite different. There is no haggling in that.

And what does the Minister of Transport do today? He suggests a positive legislation which will have the best effect for our area and which, as I say, is only efficient because it comes at the right time, and I am well placed to know what untimely legislation costs.

Mr. Chairman, before concluding my remarks I would like to deal, I would not say with a point, but with an angle—

An hon. Mmeber: A comma.

Mr. Tremblay: —an emotional angle in the speech of the hon. member for Laurier—

An hon. Member: Do swallow that angle.

Mr. Tremblay: —of the hon. member for Laurier, who made a great fuss in this house when speaking of the achievements of the pioneers in the Mattagami area, for which I would, indeed, commend him. He very briefly mentioned the problem of building a railway at Port Cartier, at Gagnon, but he was very careful not to mention the name of, nor describe the man who did not try to hand over his responsibilities to others when it was a question of developing new Quebec. I am thinking of a great Canadian, of the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, who turned his province into one of our most important industrial areas.

Mr. Meunier: He is dead now, leave it at that.

Mr. Tremblay: The hon. Mr. Duplessis made up for years of previous neglect; he wanted his province to take its rightful place in the industrial field.

An hon. Member: With "Jerry" Martineau.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, allow me to express my scorn at the untimely, cheap and narrow-minded remarks made by the primates on this side of the house; and if they do not like that term, I could use the word prognathous, which has about the same meaning.

Those gentlemen are concerned with commas and semicolons. They should look more often at the dictionary; they would find words and adjectives that need no period, comma or semicolon.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to scorn those cheap remarks that are just an expression of spite, such as I heard in certain speeches this afternoon. Some hon. members feel spiteful because the Conservative government is taking, for an area in the province of Quebec, action that had not been taken for our particular region of Chicoutimi and Lake St. John, or that was unfortunately taken too late to be as effective as we would have hoped.

I am sure that the people of my constituency, as well as those of the neighbouring constituencies of Chicoutimi, Lake St. John and Lapointe, will benefit to the same extent as the people of Chapleau from the railway the Conservative government has just decided to build.

An hon. Member: It is not decided yet.

Mr. Tremblay: I am sure of one thing, though; this government's bill will not deserve, I repeat, to be called an anti-Quebec measure, as did the speech made by the former hon. member for Stormont on May 19, 1954.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I had not the least intention of taking part in this debate, but I rise for a minute or two just to show to the house that the member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), just as a young dandy, has just taken a few minutes of the house to deal in his sanctimonious voice not with the Mattagami railway, but with the hon. member for Laurier.

Well, Mr. Chairman, as he usually does, our learned Geronte's abomasum has ruminated over silly allopathic arguments.

Mr. Chairman, if our learned colleague from Roberval does not fear to get the boot somewhere some day—

An hon. Member: Please, talk French.

Mr. Dupuis: —he is quite unrealistic.

Of course, in order to be understood by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin), I would have to talk slang, but I intend to talk good French.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Laurier spoke objectively this afternoon on the resolution now before us. He supports the motion on which we are asked to vote.

The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) made a very serious speech. So did the hon. member for Chapleau, and I commend them.

But we have just heard the hon. member for Roberval, who has again tried to startle the House of Commons with expressions borrowed from some retired professor.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at length—

Mr. Fortin: You have already spoken too long.

Mr. Dupuis: —but I wish to tell this house that when he was minister of transport, the hon. member for Laurier was the most diligent, active and competent minister ever known in this House of Commons.

Mr. Chairman, it might be appropriate to ask the hon. member for Roberval to stop playing—

[Mr. Tremblay.]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I feel that you allowed enough leeway to the hon. member for Laurier and myself to deal with the resolution. However, so far the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville—

An hon. Member: He is off the track.

Mr. Asselin: —did not address himself at all to the subject matter. He is out of order and I feel that he should immediately revert to the question of the Mattagami lake railway.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, if there is an hon. member who should never raise a point of order, it is the hon. member for Charlevoix, who was completely beside the subject matter of the debate a little while ago. Anyway, I only have a few seconds to go.

I know that it hurts them—

Mr. Fortin: We are not hurt, we are ashamed of you.

Mr. Dupuis: —but I simply wish to remind this house that the hon. member for Laurier did so much work in that field that now the Conservative party can only carry on the work undertaken by the Liberal party, which we will resume in any event when we come back to power again in a year or two.

If the hon. member for Roberval has seen fit to remind us that the great Mr. Duplessis developed the mines, I feel that it was a little inaccurate and out of order. In answer, I shall tell him that if one ever prevented the Quebec people from taking advantage of the development of those natural resources, Mr. Maurice Duplessis was the very one to do it. And if I had been an ordinary supporter of a party which allowed our natural resources to be handed out to the Americans in exchange for a mess of pottage for a period of 50 years, I would not come back here tonight and make such statements in this House of Commons.

It would be a good thing to ask—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I wonder whether it would not be possible to come back to Abitibi, and talk a little about the construction of that railway and of the Mattagami mine. The debate would perhaps be more interesting.

The Chairman: It is my clear impression that all railways brought us back to Mattagami lake, and I imagine that the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville will also manage to find his way.

Mr. Fortin: We would have to tell him.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Roberval had kindly abandoned his amphigoric role, I would have been delighted to stick to the discussion. But I simply wanted to point out that, once again, he was beside the point. We want to support the project, and we are delighted to do so, but we fail to see how the hon. member for Roberval could take the floor, not to talk about the Mattagami lake railway but, to attack the hon. member for Laurier, whom he and his colleagues constantly attack, because he overshadows them, not only in Quebec, but in the whole of Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Creaghan: Mr. Chairman, it is unusual for a member from the Atlantic provinces to attempt to participate in such a debate. However, having a great interest in railway problems and particularly problems concerning the C.N.R., I feel it is proper for me to add a few words at this time.

In opening my remarks I wish to first of all congratulate the hon. member for Chapleau for his wonderful contribution to this debate. The hon. member in question is a resident of this area under discussion and has done much for the development of this part of the province of Quebec.

We have had many outstanding speeches on this resolution, particularly the speech of the hon. member for Roberval, which covered very well the background of the railway problem in this area.

Earlier today the hon. member for Laurier emphasized that the previous Liberal government authorized the C.N.R. to construct a total of 681 miles of railway lines during its term of office. The railway lines in question, together with their mileages, were itemized by the hon. member. I think it is appropriate for me at this time, as a member representing a railway riding, a riding dependent on the economy of the C.N.R., to state that in my opinion it is unfortunate that the list was so short not only in names but in miles. Mathematically it adds up to about 30 miles per year during their 22 years of office.

This short mileage is all that was constructed, notwithstanding the fact that the former government was in power during a period of war for five years, a period of depression of an equal length of time, and lastly during a period of prosperity unequalled in Canadian history, a period of boom when the government witnessed huge surpluses year after year.

The hon. member for Laurier emphasized that at times development in connection with railway construction in Quebec might not have kept pace with the development in the rest of Canada. He inferred that perhaps development in the area under discussion under the terms of this resolution was held back because of the wishes of the then premier of the province, the late Mr. Duplessis. I do not know whether that is a fact or not, but as a former minister of the crown the hon. member for Laurier is perhaps more qualified than I am to make statements of that type. But I suggest that no government Liberal or Conservative should ever admit that a provincial premier since confederation, had enough influence on the federal government, because of fear or out of respect for a provincial premier, to fail to do anything which might have the adverse effect of holding up the development of any region of this country.

During a period of 22 years, as stated already today, the C.N.R. built a series of extensions or new mileage totalling 680 miles. A short line was built in New Brunswick known as the Bartibog extension. Whether that was a wise move economically remains to be seen, but that railway line was built under the regime of the former Liberal government at a time when we had a government in New Brunswick of a different political belief. It was fully supported by the federal government and the provincial government. Time will tell whether or not it was a good investment for the C.N.R.

I urge that the management of the C.N.R. should co-operate to the fullest extent with the provincial governments of this country and with the suggestions of business. I am confident that both provincial governments and business will now receive the kind of co-operation from the federal government to which they are entitled. The board of directors and the management of the railway should in connection with this particular project use their own forces where possible during construction. I realize that tenders must be called, but where possible C.N.R. employees should be employed. I also suggest that the management should instruct contractors to give priority to the employment of laid-off and former C.N.R. workers. I hope the Minister of Transport will be able to introduce this bill at the first opportunity and that it will receive a speedy passage through the committee stage.

In my opinion new railway lines must be developed in this country with speed. I suggest that a minimum of 100 miles a year would be a very conservative target for the C.N.R. and for the present government. This would make it possible to make up for the lack of development which we have witnessed since the middle thirties. Apparently it was government policy when times were good, and during the war and post-war years, for the former government to do all it could by an unwritten policy to retard and hold up railway development in this country.

It appears from the debate that a smelter may be constructed somewhere in the St. Lawrence area. I believe that is the reason why the companies which have guaranteed a return to the railway have requested the extension of this line. This extension is justified. From what I understand, it is fully guaranteed from an economic point of view by the mining companies concerned. Perhaps the development of the Canadian north and the undeveloped areas of Canada will proceed with much more haste if it were possible for the government in its own right to co-operate with development companies by joining in the guaranteeing of returns when new lines are promoted. It is my belief that this country cannot again afford to be caught with poor planning such as we have witnessed during the past 20 years or so.

I suggest that the St. Lawrence seaway, a project which has done much for central Canada, is the reason for the resolution now before the committee. Possibly the subject under discussion could be compared to the problem of the development of the Chignecto canal in the maritime provinces. I believe it is related, because if the St. Lawrence seaway had any effect on the resolution it must be assumed that a canal in the Atlantic provinces would likewise justify more trade and promote prosperity, new smelters and perhaps secondary industry.

In conclusion I wish to congratulate the management of the C.N.R. on the foresight and co-operation it has shown. I also want to congratulate the company on its program in recent years for building the first hump yard in its system in the Atlantic provinces and for its new plans for the redevelopment of the Moncton area. I should also like to congratulate this government on its new policy of co-operation. Available transportation is the most elementary requirement for the economic development of any undeveloped region. It developed the east; it was a term of confederation, and this area of Canada affected by the resolution is now about to witness its goal—a horizon with an economic future.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, after all the remarks we have heard this afternoon and this evening in the house, there is not much left to be said about this resolution, except to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) for having taken an initiative which will also be useful to the province of Quebec and to the development of our northern natural resources.

The only point I should like to recall, Mr. Chairman, is that the present Minister of Transport did not wait for hundreds of delegations to see him before introducing this resolution in the house, which is strangely contrasting with what went on in 1954 when the matter of building the Chibougamau-Beattyville railway was under consideration. At that time, as everyone recalls, many steps had been taken to urge the government to action, and yet the same natural resources as today were involved.

Therefore, I am delighted to congratulate most particularly the Minister of Transport for having taken the initiative of introducing the resolution which foreshadows the construction of a railway that will contribute to the development of the northern natural resources of the province of Quebec.

I am particularly delighted to point out that those natural resources, if they have to be exported, will have as their export harbour, the harbour of my city, Chicoutimi.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would be tempted to ask—even if many improvements have been made since the Conservative party came into power as my colleague from Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) pointed out—for an improvement to the Chicoutimi-Montreal railway, because there are indeed many improvements that could be made to that railway. Therefore, I would ask the Minister of Transport to draw the attention of the Canadian National Railway authorities to the matter, because I believe there is yet much to be done in that connection.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, if I take the floor at this time, obviously it is not to intone the old refrain of the man about town from St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), nor even to elaborate on the rather incongruous outline given by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) of the Liberal glories in the field of railways, glories which have vanished in any case. It is rather to congratulate, as a representative of north-western Quebec, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) who introduced this legislation, following many representations made particularly by my excellent friend the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Martel) who, I believe, deserves on more than one count much of the merit of this legislation.

The hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Martel) has made a truly eloquent account of the economic benefits that may derive from that measure. All of us who represent northwestern Quebec are pleased with the progress this measure means for that region. In fact, I believe it is an important first step towards a rational development of the tremendous resources that abound in northwestern Quebec and to which referred the hon. member for Chapleau, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), as well as others who talked earlier on this bill.

When dealing today with a railway, I think that we must consider this project in the wider field of a rational development of all the means of communication in our country and especially in northwestern Quebec, because we are making important arrangements today for the development of the railway.

Our government has also entered into agreements with the provinces on the construction of access roads to natural resources. We must carry on in this way and take vigorous steps to develop this Laurentian Shield, with its many mineral, forestry, agricultural and water resources. We must also consider within the scope of these water developments the building of waterways and seaways.

The Abitibi region is situated at the water divide and, past lake Mattagami, the rivers flow toward Hudson bay and James bay. There is to be found a whole network of rivers. These could be banked and I think we could, with a master plan, draw full profit from these waterways. In so doing we would contribute a lot to the economic development of a region long unknown but now proving itself one of the most promising, thanks to the recent discoveries at Mattagami lake.

I am therefore happy to publicly congratulate once more in this house the hon. member for Chapleau whose devotion to this project has never ceased and who, I am sure, is now happy to see in this house his dearest dreams come true.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I rise now after this very interesting trip through the province of Quebec. The regions visited were numerous. Several times we found ourselves quite far from the point that concerned us more particularly. It is nevertheless heartening to see the unanimity resulting from the different speeches. Naturally there were differences as to the details, but it is good to think that such a project met with very little opposition.

This afternoon the hon. member for Chapleau spoke very objectively of the project. He spoke with full knowledge of the facts. In fact, the line will be built in his riding. He quoted figures. He told the history of the Mattagami mines. I had the privilege of spending the week end with him in the cities of Chibougamau and Chapleau, a very interesting part of his riding. I was able to realize his interest in the Quebec mining industry and to see that he takes good care of his own people. I also noticed how highly he is regarded in that part of his riding.

This railway project meets his views and the views of the population living in the Abitibi region, in the northern part of Quebec and elsewhere in the province.

Mr. Chairman, this afternoon, the hon. member for Laurier had some very kind words for me, and I wish to thank him. He commended me for this first introduction of a resolution, and I appreciated his words. He gave us the history of the railways over the last 25 years, but I think I cannot endorse his interpretation of it.

For instance, he raised the matter of the Chibougamau railway. Several of my colleagues from the province of Quebec thought it proper to reply to his allegations, so I do not think I can add very much to that. I remember having taken the floor several times during the various debates which followed the introduction of the bill on the Chibougamau-Beattyville railway, as I remember that, at the time, the province of Quebec was the one with the smallest railway mileage having regard to its population. Besides, I did not invent that, because it seems to me I have read a most interesting article to that effect in L'Action Catholique of Quebec. In fact, Mr. Lorenzo Paré, parliamentary correspondent of that newspaper, described very clearly in that article the meanness of the former government towards the province of Quebec in the matter of railways.

As far as the Chibougamau-St. Felicien line is concerned, I do not want to throw any exaggerated blame on the former administration, but I am unable to see how the Liberal party can try today to win the gratitude of the lake St. John district when it took all that time to carry out the project.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister allow a question? It is connected with what he said about the Canadian National Railways and the building of railways in the province of Quebec. This is my question: The other night, the minister stated that the province of Quebec came first in the railway field. Does the minister still think that?

Mr. Balcer: To prove that the province of Quebec was backward during the first ten years of the former administration, I shall say that absolutely nothing was done at that time to answer the people's needs.

Mr. Chevrier: I am still asking the minister that question. Has the minister made the statement I just quoted?

Mr. Balcer: I did, and I say if there has been some effort made in this field since the war, it is because it was long overdue. In fact, the former government had not done a thing in ten years in the field of railway construction in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question of the minister? During a discussion of the Chibougamau-Beattyville project, he said that the province of Quebec had not received its share in the railway field. This statement has been made since the war. How can he reconcile that statement that the C.N.R. had done nothing for the province of Quebec with this other statement he made last night, when he said he was quite satisfied with what the government had done for the province of Quebec?

Mr. Balcer: The Chibougamau railway did not exist at that time. The representations from the province of Quebec finally persuaded the government to build it. Now they are blowing their horn about it. The truth of the matter is that they were obliged and forced by the representations to carry out the project.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister allow me this last question?

The minister's statement was made in 1955, whereas the construction of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway dates back to 1954, a year prior to the minister's statement.

Mr. Balcer: There may be a difference of a year—

(Text):

The hon. member for Port Arthur asked some very practical and precise questions on the cost of transporting the various goods that this railroad would be called upon to carry. As I said this afternoon when I introduced the resolution, the bill will go before the committee and a lot of details will be available there. The experts will be there and a lot of statistics will be given. In the meantime I should like to say that it is estimated that the volume of goods to be carried on this line will amount to 165,000 tons of zinc concentrates and 25,000 tons of copper concentrates a year. The zinc concentrates will be moved by rail to the company's refinery, which will be built somewhere in the Montreal area. The 25,000 tons of copper concentrates a year will be moved by rail to the smelter of Noranda Mines Limited at Noranda, Quebec. It is estimated that the traffic arising from mining projects will total about $2 million a year, and that traffic consisting of general supplies will total about $225,000 a year.

The hon. member for Port Arthur also raised quite a good argument when he said that we must have some solid guarantees before approving such legislation. He meant by this that it was no use building a railway if the railway was not to get the business or the business was to go down very rapidly, and all this expense would prove to be wasted money and wasted time. The agreement that has been reached between the C.N.R. and the Mattagami Lake Mines Limited contains a guarantee from the mining company of the movement of 1,400,000 short tons of zinc during the first 10 years, with the stipulation that the railway will be paid a certain penalty per ton for any shortage below 140,000 tons in any one year. Therefore, for the first 10-year period this guarantee is there, and I think it is one of the reasons why this project is so sound and why I am so pleased to recommend it to the house.

I was also asked what amount of employment would be provided by the building of this railroad. I have not got those figures at the present time but I will endeavour to bring them before the house on second reading of the bill, and if they are not available at that time they will certainly be brought before the committee. As far as the mining company is concerned, the provision is for the employment of about 400 men at the mine property and 475 to 500 people at the zinc refinery which will be built in the province of Quebec. Therefore, as you can see, Mr. Chairman, this is a sound project; it is a good, economical project and I recommend the resolution to the committee.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Balcer thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-69, respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of Quebec by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near mile 72 of the Kiask Falls subdivision in a northwesterly direction to a point in the vicinity of Mattagami lake.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SHIPPING

REPEAL OF TAX LAWS RESPECTING HALIFAX SIGNAL STATION

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-3, to repeal certain laws relating to the signal station at Halifax.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the minister a statement to make?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, I have a short statement. This bill is for the purpose of removing from the statute books an act which has long outlived its usefulness. Its title is an act relating to the signal station at Halifax. It was enacted in 1859, under chapter 64 of the statutes of Nova Scotia, and assessed the sum of 5 shillings, and later $1 upon all steamers and other vessels which entered into the port of Halifax from ports outside of the province of Nova Scotia. Vessels owned in the province of Nova Scotia, except those registered and owned in the port of Halifax, were exempt from payment. In chapter 42 of the same statute of 1861 was an amendment exempting some of the vessels registered and owned in the port of Halifax. Chapter 66 of the statutes of Canada, 1908, was a further amendment exempting vessels under 115 net tons from the payment of signal dues.

The idea behind the bill, Mr. Speaker, is that at the time the statute was enacted a signal station was maintained on Citadel hill in Halifax where people kept watch over the sea by means of a telescope so as to be in a position to report as soon as a ship was in sight of the port of Halifax. Time was of the essence then because it was very important for the owners and operators of ships to learn as soon as possible when one of their ships was coming into port.

With the advent of radio this service was no longer required but the tax was still levied on all ships entering the port of Halifax. The tax amounted in total to $1,510 in the fiscal year 1959-60. It is felt that the collection of the tax is a nuisance and, in addition, the tax is not levied at any other port in Canada. At present the requirement to levy the tax is mandatory and the bill is required to eliminate it.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the explanatory notes in the bill are so clear in indicating what the purport of the bill is that I do not think there is any purpose in our taking part in the discussion. We see no objection to the bill whatsoever and we are willing to let it go through at once.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I too shall be very brief. However, lest hon. members may think that the port of Halifax was old fashioned in keeping this tax in effect for so long after modern methods had replaced the telescope, I think in fairness to my riding it should be emphasized that the mistake was no fault of ours. There is one other point I should like to make. Hon. members will notice that the bill involves the repeal of a provincial statute which may raise some question in our minds. Actually this was a provincial statute passed before confederation and under the relevant section of the British North America Act the parliament of Canada may legislate in respect of such preconfederation statutes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Repeal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, as the only admitted shipowner in the house, though I have lost my ship since I declared that as my occupation, I should like to ask the minister how much the treasury will lose as the result of the repeal of this tax.

Mr. Balcer: As I said, the amount collected last year was approximately $1,500.

Mr. McCleave: Is it not a fact that the costs of collecting the tax would have to be offset against that mammoth revenue?

Mr. Balcer: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: By leave, shall the said bill be read the third time now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Balcer moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT REMOVING PROVISION RESPECTING COMPULSORY ENFRANCHISEMENT

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-61, an act to amend the Indian Act.—The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, if the house leader will move this bill I think we can perhaps dispose of it before ten o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: I would be pleased to move it, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-61, to amend the Indian Act.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that at the last session of parliament I did my best and so did the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) to get an amendment to the Indian Act to do what the bill accomplishes, and for my part I am very glad to see that the government is belatedly doing what we wanted them to do.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? Now, by leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill (for Mrs. Fairclough) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for tomorrow and the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will commence with item No. 11 on today's order paper, the motion to refer the report of the Canada Council to the standing committee on public accounts. The second item is No. 12 on today's order paper, to refer the public accounts and other matters to the standing committee on public accounts. The third item will be the continuation of the debate on the budget resolutions. If that debate is not concluded, we will carry on with it on Thursday. If it should be concluded on Thursday, I should like to bring forward an item which we did not reach today, the appointment of a select committee to consider the national research council and other matters. If these items are finished on Thursday we will then continue with the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and carry forward on Friday with estimates dealing with that department, if necessary, and the Department of Agriculture.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 15, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DORION—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON FEBRUARY 9

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has been brought to my attention that on Thursday night last the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made certain remarks pertaining to a declaration which I am alleged to have made in the course of a meeting held at Papineauville in Quebec last October. These remarks appear in Hansard beginning at page 1909. The hon. member attributed to me the following words:

Prime Minister Diefenbaker had promptly closed the door on this immigration—

At this point the hon. member added his own comment—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member proceeds further would he indicate on what date the remarks which he now attempts to raise as a matter of privilege were made? Was it Thursday?

Mr. Dorion: It was last Thursday, but this is the first opportunity I have had to correct this statement because I was absent from the house.

Mr. Speaker: It is not customary to permit matters of privilege to be raised on statements made in the house in full session unless the exception is taken at the time the statement is made. Yesterday I prevented an hon. member from referring back even one day. Unless there is a grave matter for correction, it would seem to me to be contrary to our practice to go back to matters occurring, in this case, almost a week ago. If any hon. member disagrees with my interpretation of the rules I shall be glad to hear him, but that is my view.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not in the house at the time of the attack made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Now the hon. member is in the house for the first time. I submit that he is entitled to rise on a question of privilege and deal with these personal charges which were made against him.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs has chosen to use that language, I may say that no personal attacks whatever were made. I read extracts from the newspapers, sir.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was present on the occasion when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate spoke. I considered the matter of such grave consequence that I rose to a point of order to draw to the hon. member's attention the denial which the Secretary of State had made in November of these various remarks. I believe this is the first occasion the Secretary of State has had to explain his position, and I think he should be permitted to proceed.

Mr. Pearson: Why is it the first occasion?

Mr. Speaker: If there is a serious question of privilege and this is the first opportunity that has arisen on which it could be raised, I think perhaps I should accept the hon. member's statement to that effect, although it seems to me that anything of consequence would certainly have come to his attention within the week. Would the hon. member give me the page reference?

Mr. Dorion: Page 1909, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member state as succinctly as he can the matters complained of?

Mr. Dorion: It is this very serious matter, Mr. Speaker. I believe I am perfectly right in re-establishing the facts. The hon. member attributed to me the following words:

Prime Minister Diefenbaker had promptly closed the door on this immigration—

And here the hon. member added his own comment:

—that is the English immigration—

The hon. gentleman went on to attribute to me the following words:

—and was trying to offset the Liberal anglicization by fostering immigration from Italy.

This is absolutely and completely false.

Mr. Denis: I was there when he said it.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: I believe the hon. member must take my word for it, and I have all the necessary evidence to prove the truth of my statement.

(Text):

This is absolutely and completely false. Never, at any time, did I say such a thing, and the comments of the hon. member are consequently unfounded.

As for two other statements attributed to me, I would point out that on November 18, 1960 I gave an explanation to this house. This appears at pages 11, 12 and following of Hansard. Despite this, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has ignored the well-established practice of this house that in such circumstances the member's declaration must be accepted.

With reference to Italian immigration, I did not myself approach that problem; I only answered an accusation brought up by a Liberal attending the meeting. Then I stated that this government stands for immigration on a selective basis taking into account the needs of employment and manpower. I can assure the house that my remarks were in no way designed to raise a question of prejudice toward either of the races of Canada. As a matter of fact, I then explicitly indicated that this explanation was not given in any spirit of prejudice.

(Translation):

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that those words were spoken in a public debate which I attended in Papineauville—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Denis: —and the words read by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in the newspaper were the very same that were spoken at that meeting by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Dorion: This is absolutely false.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I understood it, the question of privilege was raised with respect to something said by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make an observation with respect to what the hon. gentleman said. I think the best observation I can make, sir, is to read the hon. gentleman's own words at page 12 of Hansard of November 18, where it will be seen quite clearly that the hon. gentleman was very careful on that occasion not to deny those words. I will read his own words.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it would be unnecessary for the hon. member to read, provided that he gives the reference, as the hon. member did. Hon. members could then read for themselves.

Mr. Pickersgill: What the hon. gentleman did say on that occasion, sir, as was given to the house the other evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—

Mr. Grafftey: Divide and rule; race against race.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may be allowed perhaps the same freedom to speak that the Secretary of State was allowed, without help from the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi—

Mr. Grafftey: Divide and rule.

Mr. Speaker: I hear interruptions constantly. If hon. members have any objection to the course which is being followed they should rise and state it; otherwise I expect them to maintain silence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I read certain statements on November 18, and I read them again from newspapers, in the English and French languages, which had correspondents at that meeting. On November 18 the hon. gentleman did say that the press reports were rather different from things he had said, but he was very careful not to deny the express words I had read on that occasion. It occurred to me that he had not denied them for the very good reason that there were a very large number of witnesses present on that occasion, and that was the reason I read them.

Mr. Speaker: The Secretary of State is the person in the best position to know what he said, and he has indicated the exception he takes to words attributed to him and has made the correction which, it seems to me, is all that is necessary to be said at this time.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): When this matter came up in November the hon. member claimed that he had been misquoted. The minister also said at that time that he had with him the actual text of what he said. Perhaps the minister can set this matter at rest once and for all by reading to us from that text what he said.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I always understood on a question of privilege that an hon. member's word was accepted. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said on Thursday last that if there was a denial of this he would accept the word of the Secretary of State. That denial has been made and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that is the end of the question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Denis: Ten witnesses.

Mr. Speaker: It is the practice of the house to accept the word of a member given in his place. However, as has been pointed out heretofore, that does not prevent an hon. member from indicating such inconsistencies or circumstances as were his reason for having made the prior statement. I trust the matter has been sufficiently reviewed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WASHINGTON—FURTHER STATEMENT RESPECTING VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on February 8 I informed the house that I had accepted President Kennedy's invitation to visit Washington on February 20.

Detailed arrangements have now been made for that visit. I shall be accompanied by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the ambassador in Washington. I understand that the President will be accompanied by the secretary of state, Mr. Dean Rusk, and by the United States ambassador designate to Canada, Mr. Livingstone Merchant, whose recent appointment evoked universal approval everywhere in our country.

I wish to take this opportunity to express again my satisfaction at the prospect of a private and informal meeting with the President. I feel certain that at this time of serious risk in international affairs all members of the house will agree that it is beneficial that there should be discussion between the leaders of the United States and Canadian governments.

I shall not be able to specify in advance or in detail any of the subjects for discussion. Naturally among those subjects will be the most critical international issues of the moment, and I hope it will also be possible to cover other international matters and the general field of United States-Canadian relations.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house will have listened with interest to the further information from the Prime Minister about his visit to Washington. I think we all agree with him that it is important and is bound to be beneficial to have these talks, particularly at this time.

I can only repeat what I said the other day. We on this side wish him every success in these talks and in the effort which they symbolize to improve the already good relations between our two countries. May I say that I learned with particular pleasure from the Prime Minister that one of the United States participants will be Mr. Livingstone Merchant. I am sure everyone, as the Prime Minister has said, welcomes him back to Canada where he has already been stationed, and where he has already done fine service in the cause of good relations between our two countries.

May I presume to suggest to the Prime Minister that one of the things of value that might emanate from these talks would be a reaffirmation on the part of both governments of their strong support for the Secretary General of the United Nations, who is now under such a vicious and unjustifiable attack.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group wish the Prime Minister every success in his talks with President Kennedy working toward world peace and disarmament and the other policies that all of us in the house hope will develop in the months and years ahead. We trust that in doing so he will present what I think is the view of all the Canadian people by putting forward a constructive, co-operative but truly Canadian policy that represents our status as a nation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank both hon. gentlemen. May I say to the Leader of the Opposition that a reiteration of the attitude of Canadians as a whole respecting Mr. Hammerskjold and his contribution to world peace will certainly be in order and will be one of the first things to be discussed. All of us are agreed that the United Nations shall not be destroyed as a result of the truculent attitude of any one nation; nor shall it become, as the U.S.S.R. would have it become if Mr. Khrushchev's words of last September mean anything, a puppet of the U.S.S.R.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF INTEREST, PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act to increase the rates of interest to be credited to the fund by the receiver general semi-annually on the minimum balance to the credit of the fund in each month; and to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this question is in ten parts and the answers include a number of figures and statistical information. I therefore suggest that the answer be printed in Hansard without my reading it.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister leave to have his answer printed in Hansard as suggested?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

U.S. PIPE LINE WORKERS, B.C.—REGULATIONS

Question No. 118—Mr. Batten:

1. Do any regulations exist with respect to the admission of workers from the United States to Canada for employment in the construction of pipelines in British Columbia?
2. If so, what are the provisions of these regulations?
3. Have any American workers been admitted to Canada, since January 1960, for such work and pursuant to these regulations?
4. If so, how many, and in what classification of employment?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to question 1 is yes. The answer to question 2 is as follows. Section 7 (1)(h) of the Immigration Act provides that persons engaged in a legitimate profession, trade or occupation may be allowed to enter and remain in Canada as non-immigrants for the temporary exercise of their respective callings. It is the government's policy that such persons shall not be admitted unless the examining immigration officer is satisfied that the individual's services are required in Canada. In the case of such trades and occupations as pipe-line workers, where it is considered that the employment of a permanent resident may be adversely affected, the national employment service is consulted to ensure that the services of local residents with the required qualifications are not available. Admission of workers from the United States for temporary employment in the construction of pipe lines in British Columbia is governed by this section and the policy I have outlined.

The answer to question 3 is yes.

The answer to question 4 is that 17 persons have been admitted to Canada from the United States since January, 1960, for temporary employment in the construction of pipe lines in British Columbia. Five of these were described as superintendents, one of an entire project, with an assistant, and the others of various phases of the operation; three were engineers and three were foremen, all with specialized functions; there were two office managers, a project manager and a chief inspector. One was described as a material co-ordinator and the last was a representative of the United States concern interested in the purchase of the gas from the Canadian owners. All of these men except one foreman, who has since been admitted to Canada for permanent residence, and the representative of the United States purchasers, were destined for employment to one or other of the two concerns who are engineering and constructing the pipe line in the Cranbrook area. Temporary admission was allowed for various periods of time up to a year, pending completion of the project, and in each case the approval of the national employment service was obtained.

Question No. 128—Mr. Chevrier:

1. How many copies of the main census form will have to be printed because of the revision of the questionnaire as outlined in the letter of the dominion statistician dated February 10, 1961?
2. What cost will be involved?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to question No. 1 is, 7,104,000. The answer to question No. 2 is that the Department of Public Printing and Stationery has estimated the cost at $160,000.

SEATTLE, WASHINGTON EXPOSITION—CANADIAN EXHIBIT

Question No. 129—Mr. Taylor:

1. Is the government proposing to enter a Canadian exhibit in the 1962, $45 million, six-month "Century 21" exposition in Seattle, Washington?
2. Has the government received a request from the government of British Columbia to consider sharing the costs of an appropriate exhibit in this exposition?
3. If so, what is the nature of the reply given to the government of British Columbia?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to question No. 1 is, yes. The answer to question No. 2 is, no. Question No. 3 is answered by the reply to question No. 2.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether, in the light of his reply to my starred question earlier today concerning the exposition in Seattle, Washington, he can give the estimated cost of Canadian participation, and state whether we are going to build a pavilion there.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commirce): The estimated cost in $300,000, and it is expected that we will occupy rental space rather than construct a pavilion.

[Mr. Taylor.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—CONTRIBUTIONS BY FISHERMEN

Question No. 130—Mr. Howard:

For each year since fishermen have been covered by unemployment insurance, what was: (a) the amount of contributions received from fishermen while engaged in fishing? (b) the amount of contribution received from recipients of benefits under the provision of coverage for fishermen while such recipients were engaged in non-fishing employment?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): The answer to part (a) of the question is:

The amount of unemployment insurance contributions paid by fishermen in each fiscal year since they have been covered by the legislation is as follows:

1957-58	$359,204.82
1958-59	387,699.92
1959-60	453,613.58
Apr./60-Dec. 31/60	472,281.94

There is no record which would enable part (b) to be answered.

STATEMENT ON CANADIAN ADHERENCE TO GENEVA CONVENTION

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to the question put to me in French by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) on February 9 last, whereby she wished to know why the government had not implemented the recommendations of the Ilsley report to the effect that Canada should sign the Universal Convention on copyright, adopted in Geneva, in 1952.

I wish to inform the hon. member that Canada did sign that convention but that, in the interval, parliament has not yet been called upon to ratify it. Why? The hon. member will appreciate that I cannot answer on behalf of the former government. As for this government—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister has misunderstood. I asked whether there were any further questions to be made orders for return.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order No. 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the addition of 165,000 persons to the ranks of the unemployed during the past month.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex East has invoked standing order No. 26 to ask for leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss an increase in the number of persons unemployed.

No one would question that the matter is one of public importance. What I have to determine is whether there is that urgency of debate in connection with this matter which would warrant our interrupting the normal course of our proceedings so as to permit a debate on this subject matter on the ground that there has not been, or is not, an opportunity, or sufficient opportunity, for the house to discuss this question. It seems to me that is the simple proposition before the Chair.

Similar motions have been moved in the past, or at least leave has been requested in the past, and I have on each occasion taken the view that to discuss unemployment in general terms under a motion to adjourn the house under standing order 26, where there has been ample discussion or considerable discussion, or at least ample opportunity in general debates to discuss the question of unemployment, would not be in accordance with the urgency of debate which the rule contemplates, and I see no reason for taking a different course at this time, more particularly as we have had very considerable discussion of the serious problem of unemployment both in the immediately preceding days and in the earlier part of the session. Moreover, I expect there will be ample opportunity in the ensuing days.

If the hon. member for Essex East has a word to say on the question of urgency of debate I will hear him on that subject only.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think Your Honour's statement of the procedural situation is one which will be accepted by all hon. members. We are not asking that there should be a general discussion of the problem. As you have pointed out, there has already been presented this session an opportunity for discussing the generality of the problem. What we are asking is an opportunity to discuss something new, namely the fact that the government's announcement today indicates that 165,000 more persons are out of work than in the previous reporting period.

This is a new fact, and if we are not given an opportunity to debate this matter at this time there will be no opportunity provided in the foreseeable future. The estimates of the Department of Labour have not been called. If they had been called, we might have urged the government to introduce those estimates forthwith. But there is nothing now before the house which would enable us under our procedures to discuss this matter which, as Your Honour said, no one will suggest is not a matter of urgent public importance.

This question has suddenly confronted us in its present serious proportions; and, because of its admitted character, it would seem to me that Your Honour would, on reflection, agree that there being no opportunity today, no opportunity that is presented unless the Department of Labour esimates were before us, we should not be precluded at this time from discussing this further development which arises out of the most important domestic problem which, regrettably, faces our country today. For these reasons I ask leave to present this motion.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Peterborough wish to say something before I deal with the matter.

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): I should like to support the position taken by the hon. member for Essex East. I think it is indicative of the importance and urgency of this matter that we in this corner had also decided to ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the same reason. The figures have just been published, and we shall have no further opportunity to discuss this matter in the foreseeable future.

Unemployment

Mr. Speaker: I think I need not hear the minister, because I am not prepared to accept the proposition that the increase in numbers has altered the case. The hon. member has asked me to distinguish the over-all problem of unemployment and the problem which arises from a substantial increase in one month's unemployed as reported, but in view of the course of this session, which was called for the indicated purpose of dealing with the over-all problem of unemployment, it does not seem to me that the house would be warranted in following the hon. member's suggestion when so much of its direct attention in this session has been devoted to this specific problem, regardless of its proportions or whether it has increased to 10 per cent from 5 per cent or whatever the figures may be.

The session has largely been devoted and presumably will be devoted to that specific problem. With regret, then, I must inform the hon. member for Essex East that I do not accept the distinction.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: It has been well established that the ruling is not on a point of order and that there is no appeal.

Mr. Regier: In that case I should like to rely on a precedent and appeal your ruling that there is no appeal to this ruling. There is a precedent.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a precedent I, of course, would be interested in hearing it.

Mr. Regier: I do not have it with me at the moment. However, I believe all the older members of this house will recall when there was an appeal against a decision of the Chair that there is no appeal from his ruling.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that is so; and at that time the house upheld the decision that there is no appeal from the Speaker's ruling on this matter. Surely, then, there should be some termination to this question. There must be some finality as to the rules of the house and the decisions the house makes on them. This house has twice itself decided that there is no appeal allowed on this point.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on the point raised by the Minister of Justice, it is a strange point and I am amazed that he should raise it. The house on a decision like this would tie its hands indefinitely even against an appeal. Surely each parliament is the master of its own rules. If the suggestion of the minister were followed you might as well tear up the rule book and throw it away.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is tearing it up.

Mr. Argue: If an appeal on a point of order at one time with a certain result prevents the same kind of appeal ever again being made, our position would be untenable. I think the Minister of Finance knows that such a suggestion is absolutely intolerable.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows, of course, that the house is master of its own procedure, and it is the duty of the Chair to carry out the orders and practices which the house has approved. The precedent is clear. As stated by the Minister of Justice, there was an attempt made at one stage to see in the refusal of an appeal a point of order in itself and to appeal that point of order, but the house by its decision denied that that was so, and that stands until the house orders to the contrary. Therefore I cannot accept the hon. member's appeal on the basis that there is no appeal.

Mr. Regier: If I may speak to this point of order—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: There is now no point of order.

Mr. Regier: Surely it is preposterous for a parliament to determine rules for a parliament in the future.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for Assiniboia and have given my decision.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there would be any objection to allowing this motion to stand. I have to make further inquiries in connection with it.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should be very happy to agree to that, sir.

Motion stands.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have communicated with the commissioners of the unemployment insurance commission in respect of this motion. Motion stands.

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CALLING OF LABOUR ESTIMATES TO DISCUSS UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would request the house to give unanimous approval to the calling, immediately, of the estimates of the Department of Labour, so that we can discuss without any delay the serious unemployment situation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there will be a supply motion on Monday, when every opportunity will be given to hon. gentlemen to speak on this subject if it is within the rules of the house so to do. If that motion is passed, and if the house so wills, among the estimates to be called will be those of the Department of Labour.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not regard this problem as so urgent that no delay can be permitted in having this house discuss a matter which the Prime Minister said he would solve when he addressed himself to the Canadian people?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, all I would say to the hon. gentleman is this. Everyone in this house will recall that for the last three and one half years the hon. gentleman has been making prophecies in this connection which have not turned out to be correct.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO WINTER WORKS PROGRAM AND FUTURE PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the serious unemployment crisis, as shown by statistics now made available to the house, can the minister say what result his winter works program has had in dealing with this question, and whether the government has any further plans to present to parliament during this session to deal with this national emergency?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer categorically yes or no a question of this sort, but with the consent of the house I should like to make a statement at this time in respect to this serious situation.

Mr. Argue: Can we reply to it on motions?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the request of the Minister of Labour ought to be acceded to, but in view of the seriousness of this problem today we should be given an opportunity to comment on it.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the remarks which have already been made, I would think the minister's statement would open up a debate. If the house wants to enter into a debate it can do so by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Labour would have to get the consent of the house to revert to motions.

Mr. Pearson: We would be delighted to give the minister consent at this time in order to have a debate on this matter, which the minister would introduce by his statement.

Mr. Argue: Much as we would like to have a debate, is there not an alternative procedure, namely that we revert to motions by unanimous consent, the minister makes his statement and each of the opposition parties has a chance to reply to the statement?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Robichaud: Are you afraid of it?

Mr. Speaker: Well, I am not sure that I understand. Is the minister asking for leave to revert to motions? If he is, I will deal with it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, surely this is an extraordinary situation. A minister of the crown—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know hon. gentlemen do not like this.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I asked the minister whether he wished me to ask the house for leave to revert to motions; having had no response, we are on orders of the day and the hon. member for Essex East is entitled to rise and ask a question or speak on a question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the Minister of Labour kindly give to the house now the statement which he announced a few moments ago he was going to give today?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I was prepared to give a detailed reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia, but certainly there was no intention on my part to start a debate on this subject since you had previously ruled that at this time such a debate was not in order.

Mr. Argue: Obviously the minister's reply should follow the rules; in other words, it should be a concise reply to a question and he should not take advantage of a question on the orders of the day to make a provocative statement which is very likely not founded on fact.

Mr. Speaker: In conformity with the rules the minister has an opportunity to reply, if he can reply, to a question in as broad terms as that one.

Mr. Starr: It is difficult to give a full reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia, but as far as the municipal winter works program is concerned, the suggestion that there may be 200,000 people employed on site and off site under that program is about fulfilled, and this government in those measures that it has fulfilled and those programs that it has approved and put into effect will continue to do everything within its power to help this serious unemployment situation, which is of concern not only to this government but to all the people of Canada.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. On a former occasion the minister said that a responsibility lies with management and labour to deal with the unemployment crisis. Can he tell the house how he expects management and labour to deal with the government's responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question leads directly to debate; it is a debating question, and I do not propose to accept it.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have a supplementary question. It is quite in order and supplementary to what has been said previously. Has the minister received any complaints from municipalities or trade unions in southeastern British Columbia concerning the winter works program regulations as being too inflexible, and urging the necessity for great flexibility in the regulations in order to give due consideration to climatic and other local circumstances? If so, is consideration being given to modification of the regulations to meet these particular climatic and local circumstances, and thereby employ many more people?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of this question, and I wish to advise him that a letter has been forwarded to me signed by Mr. W. S. King, recording secretary, and Mr. D. R. Calder, president, brotherhood of locomotive firemen and engineers, from Revelstoke. In their letter they complain about two projects in that municipality which had been turned down. I might mention that five other projects were accepted.

The two which were turned down, Mr. Speaker, were first of all a project to slash, pile and burn brush for a distance of 15 miles along a right of way for a transmission line. This would have employed three men. It was turned down at the instigation of the province, which felt that the project was not appropriate. The other project was slashing brush at the Revelstoke airport which was, of course, completely outside the scope of the winter works project.

On the five projects which were approved, work was provided for 60 men for approximately two months.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR MEETING OF LABOUR MANAGEMENT AND GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received a request from the premier of Nova Scotia for a meeting of representatives of the government of Nova Scotia, of management, of labour and of the federal government on the matter of closing of the three collieries in Cape Breton.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question categorically. The Leader of the Opposition will understand that I have to make an examination of the records.

RAND REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO PUBLICATION OF COMMENTARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a request from various bodies on the island of Cape Breton requesting the government to make public a special commentary prepared by Mr. Vissac on the report of Mr. Justice Rand? If so, will the Prime Minister tell the house whether he expects to take any action on this matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been correspondence—a couple of telegrams were received today—in connection with the Vissac statement. After the matter has been looked into an answer will be given.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE—REPORTED REMOVAL OF GENERAL MOTORS PLANT FROM WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a telegram from George Burt, Canadian director of the united automobile workers, saying he has information that the General Motors Company may be preparing to move their motor plant operations out of Windsor after 36 years in that city? Has the Prime Minister interceded with General Motors to see whether or not this very regrettable action may be in the offing?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a telegram from Mr. George Burt in which he urges me:

> To help us get from General Motors immediate and unequivocal statement as to accuracy of press reports which say G.M. will move its motor plant operations out of Windsor.

Of course the hon. gentleman knows the government of Canada has no authority over General Motors or over the action of any corporation or individual. We are unable to secure information by a simple request. In view of this telegram I have had General Motors communicated with, and any statement with respect to this matter will have to come from that corporation, whose decision it will be. However, I think I might add that I believe any fears of early action in that regard are not well founded.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister—

Mr. Argue: Can the Prime Minister say—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia should have the first supplementary question. I note the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Argue: Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether this very urgent problem has been placed before the royal commission, and whether this particular problem is within the scope of the inquiry being made by the commission?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would suggest that the hon. gentleman read the powers of the royal commission and make his own interpretation. However, I would say that the government has not brought this matter to the attention of the royal commission. No doubt the information will be available to that commission, as it is to the hon. gentleman, it having received publicity.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his statement that he has been in touch with the General Motors Corporation regarding this matter? Does the Prime Minister not think that the emergency action taken by the President of the United States in such matters in calling together labour and management would be one device by which this kind of problem now affecting Windsor could be adequately investigated and solved.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is certainly not supplementary, and it has all the characteristics of presenting a point of view rather than asking for information.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LEASING OF PREMISES FOR USE AS PRISONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and I regret not having been able to send him notice. My question arises out of a newspaper report in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that reform institutions minister Wardrope of the Ontario provincial government has announced that the Ontario government is leasing certain buildings at Elliot Lake for use as institutional buildings. I should like to ask whether or not a similar course might be considered by the government in relation to its move to establish minimum and medium security prisons.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have in mind and have had for some time the acquisition of suitable property in Ontario for expanding the variety of our institutions in the province. An anouncement was made recently that a property had been acquired at Gravenhurst. So far as I recall, we have no immediate plans for the acquisition of further properties, but our needs will be kept under constant review and so also will the situation at Elliot Lake.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—REPORTED SALE OF SECURITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister noticed the question asked the Prime Minister on Monday last with respect to whether consultations were held recently between the government and the Bank of Canada concerning the recent sale by the bank of unusually large amounts of bonds and securities, thereby reducing the available money supply in Canada, and the reply of the Prime Minister that an answer would be forthcoming at the earliest possible time? Would the minister enlighten the country as to why there is a contraction of the money supply at a time of growing unemployment?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have already been on my feet three times today attempting to answer this question so that the hon. member might not be put to the trouble of asking it again. I was made aware of the question which he asked on Monday in my absence and to which the Prime Minister indicated an answer would be made.

It is normal in this country for the money supply to contract in the month of January. In that month the Bank of Canada normally reduces its holdings of government securities in order to offset the effect on chartered bank cash reserves of the heavy post-Christmas seasonal flow-back of currency from the general public into the chartered banks.

The hon. member has added to his question an indication that what has been happening has unusually reduced the available money supply in Canada. I should like to point out to him, Mr. Speaker, that the total money supply, which includes currency in the hands of the public as well as total chartered bank deposits, on December 28, 1960 was 5.2 per cent greater than it had been 52 weeks earlier. As of February 1, 1961 the 52-week increase, that is the increase over the same date 52 weeks earlier, was 5.5 per cent.

Perhaps I might add some figures in this respect. The total money supply in Canada on February 1, 1961 was $13,763 million, and this was an increase of $718 million over the corresponding date in 1960.

Mr. Regier: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the minister admit that the sales of bonds and securities by the Bank of Canada exceed normal sales for the same month in other years?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will not admit what is not a fact, namely that there has been any abnormal decrease in the money supply. The actual decrease that occurred in January was confined to the weeks in which January 11 and January 18 fell, and there was an increase from January 18 to January 25 and another increase between January 25 and February 1 in the total money supply.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In his answer the minister has given figures relating the present money supply to the money supply 12 months earlier. He will be aware that the money supply 18 months and two years ago was approximately at the same figure as it is today. Would he explain why there has not been an increase in the money supply comparable to the increase in the gross national product, which would be about 4 per cent in that period, and the increase in population of perhaps 3 per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member must be well aware that parliament has confided to the Bank of Canada full authority over questions pertaining to money supply. The government has no authority in the field of monetary policy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It has responsibility.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member has overlooked certain facts. The money supply in recent months has reached an all-time record, and when he speaks of the money supply of 18 months ago or two years ago may I point out that at that time it did not reach the figure that it has reached latterly.

Mr. Benidickson: Very close. About the same.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I point out that the money supply on December 28, 1960 reached a figure of $13,811 million, which was $687 million more than the figure 12 months earlier. I have also given the figures for the various weeks in January. To make comparisons of increases week by week will demonstrate to anyone who takes the trouble to look up the figures that the increase in money supply between January 25 and February 1, compared with the same period a year ago, was quite substantial. I pointed out that the increase at February 1 over the same date a year ago was $718 million.

Mr. Benidickson: I referred to two years ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not have the figures before me for two years ago, but I will say from memory without a moment's hesitation that the figure at this present time is considerably larger than the figure of two years ago.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps the minister would reply to my question tomorrow after he has looked up the information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member wants more statistical information I point out that it is available to every member of the house in the published accounts, but if he wishes statistical information of this kind selected and put on the record of the house that information will be promptly given if he will put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he is now asserting that the government has no responsibility for monetary policy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am asserting what is a fact which apparently has not yet dawned on the consciousness of the Leader of the Opposition, that parliament is supreme and parliament has given this authority to the Bank of Canada and not to the government.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What a terribly weak statement by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pearson: An abdication of responsibility.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An abdication of government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether you are going to tolerate statements being made, untrue statements, by the hon. member for Essex East. He puts them on the record from his seat and he ignores you, Mr. Speaker; he turns his back on you regularly. If this sort of thing is going to continue I respectfully suggest that this hon. member should be called upon to obey the rules of the house which are binding on him as well as the 264 lesser members of the house; either that, or his untrue remark should be expunged from the records of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say through you that it is not up to the Minister of Finance to tell me how I should comport myself in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Somebody should tell you.

Mr. Ricard: Nobody can.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to ask the Minister of Finance, since he has given us this gratuitous lecture, if he does not now regard his last statement to the Leader of the Opposition as a complete abdication of the responsibilities of government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the remarks which the hon. member for Essex East made from his seat are reported, I think it would be appropriate that they be struck off the record, because they were not made in accordance with the practice of the house. I did not myself hear his remark.

If such practices are followed, then of course I have to give an opportunity to hon. members to deal with remarks made from a member's seat. It seems to me that no hon. member would want me to follow that course. The alternative is either that hon. members refrain from interrupting by remarks of that kind or, if interruptions are made, they are not noted. In a case where a comment was made I think perhaps no change should be made in the report without the leave of the house, because the record would not be complete. However, may I say to all hon. members that the course I suggested first appears to me to be the appropriate one for this sort of case, although I do not propose to follow it at this time.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to speak to the point of order. I believe that it would be a very serious practice if interruptions by hon. members were not placed in the Hansard record. We would get ourselves into all kinds of difficulty if orders went out that no interruptions by an hon. member during the course of the remarks of another hon. member were to be on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member would wait until the matter is relevant, at which time he could make these remarks. I have indicated that I have, in effect, changed my mind from the first indication I gave, because the remark in question has been replied to and the Hansard record would not be complete without it.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

BOBCAT VEHICLE—INQUIRY AS TO ORDER FOR PILOT MODELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production arising from the reaction of disappointment at the lakehead to yesterday's announcement respecting the pilot project order for the Bobcat. If the development of the Bobcat has been completed, why is it necessary to develop further pilot models over a two-year period rather than initiate production in the magnitude of several hundred, as indicated by General Pearkes last year?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): This would be a very appropriate question to ask the Minister of National Defence, because this is an order from national defence.

Mr. Fisher: May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister, in his visit to the lakehead this week end, would discuss with the municipal authorities their views on the Bobcat and their general disappointment at what has developed in this regard.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not object to hearing from the people. This is one of the reasons I am going to the lakehead, to get as close as possible to the people and learn what views they have.

May I say this, that the order that has been given is for some 20 of the Bobcats. I am not able to say definitely what the extra cost would be, but I think the differences in cost between Montreal and Fort William are of such a nature that all reasonable people would agree with the course that is being followed by the department.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add, if I may, to the answer I gave the hon. member for Port Arthur. I would like to give the reasons it was considered impracticable for Canadian Car Company Limited to carry out the next phase of the Bobcat program at their Fort William plant.

(1) The company has spent approximately $21 million in establishing an up-to-date and modern facility in the Montreal area.

[Mr. Speaker.]

(2) All engineering and design personnel are located at the Montreal plant.

(3) The testing facilities of the army, which will be required to be used during the preproduction pilot stage of the program, are located on the Montreal road outside of Ottawa en route to Montreal.

(4) Personnel of the Canadian army development establishment and other members of the quartermaster general's branch, who will be required to exercise very close supervision of the program, are located at army headquarters in Ottawa.

(5) The senior officers of the company who are directly concerned with this program are located in Montreal and could not be transferred to Fort William.

Following the 20 preproduction pilot models being produced, when it is possible to proceed with the production of the balance of 480 vehicles this will be determined on the basis of competitive tender. This could mean that if Canadian Car Company Limited were the successful tenderer, production of the Bobcat could take place at Fort William, provided the company so elected. However—and I want to be frank in this connection—it is extremely doubtful whether the company would be in a competitive position if the manufacture took place at Fort William.

We have given a great deal of attention to this matter and have endeavoured in every way possible to do our part to assure the maintenance of the program, but the circumstances of distance and of non-competibility, and the other circumstances to which I have made reference, determine the course in question in so far as the preproduction program is concerned.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—EXTENSION OF SPECIAL ALLOWANCE TO RETURNED PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the house whether the Canadian soldiers who were injured in clashes with the Congolese and returned to Canada before December would be eligible for the special allowances to Canadian soldiers participating in the Congo action?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This is a matter which concerns the Department of National Defence and not the Department of External Affairs. I will pass on the question to my colleague.

TRADE

O.E.C.D.—REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION BY HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider bringing to the house for examination at the earliest possible date the agreement setting up the organization for economic co-operation and development. I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, because strong opposition seems to be developing toward that agreement in congress, where it is now being submitted for approval, and unanimous Canadian action might help in this respect.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the present plans are to introduce this measure at an early date.

JAPAN—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I asked the question yesterday of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I was referred to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister inform the house whether the Japanese-Canadian trade negotiations are still in progress, and could he report to the house whether any agreement or understanding has been reached?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the discussions are still in progress.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister care to comment on the press report, attributed to a member of the Japanese delegation, that unless a satisfactory agreement is reached Japan might be forced to purchase her wheat elsewhere, in the United States and Australia?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to a press report that appeared several weeks ago, all I can say is that I was informed that the report was completely inaccurate and no such statement was authorized.

PUBLIC WORKS

VANCOUVER—EXTENSION OF STANLEY PARK SEAWALL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he is ready to answer the question I asked him yesterday, and to which he said he would reply today.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there will be an item in the supplementary estimates to cover the point raised by the hon. member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROCEDURE RESPECTING CORRECTION OF OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. Speaker: There have been an unusual number of corrections of a minor nature today. The house must appreciate that there is an opportunity for every member to go to the editor's office, read the original transcript of his remarks, and make his corrections at that time. It is really a duty to do that, to save the time of the house which is otherwise consumed in making corrections which are not of great significance. Furthermore, the disadvantage of making the correction in the house is that the text has already gone out to the country in its erroneous form, whereas if hon. members would take the trouble of looking over the transcript of their remarks the report would go out in the first printed issue in the corrected form. Hon. members would not then have to rely on a correction which may never come to the attention of the person who reads the first printed text. This applies particularly if those corrections are verbal and do not involve any matter of principle or grave misunderstanding.

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I actually corrected the text. This was added after correction. This was a subtitle and could not be corrected by the member himself. That is the reason I called it to the attention of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I am not complaining particularly about the hon. member, or any hon. member. I am just pointing out that the house cannot afford to spend a considerable amount of time on having corrections made to Hansard. I hope hon. members will note this.

There are occasions when members may rise on a matter of personal privilege if an error in Hansard is creating some serious inconvenience or injury. I think that should be the criterion, and the only criterion.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who will not be able to return to the house until perhaps after orders of the day, I have been requested to ask the Prime Minister this question.

With respect to the question the hon. member raised on Monday, has the Prime Minister seen fit to table such correspondence as he has received from premiers who have consented to the tabling, even if some consents have not been received?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not received the consents of the premiers to the tabling. As soon as they are received the documents in question will be tabled.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the Prime Minister that, as reported at page 1972 of Hansard for February 13, he replied previously to the hon. member in this way:

I think that one or two have not yet replied.

That is referring to one or two of the premiers:

If I do not have any replies from them I take it that it will be in order to table the others.

It was on that point that I wished an answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciated that, Mr. Speaker.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

NATIONAL GALLERY—DISPLAY OF PORTRAIT OF MARQUIS OF LORNE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as a socialist with some appreciation of history, on behalf of some well-known Ottawa people I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the fact that the Marquis of Lorne was the founder of the national art gallery in 1880, can the minister inform the house why the painting of the Marquis of Lorne, now in storage in a building on Echo Drive, is not displayed in the Lorne building?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member for Kootenay West that a portrait of the Marquis of Lorne by the distinguished pre-Raphaelite painter, Sir John Everett Millais, is at present hanging in the national gallery and has been hanging there since the building opened. At the present time it is not part of the curatorial plan to have two portraits of the marquis hanging at one and the same time.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that there is an excellent portrait in storage which was painted years ago, why does the government go to the extra expense of having another portrait painted?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the hon. member bring forward a notice of motion to deal with this serious matter.

CANADA COUNCIL

REFERENCE OF REPORT TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That the report of the Canada Council for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, laid before the house on July 13, 1960, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts in order to provide for a review thereof pursuant to section 23 of the Canada Council Act.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I just want to remark how satisfactory it has been to have the annual report of the Canada Council before the public accounts committee. I wish to compliment the members of that committee, of which I am not ordinarily a member, for the way they have approached this matter, and the chairman for his work.

I did want to pay a tribute to the man who headed the Canada Council and who has since died. He was a man I did not know personally. The Hon. Brooke Claxton made a great impression on those of us who had not known him before and certainly the feeling I have to a much greater extent than I had before is that the Canada Council is an expression of one of his dreams and ambitions. He is now gone, but I hope we can all continue to see in the Canada Council the kind of Canadianism and Canadian idea he was out to express.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I do not desire to hold up this motion, but this gives me an opportunity to pay my tribute to the work of the council and especially to the contribution made to that work by the late chairman and my former colleague in the house, Mr. Brooke Claxton. In doing this may I add my expression of good will to the present chairman.

I was interested to read in the press not long ago that the present chairman had indicated that more funds would be required if the council is to be able to carry out the kind of job it hopes to perform. No doubt this is one of the matters which will be considered by those concerned, and at this time I have nothing to say about that request. However, I do feel, as I am sure all hon. members feel, that the council has already abundantly justified its existence. We hope it will be able to continue that existence in a way which will make a special contribution to the development of Canada in fields other than material.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Before this motion passes I should just like to express my appreciation of the work which has been done by the Canada Council since its formation during, shall I say, what was almost an experimental period, because many problems had to be met.

I rise principally to urge that every consideration should be given to groups in the smaller communities such as little theatres and others connected with various forms of the arts and to suggest that there might possibly be some total survey made of the needs of these smaller communities across Canada. I personally am a great believer in doing even more in percentage terms for the smaller communities than is done in the cities where the opportunities are so much greater. I firmly believe that if the council can make a grant for someone to study constitutional law which I do not look upon as a cultural activity—indeed, I was rather surprised that such a grant should have been made—then, surely, the council could do something for the smaller communities which I represent.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. gentlemen who have participated in this short but, I think, effective debate. It indicates the unanimity of hon. members in this house with regard to the necessity of encouraging those concerned with Canada's cultural and artistic standards.

Mention was made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) of the request made recently by the chairman of the Canada Council, Dr. Bissell, who, I know, will be a worthy successor to the Hon. Brooke Claxton. Dr. Bissell and those associated with him made a presentation to the government in connection with the needs of the council and stated in relation to the scholarship and fellowship program, and to the organization representing the country's developing arts, that certain minimal additional sums would be required to meet the present needs in both these fields. With regard to the scholarships and fellowships, the request was for an additional $250,000. In addition to that, for organizations such as were referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and other artistic organizations across Canada, a further $250,000 would be required.

The income from the endowment fund for the current fiscal year is estimated to be approximately $2,900,000, and those associated with the board estimate that a further $500,000 would be required. The need of assistance for the cultural things of life are indicated by the fact that the board's representations were to the effect that in 1957-58 Canada's theatres asked for $89,000 and were granted $60,000; in 1960-61 they asked for $290,000 and were given $119,000. In connection with orchestras in various parts of Canada, in 1957-58 ten Canadian orchestras asked for $172,000 and were granted $130,000; in 1960-61 nine orchestras asked for $245,000 and were granted $205,000. In so far as the smaller communities are concerned, there are some seven or eight orchestras in such communities which need help, help which cannot now be given because grants to orchestras at the present level already account for over one fifth of the funds available for all artistic organizations.

Finally, in the field of ballet, in 1957-58 the grant asked for was $136,000 and the amount granted was just $6,000 less, while in 1960-61 the amount asked for was $225,000 and the amount granted was $160,000.

Believing, as all of us do, that there is a major need for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences in Canada —a need to stimulate the national culture— I have no doubt these are matters which will receive, and can receive, the attention of the committee to which this report will go if the present motion is passed.

May I conclude by saying that I join with the hon. member from Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) and the Leader of the Opposition in their references to the late Brooke Claxton. He made an outstanding contribution, first in the days of war, then in the parliament of this country and, later, upon ceasing to be a member of parliament and of the cabinet of Mr. St. Laurent, by giving leadership to the arts, something that is most laudable and commendable. I appreciate the attitude taken by members in all parts of the house and trust that when the report of the Canada Council comes before the committee the commendation to the late chairman and the manner in which the council was conducted last year will be representative of what will happen again this year.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the Public Accounts, volumes I and II and the report of the auditor general for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, and the financial statements of the Canada council and the report of the Auditor General thereon for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, this motion relates to the referral of volumes I and II of the public accounts and the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960 to the standing committee on public accounts. The second volume referred to is the report respecting crown companies. The Auditor General has filed a separate report this year. I say "separate" because in past years the report has been a part of the large, thick volume of the details of the accounts. I commend the Auditor General for preparing a separate volume because it is certainly more convenient for those who want to deal only with the Auditor General's remarks to consult the separate small report instead of the large volume which is exceedingly bulky.

In paragraph No. 112 of the Auditor General's report he points out that the Auditor General is eligible to be appointed the auditor or joint auditor of a crown corporation and that the accounts and financial statements of 22 of the 26 corporations were examined by his audit office in the year under review. He lists those on page 54 of his report.

In paragraph No. 113 he goes on to say that the accounts of the crown corporations and other public instrumentalities set out were not examined by the Auditor General in the year under review. These are the Bank of Canada, the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust, the Canadian National Railways West Indies Steamships Limited, the Canadian wheat board, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the industrial development bank and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Hon. members will recognize that some of those crown companies are examined on an annual basis by committees other than the public accounts committee. Others are not examined annually but are examined only periodically. A request has been made that the report of the Bank of Canada when tabled, as it likely will be next month, be referred to the banking and commerce committee. No encouragement has been given by the government in response to that request. As I understand it the public accounts committee has not to date examined any of those crown companies which are not audited by the Auditor General. As far as I can see, in reading the authority of the public accounts committee and this motion, there is no valid reason why the public accounts committee would not be able to review all of the accounts of the crown companies referred to in part II.

I may say with respect to parliamentary review of the Bank of Canada, this has not been provided historically on an annual basis. There has been a periodic review. I suggest that a review would be particularly timely this session. In 1956 the annual report—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this is a very simple motion. It is the annual motion we have to refer the public accounts and report of the Auditor General to the public accounts committee. The hon. member is now talking about something that lies completely outside the scope of this motion. There is nothing here that involves the practice with respect to audit of the Bank of Canada or of the annual report of the governor. That is dealt with under other legislation entirely.

Mr. Benidickson: You will have recognized, Mr. Speaker, that I have not addressed myself to that line of argument at all. I intend to be brief and to avoid any reference to the contents of the report of the Bank of Canada for either last year or any other year. I am saying—and this is traditional at this stage in our proceedings—that this committee during the course of this session should take on the responsibility for the examination of the accounts of this crown company. I intended to go on to briefly indicate what parliamentary review we have had in recent years through a parliamentary committee.

In 1956 the annual report of the Bank of Canada was referred to the banking and commerce committee. As far as I can ascertain it was referred at the initiative of the government. I do not think that any hon. member of the opposition at that time requested that this be done.

It is true that on February 14, 1957—the next year—prior to the tabling of the 1956 report the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) did ask the minister of finance of that day if he would be able to tell the house if the banking and commerce committee would have an opportunity to review the report when presented and have the governor as a witness as was done the preceding year. The minister said that he would take into consideration what appeared to be a request. It was not a direct request.

There was a request made by me in 1959. The Minister of Finance at that time said it has not been the practice to have that report referred to the banking and commerce committee every year but that it had been done occasionally. That is in accordance with the record I have outlined.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) recently asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) if in view of the seriousness of interest in our monetary situation a parliamentary committee could not review the report of the Bank of Canada this year but we have had no encouragement in that respect. That is why I rise to suggest to the chairman of the public accounts committee that as it has been the practice each year to examine the accounts of some crown companies, this year it would be most appropriate if we were to examine the accounts of the Bank of Canada.

The importance of this examination particularly arises from the fact that—and this is not something new; I readily admit this has been typical of the annual reports of the Bank of Canada—for 1959 it contains what is the normal report for a crown corporation entitled "Profit and Loss" but many people are astonished to find in connection with these important and large operations of a crown company the profit and loss account for this crown corporation—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. gentleman is discussing something entirely outside the scope of the present motion.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that that is so. I thought perhaps the hon. member was relating his discussion of the Bank of Canada's report to the omission of that report from this motion and indicating that it ought to be included, but I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. Benidickson: You are perfectly correct, Mr. Speaker. In one or two brief sentences I was going to emphasize a further reason why the public accounts committee should perhaps examine the Bank of Canada report because they are accustomed to reviewing profit and loss statements. In the case of the Bank of Canada the profit and loss statement contains only this very minor amount of information. It says, "Profit for the year," so and so millions; "Paid to the Receiver General of Canada for credit to the consolidated revenue fund," the same so and so millions; and gives no statement whatsoever with respect to operating expenses and so on. It is for that reason that I make the suggestion.

An additional reason is that, rightly or wrongly, the Bank of Canada has been under attack and criticism recently by a majority of bank presidents in their annual statements. In part they have criticized the operations of the bank. Recently a number of economists across the country raised questions as to the activities of the bank and I suggest that it would be most timely, if the banking and commerce committee will not assume its responsibilities, to have the public accounts committee take the Bank of Canada as one of the crown companies to be examined this year.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I intend to complain about the inadequacy of the motion now before us, in the light of the needs of our nation. I should like heartily to endorse the request put forward by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). In addition to that endorsation, I intend to move an amendment to that effect to the motion now before us.

The motion is inadequate in that it does not ask the public accounts committee to investigate the annual report of the Bank of Canada. I realize that under normal conditions the banking and commerce committee might be asked to undertake this study. However, the government has refused consistently to refer the annual report of the Bank of Canada to the banking and commerce committee for consideration, and I see no logical reason, as has been said already, why the public accounts committee ought not to be asked to undertake this responsibility in addition to the responsibilities called for in the motion. I happen to be a member of both committees and I notice that in the main the membership of the committees is almost the same. Identical members of the house happen to be on both the banking and commerce committee and the standing committee on public accounts.

Earlier this afternoon mention was made of our gravest national problem, namely unemployment. The operations of the Bank of Canada are urgently in need of review because the actions of the Bank of Canada have such an important bearing on the level of employment in our nation. Our whole economic welfare is dependent upon the actions of the Bank of Canada.

As recently as this afternoon the minister attempted to divorce himself and his responsibility from the actions taken by the Bank of Canada. If the minister's contention is to be given any weight at all—I personally feel the minister is completely wrong in his denial of responsibility for the actions of the Bank of Canada; however, if—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is going certainly afield when he attempts to debate the question of responsibility of the minister for the Bank of Canada on a motion to refer to the public accounts committee certain specific items which are named in the motion.

Mr. Regier: As you indicate, I may have gone a bit beyond the rules. However, I indicated I do intend to move an amendment at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: The fact that the hon. member intends to move an amendment does not give him any greater scope in debate than he has on the motion. I hope he will keep to the main purpose of this motion which is to determine whether certain specific matters shall be referred to the public accounts committee, namely volumes I and II of the Auditor General's report and the financial statement of the Canada Council and the report of the Auditor General thereon.

Mr. Regier: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I will have to move my amendment now in order to make the rest of my remarks in order. I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher):

> That the motion now before the house be amended and that after the comma following 1960 there be inserted the words "and the latest annual report of the Bank of Canada".

The motion as amended would then read:

> That the public accounts, volumes I and II and the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, and the financial statements of the Canada Council and the report of the Auditor General thereon for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, and the latest annual report of the Bank of Canada, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

My reason for moving this amendment, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member gives any reasons perhaps he should give me any authority which would permit an amendment to be made which changes the character of the motion. This amendment introduces new matter into the motion. It is not an amendment; it is really another motion, which clearly would require notice. It is to refer the report of the Bank of Canada to a committee.

Mr. Regier: It is my humble submission that our public accounts are affected by the activities of the Bank of Canada, and the motion now before us lists an assignment to be undertaken by a standing committee of this house. My amendment merely adds to the specific work load, if you wish to call it that, of a committee that has already been established. I do not think that new matter is being introduced at all, because the activities of the Bank of Canada are tied in directly with the consolidated revenue fund of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the minister has anything to say on the point?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: My recollection is—I have not had a chance to verify it by reference to specific authority—that a motion of this kind to refer matters to a committee is amendable only within the terms of the original motion which, of course, is in line with the principle that relates to amendments generally. Citation 203 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, states the principle in paragraph 3, as follows:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

That citation does not refer specifically to this particular kind of motion; it deals with all motions. I will hear the hon. member again. I want to be satisfied that the course I have indicated is correct.

Mr. Regier: I should like to submit for your consideration that the public accounts of Canada involve the whole of the consolidated revenue fund of the government of Canada. The minister, on behalf of Canada, is the only owner of the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada is by its own legislation appointed as the fiscal agent of the government of Canada. I feel that to discuss the Bank of Canada when we are discussing the over-all and detailed financial operations of the government for the preceding year is very much in order, and that no new and different subject matter is added to the motion by the terms of the amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should have thought the point was so very plain that it would not indeed have been raised. This is a motion in the time honoured form. It has become practically an annual motion; the form of it was changed only after the Canada Council was brought into being and was enlarged simply to include, as the present motion does, the accounts and the financial statements of the Canada Council and the report of the Auditor General thereon.

What is attempted in the present amendment is to introduce something quite different and quite outside the scope of the motion. The motion contemplates a reference to the public accounts committee of certain specified documents. First, there are the two volumes of the public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960 and, second, the report of the Auditor General thereon. Third, there are the financial statements of the Canada Council and, fourth, the report of the Auditor General thereon.

That does not open the door for any hon. member to tack on the motion everything that occurs to him might well be considered by this committee. That would be opening the door to importing into such a motion matter that is entirely foreign to the motion. The public accounts committee can have referred to it many matters but a motion of this kind does not open the way for hon. members to add to the motion everything that it may appear to them desirable to have considered by the public accounts committee.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that there has been no little misapprehension indicated already in this matter. The Bank of Canada does not make an annual report. It is the governor of the Bank of Canada who makes a report and, so far as audit is concerned, the auditor general has no function whatsoever with respect to the Bank of Canada. Parliament's own legislation has provided for the appointment of auditors to the Bank of Canada. The power is given to the governor in council to appoint auditors for the Bank of Canada annually. The provisions of the legislation are quite specific on that point. The public accounts do not include the report of the Bank of Canada at all. It is a quite separate report and it comes to the minister annually about the middle of March. So, Mr. Speaker, the amendment purports to deal with something that is very different in nature from the documents that are specifically referred in the motion itself and are proposed to be referred to the committee.

I began, Mr. Speaker, by referring to the fact that this is a traditional motion. I do not recall any previous occasion when the motion was even debated. It has always been in this standard form. Normally it is the desire of all hon. members to have the public accounts and the report of the Auditor General thereon referred to the committee, and it seems to me that the discussion that has taken place this afternoon has just been a way of planting in the minds of hon. members the idea that such a motion can be amended by dragging into it anything that an hon. member thinks appropriate to refer to the committee, and in my respectful submission that is certainly not within the procedure of the house.

Mr. Speaker: In the chapter in Beauchesne dealing with motions and amendments there are two citations, Nos. 202 and 203, which deal generally with the matter. I cannot see that the hon. member can bring his proposed amendment within the scope of the rule because it calls for quite a different reference from those now in the motion. It is true that such a motion can be made as an independent motion on notice but without notice it seems to me it offends the rule because it does deal with a completely different reference to the committee. I regret, therefore, to inform the hon. member that I cannot accept the proposed amendment.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Resolved,—That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Customs Tariff and to provide:

1. That the said act be amended by adding thereto immediately after section 2 thereof the following section:

"2A. (1) For the purposes of this act, goods shall be deemed to be of a class or kind made or produced in Canada if

(a) in the case of goods other than goods custom-made to specifications, goods of approximately the same class or kind are made or produced in Canada; and

(b) in the case of goods custom-made to specifications, adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), goods other than goods custom-made to specifications shall be deemed not to be of a class or kind made or produced in Canada unless at least ten per cent of the normal Canadian consumption of goods of the same or approximately the same class or kind are made or produced in Canada.

(3) The decision of the minister shall be final with respect to the following matters:

(a) the normal Canadian consumption of the goods described in subsection (2), and

(b) whether goods are custom-made to specifications, and whether adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time."

2. That subsections (9) and (10) of section 6 of the said act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(9) For the purposes of this act, notwithstanding section 2A, goods may be deemed to be of a class or kind not made or produced in Canada where similar goods made or produced in Canada are not offered for sale to the ordinary agencies of wholesale or retail distribution or are not offered to all purchasers on equal terms under like conditions, having regard to the custom and usage of trade."

3. That subsection (4) of section 6A of the said act be repealed.

4. That any enactment founded upon this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the 21st day of December, 1960, and to have applied to all goods mentioned therein imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after that day, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, it is more than a week since we last discussed this resolution. I know that in the interval the Minister of Finance has made a very brief trip to western Canada. I rather thought that with the introduction of this resolution again he might come forward with some amendment to his proposals because I am sure while he was out there he heard a considerable amount of indignation expressed with respect to the arbitrary powers being taken by the ministry under the proposed legislation, the elimination of appeals to the tariff board and to higher courts, which practice has been in effect for years, and so on.

I certainly know that the interval has been a fortunate one as far as the public are concerned because since we last discussed the matter it has become very apparent that there is widespread apprehension in the country as was expressed by members of the opposition when the resolution was introduced. As I recall, hitherto in our discussion of this subject the debate has centred on two matters, neither of which I propose to deal with at this stage although I will certainly raise my voice with respect to them at later stages of the debate.

I refer first of all to the question of arbitrary power and the elimination of appeals to the tariff board and, second, the adverse effect that these proposals will have, particularly with regard to machinery, on other producers, on manufacturers, on end users and the effect it will have on efficiency if something less than the best machine proves prohibitively expensive for the people whom we are trying to encourage to get into production so efficiently that they will be able to meet the exceedingly keen competition of the world and enlarge our exports. As I say, I am not going to deal with those two matters at this time.

I want to remind hon. members that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue put very much foremost in their arguments the point that there is nothing really new in this legislation except that it will result in a return to the law with respect to the administration of the "class or kind" provisions that was operative prior to 1950, a decade ago. It is very flattering to have the new administration suggest that they have no new principles to offer with respect to this form of customs administration and that they admire and are returning to the practices of the Mackenzie King government and the Liberal principles with respect to customs that were operative prior to what they call the erosion which they say has taken place in the last ten years.

So far as that rather bland form of approach to this debate is concerned, I want to say that it has no foundation in fact whatsoever. I think I can demonstrate that both ministers are exceedingly naive if they think they can spoof the House of Commons, even members of their own party from areas where exports are vital, into thinking that this is simply an innocent return to a long time practice, a practice that was particularly typical and had the endorsation of the Liberal party which is known to be a party that is anxious to expand trade.

The other assertion with which I should like to deal and which I think is equally naive is that our partners in GATT will accept the minister's proposals in this legislation as nothing new or of much consequence to them, but merely a return to the situation which was in effect in Canada with respect to customs administration when the GATT agreement was originally signed in 1947.

I should like to direct the attention of the committee to the interpretation that the two ministers have given that the decisions of the tariff board in the decade create an erosion. I think it was the Minister of National Revenue who had this to say in the course of the debate—this is the type of approach that I do not believe they expect the opposition to accept, nor is it going to salve the conscience of their own supporters who would be horrified if they really studied this proposition and realized some of the implications that will flow from it in the matter of stifling trade and that will affect their constituencies in western Canada, the maritimes and other areas. I said there was a straightforward claim that this was a return to Liberal tariff doctrine. I should like to quote from the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue as recorded on page 1688 of Hansard for February 2, 1961:

> We are not going back to the days of R. B. Bennett; we are simply going back to the practices which were pursued, and I think properly so, by the government of Mr. Mackenzie King, and those associated with him up until at least 1950.

I want to establish, and I think I can very clearly the rather substantial difference with respect to some facts that I will give as to the legal decisions that have been given in the last 10 years in tariff board decisions, and the very inaccurate, rather casual interpretations that were given by both ministers in the course of the debate so far. I hope members of the government party who are not sympathetic to high tariffs will note these remarks with care.

I should like to refer particularly to the shovel case which both ministers emphasized, and I think properly so, because the case with respect to the dipper size of the shovels was perhaps the one that received the greatest amount of attention in litigation during the past 10 years. There were two appeals one of which went to the exchequer court and to the supreme court. These ministers are trying to convince their followers and the country that the final result was a judgment that was contrary to the practices and to the decisions of the tariff board as they existed some 10 years earlier.

In order to indicate the rather casual way in which this matter has been presented to the committee I should like to refer to page 1698 of Hansard for February 2, 1961. In so far as the shovel case is concerned, the Minister of Finance did not think this was worth going into in very much detail. He shrugged his shoulders and said that all members of the committee would understand how petty it is to suggest, as the tariff board did, that a shovel of 2.5 cubic yard capacity is not made in Canada and the maximum size of shovel made in Canada is two cubic yards, the tariff board was being unduly restrictive in that interpretation.

The minister did refer to one appeal, appeal No. 306, but inadvertently or otherwise it is a great surprise to me to find that no reference whatever was made by either minister when they were reviewing this so-called erosion to the original and basic appeal with respect to shovels, which was appeal No. 272. The tariff board, in appeal No. 272, came to this conclusion:

The obvious purpose of tariff item 427a—

This 427a is an item in the tariff which was inserted by the Liberal administration for the purpose of establishing that if goods of a class or kind, of iron and steel and they are mostly machinery items, were not in fact being made in Canada, the importer of those articles would not be obliged to pay the 22½ per cent most favoured nation rate but, on the contrary, would be allowed to have machinery that was the most efficient and suitable without the burden of a high tariff and would pay a low tariff of 7.5 per cent if imported from the United States or free if imported from the United Kingdom.

The tariff board report states this:

From the standpoint of the user, domestic machinery is not "available" unless such domestic machinery is precisely suitable for the purposes he has in mind. On the other hand, it would deprive the domestic manufacturer of the protection to which he is reasonably entitled were he required to supply a more or less precise duplicate of a particular foreign machine in order to take the latter machine out of tariff item 427a.

The correct interpretation of these two items would appear to require, therefore, the exploration of a middle ground between two impractical extremes, in which connection it is of assistance to ponder again the wording of section 6 (10) of the Customs Tariff Act, as set out earlier herein.

This is the section which is now before us for elimination.

When subsection 10 is read with the wording of tariff item 427a in mind, it is clear that the word "quantities" as used therein would appear to contemplate a counting of pieces of machinery. That being so, it must follow that the subsection contemplates further the counting of pieces of machinery of sufficient similarity, the one to the other, to make the exercise in arithmetic at least a matter of common sense. Similarity sufficient in degree to make sense of the counting must presuppose a reasonable degree of narrowness in the grouping or classification. Therefore, reading subsection (10) along with tariff item 427a, it would seem obvious that the classifications contemplated under the latter must be sufficiently narrow to give to subsection (10) reasonable meaning and effect. Contrariwise, the very broad classification of the tariff item contended for by the appellant would reduce this parallel section of the same act to an absurdity—apart altogether from which, his proposition as advanced does not commend itself as a sensible and practical basis for classification of "all machinery . . . not otherwise provided."

What was the result of that decision? Did that decision upset what the administration had invoked? Was there erosion of the decision of the customs department and the deputy minister? Did it run counter to made in Canada orders that had been standing with respect to these items for quite a number of years? Is this typical of the erosion that hon. members say has taken place?

On the contrary, the tariff board confirmed the ruling of the administration. The department had itself, as it does all the time, made inquiries as to what types of shovels were in fact being made in Canada and what shovels of other dimensions were not being made in Canada. In a regular way the department issued to the trade their periodic declarations as to what machinery would bear the made in Canada rate, which is high, and what imports would bear the not made in Canada rate, which is relatively low.

This is very clear. Not within the last ten years, but prior to that there was this declaration by the department itself that shovels of a size in excess of two cubic yards were not in fact being made in Canada, and on that occasion the tariff board simply confirmed what the administration said was the fact.

There was no erosion there. But what happened? I think this decision on appeal No. 272 was rendered in about March of 1953. Very shortly afterward the administration was persuaded to issue a new order with respect to what shovels were made in Canada and what shovels were not made in Canada. They decided that they could add to the top one size beyond what was known to be actually made in Canada at that time, and at the bottom of the list they could add another size smaller than that known to be made in Canada.

So that was followed by another appeal, and it is this second appeal numbered 306 only to which we have had reference to date by the ministry. As I say, there was a recent decision from the tariff board; the actual situation with respect to manufacture had not changed. But there was another appeal when this administrative order went out contrary to the decision in appeal No. 272. Of course, the tariff board simply took exactly the same position with respect to appeal No. 306 as it took with respect to appeal No. 272. But I am sure the interesting thing to hon. members is, what was the possibility of having this two and a half cubic yards shovel produced in Canada? Was this a ridiculous, silly narrowing of the size in the judgment of the tariff board?

The Minister of National Revenue sneered at the decision that a two and a half cubic yards shovel was said not to be made in Canada. In so many words he said, "We had people unemployed", and how ridiculous it was for the tariff board to say that a two and a half cubic yards shovel was not made in Canada and set a limit at two cubic yards.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question? In the hon. member's opinion is there any relationship between the size of the shovel and usage in various capacities in Canada?

Mr. Benidickson: Not in so far as the decisions of the tariff board were concerned in respect to this particular article. There is a very wide variety of criteria that are taken from article to article. In this case there was general agreement. I do not think there was any quarrel on the part of the appellant or the department that in this case the best criterion was dipper size.

I just want the committee to see how justified was the Minister of National Revenue when he made this sneering reference to the decision of the tariff board, which the government claims was in effect an erosion of long standing law, when the board declared anew that a two and a half cubic yards shovel was in fact not being produced in Canada in 1953 and 1954 and therefore the importer who required that size of shovel for efficiency should pay a rate of 7½ per cent instead of 22½ per cent. The government says this even though the evidence was clear that the shovel was not produced in Canada.

This was in 1953-54. In 1958, five years later, there is information with respect to the manufacturer who was appealing to the tariff board about the import in 1953 of a two and a half cubic yards shovel at a lower rate than if it had been declared made in Canada. I have here an article from the Montreal Star dated May 24, 1958, five years later:

Industrial giant shown—Duplessis says feat example of progress.

I wish to quote Mr. H. G. Welsford, president and managing director of Dominion Engineering. This was an affiliate company of the company that had been complaining of the import at a lower rate five years earlier. Both ministers were trying to persuade this house that there was very little difference between a 2 cubic yards shovel and a two and a half cubic yards shovel. I wish to quote from some of the remarks that were made five years later about this two and a half cubic yards shovel.

"The '550' shovel—

That is the trade number of the Canadian manufacturer in 1958:

—is larger by a half cubic yard than any other made in the country.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

This statement is made, five years after they were trying to impose a heavy tariff on the importer of a two and a half cubic yards shovel.

—the machine represents an investment of $1 million—

And this is the point:

—along with five years of research, design, component and prototype testing.

This is the kind of erosion that the ministry are suggesting took place during the past decade, which requires this drastic type of customs revision giving ministerial discretion and elimination of appeals.

We saw very clearly that when they were reporting to the house what this shovel litigation was all about they wanted hon. members to get the impression—I particularly want to impress the members of the Conservative party—that the difference between these two shovels was very minor indeed. Well, you can see that if $1 million was required in investment, and five years in time, to get a two and a half cubic yards capacity shovel available in Canada, the difference was certainly not one of a minor nature.

I want to know if in the opinion of the government in the meantime, with no two and a half cubic yards shovel available in Canada, importers of shovels should have had a 22½ per cent rate imposed on them instead of 7½ per cent. The burden of tax for these five years would fall on those large shovel users engaged in primary construction work, and so on, and those who pay the contractors. Those who pay for it are largely the taxpayers of the country, because much of this work is public works, which eventually gets into public costs and taxes. It was apparently expected by the appellant that while he took five years to produce this kind of shovel the additional burden should be placed not only on the importer but eventually upon the end user.

Now let us come to evidence during the appeal itself and see whether there was any erosion, whether there was any change in the law. During appeal No. 272 where it was decided that a two and a half cubic yards shovel was in fact not being produced in Canada—and I say that was not contrary to the ruling of the department—the board simply confirmed what the customs officials at that time had said. The government was represented by Mr. Henry, now the lawyer in charge of the combines investigation branch. He argued that the department's ruling was in accordance with long term practice. One of the witnesses was Mr. Scully, who was appointed by Mr. Bennett in the thirties to be his commissioner of customs which is the equivalent of deputy minister status today.

Mr. Scully in giving evidence said he had gone very carefully into this matter of the made in Canada and the not made in Canada decision with respect to shovels when he had been commissioner of customs, and he gave testimony that for 17 years the practice had been the same. So where is this new erosion, and how is this administration going to suggest that what is offered here is simply a restoration of the practice which was operated in the customs branch during Mackenzie King's regime? I say that in addition I can quote countless examples of what I call declarations of rulings by the department as to what is made or not made in Canada, and these rulings establish very clearly that it was a long standing practice of the customs branch under these rulings to make declarations such as were made in the shovel case and in many other cases, based on dimension, based on size.

I indicated previously that the second appeal arose simply because the administration, within a matter of a few weeks, went beyond what had been decided by the tariff board and decided to increase what the Minister of Finance called the range of sizes to a size lower and a size larger than what were in fact made in Canada, and they lost the case. But they would have lost the case 17 years earlier, because the commissioner of customs indicated that even during the period of Mr. Bennett's administration this would have been his decision with respect to grading as to sizes.

That is one of the cases. I am quite prepared to deal at a later date with some of the other cases which have been referred to, including the .22 rifle case where the Minister of National Revenue deprecated the distinction that we made between automatic and non-automatic rifles, saying this meant very little. Mr. Chairman, it means quite a lot to the importer if you have, in fact, no Canadian production, or Canadian production which does not equal 10 per cent of the consumption in Canada; it makes a good deal of difference to the importer whether there is to be imposed on that article a made in Canada 22½ per cent rate on the basis of some fiction that they are made in Canada.

After this case had been concluded I think an Ottawa editor summed it up very well. I refer to an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on March 20 which said:

> The tariff board has just handed down a decision of exceptional importance. But because it makes no change in an existing situation, the average Canadian is apt to pay little attention to the outcome of the case, which has to do with machinery.

This is referring to the shovel case. The article continues:

> In this respect, he is like a man who never realized how close he came to being hit by a truck.
> The board was asked to be judge in a dispute between the national revenue department and a manufacturer of power cranes and shovels. The latter pleaded that all such machines, regardless of size, should be treated by the department for duty purposes as "of a class or kind made in Canada." The department has taken size into account in making its rulings, and has found that power cranes and shovels with a dipper capacity of from one-half cubic yard to two cubic yards are of a kind made in Canada, and that smaller and larger types are not. Thus a limited range of machines is protected by a tariff of 22½ per cent; all others carry a 7½ per cent rate.
> Had the objecting firm succeeded in its claim, the higher rate of duty would have applied across the board. There would have been an immediate increase in costs of all sorts of private and public construction works making use of big machines. Some of these draglines, such as will be used for example in building the St. Lawrence seaway, are of fantastic size, with capacities ranging up to as much as 50 cubic yards.

So it is plain, Mr. Chairman, that for all this it is the public, in the end, who would have to pay the price.

Mr. Pickersgill: This small difference between two and two and a half cubic yards to which the Minister of National Revenue referred and that he made light of, according to the man who developed the new plant which was opened—as reported by the Montreal Star of Saturday, May 24, 1958—had taken $1 million of capital investment and five years' research, designing components and prototype testing, to produce. Yet the minister has the effrontery to come in here and tell us that this was an erosion of some previous practice. The plain fact is that for some reason or other which he no doubt knows himself the deputy minister made a ruling, after an appeal, which was not in conformity with the previous ruling of the department and the tariff board and the courts upheld the previous ruling. The minister has given us one or two other examples of this so-called erosion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I gave references to seven decisions altogether.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before we will be satisfied to let this resolution pass we will want the minister to give us a lot more detail and concrete illustrations concerning what this erosion really amounted to and we will want him to put on the record the rulings of the department in these cases before the appeals were taken, because in such appeals as I have examined the appellant was not the department and the appellant was not the person who wanted to have the ruling of the administration confirmed. The appellant was someone who wanted to upset the customs ruling as was the case, of course, on the first occasion on which this shovel case was taken. That was certainly also the case in one of the other situations I have examined since the minister made his statement. The appellant was seeking to upset the decision of the customs branch, and it was not someone else seeking to have it upset. In other words, the tariff board agreed with the administration and did not disagree with it. There obviously could not be this erosion unless the tariff board disagreed with the customs branch. At least, if I understand the word, that is all it could possibly mean.

I wanted not to add any new arguments but simply to reinforce what had already been said by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and to say that we will expect the minister to produce chapter and verse for this erosion and to tell us the decisions made by the customs branch before these appeals were taken that were upset on appeal and to show why they were upset instead of merely referring to the numbers of cases.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as hon. members know, my time was limited when I spoke previously and I did not have an opportunity to deal with the second point to which I wanted to refer and that is these assertions of the Minister of Finance that these Tariff Board decisions in the last decade were in effect what he called a windfall in so far as our partners in GATT were concerned and that there is now a wider opportunity for importing into this country to their advantage than was the situation as it obtained in 1947 and 1948. We entered into these agreements in 1947 and in 1948 made certain amendments to our Customs Act in order to comply with these important agreements into which we had entered.

The Minister of Finance I know was out in Winnipeg the other day and did his best to convince what was a rather hostile audience out there, as I hear it, that he was one of the closest adherents to GATT and that this and the 1958 legislation and so on were—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There was no hostile audience out there in my experience.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not the way I heard it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member did not hear it correctly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Maybe the minister is not a very good judge of hostility in audiences.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The minister is an excellent judge of the hostility of the misleading remarks to which he is now listening.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister may have been busy reading his speech and not recognized the hostility.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is speaking for the Winnipeg Free Press again.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Benidickson: I read the Winnipeg Tribune. Does the minister want me to read what the Tribune has to say about this legislation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has just been parroting what the Winnipeg Free Press has been saying in its misleading editorials.

Mr. Benidickson: I will not refer to the Tribune at this moment. I know about the great fight the minister has been having out in Winnipeg with the Winnipeg Free Press. I did find, however, that the interviewer certainly reported the minister accurately because the things I read in the news columns of the Winnipeg Free Press were identical with what the minister said here and which I say are quite unacceptable to me and I think they should be unacceptable to many hon. members of the minister's own party after further consideration.

I will not deal with the question of GATT at this time but I wish to come back to it, read from the GATT agreement and ask hon. members of the committee if they can take at face value some of the statements respecting GATT made by the minister on budget night and during the course of this debate.

I did not have an opportunity when I spoke earlier to pinpoint fully the fact that there is nothing new in this decision based on dimensions and fairly precise measurements and standards of criteria prior to the last decade with respect to the administration of made in Canada and not made in Canada.

I have here a memorandum with respect to made in Canada dated February 22, 1937. It refers to special steels. With respect to ingots, it says that the made in Canada ruling refers only to those of a dimension of up to 24 inches by 26 inches cross section. With reference to billets it says the ruling and distinction with respect to what is and what is not made in Canada is limited to up to billets 12 inches square. In 1948, at about the time of GATT, we had a similar departmental ruling to the effect that an article such as the metal frame for a bag would be considered made in Canada provided it was not over 10 inches. That is very precise. We had another one in 1948, which said that power lawn mowers had been transferred from the category of a class or kind not made in Canada to that of a class or kind made in Canada provided they had a cut of from 18 inches to 30 inches inclusive.

At about the time of GATT in 1947 we had one saying that foundry jolt squeeze moulding machines, 10-inch and 12-inch sizes, had been transferred from the category of a class or kind not made in Canada to that of a class or kind made in Canada. Is this taking in the whole class? Is this the type of ruling the minister said was made under the Liberal administration under whose name and reputation in trade matters he is now attempting to sell this particular legislation?

I referred earlier to Mr. H. D. Scully. This refers to the shovel case. I did not have at my fingertips the actual reference to the testimony Mr. Scully gave in that case but I have it now. Mr. Scully's statements are recorded from pages 367 to 371 of the appeal with respect to case No. 272. Mr. Scully said:

> These rulings have been in effect now for some 17 years. We were at great pains, as I say, to investigate, and had we ruled at the time on the basis of all earth moving or rock movement or equipment of the nature that is under consideration, or had we ruled in accordance with the total amount imported in any one year or produced in any one year in Canada—had we ruled on that basis, the company would not have got the ruling they did—

Because they needed a ruling under present law that 10 per cent of the consumption in Canada was in fact of a class or kind of article made in Canada. He went on to say:

> The minister, as I say, was most meticulous and we were trying to do the best we could under the circumstances and we had to narrow the sizes and types of shovels that were made at that time in order to qualify under the law at all.

This was to the advantage of the appellant. This type of thing has not disappeared. Trade and industry are similar today to what they were a decade ago and more. We have emphasized the importance to an industry starting up to operate efficiently, getting the best possible equipment; and particularly if the consumption in Canada is not to the extent of 10 per cent of our requirements, an importer of machinery and articles of that type going into production and manufacturing should not have an undue burden of tariff placed upon his operations.

We had a case in 1960, under the present administration; I refer to appeal No. 450. I think this is indicative of the type of problem that we feel is worthy of attention by members of the government who I am sure are anxious to see industry get going and not have a burden placed upon it at the start that will make it inefficient either to the extent of having to put out a higher price to the Canadian end user or have costs established for them by the original tariff which would make it impossible to compete in outside markets.

This appeal was heard by the new tariff board, the personnel of which I believe were not members of the board at the time the other decision was made that I have referred to. The decision was given on September 12, 1960. The argument here was whether a horizontal vacuum tilting pan filter was of a class or kind of filter within the meaning of item 427a; in other words, not made in Canada. It was agreed that tilting pan filters were not made in Canada. We have a new government in office, and here the department seems to be arguing the other way. I quote from the judgment:

> However, counsel for the department adduced evidence relating to a Dorr-Oliver-Long scroll discharge filter of Canadian manufacture and submitted that, while not identical with the pan filter, it was similar to it and therefore was of the same class or kind.

This is under the new administration. The officials now took the other side of the argument in a case of this kind and they are met with an appeal by the importer. What did the brand new board decide in 1960 in connection with this case? I read from the judgment:

> The appellant, which operates both scroll type horizontal filters and tilting pan filters, in one particular process, in various locations, gave evidence that the efficiency of the pan filter for their particular operation was much greater and that its considerable additional costs could quite easily be recovered from savings in the first year's operation.

The decision was:

> The imported tilting pan filter differs substantially from the scroll discharge filter in design, in method of operation, in cost, in principal use and efficiency in certain uses. On the evidence adduced in this appeal the board finds that they are not of the same class or kind.

I ask the committee whether, in this loosely drawn legislation before us, we would get a decision such as this from the minister? This is not a shelf goods item; this is perhaps a made to order item. What is the minister going to do? Here is a producer who has made up his mind that this one type of filter is so efficient that he could recover from savings in the first year's operation the additional cost in connection with it. It was a more expensive filter than the Canadian made filter. To be efficient this is what he wanted. Under the new law, what is the minister going to do? Is he going to say that, using the word "approximately" and taking advantage of the personal discretion that is given to him alone—his decision is no longer going to be appealable to the tariff board—the official's contention was right? What is his decision going to be in a situation such as I have outlined in this recent case where, very fortunately, I think, for efficiency in production, the new members of the tariff board appointed by this administration interpret the law in the same way as I have indicated it was interpreted for years. There was a very definite distinction arrived at. They said that it was not necessarily one of size.

In answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat earlier, may I say it does not always have to be determined by dimension or size. In the particular case to which I have reference the board said that on the evidence adduced the filter differed substantially in principal use, efficiency, method of operation, design, and so on. Here the department intended to tell this importer that he could not have this efficient machine; that he had to take something that was second best. I assume that under the new law there will be no appeal; there will be no necessity to look at decisions and results. Nobody in the country will know the precedents. This is the kind of thing that will be coming forward. Our people will be denied information or appeal and I do not see how this is going to help secondary industry in the country to become efficient.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A frightful travesty of the facts.

Mr. Pitman: I rise to make a few short remarks, and I hope they will be my last remarks on this particular amendment. I rise as the result of the remarks made by the Minister of Finance on February 3, at page 1729 of Hansard, in which he said that my particular speech:

> —was just about as inimical to the interests of labour in Canada as I suppose any speech that any of us has heard in this chamber for a very long time.

I must say that I was rather flattered by the fact that the minister took such great note of what I had to say. In the few weeks I have been here I rather suspected there was a kind of social system here whereby those of us in the back reaches of the chamber were not particularly of any interest to those who were on the government front benches. But none the less, I was particularly horrified by what the minister said because I had a great deal of admiration for the Minister of Finance, knowing his high sense of proportion and his love of accuracy and as a man who was a member of the legal profession and was in a position to evaluate evidence. However, when I came to read his speech I was very concerned because he accused me of talking as though this legislation were the expression of a high tariff policy. I refer hon. members to page 1729 of Hansard. What did I say at page 1711 of Hansard? Let me quote again:

> I suggest that the proposed amendment, though not one which may immediately bring about higher tariff policies, is none the less an open door toward future higher tariffs.

What I was suggesting was that there was a trend, a possibility that in the future this trend would continue. I expressed my concern not so much with this particular amendment. I am sure the minister has read my speech now and he will realize I was not expressing my concern as much with this amendment as with what had been said both on the part of the minister in his exchanges with the hon. member for Laurier and also on the part of his supporters in introducing a note of confusion that this was indeed a high tariff policy to protect Canadian industry.

Perhaps more than anything else I was appalled by the expressions of the opinion that really the only concern labour had was for high tariffs. I quoted from two documents which had been issued very recently and the minister himself indicated that he could remember a conference two years ago when this was not the case. I can only submit at this time that there has been a great deal of re-thinking of the whole tariff question as to high tariffs and low tariffs and not all of that thinking has been in the direction of high tariffs.

Possibly the minister now has on his desk some communications from labour organizations in which high tariffs are demanded. I would certainly hope so. I would expect there would perhaps be a few who might think differently but I am suggesting that the trend in the case of the majority is away from high tariffs, and I hope the minister will take notice of this fact.

I was particularly disturbed by the intemperate remarks regarding the ability of the present member for Peterborough to express the views of his constituents. I do not think we are here to rehash by-elections, and I will only say that I have expressed the same opinions in the house as I expressed on the hustings and that as far as I know these are the opinions of those who cast their votes on my behalf. I might say that the party represented by the minister lost half of its votes in that particular by-election in spite of having the best possible candidate and therefore I do not think his opinions necessarily reflect the views of the people of the constituency any more than mine do.

As found on page 1730 of Hansard, the minister made another misquotation when he said:

> Here we have an hon. member saying that dumping may be a legitimate trade practice.

Of course, I said nothing of the kind. As found on page 1712 what I actually said was:

> —what we call dumping may be regarded as a legitimate trade practice of the nation . . . on the other side of the fence.

That is not the same as saying that I am in favour of dumping or that I do not recognize there is a definite difference between legitimate trade practices and dumping.

In the very few minutes I have I can only repeat what I said before. My opposition is based on the fact that this amendment could possibly restrict trade, that this may be indeed a great national policy as our newspapers and magazines are suggesting, and that no realistic appraisal of our tariff structure would indicate that higher tariffs are needed. However, if this re-definition of class or kind made in Canada is going to bring about more employment, I am extremely happy to hear it and before the debate is over I hope the minister will stand up and on the basis of his no doubt considerable degree of knowledge of my constituency indicate how reclassification will help employment in the Peterborough area. I know that the people of that area would be very happy to hear this. We have heard a great deal about shovels and .22 rifles. I am afraid these items do not have very much impact as far as employment is concerned in this constituency. Therefore I hope that before long the minister will rise and indicate in some way exactly how this reclassification will help this particular situation.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): May I ask the hon. member a question? Does the hon. member for Peterborough agree with the leader of his party in the house that they are for freer trade at the present time?

Mr. Pitman: I do not know that he has said free trade—

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Freer trade.

Mr. Pitman: As a long term objective, yes. I think freer trade is what we all must have, not only in Canada but throughout the world.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Talk it out again.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to raise a question of privilege but I do intend to draw attention to the attitude toward the opposition expressed by the Minister of Finance from his seat just now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): From his seat.

Mr. Pickersgill: We on the opposition side have sought to deal with the facts and to bring the facts to bear upon the legislation but from the government side we have heard nothing but personal attacks and vituperation since the debate began.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not a statement of fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: All the minister has to say is, "Here we go again". I must say it is about time the minister came back to this side of the house where he is evidently at home. He does not seem to realize that the meaning of the word "minister" is "servant", that he is the servant of this house and not its master and that it is about time this sort of thing stopped.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Hamilton South wishes to raise a point of order.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the Minister of Finance does not have to sit here and take lectures from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. We are discussing an item of legislation and it is a well known practice that the hon. member should not take up time in this way.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member, for whom I have the greatest possible respect, is entitled to his opinion, and I will abide by any rulings of the Chair. I could have said that this was a question of privilege. I do not intend to pursue this line any further although I must say that on the point of order I was very tempted to quote some precedents from a speech by the Minister of Finance in 1955 when he was over here, to which I may say no exception was taken by anyone on the treasury benches at that time. The members on the treasury benches at that time sought to reply to arguments that were made by the opposition and not to attack members of the opposition for daring to speak in the house. That is one of the differences.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman should smile when he says that.

Mr. Pickersgill: If it will please the hon. member for Carleton I will be very glad to smile. It is something I have never found very hard to do. I have been trying to set a good example to the Minister of Finance for a long time but it does not seem to have taken.

I wish to say something about the statement that was made first by the Minister of National Revenue and repeated by the Minister of Finance on February 2, and which is found at page 1669 of Hansard. It reads as follows:

—we heard the hon. member—

That is myself.

—say that the present legislation apparently had some sinister connection with the legislation of 1958.

The reference is to the amendments to sections 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 40A and 40B of the Customs Act.

The legislation of 1958 was very good legislation and as was pointed out at that time it was badly needed for the purpose of making known to some foreign producers who were in the habit of exporting into Canada that they would not be permitted to do so on a basis of dumping in Canada. So salutary has been the effect of the mere enactment of that legislation that it has not been necessary once in the two and a half intervening years to apply that legislation in any particular case. The Minister of National Revenue made that fact known in the house previously. I say there is an example of very great benefit having been achieved by the mere enactment of that legislation.

I say without fear of successful contradiction that that statement is not accurate, that it is in fact not in accord with the facts at all. I have taken the trouble to have the legislation of 1958 examined. The legislation of 1958 repealed all the old legislation and substituted new legislation in its place. The new legislation is the law. The old legislation is not the law, and if the Minister of National Revenue has not been administering the new legislation he has not been carrying out the law. I am not inclined to believe that that is the case. I am told that there is only one respect in which the old law that was on the statute books before 1958 with respect to dumping is on the statute books at the present time, and that is the end of season clause that was enacted in 1955, I think.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman said he had had this examined. Would he mind telling the committee by whom he had it examined? He said "I was told", and would he mind telling the committee by whom he was told?

Mr. Pickersgill: I had it examined by someone I thought had more knowledge of this subject than I. I examined it, myself, but I thought I should have my opinion verified by someone. If I am wrong, then the hon. member for Carleton, being learned in the law and not needing any help as I do, can show me in what respects I am wrong.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would it have been Grant Dexter?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I do not regard Grant Dexter as being a gentleman any more learned in the law than I am. The hon. gentleman, if he wants to go on with this quiz game, perhaps could go on with it outside of the house.

The fact of the matter is that it was stated repeatedly in this house by the Minister of National Revenue, and was confirmed the other day by the Minister of Finance, that the change in the law with respect to dumping has never been enforced. Well, either the old law has been used, though it is no longer the law or the new law must have been used because the old law is no longer there. If that is the kind of information we are given about the administration of the law, then in heaven's name what can we expect if this legislation becomes law? The Minister of National Revenue would be given the freedom under this legislation to impose a lower tariff or a higher tariff at his whim upon any kind of commodity that, by any stretch of the imagination—it will only be by imagination—can be said to be made in Canada.

I think I can demonstrate very easily and very quickly that it would be quite impossible, under this legislation, to take any kind of meaningful appeal at all. I am thinking of shelf goods, and all the things that have to be determined on an appeal. It has to be determined on appeal, first of all, that the article which it is proposed to import is of approximately the same class or kind as the goods produced in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: What does that mean?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister must determine, at some stage, what the normal consumption is of this particular article which presumably is not exactly but only approximately the same as something else made in Canada. It has to be determined what the range of these things is that are approximately alike, and until the tariff board has decided what these things are, how in heaven's name is the minister or anyone else going to decide what normal Canadian consumption is?

I admit this is a very difficult matter, but how can you determine what the normal consumption is of something until you know what that something is? Once you put in the word "approximately", you have got to have someone say what are these things that are approximately like the thing someone is seeking to import. For that reason it seems to me it would be quite impossible, even if the minister wanted an appeal to be taken on all these other things, to get a stated case on which to appeal.

I should like to ask the minister how these things will be dealt with in the future. When an importer seeks to import an article will the minister determine the normal Canadian consumption first before the appeal is taken so that at least the importer will be told what the normal Canadian consumption is supposed to be, and so that he knows the set of facts upon which he may base his appeal? How can he be told that if the minister does not know what the goods are?

According to the Minister of Finance it would be possible to appeal to the board to find out whether these goods were approximately of a class or kind made in Canada. Would you determine the normal consumption in Canada of an unknown article before the appeal is taken, or would the appeal be taken first in order to determine whether this article is approximately the same? After that appeal is taken would one go back to the Minister of National Revenue and have him determine, after the tariff board has said what are the things that are approximately alike, what the normal quantity is? Is that the way this thing is going to be done?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now you are labouring this heavily.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is the one now making suggestions that these practical, concrete questions do not deserve to be answered.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all, I am just pointing out how the hon. gentleman is labouring this subject. The hon. gentleman is obviously in labour trying to keep it going until six o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask you, sir, to suggest to the Minister of Finance that he cease imputing motives to others. I have plenty to say about this thing.

Mr. Benidickson: So has the public.

Mr. Pickersgill: So has the public, as my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River points out. I have plenty to say about this. I have had a good deal of difficulty in selecting which of the many points I would start to speak about this afternoon. I chose to speak about this particular subject because it is very complicated and it seemed to me it would be only reasonable to give the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue time to marshal their facts in order to explain how this would be done.

The minister, never having been engaged in business, may not know anything about this sort of thing, but I can assure him—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the voice of authority on business, now, is it?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I may tell the hon. gentleman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; shall I rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I assume that we will go on with this business tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: I think it would be preferable, Mr. Speaker, if we were to bring up this particular item of business at a later time. Tomorrow we will take item No. 4 on today's order paper, the second reading of Bill No. C-69 dealing with the proposed railway line to Mattagami lake, which was discussed in the resolution stage yesterday. The second item for tomorrow would be No. 6 on today's order paper, the motion in my name to set up a select committee on research and related subjects. When those items are concluded, we will then carry on with the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of Agriculture. This order of business would hold, then, for Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like ask the minister if the government is no longer anxious to get its budget resolutions through, which we were accused of holding up?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And you are still accused of holding it up in a most deliberate way.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 16, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—STATEMENT ON PRESENT SITUATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members of the house for giving me an opportunity to make a statement in regard to the Congo situation, which is much in the thoughts and hearts of peace loving people everywhere in the world. I felt that it was proper that whatever information is available to the government should be given to the house, and that course will be followed not only on this occasion but in the days ahead.

In the last few days the Soviet aim has been the pursuance of its selfish ambition in central Africa and, in this pursuit, to paralyse the United Nations at a time when a supreme effort is demanded to prevent further deterioration in the crisis existing in the Congo.

I wish again today to reiterate support for the statement made by the secretary general in the security council yesterday when he replied to the Soviet charges. The United Nations organization was asked last year, first by the security council and later by the general assembly, to carry out certain responsibilities. There has not been that degree of co-operation required of member states for such a major undertaking. Quite apart from the complexity of the Congo situation itself, some members of the United Nations and especially the Soviet union have sought to frustrate the United Nations effort through direct interference in the internal affairs of the Congo. This mischief making has not prevented the same governments from calling on the United Nations to take action designed to serve partisan interests rather than to benefit the Congolese people.

In the face of the internal problems, the outside interference and the confusion and indecision on the part of member governments of the United Nations, the secretary general has sought to preserve and promote a United Nations policy which would lift the Congo situation from the conflict of interest of the powers seeking their own aims in Africa and would enable the Congolese people to solve for themselves their political difficulties.

In his statement yesterday Mr. Hammarskjold demonstrated a full awareness of the direction in which his duty lies and a determination to continue on that course so long as he has sufficient support from the member governments. The main support must come from the African states themselves and from their Asian partners. If African progress and independence are not to become casualties of the cold war, the uncommitted states must see to it that the Congo situation is resolved in accordance with the best interests of Africans and of world peace. The United Nations can assist immeasurably in the pursuit of these aims, but the initiative and the strength of the United Nations assistance will depend on the cohesion of African and Asian support for the organization.

I might recall that at the very outset of the crisis last July I expressed this view in the house, and it has continued to be a basic consideration in the government's policy toward the Congo and toward the United Nations intervention there.

I trust that the secretary general will be accorded the support needed at this very critical time, from an overwhelming majority of the United Nations members. Now more than ever the United Nations must be given the authority it needs, and the required means, to use United Nations instruments in the Congo for the protection of civilians, for the promotion and enforcement of cease-fires, and for the reorganization of the Congolese security forces. There is need, too, for reassurance that outside interference, from whatever quarter, will cease. Only in these conditions can the United Nation hope to pursue its efforts to preserve the independence and integrity of the Congo, to maintain order there and to bring about the necessary reconciliation of all political interests in that country. I think that Canadians as a whole, and members of this house, will agree that the government should spare no effort to promote the attainment of these ends at the United Nations and wherever Canadian influence can be brought to bear effectively.

I might mention that the advisory committee for the Congo is holding an important meeting this afternoon in New York to consider a report by the conciliation commission, now in the Congo, which contains recommendations of a positive character. I might summarize those recommendations by saying that most of them are in line with the secretary general's plans for the Congo, including provisions for the establishment in general of a broadly based government.

I do not think there is anything further I can add at this time except to say that everything possible is being done in this connection by the government.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know the house will have listened with great interest to the Prime Minister's statement, which underlines the seriousness and indeed the dangers of the situation in the Congo. I thought this was also done yesterday with great impressiveness by the President of the United States in his wise words on this matter.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the dangers we face in this situation are threefold. There is a very real danger that the Congo will become a battleground in the cold war, and in doing so perhaps bring the whole of Africa into the cold war, something which it has been the aim of members of the United Nations to avoid. The second danger is that, if things go wrong, the United Nations will be very gravely weakened, and the policies being pursued by the Soviet union and some of its friends at the present time are, it seems to me, in danger of having that result. Third, it may destroy a secretary general who has served the organization and served peace with such unselfish and patient distinction; and if that is allowed to happen it will destroy or weaken gravely the whole office of secretary general, whoever may be holder of that office in the future.

Surely, as the Prime Minister has said, what we should be doing in this situation is seeking for ways and means to strengthen, not weaken, United Nations intervention in the Congo, as was pointed out yesterday by the prime minister of India, in order to restore peace to that tragic land and build a foundation of order which would make freedom meaningful there. I do not know exactly how this can be done, of course, but perhaps one approach to a solution—this has been mentioned by others—would be to bring the Congo under some kind of trusteeship or something analogous to trusteeship by agreement at the United Nations, and then place in charge of the country as the administrator for the United Nations an Asian member, perhaps India, and, if that were the course followed, then we should back up the Asian country chosen as administrator with every kind of support, technical assistance, financial assistance, police assistance and political assistance. Perhaps this may be a way out of this difficulty. But if some way is not found not only will the United Nations be in danger but peace itself may be jeopardized.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in commenting upon the most interesting statement made by the Prime Minister with respect to the recent most tragic sequence of events in the Congo, I wish to say on behalf of this group that the former premier, Patrice Lumumba, was a person who without doubt, though possibly in the wrong way, strove to bring freedom to his people. Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, the Secretary General of the United Nations, has striven in every way, as we all know, to do his duty and carry out his instructions from that body.

Unfortunately both these persons have been victims of circumstances and a swirling of events over which they had little control. As far as this group are concerned, we believe that recriminations from any source would only serve to deepen the tragedy, create further chaos and make the solution of the problem more difficult and more distant. We support every effort that the government may make to use Canadian influence through the United Nations in order to strengthen, shall I say, the moral and material interests of the United Nations with respect to this very important matter.

Possibly in that direction we can not only use our moral influence along the lines suggested by the Prime Minister in the statement he read and along the lines suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. To indicate our sincerity and our willingness to put a shoulder to the wheel to the limit of Canadian ability and resources, possibly we might agree to increase our forces in the Congo if necessary or if called upon to do so, to send more food to the Congo, if necessary, than we have in the past and, if necessary, to provide further medical supplies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I might make reference to a suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition regarding trusteeship, I would say that this suggestion has been made on other occasions. As he knows, it has its limitations and shortcomings.

I appreciate the words of both hon. gentlemen, and I think I should add this. Time is of the essence. The report of the conciliation commission which will be considered today provides for measures to stop the fighting and the drift toward civil war, the insulation of the Congolese national army from politics, the setting up of a training scheme under a defence council, and the meeting of all political leaders of the Congo to work out a new constitution along federal lines.

These recommendations come from a report made by a committee representative of the Asian and African countries, and indicates the care and attention that has been given by those charged with the responsibility of being on that committee to meet the perilous possibilities inherent in inaction or uncertainty at this time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHEVRIER—CHANGE IN ANNOUNCED BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I rise on a question of privilege, sir, which concerns the business of the house as well as the rights of the opposition. I should like to refer to Hansard for Tuesday, February 14. When I asked the leader of the house what the business for the next day would be, he said, as reported on page 2058:

> The third item will be the continuation of the debate on the budget resolutions. If that debate is not concluded, we will carry on with it on Thursday.

This, sir, was confirmation of what the house leader had said on Monday and on the previous Thursday. I was therefore astonished when, without consultation with me and in my absence, the following exchange took place last evening, according to the Hansard record at page 2091:

> Mr. Pickersgill: I assume that we will go on with this business tomorrow.
> Mr. Churchill: I think it would be preferable, Mr. Speaker, if we were to bring up this particular item of business at a later time. Tomorrow we will take item No. 4 on today's order paper, the second reading of Bill No. C-69 dealing with the proposed railway line to Mattagami lake, which was discussed in the resolution stage yesterday.

In other words, what was announced last night was entirely different business from what had been announced earlier for the rest of the week.

My question of privilege, sir, is twofold. First, it has to do with advance notice of the business, which it has been the custom and tradition of this house to give to the opposition in order that they may properly prepare for debate. But there is another, and in my opinion more important and more serious matter affecting privilege. It is this. The Minister of Finance stated in the house on February 8, according to the Hansard record, page 1848, that we on this side of the house were delaying the progress of the budget resolutions. I should like to quote what he said in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Essex East seeking information about distressed areas. The answer was this:

> Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this will be done, of course, in due course; but as I pointed out when I was last asked a similar question, this is a matter in which some expediting of the budget resolutions would assist very much.

A little further, on that same page, we find the following exchange by the Minister of Finance:

> Perhaps we may have some progress some day soon on these budget resolutions. We spent three days on one very short resolution last week. I hope we will have more co-operation from the opposition from this point on.

Then as found on the following page, namely page 1849, in answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition having to do with the policy of the government on chronic unemployment areas, the Minister of Finance replied as follows:

> If the Leader of the Opposition will look at the answers I gave to the hon. member for Laurier when he first asked a similar question about a week ago, the hon. gentleman will find that I pointed out that I thought the house should pass on the budget before we attempted to deal piecemeal with some of the matters that I dealt with in the budget.

I say that these three statements by the Minister of Finance which I have extracted from Hansard of February 8 are a reflection on the opposition; and here we are at February 16, eight days later, and still the budget resolutions have not been discussed.

An hon. Member: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Chevrier: The question of privilege is this. All the delay is caused, first, by the absence of the Minister of Finance from the house—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Chevrier: —and next, by his refusal to go on even when he is in the house. It seems to me that the least the government might do, if they are not prepared to go on with the budget resolutions as they undertook to do, would be to announce the areas of chronic unemployment, instead of blaming the opposition for procrastination which is entirely of their own making.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Laurier concluded?

Mr. Chevrier: I have concluded, sir.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laurier has raised a double-barrelled issue. I will deal with the first part which has reference to the business of the house as forecast. Had the hon. member for Laurier wished a change in the program for today, all that was required was a telephone call to me this morning suggesting that something should not be gone ahead with, and we might have made the alteration.

Each Thursday I have attempted to make a forecast; I started this practice last year and have continued it this session. For the benefit of all hon. members, not just those on the opposite side of the house, I have attempted to forecast the business for the following week as a guide for everybody in the house. However, I have been careful to state that this forecast is subject to change because the situation varies from day to day.

That is precisely what happened this week. It was not possible to bring forward the budget resolutions until Wednesday. Yesterday, I presume to the surprise of everyone, we did not reach the business of the house until a quarter after four, I believe it was, owing to the prolonged question period. After we dealt with one or two minor items there was little time left for discussion of the budget resolutions. Before the conclusion of yesterday's sitting a decision had to be reached as to what we would do today. That decision had to be reached just close to six o'clock. It appeared then that the house desired more time in which to consider the budget resolutions. Had it been possible to pass the first one yesterday, we considered it might have been possible to go ahead today with the one dealing with income tax. However, as the house appeared to desire more time on the first budget resolution it seemed wiser to shift to some other business, and that is precisely the decision I made.

I did not and do not feel myself committed to any forecast that goes a day or two ahead of the day on which we are going to sit. We are subject to adjustment from time to time as seems necessary. That adjustment is made on both sides of the house, Mr. Speaker. It will not be long before the hon. member for Laurier will be asking me to defer some piece of business because someone on his side is away and wants to participate in the debate. I will gladly do so in order to accommodate him, and the same statement holds true with regard to the corner group, as they called themselves yesterday.

An hon. Member: The small group.

Mr. Argue: The effective opposition.

Mr. Churchill: That is my own opinion also. Now, the reason I called second reading of the bill concerning the Mattagami railway was that I noticed there was general agreement on the other side of the house at the resolution stage. The hon. member for Laurier praised it twice in the course of his speech, and the hon. member for Villeneuve, who made a lengthy speech on the subject, spoke of the general advantages to be derived from that railway. I concluded therefore that there was a general desire to get ahead with the measure and that, consequently, we would proceed with it today.

[Mr. Churchill.]

That is the situation with regard to the business of this house. But, as I said last year, if the opposition does not like to have a forecast ahead of time I will revert to the practice followed by Mr. Harris when he was leader of the house, and announce the business for the following day the night before. I did not think that was very satisfactory in those days, and that is why I have adopted this other method.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I might deal with the second part of the observation made by the hon. member for Laurier in the course of the speech he smuggled into a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman made reference to observations I had on February 8 as to the lack of progress with the budget resolutions concerning proposed amendments to the Customs Tariff.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that there are two resolutions before the committee of ways and means arising out of the budget; first, a short amendment to the Customs Tariff and, second, a series of proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act. We have now spent a total of four days on this small amendment to the Customs Tariff—a very short amendment, presenting an issue which could be discussed, surely, with reasonable brevity. I am not suggesting that anybody should abate or curtail his remarks, but I draw attention to the fact that this is one amendment and it is not a lengthy one. Despite all the time spent so far in committee we have still not been able to start in the committee of ways and means on the resolution relating to the Income Tax Act.

On February 8, as the hon. member for Laurier has pointed out, I drew attention to the fact that three days had already been spent in committee on the amendment to the Customs Tariff, and I deplored the fact that we were making such slow progress. Yesterday, another day was spent on this.

Mr. Pickersgill: One hour.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What remained of the day's sitting after an unusual length of time had been spent on the preliminary proceedings and the question period. It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, and I draw this to your attention to correct the improper impression which the hon. member for Laurier would otherwise have left, that yesterday afternoon hon. members opposite were simply repeating what they had said before and were trying to delay the proceedings. If you look at page 2089 of Hansard, you will see that I used the words "Talk it out again".

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the hon. gentleman that I did not find a matter of privilege involved in what had been said before, but if the Minister of Finance now says that yesterday the opposition was trying to delay proceedings, I am sure there would be one. Perhaps the minister would not overwork the second point which was raised by the hon. member for Laurier. I allowed considerable discussion on the first point, not because there seemed to be a matter of privilege involved but because it related to a subject which concerns us all, namely the ordering of the business of the house. It seems to me that enough has been said about this point. There is really no question of privilege before us, and if the minister continues it will be to debate the question of whether or not there has been any delay in dealing with the budget resolutions. I do not consider that subject to be before the house for debate, and with those cautionary words may I express the hope that the minister will conclude his remarks.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I shall be pleased to conclude them. I had simply put those facts before the house because of the very misleading impression the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier might otherwise have left. The government is anxious to go on with this business as quickly as possible, and we shall be glad to have the co-operation of all hon. members in doing so.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you go on with them?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am asked why we didn't go on with them. Well, we hoped that after hon. members opposite had had an opportunity of considering this, they would stop the filibuster they have been conducting.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Whether or not there was a question of privilege before, there is one now. The remarks which the minister made yesterday were applied to me. At the very close of the day, when I said I should like to ask the house leader if the government was no longer anxious to get the budget resolutions through which we were accused of holding up, the Minister of Finance replied, to use his own words as printed in Hansard:

> And you are still accused of holding up in a most deliberate way.

That was a reflection on my right as a member of this house and a member of the opposition to debate a revolutionary change in the tax system of this country which the minister calls a small matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it is not a small matter. It is an important matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman whose performance five years ago we all remember now objects to the opposition debating legislation.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the house I should like to revert to the presentation of reports under routine proceedings.

STANDING ORDERS

Third report of standing committee on standing orders—Miss Aitken.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO AREAS OF CHRONIC UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the Prime Minister, based on the announcement of policy made two months ago by the government that double depreciation would be applied to industries in areas of surplus unemployment in the country and that such areas would be designated by the governor in council.

My question is this. In view of the record unemployment revealed in yesterday's figures, will the minister assure the house that after a delay now of two months, no further procrastination will be allowed in this matter, and that the government will declare at once the areas to which this special incentive will apply?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): You will permit me, I trust, Mr. Speaker, to make the observation on that question that it is a thoroughly improper question to be asked on the orders of the day. It is the type of question which you have referred to in many rulings as being an argumentative question designed to put certain statements or, in this case, misstatements before the house. It was not designed to ask for information. There has not yet been any procrastination, nor will there be. This question was asked yesterday, and it was answered yesterday. This matter is being dealt with, and it will be dealt with effectively.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance if it is not a fact that the implementation of the government's declared policy of double depreciation can be made effective without waiting for the passage of the budget resolutions, that that power now resides in the hands of the minister under the present Income Tax Act?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a matter which has been dealt with now on, I think, four or five occasions in the house. The last one was yesterday, and I do not know how long it is to be expected, Mr. Speaker, that this question should be asked day after day. I gave the answer yesterday.

Mr. Benidickson: We want the executive to act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a matter which could be dealt with by order in council under regulatory power but, as I pointed out on an earlier occasion, it would not have been proper for the executive to deal with this until the house had passed on the budget. That has now been done and we have proceeded in the meantime to deal with this matter. I repeat that we are dealing with this matter, and dealing with it effectively.

Mr. Pickersgill: In secret.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, we hear—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understood that the minister had completed his answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I had made my statement, but again the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate makes a statement while seated which goes on Hansard and remains there. I expect that you did not hear it. If the hon. member's comment is going to remain on the record I think those of us who do hear these things in this part of the house should have an opportunity to comment on them.

The hon. member said "In secret". I have not been aware that the cabinet at any time in Canada's history proceeded by any other method than by that method. The cabinet is required to conduct its meetings in that way. That is the kind of observation that is being made now by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as though there were something new, unusual or improper about the cabinet holding its meetings in secret.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, since the minister has chosen to make a question of privilege of a remark I made—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not a question of privilege but a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I should be permitted to reply to the hon. gentleman's question of privilege. The minister did say "question of privilege" as you will find by looking at Hansard. I may say that the minister is quite wrong in saying that action by the cabinet is in secret. The action is not in secret, but the deliberations are; and we want action.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Ricard: Splitting hairs.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How silly can you get?

Mr. Benidickson: I have seen no order in council yet on this double depreciation matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this inquiry has gone as far as it can usefully go without becoming a debate. I recognize the hon. member for Essex East, who is rising to a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked the Minister of Finance when this policy of double depreciation was going to be made effective.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a point of order. It is true that under our rules no minister can be compelled to say what government policy is or when it should be announced. What I would point out to Your Honour is that when the minister introduced his budget he announced that policy, and no minister has the right to refuse to say when a policy already announced will be made effective. That is the question we are now asking because of this serious problem of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East presents as a point of order, a comment on the reply given to a question asked before the orders of the day. I think the practice of the house is well settled that although hon. members of the house may put to the ministers questions about their administrative responsibilities, they cannot insist on answers nor can they comment on the absence of answers. That is clearly set out in Beauchesne's exposition of the practice in this period of our proceedings. There is the right to ask a supplementary question and hon. members do use that not only for eliciting additional information but for comment, but it is not an approved practice.

The question that was asked was one of those which do not seek information but rather press the government to take some action. That is the particular kind of question where there should be no comment on the answer, because it is not a question asking for factual information.

UNEMPLOYMENT—RESULTS OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. He indicated yesterday that there were approximately 200,000 people employed on site and off site under the winter works program. Would the number of unemployed be increased by approximately 200,000 if we did not have this program, or are some of these people still included in the list of unemployed?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if some of these people were not hired on these jobs at the time the bureau of statistics made its survey during a certain period of the month, they certainly would be included. However, it might be that two days after the survey had been made a great many of these people could have been hired on such jobs.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO CONSULTATION ON PORTABLE PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of the great interest in portable pensions that exists throughout the country, and the statement by the chairman of the Ontario committee on portable pensions to the effect that they could be produced only with the co-operation of the federal government. My question is, has there been any consultation between representatives of the Ontario government and the federal government toward the end of introducing a portable pension plan in Canada?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

LACOMBE, ALTA.—REPORTED INTENTION TO MOVE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue based on a letter I received only today. For that reason I was unable to give him notice. Is the minister aware of any plan by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to move its CBX transmitter station from the town of Lacombe in central Alberta to either Calgary or Edmonton, or both?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have no information on the matter. I will take it up with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, obtain the information and advise the house at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Speakman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that upwards of 100,000 people, probably the heaviest concentration of rural population—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question whether the hon. member is right in making this comment on his first question which has now been taken as notice. He may have a right to ask a supplementary question when he gets his answer.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED REDUCTIONS IN ADVERTISING RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Peterborough asked a question, which appears on page 1972 of Hansard, with respect to serious advertising rate slashes by the C.B.C. The minister has been informed by the C.B.C. as follows. The corporation has not slashed advertising rates, nor does it engage in forms of merchandising and promotion which constitute rate slashing. Corporation selling practice is guided strictly by published rate cards, specifying rates for national network, national selective, and local retail business. No sales are made at variance with these published rates.

There has been recent discussion in the press regarding the extension of the C.B.C.'s local rate policy for T.V. to the Halifax, Montreal and Ottawa markets. This was not a new policy but one which was established as long ago as 1957 in Vancouver and 1958 in Toronto. The principle of local retail rates has long been established in newspaper and private broadcasting circles.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT TO PERMIT PROVINCIAL LOTTERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I am encouraged to ask it because of the serious significance leading members of the government in general usually attach to public opinion polls. Has the minister noted the overwhelming affirmative response to the La Presse poll on provincial lotteries? I should like to ask if his department is presently considering changes to the Criminal Code enabling such provincial enterprises?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of lotteries and related matters is under consideration in my department at the present time. I expect shortly to be in a position to take up this question with my colleagues. Anything further will have to await a decision, and when one is made it will be announced in the usual fashion.

SHIPPING

SHIPPEGAN ISLAND—INSTALLATION OF MARINE AID STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the house whether it is the intention of his department to proceed at an early date with the installation of a marine aid station on the bay of Chaleur side of Shippegan island and, if so, could the minister give detailed information on this proposed project?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question, but unfortunately he did not specify the type of aid to navigation that he was referring to, and without such specific details I was unable to find anything that I could report today. If the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to tell me exactly what it is he is seeking I will endeavour to answer his question. At the present time with such information as the hon. member has provided, I must say I think there is no such project planned for Shippegan island.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that a survey was made last summer by the officials of his department in order to determine the location for a Decca station?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that it is an urgent matter to inquire if the minister is aware of a survey having been made last summer.

Mr. Robichaud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister asked me to specify the type of station to which I referred, and I am attempting now to specify that it was a Decca station.

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—REPORTED LACK OF CO-OPERATION BY ICEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. This question is prompted by a communication from the secretary of local 1259, I.L.A., of North Sydney, Nova Scotia. Would the minister advise whether there has been lack of co-operation, as charged, in regard to having icebreakers free the Canadian National Railway ships in the harbour there, and further that within recent days the S.S. Cabot Strait and other ships have been diverted from the port of North Sydney, which of course is detrimental to the economy of the area concerned.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Upon receiving notice of this question from the hon. member I made a quick inquiry. I am assured by my officials that the icebreakers in the area are giving the utmost co-operation to shipping at the present time.

As far as the particular case of the S.S. Cabot Strait is concerned, when this ship first asked for icebreaker assistance it was immediately furnished. The ship was freed from the ice and got moving toward Sydney until the master told the master of the icebreaker that he was not prepared to take the Cabot Strait any farther.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED TUNNEL FROM CAPE BRETON TO NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister had any representations from or any consultations with the Progressive Conservative club of St. Francis Xavier University, who are circulating a proposal relative to the building of a tunnel from Newfoundland to Cape Breton—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member would assert that it is the administrative responsibility of the minister in question to deal with political clubs. That is outside of his public responsibility, and it is not proper to ask questions of that kind.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—REPLY TO REPORTED REQUEST FOR SUBWAY LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say whether metropolitan Toronto's request for a subway loan has been granted or rejected by the government?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when a conclusion has been reached and communicated to the city of Toronto it will then be appropriate to make it known to the house.

AGRICULTURE

STATEMENT ON USE OF WHEY MILK POWDER IN MAKING BREAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska asked my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, whether action has been taken by order in council to permit the use of dried whey powder instead of a smaller quantity of dried skim milk powder in the preparation of bread. This matter comes within my jurisdiction, as the standards for foods such as this are established by means of the Food and Drug Act and its regulations.

The national council of the baking industry has suggested that the regulations with respect to standards for enriched bread be revised to permit the use of four parts by weight of dried whey powder for each 100 parts of flour used in preparing the bread. At present the requirement is two parts by weight of skim milk powder, and the council is suggesting this change as an alternative. No action has been taken on the council's suggestions, as the matter is still under consideration within my department.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

NEWSPRINT—SUGGESTED RECLASSIFICATION AS BULK CARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received representations from the manufacturers of newsprint requesting that newsprint shipped through the St. Lawrence seaway be considered as bulk cargo rather than general cargo? If so, has any action been taken?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact I received a brief on this subject within the last few days, and the brief is under consideration at the present time.

COMBINES

CAKE MIX PRODUCTS—REPORTED PRICE CUTTING IN B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. McLennan (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister aware of allegations that Robin Hood Flour Mills Limited are conducting a price cutting war in British Columbia on cake mix products, which contravenes section 33, subparagraph (c) of the Combines Act? If so, what action is contemplated?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member I can say that this complaint has been drawn to my attention, and in turn it has been referred to the director of the Combines Investigation Act for his consideration.

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice. I should like to inquire whether the minister read that frightening story in the Ottawa Journal last night of the Dale family of Ottawa, who are having to spend an annual $8,000 on drugs for the treatment of four of their children suffering from cystic fibrosis; and whether, in the light of the Journal's current series on drug profiteering, which in some cases has been running as high as 1,000 per cent, the government's combines investigation commission will report soon on its finding in its drug investigation.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it was, I think, just in the last 10 days or two weeks that I informed the house in reply to a question that the director expects to bring his statement before the commission by the end of this month; but that it would not be possible to give a forecast as to when the commission might be in a position to make its formal report because of the large volume of evidence already obtained and the fact that the number of persons who wish to make representations or give evidence before the commission cannot of course be ascertained at the present time. All I can say is that the inquiry is proceeding with all possible dispatch.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PAYMENT OF BENEFITS FOR CASUAL EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour of which I was able to give him notice. My question has to do with the unemployment insurance benefits which are denied to claimants who have worked for a relative or for a casual employer. Has the minister's attention been directed to a resolution of protest by the chamber of commerce of St. Charles de Bellechasse, which was addressed to him, according to a news item in Le Soleil of Friday, February 10 last? If so, is he prepared to make a statement at this time, and also what remedial action does he intend to take?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I do not recall having received the particular resolution in question. I can assure the hon. member, however, that when it is brought to my attention it will be dealt with in the normal course of events. I might say this briefly, Mr. Speaker. Section 25(a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act specifies that one of the conditions of insurability is that a contract of service exists between employer and employee. This may be either written or verbal. There are also sections in the act as well as in the regulations dealing with employment of relatives and casual employment. Generally these are in the category of excepted employment.

It is not possible to make general observations covering all possible varieties of circumstances, since each case, Mr. Speaker, usually has its own individual peculiarities. In general I might say that at the present time the regulations are being applied by the unemployment insurance commission in accordance with the letter and the spirit of the law.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL OFFER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. As a result of his conversations with the mayor of Vancouver, the council and the chairman of the port committee, is the minister in a position to advise the house relative to a federal offer to purchase the Vancouver airport or of federal aid toward its further development?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we had a very interesting meeting with the delegation from Vancouver. They submitted a new proposal—as a matter of fact several new proposals—and we had a preliminary discussion of the various ones. The department has agreed to make a new study of the whole matter. As soon as a decision is reached on those proposals I will be very pleased to communicate it to the house.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—REQUEST FOR LOWERING OF INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the government planning any early action, such as lowering the National Housing Act interest rate, that would have the effect of getting the chartered banks—

[Mr. Roberge.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member asked a similar question within the last week, to my recollection.

Mr. Walker: This is the ninth time this session.

Mr. Speaker: He will correct me if I am wrong. I do not believe the hon. member will think that it is in order to repeat the question, which in this particular case is asking for a declaration of policy in any event.

Mr. Garland: If I may say so, with respect, my question had to do with getting the chartered banks back into the lending business in time for the building season this year.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member's question to relate to interest rates being altered for a specific purpose.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

BOBCAT VEHICLE—INQUIRY AS TO ORDER FOR PILOT MODELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Yesterday I asked a question of the Minister of Defence Production, and he said it would be a very appropriate question to ask the Minister of National Defence. I wonder whether I could ask now why, if the development of the Bobcat has been completed, has it been necessary to develop further pilot models over a two-year period rather than initiate production in the magnitude of several hundred, as indicated by General Pearkes last year.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the development program of the Bobcat resulted in the construction of four handmade prototypes. Having decided to go into production, there is a requirement for product improvement and pilot models in order that the transition from the engineering model to mass production techniques can be reflected in the drawings and specifications required to obtain firm fixed price tenders. Without such a pilot run it would be difficult for tenderers to make an accurate bid and subsequently for the government to hold the contractor to his quotation. This, I might say, is a normal procedure in the production of any major item of equipment for which there is a requirement for a considerable number of units.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is this an indication that the scale of urgency for this particular product in the services is not very high?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Speaker. This is normal, good business practice on going into the production of equipment of this kind. It is the same sort of practice that commercial companies, such as automobile manufacturers and so on, follow before they bring out a new model.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—EXTENSION OF SPECIAL ALLOWANCE TO RETURNED PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I directed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and he asked that I address it to the Minister of National Defence. The question I asked yesterday was whether Canadian soldiers who were injured in clashes with the Congolese and were returned to Canada before December would be eligible for the special allowance to Canadian soldiers participating in the Congo action.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, they will not be eligible. The purpose of the special allowance which has been made is to cover the cost of extras which people over there are required to buy at very greatly inflated prices. I understand that a tube of toothpaste for example, costs from $1.50 to $2. The people who have already returned do not need the allowance for this purpose.

Mr. Cardin: Because of the circumstances, difficulties and hardships that have been experienced by Canadian soldiers in the Congo and the relatively small cost involved, will the government not reconsider making the special allowance retroactive to cover the tour of duty rather than to December 1?

[Later:]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not think of the question earlier, but I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a supplementary question with respect to his statement concerning the extra allowance for our forces in the Congo. Is his department not operating a commissary for our forces in the Congo and, if so, why are these people being charged $1.50 for a tube of toothpaste?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, we are providing a certain number of items of various kinds, of course, but if the hon. member has had any experience of military life he would be aware of the fact that soldiers serving in a strange area are constantly visiting the stores and picking up various small items.

Mr. Winch: Not toothpaste; and may I point out for the minister's information that I served four years in the army.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I must point out to the hon. member that I mentioned the price of toothpaste as just one example of the scale of prices. I mentioned it as an example only.

(Translation):

TRADE

IMPORTS OF VEGETABLES FROM CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith).

Would the minister kindly ask his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), to reply to my question of February 7, concerning imports of tomatoes and other vegetables from Cuba.

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska was referring to a question which appears on page 1795 of Hansard for February 7, he will find that it was answered by the Minister of Agriculture on February 8, as found on page 1851 of Hansard.

POLYMER CORPORATION

SARNIA PLANT—INQUIRY AS TO PRIVATE PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Defence Production whether it is a fact that the Polymer Corporation has now established a branch operation in France in which there is private participation both as to capital investment and administration? If that is a fact, is it intended to allow private participation in the Polymer Corporation plant located in Sarnia?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): There is one partner in the expansion program of Polymer at Strasbourg, France. That partner is the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas, through whom provision is being made for the financial set-up of Polymer in France. This is the only partner in the company in France, and the policy has not changed as to the participation of private individuals here in Canada in the Polymer Corporation.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

FEDERAL PROPOSALS RESPECTING TAX-SHARING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he would take the House of Commons into his confidence to the same extent that he appears to have taken the Empire club of Winnipeg with respect to the proposals that are to be made to the premiers of the provinces next week.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the house has been as fully taken into the confidence of the government as the Empire club of Winnipeg or other organizations outside the house have been. I suggest to the hon. member that he refresh his failing memory by consulting the record of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask a supplementary question? Does the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will agree that the question was not such as should have been asked; therefore a supplementary would not be in order.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the press did report that the minister made certain statements to the Empire club of Winnipeg that were not made in this house at all, particularly with respect to the reversion to taxation by the provinces. The press may be wrong and the minister may wish to deny that, but what I sought to ask as a supplementary question was whether the government was adhering to the announcement made last October that after 1962 the provinces would have to impose their own income taxes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I think I should take the opportunity to comment on this matter. I spoke from a text in Winnipeg, and the text is available to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate or anybody else who wishes to see it. I did not say anything about reversion. I was not talking about the matter which has been referred to by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and I can only infer that this is an indulgence in fiction on the part of the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the minister if he would put me on his mailing list.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think my first judgment about this matter was right.

[Mr. O'Hurley.]

FINANCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister comment on any progress being made toward the establishment of a secondary mortgage market in Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when such an announcement becomes appropriate it will, of course, be made to the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—AUTHORITY FOR CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-69, respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of Quebec by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near mile 72 of the Kiask Falls subdivision in a northwesterly direction to a point in the vicinity of Mattagami lake.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the title of the bill indicates, authority is being sought to enable Canadian National Railways to build a 60-mile branch line from a point about 72 miles north of Barraute in the province of Quebec to a point near Mattagami lake and, as I said at the resolution stage, the cost of construction is estimated at $8,400,000 or $140,000 per mile.

The Mattagami lake area, Mr. Speaker, has been prospected off and on during the past half century, but it was only when modern geophysical methods of prospecting were applied in the 1950's that the presence of mineral deposits that could be economically developed was established. The first and most important discovery was made on a property which is now owned by Mattagami Lake Mines Limited, a company which is controlled by Noranda Mines Limited and McIntyre Porcupine Mines Limited. Canadian Explorations Limited has also spent substantial sums of money in turning up large reserves of zinc and copper ore at that location.

The plans call for the installation at the mine property of a concentrate mill having a capacity of 2,000 tons of ore daily, and the construction in the St. Lawrence river valley of a refinery having a capacity of 200 to 250 tons of zinc metal a day. The company expects to begin production at this rate toward the end of next year.

The prospective traffic on the proposed line consists mainly of zinc concentrates, of which about 165,000 tons will move annually to the mining company's refinery, and copper concentrates, 25,000 tons of which will move each year to the Noranda mine's smelter at Noranda. Other traffic made up of mine supplies and general merchandise will also be carried over the line. The Canadian National Railways have secured a traffic guarantee under which the mining company has undertaken to ship annually a minimum total of zinc concentrates during the first 10 years. The agreement contains a penalty provision in case the shipments in any year fall short of the guaranteed tonnage.

As I said when I spoke at the resolution stage, this project deserves encouragement as one that should improve the net position of the Canadian National Railways as well as contribute to the development of this important mineral and pulpwood area. As I mentioned when the resolution was before the committee, I intend to move that the bill be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where officers of the Canadian National will be present to give further particulars as may be required.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the house will appreciate the statement just made by the minister. However, he should, to my mind, take this opportunity to explain the policies of the government and of the Canadian National Railways with regard to the building of a branch line. I am telling hon. members nothing new when I say that there has always been a distinction between the two because, after all, the government organization, i.e. the Canadian National, did previously proceed with the construction of various branch lines on behalf of the government and for the benefit of Canada. What I would like to know, and what the house would like to know too, is whether there is a distinction made between the policy of the Canadian National on the one hand, and that of the government on the other, with regard to the construction of such a branch line. And, should such a distinction be made, I would like to know what would happen, for instance, if the federal government should decide on its own, to build a railway line, while the Canadian National felt the project would be uneconomic. In saying this I have in mind not only the Mattagami lake line, because I believe that the minister just said it is a profitable project; however I shall have something to say on that point later on. I am thinking of other branch lines, because, as the minister knows, it has repeatedly been mentioned the other night that some branch lines might be built elsewhere. I therefore wonder if there is any distinction to be made between the two policies, that of the Canadian National on the one hand, and that of the federal government on the other. I hope that the minister will be able to give us a relevant explanation later today.

I think this is an excellent occasion for the minister to establish that distinction, if there is any to be made.

Now, to come back to the bill before us, quite a number of questions occur to me. I wonder whether the minister would be kind enough to give some attention to them later. When he made his statement on the principle, earlier this week, he did not give any details as to the financial soundness of the project. Earlier today, in his statement before second reading of the bill, he made only a brief reference to the matter.

Accordingly, I wonder if it would not be possible to have further details on the matter because, if I remember well, when in similar circumstances the question of building a similar branch line came up, the minister tabled a very comprehensive statement of accounts indicating the revenues which the National Railway expected to receive on one hand, and on the other, the expenses for the construction of the line, the depreciation and maintenance costs, and finally, the possibility of any surplus.

I think that the house would be interested to know, first of all the financial position of that line according to the estimates prepared by C.N.R. officials. That is the first question which comes to my mind at this time.

Second, what are the concentrates or the ores, apart from those mentioned a few moments ago by the minister, which might be added to the traffic from that point, i.e. Mattagami lake?

Third, to what extent, and in how much time, will the project be self-sustaining? I imagine that, as sometimes happens, the project might not be profitable the first few years. Of course, it will all depend on the volume of traffic and on how many tons of zinc will be transported by that railway.

Moreover, I would like to know how the cost of that railway line compares with that of the other branch lines. I am thinking of the Barraute-Kiask Falls line, of the Beattyville-Chibougamau or Cache Lake line and, finally, of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien line. Of course, the cost must be higher right now, because construction costs must have gone up. Still, it would be of interest for the house to know the difference in cost for those various lines, which, after all, run through the same district and are rather similar.

The minister will probably remember that, when the construction of the Senneterre-St. Felicien branch line, via Chibougamau, was discussed, statements were made in this house —which were later on challenged and denied —that traffic from the Chibougamau district would be directed to Toronto. And, as that railway line is connected with mile 72, which is very close to Kiask Falls, I would like the minister to tell us whether the products of the mine will be directed to Toronto or not. Personally, I am convinced that this is not the case.

Mr. Balcer: I said so, or at least I think I said so earlier, in my statement.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I was probably not listening to what the minister was saying at the time. I think that, on the contrary, he said the products would be shipped to the province of Quebec rather than Ontario. I am satisfied he said that, because the line now under consideration is a branch line of those that were built in 1944 and 1945.

Other questions also come to my mind; they have to do with the financing of the project by the C.N.R. Is there a difference between the form of this bill and that of others previously submitted to parliament, as, for instance, the bill submitted by his predecessor with regard to the line between Chisel lake, I think, and Optic lake. Are all those lines financed in the same way by the C.N.R.? Those are questions whose answers could interest the house. Until we have had an opportunity of asking further questions later, that is all for now.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, what I was really curious about in following the translation was the significance of the remarks made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat as they came through the system, as an indication that somehow Ontario might be gaining more benefits or that the resources would be tapped into Ontario rather than into Quebec.

I could not understand the context in which the hon. member presents this view. It is certainly a question in which I am interested, not so much as someone living in Ontario but rather from the fact that this seems to be a fairly strong feeling amongst Quebec people, namely that the railway structure of Canada in the past, particularly in the Ontario northland, has led the orientation of north-western Quebec in particular to Ontario rather than to what Quebec people may consider its proper centres of influence, namely Montreal and Quebec city.

We all appreciate this matter of watersheds of influence. I know that the people in Quebec in particular appreciate it from a cultural point of view. If the minister is going to comment on the remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier I would appreciate having his estimate of just what this branch line will do in this regard. I refer to the orientation of resources and people toward the province in which the line particularly lies.

The other point on which I should like to touch is this. We reiterate our approval of this measure. We know that before the committee we shall be able to get the details, especially from the officials of the Canadian National Railways, with regard to the plans and the future prospects. However, I should like to know from the minister what are the actual metals that will be coming up or will form the main base of the area as far as the railway is concerned. Are they to be processed, as far as he knows, at Noranda or in the Rouyn area, or is this material likely to find a market in other refineries right across North America? We should have some kind of projection on that point.

The other point on which I think the minister did not touch is the question of competition for traffic. We understand that there is a good road into these mining properties now; that this is not an instance in which the railway is going to be the only means of access. In our own experience with Manitouwadge, where both the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. built lines into two base metal mines, the mines have been quite successful. I refer to Geco and Willroy. They have actually done better than was expected. Their production has been fairly high and the actual base metal product is moved out by rail. However, that is about all that is moving out by rail, and it is only extremely heavy equipment that is moving in by rail. The lion's share of the shipping or the transportation of the things that keep the community going seems to be by truck; these things seem to be going in much more by truck than by rail.

I am wondering whether the minister could not give us some indication as to the prospects the C.N.R. and the government see with regard to the ratio of over-all shipping into the Mattagami lake area that will be hauled by the railway in relation to that hauled by other interests. Are there in existence at the present time franchises to trucking concerns in that area, or is there some protection to the railway from this type of shipping? I suggest that the example we would probably have is what has happened in other areas along new branch lines. Is the Chibougamau area in general being served largely by the railway both with regard to passengers and in what you might call the general cargo sense, or is most of the traffic going by truck?

The reason I think we could consider this matter is that the general tendency in so much of our transportation today in Canada seems to be to have an oversupply of transportation facilities, something which may be fine in a competitive sense but which usually means that we have overmuch capital tied up in transportation concerns. While these are general questions, I think the minister may be in a position to enlighten us on them.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

(Translation):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) put certain questions to me and asked for certain details.

His first question had to do with the government policy: is there any difference between the policy of the government and that of the C.N.R. in the matter of the construction of railway lines.

Well, each such project is studied on its merits. There is no doubt that the present project is self-sustaining; therefore the C.N.R. will not need any subvention and the government will not have to assume part of the construction costs as happened in certain cases, especially for the Chibougamau railway. As I say, each of those cases must be studied on its own merits. It is not always possible to judge or decide on the need for a railway simply on the basis of whether it is self-sustaining, and whether it will be so at once. It is often necessary to extend rail service to certain areas in order to foster their development. In many cases, and for a few years, a railway is not self-sustaining. Then the C.N.R. asks the government for a subvention to help cover the deficits of the first years.

Besides, I believe that my hon. friend found out that the same practice has been followed in the past and on many occasions.

Mr. Chevrier: May I add a supplementary question? The minister answered the first part of the question, that the main concern of the C.N.R. is whether the project is self-supporting. But has the government any policy, distinct and independent from that of the C.N.R., concerning the construction of railway lines?

Mr. Balcer: As I explained a moment ago, each case is studied on its merits. The government's policy is to foster the development of natural resources across the country by all the means at its disposal.

We already indicated that at the present time the government is having a survey made concerning a new Pine Point line. In that case, it will no doubt be necessary to grant a subvention to the C.N.R. That branch line cannot be self-sustaining from the start because too great a distance is involved.

I am giving those details without having gone into all the aspects of the question. For instance, I did not have an opportunity to go into the financing of that railway line.

If I understood the hon. member's question correctly, he would like to know whether the government, before the railway line is built, will require evidence of the project being self-sustaining from the very start.

Even if this is a repetition, I say that each case is studied on its merits, that is according to the needs of the area to be served.

The hon. member for Laurier asked the following question: what is the financial situation concerning that branch line?

As I said, there is a guarantee on the part of Mattagami Lake Mines Limited of approximately 1.4 million tons of zinc, of zinc concentrates for the first ten years, and it is further stipulated that the railway will collect a fine of $5.10 a ton every time the traffic volume does not reach 140,000 tons—

Mr. Chevrier: The minister means 1.4 million tons.

Mr. Balcer: 1.4 million tons—

Mr. Chevrier: The minister said 140,000 tons.

Mr. Balcer: No, it is 140,000 tons a year, or 1.4 million tons for 10 years.

That guarantee involves certain other details. But the railway line as such can be operated and pay its way during the first 10 years at least.

The hon. member for Laurier asked me what other ore concentrates could be extracted or exported from the area.

The hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Martel) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) gave us a complete description of the mineral potential of that area in this regard.

I am not an expert in the study of mining fields, but both of them stated—and all experts are agreed on that—that it is one of the richest areas of the province, and even of Canada, in minerals of all kinds, and that is why the Canadian National Railways would like that railway to be built as soon as possible.

Mr. Chevrier: It is the minister who submits the project to the parliament, and not the member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Balcer: No, no, understand.

Mr. Chevrier: Nor the member for Chapleau. It is up to you to prove its usefulness.

Mr. Balcer: I did prove it. Besides, I said at the beginning that there would be 165 thousand tons of zinc and 25 thousand tons of copper concentrate transported each year.

The member for Laurier also asked me where that mineral would be shipped to. Well, the 165 thousand tons of zinc will be shipped to the St. Lawrence valley, in the province of Quebec, where the company will build a smelter which will employ nearly—

Mr. Chevrier: Where will that smelter be built?

Mr. Balcer: I could not tell you exactly at this time. The exact place is not yet determined; I do not have that information. However, I know it will be in the Montreal area.

As for the 25,000 tons of copper concentrate, they will be shipped by rail to the smelter of the Noranda Mines Limited, in Noranda, in the province of Quebec.

As for the financing of the project, we have followed the same method, the same financing system which was adopted these last few years each time the construction of a line of that kind was involved. There is nothing new in that. It is exactly the same for all railway lines of that kind, which are merely branch lines.

(Text):

The hon. member for Port Arthur asked me some very interesting questions. He asked me whether this would help, primarily, the province of Quebec, and I think he was wondering why this question was being raised by the hon. member for Laurier. The idea is, as I said, that 165,000 tons of zinc will be processed at a smelter in the St. Lawrence valley in the neighbourhood of Montreal, and that 25,000 tons of copper concentrate will be processed at the smelter at Noranda Mines, Noranda, Quebec.

As far as competition by trucks is concerned, may I say that eventually, of course, there will be a road to this area, but that is still a matter for the future. I do not know exactly what stage that project has reached, but the road is not ready yet. I cannot tell the hon. member now how much merchandise and goods, or even how much concentrate, could be moved by truck in connection with such a project. The other day I was in the Chibougamau area, and I was talking with a trucker who was telling me that before the railroad was built he used to work for a trucking company which ran big convoys of about 70 trucks every day bringing down the concentrate to a railhead near, I think, St. Felicien. However, after the railroad had been built, the trucks ceased to carry the concentrate or the ore. It may be that the same thing will happen in this case, because the area is certainly a very long distance from the smelter that is to be built near Montreal, and it is also a certain distance from Noranda. I do not think trucks will be able to compete in carrying the zinc or copper concentrate over such a long haul. Of course it is hypothetical, but that is about the best I can do at this stage in answering on this subject.

Mr. Fisher: The question involves the projection of other traffic. I appreciate that concentrates going to refineries hundreds of miles away will move by rail. We subsidize railways to go into development areas. They carry the bulk traffic which is in a sense low cost traffic, and lose their share of the high cost traffic. My question was directed to ascertaining whether there was some kind of protection for the railway so they can carry an all-round scale of traffic into that area rather than just the concentrates, which I admit will almost always go in by rail rather than truck.

Mr. Balcer: That is a good point. I am sure the experts of the railways who will be present in the committee will be in a better position than I to answer questions of that kind.

On Tuesday the hon. member for Port Arthur asked about employment on the physical construction of the railway. The management figures that construction will require an approximate minimum of 175 men, and that the maximum requirement will rise to between 350 and 400 men. The average number employed will be of the order of 250 men. Of course these figures are approximate, because it is difficult to estimate at the present time. The work will be done by a private contractor. If we base our estimates on similar work in similar areas, that is about the amount of employment the construction itself will bring.

The hon. member also asked what kind of train service will be provided when the line is in operation. At the present time management figures it will be approximately the same as the train service now operating to Chibougamau. This service will tie in with the Chibougamau service. This will mean about three trains a week, although if the traffic warrants it the service will be extended.

As to the completion of the line, industry at this time is pressing the railway to have the line completed by September, 1962 rather than at the end of that year. This date will not be easy to meet, but the railway will do everything it can to have the line ready by that date.

I believe I have answered all the questions asked by the hon. members for Laurier and Port Arthur. If hon. gentlemen have any other questions of this type I am sure the officials of the railway when they are present before the committee will be pleased to answer such inquiries.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could revert to the matter of financing. I am not altogether happy with the reply given me by the minister. The minister said the project was self-sustaining. I am quite prepared to believe that is the case. But I would like to have on record some indication that it is indeed self-sustaining, because the minister has already mentioned the guarantee of 1,400,000 tons of zinc for a 10-year period. How much revenue would thus accrue to the railway? He also said that it would carry 165,000 tons of zinc, and 25,000 tons of copper concentrate.

What revenue will those items provide to the Canadian National Railway? Above all, I should like to know what will be the total revenue, on the one hand, and what will be the total expenditure, including depreciation, interest, etc., on the other, so that we may know if, in the first year, for instance, the railway will make a profit or whether it will have to wait two, three or five years.

Mr. Balcer: According to the information on hand, the revenue for the first year will be sufficient to cover operation costs, including maintenance, as well as all expenses connected with traffic on the rest of the system, for that particular line—

Mr. Chevrier: What will be the revenue?

Mr. Balcer: —as well as the interests and depreciation on all the necessary equipment. I do not have the exact figures. As for the estimated surplus, if my hon. friend—

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister give us this information later?

Mr. Balcer: Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. Chevrier: The total amount of expenses and profits?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, you will definitely be provided with those figures.

Mr. Chevrier: Now, I intended to direct another question to the minister, but the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) raised it. The minister mentioned that Mattagami Lake Mines Limited, has guaranteed the transportation of 1,400,000 tons of zinc. But what assurance have we got, for instance, that trucks will not attract part of the traffic over and above those 1,400,000 tons of zinc, as well as that of copper or any other minerals that might be discovered in that area, and which could normally be shipped by rail. As trucking concerns are on their toes and very competive, nothing prevents them from approaching mining officials to get that traffic. Then, is there some guarantee on the part of the group interested in the construction of the railway that the C.N.R. will obtain all the traffic?

Mr. Balcer: The only information I have at present, Mr. Speaker, is that this guarantee is limited to 1,400,000 tons of zinc for a 10-year period. It is the minimum guarantee given by that company, Mattagami Lake Mines Limited to the Canadian National Railways. Now, as to any surplus, I could not give you any details. However, I certainly will try to get that information. But I know it is the minimum guarantee required by the railway to construct that line.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: If the minister has concluded his address perhaps the details might be dealt with in the committee. I will now put the question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege before the next order of business is called. I misunderstood Your Honour when you suggested a moment ago that we go into committee of the whole. I have a series of questions I wanted to ask the minister and which I still have before me. I thought I would be given the opportunity of doing this when we went into committee of the whole, but as I see it now that opportunity is not going to be given me.

Research Committee

Mr. Speaker: The bill has been referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I hope I am not doing the hon. member an injury. It is really a procedural question. The hon. member for Laurier knows that questions of detail are usually reserved for the committee stage, where it is possible in an informal way to elicit information. The hon. member did have opportunity in his main address and subsequently when the minister was speaking to ask quite a number of questions.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it is too serious. The only thing is that I would like to get answers from the minister. As it is now, I will not be able to get them until the committee sits or until the report of the committee is before the house again.

RESEARCH

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER POLICY, OPERATIONS AND EXPENDITURES

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

1. That a select committee be appointed to consider the policy, operations and expenditures of the national research council, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon;
2. That notwithstanding standing order 67, the committee shall consist of twenty members, of which eleven shall be a quorum;
3. That the committee be empowered to sit during the sittings of the house, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and to send for persons, papers and records.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this motion, because it is the same motion that was before the house last session in the month of May. It is expressed in identical terms, and is a motion to reconstitute the committee which was set up last session. That committee had seven meetings. In its second report to the house it asked that the committee, or a similar committee, be set up in the next session of parliament so that it might continue its deliberations. I might just read the first sentence of the report. It appears on page 170 of the seventh report of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the special committee on research and reads:

> This committee recommends that it be reconstituted early in the next session of parliament in order that it may continue its deliberations.

Last session the committee heard from the national research council and spent about five meetings, I think, dealing with subject matters raised that pertained to that institution. I think the committee had in mind, had there been time available, to visit some of the establishments of the national research council. There was not time to do that; consequently they terminated their discussion of the national research council and at a subsequent meeting heard from the president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, who placed before them a comprehensive statement dealing with the activities of that organization.

Apparently the committee did not have time to go into that in detail; therefore its work was unfinished and it did not reach at all the third area of investigation, namely Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited. Consequently this motion is now before the house in order to set up this committee again. By setting it up in February we will give the committee a chance to complete the work it started last session and investigate thoroughly the three areas that are indicated in the resolution.

I might say the committee asked that its terms of reference be enlarged when it was set up again, but we have brought before the house now the terms of reference as they were last year; they are in exactly the same wording.

Last year I pointed out the value of a committee of the house studying the activities of those three bodies. I indicated that I thought four years had elapsed since research had been considered by a committee of the House of Commons, and, in view of the great importance of research and the great importance of atomic energy, that it would be advisable to study the activities of those organizations.

Over a long period of years the national research council has performed a function in Canadian life that merits commendation, and during the last few years Atomic Energy of Canada has kept well in the forefront of atomic development in the world. I think it would be enlightening and informative for the committee to examine very closely the work of Atomic Energy of Canada to see what progress is being made. In addition to the research facilities which it has established at Chalk River, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is now in the process of expanding its activities, and later this year the first small reactor to deliver electric power to the Ontario grid will become operative. Within a four-year period a larger reactor, the CANDU operation, will become operative and will be delivering power to the Ontario grid. We feel confident that these two operations will prove of value in the use of uranium and heavy water as a source for the development of electric power.

Recently I was at Bombay, India, nearby which has been erected the Canada-India reactor based on the design of NRX at Chalk River and constructed with the advice and assistance of our atomic energy specialists and Canadian engineers, a joint operation between Canada and India, which was opened just last month by Prime Minister Nehru, representing India, and myself representing Canada. The Canada-India reactor is a very fine one. I would say it is the outstanding atomic energy reactor built in the world in the nature of its design and its appearance, and it will serve a very good purpose in the subcontinent of Asia to direct attention to atomic energy research and to train scientists in India, and I suppose in adjoining countries.

The future for the use of atomic energy for power is great. There are so many countries in the world that are looking forward to getting their power requirements from atomic energy plants that the pioneer work that is being done by Canada will likely bear fruit in the next few years. Therefore this is an appropriate time for a committee of the House of Commons to examine the very excellent work that is being done by our scientists and our engineers in the promotion of atomic energy and the development of atomic reactors. Then there is a third field for investigation by the committee, namely that of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company, which did not have an opportunity to report to the committee last session.

This, Mr. Speaker, concludes my remarks. I commend to the house the setting up of this special committee.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house noted with interest the minister's firsthand statement on the official opening ceremony in connection with the Canada-India reactor at Bombay when he presented the resolution now before us for our consideration. It is a fact that Canada has every reason to be proud of the contribution it has made to the establishment of this reactor in one of the very large cities of India, and I believe the minister will appreciate my saying that I think it was appropriate that he, as the minister in charge of this phase of Canadian government operations, should have had the opportunity of attending as the representative of the Canadian government at the ceremonies in Bombay the other day.

I had the opportunity on one occasion, in 1956, of touring this tremendous installation, when it was in a stage of construction under the direction of the director, Professor Baba, who has played such a notable part in the international co-ordination of atomic energy knowledge. It will be recalled that Professor Baba, one of the distinguished scientists of the world and certainly one of the foremost in India, played a very notable part in the conference of world scientists convened in Geneva in 1954 at the instance of the present Secretary General of the United Nations, all as a prelude to the setting up of the atomic energy agency of the United Nations.

Speaking from memory, I believe Canada has contributed roughly half the cost of this reactor, and I believe the estimated cost at the beginning was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $35 million. There may have been further costs involved but in any event I am sure that Canadians will not be dissatisfied with the contribution they have made.

Hon. members may not recall the circumstances of that particular gift which flowed out of Canadian knowledge of atomic energy, the work being done at Chalk River and the work being done by our scientists in the national research council and in our universities generally. This contribution by Canada was among the first contributions made by a country with know-how in atomic energy to another country less endowed in that particular. We made our decision at a time when the United States had likewise decided to establish in the Far East an atomic energy installation in the Philippines.

I am sure we will all agree with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) that this contribution of Canada toward bringing to India and to Asia a knowledge that was primarily discovered by scientists of the west is a contribution of which we will have every reason to be proud later. But, as Mr. Nehru said on one occasion, while it may be true that western scientists did initiate the discovery of atomic energy, no one can deny the great contribution made through the knowledge of Asian scientists out of which has grown the basic knowledge of scientists in the west who were given the opportunity of playing a primary role at the beginning of this great discovery.

The minister has said that in setting up this committee an opportunity will be afforded to examine the work being done by Canadian scientists and engineers, and I think that is a very important examination for parliament to make in connection with a matter that becomes increasingly of such importance in the development of our world and national societies. We are the only country with atomic energy know-how and with an atomic energy installation that right from the first decided that its atomic energy knowledge and installations would be used primarily for peaceful purposes. Neither the present government nor the former government has varied from that intention, and I am sure I express the hope of all Canadians when I say that I hope the turbulent conditions of our times will not prevent our adhering to that objective in the days to come.

I am sure this is a useful committee to set up and members of this party will play their part in giving responsible and careful scrutiny to the work of the national research council, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited.

I have one final thought. The developments that have taken place in the national research council with regard to the setting up of a special section for medical research are a matter to which the minister did not direct our attention but one which I know he will regard with us as a decision of the greatest importance. Great discoveries are being made in many areas of scientific activity. In the field of medical scientific research discoveries over the past decade and a half have been of the greatest significance. It would seem to me that the decision of the director of the national research council and others to give a special status to medical scientific research is a wise move, and I believe that under the direction of Dr. Ray Farquharson that decision will stimulate medical scientific research, give added assistance to medical research in our universities, and generally make it more financially possible for many potential scientists to make their contribution toward the improvement of medical and health standards in this country.

The kind of pursuit envisaged in the setting up of the committee is one which hon. members will follow with only one concern, the advancement of scientific causes in the hope that in the days to come such advancements will be used primarily in the interests of furthering the causes of civilization rather than for the purpose of devising ways and means of destroying that civilization.

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, it is a very great pleasure to be able to express the agreement of this group with the motion to set up a committee on research early in the session. Before I begin my remarks with regard to the committee, I should especially like to take this opportunity of doing what I have purposely refrained from doing up to now and pay my respects to the memory of my predecessor in the house, Mr. Gordon K. Fraser. I have not done so before because I wished to wait until I could relate his name to the area in which he made his greatest contribution. All members now in their seats will know, of course, that he was chairman of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines at the time of his death, and possibly it was in this area that he made his most outstanding contribution. I know that his death nine or ten months ago was a tremendous shock to members of the house and I can assure you that it was a great shock to his constituents. Only a few weeks before I sat in the gallery as his guest and his respect for this house was evidenced in the fact that during the years he sat here he brought over 8,000 young people from the schools of Peterborough to Ottawa and entertained them here so that they could see the government of Canada in action. I can assure you that he will always be remembered as a credit to this house, a credit to his party and to his country. Indeed, it is with some humility that I attempt to follow in his footsteps.

In so far as the establishment of this committee is concerned, I think we must remember that it will give parliament an opportunity to investigate and to appreciate the work that has been done in this country in the field of research, especially since the second world war. Indeed, one might say that Canada has been in the forefront in this area of scientific research since 1916 when the national research council was set up. Perhaps it is as a result of this very important government agency that Canada's position is so high in this area of scientific research.

We in this corner are particularly enthusiastic since defence research has been separated from the national research council. Nearly everything which is done by the national research council, except in particular areas, is done in the name of peace. It is almost ridiculous now to say again that we stand at a fork in the road. One road leads to our complete annihilation, while the other leads to the end of poverty, sickness and disease throughout the world. I feel that years from now men will look back and realize that this country has done a great deal toward the solving of that problem. We have played a real role as a result of the national research council. It would take a great deal more time than is available at this moment to give the details of the work that has been done by the national research council in the various areas to which it has been assigned. It would take even longer to describe fully the fellowships, scholarships and grants which have been given, and the extent to which they have helped people in conducting research. I will, therefore, not go into that today.

Certainly one of the things which has been accomplished has been the bringing of foreign students to Canada to take part in this scientific research, thus enabling them to take this knowledge back to their country. Surely no country can do more than this in contributing toward better understanding throughout the world. In addition, Canadian students have been able to go to other countries and have been given further opportunities for research. This interchange of ideas has perhaps made the men of science more internationalistic than any other group in the world. It would seem that the scientists are in the forefront of those who are concerned with making this a more peaceful world.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of its investigations this committee will come to realize the extent to which these agencies have given Canada a reputation second to none, especially in the area of atomic energy. Atomic Energy of Canada, of course, has had many pressures upon it. We realize that the resources of Canada are coming to an end or will be coming to an end during the next half century. We will be dependent, perhaps not in the foreseeable future but in the future, on atomic power. The fact that Canada has a nuclear reactor in Ontario is an indication that this nation is already looking ahead and is ready to begin the long process of converting to nuclear power. I am very proud of the fact that Canadian General Electric, a major industry in my constituency, has played a great role in this area of atomic research. Indeed, this private industry has supervised the construction and has helped to design this particular reactor, and has contributed some $2 million toward its erection. I think it is extremely important to remember that private enterprise is already willing to take an active part in this work.

I believe all these things point to the fact that this committee will provide parliament with an opportunity to participate in these most important developments. There are a number of problems with which I am sure all members in this house are particularly concerned. One of these problems is how nuclear power can be used safely and just exactly how we can get rid of radioactive material. These are things which must be investigated. It is to the advantage of Canada that she has begun her investigations early. I know that those members of this house who will be participating in this committee will find the work a great challenge.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): In rising to speak to this motion, I do so on behalf of an area in Canada which constitutes about 40 per cent of our nation. When one considers that little is known about the northern sections of the provinces across the country, one can see that I am speaking about 50 per cent of the country. Northern research has been sadly lacking, if not non-existent over the years. The investigations that were conducted by the mines, forests and waters committee in 1958 pointed up the serious lack of research in this area. I was rather hoping that when this committee was set up its terms of reference would contain a provision directing inquiries into the various factors which affect research in our northern areas.

At the moment the only research activities that are being carried on in the Canadian north are those which are being conducted by the Arctic institute which has established a station on Devon island in the Queen Elizabeth group. Then there is the Jacobson-McGill institute which has a station established on Axel Heiberg island. The stations which have been set up by these two units are run pretty well on private funds, particularly the Jacobson-McGill institute. Two other institutes have been established, one at the University of Alberta, which has been set up for research studies of the north. I believe this one is called the Boreal institute. Then there is one at the University of Saskatchewan which was established just last year or the year before, and I believe it is called the institute for northern studies. Of course, the Arctic institute finds its home in Montreal.

I feel that northern research is very important to the future development of Canada. I am sure the members of this house will agree on that score, particularly in the light of the northern development policy of this government. One should remember also that the United States is spending some $20 million annually on studies in the Antarctic. When considering the importance of northern research, one must keep in mind the fact that the Soviet union has approximately 100 Arctic stations that have been set up in that country for furthering these studies. These stations are in addition to the nine or ten floating ice stations, some of which are used as bases from which other scientific parties probe the Canadian sector of the Arctic. Since 1934 thousands of these travelling Russian scientific parties have probed the secrets of the Arctic to further their research. Indeed, they have come as close as 200 miles from the northern shore of the Yukon Territory.

I feel that the policy over past years regarding Canadian research in the Canadian arctic appears consistently to have been to do the minimum possible. The result has been that research has only been carried out when we have been pushed into it by other countries carrying out or wishing to carry out research in the Canadian arctic or by reason of some international program in which we had to participate such as the international geophysical year or we have been pushed into it by the realization of how far we were falling behind other countries in northern research. I think that in view of the findings of the mines, forests and waters committees in 1958 and the evidence in support of those findings that there can be little doubt that we are sadly lacking in our research activities in Canada's north when those activities are compared with those of other countries, particularly those of the Soviet union.

To some extent this neglect of northern research was natural. The country is large and there are pressing research problems elsewhere with more direct application, some of which the minister has mentioned, and scientists are scarce. With the need to meet the immediate demands of a rapidly expanding economy there has been a reluctance to assign to the north any large portion of the country's scientific effort that the particular northern problems require. It is also a fact that in general Canadians have never been attracted to the north. For instance, a large number of Canadian missionaries do work in China while many missionaries in northern Canada are drawn mainly from Europe.

The benefits to be derived by the nation from an active program of northern research are many and varied. For the effective development of the north a major expansion of research is essential in my view. Without thorough and continuing research any development in the north is certainly to be more costly and more easily misdirected. Owing to our geographical location Canada is expected as a northern nation, an arctic nation, to take a leading part in any northern matter, whether it is civil or military. This is an obligation which Canada, as a northern nation, as a people of the north, cannot evade, but it is one which we shall never fulfil effectively without adequate research.

In a rapidly shrinking world, in the age of jet and space travel, our sovereignty in the north must be continually reviewed and strengthened. There is no more effective way, no means less costly and no means more intrinsically useful of strengthening Canada's sovereignty in the north than the conduct of thorough scientific field research programs and the publication of their results. I am not the only one who shares this view. Dr. J. Tuzo Wilson, who is professor of geophysics at the University of Toronto, in 1959, wrote a series of articles for the Telegram. During the international geophysical year Dr. Wilson travelled some 100,000 miles over the earth and during the 18 months of IGY spent some time in both the Antarctic and the Arctic. As set forth in the Telegram of January 7, 1959, he indicates the following views:

[Mr. Nielsen.]

If there is one thing that the IGY has brought out, it is that we don't know enough about the Polar regions. Because of their special position they have unique geophysical interest and importance, but most geophysical theories have been built up upon observations made in temperate regions. In the IGY fresh information obtained especially in the Antarctic has shown that our ideas about wheather, aurora, magnetism, cosmic rays, nearby space all need modification. What is especially needed now is more information about polar regions and particularly about the Canadian Arctic. To gain this will require not 1 per cent of what has been spent on arctic defense and will save itself many times over when new developments are required.

I am sure that the Canadian government is quite aware of this and indeed it is already preparing new programs, but one feature of great importance is missing—the participation of Canadian universities on an adequate scale.

What are some of the research needs in the Canadian north? This subject can be divided into headings, the first of which I feel is technical and resource survey. The fundamental importance of detailed technical surveys appears to have been recognized in recent years and there has been a marked increase in survey work in the north since the second world war. Indeed, there has been an extremely marked increase in this survey work during the past five years. The program of air photography is of particular value as air photography, together with securing adequate geodetic control, is the only practical method of detailed mapping of the north and it was a startling fact which was advanced from the inquiries of the mines, forests and water committee of 1958 that at the present rate of mapping our country it will take 100 years to complete it. The present program and the related mapping activities appear to be somewhat lagging and it should be reviewed to ensure that it is keeping pace with requirements.

As well as mapping the arctic islands, there is a problem of charting the arctic seas. A program which I submit, from the information that was available to the committee in 1958, the Russians have almost completed. Here there is a tremendous volume of work to be done before charts comparable in scale and accuracy to those of more frequented waters can be produced. At the present scale of effort it would take some 250 years to complete this type of mapping.

The current interest in the oil potential of the arctic islands and the advent of submarines in polar waters are recent pointers to the necessity of greatly increasing hydrographic charting in the north. This can be done only as a long term program for which more special ships are essential. Here I feel the government is to be congratulated on the program that the Department of Mines and Technical Survey is carrying out in the polar continental shelf project.

Our future in the north is a mineral future. Minerals are likely to prove by far the most important resource of the north. I think that fact is well recognized. The mineral potential of the north is still unknown and the need for geological surveys is obvious. In a recent release by the bureau of statistics I note that in British Columbia from their 20 silver producing mines they produce only $300,000 more than the Yukon Territory produced with its one silver mine. It is therefore obvious that the economy of the country as a whole can be strengthened to the benefit of all Canadians if more such mines are operating. Only about one third of the Canadian north has been covered by geological mapping even on a reconnaissance scale and still more remains to be done in gravity and airborne magnetometer surveys. Without the geological surveys Operation Franklin, no commercial interest would have developed at this time in the oil possibilities of the arctic islands.

I cannot stress too much the importance of research in this field. Should we not be thinking of setting up an arctic research station for the purpose of investigating ice conditions, water conditions, surface conditions generally and subsurface conditions, as an assistance to those who are conducting the search for oil and gas in Canada's arctic islands? Little is known about the geology in these areas.

While recognizing the paramount importance of minerals as a resource, other possibilities should not be neglected. There is little detailed information on the water power potential of Canadian arctic rivers or of their seasonal variation in flow. Study of the potential of fisheries and wildlife and of possible conservation measures should receive increased attention. In other northern countries reindeer herding has proved successful. Experience in Canada was at first promising but has recently been disappointing. The reason for this probably lies in the lack of research into all aspects of the reindeer industry.

Research, too, is related to transportation. Transportation is one of the things most desperately needed for the efficient opening up of the Canadian north. I have already mentioned the need for hydrographic surveys. A related field is the study of ice formation and the distribution and forecasting of ice conditions. This is work at which the Russians have for many years been far ahead of the rest of the world. Canadian ice studies have recently been co-ordinated under the meteorological division of the Department of Transport. Most of the work contemplated, however, appears to lie in the simple reporting and forecasting of ice conditions. A promising area of research lies in the analysis of past records of ice and their correlation with meteorological factors.

Oceanography is of basic importance to submarine navigation as well as to fisheries research and has also far-reaching applications in other fields of science. I think that in 1958 the mines, forests and waters committee discovered that Canada had only one oceanographer in the whole of the scientific staff of the civil service and that we actually needed 35 as a minimum requirement. The program of Arctic oceanography initiated since the war and carried out to a large extent by the ship Labrador should be continued and expanded particularly in the channels between the islands of the Canadian arctic archipelago to complement the work of the Canadian polar continental shelf expedition which is now under way.

The joint arctic weather stations were established primarily for the purpose of forecasting and reporting weather conditions but they have provided a large amount of new data for research of wide interest. The programs at the stations could be further expanded, and Canadian sovereignty would be strengthened if the complete operation of these stations were taken over by Canada.

The application of recent advances in technology to the design and development of more suitable vehicles, aircraft and shipping for northern service would be of particular value to all northern activities. The transportation of the future in the north might well consist of truck trains with oversized or balloon tires travelling over the tundra and rocky country of the north to transport the ores to smelter and to market. Research into methods of icebreaking and the design of icebreaking vessels appears to be a most appropriate field for Canadian endeavour.

Owing to the events of the international geophysical year, geophysics have recently received considerable attention. The location of the north magnetic pole and the maximum auroral zone and the related implications for space travel and cosmic ray research make the Canadian north an area of exceptional geophysical significance which justifies a greatly expanded effort in geophysics. There are, however, other fields of pure research for which the north is particularly suitable. These include glaciology, arctic medicine, and physiology particularly in connection with cold adaptation and the interesting studies which were carried on during I.G.Y. by a team of doctors in the Old Crow region of the Yukon Territory from which some very useful results were obtained.

There is also a continuing requirement to collect and describe the natural history and material culture of the north and to conduct archaeological expeditions, a field in which, I am happy to note, the government is now taking a more active interest. The national collections do not compare favourably either in size or accessibility with those of other countries.

There are certain special conditions in the north influencing construction and development and causing problems whose solution requires both pure and applied research. The presence of permafrost, for instance, is one of the most common of these problems; this permanently frozen ground has far-reaching effects on all types of construction. The nature of permafrost has to be fully understood if satisfactory construction techniques are to be developed. I think the government has found out, to its sad disillusionment what this problem of permafrost can mean. I remember one building which was constructed at Yellowknife which had a full basement. It was ten feet lower the following year because of the thawing out of the surrounding permafrost.

Another problem is the prevalence of biting flies which make outside activity intolerable. Here, fortunately, research in control methods has produced promising results. This is particularly important if we are to have any development of livestock farming in the Yukon. There are many fields of modern technological research which can overcome or reduce northern problems such as the long distance transmission of power, possibly by direct current and the prevention of freezing in harbours by means of compressed air or by nuclear devices.

The current changes in the north cannot fail to have a profound effect on the native peoples. In recent sessions of the Yukon and Northwest Territories councils and elsewhere grave concern has been expressed that the impact of civilization and the consequent destruction of native culture is resulting in a serious and rapid decline in standards of morality. The situation demands a comprehensive program of research in social anthropology, to determine and define the problems facing native peoples under these conditions and to recommend measures to alleviate their difficulties of adjustment. Without these studies a heavy and continuing price will be paid in relief and rehabilitation measures as well as in human suffering which might have been avoided.

I mentioned the universities and so did Dr. Wilson in his series in the Toronto Telegram. In any plan to increase scientific activity in the north the universities must play an important part, both in the actual conduct of research and in the training of northern scientists. Scientists are hard to get at any time but without sufficient government support we shall not get them at all. Scientists who are willing and able to go to the north but who cannot afford to outfit themselves stand in need of an organization with the necessary funds to back them. The government should therefore, in my view adopt the policy of supporting these institutions by grants in aid to such as the institute for northern studies in Saskatchewan in order to assist and encourage their research activities.

It has been suggested that some universities should specialize in northern studies. This appears however to be a restrictive policy. Northern research is so important to Canada that in my opinion all universities should be encouraged to undertake northern studies, and the need only becomes greater in view of the increasing demands which are being placed on the funds required to run our universities throughout the country. I appeal for government support in this field. The most effective way of providing this encouragement would be by making grants available to universities for programs of northern research. In this way certain faculties at universities could build up their capacity to undertake northern research and to provide trained scientists. This should be initiated immediately in order that university faculties might be able to orient their activities with the object of making grants on an increasing scale to reach about $1 million a year within three or four years. To serve both government and university scientists, laboratory facilities are necessary in the north itself. These should be on a modest scale—and I do mean modest scale—providing the minimum accommodation necessary for scientists to carry out such laboratory investigations as cannot be carried out in southern Canada.

Dr. Wilson suggests such an establishment at Hazen lake on Ellesmere island. The defence research board has a laboratory with facilities for defence research at Fort Churchill. I suggest that these facilities be made available for civil research. In addition, two laboratories, one in the high Arctic in the arctic islands and the other in the western Arctic, are necessary.

The government has taken a step in the right direction in providing in the estimates this year, I believe, sums to provide for the establishment of a research laboratory at the new settlement at Inuvik in the Northwest Territories. It will take about two years to complete even this small station.

I should like to conclude these remarks by quoting from an editorial entitled "Time to Make the Arctic Ours" which appeared in the Kingston Whig-Standard of March 6, 1959, and which reads:

It appears that we need to do more survey work in the area—

Of northern Canada—

—and that the only really safe position is that of actual occupancy. It has been admitted by the minister of mines, Mr. Comtois, that very little has actually been done to increase the pace of our Arctic research. The government now has plans for more activity and there is at present an expedition on the continental shelf.

It seems strange that, with all the discussion of our sovereign rights during the past few years, the government has not done the obvious things in the north country. We talk a good deal about how important the whole area is to us, both economically and strategically, and yet we have undoubtedly neglected to act as if we were determined to keep trespassers out. We may wake up some day and find that this situation has been exploited by some other nation and that we have on our vital back doorstep a most unwelcome—and permanent—squatter.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the setting up of this committee. I am very happy that this committee is being set up again this year. This, in my opinion, is a very important committee. In so far as it relates to the national research council I think it is important for parliament and for Canada to know what is being done in that organization. My own private opinion is that good work is being done and that while its activities are carried out within the confines of scientific laboratories the results of these activities should be communicated, not only to those who are indirectly affected but in particular to those who are directly concerned.

In so far as the activities of this committee are concerned with atomic energy it is important to know what progress is being made in a field in which Canada was a pioneer. In the atomic age and in the age of automation research in its widest sense expresses itself in our standard of living, in industry, in labour and, in fact, in every segment of our national life. I believe, too, that we are at this time passing through a stage when research in all its forms is more important than it has ever before been in the history of our country.

Last year's committee was set up late in the session and there was not time to do all the things which hon. members of the committee would like to have seen done. The operations of a research organization must of necessity be complex and time is required to obtain a detailed knowledge of its activities.

While the time at the disposal of the committee of last session was insufficient, I believe that the committee, under a very able chairman, made a very good beginning. This year, with the committee being set up earlier in the session I would hope that it would be able to give attention to those areas of inquiry which could not be considered last year.

I was fortunate enough to be a member of the committee last year. In the meetings we were able to have last year I came to the conclusion that the amount of work this committee is required to do is so great that it might be worth while if the committee were divided into two parts, one part dealing with the national research council and research in general and the other dealing with atomic energy and related research.

I do not know if the minister proposes to have this committee operate every year but I think it might be a good idea if in one year the committee would deal with the national research council and research in general and the following year deal with atomic energy, Eldorado Mining Company and other aspects of our atomic research.

We all know that research in the field of science has expanded greatly in Canada during the last 40 years. The national research council, established in 1916 under the name of the national advisory council for scientific and industrial research, had during its first year less than 20 employees. Last year the total of scientists, technical employees and service staff was approximately 2,600 and this figure does not include those employed in defence research and atomic energy.

The committee was able to see last year that the national research council has not only increased in size but has become increasingly important in the quality of its scientific investigations and the importance of these investigations has been recognized, not only in scientific circles in our own land but in every country in the world in which any worth-while research is being conducted.

During the third meeting of this committee last year the members were discussing the increase in the circulation of Canadian scientific journals. During this discussion it was learned that in the month of May 1960 the circulation of these journals totalled 10,000, 4,000 in Canada and 6,000 in foreign countries. Dr. E. W. R. Steacie, president of the national research council, used the distribution of these journals to illustrate the growth and importance of Canadian science. I should like to quote from page 121 of the evidence given before last year's committee, where Dr. Steacie in referring to the growth in Canadian scientific journals, said:

Really, this is just a reflection of the fact that Canadian science has come ahead. Thirty or forty years ago there were just the odd small groups which were internationally well-known. There has been a very big increase since. The net result is that scientifically, rather than being in the backwoods we have now become one of the important scientific countries in the world—

This statement coming from a man of Dr. Steacie's stature, from a man who enjoys such a distinguished reputation in scientific circles both inside and outside Canada, should not be allowed to pass unnoticed and should indicate to parliament and to the Canadian people that the quality of Canadian science and research warrants our attention and support.

Last year when the minister referred to the setting up of this committee he said that the research complex consisted of government, universities and research. That may be one of the reasons why Canadian science has become so important as it is. It is because of this group of three which is doing such a fine job of research in Canada. I do not think that scientific research, fundamental research, or any other kind is ever going to be very important in any country unless the universities are able to make the greatest contribution possible.

As far as industrial research is concerned, I believe that we should take a much wider view. I know that industrial research may not come directly under this committee, but one thing I would suggest is that at some time or other this committee take a very wide look at research as it exists all across this country. At the moment I believe we are in a position where we cannot afford to have research in countries which are our competitors ahead of research in our own country. We need more products, different designs, not only for the people of our own country but for exports, and these new products and designs can be arrived at only by industrial research.

In years gone by not a great deal of research was done in this country and even up to recently much of it was done either by parent companies outside of Canada of subsidiaries in Canada or by large companies. In fact, even in 1959, 72 per cent of the total amount of money spent on industrial research was spent by companies whose liabilities were over $50,000,000. In this country we would not expect small companies would make a very large contribution to industrial research. Obviously they would not have the facilities to do so. An electronic microscope, for example, properly placed, would cost somewhere in the vicinity of $70,000 to $80,000. An infrared machine would cost in the vicinity of $15,000. These are expensive pieces of equipment for small industries, with the result that most of our industrial research has been done by the larger companies in conjunction with, of course, the universities and the national research council.

There are those who contend that we are not spending enough money on industrial research in this country. In the year 1960 the amount spent on research in Canada was about 1 per cent of the gross national product. This figure of 1 per cent is compared with the United States where the amount of money spent on research is about 2.74 per cent of the gross national product. I could not agree with this particular comparison for the simple reason that the United States government gives great support to defence production and to industries engaged in defence production, much more so than we do in Canada. I think a much better comparison would be to compare our situation with the situation in the United States in 1954. If we were to do that—and we would then be excluding much of the money which has moved into defence production—we would have the amount of money spent on research in Canada as one per cent of our gross national product and the amount spent on research in the United States as 1.4 per cent. When it is viewed in this manner it is obvious that we are spending per capita approximately the amount of money that the United States is spending. I am not trying to argue here that we are spending enough. I still think there are many things to be done in research in Canada and they can only be done by the government and industry making contributions to research in general and to the universities in particular.

I suppose most people have heard something about a little disagreement going on now between industry and the national research council. The national research council says that industry is not alert to the things that are being developed by the national research council, and the industry says that the national research council is not producing those things which can be easily manufactured. Here is a question which this committee might take the trouble to look into and see whether the needs of Canada, in so far as research is concerned, are being met by the national research council, by industry and by the universities.

I do not suppose that the suggestion which I am going to make now would have very much acceptance, but if this committee were to get a broad view of research as it goes on in this country I think it would be necessary not only to discuss what goes on with the national research council, with industry and with atomic energy and so forth, but what is done by other departments of government that have research departments. I am only talking about the other departments of government bringing in their research activities. I am not talking about discussing estimates, or anything like that. If that were done, then this committee would get an idea of what goes on not only in the national research council, in industry and at the universities but it might also get an idea of the research that is being carried on by other departments of government. I know that this research in other departments of government is taken up in the committee to which the estimates are referred, but in this particular instance I believe that if departmental research were taken up in this particular committee it would be possible for the members of the committee to have a broader view of what actually goes on in research in this country.

I suppose it is a little bit difficult for any country to retain all the scientists it produces, but I believe we must make an effort to provide the proper equipment, the proper environment and the proper incentives for those Canadians who become expert in the field of research to remain in their own country and work for the good of their own country. I believe that can only be done after giving to research in all its phases the assistance which it deserves.

I am not going to make any comments now about the idea that has been talked about recently, namely the research community, but I believe that the research community has much to commend it and I believe it is really important to industrial research in this country. Therefore, as we increase our research in this field we shall be also retaining well trained scientists within the confines of our own country.

In the field of atomic research there are those who believe that here again we are spending too much money. I do not believe this is true. In 1960 the per capita expenditure by the Canadian government was $2.25. In the United States it was approximately $1 per person. Another measurement of how much we are spending on research and atomic energy as compared with the United States would be to compare the annual expenditure on nuclear power with the total annual value of sales of electricity. This figure for Canada would be 5 per cent; the figure for the United States would be 1.5 per cent.

I think there are two reasons why we in Canada should take nuclear research very seriously. First, Canada pioneered in this field and we should make every effort to maintain this advantage. Second, the time is not too far away when we are going to be able to construct small nuclear power plants which will be able to produce electric power efficiently. This will be of tremendous advantage in many parts of our own country, particularly the north, and certainly these units could be sold in many other parts of the world.

Canada should not spend on nuclear research at the expense of other forms of investigation but should spend enough to preserve and protect our interests at home and abroad. Some attempt should be made to determine what Canada should be spending. I think that would be a very good question for the committee to examine.

When we were discussing the report of the committee last year I thought that we were not spending enough money on medical research, and I believe that here is one field where a good deal more attention could be paid. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) mentioned a few moments ago the transmission of electric power. I referred to this last year because I have a direct interest in the matter. We in Newfoundland have in Hamilton falls a great potential source of electricity. If that electricity has to be transmitted by the usual high tension alternating current method we are not going to get the amount of power from that source that we might otherwise get. I believe that here is a field of investigation—some other countries have taken up the matter—where we might investigate the possibilities of transmitting over long distances large amounts of power by direct current.

There are many other fields of investigation in Canada that need to be examined. There is no necessity of my saying any more now. I do say that I am pleased to see that the committee is being set up again. I think it has a lot of work before it and my main recommendation is that the committee be divided into two parts, one to undertake investigation of the national research council and research in general and the other to examine into research in the field of atomic energy.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I always listen with interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) on topics of this type because I always think he makes a most thoughtful contribution to the debate. I rise to express my wholehearted support for the motion because I believe that in view of the importance of research to the Canadian economy it is very necessary that the house and the country be well informed concerning the policy, operations and expenditures of the national research council, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company Limited. When we realize that there is a total expenditure of approximately $30 million I think this indicates the scope of the work undertaken by these organizations.

Before proceeding to deal with the question I rose particularly to discuss, I should like to mention the fact that in a quite well known report some time ago it was suggested that the staff of the national research council and such organizations be brought under the terms of the Civil Service Act. As far as this group is concerned, we would oppose any suggestion to implement that recommendation regardless of the importance and the high standing of the gentleman who made the recommendation. We in this group think it would be most unfortunate to take a step in that direction. It would undermine the spirit of free inquiry and the spirit of scientific initiative which we believe it is most necessary to retain if the staffs of the national research council, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and Eldorado Mining and Refining Company are going to make the greatest possible contribution to research at this time.

I rose particularly, Mr. Speaker, to deal with an article that appeared in the Financial Post of January 28.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question before he proceeds to another subject? Would he make it clear that the suggestion about the staff of the national research council did not come from anyone in the government?

Mr. Herridge: I am sorry if I did not make that clear. I thought everyone in the country was so well aware of the suggestion and had such knowledge of the details of the report that they would know the report to which I was referring. I am referring to a report made by Mr. Heeney, I believe, with respect to the civil service. I accuse the government of a great many delinquencies, but in this case, regardless of party, we all agree that they are not guilty.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am very interested in what the hon. member has said and prima facie I am inclined to agree with him. However, if I were suddenly asked why I feel that research in this department is entirely different from research in the Department of Finance I would not be able to answer the question. Perhaps the hon. member could enlighten me.

Mr. Herridge: I think research in the Department of Finance at the present time would be research related to government policies and possibly involving influences of that kind; in other words, surely it would be mathematical and mechanical research. I am referring to scientific research where the staff must be free to develop their lines of inquiry and their scientific investigations in a way that is unrelated to government policy.

Having leaped that rather low hurdle, I will now proceed with the matter that caused me to rise because in recent days I have been restraining myself very much, and I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) will give me full marks for that. I have reference to an article in the Financial Post of January 28, 1961 which has caused some concern to persons interested in the work of the national research council. While I am only a humble backwoodsman living a more or less peasant farmer's life under normal circumstances, I do read the Financial Post to find out what industry and those who control the wealth of this country are doing other than the control that is retained by governments, both federal and provincial, which in my opinion is increasing almost every day.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then you say that research of this type is in a category by itself.

Mr. Herridge: Quite right. I say that as a member of parliament and not as a scientist. I find that the Financial Post is a very responsible and reliable paper with respect to the economic questions that come before us in Canada and that are multiplying every day, not particularly because of the deficiencies of any government or individual but because of the nature of the development of our country which is becoming so complex and complicated. In my more or less contemplative moods, Mr. Speaker, when I look around me and realize the endless problems we face from day to day which I quite admit are not going to be solved entirely by legislation, I can well understand why the Buddhists build monasteries in the Himalayas.

I want to deal with this article because I have had some correspondence about it and as this paper has a wide circulation the article has caused some concern. After reading the editorial I will deal briefly with a few comments made by persons on both sides of the controversy. The article appears in the column, "The Nation's Business", and it is headed, "Make Our Ideas Earn Our Keep". I have tried to do that all my life, Mr. Speaker, and have always been successful. The article reads in part as follows:

> Top Ottawa scientists, including such able and distinguished men as president E. W. R. Steacie of the national research council, charge that Canadian businessmen are unalert to, and largely unaware of, the value of scientific research. They say Canadian industry is neither bold nor imaginative about developing new, money-making processes and products created by N.R.C. scientists.
> They strike out particularly at "lack of initiative" among Canadian subsidiaries of U.S. companies.
>
> This is an indictment of some gravity. It comes from men who spend over $30 million annually of the taxpayers' money to keep Canada abreast of scientific innovation in this fast-moving world.
> These criticisms, as might be expected, have brought heated protests and countercharges of "prevarication and fabrication" from businessmen.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that there are persons who use rather strong language outside of this house as well as in it.

There is little point in declaring either the scientists or the businessmen wholly right.

But there are some hard facts to consider.

Canada allots only 1 per cent of G.N.P. to research and development v. the 2½ per cent spent by the U.S.—yet we try to live and prosper like Americans. Less than one third of the Canadian research spending is done by business, the rest by governments. The greatest part of all privately sponsored research, 70 per cent, is done by the really big companies only—those with annual sales of more than $50 million.

It is true that Canada has often taken the easy way out and let the U.S. do much of its research for it—and Canada has benefited. It is also plain that the relatively small Canadian market simply isn't big enough to make every top idea which national research council comes up with worth developing, if business even knows about it.

This editorial goes on, and I am quoting it at length because I think it is very well written and informative.

Twenty six Chances at Success

It is a known fact that for every national research council invention developed and sold by a Canadian company, another invention has been turned down in Canada only to be licensed abroad, produced abroad, and imported into Canada from abroad.

I want to insert at that point, Mr. Speaker, the remark that this is after the Canadian taxpayer has paid for the research that produced the invention.

But neither business nor the scientists will make yards for Canada by shouting about the past. Let's, instead, see what can be done about improving communication between science and industry. This cannot be achieved by industry having only its own scientists keep in touch with national research council. It takes an industrialist to transform a feasible idea into a marketable product.

That is very well said.

If industry is more prepared to examine the potentials in national research council work, then national research council has some responsibility for keeping industry informed and enthusiastic about its projects.

More immediately, let's see what can be done about the 26 new patents on the national research council list which the scientists say are immediately feasible for Canadian development. That is where the profit in this controversy lies.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, the various persons concerned have comments to make. There is an article here by Mr. Terence Robertson which is headed, "Our Patents Going Abroad: Research Storm Blowing Up". I have noticed that the articles by Mr. Terence Robertson are usually exactly written; they are not written for sensation. Anyone who has followed his articles must have noticed that he must do a great deal of research himself because his figures and his facts are accurate. He says:

There's a big debate brewing in Canada. Does Canadian industry make full use of discoveries by Canadian scientists?

Research Committee

Some scientists this week boldly charged that industry fails to develop the results of government-sponsored research—

Then, later in the article, he says:

Industry leaders retorted heatedly to the charges. They blame the scientists—particularly those of the government's national research council—for failing to tell industry what they are doing. Industry leaders also insist that scientists don't understand marketing problems, or the kind of sales potential needed to justify development.

Then the various persons give various illustrations of inventions that have been produced and what has happened to them. They are being sold abroad, and so on. Then, after the charges made by industry, various members of the national research council reply. Dr. Steacie says, and I quote:

Although there are encouraging signs of increasing enthusiasm on the part of industry, I must admit that on the whole they don't show much interest—certainly not as much as we would like.

Then Dr. Mackenzie, who I might mention is very well known and a member of a famous Canadian battalion, the 54th Kootenay battalion—I cannot lose an opportunity to mention that fact—has this to say:

I blame Canadian industrialists for being unalert to the opportunities presented by the work of the national research council and other government scientific departments.

The various representatives of industry and the national research council present their views concerning both sides of this question.

I believe it is a good idea to have this debate because it brings to the attention of members certain facts. I am sure most members of this house were unaware, as were the people of the country, of many of these facts. I suggest that in addition to the proposed routine examination which the committee will undertake of the policy, operation and expenditures of the national research council and these other organizations, in the light of this article and the difference of opinion that exists there should be a most detailed inquiry into the situation and the senior staff of the national research council as well as the leading industrialists should be asked to come before the committee to give their views. I think it is very necessary that we secure the facts so that, as a result of that inquiry and the discussions that will revolve around it, we can do as suggested in the editorial, remedy the situation as soon as possible.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to make one other suggestion. I feel that the value and scope of the work of the national research council and these other organizations is insufficiently known to many Canadians. I have often talked to people about this question and I find they are unaware of the work of the national research council, the provincial research councils and the research that goes on in universities. I do feel that the national research council could perform a great service if it established a public relations department so that Canadians generally would be informed of the work carried out by this organization under the sponsorship of the parliament of Canada. The students in universities, and even in the high schools, could be kept informed so that they would have some idea of what is being done in this field, especially as it related to the development of our economy. I believe that in so far as the high schools are concerned, it could be related to the local circumstances of the community in which the high school is situated.

I find particularly that certain sections of smaller industries are very ill-informed as to the value of the work of the national research council and these other organizations as it relates to developments in their own industries. I suggest, therefore, that the council would be well advised to have a public relations department to improve its public relations, to disseminate more information as to its activities generally. The scientific reports that are made are excellent for the people who use them, but I am thinking of publicity that would just inform the public of Canada generally as to the work of the council and these other organizations. Some of this information could be provided by means of pamphlets. I think, too, the council could secure the co-operation of the press and some national magazines if there were some procedure worked out whereby these reports would be given under a certain heading in these publications, a heading such as, "What Research Is Doing for You". I am thinking of something in the popular style used by the magazine Popular Mechanics. I have seen excellent work done by organizations of this sort, which are largely unheard from so far as the Canadian public is concerned and whose achievements are unsung and untold in many quarters.

Before concluding I suggest that is one thing that should be done in order to get a wider recognition of the value and scope of the work that is being undertaken—I refer to its value not only to our times but to the young generations that are growing up—in the development and the improvement of our country.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this motion to set up this special committee to examine into the operations of the national research council and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. Hon. members will perhaps appreciate the fact that these days I do not always rise to support something brought forward by the government. As a matter of fact, I have occasion to differ sharply with them on most of the things they bring forward. However, today I wish to commend the minister for bringing forward at a relatively early stage of the session this motion to set up this committee.

I regard the motion as merely a continuation of the authority granted last year to a committee to examine into this subject, and I believe that is the way in which the minister intended it to be taken. The committee was set up last year with the same terms of reference but regrettably it was rather late in the session when it was set up and there was not an opportunity for it to do the work it had hoped to do. It was obliged to forgo almost completely the opportunity of examining into atomic energy matters.

The history of these committees is rather interesting to me. In 1949 for the first time a committee was created to examine into the operations of the atomic energy control board. It will be recalled that at that time there was a great deal of reason for security in the committee's examination. However, there was no practical difficulty in the workings of the committee. Indeed, on that occasion I think the house looked on this as a non-partisan matter. It is interesting to note, as I had recalled to my memory only a few moments ago when I turned up that reference in the library, the first speaker on the opposition side on that occasion made it quite clear that he was supporting the motion and gave his reasons. That spirit has been continued throughout these committees and I hope my remarks today will be in keeping with that spirit.

Then in 1950, the next year, a committee was created to examine into the operations of the national research council. Then in 1953 a special committee was appointed to examine into the operations of both. Then in 1956 a similar committee was appointed. I am sorry to say that I may have mislead the house. The committee in 1953 examined into the operations of the government in the field of atomic energy. The course of proceeding up to that time had been to refer to the committee one subject or another, namely the national research council or the atomic energy subject. Then in 1956 a special committee was set up to examine into the role of the government in the field of non-military research and specific reference was made to both the atomic energy field and the national research council. The reference last year followed that practice of combining both subjects as does the one this year. I do not know that it matters a great deal which method is used. A great deal of work is indicated. It is not too important which method is used but a great deal of work is required in order to cover both subjects in one session.

The committee members were kind enough in the first four committees I have mentioned to appoint me chairman. I think I can say that in my experience as a member of the House of Commons I have not sat on any committee in which closer co-operation was granted to the chairman by the members of the committee than was granted in those four committees.

I hope the chairman of the committee last year could say the same thing if he were here today. Certainly for my part, as a member of the committee I felt that the chairman conducted the proceedings of the committee in a way that was wholly agreeable to all hon. members sitting on that committee. Every opportunity was given to the members of the committee to examine into the subject matter as thoroughly as they wished. The feeling of fairness and the spirit of co-operation among committee members were most satisfactory. Within the limited time at its disposal the committee was able to accomplish a good deal of work. However, regrettably, the time was much too limited having regard to the scope of the subject matter referred to it.

The committee last year dealt a great deal with the national research council. Before leaving that aspect of the subject I want to place on record what I regard as an extremely significant fact, namely the high calibre of persons who have been chosen under succeeding governments to head the national research council from its inception. This is a fortunate thing for this whole enterprise. I think the high achievement they have been able to record has been due in large measure to that fact.

There is another subject that is very much in my mind, namely the relation of the national research council to industry. I feel that the work of the national research council must be kept well balanced as between research in pure science and research in applied science. I believe the balance between those two matters must be maintained. I hope that at no time will the research council be forced into a position in which an abnormally large percentage of its work will be directed to the field of applied science. I believe that is a field that must be occupied partially by them but largely occupied by industry and outside agencies.

In that connection may I say this. I hold the view that the government must reexamine the matter of corporation taxes or taxes applied to industries in this country in order to ascertain whether we should go further in making tax adjustments for research. In my view we must make appropriate tax adjustments for the work of industry in the scientific and research field.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member about to conclude his remarks?

Mr. McIlraith: I hope to conclude my remarks in about one minute, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Churchill: We might go on for two or three minutes.

Mr. Speaker: If it is only a matter of a minute or two more, perhaps the house will agree.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That is a subject that probably can be discussed more appropriately when we are dealing with the budget and the estimates rather than on the motion to set up the committee.

Then there is to be considered the field of atomic energy. We are at a critical stage of its development. I look forward with eagerness to examining into the exact state of the development in relation to the production of power—I refer to the use of nuclear energy for the production of power—and its relationship to industry. If we can develop an additional economically feasible source of power in this country at this time it will do much to strengthen our whole economy over the years ahead. I am looking forward to that opportunity of examining the subject. It may well be that we are at the stage at which we may be obliged again to adjust some of our taxation policies in order to take cognizance of the new developments in that field and of the rapidity with which they have come about.

Without further remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to express my approval of this motion to set up the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Speaker; it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): I rise to support the resolution. I doubt whether the value of research as such to the progress associated with modern living is appreciated, at least consciously, to the extent that it should be or to the extent that it merits. Therefore I should like to begin by paying a tribute to those who spend their lives in studious research in connection with the gathering of knowledge and whose unspectacular work has made possible the spectacular progress associated with this age.

In most phases of human endeavour the hallmark of the twentieth century has been progress and this is true particularly in the scientific field, in transportation, in medicine, in the production of food and in many other directions. It is to the production of food that I should particularly like to refer and I wish to deal with one foodstuff especially, that is, fish.

My interest is, of course, obvious. In the riding which I have the honour to represent many of the people are fishermen, and the waters off the coast of Labrador and northern Newfoundland are very rich in fish. The question naturally arises: are these resources being utilized to the best possible extent, and is modern technology being applied to the production and processing of fish? I should like to point out that the fisheries of the Atlantic provinces are important not only to the Atlantic provinces themselves but to the whole of Canada. I should like to raise the question whether these fisheries can be augmented so that the whole of the Canadian economy might be strengthened.

Closely allied with this object is the question of research. Lest I should give the impression that research has been neglected, I hasten to say that such is not the case. Over the years much work has been done with regard to fisheries research. A lot of time and money has been expended, and able men have made and are making a study of fish their life's work. It goes without saying that for these dedicated scientists and technicians all of us have a great deal of respect and a great deal of appreciation. We appreciate what they are doing and what they are trying to do. I should like to point out the need for an extension and an enlargement of the research work being done in this field. My personal opinion is that the job these men are trying to do is made more difficult by the lack of the necessary funds and the necessary help.

A great deal of information has been gained already, but the field is wide and the possibilities are many. More and more knowledge is needed on which to base an expansion of the industry, and the search for knowledge is one which must go on continuously and unrelentingly. I might mention a few of the subjects about which more information is required. There is, for instance, the movement and behaviour of herrings; the need for knowledge to enable us to predict where they can be found. Then again, why does the cod, the basic bread and butter fish of the Atlantic waters, sometimes disappear from the areas where it is usually found? This happens periodically, and it happened last year. Codfish practically disappeared from whole sections of the coast. There must be a reason for this, and there must be some way of predicting in advance whether or not such a phenomenon is likely to occur, I might add, when it does occur it means well nigh tragedy to the people involved. This year there is a lot of arctic ice off the coast and it has been suggested that in consequence the fishing will be good. Is there, in fact, a relationship? This is something which might be looked into.

The means of increasing production are important. Obviously it would be ideal if the catch per man could be increased and if at the same time the value of the catch could be increased. I shall not, of course, discuss the economic side of the question but I should like to point out the need for research into the whole fishing question.

There is one matter which I raised before in this house, the great need for artificial bait. Every year many thousand quintals of fish are left uncaught because fishing communities are short of bait. I believe that this factor alone would warrant intensive research into the development of artificial bait which could supplement the bait that is usually used.

There is the matter of improvements in cold storage facilities with a view to making better, cheaper and lighter units. There is also the falling off of the salmon fishery and the need for research into the reasons why this has occurred and the possibilities of improving and increasing the number of streams where salmon may breed.

In addition there is the matter of research into the mechanics of fishing and the processing of fish. Important steps have already been taken in this field. I think of mechanical aids for the splitting, filleting and drying of fish but too large a segment of the industry still depends on primitive methods which are really out of place in our modern day economy and in the highly competitive fields in which both the fishermen and the trade have to operate.

These problems are not new and have already been given considerable attention but I should like at this time to emphasize the need for giving these matters even more attention and I urge that these problems be treated with greater urgency.

The need for developing the north has already been mentioned by several hon. members as has the subject of the possibilities which long range power transmission open up for the north. If the resources of the 6 million or more horsepower on the Hamilton river were made available a large part of Canada and perhaps areas outside would benefit greatly.

In a nation such as ours with an expanding population, holding our own is not enough. Holding our own is merely inviting disaster. It is almost a matter of life and death for us to keep ahead technologically of the rest of the competition. We must advance ahead of the times. The only way to do this is to devote more time and money to patient and dedicated efforts in the field of research.

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, before this motion is carried I should like to make a few brief remarks on the question of forming a committee to look into the operation, expenditures and policies of the national research council, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited. In making these remarks I want only to emphasize the growing need we have for increased research in this atomic age. I should like to mention a few fields where more research might result in the development of certain new industries in our country in general and in my own district in particular.

I know of the wonderful job that has been done in recent years by the national research council as was pointed out by previous speakers this afternoon and evening. I know, too, the council has a significant contribution to make in the years ahead. By way of example I should like to mention the fact that research into the peaceful purposes of uranium could be very important for our country and the future of our uranium industry.

Not long ago, if my memory serves me right, we were informed in this house about the important development that had taken place in respect of alloys developed for steel which would require the use of uranium or radioactive material. This is one example which indicates the importance of research in a new field. We are in a new atomic age and I think it is worth while that the government assumes the responsibility through the work of the national research council of developing means of assistance for our new metal industries such as uranium.

There are also other metals that have been found in abundant quantity in Canada in recent years in respect of which research could play a very important role in terms of the future development of these deposits. We know, for instance, that in Canada we have on the north shores of the St. Lawrence the world's largest deposits of ilmenite which contains titanium and which is in increasing demand for the construction of jet motors and other things. We also have large deposits of columbium and tantalum. One is near North Bay and the other of which I am thinking is near Montreal at Oka. Columbium and tantalum have been known for many years but their use is relatively new and it will increase in years to come. Research will play a vital role in determining increased uses for these metals.

I now want to briefly mention a new metal about which we have heard with increasing frequency in recent times. One is always tempted to say a "new" metal, but of course these metals have been known for many years and have come into use only recently. I refer to lithium. Large deposits have been found in northern Manitoba, northern Ontario, and particularly in my district in northern Quebec where it is believed the largest known lithium deposit has been located. As a matter of fact this resulted a few years ago in the building of the first lithium mine by Quebec Lithium Corporation.

To illustrate the importance of research in that particular case, let me say that the mine was hoping to start production and had a contract with an important United States firm but they were not too sure what process they should use. Up to that time the process used was what we call a dry process method which had been used in the United States. Apparently that was the one that was most advantageous. Quebec Lithium Corporation, however, decided to look into the problem, had its metallurgists study the situation and through the co-operation of the Quebec department of mines laboratories succeeded in developing a new process. They used a commonly known method which was not previously believed suitable for the extraction of lithium ore. They used a wet process well known throughout the mining industry but adapted it in this case after careful research to enable the flotation of the spodumene crystals in order to make a concentrate of lithium that could be sent to those industries which require this metal. We hope the demand will increase in years to come.

I might say the company is controlled by two mines, East Sullivan and Sullivan Mines, which in turn are headed by a well-known French Canadian. I might say this is almost an exception. He is one of the few French Canadians who have succeeded in the mining industry and built up a mining empire of that kind. I am referring to Mr. Pierre Beauchemin. I pay tribute to him. It might be thought that this gentleman had done enough. Instead of retiring he kept right on and now the company in question has built a refinery which is the first lithium refinery not only in the province of Quebec but in Canada. This group is very aggressive in trying to find new methods and new processes for the extraction of lithium metal, a relatively new metal so far as use is concerned.

I feel the national research council would do well if it could enlarge the use of lithium in the years to come by intensive research. The research program could also be extended into other metals such as molybdenite. Research programs should be intensified to find new uses for the metal. This research program should be conducted into the use of all of our base metals, and it should be intensified in co-operation with private companies and industrialists. If new uses were found for these base metals it would increase their sale, since they are produced in large quantities in our country.

This afternoon the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) suggested that the national research council would do well to have public relations men to publicize their work to the industries and to the public in general. I think it is a wonderful idea. I think the suggestion should be adopted, but I would go even further. I suggest that the public relations men of the national research council should intensify their co-operation with industry and thereby bring about new processes for the use of different materials in the country. This would be beneficial to industry and to the people of the country.

I wish to read a few headlines which appeared in the Wall Street Journal in reference to different new problems which have arisen in recent years as a result of the development of the atomic age. One headline reads:

Hydrogen age sets challenge for chemicals.

Another one is as follows:

Nuclear energy developments to spur new prospects for chemical energy.

A third reads:

Revolution in textile manufacture.

Further down the page we have another headline which has to do with an important industry in our country. It reads as follows:

Pulp and paper industry shows marked growth.

I recall that I was a member of the committee on mines, forests and waters in 1959. This matter came up when we made a careful study of our forest resources. At that time we had witnesses from different companies who mentioned that their companies were doing much research in developing new uses for different products and finding new markets for them. I should like to emphasize the fact that more co-operation should take place between the national research council on the one hand and companies across Canada on the other which are doing their own research. Industrialists should be encouraged to do research in different ways, either through collaboration directly with the national research council or in other ways. In that way research programs could be stimulated all across Canada.

Before I resume my seat I should like to emphasize the fact that lithium ores are found abundantly in northern Quebec. As I mentioned before, the deposits there are believed to be the largest in the world. There are also large deposits in northern Ontario and in northern Manitoba. I believe that this metal will become the fuel of the future for jet planes. Experiments are being carried out to that end. I hold in my hand a research magazine which has a very detailed article in that regard. I will not read it because it would take too long. Borax and lithium mixed together have been used, and in time they will revolutionize the fuel used in the airplanes of the future.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Martel) for his speech delivered in tip-top English, following an excellent example set in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Research is such an O.K. word right now that to come along with any strictures and warnings is sort of like being a pagan among the vestal virgins, but I have the feeling that we have rather gone overboard for the magic of the word "research" in the last couple of years. I was at a parliamentary committee a couple of years ago that went very strongly for research. Now we have the new Department of Forestry, Mr. Speaker, that is primarily to be concerned with research, and wherever I go in the forestry circles and talk to woods managers and people in the business I find that they are a little bit frightened of the word "research". They do not mind basic research in their fields, but they are very much interested in what research has been done since the war which has some kind of practical pay-off.

I realize there is a split between applied research and basic research, and it seems to me the national research council in particular does a magnificent job in basic research. I often wonder whether the success they have is in that particular field which spills over to a degree into the applied research that they have, for example, in the field of snow and ice mechanics and whether there may not be a lesson there for the other departments of government such as forestry, mines and technical surveys that they might profit from.

It seems to me the basic reason why the national research council is probably more effective in research than the ordinary government department is that the scientists there are not civil servants; they do not have the strait-jacket of the civil service arrangement. It may be that the national research council is extremely good because there is a flexibility and an income and outgo of all scientists from all over the world on a continuing, regular basis in their establishment, and so they have a plastic, wide open kind of organization where there is a considerable amount of discussion and cross fertilization with other parts of the world.

My own impression of the forestry research, for example, that is going on in this country under the federal department is that to quite an extent it is divorced from the over-all research that is taking place in the world of forestry. I think the committee might very well consider looking at the research programs of some of the government departments with an eye to seeing if the national research council could not be an example to them.

The last point I want to make relates to a story that was told me by a scientist in Ottawa. He said, "You know, over the years members of parliament become curious about research programs and critical of the money being spent on research." He said, "You can always stop them quickly; all you have to do is to get a bunch of members of parliament into a party and take them off to Chalk River or some other place with big laboratory facilities, let them be impressed with a bunch of dials, gadgets and counters that they do not understand, let them meet a few men in white smocks and they all come away saying it is a marvelous place, these scientists are wonderful people who are doing a great job, and in the end their curiosity dies down." The point of the story is that apparently this is a way that scientists can take baying parliamentarians off the track. I think there is a great deal to this.

Mr. Churchill: That is hardly fair to the scientists. Perhaps the hon. member is speaking in a jocular vein but I wonder whether that is quite fair to the scientists who are charged with responsibility for our national research.

Mr. Fisher: I do not know whether it is quite fair to the scientists but I think it is certainly fair to the members of parliament. This is the point I should like to make about the committee and its work and I may say I discussed it with the chairman of the committee last year and he felt very strongly about it. It is almost impossible for a member of parliament to make a real contribution to the work of this committee unless he is prepared to spend a great deal of time studying the whole research field, not so much from the point of view of becoming an expert in any sense in one field but in order to understand the problems of research as a whole. I would commend to all members of this committee the kind of study, shall I say, that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has given to agriculture and soybeans in his specialization—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot do everything.

Mr. Fisher: —although I might be thought flippant if I brought him into this field.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My time is limited.

Mr. Fisher: I might suggest the wonderful study that the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) has made in the development of efficient commuter trains to serve certain sections around Toronto. The point is that the members of the committee can only do a good job in examining the research establishment of the government if they spend a considerable time in study, perhaps an inordinate amount compared with that required for other committees. I know that one reason I never tried to be made a member of a committee was that I considered it was a little bit too much work.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Citizenship—

49. Citizenship branch, $808,322.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. lady will no doubt recall that last year I expressed some misgivings about some of the expenditures under this item and even went the length of suggesting that consideration should be given to the consolidation of this branch and the citizenship registration branch. The hon. lady will also remember that I had something to say about some of the publications of the Canadian citizenship branch and in particular the magazine Citizen which is still being published.

I have not looked up the record and I may be wrong but if I remember rightly the hon. lady said there was a considerable demand for this magazine and I asked if there was an effective demand in the economic sense, in other words, whether enough people in the country were willing to buy this magazine at a price which would pay for the cost of producing it. I have looked through the most recent number and while I certainly do not take exception to anything in it I would think that if we are going to spend money on publications at all there are other publications in this country on which it might be spent, even perhaps by giving financial assistance to magazines of more general interest, which would perhaps do more to promote real Canadian citizenship than the maintenance of "kept" journals of this description.

I know it is very easy to ask me what I did about this when I was minister and I admit that the answer to that question is a very short one, that I expressed misgivings and did very little else. I felt at that time, when we were having immigration on such a very large scale, that I should give my primary attention, which I did, to the immigration branch and also to the Indian affairs branch. But I did feel that a good deal too much of the money of this branch and of the time of the members of the branch were taken up with activities which, however praiseworthy they might be, would in my book not rate very high on the list of priorities for the expenditure of public money.

As a result of the establishment of citizenship courts in those areas of the country where the largest concentrations of recent immigrants exist, it does seem to me there is even greater reason for considreing carefully and, indeed, taking action on the suggestion I made last year that these two branches should be consolidated. I do think there is a place for liaison officers who would perhaps be a little like the pensions advocates on the board of pension commissioners and who would help immigrants with their difficulties before the court, in preparing for the court and other matters of that sort. However, I think this whole activity ought to be tied much more closely than it is to the actual potential citizens and not be so diffuse and general as it is.

I admit that in the light of all the estimates the amount involved is not very great but that can be said, of course, of a great many other expenditures. My own feeling is that when all is said and done an expenditure of $800,000 is still quite a lot of money and that perhaps some of that could be saved. I am not suggesting that the officials should be dispensed with or anything of that sort. I think there are other useful things that have to be and could be done.

However, this is probably one of those areas which will be examined by the Glassco commission when it gets around to it. Perhaps as a former minister, having expressed these rather vague misgivings, I would be well advised not to go any farther at this time. I want to make it very clear that I am not reflecting in any way on the members of the staff. I am not reflecting on anyone. I am just questioning in my own mind whether, in view of the many demands on the taxpayers' dollar, some of the things that are done in this branch are really high enough in priority to warrant the expenditure.

There is one other thing I should like to mention. So far as the language classes are concerned, they warrant spending everything on them that can be spent profitably from the point of view of reducing the period in which newcomers to Canada suffer from the disability of not being able to speak one or the other of the official languages. In this connection, when the hon. lady replies later, I would be interested to know whether she has now been able to establish any better relations with the authorities in the province of Quebec or whether she has made any attempt to establish any better relations with the authorities in the province of Quebec, with a view to having closer co-operation in the language classes than it was possible to get at an earlier time. I know nothing about this. It is just a query. I have felt for a long time that more would be desirable there if it could be accomplished. There is no question whatever that the department, wherever it could avail itself of the ordinary adult education facilities that exist in a province, has always sought to do so and I would hope would continue to do so.

There is one other question of this character that I should like also to put to the hon. lady. There were several experiments conducted in the teaching of languages. I think we would all be interested to know what success there had been with some of the research in which the department was interested a year or two ago. I may have asked that question last year. I think I did. If I did, and there is nothing new to be said about it I do not want to take up the time of the committee.

There is one other thing that I should like to say before I sit down. I think we all realize that one of the most important elements in the satisfactory integration of newcomers into our society is that there should be a sympathetic attitude toward these newcomers on the part of the rest of us who are here. This is one of the things this branch of the department has sought to promote through voluntary organizations of all kinds. I would not suggest for a moment that I would like to see that kind of activity discouraged; far from it. However, I have some doubts, myself, about whether the attempts that have been made—some of them of course have been exceedingly well meaning—to use the facilities of the branch for the purpose of promoting closer relationships between the two groups of older Canadians are really perhaps as badly needed as some of these other activities are. I think that is something that is really looking after itself rather well at the moment.

I said a moment ago, and I want to repeat, that a sympathetic, reasonable and honest attitude and a respect for the facts is very important if we are to have a proper integration of the newcomers, a proper understanding of the relationship between recent immigrants to this country and those who have been longer in the country. I cannot help but think that one of the best ways to promote that would be to have a really intimate relationship between the courts and the liaison officers of this branch, to the point where they really are a single organization.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, before embarking on a sort of hatchet job on what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had to say earlier, I should like to concur in everything he had to say about the importance of a sympathetic, reasonable and honest attitude, as he described it, on the part of those of us who are already here toward those who have come here recently and will come in the future. I think perhaps this attitude is very appropriate at this particular time of the year since brotherhood week is almost upon us. Speakers right across this country will be reminding the participants in these brotherhood week activities and those who attend the brotherhood banquets of the absolutely vital necessity of emphasizing this particular aspect.

I have not had as much opportunity as I would like to have had to examine some of the documents that are put in the hands of new Canadians, such as the one to which the hon. member referred. Certainly I would be unhappy if some of the prouder aspects of our history in this realm were not mentioned there. I am thinking particularly of a reference to Ezekiel Hart and the well known story of that early example of tolerance and understanding on the part of the French Canadian citizens of Three Rivers. If this story and others like it are not contained in these pamphlets outlining and underlining our proud and successful history in this regard, I would be very much disappointed.

I should like to return now to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Before I came to the House of Commons I heard a lot about the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and some of the difficulties he had encountered. Of course, I read and heard a great deal about the various activities of the cabinet of that day. The impression I gained, and apparently it was shared by a large number of Canadians in 1957, was of fumbling and bumbling and perhaps not coming to grips with some of the issues that had to be met.

I should like to describe in his own words, as he described to us a few minutes ago but from a slightly different approach, his attitude to the department. He said he had misgivings; he had his doubts about this particular branch. What did he do? Apparently he did not do anything except indulge in these misgivings and doubts. He went on to say that we must not dismiss anybody. We should not misunderstand; let us not spend any less money. He was not criticizing anyone in particular in the department. He went on to point out that $800,000 is a lot of money, an important amount of money. Having said all that, giving his background and offering this great experience he had in the department to the present minister, the Glassco commission or anybody else who was interested, he then embarked upon the advocacy of another measure which involved the expenditure of additional money.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no.

Mr. McGee: The hon. member says, no. I would remind him that just a short time ago he was advocating the expenditure of an extra sum of money on language classes. The hon. member shakes his head. I think Hansard will bear out the validity of what I have said.

Mr. Pickersgill: Spend existing money on it.

Mr. McGee: I have gained a greater understanding of some of the reasons why the hon. member used to encounter some difficulties when he was a minister. This was his typical obvious pattern of doing nothing, having doubts, not criticizing anybody, not firing anybody and ending up by advocating additional expenditures. It is no wonder that he encountered difficulties.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to correct the hon. gentleman. I think he has made a good point. However, I did not in fact, suggest spending any more money. I suggested that some of the money now being spent would be better spent on lanugage courses.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 49 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. lady wishes to speak.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think I might give out a little information on the basis of the questions asked and the comments made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In so far as the organization of the department is concerned, of course that is one of the matters that is under active consideration at the present time in line with the investigation being made by the Glassco commission. With regard to his comment on the language classes I might tell him that about 50 per cent of our expenditures go to the language classes and we think we are making progress. I cannot tell him what the result is of the research that went into the matter of teaching and texts. We received copies of the new textbooks from the authors only last fall. This is the first year in which they are being used. We shall have to assess their value at the end of this year.

With respect to teaching French in Quebec may I say this. My hon. friend will recall that the other night I said we expect to open the first of such courses in Montreal in the latter part of February and, depending upon the success we encounter there, we hope to proceed to open other classes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are these classes given by the department or by provincial or local authorities?

Mrs. Fairclough: They are sponsored classes. I think I have covered most of the questions which were asked except with regard to the publication of Citizen. I might say that this year for the first time we have a sizable subscription list. About 25 per cent of the copies issued are now being subscribed for at an appropriate fee. We hope the subscription list will increase to the point that it will possibly pay for itself eventually.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to take up any time if someone else wants to speak first, Mr. Chairman. However, there is one rather less pleasant matter about which I want to say a word merely for the record. It is not in criticism of the hon. lady or of the department.

I said earlier that I felt that the business of integrating newcomers in Canada depended to a great extent on a proper understanding and a proper appreciation of the facts of the situation. I am going to draw to the attention of the committee a statement made by a minister of the crown as reported in the Niagara Falls Review of October 27, 1960. I do not think it contributes much to this kind of understanding, concord and harmony that I would have hoped every member of parliament would wish to have in this field. I refer to a report in that newspaper of a speech made by the hon. member for Bellechasse—and I regret very much that he is once more not in the house—the Secretary of State, in another by-election in which he was as successful as he was in the one in Labelle. This quotation from the Niagara Falls Review for October 27, 1960 is in quotation marks.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

I intend to read just the quotation itself and then to make one or two observations on its content.

I have before me—

This in quotation marks.

> —figures from the Post of November 9th, 1956, which show that under the Liberal government of that era Canada had a total of 292,000 unemployed despite a lot of surplus money. That same year machinery was set up that Canada was the victim of mass immigration with 280,000 immigrants reaching these shores in 1957.

Then the report continues in quotation marks.

> "We inherited a Liberal policy in this regard and the Progressive Conservative government has been taking steps to correct it ever since. For their mass immigration policy," continued the Secretary of State, "we have instituted a selective immigration program which drastically reduced the number of immigrants to less than half that figure in 1958. That year only 124,581 immigrants were allowed into this country and that was chopped by 20,000 in 1959. Under this selective policy only those immigrants who can be absorbed into our economic set-up are allowed."

There are one or two comments I want to make about those statements which were made by the Secretary of State and which appear in quotation marks in this report. In the first place, I assume that by the Post the hon. gentleman meant the Financial Post. I do not know of any other newspaper called the Post that would be apt to have these figures. I therefore went to the library this afternoon and I looked up or tried to look up the Financial Post for November 9, 1956. I find there is no such thing. The Financial Post in 1956 appeared not on November 9, but on November 10. However, thinking this might be just a mistake in the day, I looked at the microfilm of every page of that newspaper and nowhere could I find any reference whatsoever to unemployment.

I then looked up the official figures of unemployment put out by the dominion bureau of statistics for the month of November, 1956. I have them here in my hand at the moment. The D.B.S. figure from the labor force survey for persons without jobs and seeking work on November 12, 1956, was 135,000. That is a long way from 292,000. However, a year later, on November 16, 1957, five months after the government opposite came into office, I find that the figure was 292,000. At the time about which the hon. member was speaking, namely the autumn of 1956, at the time the decision was made to admit the Hungarian refugees to Canada, there were 135,000 persons without jobs and seeking work according to the D.B.S. figures. As everyone recognizes, for the month of November that figure is just about the equivalent of full employment. It seems to me that this fact ought not to be misrepresented by a minister of the crown. Moreover, a minister of the crown describes the admission to this country of Hungarian refugees in these terms:

> That same year machinery was set up that Canada was the victim of mass immigration with 280,000 immigrants reaching these shores in 1957.

I am sure that the hon. lady would not like to be associated with that kind of description of the policy of admitting Hungarian refugees which the present government, as I have always been happy to give them credit for doing, carried right on after they came into office as long as the need was there. I give them full credit for that action. However, it seems to me that it is not right for any member of this government, even though he was not in the government or was not associated with it at that time, to say that Canada was the victim of this mass immigration, when one thinks of the plight of these people and when one thinks of what they were trying to do that caused them to be in that plight, that these people were fighting to free themselves from a communist regime. Yet the Secretary of State chooses to describe them in that fashion.

I think that is entirely unworthy of any member of this house and particularly of a minister of the crown in the government of a Prime Minister who in 1957, in this same area, in St. Catharines I think it was only a few miles from Niagara Falls, said he would triple the immigration the Liberals had developed at that time. I am also struck by this extraordinary sentence: "Under this selective policy—" that was chopped down, to use the unattractive verb employed by the Secretary of State. I quote again:

> Under this selective policy only those who can be absorbed into our economic set-up are allowed to enter.

Mr. Ricard: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: When I have finished.

Mr. Ricard: Was that speech made in French or in English?

Mr. Pickersgill: I point out that when the Hungarian immigration started there were 135,000 people without jobs and seeking work, and when the hon. gentleman was talking last October about only those immigrants being admitted who could be absorbed half a million Canadians were out of work. How he reconciles that sort of thing with this kind of statement is something I would prefer to leave with hon. ladies and gentlemen on the other side of the house.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have no comment to make on the charges which have been levelled against one of my colleagues by the hon. gentleman who represents Bonavista-Twillingate, because I have never seen the alleged statement in print nor have I had the opportunity to assess its significance, but when it comes to the question of the Hungarian influx, if it might be called that, may I say that I was in this house at the time and I recall the situation quite well. I am sure that in all fairness the hon. member will be glad to admit that there was not one dissenting voice from any side of the house concerning the proposal that this scheme be put into effect.

Mr. Pickersgill: I quite agree with the hon. lady and I thought I made that clear in my remarks, but if I did not make it abundantly clear then I want to make it clear now. There was the most complete support from the official opposition and, indeed, I think from everywhere else in the house. I recall no opposition in the house to that policy and I was always proud of the fact that it seemed to me all Canadians had responded in a wonderful way to a challenge which I regarded as a challenge to the whole free world.

Item agreed to.

50. Grants to organizations as detailed in the estimates, $40,000.

Mr. Herridge: I see this vote comprises a grant of $15,000 to the Canadian general council of the boy scouts association, $15,000 to the Canadian council of the girl guides association and $10,000 to the boy's clubs of Canada.

While these are really only token grants toward these organizations, we are, at least, very pleased to see them continue. I think the work which these organizations are doing at the present time is, if possible, more important than ever. I intended to have some further remarks to say but I will simply suggest that consideration be given to increasing these grants if at all possible. I know it is easy enough to get up in the committee and suggest that grants be increased, and I know the difficult situation which exists today, but I do think that these are three organizations which we should do everything we properly can to assist, particularly in view of the challenge they are meeting today in providing these services to the boys and girls of Canada.

Item agreed to.

47. Departmental administration, $1,001,840.

Mr. Fisher: I was not here, and perhaps I should have been, in order to raise a couple of questions relating to immigration. I do not know whether the minister has answered these. I am not going to give any general talk on immigration or make any general contribution to the debate, but I should like to ask the hon. lady some questions regarding immigration from Italy and some details of the backlog of applications that are now in hand. That is the first question. The second one is how the department is adjusting to this increasing backlog in order to take care of it administratively and, third, whether the minister can give us any indication how long the backlog is likely to exist at the present rate at which people are coming to this country.

Mrs. Fairclough: The backlog as of the end of 1960 was 63,341 all of whom, with the exception of 23, were sponsored cases. It stands to reason that so many applicants present a somewhat terrifying administrative problem. This has piled up over the years. When persons come here they bring their relatives. We are making every effort to bring wives and husbands or dependent children—to try to give them priority—but the problem still exists. However, with respect to some of these cases which have been on the books for a couple of years we feel that possibly the original sponsors may not be quite so eager to have them come out, so in order to ascertain the true state of the situation these cases are all being investigated to ascertain if the original sponsor is still in a position to receive his relatives.

Mr. Fisher: I thank the minister for that last information. I was going to suggest that as she was probably aware members are constantly being approached with the suggestion that they check into what has happened in connection with various applications. I was in the office of one Canadian of Italian background a few weeks ago and he had a file there of several hundred cases of people who had applied and had received their initial letter of response and nothing had so far developed. In many cases the time lag had extended over the two year period. I not only think it is worth while from the department's point of view to remove the applications that may now be invalid because the parties are no longer anxious for them to come here, but I also think the department might consider some kind of reply to people who are waiting and still anxious to bring the people over.

I do not know whether the minister can make a reply now to that suggestion, but why should people have to wait 18 months to two years without any indication as to why, perhaps, the medical examination has not taken place or why people have not been called to the offices in Rome?

Mrs. Fairclough: I think their relatives over there can give them the required information in correspondence. I might point out to the hon. member that if we have to write 63,000 letters twice a year it is going to bog down the position even further. Whenever an application is made for up-to-date information on the state of any case we find out immediately and answer as quickly as possible.

Mr. Fisher: Is there not, I will not say unfairness, but is there not something not quite right about accepting so many applications? You give these people the right—is it not a right or a privilege under our immigration set-up—to bring their relatives in. They take this as an important part of their prerogative of living in Canada. They know of the delays and hear of the backlog building up and there seems to be no end. It is three years since I became cognizant of the backlog and its increase.

I will admit that immigration has tended to tighten up in the last 18 months but that was not so several years ago. If the government for some reason is following a policy designed to use an administrative holdup to keep immigrants from Italy entering Canada, I am wondering if it is not time to be perfectly honest and frank with the Italian community in Canada and the Italians in the old country.

I am not trying to stir up a hornet's nest. I know the minister encountered some difficulties some time ago over new regulations she introduced that would have affected immigration from Italy but it seems to me in the long run the new regulations she had to withdraw would have been more fair than the present system of dragging out the matter. I will be interested in her comments on that.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the action that has been taken has been taken and I do not intend to comment on it but to answer my hon. friend's other remarks, I do not think you can call it a slow-down when nearly 21,000 came in last year.

Mr. Fisher: To put it more directly, is there any prospect which the minister can foresee of the backlog being reduced within the next two years which we will say is the life of her administration in one sense?

Mrs. Fairclough: As I told my hon. friend a few moments ago, we are investigating the sponsorship of all these cases. There may be some of them who are no longer interested in bringing forward their relatives.

Mr. Fisher: I have one other question referring to a specific case concerning which I do not wish to generalize. I refer to people from Portugal who entered the country illegally and voluntarily turned themselves in.

They had purchased improper visas and after turning themselves in and appearing before the appeal board were deported. Even though I took an interest in the appeal I have no quarrel with the decision of the minister to have these people deported but I wonder if the minister can say if this permanently kills the possibility of those people having another chance to come to Canada?

Just to elaborate, it is my experience that these people lived in a state of anxiety and because of the particular milieu in which they have grown up they tended to take for granted as part of their way of doing things that they would pay so much money to someone and in return get a visa. It turned out that the visa was illegal and in a sense they were trapped and betrayed by their own ignorance. I know that ignorance is no excuse before the law and they were properly deported but is there any opportunity for those people to make legitimate applications to come to Canada and is there any likelihood of their applications being fairly considered?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I cannot give a general answer to that question. I would have to know what the case was and determine just how serious were the charges. In some cases the deportation is not held against a person in the event of his subsequent reapplication to enter the country legally. However, I could not make a general statement without knowing the particulars of the case.

Mr. Winch: Can the minister say if there have been any changes in the regulations governing the coming into Canada on a temporary basis of musicians and other entertainers? If there have not been can the minister briefly tell us what is the situation?

My reason for raising this matter is because a few weeks ago a furore was created in Vancouver when one of the newspapers published a report to the effect that the minister's department was taking what was described as a dead aim at imported entertainers. The report said if there were not some new regulations there was going to be a stringent enforcement of existing regulations concerning the length of time entertainers could stay in Canada. The suggestion was made that they could stay here a maximum of four weeks and would have to leave the country for four weeks before they apply to enter again.

According to the report, musicians would have to put up a cash bond of $100 and other types of entertainers a cash bond of $300. A number of people drew this matter to my attention and the report created a furore as the minister will understand. I would be interested in the minister's comment.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there has been any change. Of course, each of these groups of entertainers is judged on its own face value. We have to determine if the group is a bona fide entertainment group, whether it has a contract of employment in Canada and whether it is putting Canadians out of work. There are a great many angles to this matter.

I do not think the payment of a cash bond is usual for the average group of entertainers entering Canada. It seems to me I recall something about this particular instance but I cannot remember the details. I would be glad to inquire into the matter and give my hon. friend a complete report on the particular case which he mentions. There seems to be many things which happen in Vancouver which do not happen elsewhere in the country and I am afraid I could not give a blanket answer with respect to this particular problem without looking at the file. If the hon. member would be satisfied to accept a report from me at a later date, I shall be happy to have the matter investigated.

Mr. Winch: I would appreciate that. It is very serious when a report of this nature is published in a newspaper with a circulation amounting to a few hundred thousand and especially when the author of the article suggests that the new regulations are a racial measure directed at negro entertainers who want to enter Canada. I believe it would be an excellent thing to have the matter clarified.

Mrs. Fairclough: Without listening to any more detail I would say that such statement is absolute nonsense. We have negro entertainers coming into Canada right across the country from Halifax to Nova Scotia—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Halifax to Vancouver.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, thank you, Vancouver to Halifax. If they are bona fide entertainers and have contracts with Canadian places of entertainment they would have no difficulty.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that they would not be admitted to Newfoundland.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, no. I was thinking of the immediate border.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, have there been any changes in the regulations respecting oriental immigration or are any changes contemplated? I am thinking of people in those categories described by the minister as borderline cases. These people do not necessarily come under the regulations now. I was wondering about those to whom some hope had been held out concerning changes in the act itself.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am afraid I do not understand what it is to which the hon. member refers. There was a change made with reference to Chinese fiancées the result of which means it is no longer necessary to post a cash bond. So far as any other changes are concerned I could not promise anything until we get the present investigation cleaned up, if that is the matter to which my hon. friend refers.

Before I resume my place perhaps I may be permitted to indicate to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I now have some tables which I promised to make available to him the other day. One refers to immigration to Canada from countries in which Canadian immigration offices are located with the number of persons employed. That table gives figures up to February 19, 1961. The other table is a reconciliation of the revolving fund. If I have the permission of the committee, Mr. Chairman, instead of trying to read these rather voluminous tables, possibly I could place them on Hansard at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: That would certainly be agreeable to this side.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to have these documents inserted in Hansard at this point as having been read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Editor's Note: The tables referred to above follow on p. 2135.)

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady was also going to see if she could not supply me with the memorandum which takes the place of that incomprehensible document that she produced last year. Has she reached any conclusion about that yet?

Mrs. Fairclough: I think that is still to come, Mr. Chairman. I will find out about that. These charts came through first.

Mr. Pickersgill: One other question; I think, as far as I recall without checking back in Hansard, these were the only things the hon. lady agreed to produce. If she regards this as a breach of my agreement she does not need to answer this question. There was one question I meant to ask and forgot and it is this. Does the department still refuse to allow persons who are in Canada as visitors to apply for landing while they are inside the country?

Mrs. Fairclough: Generally speaking, yes, Mr. Chairman, but there are some extenuating circumstances. I do not think I can give a flat answer to the question. For instance, a person comes in and marries, or comes in to visit a relative and the relative takes ill. Of course, humanitarian principles govern in cases such as these. I do not think I could give my hon. friend a straight answer to his question.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady will remember that the first year she was minister she was very rigid about this. I gather from what she says she has learned from experience.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would not say it was learning from experience so much as it was relaxing in cases where humanitarian principles call for some relaxation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could say the minister is following a good example.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister about a rather delicate aspect of the immigration problem. Probably every hon. member has been approached by persons in this country with relatives in some other country, and the plaintive quality of their supplication, either in letter form or over the telephone and sometimes in person, takes the form of pleading, offering to do anything to be able to bring their loved one, their family or other persons to Canada. From time to time in discussions with these persons it has been suggested that they wanted to approach their member of parliament and do the thing properly and honestly, but the suggestion has persisted, certainly as long as I have been a member of parliament, that there are people who can fix these things.

Of course, any time this suggestion is made I try to obtain the name. I used to ask for it outright and, of course, the individual concerned would immediately shy away. On several occasions, one within the last year, upon asking about this particular individual who was supposed to be able to fix these things the individual informed me that he had already been asked that question, presumably by somebody in the immigration department, and he had turned over that information. As a matter of fact, in one case he said the mounted police had come and interviewed him almost immediately.

I must say I was greatly impressed with the dispatch with which this investigation was followed up. Certainly, the obvious suggestion conveyed by those persons—those are applicants for friends and family to come to the country—was that this person who had the inside track was getting to somebody within the department. As I say, I was impressed with the fact that they were being pinned down, they were being followed up.

I wonder whether the minister can give us any information about these investigations and the type of person, if they do not have any particular qualification, who preys on those people, who takes advantage of those longings to extract, and I am given to understand in some cases substantial amounts of money from them? To my mind they are some of the most despicable people on the face of the earth. I am wondering whether the minister can tell us anything about those investigations? To her knowledge, have any of those types of individuals been apprehended? If so, what has happened to them?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, this is one of those unpleasant things that arise from time to time. Unfortunately, there are people in this country who attempt to make money out of other people's troubles and whenever we hear of a case where we have sufficient information to investigate it we institute an immediate investigation. If we can get sufficient evidence to prosecute we will certainly prosecute. I cannot tell my hon. friend that I have any immediate recollection of a recent successful prosecution. Of course, if there are some, as I suspect there are, in the process of investigation, I could not discuss them in any event; but I can assure the hon. member that if we can find out that anyone is in fact attempting to take money from people on the promise that he can fix anything, if we can get enough evidence we will fix him.

Indian affairs branch—
55. Administration, $792,099.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. lady wish to make a statement?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, since I last introduced estimates for the Indian affairs branch in this house I have had the privilege of meeting many more Indian Canadians in their far flung home communities. Last September I visited Churchill and talked with Indian people who live on the shores of Hudson bay. A few weeks ago I met others who live on the shores of the Atlantic in historic Cape Breton. Previously I had visited with the great prairie tribes and had met with them at their ceremonial fires. I have also visited the homes of those ancient Canadians who net their livelihood from the deep waters of the Pacific. I mention these things to indicate to hon. members that the conclusions I have arrived at are not the result of merely cursory examination of statistics nor of an isolated visit to a community with a particular local problem, but are born of firsthand knowledge after visiting these Canadians in their communities from sea to sea.

I would not deny that the problems of these, our oldest Canadians, are many and difficult. Indeed they are, and their solution will require understanding, imagination and the best and wises decisions that we who legislate can bring to bear. And here let me say that I have high hopes that exhaustive examination of the social and economic status of the Indians now being undertaken by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons will point the way to both legislative changes and desirable programs.

Be that as it may, I am convinced, and I am sure hon. members are of like mind, that it is our bounden duty to ensure that Canadians of the Indian race are given the opportunity of sharing fully in the national life of this country. This will be denied them unless they are given the training, academic and technical, to fit them for our increasingly complex and highly industrialized economy. I have recently stated outside this house the desirability of new Canadians possessing these skills from a point of view of their own good as well as that of Canada. It is, therefore, our duty to ensure that the oldest of our many Canadian races are granted these necessary skills.

The estimates now before the committee bear witness to our intentions to accept this obligation. Hon. members will note that almost $29 million, over 58 per cent of the total Indian affairs appropriation, is proposed for educational purposes. This continued expansion of the Indian educational program is reflected not only in the number of pupils receiving education but also in the scope of the courses which are being made available for Indian students. Preliminary reports indicate that the number of Indian pupils receiving an education has now reached the figure of approximately 42,500 of whom more than 10,000 are enrolled in non-Indian schools, universities, teachers' colleges, commercial and trade schools. The statistics for the year ended December 31, 1960 are not yet available but it is anticipated that at the present rate of increase during the fiscal year 1961-62 pupils attending such institutions will number in excess of 11,500.

In September, 1960 a revision of teachers' salaries was approved. The increase in the requirements for teachers' salaries for the 1961-62 fiscal year, which is approximately 4 per cent higher than the current fiscal year, is to provide for this increased salary scale. The department currently employs 1,351 teachers of whom 123 are of Indian status, or 9.1 per cent of the total teaching staff. It is my hope that this percentage will steadily increase.

The program of organizing education committees composed of Indian band members has continued a fairly rapid expansion. Last year I reported that 19 such committees were in existence. To date this number has increased to 25. These committees have been established in the following regions: in British Columbia, 6; in Alberta, 3; in Saskatchewan, 9; in Ontario, 5; in Quebec, 1; and in the maritimes, 1.

The department awarded 18 new scholarships during the fiscal year 1960-61 to outstanding students, the total of which amounted to $17,910, an increase of one in the number of awards and of $3,600 in the total value.

Provision is made for the construction of 109 new classrooms of which 40 are for the replacement of existing units and 40 new staff units, with a total estimated cost of construction amounting to $5,500,000. In addition, provision is made for financial contributions toward a share of the construction cost of provincial schools in connection with the joint education of Indian and non-Indian pupils in 26 localities. During the current year 15 agreements for joint education of Indian pupils have been completed, with government contributions totalling approximately $1,100,000. The department has now completed 98 agreements with various provincial and territorial school boards in connection with the joint education of Indian and non-Indian pupils.

During the current fiscal year the program of repairs and upkeep of Indian schools was accelerated and had the additional attraction of providing for more winter employment. It is expected that an amount of approximately $483,000 will be expended by March 31, 1961, over and above the amount originally provided for this purpose.

In addition to the regular school program, the department has continued its work in the adult education field. During the year 1959-60 the total enrollment was approximately 1,300 with the greatest number enrolled in literacy and homemaking courses. In this regard the upgrading courses institute an interesting innovation in our adult education program this year. Under these schemes young Indian men and women who have left school are given short concentrated courses in English, mathematics and social orientation to prepare them for commercial, trade training and employment. Much interest and enthusiasm have been indicated so that now we have over 150 participants in such courses in Edmonton, Regina, Prince Albert and at Muncey. It is very apparent that the young Indian adult is becoming increasingly aware of the necessity of formal training.

An obvious extension of our responsibilities to Canadians of the Indian race is to ensure that, once skills have been attained, equal opportunities exist for them in the economic life of Canada. Through the new economic development division, which came into operation about a year ago, it has been possible to place added emphasis on the distinction between relief assistance on the one hand and the promotion of employment opportunities on the other. In the field of agriculture, assistance has generally been provided on a repayable basis. The program of lending cattle on a rotational basis to selected Indians in the western provinces has aroused considerable interest during the past year, and the current estimates include provision for a very substantial increase in livestock expenditures.

Under the employment placement program, with excellent co-operation from the national employment service, the total number of selected Indians placed in regular employment in urban centres since April, 1957 has now risen to over 700, of whom 270 were placed during the year ended November 30 last. These are for the most part young Indians qualified for their jobs. They are in a very real sense pioneers in the process of integration; and the department has continued the policy of careful selection with this in mind and with a view to promoting good and lasting relationships with employers.

Rural and seasonal placements in which placement and field officers participated totalled over 8,500 from April, 1957 to November, 1960 and included nearly 4,000 individuals placed during the last year. These figures do not, of course, include Indians who have obtained employment independently or with the assistance of their local agency superintendent.

One of the problems in encouraging young Indians to take advantage of vocational training and employment opportunities has been, in many cases, their lack of education and social development. This problem was thoroughly reviewed at a meeting of administrative, educational and placement staff at Edmonton in October last. As a result, additional courses providing academic upgrading and social orientation have been initiated or are planned at several points in western Canada.

A regional placement officer was appointed to Fort Smith, Northwest Territories, in September, 1960, bringing the total of such specialists to nine. A new appointment for the Yukon Territory is expected shortly, and the estimates include provision for four additional appointments at London, Ontario, The Pas, Manitoba, Calgary, Alberta, and Prince George, British Columbia.

While economic development activities are extending into new fields the fact must not be forgotten that many Indians still depend on hunting, trapping and fishing for their livelihood and will continue to do so. In areas where fishing companies operate, the department assists Indian fishermen by providing equipment when required on a repayable basis, generally through deductions from sales of fish. In other areas the department has organized fishing operations on a project basis and provided supervision equipment, ice houses and other facilities. These operations serve as a training ground for Indian fishermen.

As in the past, Indian trappers have been grubstaked where required. The demands for this type of assistance tend to increase when other employment opportunities diminish. The Indians in the hinterland, however, benefited from many of the new developments in the northern areas and will participate in them to an even greater extent in the future.

In carrying out the various administrative programs of assistance the department has not overlooked the vital importance of research to meet the needs of tomorrow. An economist was appointed in October, 1960, as an economic development officer, to initiate surveys and studies and to co-ordinate activities of this nature carried out on our behalf or independently by other agencies. Several economic surveys are now in the process of being organized.

In introducing Indian affairs estimates last year I mentioned that a record total of 1,465 homes had been built on reserves and that 228 units had been started. Final records are not yet available for the current year but it is clear that we can expect another very successful year. Members will recall that to help meet the shortage of houses on many reserves and to provide employment during the winter months an additional sum of $200,000 was provided for this purpose in the supplementary estimates passed by the house on December 20 last.

I think hon. members will be particularly interested and pleased to note provision of $100,000 under the heading of loans, investments and advances to make possible housing loans to individual Indians on reserves. The purpose of this relatively small sum is merely to launch the program which will be introduced as soon as possible in the fiscal year 1961-62 in a few pilot areas. The purpose of these funds is to make loans available to Indians who earn a sufficient income to assume such obligations but who cannot secure credit from other lending institutions because of restrictions upon the use of real property situated on reserves as security.

The appropriation for housing is maintained at the same level as in previous years, which as members will recall this government doubled in 1958. These funds will provide grants and subsidies in addition to loans for families whose income is not sufficient to enable them to meet their housing requirements from present or future income.

In regard to welfare assistance, it will be recalled that the former ration system was discontinued in April of 1959. The change in procedure and the increased scale of benefits provided placed a good deal more responsibility upon Indian bands and upon individual members of these bands. Since I last reported to the house on this subject the number of bands whose needy members receive assistance by cheque has increased from 20 per cent to 40 per cent. A particularly interesting development this year has been the negotiation of an agreement with the province of Manitoba. Under this agreement the federal and provincial governments share in the costs of a community development program which the province has launched in an effort to improve the social and economic standards in a number of communities with both Indian and Metis populations.

I should like to comment also, as a matter of general interest, upon the fact that 16 bands representing 74 per cent of the Indians in southern Ontario and 10 bands representing 13 per cent of the Indians in northern Ontario are now administering their own welfare assistance programs on exactly the same basis as municipalities in Ontario. This has been possible through amendments to the Ontario general welfare assistance act and the application of section 68 of the Indian Act.

All persons in these reserves apply to the band welfare administrator in non-Indian municipalities. Assistance is provided by this administrator from funds established in the band bank account. An 80 per cent subsidy, 50 per cent of which represents the federal share under the Unemployment Assistance Act agreements, is paid direct to the bands by the province. Under this program bands administer their own program, pay the normal municipal share of the costs, and deal directly with the province.

This progressive measure is being energetically pushed forward by the province of Ontario in co-operation with the Indian affairs branch. Discussions with other bands in the province are now under way, and it is expected that this program will be extended in the near future. Much has been and is being accomplished in works of a capital nature designed to improve the economy and conditions on populated reserves.

Perhaps the most important aspect of this program has been the extensive construction of roads which are needed, not only for the development of Indian community life but are most essential in providing the Indian population with access to neighbouring municipalities where advantage may be taken of the opportunity for employment and the means of earning a better livelihood. The importance of roads to the educational program, especially on the larger reserves, must not be overlooked. It is only by the provision of better roads that greater use of school bus transportation can be made to ensure that more Indian children attend classes regularly in the schools operated by the department as well as municipal schools where such arrangements are in effect.

It is interesting to note the co-operation received from provincial governments by the branch in its roadbuilding program in many areas. The payment of provincial subsidies or straight sharing of project costs by the provincial departments concerned have resulted in more and better roads being developed and, in many instances, having these joined up with important provincial and municipal road systems. A continued high level of expenditure on these capital works is anticipated in the new year.

In these introductory remarks I have endeavoured to make it clear that these estimates are designed to meet our needs if certain clearly defined objectives are to be attained: First, a continued acceleration of our educational program so that Indian youth will be assured the opportunity of a full academic life and the opportunity of learning those skills which are necessary tools with which to work and progress in our national life; second, the development of projects designed to enable him to take full advantage of knowledge so gained; and, third, the improvement of home and community facilities so that he may walk securely among us as a fellow citizen blessed with a proud heritage.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think it is a great advantage to the committee to have had the quite comprehensive survey that has just been given by the minister. I should like to thank the hon. lady for the neat way in which she summarized what she felt to be the most important aspects of the work of the department. I am very happy to see that there seems to be no difference between us that the most important part of the work of the Indian affairs branch is in the field of education. It is incomparably more important than anything else. I am very glad also to observe that it is realized more and more that education does not stop at the age of 16.

One of the most tragic features—I think I have mentioned this on several occasions before but it does no harm to mention it again—of Indian affairs administration for many years was the lack of any provision for those young people who came out of residential schools and who went back to the reserves. These people often came from broken homes and were orphans at the age of 16. They returned to the reserve because there was no place for them to go and, in some cases, they were quite disoriented from their band. This was something that certainly should not have been allowed to continue even as long as it did.

We do know that after the war the government began to repair the damage which had resulted from the neglect of the war years, and there was so much to do in so many directions that it could not all be done at once. It is reassuring, and I am sure it is true, to find that today no Indian who can get through high school and who is willing to go on and take further education, is denied the opportunity for financial reasons.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think this has been true since the days when Mr. Harris was the minister, and the provision of the scholarships, with which I was associated when I was minister, was just another stage in the development. I think it was more a moral change than anything else in that it seemed to me that the scholarships established a recognition of merit. Before the scholarships were established the Indians were not denied the education that they were capable of taking. The gratifying thing is that there are more, not as many as we would hope perhaps, of these young Indians who finish high school and who go into universities, more who go into technical schools and, more recently, into vocational training.

It is very encouraging also to find, if I understood the hon. lady correctly, that there has been an increasing interest on the part of adult Indians, particularly the younger adults, in securing vocational training of one kind or another. I must say I should like to look again at what the hon. lady said about the placement service to see whether there is an adequate reflection in the placement of the increased educational training. I would hope there is, but of course we do recognize that in the present circumstances employment is not quite as easy to get as it was a few years ago when people were coming to beg us to provide Indians for various occupations. We know it is not quite so easy to get jobs today.

I think it would be interesting, when we are considering these estimates tomorrow in somewhat more detail, to have the minister tell us about some of the areas in which there is an increasing amount of regular employment being provided for the Indians off the reserves and particularly in the northern and frontier areas. It seems to me that they are much better adapted to provide really stable employees than are many of the people who drift into these areas from the more settled parts of the country and who also quite often drift out quickly afterwards.

I intend to make a request of the minister and I should like to give her notice of this request now. Some time tomorrow I intend to ask the minister whether she could have a computation made and could give it to us, first of all, giving the latest available figure of the total Indian population which I believe is growing. I presume a D.B.S. estimate was made.

Mrs. Fairclough: I could give it right away.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it would perhaps be better to have all this information together. What I should like to have is this. I should like to know approximately how much the federal government is spending not just in the Indian affairs branch but also adding in the amount in the Indian health branch.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am not responsible for that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know the minister is not responsible for this matter but in order to get a figure that would not be a discredit to the government of the country, I think it would be desirable to add the two together just to find out per capita what we are spending on the Indians. I think this would be of interest to the people of Canada generally. I think it is the kind of information that it would be desirable to give. If the minister gives only the figures for her own department that would be a gross underestimate of what really is being done by the Canadian people.

Mrs. Fairclough: I can speak to my colleague.

Mr. Pickersgill: I could do the arithmetic myself for the minister but I have not as much technical assistance as she has.

Mr. Fisher: That is not the way we heard it.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I could get the assistance of the hon. member for Port Arthur perhaps I could do these problems in arithmetic myself. I think perhaps I could do them, but I am appealing to the minister and to her sense of collective responsibility in making this particular request.

I was also greatly interested in what the minister said about the administration of welfare. I recall that in 1957 we took the first tentative steps in a few pilot reserves to pay relief in cash and to leave it to the Indians to make their own decisions as to the way in which they would spend that money. I know this was done with a certain amount of misgiving on the part of many of those who were associated with that decision. From what the minister has said I gather that this procedure had turned out well and that it is being adopted to an increasing extent. I was also interested in—and I think I shall have a few more questions to ask about it—this arrangement that is being made with the government of Ontario for the administration of relief through municipalities.

I should also be greatly interested to hear in more detail about this new agreement in Manitoba which was already, of course, being foreshadowed by work that was being done in the legislature as much as five years ago by a legislative committee. As a matter of fact the department lost an extremely useful member of the citizenship branch who went to the government of Manitoba when I was minister in order to start the planning of this work. I am prompted to make one other observation and then I am going to sit down because I should like the hon. member for Skeena to have a few minutes.

Mr. Howard: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: There seems to be a marked difference between the attitude toward Indians of provincial governments in those provinces in which the Indians have the vote and that in those in which they do not have the vote.

Mr. Howard: The graciousness of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate overwhelms me. I was sure that with his vast store of knowledge and his great interest in this matter he would be making perhaps more than one speech on the item.

Mr. Pickersgill: I make no promises.

Mr. Howard: In the few moments at my disposal may I express the appreciation of all of us in the effective opposition of the comprehensive statement of the minister earlier in opening up these estimates. We think that quite correctly she has put her finger, as well as has the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, on the whole question of the acculturation or the integration of Indians or the mutual interest amongst Indians and non-Indians. I refer to the field of education.

You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that at an earlier stage when we were debating the establishment of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Indian affairs we also dealt with this matter. My particular point then was that education is a thing upon which we must rest our hopes and in which we must place our faith with regard to having our Indian people take the longest possible step toward a decent way of life and respectable living.

Incidentally, while I am on the subject of the joint committee, may I say this. I cannot for the life of me understand the long delay in calling that committee or why that committee has not been called since it has been established. I hope this difficulty will perhaps be overcome within the next two or three days or at the beginning of the week so that this all-important committee can get down to studying the intricacies of this particular problem to the end that it might come up this session with some decent recommendation.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could ask the house leader what the government is planning for tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will carry on with the estimates that come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration; that is to say we shall conclude Indian affairs. Then there are some other items such as national gallery, film board, archives and national library which would be passed, I hope tomorrow.

For the guidance of the house, I might just say this. When you consider the fact that the estimates of 20 departments are to come before the house, it is advisable early in the session to allocate the time so that we are not rushed in our deliberations toward the conclusion of the session. About six hours have been devoted to this particular department. If these estimates are concluded tomorrow we will carry on then with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. The forecast for next week, which I underline is subject to change, runs as follows. On Monday and Tuesday there would be a supply motion, the subject matter being in the hands of the opposition. Wednesday, Thursday and Friday would be devoted to government business.

Unless something occurs over which I have no control it is expected that on Wednesday we will deal with the motion in the name of the Minister of Transport to set up the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping followed by the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport to amend the Canadian National Railways Act. That resolution is No. 5 on today's order paper.

The estimates for next week will be announced, I imagine, on Monday or Tuesday of next week. It depends on the progress we make tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might perhaps draw the attention of the leader of the house to the fact that there was an implication to be drawn from what the Prime Minister said that the estimates of the Department of Labour would be taken next week.

Mr. Churchill: The Prime Minister suggested there was an opportunity on the supply motion for the subject which concerns the opposition to be discussed. A good deal depends on that. If the spokesman for the opposition will tell me what the subject is to be for Monday and Tuesday, then perhaps I could announce whether the estimates of the Department of Labour will be considered next week.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INDIAN AFFAIRS CONTRIBUTIONS TO WORKS PROJECTS

Question No. 68—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1950, has the Indian affairs branch contributed any money towards provincial government highway, bridge or ferry projects in British Columbia?

2. If so, why, and to what extent?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

The Department of National Health and Welfare is assisting the development of live oral polio virus vaccine in Canada through the national technical advisory committee on live polio virus vaccines, the food and drug directorate, the laboratory of hygiene, the epidemiology division, and with funds made available through the national health grants. Last year limited studies on the use of Canadian produced live polio virus vaccine were carried out in Canada, and the national technical advisory committee has recommended more extensive demonstrations of the use of this product for the current period.

2. Yes. Laboratory tests on the vaccine are continuing in the laboratory of hygiene.

3. No. The licensing of the vaccine will depend on the progress and results of the demonstrations and the product is not likely to be introduced for general use before next summer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 17, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF VISIT OF UNITED KINGDOM PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Right Hon. Harold Macmillan, has accepted my invitation to visit Ottawa after his forthcoming meeting with President Kennedy in Washington. Mr. Macmillan will be accompanied by Lady Dorothy. He expects to arrive in Ottawa on the evening of Friday, April 7, and to leave late in the evening of April 8.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the announcement made by the Prime Minister of the intended visit of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to our country will be warmly received. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom will, of course, be very welcome in Canada.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): This is a welcome announcement by the Prime Minister. All Canadians will be pleased to once again have the opportunity of welcoming the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to our country. I express the hope that arrangements may be made for Prime Minister Macmillan to address both houses of parliament while he is visiting Canada. I think the nation would welcome this if it is possible to make the arrangements.

ESTATE TAX

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will no doubt be interested to know that a convention has been concluded between Canada and the United States for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on estates. Arrangements have been made to have the convention signed in Washington today by the Canadian ambassador and the United States secretary of state.

This convention is additional to the existing convention between Canada and the United States signed June 8, 1944, which continues to apply to the estates of persons who died before January 1, 1959. The new convention applies to the estates of persons dying on or after that date, which is the date on which the Canadian Estate Tax Act superseded the dominion succession duty act. The convention follows the general pattern of the 1944 convention between Canada and the United States and the conventions between Canada and the United Kingdom, France, Ireland and South Africa.

The taxes included in the scope of the new convention are the Canadian estate tax, the United States estate tax and any other taxes of a substantially similar character subsequently imposed by the federal governments of either country.

The main purpose of the convention is to avoid double taxation which might otherwise result, particularly when the estate of a person dying domiciled in one country includes assets situated in the other country. This purpose is accomplished chiefly by a reciprocal system of tax credits whereby the country of domicile gives credit for the tax imposed by the country where the assets are situated, that is to say the country of situs. In order to make this system work smoothly specific rules of situs for assets of various classes are provided. These rules are almost identical with those in the Estate Tax Act.

Another method of avoiding double taxation is by providing that when one country is taxing solely on the basis of situs it will take into account only property situated in its territory and will restrict its tax by limiting its rates or by allowing an exemption, or both. Accordingly Canada has bound for the term of the convention the present flat rate tax of 15 per cent imposed by the Estate Tax Act on property situated in Canada of any foreign domiciled decedent. The convention also stipulates that Canada will not tax such property if its value is less than $15,000. This contrasts with the provision in the Estate Tax Act whereby such property will not be taxed if its value is less than $5,000. The United States in taxing Canadian domiciliaries is similarly required to restrict its tax base to property situated in the United States and not to tax if this property is valued at less than $15,000. However, the United States, which uses a schedule of graduated rates, is not obliged to restrict its rates; instead it is required to allow a deductible exemption of $2,000 in all cases where the property is valued at more than $15,000.

By the terms of the convention Canada will make two other changes of substance affecting the normal operation of the Estate Tax Act. The first is that Canada, in giving a credit for United States taxes on property situated therein, will give a credit for the United States federal tax before this tax is itself reduced by credits allowed in respect of taxes levied by the state governments. The United States will similarly give a credit for the Canadian federal estate tax before this tax is reduced by abatements in respect of provincial succession duties. This provision has much the same result as allowing a credit for the provincial or state taxes of the other country. The new provision will make Canadian practice reciprocal with long-standing United States practice and will benefit estates of certain Canadian domiciliaries by increasing the amount of credits given.

The second of these changes is that where Canada allows a deduction for a bequest to a charitable organization in Canada, as it now does under the Estate Tax Act, it will also allow a deduction for a bequest to any charitable organization in the United States that would have qualified according to the Canadian definition of a charitable organization, if it had been in Canada. An example would be a university, Mr. Speaker. The provision affecting this amendment is reciprocal and again will bring Canadian practice into conformity with long-standing United States practice. It will also be beneficial to the estates of Canadian domiciliaries where such a bequest exists.

The convention will come into force when it receives legislative approval and is ratified by the governments of the two countries. When the convention comes into force it will be retroactive to January 1, 1959, so as to provide continuity with the existing convention. Consequently benefits resulting from its terms will apply to the estates of persons dying on or after that date. A bill to implement the convention will be introduced in the house in due course.

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF PURCHASE BY CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I am pleased to announce that the Canadian wheat board has concluded an agreement with KOOSPOL, the Czechoslovakian purchasing agency for foodstuffs, for the purchase of approximately 200,000 metric tons of Canadian wheat or approximately 7.3 million bushels of No. 2 and No. 3 wheat, with a small amount of Durum. The wheat is to be shipped from St. Lawrence ports following the opening of navigation. The wheat will be purchased on a credit basis and, by agreement between the governments of Czechoslovakia and Canada, export credits insurance has been provided in order to facilitate this sale. The terms of payment are 10 per cent cash at date of shipment; 30 per cent payable one year from date of shipment; 30 per cent payable two years from date of shipment; 30 per cent payable three years from date of shipment. The Canadian grain trade, acting as agents of the Canadian wheat board, will negotiate individual contracts with the official purchasing agency of the Czechoslovakian government.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the house will welcome this announcement, as it did the announcement the other day of the proposed sale of wheat to China. The minister has given us some details as to the method of payment, but it may be that he will expand on this on some other occasion or perhaps on orders of the day. In any event, this welcome news will assist the farmer who needs assistance at this time in Canada.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The Minister of Agriculture seems to be developing the habit in connection with his announcements of extra Canadian wheat sales, to make them when they involve countries that might not, under present conditions, be expected to buy their supplies from the United States. These sales are welcome. I may say that over the years I have had some part to play myself—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Hon. members can laugh if they like—in assisting in the conclusion of sales to such countries.

An hon. Member: How many bushels?

Mr. Argue: The record is quite clear and I could spell it out if hon. members would give me the opportunity, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure what was the cause of the reaction, but perhaps hon. members will allow the member for Assiniboia to finish his comments.

Mr. Argue: I was about to go on to say that I hope any future announcements the government makes will demonstrate that the government is being just as successful in holding or increasing our sales to our normal or regular markets.

The fact that this wheat will be shipped through the St. Lawrence ports is welcome news indeed because producers in Manitoba, eastern Saskatchewan and central Saskatchewan in recent months have found difficulty in marketing their grain because of a lack of markets which took wheat through eastern Canada. This, Mr. Speaker, could be of some help in allowing the Canadian wheat board to raise the quotas in Manitoba and the parts of Saskatchewan to which I have referred.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, this is legislation which was forecast in the speech from the throne to compel the disclosure of certain important essentials as to the details of their operations by corporations and trade unions carrying on activities in Canada, which are controlled from outside Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REPORTED COMPLAINT RESPECTING STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to address to the Prime Minister a question arising out of part of the statement he made yesterday in this house when he outlined Canada's position regarding the situation in the Congo. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if his attention has been directed to reported complaints on the part of certain neutral African nations, members of a conciliation commission designed to deal with the situation in the Congo, who have alleged that part of the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday was a breach of confidence and that, instead of helping to alleviate the situation in the Congo, it has aggravated it.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has given me notice of his intention to ask this question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the Prime Minister will agree that I had given him notice also.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Later. Apparently what the hon. gentleman has in mind is an article in this morning's Globe and Mail. I would point out the fact that over this article, which refers to the circumstances outlined by the hon. gentleman, this paragraph appears:

The following report of Ottawa disclosures of information on Congo conciliation commission was received simultaneously last night with a report from Henry Tanner in Leopoldville which revealed that the commission's recommendations had also been disclosed in the Congo. A short time later the above story by Lindsay Parrott with extensive quotes from the commission report was filed by the New York Times.

This is the report to which the hon. gentleman refers and which indicates the degree to which the gist of the conciliation committee's report had been made public in New York and elsewhere before reference to it was made in this house. The general idea embodied in the report had indeed been in circulation for some time. Those ideas coincide generally with the views of the Canadian government, and in fact what I was discussing was ideas under consideration by the Canadian authorities which in any case had already become part of the public domain. The very fact that the article in question has over it this reference to the degree to which the contents of the report had already been made public is an answer to the allegations of the correspondence in question. In my statement I gave an outline.

All I can say is that there was nothing revealed in any way that was of a confidential character. Indeed, the information had been revealed in the press or by reports before any reference was made in this house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. The reports in the United States press were straight news reports and did not refer to a leak or anything of that sort?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the Prime Minister can be held accountable for what is published in the United States press.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister say whether the government has received any communications from any nations involved protesting this alleged leak by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the only alleged leak was a reference by a correspondent, and there has been nothing from any of the nations in question protesting in any way.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRACADIE RANGE, N.E.—SETTLEMENT OF DAMAGE CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister inform the house whether a final decision has been reached as to the settlement of claims for damages caused last summer in the Tracadie range area by an R.C.A.F. plane from the Chatham air base; and if so, can payment be expected at an early date?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, one claim has already been settled and payment made. With respect to the other claimants, authority has been given to negotiate settlement of all claims except three, where ownership of the property damaged has not yet been established. It is expected that a legal officer of the department will visit the area within the next week or ten days to make payment to the various individuals concerned.

TRADE

EUROPEAN TRADING GROUPS—REMARKS OF PRESIDENT OF U.K. BOARD OF TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Finance, who has indicated that representatives of the government have been keeping in close touch with the conference of the outer seven trading units in Europe.

I wonder whether the Minister of Finance heard the direct report on the C.B.C. news this morning from London, which in part was a direct voice recording of a statement by the president of the board of trade of the United Kingdom upon his return from that conference. Mr. Maudling said the group of Seven had certainly agreed that further approaches to the common market group of Six would be made, but he indicated that in addition to that, for the advantage of trade liberalization, new approaches to the United States were equally necessary.

Could the minister explain why no reference was made in the remarks of the president of the board of trade to approaches to Canada in the hope of reducing tariffs, and does the minister think this was perhaps in some manner due to the rebuffs which the United Kingdom received in Montreal two years ago?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked a question in a way which puts it outside the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. There may be appropriate questions to be asked as a result of the conference, but the way the hon. member has expressed it he endeavours to make the Minister of Finance accountable in an administrative way for a statement made by the president of the board of trade of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Benidickson: My question was whether or not the observers representing the Canadian government have reported to the minister any explanation of why the president of the board of trade, after the conference of the Seven, indicated that approaches would be made to the United States; but there was an omission when mentioning approaches to the United States to the same toward Canada.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I heard the broadcast this morning. It purported to be a broadcast of some excerpts from a statement made by the president of the board of trade on his return to London. It did not purport to be the full statement at all. I do not know what were the contents of the full statement made by the president of the board of trade.

He drew attention to the fact that the United Kingdom and other members of the outer seven would be interested in exchanging mutual tariff concessions with the United States. I think this is the position of practically all countries now negotiating at Geneva under the auspices of GATT, Canada included. There was no omission of reference to Canada that has the significance the hon. member seeks to attach to it. When the hon. member talks about rebuffs he is putting his own colourful and inaccurate interpretation on something he has been agitating about for a considerable length of time but which has never justified the statements he has made in reference thereto.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister of Finance say whether there have been any recent approaches by the president of the board of trade or any other member of the British government to the Canadian government with a view to liberalizing trade between the United Kingdom and Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are exchanges proceeding in reference to the present negotiations at GATT. The negotiations which have proceeded at Geneva up to this time have concerned proposals to rebind existing tariff concessions. The timetable contemplates that commencing March 1 negotiations will be undertaken with respect to proposed new exchanges, and of course there have been communications passing between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom in reference to this subject in so far as it relates to trade between the two countries.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, whether the Canadian government has made any proposals to the United Kingdom government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, we have expressed views with regard to proposals to the United Kingdom and they have expressed certain views to us. This is the ordinary form of exchange between the two governments.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister misunderstood my question, Mr. Speaker. My question was specifically with relation to the further liberalization of trade between the two countries.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have made certain proposals to Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom has made certain proposals to the Canadian government.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED RAIL STRIKE—INQUIRY AS TO ARBITRATION PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a letter from Frank Hall advising him that negotiations are being cut off with the railways partly, at any rate, because of reports that the government is considering some form of arbitration procedure? In view of the desirability of continuing negotiations, could the Prime Minister inform the house whether or not the government is considering a form of arbitration in this dispute?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not as yet received any letter from Mr. Hall. After I have received it, I shall then be in a position to reply to whatever allegations or statements may be made therein.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the direct question I asked a couple of weeks ago when the Prime Minister did not answer. Is the government in fact giving consideration to arbitration proceedings?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is asking the government to declare a fairly considerable amount of policy in answer to a question from him, and that is not in accordance with the practice.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister, I believe, has already tabled the letter which he wrote to Mr. Hall and others, I wonder if he would not do the same thing in connection with Mr. Hall's letter when he receives it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when the letter is received consideration will be given to the request of the hon. gentleman.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

BOBCAT VEHICLES—REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER MEET LAKEHEAD DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a statement made in the house on Wednesday by the Prime Minister in connection with the award of a contract for 20 Bobcats to the Canadian Car Company. Will the Prime Minister indicate if he will meet a delegation from the city councils and other bodies of the two cities at a time suitable to him during his visit to the lakehead tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is asking a hypothetical question. He has not indicated that there has been any request for such a meeting.

[Later:]

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, may I direct another question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the hon. gentleman is going to be in the lakehead tomorrow, will he accept an invitation to meet a delegation from the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is repeating a question which I have already indicated is purely hypothetical, in the sense that there is no suggestion that there has been any request for the Prime Minister to meet these gentlemen.

INQUIRY AS TO SALE OF AIR CARGO PLANES TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him if he has seen the article written by George Bain, appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail, to the effect that the sale of the Canadair CL-44 to the United States as a military cargo carrier has been hanging by only the thinnest of threads? Mr. Bain goes on to say that the only way to effect this sale is through direct intervention by the Prime Minister with the President of the United States when their meeting takes place. I wonder if the Prime Minister has any comment to make?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to both questions is no.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING UNIVERSITY BURSARY PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has recently had representations made to him by the Canadian federation of university students in regard to a proposed bursary plan. If so, has he any announcement to make in this regard?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there were representations made to the government some two or three days ago by three representatives of the university federation. These representations naturally will receive the fullest consideration.

AGRICULTURE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MINISTER RESPECTING BREEDING PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture based on a recent newspaper report which quotes the hon. gentleman as saying that we:

> —have breeding programs for just about everything except trees and human beings and I see no reason why trees should be exempt any longer—

Would the minister assure the house that the minister does not plan to encourage any further exemptions?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLENISHMENT OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour based on a report today from the dominion bureau of statistics that 754,000 individuals claimed unemployment insurance as of December 30 last. Will the minister tell the house whether the government proposes to replenish the unemployment insurance fund out of consolidated revenue and if not what method the government is going to employ to replenish the fund so that further claimants will be guaranteed their contractual rights under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this government has always shouldered its responsibilities with a marked degree of responsibility. If the government arrives at any policy in respect of the matters raised by the hon. member, it will make that decision known here in the house.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR REPLY TO QUESTIONS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position today to answer two questions put to him on February 15, one by the hon. member for Gloucester dealing with a meeting between representatives of government, management and labour with respect to the coal industry in Cape Breton and the other by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the so-called Rand report. The hon. gentleman indicated that he would have to examine the record before he could supply answers to these questions. Is he yet in a position to deal with them?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I am not in a position to reply to those questions today. I do not have the information with me.

TRANSPORT

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—REQUEST FOR MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and I apologize for not sending him notice. My question rises out of a decision by the board of transport commissioners to allow the Cumberland Railway Company to abandon its 4-mile railway service from Springhill to Springhill Junction, Nova Scotia. In view of the serious tragedies that have befallen this town would the government consider making this railway a part of the Canadian National Railways system so that the service necessary to the industrial survival and growth of Springhill may be maintained?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already received a request to that effect from Premier Stanfield of Nova Scotia. The matter has been under consideration for some time. I have passed along this request to the management of the Canadian National Railways, and no final decision has been arrived at yet.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his reply. I have a supplementary question. Can I take it from the minister's reply that the government itself would have no objection to the C.N.R. taking this course? Can the minister say whether the government has a policy with regard to this four miles of railway line?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, this is strictly a decision for the management of the C.N.R. As far as the government is concerned, we always try to do everything for the well-being of our fellow Canadians in any part of the country, and we will keep on doing that.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Can he say on what date the government abdicated its responsibility for the acquisition of capital assets by the C.N.R. and transferred it to the company?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is putting his question in the form of an assertion. I suppose he did not expect it to be answered.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have another question that I should like to ask the Prime Minister. Is he in a position now to table the replies from the premiers to his letter, which he indicated some time ago he would do?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not yet received the consent of the premiers, but I will table them at the earliest possible date. I know the hon. gentleman wants to see the letters, and I would be very glad to let him see them before they are tabled here in a formal way. I can only table them, of course, with the consent of the premiers. If there is anything in them that the hon. member wants to see or that he has in his mind, having preinformation or otherwise, I will be glad to let him see them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting every hon. member in this house and the house itself, with respect to the reply which has just been given by the Prime Minister. These letters are in reply to a letter addressed to the premiers by the Prime Minister, with respect to which he did not feel it necessary to get any consent to have it published in this house before, in some instances and indeed as far as I can learn in all instances, it had even been received by the recipients. It was a public letter to which presumably public replies were made, and it does not seem to me appropriate that these replies should be offered to one member of the house and not to the whole house, nor does it appear to me that any consent is required.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in withdrawing the offer that I made a moment ago in a spirit of amity.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Indian affairs branch—

55. Administration, $792,099.

Mr. Howard: There was only a moment or two available last evening to make a few brief comments on this matter following the opening statement of the minister. I wonder whether I might be allowed the opportunity to make one or two statements at this stage and pose some questions which might subsequently be answered by the minister, because—

The Chairman: Order. Will hon. members please lower their voices so that we may hear the hon. member for Skeena?

Mr. Howard: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As I say, I would like to pose one or two questions early in the debate, for they may entail some compiling of statistical information, if only in a general way.

The minister made reference to the alterations which were made a few years ago in the welfare structure, and to the substitution of payment by voucher by payment in cash. The announcement was made in the house on March 5, 1959 with respect to the new standards of welfare. This information is contained in Hansard of that day. Five separate classes or groupings were established within which a person might fall in order to obtain certain levels of welfare payments. The standard rate was established on the basis of a single adult at $22; then there were scales classified alphabetically as A, B, C, D, giving increasing amounts, depending on circumstances and conditions in the particular area in which the welfare payments were being made.

It would be interesting, if this information is obtainable, to get an indication of the number of people who have been on welfare assistance, or who fall within the five separate scales of payment; that is, how many were on standard rates, how many on class A, how many on class B, how many on class C and how many on class D. Perhaps an analysis of that information will indicate that the standard rates are generally applicable throughout the country and that there are very few native Indian people who were able to qualify for the increased payments.

I understand there has been a tremendous increase in welfare payments to Indians. Of course this is a reflection of economic conditions in the nation as well as of other factors, and we all know that one can very easily come to accept welfare payments as a means of subsistence on a long term basis. I think it would be most unfortunate if native Indian people and others should come to feel that their whole livelihood was gleaned from welfare payments by the department. This would tend to sap any initiative that the individual might have and, incidentally, this applies not only to Indians but to non-Indians as well if we can dip our fingers into the public treasury and live on welfare or relief. There are some people in this society who are quite happy and content to live that sort of lethargic life. I think it would be most unfortunate if, because of economic conditions and other factors, our native Indian people should come to believe that their subsistence and income were dependent solely on welfare plus the foodstuffs they may collect on or near their reserve.

As an indication of the effect of the decline in the economy, coupled with the increased welfare payments and the transition or the change-over from a voucher system to a cash system, I hold in my hand one example which shows what can develop as a result. I have copies of a series of letters exchanged between an organization or company known as Robertson's Market in Sarnia and the minister, and between Mr. Robertson and Mr. Patterson, the superintendent of the Sarnia agency, and a Mr. LeRoy in Sarnia also, all dealing with accumulated bills of Indian people and some non-Indians. I understand that bills have accrued in Mr. Robertson's market to the extent of some $5,300. This correspondence has been exchanged over the period of a year or a little more. Mr. Robertson's attempt, of course, is to get either from the Indian affairs branch or from band moneys direct payment to him for these overdue accounts.

[Mr. Howard.]

That, of course, is not the point I want to deal with, because I think his approach to the department in this regard is quite correct; but it does reflect an unfortunate set of circumstances, one in which the Indian people themselves find it necessary to charge up groceries and perhaps other commodities in stores with which they have been dealing. Subsequently, for a variety of reasons, they found themselves unable to pay these accounts. This is not beneficial to the Indians themselves, and it is certainly not helpful to stores like that of Mr. Robertson.

I only raise the point to indicate that I think a more concerted effort should be made to ensure that the native Indian people do not come to rely on welfare payments as their sole means of sustenance, and so that a man like Mr. Robertson will not in the future find himself in the position of having a great amount of credit on his books over a period of time, to such an extent that the continued operation of his business is impaired.

The minister mentioned last night that there is a vote of $100,000 under the Department of Finance, I believe, for housing loans to Indian people as a sort of pilot project, and she indicated that in subsequent years this amount of money, depending on the experience, could very well be increased. I think it would be interesting if the minister could give the committee an understanding of the terms under which these loans will be made. I have in mind the interest rate that will apply, the term of the loan, whether there are any restrictions on the amounts of such loans, and all other statistical information relating to the lending of money and the repayment thereof. Perhaps the minister could make this information available later.

I have in my hand a document published by the Progressive Conservative association of Canada, I believe. It is called "The Record Speaks", and I should like to take the opportunity to make one or two references to it so far as Indian affairs are concerned. On page 11, in dealing with Indian affairs, two statements are made which are not in fact correct. When I say they are not in fact correct that is a polite way to put it, because I will show later that they border on deliberate distortions of fact; or it could well be that Mr. Grosart, who I gather prepared this pamphlet, is really out of touch with the department and the government and is not sure just what is happening. The first sentence under Indian affairs reads as follows:

> For the first time, the right to vote has been granted to all Canadian Indians.

We know this is not so. We know that all Canadian Indians had the right to vote some years ago; that by legislation enacted by parliament many years ago it was taken away from them and that subsequently—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A characteristic distortion.

Mr. Howard: Let me tell my hon. friend that it was a Liberal government that took away the right of Indians to vote in the first place.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was the Liberals who gave it to them.

Mr. Howard: Was it? I do not want to get into a crossfire with the hon. member for Essex East about Indian affairs because I have very little respect for the Liberal party's approach to this matter. It is a pretty dark and black record.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would not want to raise the matter.

Mr. Howard: My friend would not want to raise the matter because what I say applies to the party to which he belongs. Here is another distortion of fact in this document:

> For the first time, a joint Senate-House of Commons committee on Indian affairs was appointed in May, 1959.

This is just not true; it was not the first time. In fact, on May 13, 1946 parliament passed a motion in substantially the same terms as the one passed recently setting up a joint Senate and House of Commons committee. The hon. member for Brant-Haldimand, the parliamentary secretary to the minister, was a member of that committee in 1946 and, if I am not mistaken, the present Minister of National Defence was also a member. In any event these two members of the house were members of the committee established in 1946; but our friend Mr. Grosart says that this did not happen. I do not want to go too far into this matter; I simply wanted to refer to it as a basis for something else.

I remember that a few years ago an Indian gentleman near Brantford accused the hon. lady of speaking with a forked tongue, and I say, of course, that that was incorrect. That was not in fact true, but I am inclined to think that "The Record Speaks" is a record that speaks with a forked tongue so far as these two matters are concerned.

This raises a question in my mind. For many years we have not been too faithful and trustworthy in our dealings with the Indian people. We have destroyed a great deal of the confidence they had in government and in non-Indians. I am sure there is a conscious effort now on the part of the government and every member of the house to bring back that mutual trust, respect and admiration, but the more incorrect distortions of facts such as are contained in "The Record Speaks" are made, the more statements are made that are not in fact true, the more we are doing to destroy the attempt we are making to establish mutual trust and confidence. I am quite sure that if a native Indian were to look at this document and see these statements, which he knows are not true, he would say, "How can I trust this government on other matters in which there has to be trust"?

This is something that is going to become even more important because the fact that parliament has taken the commendable action of giving Indians the right to vote will mean that members of parliament and of political parties, if only for political reasons, will take a greater interest in these people simply because they are a group of voters, and will try to understand more fully the attitudes, feelings and problems of the Indian people. This is beneficial to that extent, and I think it will go a long way toward creating that mutual respect and trust which is so necessary in dealing with our native Indian people.

There are other obstacles which have to be overcome. Over quite a number of years a feeling of resentment against the Indian agent or Indian superintendent, as he is properly classified, has developed among the Indians. Many Indian people have looked upon the Indian agent in the past, and some still do, as a person who is there to prevent them obtaining justice with regard to their demands rather than for the purpose of helping them. They look upon many Indian agents as untrustworthy. It would almost seem as if the Indian is continually at war with the Indian agent with regard to many problems.

As I have said, this situation still exists. It is the result of a number of things, the first being our attitude and our actions toward these people in the past. Second, I think it reflects an attitude on the part of the administration which in itself is a reflection of the attitude of society toward our native Indian people. This situation unfortunately still exists although perhaps not to the same degree as a few years ago. There appears to be a bottleneck within the administration with respect to the flow of ideas concerning the problems of the Indians between parliament itself, the people generally, and the native Indian people.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and other cabinet ministers with jurisdiction over Indian affairs will change from time to time, but as long as we have Indian affairs under federal jurisdiction the administration will remain. It is the attitude of the administration which I think must be altered. As I say, I think the situation is perhaps less difficult than it was a few years ago. I may be incorrect as to my figures, but I understand that there are 20 or 25 people of native Indian descent who are employees of the Indian affairs branch. This is just a rough guess, but that figure is in my mind. In any event, I have come to the conclusion that this mutual respect which is so desirable does not exist throughout the Indian affairs branch. This again is a reflection of the attitude of society toward the native Indian people. It is extremely unfortunate. I feel that this is one of the key things toward which the Indian affairs branch must work, this trustworthiness and mutual respect, and it must be backed up with proof. Perhaps this condition will continue for the next three years when, I understand, a number of changes will take place which may alter the situation immeasurably.

I think the administration of the branch must exude sincerity toward the Indian people. The Indian agents must exhibit this trust and respect. They must not do so merely by words or fine phrases, but must do so consciously and must give evidence of it by acts. There are a number of instances that take place from time to time which tend to destroy this mutual trust that we are all desirous of building up in the Indian affairs branch.

I should like to refer, if I may, to the matter of land in British Columbia. I did not raise this subject at an earlier time because, unfortunately, I did not have in my possession a particular document which I have since received and to which I should like to refer. If I may be permitted to make a slight reference to something that happened earlier, I would say that this house endorsed a bill repealing section 112 of the Indian Act. This was commendable. The thought was that if these Indian bands were to become enfranchised as entities they would move in the direction of becoming either municipalities under provincial structure or something akin to a municipal corporation. This was the end which I believe the minister and others had in mind some years ago when this provision was instituted. In fact there is still a reference in the act to the understanding that the application of such a band for enfranchisement is coupled to whether or not they will be operating as a municipality.

We have such a request from a village in my riding, from the Metlakatla. This request was made six or seven years ago. There was a committee of inquiry established under section 112, and that committee recommended against the request. I understand from the Indian people that their main objection to proceeding with enfranchisement was the question of lands formerly owned by the provincial government. This was what prevented this band from moving toward closer ties with our non-Indian society in the municipal and sociological field. I have here a copy of order in council No. 1036, approved and ordered on July 29, 1938 at the executive council chambers in Victoria. There is a list of the members of the cabinet who were present at that time, and incidentally they were Liberals. Part of this order in council deals with certain B.C. lands and, under the Indian affairs settlement act, transfers that land to the federal government in trust for the Indians. This is the key point, as I understand it, and is what prevented the Metlakatla band from proceeding toward enfranchisement and becoming something akin to a municipality.

The order in council reads in part as follows:

> —subject to the condition that in the event of any Indian tribe or band in British Columbia at some future time becoming extinct—

Of course if they became enfranchised they would become extinct as a band. They are the same people, but they are not a band within the meaning of the act.

> —that any lands hereby conveyed for such tribe or band, and not sold or disposed of as heretofore provided, or any unexpended fund being the proceeds of any such sale, shall be conveyed or repaid to the grantor—

What would happen under that provision would be that the Metlakatla band, if it became enfranchised, would lose its lands because they would revert to the province and become provincial lands. It was the refusal of the Social Credit administration under the former minister of lands and forests, Mr. Sommers, to change this order in council that led the Metlakatla band to say, if we become enfranchised we lose everything. What do we do? Do we step out of our village into the "saltchuck", and then where are we? We thought enfranchisement would mean that we would keep the lands. It was primarily because of this order in council that the Metlakatla enfranchisement question was subsequently rejected by the Metlakatla people themselves.

I say this order in council will be a barrier to any Indian band in British Columbia desiring enfranchisement as a band, regardless of the provisions in the Indian Act. Until there is a change made, this barrier will remain. There are other barriers with respect to land which are preventing and will continue to prevent any clear or definite approach toward the desired mutual respect and trustworthiness, the admiration of one group of people for another, as a step toward integration.

There was one other thing which happened in British Columbia which tended to destroy this hope that the Indian people had for trust in the government. I refer to another village in my constituency, that of Kitwanga. Part of this reserve is traversed by highway No. 16. The provincial government desired to relocate that section of highway No. 16 which passed through the reserve. This was an example of callous disregard for the rights of people if ever one existed. The correspondence in this regard was tabled pursuant to a motion of mine, and I should like to make reference to one or two letters if I may.

This is an example of the slight regard of the minister of highways of British Columbia for the Indian people, for their rights and their property. His action again tends to destroy what we are working toward in the field of mutual respect. This is a copy of a letter from the department of highways of British Columbia to Mr. W. S. Arneil, the Indian commissioner in Vancouver, dated April 2, 1959. I shall not read it, but it advises that the department contemplates widening the road through this particular village. The last paragraph of the letter reads:

> One behalf of the department of highways, I am instructed to make formal application for entry to undertake the proposed reconstruction work within the above mentioned Indian reserves.

According to a subsequent letter, and before the formal application could be dealt with, we find that the department of highways moved on to the property, uprooted the timber and destroyed it, along with everything else. There is a letter dated April 17 from Mr. Arneil to the department of highways in which he says:

> Work on this section of the highway, we understand, has already proceeded, the slashing work apparently now almost completed. Without specific approval of the band council for entry onto the reserve we anticipate some difficulty in negotiations.

I expect they would anticipate some difficulty in negotiations. I well know that Mr. Gaglardi has not too much respect for the law as long as he has his way. It is unfortunate that this invasion occurred, and it is unfortunate that the Indian affairs branch sat by and did not act quickly to prevent it or to prevent the destruction of the timber, the removal of the gravel and so on. The Indian people look to the Indian Act for some protection. It states that a person shall not trespass on a reserve, and if he does so he is committing an offence. In this instance they found no protection in the Indian Act, and no protection in the Indian affairs branch. They found nothing except a desire to negotiate and consummate the sale or surrender of that land after it had been taken by the department of highways. This is not doing much to assist in mutual understanding and the move toward integration.

I have a copy of a letter that was addressed to the Minister of Justice. In it accusations are made that the Indian agent in that agency attempted to put pressure on the council and certain members of the council, by means of threats of cutting off welfare and the like, in order to influence them not to negotiate in too difficult a way or on too hard a basis with the provincial government of British Columbia, and to make surrender of the land without too much trouble.

This information was communicated to the Minister of Justice on December 14, 1960. As far as I know, no action has been taken by him in that regard. As a consequence the rights of the Indian people in their land at Kitwanga reserve have just been pushed aside. If ever any people in Canada are covered by the bill of rights it is the Indian people, because they are the ones who are mentioned as a separate group of people coming within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Obviously the bill of rights means nothing as far as their land is concerned.

This sort of thing has been going on for many years. Unfortunately, whatever steps we may be taking toward integration, acculturation, understanding and asking them to trust us again in our dealings with them; no matter how many steps we may take in that direction, attitudes like this which have developed over the years in the Indian affairs branch, actions like those of Mr. Gaglardi, the minister of highways in British Columbia in invading that area, and the failure of the department or of the Minister of Justice to take some action to protect the rights of these individuals and their property, will do more to destroy the moves toward mutual trust that we are trying to develop than anything else. We are working at cross purposes unless we can implant in the mind of every member of the cabinet the fact that it is necessary to move in this direction of mutual desire.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Winch: First of all, Mr. Chairman, may I express my appreciation to those sitting on the government benches and in the official opposition for being allowed to follow the hon. member for Skeena at this time, owing to my having made a commitment several weeks ago to speak this afternoon at a seminar in Niagara Falls on the subject of my experience at the United Nations and in international affairs. I greatly appreciate that courtesy.

I desire to speak on this administration vote for the Indian affairs branch for one reason only. May I say that I fully appreciate the fact that there was last session, and there is this session, a special joint committee of the other house and the House of Commons on Indian affairs. What I want to discuss is a matter which I feel is of such great importance that it goes beyond a study of Indian affairs by a joint committee of the other house and the House of Commons.

Through you, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask whether the minister in charge of Indian affairs in her time in office has had an opportunity to review the sale of Indian lands over a period of, for instance, 40 years. I refer in particular to the province of British Columbia, and ask whether any thought has been given not only to the studies being made by a special joint committee but to a judicial inquiry to decide whether or not the Indians in British Columbia have been robbed—and I deliberately use those words "have been robbed"—on the sale of land. Has any thought been given to a judicial inquiry into the question of whether an agreement made in 1912 is still in effect or has a bearing on the sale of reserve land nominally held by the Indian bands of British Columbia?

May I at this time through you, Mr. Chairman, and the minister also express my thanks to the director of Indian affairs, who in past weeks has been most courteous and helpful to me in trying to obtain copies of official records. It is only through his courtesy and co-operation that I was able to locate a copy of the proceedings of the royal commission on Indian affairs, volume 1, in 1916, which provides the basis upon which I am making my remarks here this morning.

It is my understanding that prior to 1912 Indian reserves were established and lines of demarcation were set, and that those Indian reserves were the property of the Indians of British Columbia. However, a royal commission was established in 1912 on which was a Mr. McKenna, representing the government of Canada. As a result of this royal commission an agreement was reached in 1912 which is now known as the McKenna-McBride agreement, McKenna being the commissioner representing the government of Canada and McBride the premier of British Columbia.

I was most interested in noting that an order in council was passed on November 27, 1912 and that according to the terms of this order in council, the agreement reached between McKenna and McBride was not to be submitted to the legislature of British Columbia or to the parliament of Canada but was to be decided upon by the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia. I have not yet been able to locate any act of the legislature of British Columbia or any act of the parliament of Canada relative to changes that were made regarding reserve lands. I say that I have not yet located any acts of parliament, but they may be in existence. I do not know; I have not found them yet. All I have at the present time is this order in council passed in Ottawa on November 27, 1912, by which the government concurred in the McKenna-McBride agreement.

You may ask, Mr. Chairman, why this is disturbing and why I ask whether the minister is considering, has considered or will consider, in addition to the study being made by the joint committee, a judicial inquiry to determine whether or not the Indians of British Columbia have been robbed of their lands because of the McKenna-McBride agreement of 1912.

The McKenna-McBride agreement is quoted in the report of the royal commission on Indian affairs, 1916, volume 1. I will read the agreement in part. I will read all that hon. members require, but this is what it says in part, dealing with reserve lands. The commission had the power to add, if they found it proper, or cut down the reserve lands. This is the agreement on how they could cut down the lands which had previously been granted and accepted as being the property of the Indians of British Columbia:

> Memorandum of an agreement arrived at between J. A. J. McKenna, special commissioner appointed by the dominion government to investigate the condition of Indian affairs in British Columbia, and the Honourable Sir Richard McBride, as premier of the province of British Columbia.

Then the agreement continues:

> (a) At such places as the commissioners are satisfied—

I stress those words "the commissioners are satisfied":

> —that more land is included in any particular reserve as now defined than is reasonably required for the use of the Indians of that tribe or locality, the reserve shall, with the consent of the Indians, as required by the Indian Act, be reduced to such acreage as the commissioners think reasonably sufficient for the purposes of such Indians.

I would like this to be noted; it is in the report:

> 4. The lands which the commissioners shall determine are not necessary for the use of the Indians shall be subdivided and sold by the province at public auction.
> 5. The net proceeds of all such sales shall be divided equally between the province and the doimnion, and all moneys received by the dominion under this clause shall be held or used by the dominion for the benefit of the Indians of British Columbia.

That is the McKenna-McBride agreement, which was agreed to by order in council in Ottawa and by the lieutenant governor in council in British Columbia. I would like to point out first of all that these lands had been granted by law as the reserve lands of the native Indians of British Columbia. I know it is a long time back, but I can assure the minister through you, sir, that I have travelled across British Columbia for 27 years and I know the Indian lands, Indian bands and Indian people. Right to this day they feel that over the years they have been robbed on land sales.

One point is this; that in 1912, although they already held reserves by right and by law, a decision by a commission and approved by order in council held that any lands which the commission decided were not required by Indian bands would be sold by auction by the province, the province to retain 50 per cent of the moneys and the federal government to receive 50 per cent and distribute it to the bands. In my studies I have found that in all sales the federal government has, under the order in council, distributed this money to the bands. But I am certain you will understand what is causing this feeling on the part of the Indians that they have been dealt with unfairly. This is because 50 per cent of the money goes to the province after the sale of their own lands, and no distribution is made to the Indians. If these were Indian lands and by agreement they were to be sold by auction, why should only 50 per cent of the proceeds go back to the Indians? These lands were all theirs originally by law, and certain parts were allocated for reserves.

As I say, this was in 1912. One half of this volume 1 outlines the lands declared surplus. Was it all handled that year? The answer is no. I have not had time to study how this matter has developed since 1912, but I wish to show what happened in one instance. There was a report agreed to by order in council in 1912 concerning Indian reserve lands. Order in council No. P.C. 48/2838 was passed in Ottawa on September 26, 1939. I would like to place this order in council on record:

> The board had under consideration a memorandum from the honourable the minister of mines and resources reporting:
> "That pursuant to the report of the royal commission on Indian affairs for the province of British Columbia, a portion of Capilano Indian reserve No. 5, of the Squamish band, Vancouver agency, province of British Columbia, was cut off the reserve;
>
> That the McKenna-McBride agreement of 1912 provided that reserves or portions of reserves so cut off were to be sold by the province at public auction, and that 'the net proceeds of all such sales shall be divided equally between the province and the dominion, and all moneys received by the dominion under this clause shall be held or used by the dominion for the benefit of the Indians of British Columbia';
>
> That in 1936 the province of British Columbia disposed of a portion of the cut-off area in the Capilano reserve to the First Narrows Bridge Company for a net sum of $6,048 and remitted $3,024, being 50 per cent, to the Receiver General of Canada, which was placed in the capital account of the Squamish band, and
> That the council of the Squamish band, in a resolution dated April 25, 1938, requested that 50 per cent of the dominion's share be distributed to the members of the band on a per capita basis, as provided by section 92 of the Indian Act.
> The undersigned, therefore, recommends that he be authorized to approve a per capita distribution of 50 per cent of the moneys received from the province to the Indians of Squamish band, as provided under section 92 of the Indian Act."
> The board concur in the above report and recommendation, and submit the same for favourable consideration.

There was the McKenna-McBride agreement in 1912 under which what were previously Indian lands were dealt with. Under the orders of the commission, according to all the plans submitted in this report, lands could be cut off and sold by the province at auction, the province to receive 50 per cent of the sale moneys and the federal government to receive 50 per cent. The federal government distributes its share, but since 1912 the Indians have received nothing with respect to the 50 per cent return on the sale of land that goes to the province of British Columbia.

I used an order in council passed in 1939 as an illustration. Although the order in council enumerates the relevant sections of the agreement, it does not say that the land cannot be sold without the consent of the band. I have previously expressed appreciation to the minister for the work of the director of Indian affairs. A few days ago I asked the director if he would try to find for me the authority for the consent of the band in this particular case. I am convinced that if it had been found I would have been advised by this date. It is felt that the Indian agent exercises authority in these sales.

I will not speak at great length, but I do want to emphasize this point. Although this problem goes back to 1912, it is a source of disturbance to the Indians of British Columbia. I have had only a few weeks in which to study the matter in addition to dealing with all the other problems which confront a member.

On the basis of my examination of the royal commission report on British Columbia Indian affairs, on the basis of the agreement, and on the basis of the type of order in council passed with respect to reserve land sales in British Columbia, I am definitely of the opinion, unless evidence to the contrary is produced, that the Indians have ground for complaint. I question the legality of the way in which this matter has been handled, and am of the opinion that the Indians of British Columbia have been morally, if not legally, wronged in the sale of their reserve land. I am interested in learning if the agreement is still law and if any other reserve lands belonging to British Columbia Indians can be auctioned, in respect of which they will receive 50 per cent return through the federal government but will lose 50 per cent through the provincial government.

I raise this matter because it is important, and I realize that the minister may not have had time in her brief term in office to study the problem. I believe the hon. lady will appreciate why I think it should be the subject of a judicial inquiry, and I hope she will offer some comment on the situation.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should deal first with the questions which were asked last evening by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, when he inquired as to the estimated expenditures for Indians on a per capita basis.

Based on the present population figure of 185,295 and the total estimated expenditure for 1961-62 of $49,421,488 for the Indian affairs branch, the per capita expenditure would be $266.72. In order to achieve a more realistic figure, additional expenditures on Indians by the Indian and northern health services of the Department of National Health and Welfare and also expenditures on Indian education in the Northwest Territories by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources would have to be included.

I am informed that it is proposed to spend $19,500,000 on Indian health in 1961-62. This would involve an additional $105.24 per capita expenditure. I understand that the education of Indian pupils in the Northwest Territories will involve an expenditure of $2,285,127. On a nation-wide per capita break-down this amounts to $12.33. Therefore the total proposed per capita expenditure for 1961-62 would amount to $384.29. I remind hon. members that this figure does not include old age assistance, family allowances and other such social benefits of general application available to citizens of Indian status on the same basis as others.

The hon. member also asked for a report on some of the areas of regular employment in which Indians are moving, particularly in frontier areas. In British Columbia substantial numbers of Indians are employed in the logging and pulpwood industries. The department has established liaison with several companies which are planning new pulpwood and power projects, and expects these to provide additional job opportunities.

There were 128 Indians placed this year on clearing work for the microwave system along the Alaska highway. At Masset, British Columiba, 80 Indians are employed for nine or 10 months of each year in the local cannery. In the Yukon, clearing operations in connection with road construction included one project at Watson Lake last winter which employed 100 Indians, and there is a similar project at that location this winter. In the Northwest Territories, at Yellowknife, a similar clearing project is currently employing approximately 100 Indians. Indians are also employed as school janitors and in other capacities by government departments. In Alberta over 160 Indians have been employed in clearing the right of way for a north-south pipe line, and this work is continuing.

These examples concern construction work largely. In Manitoba there have been similar projects at Cormorant lake and at Thompson. Currently over 100 Indians are employed at the Grand Rapids power development. These programs give them experience in wage employment which prepares them for other job opportunities as they occur. At Island Lake, Manitoba, a fish filleting plant provides wage employment for over 50 Indians for three to four months each summer. Many Manitoba Indians are employed by the railways as section hands and section foremen, and this also applies in northern Ontario.

Mining operations in northern Ontario provide employment to a considerable number of Indians in the Red Lake district. At Pickle Crow, Ontario, there are some 50 Indians employed as miners and on surface work. At Sudbury 25 were placed last year. Highway construction for a new iron ore development in Nakina agency employs 30 Indians. A sulphuric acid plant established on the Serpent river reserve No. 7 in the district of Algoma has employed approximately 20 Indians. At Schefferville, Quebec, although the work force was substantially reduced last fall, 35 Indians were retained on the payroll out of approximately 125 employed. Many of the others are employed periodically on a day basis.

The foregoing presents a few examples of instances where groups of Indians are being employed on construction projects, particularly in the north. Smaller groups are making the adjustment to industrial employment. This is not a complete list, nor does it include mention of those individuals who have moved into steady employment under the permanent placement program.

This morning the hon. member for Skeena asked some questions and made some comments to which I should like to reply. He asked me whether I could give him the number of persons receiving welfare payments in each of the five categories, as set out in the statement made a year ago. We do not have these figures; I presume it would be possible to procure them, but I am told by my officials that it would entail two months work to do so. I doubt very much whether the answer would be sufficiently valuable to the hon. member to warrant that expenditure of time and money. He also asked me about loans for housing which would be made from the $100,000 fund which appears in the vote to come up shortly, namely vote No. 480. With the agreement of the committee I will answer it now. The interest rate is 5 per cent simple interest for a period of 10 years. Although that is the ceiling, the period can be extended. The maximum amount permissible for a single loan is $5,000.

I must say my hon. friend is misinformed with reference to the number of Indians employed by the department. Altogether there are 255 Indians in the employ of the Indian affairs branch, 123 of whom are teachers. The others are employed in various categories, clerical and administrative jobs, superintendents and assistants, constables, caretakers, stenographers and typists and one classification of all other types of employment.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the total number of all employees of the Indian affairs branch?

Mrs. Fairclough: The number is 255, 132 general staff and 123 teachers.

Mr. Pickersgill: No; those are Indians, are they not?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I mean, what is the total number of employees in the department?

Mrs. Fairclough: I see. I will get that figure for the hon. member. I might say that it is the aim of the department to employ these people whenever we can, and we do hope that as time goes on more and more of them will enter into the employ of the department. Altogether the number employed is 2,494. So you see that something just over 10 per cent of our staff are Indians.

The hon. member for Skeena made reference to the Kitwanga Indian band and the difficulties they are having with reference to the road which British Columbia is building in that area. First of all I might say that under the terms of the agreement with the province with respect to this land, the province has the right to take back 5 per cent of unimproved land for road purposes without any compensation. Of course the hon. member knows they have taken more than that, and we agree that the situation is not what it might be. At the present time we are in the process of negotiations with the province, and we have hired an independent appraiser to evaluate the property which has been taken.

Mr. Howard: The minister said that by virtue of the agreement they have they can take up to 5 per cent without compensation. Can the minister indicate what this agreement is or when it was consummated?

Mrs. Fairclough: The reserves were conveyed to the dominion by the province of British Columbia by a minute of the executive council on July 29, 1938. By that minute the province retained the right to resume unimproved land, to the extent of 5 per cent of the area transferred to the dominion, for roads and other public works, without payment of compensation. Therefore, in the case of the Kitwanga reserve No. 1, the province may resume approximately 165 acres of unimproved land and approximately 10 acres in the case of Kitwanga reserve No. 2.

Mr. Winch: That action was taken by executive minute, not by an act of the legislature? It was an executive council minute?

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member is quite right.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry to bother the minister, but does the minister, or do her advisers, know of any authority of the federal government whereby a provincial government can take over reserve land under an order in council and not by an act of the legislature? Is that authorized by the federal government, which has the responsibility for Indians?

Mrs. Fairclough: This was done under the terms by which the reserves were turned over in the first place.

Mr. Winch: In other words we are back to the McKenna-McBride agreement?

Mrs. Fairclough: No. I will give the hon. member a fuller explanation in reply to his question.

With reference to the matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East, this is as he has indicated. The director and the department have been spending a considerable amount of time in research, delving into the questions he has raised and the conditions under which these reserves were changed in the first place. His first inquiries to the department, or his main inquiry, had to do with Capilano Indian reserve No. 5. Before dealing specifically with that reserve I think possibly some background information applicable to all reserves in British Columbia might be helpful. I should say that this information is going forward to the hon. member in a letter from the director. I assume by his remarks he has not received it, but it is in the mail and should be on his desk now. However, it is interesting information and possibly I might make it available to the committee.

The British North America Act assigns legislative authority over Indians and lands reserved for the Indians to the dominion. Article 13 of the terms of union under which British Columbia entered confederation recognized the dominion's responsibility for Indians and Indian lands, and British Columbia undertook to convey to the dominion tracts of lands for the use and benefit of the Indians. Differences soon arose between the two governments as to the fair per capita acreage of reserves and in 1876 the two governments set up a joint commission to allot reserves.

The agreement constituting the joint commission and subsequent provincial legislation created legal and administrative difficulties with respect to dominion management of reserve lands. With a view to achieving a settlement of the difficulties, negotiations continued with the province which resulted in the McKenna-McBride agreement of September 24, 1912. The agreement provided for the appointment of a royal commission empowered to bring about "a final adjustment of all matters relating to Indian affairs in the province of British Columbia". The royal commission's terms of reference extended to the adjustment of the area of reserves with power to add to, and subtract from, the area of existing reserves and to allot new reserves, it being provided that reductions in area would be "with the consent of the Indians, as required by the Indian Act". The agreement also provided that 50 per cent of the proceeds from the disposal of any cut-off lands would be paid in trust for the benefit of the Indians.

The royal commission completed its work in 1916 and in brief confirmed existing reserves, added to reserves, reduced reserves and created new reserves. The commission's report with schedules of reserves confirmed by the commission was accepted by orders in council of both governments, by British Columbia in 1923 and the dominion in 1924.

The hon. member asked as to what reserves were affected and so on. The schedule attached to that commission's report will give that information.

Legislative authority for acceptance of the royal commission report by the dominion was provided by the British Columbia Indian Lands Settlement Act, chapter 51, statutes of Canada, 1920.

I must say here that the hon. member has been talking about so many things being done by order in council, and I draw his attention to the fact that this was an act of parliament.

Mr. Winch: In 1920, was it?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Winch: This was agreed to in 1912.

Mrs. Fairclough: The actual legislative authority was in 1920.

Mr. Winch: I have the orders here, and I should like to know how the governor general in council and the lieutenant governor in council in British Columbia could pass such an order in council when they did not have authority until 1920.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not know which orders in council the hon. member is referring to, but the orders in council to which my attention was drawn were those passed in 1923 and 1924.

Mr. Winch: There was one passed in November, 1912, in Ottawa and also one passed in British Columbia.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mrs. Fairclough: I believe that established the commission. Perhaps I might be permitted to go on and finish.

Section 1 of the act empowered the governor in council to give effect to the report of the royal commission "in whole or in part". Section 3 of the act dispensed with the necessity of securing Indian consent to the reduction of area of reserves by providing:

"For the purpose of adjusting, readjusting, or confirming the reductions or cut-offs from reserves in accordance with the recommendations of the royal commission, the governor in council may order such reductions or cut-offs to be effected without surrenders of the same by the Indians, notwithstanding any provisions of the Indian Act to the contrary."

There was considerable discussion in the House of Commons in 1920 when the bill was debated and the then minister outlined the problems relating to Indian lands in British Columbia and the reasons for the legislation.

As far as Capilano Indian reserve No. 5 is concerned, it was confirmed by the 1876 joint commission on June 15, 1877. The joint commission confirmed the original reserve together with an additional parcel of land. In 1892 it came to light that the province had made a grant of part of the land added to the reserve in 1877. The reserve was then re-surveyed and the commission on April 24, 1893, reconfirmed the reserve with an area of 444 acres.

The royal commission appointed pursuant to the McKenna-McBride agreement reduced the area of Capilano reserve by cutting off 130 acres. However, commission minute of decision gives no reason for the reduction. It is assumed the commissioners were of the opinion the remaining land was adequate for the needs of the band at the time. The Squamish band, for whom the reserve was set apart, as far as we know without going into extended research, never consented to the reduction. It is unlikely that consent was sought in view of the provisions of the British Columbia Lands Settlement Act and the fact that the report of the royal commission which recommended the reduction was accepted.

In other words, by reason of the law of 1920 consent by the band was not required.

In accordance with the agreement arrived at the band is entitled to 50 per cent of the proceeds from either the rental or sale of the cut-off land.

As I have said, this information is in the mail to the hon. member. No doubt he will want to study it further, and if there is any further information we can give we will be very happy to do so.

Mr. Winch: I appreciate very much the length to which the minister has gone in dealing with the problem I have raised. However, I presume that the administration item will go through today; therefore this is the last opportunity I will have to speak on this matter. I should like to ask the minister two questions. I understood her to say that from the records it is shown right in the order in council to which I made previous reference that the Squamish band never did give permission for the sale of this land.

Mrs. Fairclough: Not so far as we can tell. Without a great deal more research we could not say definitely, but it does not appear that they did. However, as I pointed out to the hon. member, according to the conditions set out in the act passed in 1920 such consent was not required.

Mr. Winch: That is quite true according to the act of 1920, but according to the McKenna-McBride agreement of 1912 the Indians had to give their permission in accordance with the Indian Act for the province to be able to sell this land. The minister has now confirmed my contention that perhaps there should be a judicial inquiry into this entire matter.

Second, in view of the obvious study the minister has been making since I started to make inquiries about this matter—and she obviously knew, of course, that I would raise it under this vote—has the minister given any consideration to the moral right of anything being passed provincially or federally, legislatively or by order in council, which says that the Indians will only get 50 per cent of the value of the land disposed of? Admittedly the federal government pays the 50 per cent to the Indians, but is the minister in a position to comment as to the other half and the fact that the Indians only get 50 per cent and not 100 per cent of the value of the land sold?

Mrs. Fairclough: Obviously I am not in a position to make any comment. All of this happened a long, long time ago. I know that over the years the Indians have suffered under various acts of all governments, but I have no basis on which to form a judgment. I would not accuse anyone of mistreating Indians, nor would I accuse the Indians of demanding more than is their just right.

With respect to the McKenna-McBride report I would say to the hon. member, however, that the 1920 act superseded that, and it must be borne in mind that not only were lands taken away from the Indians but areas were also added to existing Indian reserves at that time. There was some compensation. Whether an individual band received compensation for the land it lost I cannot say, but in any event I will agree with the hon. member to this extent, that over the years undoubtedly things were done that should not have been done. I cannot, however, sit in judgment on anyone who participated in those actions.

Mr. Winch: I know it is now one o'clock, but I have only one short question and I would ask the committee to permit me to put it. Can the minister give me any information on this factor? Although we have the McKenna-McBride agreement of 1912 and the act of 1920, the fact remains that an order in council was passed in 1939 relative to sales. Are there are any lands still held by Indians in British Columbia that can be sold or disposed of under the McKenna-McBride agreement?

Mrs. Fairclough: We would have to check the schedule to the agreement to which I referred previously.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Wratten: Before I bring one or two points to the attention of the minister, I should like to take advantage of the opportunity to thank the minister and the officials of her department for the many courtesies they have shown me since I have been here and since the hon. lady has been minister. I should like to refer, first, to a problem which I have mentioned in the house many times before relating to the council for the administration of justice on the Six Nations reserve in Brantford. I know that the administration of the courts is a provincial matter, but I was interested this morning to hear the minister say that many years ago the federal government accepted responsibility for the reserves in Canada.

As I have stated before, the Six Nations reserve is in the county of Brant, the smallest county in the province of Ontario, and it is one of the largest reserves in Ontario. It does seem unfair that the people of the city of Brantford have to assume the costs in connection with county magistrates and supreme courts as they relate to Indians without any remuneration from the federal government. The federal government should help us out in connection with this matter, especially in these days when every municipality is looking for some way to ease the taxation burden on the people. We feel that this is one place where the federal government should step in and help us. I do not want to belabour this point because the minister is familiar with the figures. We have had them placed on the record before. She knows just how we feel about this matter.

There is another problem that has come up since I last spoke on the problems of Indians. I refer to the problem of policing the Six Nations reserve. I recall that quite a few years ago there was an agreement drawn up under which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were to look after police matters on the reserve. Unfortunately, since we had the so-called riot on the reserve, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been gradually shifting the burden of looking after police matters to the provincial police. In my opinion this is not the way police matters should be administered in so far as the reserve is concerned. If the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are going to maintain a detachment of three or four men on the reserve to look after police matters, then they should do so and not pass on the calls to the provincial police. The Brantford city detachment of the provincial police is 12 to 14 miles from the centre of the reserve, and as a result the people on the reserve are not receiving adequate police protection when the provincial police are called. I wish the minister would look into the matter of the agreement between her department and the Department of Justice in order to ascertain just what the duties of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are on this reserve. If they are supposed to be maintaining law and order then they should be ordered to do it instead of passing the job on to the provincial police.

There is one other important point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. Newspaper reports would lead me to believe there has been some progress made in connection with this subject of fire protection on the reserve. Since I mentioned the matter last June there have been several fires on the reserve, in one of which four children were burned to death, and in another one person was burned to death. The Brantford city fire department is very efficient, as is the township fire department. These departments are fire prevention conscious and they have asked me to draw to the attention of the government the need for some firefighting equipment located on the reserve. I know that the chief of either of these fire departments would be glad to give advice on the establishment of such a department. I do not want to belabour this point because I do know some investigation has already been conducted into the matter. However, I do believe that for the sake of the safety of the people who live on the reserve we should go ahead quickly and establish fire fighting equipment on the reserve.

That is all I have to say at this time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I, like the hon. member who has preceded me, should like to extend my grateful thanks to the minister, to the director of the branch and to his staff for the very generous measure of assistance and co-operation they have given me during the past year. I should like to commend the branch particularly on the enlightened view that they have taken of the various suggestions which I have made from time to time and which have been of particular help to the Indian people in the Yukon. In this connection I should like to mention the suggestion which I advanced last year concerning the construction of a road from Watson Lake to Ross river which resulted in employment for well over 100 Indian people in the Yukon for some four months. The same work continues this year.

I should like also to commend to the minister her staff at Whitehorse. There has been a substantial and noticeable improvement in the administrative quality of the personnel in the Whitehorse office. The superintendent there is a very dedicated person and I think the minister would go a long way before she would find someone who would be of such a high standard. There is, however, still a large gap in the staff at Whitehorse, a gap that will exist until a placement officer is found for the Yukon.

The minister will recall that I first brought this matter to her attention on March 12, 1959. Since that time I understand one competition has been held by the civil service but some difficulties were encountered and the position was not filled. I noted with interest in the minister's opening statement that a placement officer had been found for Prince George. I understood the original intention was that the placement officer for the Yukon agency was also going to cover this area as well. Perhaps she could clarify this matter if I am wrong. Perhaps she could also give me some idea as to when the placement officer will be found to occupy that position in the Yukon because there is a substantial need for one there.

In keeping with the compliments which I paid to the minister for the increased tempo of the work of the branch in the Yukon, I note with much satisfaction the figures for expenditures which have been made in the Yukon over the past three years. I understand that in 1956-57 the total expenditures in the Yukon were $224,250; in 1957-58, $350,984; and in 1958-59, up to March 31, 1959, $543,231.22. I should like the minister to bring me up to date on that last figure, to give me the figure for the complete fiscal year of 1958-59 and also the current figure for 1959-60 as far as it is possible to do so. From the figures I have been able to obtain it would appear that the expenditure from 1956 to date has more than doubled on an annual basis, something which is exceedingly gratifying to me.

In her opening remarks the minister also mentioned the grubstaking of trappers. I had not been fully aware of the fact that this was the policy of the branch and I should like her to tell me to what extent this policy of grubstaking trappers has been applied with regard to Yukon Indian people. While she is answering that question perhaps she might also tell me whether this policy would extend to those Indian people in the Yukon who are engaged in prospecting for minerals.

I wish once again to dwell on an issue which I think should occupy the concentrated attention of the branch. I have said before that in the Yukon territory there are no reserves established for the Indian people. This situation has not changed. In every other jurisdiction in Canada the Indian people either have established Indian reserves or they have been paid in cash or kind in lieu of reserves being set aside for them. As the minister knows, the policy in the Yukon is for land to be set aside for the use of the Yukon Indian people by order in council, but these orders in council are flexible things and what is made an order in council today may next month cease to be an order in council or it may be varied.

During the construction of the Teslin airport or the enlargement of Teslin airport, for instance, under the past administration, the Indian reserve at Teslin was varied to the extent that reserve occupied land set aside for the use of Indians in that area was reduced in size in order to obtain for the Department of Transport sufficient land to accomplish their enlargement program. I do not think this procedure really is good enough. It certainly does not provide any too much long range security for the Indian people as to what they can regard as their own land. Again I should like to ask the minister or her officials to give this problem their concentrated attention. I feel that either the Indian people in the Yukon should have established entitlement to land, on an acreage basis if you will, so that they can look forward in the future to sharing in the resource discoveries as do the Indian people in other provinces or should be given something in lieu thereof.

I really do not know what the reason was for establishing reserves in the first place except that perhaps it may have been to satisfy the Indian people in the early days of settlement to the extent that they would be guaranteed a permanent and exclusive place in which to live, to farm, to raise livestock and so on. But, perhaps because of the small number of Indian people in the Yukon, this policy was not followed up there, historically. The fact remains that they have no land which they can call their own. They are the only Indian people in the whole of the Dominion of Canada who have not either been given land that they can call their own or payment in cash or kind in lieu thereof.

Passing to the education of the Indian people in the Yukon, I would once again urge the minister to co-operate with her colleagues in other federal government departments, particularly the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, to establish vocational training facilities for the Yukon Indian children. I am aware of the fact that the Indian affairs branch has an on the job training policy whereby the young Indian people can obtain employment with an employer and the department pays 50 per cent of the wages that are usually paid to the apprentice or to the learner in the trade during the months that he is an apprentice. I believe this policy extends to a six months' training period. However, I am just wondering how far it would go, for instance, if an Indian boy wanted to become skilled in the trade of electrician or plumber. These are questions that have often been asked.

Incidentally, may I say that I have referred some of these applicants or proposed applicants of Indian parentage who wished to obtain on the job training to the territorial government authorities who have informed me that they have no knowledge of any agreement existing between the territorial government and any federal government department with regard to on the job training. I do not think this is so. I think that the on the job training policy of the Indian affairs branch applies equally to the Yukon Territory and to any other jurisdiction in Canada.

May I also suggest that the Indian affairs branch policy in this regard be extended so that an Indian youth who, for instance, wishes to take training on a caterpillar tractor, a crane or a shovel or heavy equipment of that nature, may be encouraged to undergo training with some of the local contractors in the construction business during the winter season when their equipment is not working and when it could be gainfully and usefully utilized in the training of Indian boys. This is not training in a skill in the sense of one becoming an electrician or a plumber. But it does make for training operators of heavy equipment who would be available in the local labour pool when the seasonal construction of roads and the like commences in the spring and summer. I forget which hon. member on the other side of the house mentioned the desirability of retaining this native labour pool in the north. In my view this is one manner in which this could be accomplished.

I also wonder whether the minister would enlarge on the policy, if there is one in the branch, which provides similar training for girls. Indian girls are as much in need of this type of vocational training as are Indian boys. Now that there is a rather complex health and welfare administration set up throughout the north, I wonder just how far the branch could go in encouraging this type of training among the Indian girls. I wonder whether they could establish a policy of taking them into established hospitals and training them as nursing aids, and even at this point encouraging them, and perhaps even establishing scholarships for this purpose, to take nursing training so that they could return to the north and not only make a good living but set an example for those who may wish to follow.

I would also like some statistical information from the officials of the department, if it is possible, on this matter. I would like to know what the contribution has been by the Indian affairs branch to education generally in the Yukon territory. If that could be broken down to a per capita figure it would be even more useful, so that I could compare it with education costs generally in the Yukon and with the contributions made by other federal departments on a per capita basis.

I would like to know also what those contributions have been in respect of separate schools as opposed to non-denominational schools. Does the policy of making these contributions extend beyond those made strictly to schools; does the policy extend to the establishment of hostels and other boarding-in institutions which may be set up in the north?

While I am dealing with that point I would be critical, if I may, of the policy of the branch with regard to the rigid interpretation and the technical application of the act in so far as it affects Indian children attending Indian hostels. I feel there could very well be exceptions made here. In fact, in my view there are exceptions which could and must be made to the application of these regulations.

I have a current case in mind which I should like to relate to the minister. The case concerns Rosemary Lowe, who is the daughter of an Indian woman in the Yukon, Mrs. Mary Etzertza Lowe, who by her first husband had several children. Her first husband died and she remarried a white man four years later. Of that marriage there was the one issue, Rosemary Lowe. Three months or thereabouts after marrying the white Yukoner she left simply because circumstances would not permit continued living as a family unit.

The children have grown up to the point where they are attending school. Rosemary's three brothers are in the Roman Catholic hostel at Whitehorse. Mrs. Lowe worked there and I suppose because she was working there she was allowed to keep Rosemary in the hostel. All these children were attending the same school. Now Mrs. Lowe has left the hostel and has a permanent job in the hospital, and it appears there is some doubt as to the status of Rosemary and some doubt as to whether she will be allowed to remain in the hostel.

If the department cannot make exceptions in these cases we will find that Rosemary will be taken out of the wholesome atmosphere of the hostel, away from the affection of her brothers, away from the family unity that exists in the hostel and will be required to live in some miserable, squalid shack on the outskirts of the city.

I think these circumstances are sufficiently compassionate to allow a discretionary sympathy to be extended toward people who find themselves in these circumstances. While I am writing to the minister separately on this particular case, I certainly would like to know the over-all approach of the branch in the future to problems of a similar nature, because this case is not isolated; it can be repeated and repeated.

One further point that I wish to raise for the minister's consideration concerning education is the policy of the territorial government to recommend the cessation of family allowances paid on behalf of children, including Indian children, in the Yukon for irregular or non-attendance at school. In these cases the superintendent of education, as the minister knows, recommends to the family allowances division that the family allowances cease to be paid because of the non-attendance or irregular attendance of the child. In the case of Indian children I would strongly suggest that the minister speak to her colleague or someone in the family allowances division with a view to having a procedure set up whereby before making this type of recommendation the superintendent of education should check with the superintendent of the agency in Whitehorse, because there may be special circumstances which justify the irregular or non-attendance of these children. It does cause hardship among the very low income earning group at the best of times when these family allowances are abruptly cut off.

I would also like the minister to bring me up to date on the considerations which have been given by the branch to the Teslin co-operative society which I first suggested in June of 1959. The minister will recall that at that time I suggested that a big game guide co-operative be set up for the Teslin people. I would also like the minister to give me her assurance that the trapping grounds of the Old Crow people will be held inviolate for the use of those people.

I would also suggest that the branch investigate the feasibility of setting up a co-operative among the Yukon Indian people to manufacture and market Indian handicrafts.

In this connection the Yukon Indian advancement association, an association unique of its kind is doing some extremely good work. But I believe they could do with a good deal of assistance. These co-operative societies are working well in the Northwest Territories with the Eskimo and Indian people. They are working very well with the Saskatchewan Indian people, and in my view in an area such as the Yukon territory, where the branch is 100 per cent responsible for the Indian people, a good deal more attention could be paid to accelerating the establishment of this type of endeavour.

Then, too, the director of the Indian affairs branch will recall that in June 1958 he held consultations with the various leaders of the Indian people in the Yukon and they put forward several requests and representations. One of the requests put forward by the Dawson Indian people was for a freezer. This same request was put forward by the people of Teslin. I am wondering whether these units have been established in these places and whether they will be established in other localities in the Yukon. If they have not been established in Dawson and Teslin and if it is not the intention of the branch to establish these units elsewhere in the Yukon, I am wondering why.

I should also like the minister to inform me of the amount that the branch has contributed to the general health and welfare of the Yukon Indian people as opposed to the amount spent on education. I am wondering if there have been any grants made to Whitehorse hospital, Mayo hospital or Dawson hospital and if any other grants along those lines have been made. If the minister has figures available I should like to know how many new homes have been constructed for the Indian people in the Yukon Territory since 1957. I wish to know what those houses cost to build and how many families they have accommodated.

I also wish to know from the minister if the particular housing problem that the Dawson people have been saddled with has yet been solved. There are new homes there which I understand have not yet been occupied because of the refusal of the city council of Dawson to pass them as being fit for habitation. I believe the question involved is that of adequate plumbing.

One further feature of the administration of Indian affairs in the Yukon Territory to which I should like to draw the attention of the minister is the policy of the territorial government of the moment which is such that it does not participate in the payment of any old age assistance to the Indian people there. I believe that this is wrong. In my opinion the Indian people of the Yukon are entitled to receive old age assistance benefits in the same sense as they are provincially.

The Yukon Indian is a consumer of beer. He is lawfully entitled to buy beer in the Yukon and thereby contributes substantially to the tax coffers of the territorial treasury. There would appear to be no reason why this discrimination should exist between the aged Indian people and the aged non-Indian citizens there. Perhaps the minister could take this up with her colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources with a view to seeing what could be done through the commissioner-in-council in the Yukon.

There is another facet of the administration of the territorial government to which I wish to call the minister's attention. As the hon. lady knows, the children's aid society has now been taken over by the territorial administration. To be more accurate, I should say that the work previously done by the Yukon children's aid society has now been assumed by the territorial administration. The territorial administration, I feel, is paying more than its fair share of the cost of this work. I have here some figures which have been supplied to me concerning the number of welfare cases that have been handled in the Yukon during the period April 1 to October 31, 1960.

It would appear that of the number of individuals worked with in circumstances where protective welfare assistance was required, 62.5 per cent of the number of cases involved were Indian people. I do not believe the Indian affairs branch is yet making any contribution to the territorial government in this work. If I am wrong, perhaps the minister can set me straight. Of the number of individuals worked with, 63.7 per cent involved Indian children. Of the children in care during this period, 45 per cent were children of Indian status and with respect to the number of children in care as compared with the number of individuals worked with, the percentage is the same, 45 per cent.

In my view the branch should be making a contribution toward the cost of the welfare work which is being done by the territorial government. Otherwise that government is circumscribed. Its revenues permit it to go only so far in welfare work. It simply does not have the funds to even bring its welfare efforts up to standards comparable with those that exist in the provinces to the south. I should be very grateful if the minister would answer these several questions.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, during the discussion on the resolution, I suggested that education was one of the principal factors in bringing about an improvement in the economic conditions in which our Indian people find themselves. I stressed particularly the need for scholarships. The minister at one point made the statement that the government has in operation a program of scholarships for Indian students which includes girls entering the nursing profession. Will the minister indicate to what extent this program has been implemented, how many scholarships have been awarded to Indian pupils during the past year—if she has these figures —and particularly the number awarded to girls going into training in a hospital school of nursing and the amount of these scholarships? I would be particularly interested to know if any scholarship has been awarded to any young pupil from northwestern Ontario and more particularly in the district of Thunder Bay.

The minister did make some statements with regard to vocational training. This is an important matter which perhaps exceeds in importance even the need for higher learning, so far as young Indians are concerned. I should like to know if there is anything in the estimates of the department to provide for the establishment of vocational training for young Indians in the district of Thunder Bay and more particularly in the lakehead cities of Fort William and Port Arthur.

These are some of the questions on which I should like to hear the minister's comment. The hon. lady has been very generous in her remarks and answers. I do not wish to repeat all that has been said during the discussion. I believe the minister has been very explicit with respect to some points brought out but the questions of scholarships and vocational training are of great importance to me and to the district in which I live. I hope the minister will be in a position to give these answers particularly with respect to the amount involved in these scholarships.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, it is not very often that I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Skeena, but he did comment on a facet of Indian affairs this morning that I should like to touch on as well, and I can do no better to emphasize what the hon. member has said than by quoting from what an hon. member said in the other place. I have to read two paragraphs to make it clear. I am quoting from page 349 of Hansard of the Senate:

> Canada may be justifiably proud of her record in her dealings with the Indians. Her record is not spotless, of course, but it is the cleanest in the world. A foremost authority on Indians pays tribute to the Canadian record when he says, "It means much that there is one commonwealth in the western world—there is only one—which from beginning to end has shown moral integrity in dealing with Indians and has kept the faith." It is to Canada that this authority refers.
> Honourable Senators, this is probably higher praise than we non-Indian Canadians deserve. Canada has in the past made mistakes in dealing with our Indian population,—

And this, Mr. Chairman, is the part of the hon. senator's remarks that I should like to emphasize:

> —in that our paternalistic attitude and laws have taken from the Indian his self-sufficiency and independence.

Mr. Howard: May I ask the hon. member a question? I just did not get whom he was quoting.

Mr. Speakman: An hon. member of the other place.

Mr. Howard: Name, please.

Mr. Speakman: Honourable Senator Fergusson.

I have several matters which have not been raised during the discussion of this item which I should like to raise now. One is a matter of very great concern certainly in the district from which I come, which I have the honour to represent and which has a fairly large and quite prosperous Indian population. I refer to the constant sale of spirituous liquor to Indians, which is contrary to the law. I have taken this matter up with the Department of Justice on several occasions, because it is the Department of Justice which, through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, is responsible for the police supervision. I would suggest that in addition to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Indian constables with the power to arrest be appointed, because these are the people who are best known to the Indians on the reserves and they are the people who would best be able to guide them. We have an infestation—and I call it that—of both white and breed people on the fringes of our reserves who make their living by selling liquor to Indians. I would also suggest to the government that the penalty for such offence be increased very materially, because this is very serious indeed and leads to a serious impairment of the morals of our younger Indians.

I should also like to ask the minister whether she could provide more technical training for our Indian students? By this I do not mean reserve or separate schools of any nature. I should like to see our brighter Indian students given the opportunity to attend existing and proposed technical and vocational schools and be taken into those schools. We have excellent schooling facilities for our Indians up to a point in the province of Alberta, and I am particularly proud that on the reservations in my constituency we have one of the finest Indian schools in Canada, which is run by one of the churches; but I think this matter of further training, and particularly trades training, is important, because our Indians are getting closer and closer to assuming equal status with the non-Indians, and I think they must be in a position to stand on their own feet when they do eventually assume this status.

I must compliment the minister and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the duty of whose department it is to maintain the Indian health services. I think this is one of the finest improvements that has taken place in Canada over the years. The health of our Indian population has improved and continues to improve because of the increasingly better medical and hospital facilities provided. I should like to suggest that the Indian reserves should be provided with welfare people distinctly for themselves and not those who are dealing with the whole population. I am quite sure that within a very short time such workers may be found amongst the Indians themselves. I think our Indians are entitled to all federal welfare services comparable with those enjoyed by the non-Indians. I feel there are some deficiencies in this regard.

As I said before, the Indians in my district are prosperous. They have very rich producing oil wells on their reserve which are bringing them in a major income. They are ambitious; they are good farmers and they want to expand their farming operations. I suggest to the government that credit facilities, outside of band funds, which are available to non-Indians be made available to Indians. I am thinking of such facilities as the Farm Credit Corporation, the industrial credit corporation, the National Housing Act and so forth. Housing is being provided now by the government and from band funds.

The housing for Indians is excellent in my constituency. They are almost completely housed in new dwellings. They are getting electric power. With the expansion of credit facilities they would be able to put in water and plumbing, modernize their homes and get telephone service, things which we non-Indians take for granted, things which they have been very slow to acquire. With additional credit facilities they would very quickly instal these services and move one step closer to complete equality with their white Canadian brothers.

I should like to bring one other matter to the attention of the minister and ask her officials to take it into consideration. I refer to the matter of traffic speed in the village of Hobbema. Up until a few years ago the provincial department of highways provided restricted speed signs on the two approaches to the village on No. 2 Alberta highway. However, they removed those signs and made the statement that the responsibility belonged to the federal authority. I ask the minister and her officials to consider the installation of traffic lights at the two approaches through this hamlet because over the past several years we have had several very tragic highway deaths there.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to express my appreciation to the minister and also to the officials of her department of the assistance which they have given me at all times in my own area, especially during many trying times.

At this time I should like to bring to the attention of the department a matter which I believe is of importance. About a year ago through a resolution a contract was made with the Emerald Christmas Tree Company Limited in my area, and the Columbia lake Indian reserve No. 3.

This contract was made for a 30-year period. I just cannot quite visualize, Mr. Chairman, a contract being made for that length of time. I believe some advice as to the contract should have been given to the band concerned before it was signed. I believe it is part of the functions of the department to advise bands as to which way they are going and particularly with respect to a long term contract. I also believe that any business would hesitate before entering into a 30-year contract, particularly a new contract being made for the first time. This was the first time that this had occurred in my area, and in my opinion we should take some action in this matter.

Shortly after the contract was signed I was advised that the contract itself did not come before the council. It was signed by the chief of the band, something which I have confirmed with the department. I have a copy of the resolution here and also a copy of the contract. It was very unfortunate that the resolution was presented to the chief of the band at a time when he had just returned home from hospital and was recovering from a serious stroke. I do not believe it should have been presented to him at that time without witnesses being there representing the department or representing a group in the area interested in the affairs of the band.

The Christmas tree business is a highly competitive one. It is not a business that can be picked up on the spur of the moment by anyone and I believe that the opportunity should have been advertised so that all Christmas tree companies in the area would have had a chance to bid before a contract was signed with any individual company.

I have here a copy of a letter I have received from the department which reads in part as follows:

The company has until April 30, 1960, to submit a report on the first year's operation—

I should like to reiterate that this was the first year of operation after the signing of the contract. I am not sure as to the exact date of signing.

—at which time a meeting with all concerned is proposed to discuss and iron out any difficulties encountered. The manager of the company has been away recently but, on his return, all problems will be fully discussed—

I am not criticizing the local officials of the department but at the same time I think a 30-year contract is beyond all reason. At the request of the council I met the Indians in September of last year. I met the band chief and also 20 other members of the band at which time the chief told me in the presence of the band members that he did not sign the resolution and that he also had no knowledge of any portion of the contract. He said that one sheet of paper was presented to him and that he did not sign it. I have recently confirmed that at a time when he was just getting over his illness he apparently did sign it and possibly did not know what he was signing.

There has been a certain amount of trouble in the past season with respect to Christmas trees in that area and I believe owing to the efficiency of the local officials the matter has been straightened out to some extent. Certainly there is a feeling developing in the area against a contract of this nature. I think the department would be well advised to look into the matter very carefully and take into consideration all the facts with respect to operations in the past year. I sincerely hope they will shortly have a report on the operations during the past winter, and I believe that the matter should be given some consideration because of the competition that is developing in the Christmas tree business.

There is one other point I should like to bring to the attention of the department. I should like to suggest that five members representing the Indian bands of Canada from districts which can be designated at some future time should be elected to the House of Commons so that they themselves can bring their difficulties directly to the floor of the House of Commons. We have already made a start during the regime of the present government by the appointment of an Indian to the other place. It appears to me to be ridiculous that hon. members should bring the difficulties of the Indians to the floor of the House of Commons when they, the Indians, are more familiar with their problems than any other group in Canada.

[Mr. McFarlane.]

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I simply want to refer to a few items that are of concern to the people of our area where, as the minister knows, we have quite a substantial Indian population. We have four rather large Indian residential schools, all of which have required expansion. I think the minister will be very glad to know that she can expect from me today many more bouquets than brickbats. Our experience with the progressive developments made by the department has been a very good one during the past year. I saw the McIntosh school recently and the magnificent new addition there. The staff there are extremely pleased with their plant. The school offers a good practical training in home economics, woodworking and so on and is really a most excellent operation that cannot be bettered in other schools anywhere else in the country.

I want to remind the minister that in the Sioux Lookout and Dryden areas there are still a very substantial number of children living in the country northward for whom there is no accommodation at any of our schools in those areas. The schools are all too crowded. Neither location is asking for a school to be located there. Therefore I am satisfied that when the need is presented to me it is not based on any local enthusiasm for the construction of a building or school simply for its value to the community along commercial lines. I have written recently about the matter. I think it was brought up in debate here last year at which time it was said that an investigation would be made. Perhaps the minister has something to report in that regard.

I want to say one more thing about education. Recently I wrote to the department and pointed out that the trend that has been operative for quite a number of years now of trying to increase the number of day schools and thus avoid the separation of families is in my opinion a very worth-while development. I referred to one school where there seemed to be the kind of staff likely to provide good training in the practical arts and talents of home economics for the girls and woodworking and machine shop practice for the boys. I think these facilities are available in all four of our residential schools. I know it is hard to get staff but it would seem unfortunate if in developing the day school system we have schools where such courses could be given and are not available. I think that these facilities should be provided where possible.

A good example is Whitefish Bay. The minister knows our area because she has been a welcome visitor there. Whitefish Bay is situated midway between Fort Frances and Kenora. Because of the tourist industry there are probably 200 licensed camps in that area and I do not know of any Indian band that has had more social contacts and social contacts with our white race of a very pleasant nature than the band there.

You know how guides, in particular, fraternize with those whom they are guiding and how friendly they become. The guests we have are mostly people from the United States. Great numbers of them are from the very highest business and other levels with experience in so many walks of life. This has been a wonderful thing for all people in our area. These people from the United States like the Indians immensely and treat them in an exceptionally fine manner. However, the school in that area does not provide practical training. These Indians are not going to be able to follow up this very desirable social inclination they have by getting employment in technical and other good occupations if they are not given something more than reading and writing at the day school. I would be sorry if these families had to be separated in order that some children might attend the residential schools to attain practical vocational skills.

I am very delighted with the progress that has been made during the last 12 months on the economic opportunity side. I know that this has been the result of a long term program given a push under the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the former minister Mr. Harris as well as the present minister. I know the present minister will agree that it is good to see some progress here. It is difficult to get the trained staff necessary to supervise some of these industrial aspects. I know that at Lac Seul in the last couple of years we have had timber cutting supervised right on the reserve during the winter months. This has provided employment for as many as 60 Indians, and instead of working for outsiders they are actually operating on the reserve under their supervisor. It has been a very successful operation. As long as it proves successful and economic, as I believe it has, I am very glad to find that the department decided not to put the area out for competitive bids to outside white contractors who would simply be employers of the Indians on these Indian lands.

I know that there are now being made available in areas like this department financed saw mills which are provided out of such appropriations as we are voting here today. I should like a little more information as to the utilization of the revolving loan fund. Within the past 12 months what volume of lending has been done from this fund which, I believe, amounts basically to a half million dollars? We understand the way in which revolving fund loans are made and payments are expected.

I should like to refer now to commercial fishing. I commend the minister and her officials upon the fact that during the past 12 months there has been a considerable increase in filleting machinery that has been made available, provision for ice and so on. I hope this will mean that from now on the waste products in connection with the fish catch will be left in the north and the Indian will not have to pay the high costs of air transportation of these non-edible products down to the railhead. This should result in a higher return for the fish catch. I observe that some progress is being made by the department. I know the department is handicapped in some areas because the Indians must get a provincial licence in order to obtain an adequate fishing area which will support the number of people in the band who have few other sources of livelihood but fishing. Some progress has been made with the provincial government, and I want to give credit where credit is due.

I think that last year's development in Ontario which resulted in giving the collection of wild rice exclusively to the Indians was a very desirable step. I know that in connection with fishing the department is attempting to make sure that the fish is not going to be sold by the Indian, through ignorance or otherwise, at less than the best market price. I believe a tender system is operated in this respect. In so far as the wild rice crop is concerned, which is an extremely valuable one, I wonder if the department is exercising some kind of check on the actual price being received by the Indians for this crop. We know that the consumer prices that prevailed before this became an Indian preserve were fairly high, and even on a wholesale selling basis before it found its ultimate market in Chicago.

I have already had correspondence with the minister which indicates that the provincial department of forestry is happy to recruit Indians for its summer junior forest ranger program. This is down in black and white. The department believes the Indians are really superior for this type of work which requires that they be mobile. They must jump from one forest fire threat to another, and so on. The provincial department recognizes that for a certain period of time the Indian finds himself able to live longer without permanent accommodation and without boredom than some of our young white people are able to do. I think this type of program should be extended for Indians' employment.

I wonder if the minister would just bring us up to date on the relief assistance scales that are now applicable with respect to payment both in cash and in kind for indigent Indians. I read last year that at least one of the Indian agencies has an Indian superintendent. I was wondering to what extent the department is finding that Indians are leaving school with a background of education adequate to meet some of the requirements for clerical positions and other of the better positions in the agencies from which they could advance to the superintendency, as this one Indian did. I believe it was at the Muskeg lake reserve in Saskatchewan. I was wondering in how many instances Indians attain senior positions in the agencies.

I indicated to the minister that I have found some difficulty with respect to the financial responsibility for children born of Indian women and white men where the white man is either known or unknown and, if known, is perhaps a transient. He has no record of residence in any one municipality which would indicate that he belongs to that municipality. I am speaking now really of neglected children under these circumstances. As I understand it, the children's aid society has to go to the courts and get an order naming the party or government responsible for the maintenance of this neglected child. As I understand it, our constitution does not make it possible for the courts, under any provincial welfare legislation to impose a liability on the federal government. The court is obliged to name a municipality as responsible for maintenance of the child of an unknown white father. I should like to have a statement if the minister is prepared to give us one.

I know this matter is bothering a great number of the municipalities which are extremely poor, particularly those in some sections of my riding. As the minister knows, some are in remote areas. I am thinking of the rural areas where really there is just a little bit of tree farming and pulpwood cutting and there are practically no taxable assets on which to build up for municipalities of this kind an assessment which will allow them to make many payments of this nature. The burden is heavier in our area than most because of the proximity of Indian bands and the fact that there is a greater number of these deserted Indian children.

This matter was brought very much to my attention by some of the childrens aid societies recently. As you know, Mr. Chairman, there are probably more people seeking to adopt healthy white children than there are children available. I refer to children without handicap and who are in every way normal. Unfortunately, however, out in our area I am told that a high percentage of the children who must be maintained for long periods of time by the children's aid society are of mixed blood and that they are not being placed so readily, particularly because our population of those seeking children is not large. The children of mixed parentage are a little bit different in appearance and somehow these children are just not taken to their hearts as quickly as are white children. This situation is proving to be a financial burden on the children's aid societies which, as you know, canvass in substantial part for voluntary givings in order to carry on their work.

It is the deserted Indian child, and particularly the Indian child of mixed blood, that is of great concern in our area in this province. We are a long distance from the big populations where prospective parents might be found in greater numbers. If we had more people nearby I am sure that the record would be a little bit better. I am also sure that if many of the prospective parents were not in the heavy population centres more than 1,000 miles away but actually on the scene to see these attractive children the situation would be different. But when they are obliged simply to correspond with respect to a child of this background they get only this description, and there is a tendency to lose interest.

The department is frank, and I think properly so. They are quite honest and frank about the description of the children they have. If it is obvious that they are Indian children or of mixed blood, I think the children's aid society tells a correspondent. As I say, the heart appeal of these children face to face not being seen, disinterest sets in. I think this matter would be something that would be of interest to our several children's aid societies for which it is a problem, and to the municipalities which are very much concerned about it.

I think I have been fairly complimentary so far but I wish to say this. Much and all as we appreciate the fact that after a number of years of assurances we are going to get a replacement residential school at Fort Frances for the 50 years old edifice that has been there, I hope that this experience can be looked upon as rather an example of how difficult it is to co-ordinate with the Department of Public Works in order to assure that some of this kind of work is made available in the winter time.

I tried valiantly, as everybody knows, before the winters of 1958-59, in 1959-60, and again last year very actively even a little bit as to the program for 1960-61, with regard to work on this project which I think was originally promised by the former minister in the spring of 1957. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate persuaded his colleagues that this building needed replacement but just this month we are calling for tenders. As the minister knows, in our part of the country unless you get your foundations, your piles down and so on down much earlier than in February, nothing is going to open up there until late spring. It is not only a matter of delay with respect to work but it is also matter of delay in the availability ultimately of school rooms or classrooms themselves. I think it was four years ago now that officials of the department said that the pipes, heating equipment and other things were so far gone that they were not worth replacement and they have been somewhat of a danger since then. However, as I say, we are pleased that tenders have been called.

However, I think this is in part the responsibility of the Department of Public Works. They tell me, of course, that they made plans and that they had to go back several times for revisions. I think there is some improvement in the Indians affairs branch though with respect to winter work. It has taken three or four years and a fair amount of agony, I suppose, in all places including those that see the matter from a point of view of constituencies. However, I know that a year ago there was not a single project that I had on the calendar that was forecast in our riding—not a single thing, including this one—for the winter 1959-60 where tenders were actually called in time for the work to be utilized in the winter works program.

I wish to share the views of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin who spoke so recently about the improvement that has taken place on the health scene. In the further remote areas I think there may be still quite a bit to do. We have a relatively new hospital established in Sioux Lookout. When I say "relatively new" I mean that it has been there for perhaps 12 or 13 years. For a number of years, while its rated capacity was 65 beds I think the average occupancy would be 130. So successful has this hospital been in this area—they have been dealing with the tuberculosis problem largely —that in a period of about ten years I think they are back again to the normal rate in so far as occupancy is concerned because the case load or the case need has gone down to that extent as a result of the work done in the last ten years.

I thank the minister for listening patiently to some of these problems. There is one which I should perhaps mention also—I have not brought my correspondence with me—and I refer to the Red Lake situation. The minister is well acquainted with it as is the director particularly. I know of the difficulties here. It is something that is normally part of the responsibility of the provincial ministers for education, housing and welfare. It is thus in large part normally, if it is an off-reserve problem, something that is the responsibility of the province of Ontario. In fact, the province of Ontario is a little bit jealous with regard to maintaining secure its responsibility for health matters and education matters. But this matter has been really of such a deplorable nature in this area that it has received the attention of professional health specialists, anthropologists and others who have gone up there. The minister is familiar with the Morris report. I sent to her the recent report of the district officer of health, Dr. Langford. The last word was that a further attempt would be made to see the provincial government authorities to determine whether something could be done. In my opinion the first thing that has to be tackled there is housing. These shacks are not fit for human habitation. I thought—I think this was before the minister's time—that when we raised such a rumpus about this matter certain amendments were made to the regulations with respect to housing loans that would permit the department to make off-reserve housing loans.

I was given to understand that the whole purpose of making these amendments about four years ago was so that this particular situation might be taken on in part by the department of Indian affairs as a pilot project. I have always called it a bridge project, meaning some responsibility being assured by the department in the period when Indians living on the reserve take a step forward, leave the reserve and start to live alongside the white man.

I thought the department just could not so promptly wash its hands completely of responsibility for Indians who have no security in employment, just because technically they had left the reserve to see how they would get along economically in the white man's territory. This has been a long standing cancer in the Red Lake area; there has been practically no progress on any side.

I was very disappointed when told a year or so ago that this new regulation, contrary to what I thought it was designed to achieve, was not going to be invoked for this purpose. I was told that we should go to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and try to get them to take on the responsibility for housing here. This is not practicable, as the minister knows. The minister knows the standards of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That is not the next stage of improved housing for these Indians, from a shack, pictures of which the minister has seen. The minister knows that the next step is not even a minimum standards house under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regulations.

I went to the municipality last fall and suggested that they adopt a land assembly plan. I did my best to see whether I could take advantage of the opportunities afforded under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They have pretty high rates of interest now, but they are lower than the standard rates of interest if it is a non-profit type of housing development being authorized and sponsored by a municipality. I thought that perhaps they could help in this regard. However, I was told by the reeve and others —and I saw his point—that they could not sponsor a housing scheme in a municipality where the housing scheme was discriminatory; that is, when it was designed for a certain class of people.

He said, "If we open up a subdivision over in what is called Tomahawk village, with the idea that it will be to improve the housing of Indians who have lived there for some while under these deplorable conditions, and if we develop that into lots, we cannot say it must be restricted to those who are living there now". I rather saw his point.

I tried something else in the meantime. I tried to persuade the service clubs in the area to create a pilot housing scheme of small units similar to the type of housing scheme which had been developed, as the minister knows, by service clubs, legions and other well-intentioned community organizations, I think largely for the aged in the past. I think in the Hamilton area we had one of the first of these schemes, the Burlington scheme. However, I do not think this is going to be seized upon because the white population is very small and service clubs usually have a membership of not over 25, or something like that.

I still think that where there is a will there is a way and I would hope that in connection with education and this housing problem another look will be given at the matter and another attempt will be made to try and do something in co-operation with the provinces, which are admittedly in this field.

I just do not see too much prospect of help from the municipalities in this regard. As a matter of fact, I think the program has had municipal status for only one and one-half or two years. So I think the situation, unfortunately, is just as bad as it was when originally talked about four or five years ago.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I have accumulated quite a few questions here. Perhaps it would be well if I handled some of those that have come up to this stage of the discussion. The hon. member for Yukon asked a number of questions. I do not think I can answer them all from information which is available in this committee at this time, but I can assure him that those questions I cannot answer right now will be the subject of a report to him at the earliest possible moment.

With reference to the placement officer, the one mentioned in my statement with reference to Prince George is not the one that is being selected this week, we hope, by the board of selection. That matter will be processed just as quickly as possible. The establishment for Prince George is in the current estimates and of course we cannot proceed until the estimates are passed.

With reference to the grubstaking of trappers, I mentioned this yesterday in my introductory statement. The hon. member asked whether this scheme could be extended to prospectors. The answer is yes, it could be. I might also tell him that funds are available for any trapper who wishes to apply under this allotment.

With reference to the establishment of reserves in the Yukon, the hon. member will know that the lands in the Yukon, while not formally classified as reserves, are classified as areas reserved for Indians. This applies to both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Of course, they are not reserves within the meaning of the Indian Act but they are areas reserved for the use of Indians. There are some 15 of them in the Yukon and 10 in the Northwest Territories.

The hon. member asked me a question with reference to houses. In the year 1959-60 there were 22 built in the Yukon having a total value of $52,165. In 1960-61 there were 15 built, having a total value of $45,000. The information we have on hand does not go back to 1957, which I believe is the year about which the hon. member asked.

The hon. member asked a question with reference to the amount expended on Indian education in the Yukon. The amount, which he will find in the report of the department for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, was $1,291,883.02. I believe he asked for that figure to be broken down further, but we do not have those figures here. We will be glad to supply that information to him at a future date.

With reference to on the job training, there are facilities for both boys and girls to receive this type of training. I do not believe we have experimented to date with off-training such as he suggested with equipment which is idle. We do make facilities available for any boy or girl who has a bent in a given direction, and where we can place them with employers, we do so.

For instance, the Department of National Health and Welfare are training nurses' aids constantly in their hospitals. With regard to such other training as is available to girls, the door is open for them to take advantage of any opportunities that are available. If we have specific cases and specific individuals we are glad to try and place them in jobs with the co-operation of the employers where they can learn a useful trade.

Some of the information which my hon. friend asked for with relation to the Yukon I believe was given in a general way in my statement yesterday but, of course, not broken down into regions. We shall be glad to furnish whatever information he requires, as I said before.

We will certainly look into the matter of school attendance and its effect on family allowances. I think possibly the answer would be to have the reports of the school superintendent channelled through the Indian superintendent for investigation but this is a matter we will definitely look into. We will also look into the case of Rosemary Lowe as soon as we receive the letter the hon. gentlemant promised to write us.

I can tell the hon. member that the Dawson freezer is ordered and should be forthcoming within a reasonable length of time.

The hon. member asked for figures on health and welfare extended to Indians. We do not have this information. This matter comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare. We could secure it for the hon. gentleman but perhaps he would like to ask his question of my colleague when the estimates of his department come up.

Mr. Nielsen: Before the hon. lady proceeds I have one question with respect to the land set aside for the use of Indians. I was not concerned with the technical description of what was and was not a reserve. I was concerned about the fact that the Yukon Indian people have never been compensated as have the other Indian people in Canada for the taking over of their lands. I say "their lands" in the sense that they were there first. I was not thinking of a technical description but intended to ask what are the plans for compensating the Yukon Indian people on the same basis as Indian people in the rest of Canada were compensated either by way of land which they can call their own in perpetuity so they can take part in the revenue from resource developments such as was mentioned by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin or, if not land that they can call their own in perpetuity, what arrangement does the branch intend to make for something in lieu of land in perpetuity?

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course, Mr. Chairman, these are problems that are brought up from time to time. We have no specific plans at the moment. These are matters that are discussed with the territorial authorities from time to time. All Indians are not on reserves for which compensation has been arranged by way of treaty. It is only where there have been treaties fulfilled by the Indians and the federal authorities that any arrangement can be made with reference to the matters my hon. friend has raised. If there is any further information on that we will be glad to procure it for the hon. gentleman but as I say most of these things are matters of discussion from time to time and have not reached the stage yet where we could say that any particular plan is under consideration.

Mr. Nielsen: I can say right away to the minister that there are no treaty Indian people in the Yukon territory. I am wondering if the minister could ask her officials to direct their attention to designing a treaty or something that will give the Indian people the rights which have been enjoyed for many years by other Indian people in Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that if there is no treaty there is no basis for the establishment of those rights. I believe I am correct in saying that. If my hon. friend wishes to explore the question further we will be glad to go into a full discussion of the matter with him.

I understood the hon. member to say that there is no old age assistance in the Yukon. It is my understanding that there is.

Mr. Nielsen: Not for the Indian people.

Mrs. Fairclough: I understand there is, yes. There is no supplementary assistance, that is assistance supplementary to the old age security payments, but I am informed that there is old age assistance available to Yukon Indian people. In so far as supplementary payments—payments supplementary to old age security—are concerned, we have made representations to the council and this is a matter that is under discussion at the present time.

I hope my hon. friend will not be too disappointed if I have not answered completely all of the questions he asked but, frankly, they came so fast that even with my officials and I all taking notes we were unable to get them all down. We will make sure that the hon. member receives complete answers to them within a reasonable length of time.

The hon. member for Fort William asked a question with reference to scholarships. In particular, he asked about nurses. These figures which I shall give are not entirely relevant to scholarships but refer to professional and vocational assistance. In nurses' training, there are 25 young women now receiving assistance for tuition and there are 22 serving as nurses' aides. I gave the figures and the amounts involved yesterday with reference to the scholarships which were earned in the various classifications. The hon. member asked about scholarships with respect to northern Ontario. In the year 1959-60 there were two and in the year 1960-61 there was one. I cannot say for sure whether any of these pupils came from Thunder Bay district, but I do not think so.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin made several suggestions which we will certainly look into particularly with regard to technical training. When the hon. member referred to welfare workers I presumed that he meant trained social workers. No doubt the hon. member knows this is quite a problem. Even if we made provision in the estimates for social welfare workers right across Canada we could not secure them because there is a great shortage of these workers in Canada. What we are trying to do now is make arrangements with the provincial authorities to co-operate with them and to take advantage of their social workers to work in the various Indian localities.

We think that will probably be more successful than trying to place a worker, let us say, on every reserve, or every group of reserves. I am sure that will work out but it is a long range project and as I said it depends to a large extent on the number of workers that even the provinces can provide because of the shortage in this profession.

Mr. Speakman: If the minister would not mind my interrupting her at this stage, that is just the point I made. The provincial welfare workers devote themselves rather exclusively to the non-Indians to the detriment of the Indian requirement.

Mrs. Fairclough: I see. That may be because we had not made a contract with them. We intend to explore this right across the country.

The hon. member asked about the revolving funds. I might tell him that these are available for individual enterprise in practically every field.

The hon. member for Kootenay East raised a question which I must say was new to us. The hon. member referred to the question of the Christmas tree contract at Columbia lake. We will certainly look into it. These contracts are not made without the sanction of the band council and without a proper resolution being passed by the band council. I have not heard of one being made where the chief's signature was sufficient without some supporting evidence of the desire of the band to participate but we will certainly look into the complaint which the hon. member registered on their behalf and find out precisely what are the circumstances.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River brought up several problems.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could explain that the hon. member was called out of the chamber and he hopes to be back shortly.

Mrs. Fairclough: In any event I will make these explanations and the hon. member will have a record of them. With reference to Sioux Lookout there is an appropriation being asked for in the current estimates to provide a new gymnasium for the school there.

The hon. member asked about the utilization of the revolving loan fund. I can tell him that from April 1 to November 30, 1960 there were 97 loans approved of which 65 were for agriculture, 14 for fishing, 5 were miscellaneous, 2 were for timber and 11 for vehicles. The hon. member mentioned a total authorized amount of $500,000, but it is actually $1 million. Although the approved loans have totalled over $500,000—some $547,800—there are at the present time outstanding loans numbering 578 in the amount of $498,790.

I can reassure the hon. member on the matter of the sale of wild rice and the supervision exercised by the department over the concession of picking rice and the assistance given in connection with harvesting. The department arranges for the marketing of the production by tender and makes sure that a fair market price is obtained by the Indians for their crop.

The hon. member also asked me a question with reference to the education of Indian children and those for whom no education is now provided. We find that in January, 1959 the agency returns showed that 1,735 Indian children between the ages of seven and 16 were not provided with education. However, in the following year, 1960, the number had decreased to 1,503. In other words, it had decreased by about 13.4 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are those the children who are either on reserves or with the bands, or does that figure include Indian children living in places such as Red Lake?

Mrs. Fairclough: That would include children of families which are nomadic and, probably, children in some small communities where no educational facilities are available. It is unfortunate, but the majority of these children reside in northern Ontario and Quebec. These are the children with whom we are primarily concerned at the present time, because it is a challenge to the department that there should be even this number of children for whom no educational facilities are available. However, at the present time 90 per cent of the children of school age are in schools and the total number, as the hon. member will realize, has diminished rapidly in one year. I hope that when the figures are available for this year we shall find that a similar decrease has taken place.

I was asked to say a word about Indians in senior positions; those who had come up from the reserves and achieved senior positions in the department. Those who are either superintendents or assistant superintendents on the field staff, number 15. There are also 11 in clerical and administrative posts on the field staff. Perhaps I might give the committee the other figures, because they are interesting. I do not remember whether I gave them earlier today or not, but I will repeat them, if I did. In addition, there are 37 caretakers, 11 stenographers and typists and 21 in other categories. And, as I said earlier, there are 123 teachers. This brings the total to 255, the figure I quoted earlier.

Mr. Benidickson: Those are very interesting figures but, of course, they have to be related to something. I was wondering if the minister could indicate whether there has been some advance in this particular respect? Could she, perhaps, indicate what percentage relationship they bear to the total staff in the categories listed? Second, would the hon. lady be able to say how this situation compares to the situation a year ago? If she does not have that information now, perhaps the committee could have it at another time.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is a little better than 10 per cent. I am afraid I have no comparison to give for previous years.

I was interested in the hon. member's allusions to the good intentions of the former minister with regard to Fort Frances. I am sure the hon. gentleman's intentions were good, as they always were in this department, but one of the things he neglected to do in 1957 was to make any allowance for the Fort Frances school in the estimates of that year. Consequently it is only this year we are making that allowance. We started with an appropriation of $150,000 with $720,000 planned for next year. We hope we can replace this school, which is certainly not our pride and joy.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister had promised me in the spring of 1957, at the end of the fiscal year, that the planning would commence immediately in connection with this school, and I am sure the planning did commence, even under the new government. There has been a delay in getting the work under way.

Mrs. Fairclough: I hardly think that on reflection the hon. member would say there has been too much delay, because he knows from his experience in government that these things sometimes take a good deal of time. One has to allow for plans to be drawn up and approved by the various departments of government which are concerned with building—so much has to be done before the stage is reached at which tenders can be called. Even when tenders have been called we sometimes encounter delays, but we hope to get on with this particular project this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether the Fort Frances school was part of the billion dollar program announced at the beginning of February, 1958?

Mrs. Fairclough: At the beginning of February, 1958 I was not charged with responsibility for this department, so that is knowledge which is beyond my ken.

With reference to Red Lake I should tell the hon. member that we are very concerned about the situation there. Within the course of a very short time—a week or two—I think we shall begin a conference with the Ontario municipal affairs department to see what can be done with respect to this deplorable situation.

Some comment was made by the hon. member with reference to child welfare problems and I should like to say at the outset that we are very grateful for the co-operation we have received from the children's aid society in the matter of the care of Indian children. Partly as a result of one case in the Fort Frances agency which the hon. gentleman has discussed with us, and partly because of a few other cases where circumstances were somewhat similar, the department is now authorized to provide educational and welfare assistance as a humanitarian measure to children of Indian origin in residence on the reserve in addition to other categories described in my announcement to the house on April 8, 1960. Principally, these benefits are extended to women of Indian origin who have lost Indian status through enfranchisement or marriage and who have no alternative but to return to friends or relatives on the reserves for various reasons such as the death of a husband or serious illness in the family.

Before this time there had been no satisfactory means of providing essential welfare and educational help to these women and their children. This government therefore decided on humanitarian grounds that educational and welfare assistance should be granted to these people on reserves in the same manner and to the same extent as if they had retained Indian status. We hope this will solve particularly vexatious problems of which my hon. friend is well aware.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting here in comfort waiting for the estimates of the national gallery and hoping to cause the minister to be uncomfortable later. However, I want to take this opportunity to make a few remarks that are related to remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Skeena with respect to that order in council which made it necessary to return land in Indian reserves in British Columbia and any cash that was left in the band or tribe funds. I have suggested on a number of occasions before that this cash should be used to erect a memorial to the Arrow lake band which has now become extinct, the last member dying in 1955. I rose to ask the minister this question. Has the department returned the cash balance in the Arrow lake Indian band fund to the province of British Columbia?

Mrs. Fairclough: The answer to that is yes.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks before the first item of these estimates is approved. This question is of great interest to me because there are a number of Indian bands scattered around in the riding of Chapleau which I have the honour to represent in the house. First, I should like to join with other members in thanking the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for the very kind co-operation I have always had from her department and I should also like to thank the officials of the department.

(Translation):

I should like to go on in French because in my area young Indians who have been attending school for a few years receive their education in French.

In fact, even though those young Indians did not have the opportunity of learning French before entering school, they are nevertheless able to follow the curriculum of the province of Quebec. Most of them spoke only English before coming to school, but they learn French very fast and they get along very well.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

I should like now to deal with the young Indians attending the St. Marc de Figuery school located about ten miles south of Amos. These young pupils come from all parts of the area, since it is a boarding school. The Oblate Fathers who operate the school are doing excellent work, not only in this particular place but wherever there are Indians in my riding.

There is also a special problem concerning the Indian families living in Abitibi, as most of them, during the last few years, have chosen to settle in or in the immediate vicinity of the towns of Amos, La Sarre and Senneterre; others intend to do likewise in the future. Already some have moved into Chapais and Chibougamau, near Waswanipi lake, Mistassini lake, and even Mattagami lake, site of the proposed railway line provided by the bill discussed a few days ago.

The migration of Indians toward organized areas is explained by the fact that the trapper and his family can no longer make a decent living out of trapping.

They also know that closer to towns they have a better chance of getting proper hospital and medical attention and that their children are closer to schools.

As for the town of Amos particularly, the 40 families who settled there live in overcrowded and often unsanitary dwellings.

That is why last year, the delegates of the Abitibi Indian band, better known as the Dominion Abitibi band, appeared before the Indian affairs committee and asked the Indian affairs branch to build as an original project at least 30 houses to permanently accommodate an equivalent number of families; the project was to be carried out on the Leclerc farm, bought for that purpose a few years ago and surveyed and subdivided in 1959.

I even believe that in 1960 some preparatory work was carried out by the Indian affairs branch, with regard to the building of those houses.

In my humble opinion, those houses should be supplied with modern sanitary equipment and the cost of sewer and plumbing could be paid from the available funds of the Abitibi reservation.

I hope the minister will be able to tell us, when she takes the floor, how soon this program involving the Abitibi Indian band may be carried out.

(Text):

I was just mentioning in my remarks that there is a project near Amos for the Abitibi Dominion band on a piece of property that was bought for them a few years ago. It is a housing project and last year before the committee it was requested by the delegates from the Abitibi Dominion band. I wonder whether the hon. lady could tell the house a little later if this housing project for the Abitibi Dominion band will be carried out.

As is the usual procedure, of course, these houses will have to be supplied with modern heating equipment. It was suggested last year before the committee that the cost of the water works and sewage disposal system could be paid out of the band fund. Although this band is not a very rich one, nevertheless its members are willing to co-operate and do their share.

There are various other housing projects that are also urgently needed by other bands in the large territory included in my riding. I will give the names of the bands quickly. I am referring to the Mistassini band, the Waswanipi band, the Eastmain band and the bands at Rupert House Obedjiwan and also Manowan. As far as Obedjiwan and Manowan are concerned, housing projects have already been started there.

Of course, all these different projects throughout Canada cannot be carried out simultaneously. However, considering the amount of money that is made available from year to year I know that a big effort has been made toward accomplishing these different projects in recent years and the department and the minister particularly are to be congratulated. Taking into account the amount of money made available, I think a very good job has been done.

So far as education is concerned, more has been done in recent years than was the case some years ago. I think that education has to come first and that it will certainly help integration with the white communities across Canada.

I was glad to read a statement by the hon. lady the other day that the only solution to the Indian problem across Canada is integration as soon as possible. I really believe that is so. The Indians in my area have only been in touch with the white man for a few years. We have just a few reserves and most of the Indians there have only come in contact with civilization recently. I believe that with education available to their children the possibility will be greater of integrating them with the white population.

I should like to relate something that was said to me by Mr. Kistabish of La Sarre, Quebec, a well known and respected Indian. He said to me: "Your education program for Indians is quite all right but what happens? We send our children to the school and when they come back from school they are not educated enough to work for the white man and they are no good as Indians any more because they do not know how to trap. They no longer know how to operate in the bush." These young Indians go to school and graduate about the age of 16. They are not sufficiently educated to be able to compete with the white children of their own age in obtaining employment. On the other hand they are no longer able to follow the pursuits of their Indian fathers in fishing, trapping and so on. They have lost their natural skills during the years they have attended school.

I believe, therefore, that the employment officers who are doing their best to find jobs for these young Indians should take into consideration their lack of education and should try to find employment for them as soon as possible so that they will not become discouraged and return to the reserve.

In so far as income and relief are concerned, I should like to make a few suggestions. Since as I have just explained the Indian does not have sufficient education to compete with the skilled worker, the only kind of employment open to him in my area is often irregular and of a temporary nature. For instance, in the Abitibi district an Indian can find employment as a hunting and fishing guide for 15 to 30 days a year. He might find a job as a helper for a prospector or staking mining claims, depending upon whether there is any mining activity in the area. He can sometimes find a job as a lumberman for three or four months during the wintertime. This illustrates the problem. The older generation, of course, has even more difficulty in finding employment. It is hoped that the younger generation that is being educated now will have a better chance to compete. When these children come out of school we should be careful to make sure they do not become discouraged because, as I have said, they are not sufficiently well educated to compete with the white children.

In so far as the relief system is concerned, it was suggested that the system could be improved. It was suggested also to the committee last year that the amount of relief payments could be increased. This is a rather difficult problem in certain cases, as the minister well knows, because many people who have been away from the reserve for some time come back to live on the reserve when they are unemployed.

Before I resume my seat, I should like to mention a few other points that were presented to the committee last year. I do not want to take too much of the time of this committee, but there were a number of briefs presented to the joint committee last year by the Quebec bands. There is a list of the briefs presented by these bands in the minutes and proceedings of the joint committee for Wednesday, May 4, 1960. I should like to make a brief reference to this list. There was a brief presented by the Eastmain band, Eastmain, Quebec. This is on the Quebec side of James bay, but it is in my riding. The brief was dated December 29, 1959. There was another brief presented by the Obedjiwan band, via Oskelaneo river, Abitibi east district. It is dated September, 1959. There was one presented by the Mistassini band, and it is dated August 24, 1959. The next one was presented by the northern citizens guidance association, and that is the one to which I should like to make a special reference. The different briefs that were presented by these bands will receive the careful consideration of the committee and exhibit the interest of the different Indian bands across the country in the committee.

I should like to read one section of the brief that was presented by the northern citizens guidance association, a group that is working for the improvement of the lot of the Indian in northern Quebec. This brief reads, in part, as follows:

> Another matter of importance raised was the question of hostels for Indian children. The N.C.G.A. is in favour of the La Tuque plan provided it offers in the end permanent type employment to the future Indian labour force. Experience has taught us that seasonal employment is not the answer, nor ever will be. There are far too many negative sociological aspects involved. We understand that the La Tuque plan, commendable as it is, will not by any stretch of the imagination take care of the total number of available children. Our organization has therefore put on record a request that hostels be built in towns like Chibougamau, Chapais, Schefferville and eventually Mattagami. In such places, Indian children could receive primary education within their own environment, and eventually as the development of these towns proceeds, training in high schools and technical schools. Their training would qualify them for permanent employment in the mining industry, commercial and other fields.
> Once again, it is emphasized that these offers of co-operation are coming from the industrial, educational and social leaders of northern Quebec mining communities. Will the opportunity be grasped by our federal government or will it be lost? Canadian citizens have been asked to develop a new consciousness towards their Indian brethren. We believe that we have done that here. We are willing to go all the way. But the next move is yours.
> We would hope that the joint committee of the commons and senate would study these proposals humbly submitted, and that out of its discussions an enlightened and rewarding policy will be adopted.

This brief was signed by Doris H. Scanlon, Mrs. James P. Scanlon, secretary treasurer.

[Mr. Martel.]

I only mention this brief because I should like to know from the minister whether the project at La Tuque has been completed. We heard in the committee last year that it was going ahead, and since some of the Indians in my territory would be going to that school, I should like to get the situation clarified.

I should like also to make one suggestion before I conclude. Last year the committee received a great deal of evidence from the different Indian bands across the country. Before the committee resumed its work this year an index and a classification of all the material was supposed to be prepared. I understand that the classification and indexing of this material has been carried out by the departmental officials. I do not want to cast any doubt on their capacity or to indicate that they would be prejudiced in any way, but I feel the job could be done by independent persons or an independent group. Perhaps we could get suggestions from this group as well, and then the committee could proceed at a little faster pace. I was a member of the committee myself last year and it would be an impossible task for each member to go through all the evidence that was brought before the committee. If we had an independent group look through the material and prepare a résumé I feel this would be of help not only to the department but also to the Indians and to the members of the committee. I shall now conclude my remarks because we will have other opportunities to discuss these different matters in detail, when the joint committee starts its work.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I just tell the hon. member for Chapleau that in so far as committee work is concerned, this matter is in the hands of the committee. As a matter of fact, it was the committee which asked the department to undertake this work. If the committee wishes someone other than the department to undertake it, they will have to make other arrangements.

Mr. Martel: I will make suggestions to the committee.

Mrs. Fairclough: With regard to the school, may I say that it is in the planning stage now. I cannot give my hon. friend a definite answer as to when this project will be proceeded with but we are planning at the moment to have something in next year's estimates.

Mr. McQuillan: I listened with a great deal of gratification last night to the minister's opening remarks and I was pleased with the emphasis placed on the educational program.

I think this branch is on the right track and that it should allow nothing to deviate it from that emphasis.

I was also interested in the remarks made about the vocational training program and the work of the placement officers. On several occasions I have made representations to the minister and her officials stressing the field in which placement officers could work on the coast of British Columbia and what they might accomplish in the way of placing more of the Indians in industry, particularly the logging industry. I myself have had a great deal of experience in hiring them and I have found them to be as satisfactory as is any other type of labour that has been available to us.

I believe that, through the acceptance of responsibility on the part of the Indians and on the part of some of the provincial governments, we are at long last reaching a point that we might call a break-through in connection with this problem of Indian affairs. It must be rather ironic sometimes for members of the staff of the Indian affairs branch to realize that the better the job they do, the sooner they are going to put themselves out of a job. I look forward to the day when the Indian affairs branch will be primarily concerned with over-all arrangements between the federal government and the provinces until such time as the Indians become completely integrated.

I was interested in listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Vancouver East in which they brought to the attention of the committee two cases in which they appeared to think there had been an injustice. I should like to take a few minutes in which to explain to the committee the situation that exists in British Columbia and which I do not think many hon. members fully appreciate.

We have something like the 1,620 reservations in British Columbia out of a total 2,200 in the whole of Canada. Most of these reservations are in the coastal area. Almost invariably they are at the mouths of valleys through which is to be found the only route of access to the hinterland. They in a sense completely block access to many industrial sites and to a great deal of our timber and mineral resources. So far there has not been too much difficulty about making arrangements for rights of way and in some cases, for leases for industrial purposes, and perhaps in a few cases for purchase of some of these lands which are in many cases not occupied. I do not know how many of the reservations on the coast are occupied but I know that the percentage must be small.

The hon. member for Skeena took a kind of roundhouse sling at the minister of highways in British Columbia. Of course that is a popular thing to do these days. I do it myself once in a while. However, the fact remains that this is a much greater problem in British Columbia than it is perhaps in any other province of Canada. I refer to the question of rights of way or what some people might refer to as trespass on Indian reserves. It is also quite often a problem in the development of timber and the establishment of pulp and paper mills and where the Indians have land that is in an area suitable for the establishment of such industry they have to be negotiated with. Sometimes it takes a long time to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion and get these industries under way. I sometimes think that perhaps there should be a slightly different policy with regard to dealing with Indian lands in British Columbia as compared with the rest of Canada. It should not be a policy of prejudice or a discriminatory policy but it should be a policy in keeping with a particular situation that exists there. I should think this matter could be given a good deal of thought on the part of the officials of the Indian affairs department and the minister.

In the report of the Indian affairs department I notice that it is stated that there are some 209 bands and 1,623 reservations in British Columbia. Those figures indicate the situation about which I have been speaking. I do not for one minute advocate that the Indians or the rights of the Indians should not be given the maximum consideration. However, I feel that perhaps some agency might be set up that would lead to easier negotiations or perhaps I should say quicker negotiations. Let us not say "easier negotiations" lest some people might interpret those words to mean cheaper rights of way on the part of those that seek them. I hope some consideration will be given to this problem.

Mr. Howard: I listened with interest to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni speak with respect to the land question. Before I deal with that matter, however, I wonder if I may at this stage, initially leave with the minister a question to be answered at her convenience. It relates to the question raised by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin with regard to the liquor situation. Can the minister indicate what is the present state of the resolution passed by certain independent band councils or Indian bands in British Columbia with respect to bringing section 96 (a) (ii) of the Indian Act into force in so far as these reserves are concerned. I posed a query to the minister some time ago on this matter and it was answered by way of a return. However, since that time I understand that subsequent developments have taken place and it would be interesting to know just what is the current state of affairs.

Before the one o'clock adjournment there was a considerable amount of discussion concerning the land question and extensive references were made to the McKenna-McBride agreement in 1912 and the royal commission which met for some three, four, or five years following 1912 and orders in council passed by both the federal government and the provincial government and the statutory endorsation of the action that was taken with respect to the land.

In so far as British Columbian Indians are concerned, I think this is perhaps the basic objection that exists and around which all these other things rotate, such as the McKenna-McBride agreement, the reversionary rights of the province, and so on. That is the state of affairs which exists, apart from an area in the Peace river district and a similar area on Vancouver island. I am not too clear on this, but I think those are the only two places where treaties as such exist, one with the crown—treaty No. 8, I believe—and another one with the Hudson's Bay Company dealing with the purchase of land in the early days.

Apart from these two there are no treaties in British Columbia which apply to the Indians in British Columbia, as we know treaties as they have been assigned to apply to Indians in other parts of the nation. The claim of the Indians of British Columbia, apart from these two treaties, is that their title and right to the land has never been extinguished. They claim that the McKenna-McBride agreement of 1912 was an invalid agreement because the provincial government and the federal government of that day were dealing with lands which were not the property of either government but were the property of the Indians, because their original title, ownership and occupation of the land had not been extinguished by war, sale, surrender, treaty or any other means except the encroachment of non-Indian people. This is the key point from which all these other objections flow.

As I understand it, the Indians of British Columbia have never accepted or recognized the McKenna-McBride agreement or the decisions which followed as a consequence of that agreement. Even the arrangement in 1926 to pay $100,000 in lieu of treaty money, as it were, while the money is used in British Columbia the Indian organizations that I know claim they have never given any official recognition to this $100,000 and have not accepted it as being in lieu of, payment for, or acceptable for the extinguishment of their title to this land. I think this is the key point which must be cleared up in so far as the native Indian people of that province are concerned.

There are a number of suggestions as to how this can be done. One is by a court decision such as was attempted in 1914, I understand, or offered by the federal government, with some strings attached, of course, that were objected to by the native Indian people.

Another alternative—and I think perhaps this is the way in which it should be approached initially—is an offer to negotiate, whether by the federal government, the provincial government or both in concert, a treaty with the Indians of British Columbia for the extinguishment of their title to this land.

I have here a copy of an order in council which the Prime Minister filed with the house on December 7, 1960. It is order in council P.C. 1959-799, approved on June 25, 1959. It establishes a committee of inquiry, as it were, consisting of Mr. Nelson, barrister of Prince Albert; Mr. Valentine of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources; Mr. L. L. Brown of the Indian affairs branch; and Mr. James Koe of the Fort McPherson band; and Mr. Baptiste Cazon of the Fort Simpson band. The funcitons of this commission are set out in the order in council. This has reference to the question raised earlier by the hon. member for Yukon. I will read briefly from the order in council:

(a) Whether the future economic and social welfare of the Indians—

This refers to the Indians of the Mackenzie district, incidentally:

—would be well served by the setting apart of reserves for them in the proportions provided for by the treaties or whether it would be in their future interests to renegotiate the treaties on some different basis:

I say that the cabinet and the privy council, by giving these terms of reference to this particular commission—namely whether it would be in the future interests of the Indians to renegotiate the treaties on some different basis—have indicated a policy of the government to renegotiate a treaty that is in existence. I think it would naturally be expected that an analogous policy of negotiating treaties which had been exchanged would be quite in keeping with the policy of the government in this respect regarding the situation in the Mackenzie district.

I think the government should undertake the immediate establishment of a pretty far-sweeping judicial inquiry into the land question and should take steps to negotiate treaties, surrenders or extinguishments of the Indians' aboriginal title and occupation of land on whatever basis is mutually acceptable. Failing a mutually acceptable agreement rising out of such negotiations the subject matter of sale might very well then be referred to a court.

A somewhat similar situation prevailed in Alaska. The Tlingit and Haida bands were given special authority by the United States congress to proceed to the United States court of claims on this self-same question of the extinguishment of their title. Their claim was approved by the United States court of claims, which held that the Tlingits and Haidas in Alaska had never extinguished their title to land. This is the same situation as prevails in British Columbia and I think this must be dealt with first, foremost and quickly before many of these other problems can be straightened out. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may call it five o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, before you rise and report progress, I wonder whether the committee would consider going on for another hour. We are close to finishing the estimates of the Indian affairs branch. The other items that come under the jurisdiction of the minister might stand over until later in the session. Perhaps we could take the private members' bills that would be coming up today at some later date.

We are so close to finishing that I wonder whether this might be done. On the other hand, there are at least three members who would like to say something now. Perhaps in the next 60 minutes we could complete the estimates of the Indian affairs branch.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in so far as we are concerned, we would be quite happy to assist the house leader and the hon. lady in getting on with this estimate and thus avoid perhaps starting again on another day. We would be quite happy to co-operate with the government in this respect.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may comment on this. It is our desire, of course, to co-operate with the government and the house leader on anything that will generally be of benefit all the way round, but in this particular instance unfortunately some of us have made arrangement contingent upon the hour of five to six. I do not think it would be possible to agree to the course suggested by the house leader at this moment.

Perhaps if the request had been made at some earlier time—it was unforeseen, of course; I realize that—we might have been able to make other arrangements. But at the moment I am afraid it is rather difficult.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): It would be necessary for me, as chairman, to report to the Speaker of the house in any case before unanimous consent is obtained. It being five o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day, or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the latter having precedence. Today being Friday, public bills have precedence according to the temporary order.

FLAGS OF CANADA

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR A NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-17, respecting flags of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, this is the third time that I have had the privilege of introducing a bill entitled "An act respecting flags of Canada" aimed at giving this country a distinctive national flag.

I tried with all the sincerity I could muster and in objective terms, to convince hon. members of the necessity for Canada to have its own emblem.

I do not believe there is any need of reiterating arguments which have been brought forward on many occasions.

Some inquiry reports have been produced which prove without a doubt that the majority of the Canadian people are in favour of the project.

A recent survey held by the junior chamber of commerce of Canada, following which a brief was submitted to the government last March, revealed that 81 per cent of the 17,000 people questioned in every province of this country wanted a distinctive national flag.

The bill I am introducing today provides one way of carrying out this project; it asks the governor in council to prepare during this session, an appropriate design of a distinctive national flag for Canada which would later be approved by a joint resolution of both chambers before royal assent was given.

Mr. Speaker, if my bill has not gone beyond the stage of second reading, even after several attempts, I am satisfied to have submitted it to the house, a fact which has brought me a flood of approval from all parts of Canada. We should rejoice to see unanimity being reached on the principle of a distinctive national flag, but Canadians are very surprised to note that nothing has been achieved in spite of it.

The situation seems, indeed, very odd, and one could wonder why the matter is not settled by a final vote or why the government, through the voice of its Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, does not reveal its position on a matter which is of the highest interest for the Canadian people.

The unity mentioned a few years ago by the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent now seems to be attained, as shown by the polls organized by the chamber of commerce, the Gallup institute, students associations and many others.

Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude my remarks by saying that the refusal to have this bill read a second time might be interpreted as if this were a bill prejudicial to the interests of the Conservative party, because it is introduced by a member of the opposition.

Hon. members of the Conservative party may be at rest. When one of them submits a bill aiming at giving Canada a distinctive national flag, I shall hasten to withdraw my own bill and to support that of my fellow member.

I want some hon. members—who have already misinterpreted my intentions when I submitted a similar bill last year—to know that I do not submit this bill in order to rouse the attention of the newspapers, nor to entice my colleagues into making compromising statements. My only aim is to call the attention of those who have the responsibility of giving us that symbol of independence which is the sign of a country having attained its maturity.

There has never been any doubt in my mind as to the aim that was to be reached.

Let those who doubt this take up the challenge and bring in a similar bill. I shall be happy to support them and give them the credit for it.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, I placed on the order paper, at the beginning of the session, the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, consideration should be given to the advisability of appointing a committee comprising members of this house and of the Senate to look into the ways of giving Canada a distinctive flag and an official national anthem and to hear in this connection the views of Canadian organizations, public bodies and private citizens.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that for the sake of national unity, the government should follow up the resolution I placed on the order paper at the beginning of the session and that a committee of both houses should be set up as soon as possible to hear the views of the various Canadian organizations, so that we may obtain a distinctive Canadian flag.

I know that all members of the house support the idea of a national flag for Canada. Some favour a certain design, and some another.

If the committee I am suggesting were established, I would have a suggestion to make to the hon. members. I have before me a flag which, in my opinion, truly represents the aspirations of all Canadians. You can see it has blue corners representing—

Some hon. Members: Order.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, I think, should be reminded of two matters, one that we are debating this Bill C-17, not his resolution and, secondly, that it is not customary to introduce other than words into the house. I did not object to reference to the other motion, but the matter for debate is Bill No. C-17 which has been introduced by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger).

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I simply wished to submit to the house a design for a distinctive flag, which could be submitted, and adopted, if found acceptable. This is a purely personal suggestion. But in any case, if a joint committee of both houses is set up, I shall have the opportunity, in due course, to submit that design.

Mr. Speaker, I simply wished to make these few remarks so as to make it clear that I am not opposed to the bill introduced by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) but that, if the matter is put to a vote, I would not like to see a flag adopted which would not be truly distinctive.

In the interest of national unity, we must adopt a genuinely distinctive flag. That is why I would prefer that a joint committee of both houses be set up as soon as possible, to consider the matter so as to enable the house to come to a decision in keeping with the principle of national unity.

(Text):

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, this question has come up before and has been discussed for some time in this house. I think I spoke on a truly distinctive flag once before. As I mentioned previously, perhaps a committee should be set up to study this question. It need not be a committee identical with that which was set up in 1945 and 1946, but a study should be made of whether the flags we have in Canada are satisfactory. If they are not then we should set about to change them and bring in something which would be suitable to the Canadian people.

The question has been asked whether it should be in the census. We all realize that it has cost a great deal already to reprint the census forms. Therefore, I do not think it would be feasible or wise to spend a great deal of money to reprint census forms to include a question concerning a distinctive flag, but something along that line should be undertaken. A questionnaire should be sent out, or the people should be canvassed on whether they want another flag. I think that question would be in order before any definite steps are taken to change the flag we now have, or the two flags which are flown in Canada.

While there is a great deal of concern over this question in Canada—maybe more so in some parts of Canada than in others—yet, it seems to me, after listening to both sides of the question, that it is a controversial one and before any action is taken on it perhaps a little further study ought to be made and a questionnaire sent out in the form of a minor census in an endeavour to find out whether the people actually want a new flag or whether a change is desirable. If it should turn out that a change is desirable, then somebody should design a flag which would be suitable to all Canadians.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, like other hon. members, I suppose, I have been besieged with letters, suggestions and talks on the question of a national flag for Canada. My desk and the file in my cabinet are full of many suggestions along this line.

First, I must say that I am a little surprised myself to find the extent of the interest in and the depth of the feeling about the subject. I was born and brought up in this country and I think I have taken my proper amount of interest in the affairs of this country. I have served in the armed forces and I think I am as patriotic as are most Canadians. As I say, I am a little surprised at the depth of feeling, because frankly the question of the sort of national flag we should have, whether it is distinctly Canadian or not, really has never bothered me very much. Therefore it was with a little bit of surprise at first that I found so many citizens dedicating so much of their time—they must have—to designing flags, organizing groups and pressing and working so hard that this country might have a national emblem of its own, and to learn of the variety of ideas that have been presented to us from day to day for this purpose.

I note that the bill before us does not deal with a specific flag already used in Canada or press for one of the specific designs that several groups in this country have already prepared. However, I think I would prefer to see a bill introduced by a private member calling for a specific nationally designed flag. The bill says that the governor in council shall prepare one. I suggest to hon. members that since there have not been any steps taken to use anything but the union jack or the red ensign in all the years since confederation it might justly be felt that the government has been quite satisfied to have one flag or both of these flags and that the government's policy, no matter what was the form of the government at the time, is reflected by this same acceptance of those flags as the Canadian flags.

I think the spirit motivating most people who ask for government action, or who press for their own ideas or designs of flags, is that they are not satisfied that this country has an emblem that they can point to and say, "This is ours; this reflects Canada". I think the variety of the designs presented to us for consideration strengthens my own belief; my own feelings about it are somewhat encouraged by the fact that those same designs are so varied. There are so many ideas expressed that one encounters great difficulty when one tries to find some flag which will reflect this distinctly Canadian nationalism of ours.

First of all, I think I should say that I am not one who is really concerned about increasing the amount of Canadian nationalism in this country, along certain lines at least. We live in an age in which life is getting more and more complicated, where everything that is done in one country is reflected so quickly in another, and where for various reasons we must be more and more careful of what we do so as not to annoy our neighbours, and where for various humanitarian reasons we must more and more often extend a helping hand to our neighbours.

In this house we are, I am sure, almost completely dedicated to the support of the United Nations. The fact that such a body of necessity has to take care of some of our problems to that extent at least reduces the need for Canadians to be ultra nationalistic. As I say, this motivating spirit in the country seems to move us away from nationalism in some respects, while the growing development, the growing population and the growing importance of our country seem to foster that spirit.

However, Canada's position in international affairs is only one aspect of the problem of how nationalistic we want to be. We still have coming into this country every day a great many immigrants, and every year we are in the process of trying to provide jobs for them and trying to educate the children of new immigrants. We are not predominantly of any one racial origin and it is hard to find in this country what I would call a typical Canadian citizen.

To illustrate this, I think I might try to show the difference between Canadians and residents of the United States. I do not want in my remarks to be taken as being anti-American when I say that the Americans are rather flamboyant; that they are flag wavers; that they are very nationalistic. That is not necessarily saying these are not good qualities, but certainly our American neighbours to the south are distinguishable from Canadians by this feeling of nationalism which they acquire very quickly.

I think it takes an immigrant going into the United States only a very short while before he starts to think and act as an American. He feels it is the only way he can behave. In that society, if one is not the nationalistic flag waving type I feel the chances of being accepted as an ordinary member of the community are, perhaps, very slight. I suggest that a flag is one of those things he can point to with pride and say: this is mine. It is part of the American spirit to be a flag waver, and I am one of the first to admit that there is no such feeling in Canada.

We do not have a flag to which people can point in the same way as the Americans do. We do not hear them making so much reference to a national flag. However, I suggest this should in no way be taken as criticism of ourselves, just as I suggested a few moments ago that my remarks about Americans were in no way a criticism of that country. Speaking to a group of new immigrants the other day and searching about for an example of a typical Canadian I found that, thinking on my feet and giving the matter just a little thought and trying to describe it I was totally unable to come up with a description of the way in which a Canadian should act with regard to his feelings about a flag; how quickly he should be absorbed; how quickly he should set aside some of the patterns of life he had brought from the old country; or how much flag waving and nationalism he would need to show in order to be a typical Canadian citizen.

This is of importance, I think, when we consider the problem of whether we should now have a distinctive Canadian flag. The United States flag is a distinctive emblem, and I am suggesting that citizens of that country take on somewhat flamboyant American characteristics much faster than we do in this country and to a greater extent. I suggest that if we have one distinguishing characteristic in Canada it is simply that not too many of us worry too much about taking on a distinctive national character. Really, what marks a Canadian as a good Canadian citizen is the fact that he does not worry about being a conformist; that he does not worry about creating the impression that he is similar to everyone else. I think the average Canadian citizen prides himself upon being a little different and on not worrying too much about whether he is conforming to a national pattern, no matter how exemplary that national pattern might be.

Therefore, I am one of those who believes that this is the spirit we should continue to foster in this country, the spirit that the typical Canadian is the one who likes the greatest freedom to act as he wishes as long as he is not bothering his neighbours, and who wants to give his neighbours the right to act in the same way, without requiring him to conform to a pattern. It is going to be very hard to typify this type of person. I suggest we have a much more independent, a much more individualistic type of person in this country and, accordingly, we are going to have much more trouble getting a flag to suit people of this type.

We are certainly not going to get unanimity on it, and I think that government measures intended to pick out a flag to suit everyone and change the customs which have developed over the years will be extremely hard to determine. I think we would have difficulty in determining what design we should use or what scheme should be adopted to bring it into being. On the other hand, I feel that this bill suggesting that the governor in council should bring it out is putting a heavy load on any authority. While we all, as members of parliament, must take sides on specific issues as they come up; while we must be prepared to lambast the government if we think it has failed to carry out its duties from time to time; and while we must be prepared to give leadership to the people of this country on controversial issues, it is hard to expect the small group of men who represent the government of this country to be able to come up with an idea for a flag which is going to meet with general approval throughout the country and which is going to carry out the objectives of those various groups which are so concerned about the flag they have in mind. In other words, most of those people who are most desirous of having a distinctive national flag have a particular idea of the kind of flag they want.

Therefore, I think if they can come up with a flag which is going to gain general recognition and support across the country, a bill supporting that particular flag, with a scheme by which it can be determined if it is generally acceptable throughout the country, should be brought forward. If it could be shown that there is a substantial feeling throughout the country in favour of such a flag, then it would be time for the government to step in and act.

I am not sure whether I would be in order if I were to comment on some of the particular designs that I have seen and on some of the reasoning behind the wish to depart from the use of the union jack and the red ensign. Earlier in my remarks I pointed out that while Canada is growing up and becoming in some ways more nationalistic, more important, a bigger and richer country having a wider influence in world affairs, at the same time we have greater responsibilities to the United Nations and must beware of voicing too great a feeling of nationalism at the present time.

We are, of course, tied to the British commonwealth. While it is true that perhaps not all the citizens of this country have direct family ties with the United Kingdom, no one can forget for a minute that the development of this parliamentary system that we enjoy today is an offspring of the British one or that our heritage in the administration of law is a direct descendant of the British system. In fact, British cases are still used in our courts as precedents. I would think that we would blind ourselves a little to say that we want to get a flag which will not identify us with these things that, fortunately or unfortunately, we must readily identify ourselves with as a country.

With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude because to deal adequately with all the various aspects of the type and design of flag, and what should be represented and should not be represented on it, would make a speech a little longer than I think even my patient friends in the house would care to listen to at this time.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I am rising at this time, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I grant that it is a little late in the debate to raise it, but I was under the misguided assumption that perhaps Your Honour would have raised the question as you did on January 23. As I was absent unavoidably from the house then I have had to look up what was said in the debate on that occasion before interrupting this debate to get your opinion on the point of order.

The point of order is simply this: Are we not establishing now a precedent that any number of bills dealing with the same subject may be before the house and debated in the same session? We had before us early in the session Bill No. C-8, an act to authorize a Canadian flag. This measure was debated and there is an item on the order paper, No. 32, for the resumption of that debate. We are dealing now with Bill No. C-17, an act respecting the flags of Canada, which is intended to be an act to authorize a Canadian flag. It is, therefore, really dealing with the same subject matter. I notice that Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 167, paragraph 200, subsection 2, says this:

> Not more than one question should be before the house at the same time. "When a motion hath been made, that matter must receive a determination by a question, or be laid aside by the general sense of the house before another be entertained."

This is a restatement of an old rule of June 28, 1604. It indicates the possibility of the withdrawal of a motion by leave of the house. In so far as Bill No. C-8 is concerned, which was before us earlier, it has not been withdrawn or determined by a question. It has not been laid aside by the general sense of the house. It is still before us and could be considered at any time. Then, subsection 3 of the same general paragraph says:

> A motion dealing with the same subject matter as a bill standing on the order paper for second reading cannot be considered.

I believe that was the problem that was before Your Honour on January 23 when you were considering whether a motion might be debated, although there were two bills dealing with the same subject matter on the order paper. In looking up Hansard, page 1307, January 23, 1961, I find that you did not make a ruling that you expected would remain as a precedent because your words are as follows:

> If the house will then permit me to accept this motion, with the very definite reservation that it will not be too weighty a precedent, I shall be glad to call on the hon. member for St. Boniface.

You were dealing then with the question of a resolution rather than a bill. Earlier, I find that when you were drawing the attention of the house to the fact that there was a technical difficulty because there were two public bills standing on the order paper, these are the words which you used as recorded on page 1306:

> —a technical difficulty which results from the fact that there are two public bills standing on the order paper both dealing with the question of a distinctive national flag, which is also the subject matter of this motion.

Then this paragraph is essential to the discussion, Mr. Speaker, as you went on to say:

> The problem of conflict between two items on the order paper dealing with the same matter has arisen before in the house. Hon. members will recall that there were two bills dealing with the printing of negotiable securities in French, and that debate on one of them was refused pending the disposition of the other on the grounds that the house will not enter into a discussion of identical subjects under two categories.

Farther on you mention the fact that both bills were concerned with a method of selecting a flag. I raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, so that we may be sure of the conduct of our business here, and I think a ruling will be required in this instance. Whereas in the last session it was definitely determined that the two bills dealing with the printing of negotiable securities should not be considered in the same session without a determination on one, here we have a similar situation with two bills dealing with the authorization of a Canadian flag. The debate on one was started and not concluded. The house has not expressed its opinion on that subject. The second bill was introduced today and, although phrased in different language, actually deals with the same subject matter since it asks the house to express its opinion on the question of authorizing us to select a Canadian flag. For the second time this session, therefore, the debate will be on the same subject matter and it may or may not be resolved today, if you should decide that the debate should continue. If it is resolved today, what then happens to the earlier bill? If it is not resolved, on a subsequent occasion we will have two bills on the order paper, as we have now, dealing with the same subject matter.

It is in order that we shall not, by inattention or by inadvertence, establish a precedent which we might find unsatisfactory in the future that I draw to Your Honour's attention this situation.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the point which has been raised by the house leader is not well taken. The rule which has been read as citation 200, page 167 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, suggests that not more than one question should be before the house at the same time. I think what Your Honour would want guidance upon, if Your Honour wants guidance on this matter, would be what is meant by one question. My contention is that the questions that have been before the house earlier are not the same as the question that is now before the house.

I should like to explain what I mean by that. The first matter that came before the house was Bill No. C-8, an act to authorize a Canadian flag. That bill was brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith). All we need to do is to read clause 1 of that bill in order to come to the conclusion immediately that it deals with an entirely different subject matter from that which is now before the house. Not only is the phraseology of clause 1 entirely different but the subject matter is entirely different, although the title is "Flags of Canada".

The second matter that came before the house was by way of a resolution introduced by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier). He suggested a plebiscite on two alternatives, something which I respectfully submit is not the same question as that which is now before us.

Then at a later date we had discussion of Bill No. C-60, an act to amend the Statistics Act, to provide that a matter of this kind be considered as a question in the forthcoming census.

This matter now brought forward by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), although entitled "An Act respecting flags of Canada", provides that the design is one which should be selected by the governor in council. When one comes to the actual meaning of the rule he finds, as I understand it, that the word "question" as it applies to these three bills and one resolution is directed toward entirely different matters.

A moment ago the house leader said that this was the the second time the matter had come up for consideration this session. It is the third time. I am sure that the house leader forgot—or that the matter was not brought to his attention—the bill discussed by the hon. member for Lincoln. Then there was the resolution of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier). There was the discussion of the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. Then there is this one.

The point that I am trying to make is that when Your Honour asked for guidance on the resolution because of the points raised by the house leader I think Your Honour was then satisfied that this was a matter which should be allowed to be pursued. It strikes me that if objection was going to be taken against this procedure it should have been taken long ago. If the point made by the house leader is a sound one, then the objection should have been taken on the second bill or the second resolution that came up for discussion, and that was many weeks ago. Objection was not taken then. There was a third one and no objection was taken. Now there is this one on which discussion is allowed to go on for 30 minutes or more and then objection is taken. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the question under discussion is entirely different from those questions that were under discussion in the earlier bills and resolutions.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): I should like to say a few words in support of what the house leader has said. To deal first of all with the citation he gave at page 168 of Beauchesne, it states as follows:

(3) A motion dealing with the same subject matter as a bill standing on the order paper for second reading cannot be considered.

Incidentally, in reply to the last observation made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), to the effect that this discussion has been going on for half an hour, may I say that it takes a little bit of time to prepare an argument and to get the necessary documents. I have sent for this one, at any rate.

Mr. Chevrier: Then you are killing time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This is an important point because a distinguished gentleman at the time, namely Mr. Mackenzie King, the then hon. member for York, moved on May 31, 1923, as reported in Journals LX, page 420:

That the house do now proceed to notice of motion No. 9 respecting the Oleomargarine Act.

A point of order was raised by Mr. Sutherland, member for South Oxford: that the said notice of motion anticipated a matter already appointed for the consideration of the house, in the form of a bill standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture and was therefore out of order.

Mr. Speaker ruled the point of order well taken.

In that instance there had been no discussion at all. The point of order was well taken and formed the basis for this third paragraph in paragraph 200 of Beauchesne. But in addition to the citation on that page, we find citation 373, the second paragraph of which reads as follows:

(2) There is no rule which restrains the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject, and containing similar provisions.

In other words, there is no rule which prevents the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject. He then goes on to qualify that statement by saying this:

But if a decision of the house has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions, and such a bill could not have been introduced on a motion for leave. But if a bill is withdrawn after having made progress, another bill with the same objects may be proceeded with.

That citation explains what is meant by two bills being presented relating to the same subject or containing the same provisions.

The hon. member for Laurier tried to distinguish between the bill introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln and the one introduced by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. The first one, namely Bill No. C-8, is entitled "An act to authorize a Canadian flag". The next one is entitled "An act respecting flags of Canada". Can anyone reasonably contend that both these hon. gentlemen did not have the same purpose in mind? They may have gone about it in a slightly different way. One would not expect the details to be the same. But explanatory notes relating to the bill of the hon. member for Lincoln contained this sentence:

The purpose of this bill is to provide a Canadian flag.

Then he explained how that should be done. Then the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) in the explanatory note to his bill states as follows:

As it is desirable and urgent that Canada possess a distinctive national flag, this bill provides a method of obtaining a flag with the least possible delay.

Both of these bills instruct the governor in council how they should proceed about obtaining a suitable distinctive national flag immediately. I do not think that it can be reasonably contended, as the hon. member for Laurier wished to do, that these bills are dealing with different subjects. The ordinary person would certainly understand that each of these bills dealt with the same subject. It is a subject that is near and dear to the hearts of a great many people in this country. In fact, I think the hon. member will agree that this is a matter that arouses great emotion in some sections.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Why did he not raise this point of order when the second bill came up for consideration many weeks ago?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member concluded?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to answer that question. The point was not drawn to my attention previously.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Question.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point of order could be disposed of on the basis that it was raised somewhat late in the course of the debate.

These two bills which are said to be in conflict have been on the order paper for some time. As it is a matter of some consequence that arises from time to time I was happy to receive assistance and observations from hon. members. The simplest case of this type was that of the bills relating to negotiable instruments. Those bills were in fact identical, and I came to the conclusion that debate should not be permitted to proceed on those bills concurrently.

There the bill which was reached first took priority; the other appeared on the order paper and when it was called I myself raised the point of order which prevented debate until the identical bill had been disposed of.

In another case of this type, in resolving a conflict between a government bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, if I remember rightly, and a private member's bill relating to the Unemployment Insurance Act, but not identical, I took the view, after we had some discussion—as we have had today—that the two bills were not identical. That being so, it was open to the government to proceed with its measure and to debate the second reading, as was open to the private member with his measure, until the house had taken a decision on one or other of the bills, which would prevent the second measure from coming up because the house had decided the principle involved.

We have two bills here. I think it depends on the way one assesses the principles of these bills, whether one comes to the conclusion that they are so closely related that they should not both be proceeded with concurrently.

I have come to the conclusion that they can be distinguished. One could say that the principle of both bills is to establish a distinctive national flag. I rather look at them as two bills, each providing a method for the establishment of a distinctive national flag. One bill, as hon. members will recall, was debated and stands for resumption of debate on second reading. That bill deals with the heraldic method of establishing a Canadian flag. This bill puts the onus on the governor in council. The motion before the house which I allowed to proceed does not necessarily provide for a flag at all; it simply calls for the government to establish a referendum on the issue.

If one regards the principle as being one of method of disposing of this important issue of the flag, I think the two bills are distinguishable, and that the debate may proceed.

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the principle of this bill and I think the government would be very well advised to make a decision on this matter. In 1945 and 1946 the committee examined some 2,695 models of flags and after about nine months' study came down to two models. I think the line of division in the committee was between those who wanted a flag which had the maple leaf on it, without the union jack, and those who wanted the maple leaf with the union jack. A study was made by the Hon. Mr. MacNichol in the committee and he found there were 1,611 flags with the maple leaf and only 383 with the union jack. It was 67 per cent one way and 16 per cent the other way.

I should like to read a letter in order to show the great interest in Canada on this subject of a national flag. I have here a letter which I received from 49 Rothsay avenue, Toronto 18, Ontario, dated February 3, 1961. It is addressed to myself and reads:

> An enthusiastic congratulation from us to you on your recent stand in parliament on a distinctive Canadian flag. We are solidly in favour of a distinctive Canadian maple leaf flag.
> We are high school students who believe that our first loyalty goes to Canada; not to England and the union jack or the United States and the dollar bill.
>
> The defaced red ensign offends our national pride. A people without its own flag is like an unheralded king, a bannerless army, a nameless citizen. A country which uses a borrowed flag cannot truthfully mark its soldiers' graves, decorate its streets or give unfaltering symbol to its youth.
> The youth of Canada today feel that our national anthem is "O Canada" and not "God Save the Queen". Today in our high school ten students and myself have started to collect signatures for a petition of 300 names. The response is terrific. On our first day we have collected close to a hundred signatures. We will present our petition to the school principal in order to get "O Canada" played at least three times a week—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the hon. member's letter is not relevant at this point. The question before the house is whether the governor in council shall prepare a design for a distinctive national flag.

Mr. Regnier: Thank you, Your Honour. I will just read the last paragraph of the letter, which I think deals with the matter in question:

> We wish that there were more M.P.'s who wanted Canada to have her own flag. You are on the right track and may you have every success in your commendable efforts.

This letter is signed by Mr. Bill Evans, president, native son youth.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the business for Monday and Tuesday is as announced last evening; that is, a motion to go into supply and the other business mentioned?

Mr. Churchill: The business for Monday and Tuesday is as announced. I am waiting to hear the subject matter of the debate on those days.

Mr. Chevrier: It will come in due course.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CANADA ATLAS

Question No. 96—Mr. Racine:

1. What has been the preparation and printing cost of the Canada atlas?
2. How many such volumes have been printed (a) in English? (b) in French?
3. How many such volumes have been sold (a) in English? (b) in French?

Answer by: Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State):

1. The cost of printing and materials excluding labour and Queen's printer costs amounted to $71,500. Precise costs, particularly of the preparation, would be impossible to assess as it would include meetings of interdepartmental committees and the various other committees which were held from time to time to consider planning of the atlas and would also include research done by this and several contributing departments. No one was ever employed exclusively for any length of time on Atlas of Canada work and it would be impossible to determine how much of the work was done along with other duties.

Questions

2. To be answered by the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.

3. To be answered by the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.

In so far as the Department of Public Printing and Stationery is concerned.

1. Covers and bindery operations for 6,500 volumes completed and 1,500 in process, total cost to date, $104,808.

2. (a) 5,000, (b) 1,500.

3. (a) 5,000, (b) 1,500.
