HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 16, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE JOHN AUGUSTINE MACDONALD

TRIBUTES ON PASSING OF MEMBER FOR KINGS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it will be an occasion of sadness for members of this house to note that since the Christmas adjournment one of our members has passed away in the person of Lieutenant Colonel John Augustine Macdonald, the member for Kings, P.E.I.

Mr. Macdonald followed in the footsteps of his father in public affairs in his province. He joined the armed forces early in the war, served with great distinction in France, and was first elected to the legislature in his province in the summer of 1945, the youngest member of that body. At that time he was in hospital recovering from the effects of his war service. Subsequently he sought election to the House of Commons and became a member of this house in 1957, being re-elected in 1958. A humanitarian and one greatly interested in the welfare of all, and in particular of the veterans, he made a contribution such as is made by those who, whether in the house proper or in the committees, give of their best to the service of their country.

He served his country in the days of peace. He has passed away at a comparatively early age; indeed, one might say, at the beginning of a public career auspicious in its hope for the future. He leaves a widow and three children. We miss him sorely on this side of the house, and I think the house as a whole would wish to join me in expressing our sadness at his sudden passing and our sympathy and condolences to the widow and members of the family. Mr. Macdonald served his country well, and of no one can more be said.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house join the Prime Minister in the sympathy he has just expressed in the passing of one of our colleagues, the hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island, a passing which was both sad and premature. Colonel Macdonald was a young man, as the Prime Minister pointed out, but he had served his country with distinction during his relatively short life both in time of war and in time of peace, and new areas of service were opening to him when he was called.

We join with the Prime Minister in extending our sympathy to the members of his family. We also sympathize with the Prime Minister and the members of his party, who have lost a loyal and devoted adherent.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to hear just a few minutes ago of the passing of Colonel Macdonald. On behalf of this group may I say we join with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in expressing our sorrow at the loss of a highly respected colleague in this house, a gentleman who served his country well in war, in the defence of freedom, and in peace in the legislature of his province and in this house in both he worked to give effect to the principles for which he fought during time of war.

The members of the veterans affairs committee will miss him very much indeed. Suffice it to say I am certain that the impression he created on the members of that committee was one of quiet sincerity. We join with the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition in extending our sincere sympathy to all his family.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with what has already been said by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the spokesman on this occasion for the C.C.F. party.

Perhaps more than anyone else in this house I had a long and close association with Lieutenant Colonel John A. Macdonald. Practically all his mature years have been devoted to public service both in time of peace and time of war. In addition to his service to his country in time of war, for which he was well known, Colonel Macdonald had a continuing interest in the reserve forces of his country. At the time of his death he commanded the Prince Edward Island Recce regiment. His services to veterans were especially noteworthy and his services generally to his community were of a very high order.

John A. Macdonald was a thorough gentleman. I knew him intimately for many years and never heard him utter an uncharitable word about anyone. The sympathy of all of us, I am sure, goes out to his widow and his young family in their bereavement.

Question of Privilege

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I am in receipt of a communication informing me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely of J. C. Van Horne, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Restigouche-Madawaska, by resignation.

Accordingly I have issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer for the issue of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MARTIN, ESSEX EAST—REPORT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a matter which I believe involves a question of privilege affecting every hon. member of this house. It has to do with the tabling of the report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission by the Minister of Labour in the dying hours of the day when we adjourned prior to Christmas.

On December 6 I asked this question of the Minister of Labour as reported at page 527 of Hansard of that date:

> Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission has had any meetings since the prorogation of parliament and, if there has been a meeting of that committee, will the minister kindly table the report in accordance with the direction provided in the act?

The minister replied, at page 527:

> Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the way it will be tabled.

Then I asked a supplementary question, as follows:

> When might we expect the report to be tabled?

The minister replied, at page 528:

> The act provides that it shall be tabled 30 days after it has been received by the governor in council.
> Mr. Pickersgill: Within 30 days.
> Mr. Starr: Yes, within 30 days.

On December 20 I again asked the Minister of Labour a question in this connection in the following words, which will be found at page 969 of Hansard:

> May I ask the Minister of Labour if he is now in a position to table the report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission? The committee met in October, and about it there have already been questions this session?

The minister replied:

> No. I am not prepared to table it yet, as the government is still studying this report.

I am advised by the Clerk's office, Mr. Speaker, that the day after, the minister did hand to the Clerk a copy of this report, sessional paper No. 83, Wednesday, December 21. That was the day the spokesman for the opposition was concluding what he had to say about the budget introduced the day before by the Minister of Finance.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the first time this practice has been resorted to by this particular minister or by the government. In the dying days of the session which ended on August 10 last a report was tabled in the same manner—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should introduce more than one matter of privilege at the present time. He should confine himself to the matter under discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Having said that there was a self-created precedent on the part of the minister for this particular act, I will agree that there is no point in elaborating on this aspect of the matter; but, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that it is contrary to the privileges of this house, when, the day after a member asks for the production of a particular report and the minister says that the government has not yet studied it, the minister clandestinely hands the report to the Clerk without advising the house publicly, as I believe he should. It is a violation of the rules of this house. I can well understand why it was done, because the report shows—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will agree with me that he should state his question of privilege without debating the matter. There is no motion before the house, and I have to determine whether there is a prima facie breach of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I simply add that I can understand why the minister would want to do it. I do not have to give further reasons why I think he would want to show that, because of convenience, he was justified in acting as he did, but the proper practice would have been for the minister to tell the house that he was going to table a document which was so vital in the consideration of matters affecting the financial state of this nation and of the unemployment insurance fund.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Under the circumstances in which the hon. member for Essex East has brought this matter up, I think I should say a few words. When I made the statement on December 20, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Essex East, it certainly was my intention to table the document within the time prescribed in the act. On the following day I was advised that it would have to be tabled before the house adjourned for the Christmas holidays, and under the circumstances that was all I could do at the time.

In any event, the anxiety of the hon. member for Essex East is not wholly justified, because since he has read the report he will know that it is in almost the same tone and, as a matter of fact, is a facsimile of the report made earlier in the year by the same committee. There is nothing new in the report. The state of the fund has been well known to everybody in this country. It has been referred to in the press.

The committee does recommend that certain changes be made, and I want to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Essex East that in the speech from the throne it is set out that the government intends to bring in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that as the hon. member for Essex East has expressed his views and has not submitted a motion, I may let the matter rest there.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SIGNING OF TREATY ON JANUARY 17

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at this time I wish to announce that tomorrow in Washington the treaty for the co-operative development of the Columbia river basin will be signed by the President of the United States and two others from that country and by myself, the Minister of Justice and the Canadian ambassador to the United States.

This treaty marks the successful outcome of nearly three years of intensive work on a project which we believe will bring great benefits in years to come to both Canada and the United States. Indeed, this will be an historic occasion in the relations between our two nations, showing to all the world the benefits that can accrue when nations, while having their differences, have common objectives and a desire for peace and the attainment of those things which are the attributes of peace.

After the signing of the treaty statements setting out the situation will be made both by the administration of the United States and by myself on behalf of the government of Canada. I should have liked to be able to make a full report to the house, but realizing that as soon as the signatures have been applied a statement will be forthcoming by the other signatory. I intend to make available then a summary of the terms of the treaty, the benefits that we believe will accrue to Canada and, in general, to summarize the effects and results of this great co-operative international effort.

The treaty will, of course, require to be ratified. It will be submitted to the house for consideration. With respect to certain elements and clauses within the treaty, there will necessarily be differences of opinion. Indeed, representations have been made to the government by certain people in areas that will be affected as a consequence of the implementation of the treaty that an opportunity should be provided for the fullest consideration of the treaty and its implications. It is the government's intention, if the house will agree, to have the treaty submitted to the house committee on external affairs so that in that committee full and complete consideration and discussion may take place relative to its terms.

I thought it well to bring this to the attention of the house at this time, to the end that it will be realized that the affixing of signatures to the treaty does not make the treaty effective. Parliament alone can do so. To the end that this house shall be enabled to secure the fullest information on the treaty, its terms, the interpretation of those terms and in general a résumé of the entire field that is comprehended by the treaty, I believe that the proper course is to enable a committee of the house which is qualified to deal with the matter, namely the committee I have mentioned, to go fully into its terms.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the satisfaction which all members of the house must feel on the conclusion of an agreement with our neighbour the United States must also, of course, be related to the terms of that agreement, and we have not yet had an opportunity to ascertain what those terms are. The negotiations on this important matter between representatives of the two countries have been going on not merely for the three-year period mentioned by the Prime Minister but for some years previously, as my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who played such an important part in these negotiations, was careful, I believe, to point out in a recent address he delivered at Windsor, Ontario.

I know how difficult these negotiations have been. Perhaps the house will permit me to mention only one further name in connection with them. I refer to the name of General McNaughton, who has worked so hard and so long to bring about an agreement of this kind.

As the Prime Minister has stated, the treaty is to be signed tomorrow but it is not effective until it is ratified; and ratification, under our constitutional practice if not our constitutional law, requires approval by this house. I think the procedure recommended by the Prime Minister, namely the reference of this matter to the committee on external affairs, is an appropriate one. The treaty also must be approved by a two thirds majority of the Senate of the United States, and that is always a question mark in agreements of this kind. Perhaps we should also remind ourselves that while this treaty must be approved by the two legislatures, it cannot be made effective in its implementation without the co-operation of the province of British Columbia. That is another element which enters into the final consideration of this matter, and I do not need to stress the importance of that element, I am sure, to my hon. friends the cabinet ministers from British Columbia.

We welcome the conclusion of the treaty or the signature of the treaty, and we will make our own views on the terms of the treaty known when it is before the house for consideration.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group listened with great interest to the Prime Minister with respect to the signing of this treaty tomorrow. I could not help but think of another treaty that was signed with respect to the Columbia river, namely the Oregon treaty of 1846, article 2 of which provides that British subjects shall have the right of navigation from the upper waters of the Columbia river to the sea in perpetuity. In return for that right the British government gave the United States government all the land lying between the Columbia river and the Pacific to the 49th parallel.

I trust that when we conclude this treaty we do not come off second best. The treaty of 1846 was violated by the United States through the building of the Bonneville and Grand Coulee dams without so much as a word being written to any authority in Canada. My authority for that statement is the leader of the official opposition to whom I wrote a letter when he was under secretary of state and asked him to search the correspondence in order to find whether there was a single line about this violation of the treaty by the United States government. He wrote back and told me that after a most extensive search of external affairs files his officials could not find a line written about the violation of the Oregon treaty of 1846.

I wish to say that under the circumstances we in this group cannot agree with what appears to be this unnecessary and unseemly haste in signing this treaty. I am not alone when I say that. The Prime Minister knows that what I am saying is true. I make that statement in the knowledge that I have the wholehearted support of numerous organizations in my constituency, in British Columbia and of thousands of persons directly or indirectly affected or concerned who are members of all parties in this house.

I suggest that this is a rather hasty step. There are numerous organizations and thousands of persons opposed to or affected by the proposed building of the High Arrow dam, and their consulting engineers have not had an opportunity to present their views since the filing of that memorable document —I believe it is No. 180—on November 18 last. I was physically wounded on November 18, Mr. Speaker, but I was spiritually wounded when I read that document on November 18 last which contained the proposals for the draft treaty to which the Prime Minister has now referred.

I might say that these people and these organizations and their consulting engineers have not had an opportunity since November 18 to make representations to the government of Canada or to appear before the external affairs committee in order to give their evidence and to cross-examine some of the people who live down in the cubbyholes of the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and who think in terms of hydro development only, not in terms of human beings and the conservation of natural resources.

My second reason for opposing this treaty and for suggesting that this is unnecessary and unseemly haste is that we shall not have during this debate, namely the debate on the budget, an opportunity properly to discuss this matter because the speakers are arranged for today, and they have their rights and will go ahead, and the treaty will be signed tomorrow.

My third reason is that Hon. W. A. C. Bennett, premier of British Columbia, announced on Thursday, December 29 that he has ordered the British Columbia energy board to make a complete investigation into the cost of the Columbia and Peace river projects, including the downstream benefits, in order, as he says, to let the sunlight into the facts; and that the first report is to be handed to him on or before March 1. That means without a doubt some months of delay.

In addition Hon. Ray Williston, minister of lands and forests has also said that he is most reluctant to predict when construction will start, as the British Columbia and federal governments have yet to agree on the terms of the agreement. Then he gave these reasons. All engineering studies must be completed, including the studies of the British Columbia energy board—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is perhaps anticipating the discussion of the treaty when it comes before parliament. The two matters presented to the house were the announcement of the signing of the treaty tomorrow and then the proposed procedure for ratification by referring the signed treaty to this house and its committee. If the hon. member has matters that go beyond that point, he could more properly defer them until the matter comes before the house for consideration.

Mr. Herridge: I am trying like the devil, Mr. Speaker, to be in order, but at the same time I am also trying to have my say on behalf of the people whom I represent, as to why we consider this to be unnecessary and unseemly haste. Mr. Williston also says that a water licence must be issued and hearings held before any decision is made. In view of these matters there is likely to be the lapse of months before there is an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia, and Mr. Williston says that the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia should be attached to the treaty.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, regardless of what the chaps down in the water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources say, they have not an inkling as to where the foundation for this High Arrow dam will be. I do not know how we can agree to do certain things by treaty when we do not know if suitable foundations can be found for the High Arrow dam.

I was very glad to hear the Prime Minister say that various organizations, individuals and so on will have opportunity to make representations before the external affairs committee. I am sure in making that statement he wishes to provide every opportunity to those thousands of people of all parties whom I represent who, through their consulting engineers and representatives on the water resources committee of the Arrow lakes, and the city of Revelstoke, are very anxious to come to Ottawa and present their evidence.

I trust that when the external affairs committee meets to discuss this treaty we shall hear the impregnable General McNaughton, who is the Rock of Gibraltar on Columbia development, and Mr. Bartholomew, consulting engineer of Vancouver, and possibly representatives of various other engineering firms. I hope these authorities and persons may be heard.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we do think that under all the circumstances there is an unnecessary and unseemly haste in signing this treaty at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to enter into a controversy in any way, realizing this would be improper, but I cannot allow to go unchallenged the statement that there was unseemly haste in any way. It has been pointed out that for three years efforts have been made by this government and its representatives to bring about the attainment of an objective that has been the hope of Canadians, and particularly residents of British Columbia, for many years. The Leader of the Opposition has stated that there were discussions during the period the former government was in office, and certainly there has been available to anyone the opportunity to understand the course being followed.

The negotiating committee has been meeting and I am very confident, with that one observation, in saying to the hon. member who has just spoken that I appreciate the fact that he is willing and desirous of having this treaty submitted to the committee on external affairs.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there was one matter I omitted to bring to the attention of the house, and that was to advise that a copy of the statement which I will make in Washington tomorrow morning, and also of the treaty, will be sent to all members so that each and every one will have before him or her a record of the statement and also the treaty itself.

TRADE

O.E.C.D.—TABLING OF REPORT OF PREPARATORY COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on December 15 the Prime Minister stated, as reported at page 824 of Hansard, that the convention and the report of the preparatory committee in respect of the organization for economic co-operation and development would be tabled. The following day, as reported at page 866 of Hansard, I tabled copies of the convention and of the communique that was issued at the close of the conference. I now have received and table copies in English and in French of the report of the O.E.C.D. preparatory committee.

Proposed Legislation

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

TABLING OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I acquaint the house of the fact that I have today tabled the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, in English and in French, and copies in English of volumes I and II of the public accounts for the same fiscal year. The French edition of the public accounts will be available, it is expected, about February 1 and will be tabled immediately it is received.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—AUTHORITY FOR CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINE

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the C.N.R. Railway Company may construct a line of railway from a point at or near Mile 72 of the Kiask falls subdivision to Mattagami lake, in the province of Quebec, and to authorize temporary loans to the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, not exceeding $9,660,000 to enable the work of construction and completion of the railway line to proceed forthwith; and to authorize the company to issue and the governor in council to guarantee securities to finance the expenditures upon the said line up to the said figure.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING MEMBERSHIP, PROVIDING FOR SALARIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Tariff Board Act to increase the number of members of the board from five to seven, and to provide for the salaries of the new members; and to provide further for consequential amendments designed to facilitate the adoption by the board of a panel system.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSTPONEMENT OF PRIVATE MEMBERS' MONDAY

Mr. Speaker: Before calling the next order, which takes us beyond routine proceedings, I think it is my duty to call the attention of the house to the rule applicable this session which permits the government to postpone private members' Mondays for two successive Mondays, which is the rule governing at the present time.

When the order of business for today was announced before the adjournment the house leader indicated this would be the resumption of the budget debate, making it a government day. As the preceding private members' Mondays had been used for government business this was in conflict with the rule under which this day necessarily is a private members' day, unless the house otherwise orders by unanimous consent.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I notice that when the house leader referred to the business for today he stated that we would proceed with the budget. That, of course, we cannot do without unanimous consent on the part of the house. We are in the hands of the house in this regard. If the house will accept an informal suggestion—or motion, if you will, as informally put as I am now putting it—that this day be one for the discussion of the budget rather than a private members' day, we will proceed as outlined by the house leader.

If on the other hand we have not unanimous support, then naturally it will be private members' day.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I was in the house at the time the business was announced when we adjourned, and I had understood from the hon. member on the other side who was looking after the business of the house that there was an understanding. It was in that spirit that I accepted the announcement, and I feel sure that so far as the official opposition are concerned we accept it in that spirit.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the effective opposition I wish to say that providing a day is reserved for us at another time, we agree with the suggestion made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Then does the house give its unanimous consent to the use of this day as forecast by the house leader, without of course depriving the house of a private members' Monday, which is postponed. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SINCLAIR REPORT ON B.C. FISHING INDUSTRY

Motion No. 19—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of the report submitted to the Department of Fisheries by Dr. Sinclair on the British Columbia fishing industry.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): This report is in the hands of the printers. I am afraid I was overoptimistic in my estimate of when it would be available. It is not yet ready, and in the circumstances perhaps the hon. member would be agreeable to having the motion stand.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I am quite agreeable to having it stand. I am equally agreeable to having it passed, because the minister does not have to comply with this motion tomorrow. Let the minister do whatever he wishes.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister insist that the motion stand? It is the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

COLUMBIA RIVER—DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO RESOURCES

Motion No. 27—Mr. Herridge:

For a copy of all telegrams, reports, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources or any officials of his department and the government of British Columbia, the officials of any corporation or other persons, regarding the development of the hydro resources of the Columbia river in Canada.

PENSION VESTING FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES

Motion No. 28—Mr. Herridge:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence or other documents exchanged between the Minister of Finance or any officials of his department and any officers of any trade union with respect to pension vesting for income tax purposes.

He said: With the permission of the house I should like to withdraw these two motions, because I omitted to include the dates, and I do not want to go back to confederation. This was caused by the influx of a bevy of ladies into my office while I was dictating the motion.

Orders discharged and motions withdrawn.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH NEW U.S. PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether during his visit to Washington he expects to be able to meet with the incoming president of the United States or any member of the new administration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Desirable as that would be, I think the Leader of the Opposition will realize the difficulty of arranging any such meeting at the present time, in view of the fact that the inauguration ceremony takes place in a matter of two days thereafter. It would be almost impossible to arrange such a meeting. However, my hope is that at an early date following the inauguration of the new president an opportunity will arise which will permit discussion between President Kennedy and myself regarding matters of general interest to our two countries.

LAOS—REASSEMBLING OF SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister in a position to tell the house what the policy of the government of Canada is regarding the reactivation of the truce supervisory commission in the troubled situation in Laos, particularly in the light of the published views of the governments of the United Kingdom, France and the United States? When the minister is replying, could he also tell the house whether or not Canada is included among the 14 countries which Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia has suggested as potential participants in a proposed conference to deal with the matters originally discussed in 1954 in Geneva?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a short statement here with regard to the position in Laos. The Canadian government has been very much concerned about this situation. We have been doing our best to help work out a satisfactory solution. If the hon. member who raised this question has read press reports to the effect that the countries he has mentioned have agreed on a definite position, he is quite wrong, because this whole situation is being negotiated.

Canada's direct concern in this matter arises from our membership in the international commission for supervision and control in Laos which was established by the Geneva conference of 1954. As the hon. member for Essex East knows, Canada did not participate in that conference but together with India and Poland was named to a supervisory truce commission. It will be recalled that the international supervisory commission adjourned sine die in July, 1958 following two requests by the Laotian government for its departure. I have seen the suggestion made that this commission was adjourned at Canada's insistence, but the insistence came from the Laotian government, and the adjournment was approved by Canada and India, being a majority of the nations on the truce supervisory commission.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In the second of these requests dated May 22, 1958 the prime minister of Laos stated that the task entrusted to the commission was "drawing successfully to a close", and he expressed on behalf of his government "its profound gratitude for the efficacious assistance" of the commission in re-establishing in the kingdom a "normal situation in respect of its unity, sovereignty and independence".

The normal situation to which the prime minister of Laos referred in his letter of May, 1958 did not, unhappily, long prevail. In the fall of 1959 the security council took steps to send a committee to Laos in the hope that this would stop the trouble which had already arisen there at that time. I believe there is still a United Nations presence in Laos, but obviously that fact has not prevented the civil war which is going on there at the present time.

In recent months the situation has become increasingly critical so that at present there is not only a state of open hostilities, but also an absence of general international agreement on the identity of the legitimate government. The communist side is claiming that one man is the head of the government and the western side is claiming another man is. The conflicts within the country have engaged the sympathies and to some extent the support of interested powers outside. This is actually a question which the big powers must settle. If they do not agree to some settlement, in any event if they do not keep their hands off, it is quite impossible for other countries to bring about a settlement.

I need hardly remind the house that such a situation imperils not only the sovereignty, independence, unity and territorial integrity of Laos, which the members of the Geneva conference undertook to respect, but also the peace and stability of southeast Asia in general. In these circumstances it is natural that there should have been suggestions that a return to Laos of the international supervisory commission might help to reduce tensions and promote a peaceful solution of Laos' difficulties.

Such a reconvening of the commission presented, however, certain difficulties. In the first place, the task originally assigned to the commission was to supervise and control the application of a cease-fire agreement already reached by the great powers at the Geneva conference. There was no question of the commission itself bringing about a cease-fire. Second, it is clear that an essential condition for the effective functioning of a commission so constituted would be basic agreement among the other powers directly interested on its return and on the duties it should perform. Third, unless it had an assurance of the co-operation of the Laotian authorities it would be unable to operate effectively, and its position would be untenable.

I might remind the house in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that at the time the commission was adjourned we made quite clear that if in any future emergency the commission were to be recalled, we would always have in mind the rights of the Laotian government and would respect the sovereignty of that country. The Canadian government, therefore, while fully in sympathy with the desire to take action quickly in a critical situation, has sought to ensure that the means adopted would be those which, given the existing circumstances, would give the best promise of success.

It was with these considerations in mind that I suggested an exploratory mission might be sent to Laos to find out by consultation with the Laotian authorities what precisely could usefully be done in the present circumstances.

In this connection my suggestion was that the three key men who went to southeast Asia in 1954 or 1955—I am not sure of the exact year—would go back as members of this exploratory mission. The Canadian member was Brigadier Sherwood Lett of Vancouver, who is now chief justice of the supreme court of British Columbia. Chief Justice Lett has offered to go out in this capacity. The Indian representative, Mr. M. Desai, unfortunately has not been well and is on sick leave. This proposal that there be an exploratory mission made up of these three key people was not generally acceptable.

Discussions are continuing with a view to establishing an agreed basis of proceeding along these general lines. We for our part are willing, if the United Kingdom and the Soviet union as co-chairmen of the Geneva conference so request, and subject to the agreement of the king of Laos—we are not asking for the agreement of the Laotian government but for the agreement of the king of Laos, who is the only generally recognized constitutional authority of that country—to appoint a Canadian representative to the commission, which would do what it could in present circumstances, by consultation and advice, to contribute to the restoration of peace and to the maintenance of the sovereignty, independence, unity and territorial integrity of Laos.

If the commission is reconvened I do not believe that all the responsibility for working out a cease-fire could fairly be placed on it, because in fact it was never set up to bring about that result, but it probably could help.

As I pointed out earlier, discussions are taking place. Some discussions are actually going on this afternoon, and when there is anything further to report I will be very glad to bring it to the attention of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not understand the last part of my hon. friend's statement. Did he say anything about the question whether Canada was going to participate in the conference suggested by Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia?

Mr. Green: I also made the statement some days ago that I thought, for a long term settlement, it would be wise to reconvene the Geneva conference. There was a good deal of opposition to that being done. In addition there has been the suggestion that there should be a broadened Geneva conference made up by adding countries in the area which are neutral, for example Burma and Thailand. Several of the Asian countries have been proposed. Whether agreement will be reached to recall the original conference or to call an expanded conference, I do not know. This is one of the questions which is already under discussion.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister mentioned the representatives from Canada and India. Did he mention the representative from Poland?

Mr. Green: I did not mention the one from Poland because I cannot pronounce his name. I have not it with me at the moment. He is a very distinguished gentleman, now in the Polish foreign office.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of public importance, namely the unnecessary and unseemly haste on the part of the government of Canada in making arrangements for the signing of a treaty between the government of Canada and the government of the United States to provide for certain developments on the Columbia river in Canada.

I ask leave to move the adjournment because there will be no opportunity during this debate to discuss this question adequately, and because there will be a delay of months, without doubt, before an agreement is signed with the government of British Columbia.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I am sure Your Honour would feel that the question of urgency which it is necessary to establish before accepting this motion will have been disposed of by what the Prime Minister has said, namely that the treaty will be submitted to this house with the suggestion that it be submitted in turn to the external affairs committee before there is any question of ratification. There is no treaty in existence until the document has been signed. The house has the assurance that before the treaty becomes effective, before ratification is made, the house will have the opportunity for the fullest discussion and the fullest information through the medium of the committee procedure. It is therefore surely obvious that there is no urgency for debate at this time in the way in which that term is used in connection with a motion to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance.

It is suggested to me—I was looking at the rule at the time—that the hon. gentleman has apparently become so confused about dates generally that he has also got his motion before the house at the wrong time according to the rule which now prevails.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the hon. member for Kootenay West has an answer to the observations of the Minister of Justice I am prepared to dispose of this request.

Mr. Herridge: I only wish to say that I congratulate the Minister of Justice on trying to make a good case out of a bad case.

Mr. Speaker: If the earlier statements about this treaty had not been before the house there might, perhaps, have been some doubt in my mind as to whether we should interrupt our proceedings to discuss this matter; but, as has been pointed out, the treaty, when signed, has to come before the house and until then there is nothing which can come before us. It seems to me that the necessary urgency does not exist in this case, and I regret that I must refuse the hon. member's request for leave to move this motion.

Mr. Herridge: I appeal Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is well settled that the decision of the Speaker under rule 26 does not involve a point of order and cannot therefore be appealed.

FLOODS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to make a brief report on the heavy damage arising from the recent heavy rains in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Following notice from the hon. gentleman, a report was secured from Victoria at two o'clock this afternoon. This report indicates that there has been serious flooding in three areas due to the run-off of snow and heavy rains. That flood reached a maximum late yesterday afternoon. The areas affected were the Fraser valley, the Vancouver north shore area and the Duncan-Cowichan lake area of Vancouver island. A number of dams are spilling over in one or more of these areas.

The municipal and provincial authorities have been dealing with the emergency conditions and seem able to deal with the problem locally. The army was called upon to assist at Duncan and has had a platoon of regular troops there from ten o'clock last night. The militia has assisted from time to time at certain other places. The army has provided some sandbags to supplement those supplied by the department of highways, and the information is that there are ample supplies available to meet whatever conditions may be expected. A number of people have been evacuated from the low-lying areas.

The minister of highways of British Columbia has stated that there is fairly extensive damage to highways. Both the main railway lines in the Fraser valley have been cut by the flood, and the P.G.E. line has been similarly affected. The Hope-Princeton highway remains open, but there is some danger that it too may be unfit for travel shortly. It is still too early to estimate the damage.

One life has been lost, and I am sure I speak for all members of the house when I extend the sympathy of hon. members to the people in the areas affected as well as to those who suffered damage or who are bereaved.

Mr. Regier: In expressing thanks to the Prime Minister for his very detailed and adequate reply I should like to direct a related question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the government now reconsider its advice to me as given by the minister in a letter dated January 6, and immediately convene a meeting of all three levels of government for the purpose of arriving at a mutual solution to the problem caused by the rapid and repeated flooding of the Coquitlam river?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): This problem is entirely concerned with flood relief and prevention, since navigation is not involved. Only at times when flooding is of such seriousness as to constitute a national disaster does the federal government become a party when requested to do so by the provincial government. Consequently this government cannot properly convene a meeting of the three levels of government, as suggested now by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Over a year ago in a letter dated August 19, 1959, the Department of Public Works has suggested a remedy to the hon. member.

Mr. Regier: Is it the contention of the government even at this date that Kanaka creek is a navigable river, while Coquitlam river is not?

COMBINES

PULPWOOD—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO ONTARIO PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on December 21, the hon. member for Port Arthur asked whether any petitions or requests have been received for an investigation in northwestern Ontario similar to the one conducted two years ago in Quebec and eastern Ontario into prices of farm or settlement pulpwood.

I am now informed by the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act that one complaint of a preliminary nature was made to the director in the latter part of 1957, the main purpose of which was to ascertain from the director what information he would require before considering himself placed upon inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act.

This discussion referred to the pulpwood industry in the Port Arthur-Fort William area, and was not subsequently followed up with the director. Neither I nor the director have received any other petitions or requests in relation to the matter raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry. Can the minister inform the house whether he has received a letter from the president of the united pulpwood farmers' association of the district of Thunder Bay complaining about the price of pulpwood being paid to farmers? If so, would the minis-

Mr, Speaker, the hon. member for Fort

Hon. H. J. Fleming (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fort William was kind enough to send me notice of his question. In answer to the first part of the question, I have received such a letter from the president of the united pulpwood farmers' association of the district of Thunder Bay.

With reference to comments, I have only this to say. It seems to me that any extended comment on a matter of such importance and pertaining to so many provinces would be rather difficult to make on such short notice. I should be glad to discuss it with the hon. member privately, but I could not make any comment at the moment.

Mr. Badanai: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister assure the house that he will give this question such study and make a report in due course?

Mr. Flemming (Royal): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I have no hesitation in giving that assurance.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO AREAS INDICATED IN BUDGET SPEECH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, and ask if he could now indicate to the house the areas of the country where unemployment is high to which he promised measures of assistance in his budget speech, as reported at page 1006 of Hansard. I refer to the sentence which I quote, as follows:

—I shall announce measures of assistance for new industries in areas of the country where unemployment is high.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that the house, in deference to constitutional practice, would expect that the budget proposals would be adopted at least in general before the government proceeded on that course that was proposed in the budget speech.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. How, then, can the members of the house deal effectively with the contents of the budget speech unless they have some indication of what these areas are, as the minister indicated in his speech?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why, Mr. Speaker, I should not have thought the hon. member would be so ready to confess a lack of ingenuity as to say what he just now says. He and others have been talking as though there were many such areas. I think the hon. gentleman had better make up his mind just where he stands on this question. This is a matter now under debate, and I do not think the hon. gentleman is suffering from any inhibitions or restrictions in debate in this regard.

Mr. Chevrier: Is it not a fact that there are distressed areas in this country? Why will the minister not tell us what they are?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I can point to one, Mr. Speaker, and that is the constituency of Laurier, not because of unemployment particularly but because of its representation here.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN DAM—REPORTED COMPLAINTS ON WORKING CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on December 19 I answered a question in the house directed to me by the member for Rosetown-Biggar, relating to a letter circularized by Joseph A. Thain, international representative of the international union of operating engineers, concerning conditions in the construction camps of Piggott Construction Company and the Ingram Construction Company, Limited, South Saskatchewan river project. I now have a report on the present situation.

An inspector of the public health engineering division of my department visited the former camp in August of last year and forwarded his report to the prairie farm rehabilitation administration of the Department of Agriculture. This was consistent with the departmental policy of referring such technical reports to departments or agencies responsible for letting contracts in order to avoid duplication. The P.F.R.A. forwarded a copy of this report to the construction companies with instructions to carry out the recommended improvements.

After I received a copy of Mr. Thain's letter I asked my department to examine both construction camps involved. Inspection took place earlier this month, with representatives of the union and the company present. It would appear that at least some of the complaints were based on out of date information, as all conditions that could be observed showed that attention had been given to my inspector's previous report. The company's project manager stated this had been done within a few days of the P.F.R.A. instructions.

The Ingram Construction camp consists of only one trailer used as living quarters, very close to the Piggott camp and sharing its facilities. Certain matters merit attention here, and a further examination will take place in a week or two.

I might add that the union has been told that some of its complaints should be taken up directly with the company, as it is felt that they do not come within the authority of the Public Works Health Act. The union has expressed to my department its satisfaction with the manner in which it had been arranged for the general situation to be improved.

FINANCE

IMPLEMENTATION OF SMALL BUSINESS LOANS LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Can he tell the house when the small business loans legislation will come into operation?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I am glad to inform the house that rapid progress has been made; the regulations have been distributed and, I am informed, the forms have been sent to the some 5,000 bank branches throughout Canada. It is expected that lending operations will commence on January 19.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): May I ask a supplementary question. When the opposition so facilitated the advancement of this legislation, why is it necessary for the banks to be unaware of this affair until January 19?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in the first place it is not a fact that the banks will be unaware of this until January 19. The banks were aware of this measure from the time it was announced in the speech from the throne nearly two months ago. Of course the banks have no access to the regulations before they are made. That is what has been in the course of distribution. So, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. member is just barking up the wrong tree completely today.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED SENDING OF STAFF TO LABOUR INDOCTRINATION SEMINARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he could obtain for us the response of the C.B.C. management to the charge contained in the current union publication called Artech and made by a Mr. Eldon Wilcox, that the C.B.C., at public expense, has sent management staff to indoctrination seminars on labour relations in the United States sponsored by the American management association, an association sometimes referred to as a union-busting organization.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of the matter to which the hon. member refers. I will make inquiry and report in due course, without accepting responsibility therefor.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS BY PRIME MINISTER AND LEADER OF OPPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Would the minister inquire from the C.B.C. why it was that on the French television network eleven o'clock news broadcast on December 25 the announcer expressed the Prime Minister's Christmas greetings without the latter's photograph appearing on the screen, whereas immediately afterward the announcer presented Mr. Pearson who, for four or five minutes, appeared on the screen and presented his Christmas greetings to the people, who are disgusted with the Leader of the Opposition for preferring Khrushchev's domination to an atomic war?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I will take up this matter with the C.B.C., Mr. Speaker.

BUDGET SPEECH—COMPLAINT RESPECTING COMMENTATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: The question which the hon. member has just asked reminds me that on reading Hansard for our last sitting I find, as recorded on page 1032, that I misunderstood the question asked by the hon. member for Roberval. Had I understood it correctly I would probably not have interrupted him at that time, and I wish to express my regret that I did, not having understood the full import of his question at the time.

INQUIRY AS TO LIVE BROADCAST OF LIBERAL RALLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question about the C.B.C. based on a perhaps apocryphal report. Would the minister check into the report that the embarrassing incident of the live microphone on the Liberal rally platform during the television broadcast was an attempt by the C.B.C. to guarantee at least one "live Mike" at the Liberal rally?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the opportunity to listen to the program, so I am not in a position to comment thereon.

I understand there was a great deal of difficulty in determining who was "live Mike" and who "dead Mike", and possibly the C.B.C. may be forgiven for having made some mistake.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO OPINION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the last question asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur suggests one for the Minister of Finance. May I ask the Minister of Finance whether, as a result of his rather extended tour last week, he is now convinced that there is an emergency unemployment problem in Canada?

Mr. Benidickson: He said so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the Minister of Finance responds to this question I should caution him that it does not seem to me to be a proper question to introduce on the orders of the day. There have been exceptions dealing with some specific phases of unemployment, but it seems improper to me to throw in the whole subject in that way.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the contending members cannot settle which one shall take the floor, I think I shall have to allow the Minister of Finance to raise his question of privilege.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take strong exception to the suggestion that at any time I have suggested there was an emergency in Canada. On the contrary, I expressly disclaim it. The only emergency I know of is the one existing in the minds of members of the Liberal party.

Mr. Benidickson: Nobody is unemployed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, since you allowed the question of the hon. member for Port Arthur, which I am sure most objective persons would admit was a little more frivolous than the question I put to the Minister of Finance, I am sure you will not mind my asking the Minister of Finance again whether as a result of his extended tour he is not now convinced that there is—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —a very serious level of unemployment in this country that calls for a recognition by the government of an emergency situation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has disregarded my caution—

An hon. Member: It is quite habitual.

Mr. Speaker: —if I may put it as mildly as that. He is in effect asking for an opinion on a very broad subject, and I am not satisfied that it is a proper question for the orders of the day. If I allowed the minister to deal with it I am sure it would result in an exchange which could only be interpreted as a debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen can do what they want but they are not going to prevent us from discussing this matter of unemployment in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rose to discuss the point of order but you acceded, and properly so, to the right of the offended Minister of Finance to speak first. Speaking to the point of order, I suggest with great confidence to Your Honour that a question addressed to the Minister of Finance in respect of unemployment is not merely asking him for an opinion but is giving him the opportunity of declaring whether or not there is to be a revision of government policy regarding the foremost domestic problem now facing the country.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member would confine his remarks to the question of order I would be glad to hear him, but when he gets into arguments relating to the question itself that is a different matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was about to say that if the question which the hon. member for Port Arthur put to the Minister of National Revenue a moment ago was a proper one, surely it is proper for me to ask the Minister of Finance whether or not his contact with the people has convinced him that there is serious unemployment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have plenty of opportunity to do that in course of the debate which we are waiting to begin.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED CONVEYANCE OF RUSSIAN PROPAGANDA MATERIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. According to Ottawa city councillor Murray Heit, as reported in this morning's newspapers, a Russian review containing outrageous propaganda is on every newsstand. Has the Post Office Department an organization set up for the purpose of allowing or forbidding this kind of review to go through the mails? If not, does the minister intend to set up such an organization?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it is not the function, responsibility or, as far as I am concerned, the desire of the department to engage in the censorship of material that passes through the mails, and we take a very firm stand in this regard. If the courts wish to declare something to be improper mailable material, we will respect the views of the courts, but I am not going to accept the hon. member's suggestion that the department or myself should make censors out of ourselves.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the view of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Denis: Can the minister tell the house whether in some other department there is an official who has any control over this Russian magazine going through the mails?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): To the best of my knowledge, no, sir.

[Later:]

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the one I put to the Postmaster General. I should like to know what facilities the government has for examining, scrutinizing and detecting magazines such as this review, if there is nobody in the Post Office Department who does this.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is posing a question which might be better brought up on the estimates of the department. It is not of such great urgency, and as the practice has been going on for some years it seems to me it is a proper subject for comment on the estimates.

CHRISTMAS OVERTIME WORK—INQUIRY AS TO METHOD OF PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. I am informed that additional work performed by postal employees in the Christmas and New Year period will be paid for by means of holidays instead of cash, whereas in the past employees had the choice of being paid either by means of holidays or by cash. Will the minister tell the house the government's views on that subject?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to tell the house first that there has been a great deal less overtime on the part of our permanent staff this Christmas than ever before, owing largely to increased efficiency in operation and certain changes which have been made. That overtime which has occurred on the part of our permanent staff has previously been either liquidated or paid in cash, largely at the option of the local postmasters. This year we have encouraged them in every possible case to liquidate it by means of time off during the month of January rather than making payments, in the interests of efficiency and economy.

AGRICULTURE

REPORTED TRANSFER OF PLANT PRODUCTS DIVISION INSPECTION SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. It has been brought to the attention of the Fort William chamber of commerce that the inspection service of the plant products division of the federal government may be transferred from the lakehead to Winnipeg. Can the minister inform the house whether such a move is being contemplated by his department?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question, for which I wish to thank the hon. member. I can assure the hon. member that no such move is being contemplated.

TRADE

RED CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE OF WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. After the long Christmas adjournment can the ministers indicate to the house what progress may have been made in discussions with trade representatives from China with respect to the sale of western wheat?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all I can say at this time is that discussions are in progress.

THE BUDGET

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, december 21, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) I should like to ask the house to consider the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) when this debate was before the house at its last sitting. The amendment was not placed before the house at the time because of the reservation which I had in my own mind as to the form of amendment which, as hon. members will note if they refer to the proceedings of our last sitting at page 1046 of Hansard, contains a substantial preamble which quotes the words of various members of this house on both sides.

I have spent a considerable amount of time in reviewing the amendments which have been made on supply and ways and means motions in the past, and have a fairly good idea of what the practice of the house has been over the last 90 years or more—it has changed somewhat from time to time—and I have come to a tentative conclusion, which perhaps I might express as a tentative conclusion and then hear hon. members who may wish to assist in the settlement of this rather interesting and, in my opinion, important procedural question; or I shall be glad to hear them first.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the better course will be to hear the members who wish to speak. I think I might give the choice to the hon. member who moved the motion or to someone from that side of the house to support it, and then hear the reply in the second place.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Personally, Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred to hear your tentative conclusion on the subject in order to abbreviate the argument as much as possible. However, in the circumstances I intend to deal with the argument put forward by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), which was brief and which seemed to me to be wholly wrong.

The hon. member for Carleton rested his case mainly on two points. One was that the amendment was vague. That is something which I do not admit for a minute. But even if it is vague I submit that in the light of Beauchesne's citation 202 in the fourth edition, paragraph 4, that circumstance does not in the least invalidate the amendment. That citation reads as follows:

> (4) An amendment cannot be ruled out because of its vagueness. Speaker Cockburn, having to give a ruling on an amendment to the address, on March 30, 1870, said: "the amendment is certainly very vague, but I cannot say the house cannot express a vague opinion".

But, Mr. Speaker, of course there is nothing vague about the amendment, with the possible exception of citations from members of the treasury benches opposite which are part of the preamble. If the hon. member for Carleton chooses to regard those statements as vague, of course that is his privilege. However, we put them in this amendment precisely because we thought they were far from vague. We thought they were precise and precisely wrong.

I now come to the other objection that was made by the hon. member for Carleton, namely that the amendment is long. May I say that the amendment is not as long as are some of the amendments that have been made in the fairly recent past, as no doubt Your Honour's researches have shown; and I am not going back beyond the year 1930 in this regard. Moreover, Your Honour indicated that you had some doubts about the recitation of argument and other matters which are properly the subject of debate. Perhaps at the same time I could deal with the question of the length of the amendment and the question of the recitation of argument in presenting these points.

At the time the point first came up for consideration I drew Your Honour's attention to the amendment moved by Mr. Heenan, the then member for Kenora-Rainy River, in the year 1932, which is reported in the Journals at page 76 for that year, and which cites in considerable number not precise statements made by ministers of the crown but press reports of statements made by ministers of the crown in order to substantiate the substantive part of the resolution. While I should like very much to read the citations, because they are exceedingly relevant to the situation in Canada, the reading of them would perhaps not be relevant to the point of order. Moreover, I have no doubt that Your Honour has already read them. The effect of them is, of course, to substantiate the substantive motion.

In addition, in the second session of 1930, which was the first session held after the election of that year, on September 18, as reported at page 29 of the Journals, an amendment was moved by Mr. Mackenzie King to a motion to go into committee of ways and means and a subamendment was moved by Mr. Garland, the then member for Bow River and seconded by Mr. Woodsworth, and it was very much in the form of this amendment, although not so long. It had only three clauses beginning with "whereas" while our amendment has six clauses; but I submit that there is no sanctity in having only three clauses rather than six. Indeed, some of the other citations I will give will be rather longer than that one.

In 1932, at page 247 of the Journals, a situation similar to the one to which I have just referred arose. Mr. Ralston had moved an amendment. Mr. Gardiner, the member for Acadia—I think that was his constituency—seconded by Mr. Woodsworth, moved an amendment of an argumentative sort very similar to this one. This time there were five clauses beginning "whereas". Therefore there does not seem to be anything unusual about the present case.

Then in the session of 1932-33, as reported at page 377 of the Journals, an amendment was moved also by Mr. Ralston, and a subamendment was moved on that occasion by Mr. Lucas. I think he was the member for Camrose; I believe that is what his constituency was called. That was seconded by Mr. Woodsworth. It also contains a series —four of them, indeed—of clauses giving an argument for the proposition.

As I have said, the most precise parallel so far as quotation is concerned is the one I drew to Your Honour's attention the other day. That is the one moved by Mr. Heenan and seconded by Mr. Mackenzie of Vancouver Centre, a very distinguished parliamentarian indeed.

There is one other consideration which I shall advance with respect to amendments to the motion to go into committee of ways and means. As Your Honour knows, the motion to go into committee of ways and means is one which gives the Minister of Finance the opportunity of reviewing the whole ambit of the economic and financial policies of the government.

I have had a careful search made of the records going back to the year 1930, and I find that until the present government came into office there were only, at any time, two points of order raised on amendments to the motion to go into committee of ways and means, and in neither case by the government. Mr. Bennett raised a point when he was leader of the opposition in 1937, and the Speaker, in July of 1942, initiated a discussion on the regularity of an amendment moved by Mr. Blackmore. But on no occasion in all that long period when Mr. Bennett was prime minister, when Mr. Mackenzie King was prime minister or when Mr. St. Laurent was prime minister, from 1930 on, has the government ever raised a question about these amendments to go into committee of ways and means.

I suggest it is for the very good reason that this is an opportunity, and has always been regarded as an opportunity, for the fullest and freest debate on the whole scope of the economic and financial policies of the government. It is surely a simple rule that any subject which may be discussed in a debate may also be the subject of a motion seeking to get the opinion of the house. What we are seeking to do in our amendment is not merely to get an affirmation from the house on the substantive part of the amendment, which Your Honour indicated you had already found in order, but also on the preamble on which that conclusion is based.

It seems to me it would be unduly restrictive of the rights of private members as against the government—I do not exclude the government members, I mean private members in all parts of the house—it seems to me it would be unduly restrictive of the historic rights of the representatives of the people as opposed to the advisers of the crown to restrict the opportunities of the House of Commons to express itself upon the whole ambit of the economic and financial policies of the government.

Finally, sir, I would draw Your Honour's attention to the amendment itself and to the citations which seem to be the only part of it to which Your Honour took much exception, or suggested there might be any exception taken. The citations are in paragraph 2. There are eight of them. They all deal expressly and explicitly with matters which were the subject of the address by the Minister of Finance in presenting his budget on December 20. They deal precisely with subjects which he dealt with upon that occasion. It is true that they express views previously expressed by the minister himself and by some of his colleagues on those subjects, but surely it is not going to be argued that the previous expressions of ministers are not a proper subject for debate and, indeed, for decision by the house.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): For debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: And, indeed, for decision by the house. It is precisely because we wish to point out how wrong the government has been, and to get the house to agree with us about this proposition, that we have listed these citations. Of course we do not deny the right of any hon. member to disagree with us, but we do claim the right to have our proposition voted upon by the house and not extinguished at the initiative of the government. It seems to me that is precisely the point that is at issue.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I add to the submissions which I made to Your Honour on December 21, particularly by drawing Your Honour's attention to paragraph 2 of citation 198 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which reads as follows:

A motion should not be argumentative and in the style of a speech, nor should it contain unnecessary provisions or objectionable words.

What applies to a motion of course applies equally to an amendment. My submission to Your Honour is that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River offends directly against this citation. The purpose of an amendment or of a motion is to state principles and to propose action or remedies; it is not to engage in argumentation or documentation which is appropriate to the proposing speech or to the subsequent supporting speeches. If citation 198 were not followed, I submit it would be impossible to draw the line anywhere and a whole speech might be incorporated into an amendment.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has cited the amendment which was moved on February 23, 1932 by Hon. Peter Heenan, and he says that is the parallel. Quite obviously it is the parallel and the model for this particular amendment. But I would point out to Your Honour that the point now raised was never argued before Mr. Speaker Black and the precedent the hon. member quotes, therefore, has all the authority that a default judgment would have if it were cited in a court of law.

I have read two of the other amendments which were cited by the hon. gentleman. I have not read the third. In the two I have read the point at issue was not raised. So I respectfully submit they in no sense constitute a precedent. What the hon. gentleman's argument really amounts to is this. It is a suggestion that somehow, by some means or other, on ways and means it is possible to breach the rules of the house; that the ordinary rules of the house do not apply in respect of a motion to go into committee of ways and means.

Of course the rules relating to amendments, the rule relating to argumentation, to relevancy, and all the rules relating to motions and amendments apply to a motion on going into supply or a motion on going into committee of ways and means equally well. If this lengthy and argumentative preamble is, as I submit, objectionable, may I ask Your Honour to consider whether the whole amendment itself is not completely out of order. On December 21 Your Honour indicated a tentative belief that the final paragraph might constitute a substantive amendment which might be severed from the objectionable parts.

My submission to Your Honour is that it is not so severable. It is clear, I think, that Your Honour has the right, before putting a motion or amendment to the house, to make technical corrections so that the motion or amendment shall conform to the usages of the house. That is citation 199.

That right does not exist, in my respectful submission, where the objectionable features of an amendment or motion are of a substantive nature, which is the case before the house. I submit it is only on the basis of this distinction that one may reconcile the first and fourth paragraphs of citation 199, or reconcile the decisions of Mr. Speaker Lemieux and Mr. Speaker Macdonald and that of Your Honour on the budget amendment of last year. Where the objectionable parts are substantive the principle which applies is that cited in the second subparagraph of paragraph 4 of citation 199, which reads in part as follows:

Any irregularity of any portion of a motion shall render the whole motion irregular.

The authority for this is Smith's Digest, seventh edition, at page 233. I endeavoured to follow that further, but I found that neither in the library nor elsewhere could Smith's Digest be obtained. I hope that lack may be rectified.

This was the position which was taken by Mr. Speaker Macdonald on November 23, 1949 when Mr. Stanley Knowles proposed an amendment on second reading of an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act. Mr. Speaker Macdonald ruled that part of the amendment was admissible but another part was objectionable on the ground that it called into question an issue already decided by the house. In the Journals at page 280 of the second session of 1949 Mr. Speaker Macdonald is quoted as follows:

Since the proposed amendment is defective in part I must rule the amendment as a whole out of order.

That decision was appealed and upheld by the house. Any seeming conflict there may be between that decision based on citation 199 and the decision of Mr. Speaker Lemieux of April 28, 1924, with which Your Honour is familiar, and Your Honour's own decision of April 4, 1960, must be reconciled, I submit, by reference to the last sentence of citation 193, which reads as follows:

If the irregularities are trivial or without bearing on the main purpose of the motion the house may agree to rectify them, but the mover himself cannot amend his own motion.

My submission is that citation 199, paragraph 1, and the first sentence in paragraph 4 of the same citation must be read as applying to irregularities which are trivial or without bearing on the main purpose of the motion. With respect, I submit it is only on such a basis that citation 199 is consistent within itself and that the various rulings from the Chair may be reconciled. Where the objectionable features are not trivial I submit there is no power either in the Chair, either before or after the amendment is put, or in the house, without unanimous consent, to sever the objectionable from the unobjectionable portions of an amendment or motion.

Consequently, in summary, it is my submission that the preamble to the amendment is out of order for the reasons I put forward at the last sitting of the house and for the several reasons I have advanced today. It being out of order, the whole amendment is irregular and cannot be rectified without the unanimous consent of the house, and neither the mover nor Your Honour has any authority to make any correction even before the amendment has been put to the house.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a number of observations to make on arguments which have been put forward on this matter. I cannot agree at all with the claim made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) on December 21 that the amendment was irregular or that the hon. member who moved it was guilty of too much vagueness. Hon. members will recall that the amendment concluded by saying:

> Therefore be it resolved that the financial policies of the government do not deserve the confidence of this country.

That, I submit, is very clear and explicit. However, I have to agree with the new submissions which have been made by the hon. member for Carleton, because it is my belief that in a want of confidence motion, though we may have an argument and a proposal, or an argument or a proposal, these must be brief and must, to use the words of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, contain the subject matter of the proposal or of the argument and not all the substantiating evidence which might be called in aid. If the argument of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate were adopted there would be nothing to prevent my asking that the whole of my last year's budget speech be incorporated in an amendment that I might wish to move. If only the argument of relevancy were used, there would be nothing to prevent a textbook which some economist had written on national finances from being included in the amendment, and being allowed.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

Let us observe for a moment what happens in a court of law. If the prosecution is able to win a conviction it is only a conviction in respect of the offence as alleged; it is not an endorsation by the presiding officers of each and every detail of the allegations which the lawyer for the prosecution has presented. I feel that relevancy alone is not the guiding consideration, and that in a want of confidence motion there should be only the bare statement of the argument and/or proposal given in its most concise form.

The people of Canada are watching procedure in this House of Commons more closely than ever before, and I should like to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that you have the right to make your decisions independently of decisions which have been made in the past. If errors have been made by speakers in the past I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to make every effort to correct those errors and establish public confidence in our manner of doing business.

I fear I must take exception to the attitude of the hon. member for Carleton during the last part of his remarks, however, because I do believe that an opposition party ought to have rights in this house. Had you made a decision on the amendment, Mr. Speaker, there might be some merit in the proposal now put forward that you ought not to accept any part of the hon. member's amendment. However, because of the fact that you delayed your decision, and because the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was thereby debarred from moving any other amendment in the course of his address I do not believe the people of Canada would take very kindly to the proposal advanced by the parliamentary secretary, as I understand it, that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River ought now to be barred from making his amendment in such a manner as would be acceptable to the Chair.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just before you make your decision, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the hon. member for Carleton did introduce some new arguments in his remarks, and I should like to deal with them briefly. It seems to me that the only argument of consequence made by the hon. member was that the preamble was irrelevant and unnecessary. Then he suggested to Your Honour that, because it was a matter of substance, if it were ruled out the whole amendment would fall.

It seems to me that the parliamentary secretary cannot have it both ways. If the preamble is a matter of substance, as I contend it is, then it should be left as part of the amendment. If, on the other hand, it is a mere matter of verbiage, then it is within the competence of Your Honour, as you did last year, to direct that the necessary corrections be made so as to conform with Your Honour's view of the rules.

Moreover, I had also intended to make the argument which was made very aptly by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), namely that Your Honour had in fact ruled upon the substance of this amendment and that we had accepted the ruling in good faith on December 21. I did not direct any argument to this question because I understood that the question had been settled and that the only question which was open to us to argue at the present time was the one on which Your Honour expressed these words:

I have my doubts about the recitation of argument and other matters which are properly the subject of debate.

Those words are to be found at page 1048 of Hansard of December 21. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has said, it seems to me that in view of the opinion given by Your Honour at that time it would not be competent to re-open that subject at this stage.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the very helpful contributions made by hon. members. It is a pity to take time on procedural matters but there is a point of importance here which I feel warrants disposition in a methodical way. I ask the indulgence of the house for a minute.

There are two questions. One is the validity of the amendment itself, whether it is defective or not in accordance with our rules. The other is what we can do about it if it is defective in part which was the question raised by the parliamentary secretary.

On the amendment itself may I say that the fact that this amendment is in almost the precise form of the one in 1932 to which I have been referred requires very good reasons if it is not to be accepted because precedents are the basis of our parliamentary procedure. I have searched out what seemed to me to be the best statements of principle and I have reviewed the precedents. I should like to give what appears to me are the most reasonable statements of principle starting with one from Redlich's "The Procedure of the House of Commons", volume 3, page 187 which clearly differentiates the stages of procedure in the house. The author says:

The third of Bentham's fundamental principles concerns the forms of parliamentary procedure themselves; he points to the necessity for a precise separation, both in form and in substance, between the different stages in the formation of the will of a political assembly, and for a strict observance of the definite logical order of these stages. Proposition, debate as a means of expressing the views of members, and voting are to be kept from intermixture. They must follow strictly in order, and must be governed by a further rule, namely, that of the unity of each parliamentary action.

That general view is supported by Bourinot. It was applied to our practice by both Bourinot and Beauchesne. Perhaps I might quote Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 191, section 1. This is a part which has not yet been quoted:

A motion is a proposal made by one member, in accordance with certain well established rules, that the house do something or order something to be done, or express an opinion with regard to some matter or thing.

May, to the same effect, at page 418 of his 16th edition, states:

—an amendment is a subsidiary motion moved in the course of debate upon another motion, which interposes a new cycle of debate and decision between the proposal and decision of the main motion and question.

What I have been trying to differentiate is the proposal put forward in the amendment, the debate which will follow, and the decision which the house will take on that proposal. What troubled me was the confusion in this motion of proposal and debate. I think it is clear to all hon. members that when the statements of members of the house which are quoted extensively as they are here, that is something that very properly could be done in the course of debate to support the verbiage which precedes those statements. That was the problem which seemed to me to be raised by this amendment.

That brings me to the question of whether a preamble before any motion is proper in our practice. It is clear in practice that there have been many. Bourinot says about preambles at page 317 of his fourth edition:

Instances may be found in the Common's journals where questions are prefaced by a preamble, but that form is obviously inconvenient, and not in conformity with the correct usage of either the Canadian or the English parliament.

He is correct about the English parliament because there preambles are not allowed but he is certainly not fully correct when he says it is not in conformity with Canadian usage as has been demonstrated by the citations from our practice to which reference has already been made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Beauchesne's citation on the same subject has already been given by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) but for charity I shall repeat it. This is citation 198 of Beauchesne's fourth edition:

A motion should not be argumentative and in the style of a speech, nor should it contain unnecessary provisions or objectionable words.

So much for a general statement of the law with respect to preambles to motions as applied in Britain and as viewed by Bourinot and to some extent by Beauchesne. It is notable, although perhaps not persuasive in this house, to cite the rule of the other place on this very subject which expressly states that no motion shall be presented with a preamble. That is rule 27 of the other place but we have no such rule.

I have, then, to deal with the practice in this house. It is clear from our practice that the preamble has been used a great many times as a preface to a motion of amendments to the motion to go into committee of ways and means. The same applies to motions to go into supply. An extensive review shows that for many years there were no instances of such an amendment with a preamble and then they would come back into style again and be used. I have collected almost all the instances which are numerous but I do not propose to trouble the house with them. Suffice it to say that it is amply established that a preamble is in accordance with our practice. Whether or not it should be is something for the rules committee to determine.

I think it might very well be considered by the rules committee because if you have a preamble then the question of what may go into the preamble raises difficulties for the Chair. The use of the preamble can lead to absurd lengths. By way of example I have only to cite one instance which I found in 1899 of a motion the preamble of which covers 21 pages of the journals. It is, I might say, a procedural monstrosity, but there it is as a precedent. It contains exactly what this amendment contains, that is quotations from political speeches made in and out of the house, quotations from letters and there are even quotations from some confidential documents included in that preamble. That, and the instance of 1932, to which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate refers, are the only two instances of actual quotations being part of the preamble. I have come to the conclusion that this amendment is not defective because it is preceded by whereas clauses, reasoning clauses or argumentative clauses in the form of a preamble, our practice to the contrary is too well established to be upset.

On the other hand, I am not satisfied that I should follow the precedent of allowing a preamble to include a lot of matter which would properly be part of the debate which would follow the motion. Therefore, without trying to split hairs at all, because I think there is a principle involved, even if the principle is only that the Speaker must do his best to draw the line somewhere between what may and what may not go in the preamble. I have come to the conclusion that the whereas clauses in this amendment are not objectionable in accordance with our practice, but that the inclusion of the eight quotations in one recital and of the two quotations in another recital are bad and should not be permitted to restore a practice which has not been followed since 1932 and only twice in our whole parliamentary history, as far as I can discover.

Therefore, my view is that if the amendment stopped after the figures "1960" in the second paragraph, so as to eliminate "as illustrated by the following ministerial statements" and the eight numbered paragraphs of statements then set out, and stopped again after the third recital after the words "Leader of the Opposition" so as to eliminate clauses one and two which quote further, the rest of the amendment would be admissible, according to our practice.

This brings me to the point that seems to trouble the hon. member for Carleton, as to what can be done about the motion at this time. This amendment has not been placed before the house. It was moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and seconded by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Instead of placing it before the house by reading it I indicated my doubts about it and reserved the motion for further consideration by the mover, the seconder and the house. I agree that, if the motion had been placed before the house neither I nor anyone else could alter it without the consent of the house.

I accept the argument of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance that if an amendment is bad in part it is bad in toto and, therefore, must be rejected; but I do not accept his proposition that the motion is not subject to revision with the consent of the mover, or rather at the instance of the mover if it is bad and he wishes to remove the error, provided that it has not been put in the possession of the house.

Briefly, this is the conclusion I have come to. If the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River wishes on his own initiative to ask that what I have described as faulty parts be removed from the motion I would be sympathetic and would feel that I had the authority to accept his proposal and then to put the motion in the possession of the house for the first time after the formal and procedural objections had been disposed of.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was called from the house; he expected to be back but he is not here. I was the seconder of this motion and, as he pointed out to me before he left that he would leave the discretion to me, I wonder whether the house would consent in the circumstances to my accepting Your Honour's suggestions on his behalf?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Then, I take it, by leave of the house, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is asking that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River be resubmitted in a revised form as suggested and put before the house in that form. Then, I think I should now put the motion before the house, if it is agreeable. The motion of Mr. Benidickson, seconded by Mr. Pickersgill, is as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

Whereas the budget speech of the Minister of Finance rests on the assumption that deficits and unemployment are inevitable features of Canadian life under Conservative government;

Whereas members of the government have failed to assess correctly economic developments in Canada in 1960;

Whereas the government persisted stubbornly and blindly in this mistaken assessment of the economic situation notwithstanding warnings issued in this house, notably by the Leader of the Opposition;

Whereas the necessity of calling parliament this fall to deal with emergency legislation and a supplementary budget confirms the position taken by the opposition and reveals clearly lack of foresight and leadership on the part of the government;

Whereas the supplementary budget converts a proposed surplus of $12 million into a forecast deficit of $286 million, which will be the fourth consecutive deficit of this government and exceeded in the post-war period in amount by only the last two deficits of this Conservative government;

Whereas the new deficit was unplanned, unexpected, and is a result of a wrong assessment of the economic situation;

And whereas the proposals in the budget do not deal with the deeper causes and manifestations of economic difficulties, and in particular with massive, persistent and growing unemployment;

Therefore be it resolved that the financial policies of the government do not deserve the confidence of this house.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, before the Christmas recess I had expressed in this house the disappointment, as I understood it, of the Canadian people with the contents of the baby budget. I deplored the fact that Liberal spokesmen had done a lot of weeping and wailing and offered no constructive proposal as to alternative policies. I refer briefly to the amendment and indicate that if that is all the Liberal party has to offer, then it has no constructive proposals to place before the house and the country.

We were meeting at a time when there was great unemployment in Canada. In the fall we were meeting at a time when our markets were not growing adequately to meet the needs of the Canadian people, Canadian industry, Canadian agriculture and Canadian workers. We were meeting at a time when actually there was a decline in the level of investments in Canada, when investment money for intensive production, for adequate establishment of markets to meet our social needs and to meet the ever-growing effects of automation was not forthcoming. Such money was not being made available in adequate amounts. We were meeting also at a time when there was yet a further decline in the net income of Canadian agriculture.

We had been called to an early resumption of the sessions of this parliament. We were here as early as November 17. We heard a lengthy speech from the throne containing a number of detailed proposals. We had been informed that we could expect a baby budget before the Christmas recess. We had received many oral assurances such as the assurance "You ain't seen nothing yet".

We had spent three years clearing out the underbrush and now the government was going to go after the tall timber. The expectations of the Canadian people were at a very high level indeed. There was hope that at long last after much procrastination the government was finally intending to tackle the needs of the Canadian people with imagination and with some vigour. Now, even as late as this afternoon, we hear with utter dismay the announcement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that there is no emergency. If there is no emergency I might well ask why the beating of the drums and the great effort to assure the Canadian people in the dying months of last year that the government recognized that conditions were very serious indeed and was about to undertake action that would begin to fell the tall timber.

Instead, in the baby budget we received only a denial in effect of most of the campaign pledges of the Conservative party. Instead of the implementation of campaign pledges we had a return on the part of Canadian Tories to the old, traditional and discredited Tory policies of the late R. B. Bennett's regime, policies of higher tariffs, curtailment of production in the industrial and the agricultural world, higher interest rates for the Canadian people, and any blessings that were handed out in the baby budget were, in typical Conservative fashion, handed out only to big business and to the investment houses of Canada.

Some people have the idea that when the masses of the people are hungry all you have to do is to add a little more to the tables of the overly wealthy and somehow a little more will roll off the tables and therefore the needs of the masses will be met. The remedies that have been proposed by the government will in our opinion not help us with regard to unemployment. They will not help to find markets for our products. They will not supply us with the needed investment capital. They will not help the needs of Canadian agriculture.

I welcome the effort of the government to reduce the percentage of equity that Americans hold in Canadian industry. However, at the same time the minister also imposed a severe additional hardship on our lower levels of government in that in effect he imposed a penalty on the municipalities and the provincial governments when they go to money markets abroad in order to meet their capital needs. The government by its proposal contained in the budget is in effect raising the interest rates that will have to be paid by hospital boards, school boards and municipal and provincial governments because it is obvious that when they want to borrow money in New York henceforth they will have to pay a higher rate than they otherwise would have had to pay.

I regret also that while the government is discouraging United States investment in Canadian equities and Canadian corporations the government is not making any proposal that would help to increase Canadian investment in Canadian enterprise. No action is proposed that will replace United States capital with our own Canadian capital, and we do need capital if we are going to meet the problems that a growing labour force calls for, that automation calls for and that intensification of our agricultural and industrial production and the lowering of our cost of production call for. We need this investment capital. The government made one welcome move but as it made that one welcome move it completely failed to encourage Canadian investment in Canadian enterprise and imposed an added hardship and burden on the backs of local levels of government.

The government has done nothing to entice the investment in Canadian enterprise of funds at present idle in Canada and much more will have to be done in this regard than is being done. Canadian investors do not invest their hard earned savings in visions. They will invest only in potentialities that are realistic, and when they see in office a government that can give them no assurance of expanding markets Canadian investors will continue to be unwilling to listen to the slogan: Let us buy Canada back for the Canadian people. Definite and specific plans and policies are needed rather than a patchwork policy and, as is so often the case with this government, a locking of the stable door after the horse has been stolen. We should be able to analyse what our credit needs are. I see no evidence that the government is even attempting to analyse what national credit needs are at all levels. We should also be able to analyse how we can best meet these needs.

This brings me directly to the possible role of our nationally owned Bank of Canada. The minister cannot for much longer deny responsibility for the actions of the Bank of Canada. The minister is the major shareholder according to the terms of the Bank of Canada Act. The Bank of Canada was established to serve the needs of the Canadian nation and the executive authority of our nation cannot begin to absolve itself of responsibility for action or lack of action or lack of adequate legislation that prevails with regard to the Bank of Canada.

The Bank of Canada is very much involved in levels of interest rates and the time has long since passed when the Bank of Canada should have been given the added responsibility of being responsible for credit needs and operations within Canada in addition to ruling over the issuing of our currency.

In all these fields markets are indeed necessary. They are the key. They are the key to unemployment, to agriculture, to business, to industry, to our investment problems and, incidentally but of great importance, to the revenues of our governments. We must enhance the tempo of our Canadian economy. The people will forgive a government that makes mistakes but the people will not forgive a government that sits idly by, formulates no policies and comes forward with no proposals for major action at this time.

The minister for the first time in the house admitted the responsibility of the government for the economic welfare of the Canadian nation. Now we ask, where are the policies which acknowledge that he in fact admits his responsibilities? Where are the markets? They can be obtained mainly at home by enlarging the public sector of our economy, by paying adequate pensions to retired civil servants, by paying a fair share of the national income to agriculture, by an adequate national program of minimum wages in co-operation with the provinces, by altering income tax rates so as to encourage consumption levels, by a comprehensive social security plan and, above all, by a policy of full employment.

Half a million unemployed in one year's time account for the loss of $1.5 billion to our national economy. When you ask us, where are you going to get the money to give this added purchasing power to the Canadian people, we point to the heavy cost so far as our wealth is concerned of half a million unemployed. We point to what in our opinion are the needlessly heavy expenditures of the Department of National Defence every year amounting to over $1.5 billion. There are markets abroad that are available. We ought to recognize that trading blocs exist and that they are growing in number and effectiveness. We ought to affiliate ourselves as much as possible with this new movement and we should also recognize that there are markets available through an adequate program of international aid.

I know that our proposals may be radical. The Canadian people do not want radical election promises. They want election promises, yes, but along with them they want a political party to tell them what policies must be implemented in order that those election promises can be met. I am convinced that we cannot afford a Tory government much longer in Canada. If this government wants to remain in office, if it wants to retain the good will of the Canadian people, I believe it can only adequately do so by appealing to the people and by the holding of a national election immediately. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin):

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following:

"In that the government has failed to adopt financial policies that would provide for:

(1) lower interest rates,

(2) an expansion of the money supply commensurate with a full employment program, and

(3) assistance to export and domestic industries by taking those steps necessary to reduce the premium on the Canadian dollar."

Mr. Speaker: Unless some hon. member wishes to raise any point on the subamendment I shall put it to the house.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, four weeks less one day have elapsed since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) presented so admirably the supplementary budget. During that period of time its proposals have been submitted to searching analysis and to exhaustive scrutiny both at home and abroad. Already it can be said that the budget has stood the acid test, that it has made major advances to the achievement of its basic objectives. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, seldom has a budget met such a universality of approval from objective critics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Indeed, in all the double talk and phony enthusiasm of a certain political rally last week there was no substantial criticism of its proposals, even from the trinity of back room big shots, the triumvirate of big business moguls, Gordon, Sharpe and Drury, who have now taken over the Liberal party.

But in his speech on December 21 the official although apparently now displaced financial critic of the opposition, my good friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), adopted a scattergun approach. Filled with statistical inaccuracies—I have a whole volume of them under my hand—his speech was an odd assortment; a curious, confused conglomeration of unrelated strictures; a hodgepodge of ill-digested criticisms.

In 30 minutes I cannot hope to deal with all his random jibes, but this I say: Nowhere were his criticisms founded upon principles. Nowhere did they reveal any consistent policy of the opposition except its total inconsistency, an inconsistency which last week became more pronounced, more vivid and more notorious as the heir presumptive, Walter Gordon, led hon. gentlemen opposite to embrace policies they have constantly spurned, to profess that which they have always eschewed.

But what was worse, Mr. Speaker, was this. The speech of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was an odd assortment of pessimism, of economic despondency, of fiscal melancholy. Characteristic it has become of hon. gentlemen opposite to indulge in preachments of gloom, in woebegone and lachrymose descriptions of our economy and Canada's future.

They do themselves and this vibrant nation much less than justice when they indulge in such tactics. Canadians today have no reason for dejection and no reason to be downcast. A temporary levelling out in our high rate of economic expansion and progress ought not to be magnified out of all proportion. It should rather be assessed for what it is, namely a period of adjustment and readjustment, a period to mark the onward and upward progress of our development. This I assert, and it will be my confident theme: no government has ever taken in such a short period of time so many productive, constructive, potent actions to provide stimulus to the economy, impetus to development, incentive to expanded employment, increased social justice payments, expanded assistance to provinces and municipalities, and inspiration to Canadian unity. These are the real facts, and this is what I propose to demonstrate to the house. But first may I say a word about the amendments.

The subamendment just moved by my friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), the fiscal spokesman for socialist thought, as well as his confused and disordered arguments, in my opinion succeeds in demonstrating that the only thing new about the new party is its name, that the so-called new party is nothing more than the old party with a new but equally repulsive socialist mask.

The amendment of the official opposition, now mangled and mauled as it has been, remains negative and destructive, illustrating only the barrenness of Liberal policy. What will interest the house now will be the tactics or the strategy of the official opposition. Now that their rally is over, will they pursue the stratagems which they adopted earlier in this session and which I can sum up in four words, fire and fall back. Yes, Mr. Speaker, their stratagems have been to fire and fall back; to criticize and criticize, to calumniate and calumniate; to scatter volleys of smears, sneers and innuendos. But when the chips are down, what a different story it is. Then, meekly, row upon row, up they stand to be counted in favour of that which they denounced, in favour of the very legislation for which they reserve their most violent strictures. How will they ultimately vote on this budget? Will they vote as they talk or will they continue, Janus-like, to face front and look back?

Last week, with the new found bravado, with what I thought was uncharacteristic bluster, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) expressed an urgent desire to commit political hara-kiri. That time, whenever it comes, I predict will be too soon to suit him, despite his roll of political drums, despite all his sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. Some of us have a rather vivid recollection of what happened after the last bold challenge hurled by the Leader of the Opposition. But before he commits political suicide on the electoral front, let him concern himself with this House of Commons. Specifically, I invite the Leader of the Opposition, when he speaks on this budget, to state where he stands on fiscal issues, to rationalize the approach that he and his colleagues have taken this session. It will be interesting to see what strategy the opposition will pursue in the future, the Lamontagne strategy or the Walter Gordon strategy or just the old-fashioned strategy of Joey Smallwood's favourite disciple.

I want to discuss some features of the speech of the official critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. It seemed to me that he took a sort of gleeful satisfaction, sometimes a gloating self-satisfaction out of alleged variations or divergences between certain forecasts and actuality. Certainly his words were waspish and sarcastic.

Let me remind the hon. gentleman of three things. First, that the so-called divergencies between forecast and actuality, whether in gross national product, in revenues, in expenditures or in deficit are much less than has frequently been the case, as indeed was the case during much of the time when he was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance. What we had then was budgeting by accident. Second, when one is dealing with very large figures, percentage calculations of course tend to wide margins of error in lump sum figures. A 1 per cent error in a calculation of $100 is $1, but a 1 per cent divergence in a calculation of $6 billion is $60 million.

Finally, I believe the hon. gentleman should be fair enough to concede that forecasts were made in a very different atmosphere than today and that equivalent or greater margins have occurred during the same period in similar calculations in the United States and other western countries.

My hon. friend will recollect that in the United States and here, the year 1960, the new decade, commenced with what now appears to have been an exaggerated, or at least temporarily exaggerated optimism. In the writings of economists such phrases as "the soaring sixties" and "the sizzling sixties" were commonplace. Let my hon. friend read the business and economic periodicals at various periods in early 1960. I have a wide variety of extracts under my hand as I speak, and only wish that I had the time to place them on the record.

What they do establish beyond peradventure is that if the Minister of Finance has had a margin of error, he was in the very best company, governmental, professorial and editorial, in the United States, Canada and elsewhere. A most realistic comment is that made by the federal reserve bank of New York in November, 1960, at page 190 of its publication in reviewing developments for the year:

> Through most of the year, the economy has been dominated by a process of business and consumer adjustments to the abatement of inflationary pressures and the dissipation of inflationary psychology. These developments have been associated with all-round ample capacity, ready availabilities of all kinds of finished goods and materials, and generally stable prices. This rather unspectacular period of adaptation has continued through September and into October and may yet have some distance to go.

With reasonable accuracy that describes as well the Canadian scene. But in this period of adaptation and despite these adjustments let us not forget that our production has risen, our G.N.P. is at an all-time high, personal incomes are at an all-time high, employment is higher—though regrettably accompanied by unemployment—retail sales have increased. exports are at an all-time peak. Now, in this budget, the government seeks to assist all sections of the community to adapt to the new environment to meet the challenge of the 1960's of new demands, new products, new markets in Canada and abroad.

Already a most significant feature is apparent. By orderly decline the Canadian dollar has reached the position where it is trading close to parity with the United States dollar. Virtually all Canadians will welcome this development, from which the economy will derive substantial and immediate benefits in terms of production and employment.

When my hon. friend the member for Kenora-Rainy River was speaking of deficits I had the impression that he was scoring debating points rather than getting to the heart of the issue. Nowhere did he whisper what he, or his old mentor, Professor Lamontagne, or his new mentor, the heir presumptive, Walter Gordon, would have done to avoid a deficit. Would he have raised taxes; and if so, which ones? Or would he have reduced expenditures; and, if so, which ones? He cannot have it both ways. He cannot face both directions at the same time.

Yet that is precisely what the Liberal rally in its plethora of platitudes last week sought to do. Reduced taxes and greatly increased expenditures; that was the theme, that the battle cry. How gullible do they think Canadians are? Under the proposals made by that rally the deficit this year would certainly exceed $1 billion.

I suggest to my hon. friends that it is time for a return by them to responsible thinking. Apparently what is needed is not only a royal commission—with or without psychiatrists—to examine the defence policy of the Leader of the Opposition, but a royal commission to examine the fiscal thinking of the trio of tyros who have replaced the four horsemen opposite.

Then the Leader of the Opposition states that these proposals are only a guide; by which expression I assume he attaches to them the same importance as Mackenzie King did to the 1919 resolutions when he described them as a chart and compass. The most significant of the "chart and compass" resolutions took 38 years to implement. Doubtless we may anticipate equivalent expedition with this guide.

What I say to my hon. friend the member for Kenora-Rainy River is this: It does not lie in his mouth to wax indignant about a deficit at one moment, to exercise all his considerable powers of flip, glib sarcasm about Conservative governments in one breath, and then at the next moment in the next breath to advocate policies the inevitable result of which would be larger and larger deficits. Yet that is precisely the dilemma upon the horns of which he has gored himself; and so gored, what a pretty sight he is.

One of my friends summed up this dilemma of the Liberal rally rather well, I think. He said, "I've read everything they said, and they succeeded, on most issues, in getting themselves in the undignified posture of straddling the fence, with an ear to the ground, grinding an axe." What an apt description of a rally which, with all its vaunted efficiency, succeeded in dealing with only 12 out of 21 resolutions, and only that number after a revolt of the young grass against the big business brass.

But what of this deficit? Naturally the Minister of Finance is not pleased by it; but should it cause any concern? What it represents is 5.6 per cent of our total expenditure this year. There have been many times in our history, both under Liberal and Conservative governments, when a deficit represented a very much higher percentage of expenditure. On an earlier occasion in the house I gave the house detailed figures and indicated that the great Liberal finance minister of all time, Mr. Fielding, in his second last budget expressed no concern over a deficit which represented 35 per cent of the total expenditure of that day. The famous Dunning budget showed a deficit of 19 per cent of expenditure. The less noted Dunning budget, his first after 1935, showed a deficit of 14.6 per cent of expenditure.

One might relate the deficit to the gross national product or place it on a per capita basis. On either basis, there have been many, many occasions when the deficit has been very much larger than now projected.

But the real test is, what is our per capita debt? The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River delights in dialectical exercises about the alleged rise in our net debt. He is strangely silent about our ability to pay. The realistic test is our per capita debt. In 1950 it was $849; in 1956 it was $701; in 1960 it was $679. With this forecasted deficit, as of March 31, 1961, it will be of the order of $684. Despite the greatest increase in services to our people of any equivalent period in our history, our per capita debt is $17 less than in 1956. That is the realistic way to look at the issue. What a record in which to take pride.

Let me turn now to the budget purposes and the tax changes. The objectives of this budget may be summed up and stated in five propositions: to provide immediate stimulus to employment; to intensify the impetus to balanced economic development; to encourage more effective use of Canadian savings in the development of our resources and industry; to assist in the improvement of our balance of payments situation and to keep a tight rein on inflationary pressures.

Let us test the proposals of the Minister of Finance in the light of these objectives, these targets. First, what of employment? The budget must be examined, of course, in the totality of government policy. It is an integrated, cohesive part of a positive, dynamic program of action to meet the problem of unemployment, seasonal, technological and chronic.

The increase in the bracket for the low rate of 21 per cent on corporations from $25,000 to $35,000 will provide an immediate spur, a further incentive to expanded economic activity. Since this government came to power in 1957 the low bracket has been enlarged from $20,000 to $35,000, and now 55,000 of the 62,000 corporate taxpayers in Canada pay only the low rate. What more positive evidence of the concern of this government for small business could be cited? What a triumphant fulfilment of the Prime Minister's election commitments to the smaller businesses of this nation, the very great bulk of which are wholly Canadian owned.

When one couples this with the enactment earlier this session of the small business loans legislation, providing government guarantees of bank loans to small business, the enactment last session of the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, so bitterly fought by the opposition, but which restored to small merchants adequate safeguards against unfair competition, and with the establishment of the small business branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the pattern of government policy is crystal clear. This government is the friend, the ally, of the progressive small businessman of Canada. It seeks to have him grow and prosper, providing secure employment and a stable community.

Then the new proposals for double depreciation are of high significance, first in areas of high unemployment and, second, generally across Canada in the development of new products and new processes. The objects are to broaden the base of our industrial output; to assist in the balancing of our productive capacity; to strengthen our secondary industry now in need of a spur to renewed activity, and to assist in what is a major, indeed, the most fundamental, goal of this government—the achievement of a higher degree of processing of our own raw materials here in Canada both for our own market and for export. The government has provided the incentive; the challenge is passed on to industry itself. Here is the opportunity. Here the chance for new ventures, for a pioneering spirit in industrial production.

These tax and fiscal measures must be examined as part of the program already placed before the house—new assistance to housing, including urban renewal and slum clearance, loans for university residences, loans and write-off for municipal sewerage installations, new aid for vocational training, establishment of a productivity council, a greatly expanded winter works incentive program. These and other measures still to be presented, coupled with the proposals in this budget, constitute the most massive program to combat unemployment ever proposed by a Canadian government and, indeed, by any other government, for most of these proposals are original, one might say indigenous to Canada.

I am not so optimistic as to believe that magic wands have been discovered in this program which when waved will cause the problem to disappear immediately. What I do say is that this government's actions are a sincere, honourable and intelligent grappling with a dislocation, part of which is seasonal, more of which is technological, all of which will respond only to a variety of treatments.

But, if we are to have a balanced development, we must increase the volume of Canadian savings available for Canadian development. To that problem the Minister of Finance has addressed himself in a realistic manner. The great pools of capital today are with the pension funds, the investment companies, the mutuals and the insurance companies. When mated with the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne regarding the investment policies of insurance companies, the proposals in this budget will provide the incentive to these institutional investors to place the bulk of their investment in Canadian enterprises. And so they ought. The trend to diversification of portfolios in foreign markets has not been a healthy one for our economy, and if these companies, which the Minister of Finance aptly styled conduits for individual investment, wish to enjoy the advantages of low tax rates, then they should participate in the fullest measure in channeling Canadian savings to Canadian development. This is not nationalism, it is just plain common sense.

A basic encouragement to individual savings is the proposal to repeal the 4 per cent surtax on investment income from Canadian sources. Canadians can avoid this surtax by investing in the future of Canada. If they want to invest in the future of some other country, let them pay the tax. Canadians must generate more capital within Canada. We need more savings by Canadians, the marshalling of those savings into capital and the wise investment thereof in Canada. Part of this program of self-reliance is dependent upon our practice of increased efficiency, productivity and thrift. For, as I hope to have the time to mention later, one of our major concerns must be to avoid a price and cost level which will bar us from export markets as well as make foreign goods more competitive in our domestic markets.

This budget, having first sought to provide additional stimulus to Canadian savings, then advances proposals to remove the incentives which attract foreign capital. Personally I was pleased that the Minister of Finance dealt so lucidly and vigorously with those who seem to assert that Canada can get along without foreign investment. At this stage of our development it just is not so, and any attempt to bar the door to foreign investment in Canada would launch us into grave economic difficulties.

In some of the comments, by some queer twist which I do not understand, this budget and, in particular, the proposals relating to withholding taxes and taxes on branches, has been represented as anti-American. How ridiculous can prejudiced assertions become? This budget, like the government, is pro-Canadian. It is not anti-anything. There is nothing, I emphasize, nothing hostile or discriminatory in these proposals. They are moderate. They are rational. They are tailored to today's needs.

Until Canadian savings are sufficient to provide all capital needed for development of our natural resources and of our processing and secondary industries—and that day has not yet arrived—we shall need foreign investment in Canada. Policies antagonistic to foreign capital would be not only shortsighted, they would intensify an unbalanced economy. So long as we manage our financial affairs in a manner commanding confidence abroad we can expect capital from abroad to seek opportunities for profitable investment in Canada. As the Minister of Finance mentioned, it cannot be turned on and off like a tap. Progressively we can strengthen our own capital position and lessen our dependence abroad, and that is one of the objectives of this budget. It is both a long range and a short term measure. Some of the impact has been immediate, as we have seen in our exchange position.

At the outset of these comments on the tax changes, I mentioned that one of the budget objectives was to keep a tight rein on inflationary pressures. It has been a central feature of this government's policy from the outset to contain inflation—and it has been a hard fight. It is not over. Vigilance and sound, flexible budgetary and monetary policies are needed to keep the battle won.

Associated with inflation is the danger of rising costs. As the fifth trading country in the world, with 20 per cent of our production disposed of in external markets, Canada cannot insulate her economy from the rest of the world. By efficiency, by productivity, by every means possible, Canadian producers must keep costs down or pricing ourselves out of world markets will be inevitable. And if that happens we may find we have also priced ourselves out of the domestic market. Every Canadian has a direct and immediate interest in preventing the loss of markets through high costs of production.

These, then, are the objectives, the purposes of this budget. I repeat what I said earlier: the legislative proposals forecast in the speech from the throne—the proposals made in this budget—are a cohesive, integrated program of action and, taken together, constitute the most massive attack upon unemployment, the most massive stimulus to a balanced economy ever launched by a Canadian government.

Now a word about the tariff proposals. Over the last few months a consistent attempt has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite and, in an exaggerated way, by their newspaper supporters in western Canada to misinterpret and malign the trading policy of this government. The universal policy of Liberalism on trade and tariffs has been to play both ends against the middle—and I mean that both literally and figuratively.

What this budget seeks to do is to restore and strengthen the historic position of the "class or kind made in Canada" items, gradually chiselled away in recent years. I hope my hon. friends opposite will not repudiate Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding under whose aegis the "class or kind made in Canada" principle was first developed. But they have encouraged the Sifton press in western Canada to paint this as high protectionist action. I have some of their ridiculous, prejudiced editorials here. My hon. friends encourage the Sifton press to paint this as a high protectionist action, and this despite the fact that the founder of the Sifton fortunes, Sir Clifford himself, was a member of the Laurier government which introduced the "class or kind made in Canada" concept which is now being restored to its original intention.

Nor do I doubt that my learned historian friend from Bonavista-Twillingate will, at some stage of this debate, seek to repudiate the history of the period 1936-39 when under the guidance of Charles A. Dunning, a one-time professed Saskatchewan free-trader, and of J. Lorimer Ilsley, a Nova Scotia disciple of Fielding, the largest number of "class or kind" items was introduced. It was the later satellites of these earlier and genuine Liberals who chipped away the benefits that their more statemanlike predecessors had sought to confer.

There is no antagonism to anyone in these proposals, but there is enlightened self-interest; an enlightened self-interest this country pursued for many years. I am not content to have Canadian secondary industry sold down the river by administrative chipping away of the clear intent of parliament expressed under a succession of Liberal and Conservative governments from 1904 to 1950. Well, that is precisely what we have had. Under a halo of self-righteousness my hon. friends opposite will no doubt describe this as high protectionism and repudiate all the great Liberals of yesteryear.

One further word. In accordance with the practice initiated, I think, by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River proceeded to try to find a name or description allegedly characterizing the budget. How obviously the hon. gentleman strained, how obviously hard put he was, is evident from the unreality of his characterizations. "Executive suite budget," he exclaimed. How ridiculous. This hardly merits a reply for all hon. members know that the tax changes are designed to put men to work now and in the future, to build and develop Canada for Canadians.

This is no executive suite budget. It is a payroll budget. That is what the hon. member should have styled it. It is a national development budget, a jobs for Canadians in Canada budget. It is a genuine Progressive Conservative budget.

With the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert as Her Majesty's first minister our country has developed and expanded to the highest peak in its history. This budget so brilliantly presented by the Minister of Finance is a further step in the march of progress, ever onward, ever upward, ever more self-reliant.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to say that the hon. parliamentary secretary's time has expired.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I would have been glad to accept one.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell) who just spoke before me, reminded me of a lawyer pleading a hopeless case. To good arguments he substituted eloquence, and it is on that score alone that I congratulate him.

I also thank him for thus affording good publicity to last week's Liberal rally. We had been pleased at the good coverage given to it by the press throughout the country, in addition to the points covered by the press we now have those presented by the hon. parliamentary secretary.

My first words, Mr. Speaker, will be to indicate that I wholeheartedly support the amendment moved by my colleague from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). It seems that, under the present government, the problems of unemployment and deficits are inevitable in Canadian life. This is so true that apparently the government failed to give adequate attention to the estimates and prospects of the economic development in Canada during 1960, since the estimated $12 million surplus forecast by the Minister of Finance will become, according to the new estimates of the minister, a deficit of approximately $300 million.

In his budget speech of March 31, 1960, the minister stated his belief that the unemployment problem would soon improve. He will have to admit that, again on that point, he was quite wrong.

As for the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam claims that it is wrong for us, Liberals, to draw the attention of the people to the errors of the Minister of Finance in his estimates for 1960. He even goes so far as to agree that the Minister of Finance might have been mistaken or ill-advised. The same hon. member states that the statements made by the Liberals amounted to mere weeping and wailing and yet we find that in the speech he made in this house on December 21, he said that the budget speech of the Minister of Finance is meant for businessmen and offers concessions to corporations and capitalists, but not to widows and orphans.

He also states that people in Canada and in other parts of the world no longer consider the government able to deal with national affairs.

He also says that the average citizen is even more disgusted with the government's failure to act. According to him, there is no reference in the budget speech to the development of domestic and foreign markets for Canadian products.

Further on, he says that he is very concerned over the future of GATT, if present ideas are going to prevail and if the government does not do anything about interest rates.

C.C.F. members weep and wail, but it seems to me they claim to have a monopoly on ability. This I do not concede; I would rather support the Liberal amendment, an amendment introduced by people who, at least, know about the responsibility of administering the country. The previous Liberal government has already done something positive about the major current problem in this country. After the last war, the government was faced with a similar situation, but there was no unemployment, because under the direction of able administrators, more concerned about the welfare of the people than about politics, solutions were presented in advance of the problems.

The government of the time had to find jobs for an increasing number of Canadians, since the population was growing rapidly and wartime production had come to an end.

That wise and experienced government created thousands of jobs each year and provided work for the ever-increasing number of workers, that is to say for those who were working in war plants, as well as for our soldiers discharged from the armed forces.

That solution was brought about by the creation of new industries, and by giving them the means of necessary expansion in order to provide more jobs for our people, by means of an outstandingly wise external economic policy which allowed us to export our surplus production.

Today, unemployment is our number one problem. Never since the great depression of the thirties has it been so serious. That should not be the case but, since 1957, the matter of full employment has not received the attention it deserved.

This government has proved unable to solve the problem, and its actions are not in keeping with the requirements of that emergency. And yet, unemployment is a reality.

Between October 1959 and October 1960 the number of unemployed in Canada has increased by 117,000. It seems to me these figures are thought-provoking; even if the number of those employed has increased by 92,000, there is still a shortage of 25,000 jobs.

What makes this situation even more complicated is the fact that the unemployment insurance fund has dwindled alarmingly. While unemployment is higher, the unemployment insurance fund is fast dwindling; obviously, those two factors are inter-related, the first one necessarily affecting the second.

It is even said that if things keep going as they are now, by May 31 next, the unemployment insurance fund will go down to an all-time low of $85 million.

The situation is most serious and requires drastic remedies.

The extent of the evil now prevailing can easily be grasped if we recall, for instance, that on May 31, 1957, the fund amounted to $878 million.

The present situation is naturally related to the constant increase in the number of unemployed, which will reach unprecedented levels this winter.

This whole unfortunate situation may be explained by a slow down of the national economy. Consequently it is imperative that steps be taken to produce immediate results, since the report submitted by the committee and tabled in the house, on the day of the adjournment, also considers that after March, when the present fiscal year comes to an end, expenses will exceed revenues, on account of the numerous insurance benefits that will be paid in April and May; that is why it is estimated that by May 31, 1961, only $85 million will remain in the fund.

Faced with the government's inaction, we, on this side of the house, had foreseen the situation which was outlined in the report submitted to the house at the time parliament adjourned for the Christmas holidays, but no more discussion was then possible.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), has played exactly the same trick on parliament when he tabled a report almost as alarming, from the same committee, on the last day of the session, last August.

Does the government wish to avoid a debate on unemployment in the house and, at the same time, prevent that report from being circulated among the public so that people may not fully realize the seriousness of the situation?

If this were the case, it would show that the government is not shouldering its responsibilities, and is afraid to show the situation as it is, after failing to consider it for the last two years.

The government has no right to play this game, while there are now more than half a million suffering unemployed, in spite of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), to the effect that no Canadian would suffer from unemployment as long as he would be Prime Minister.

It is true, however, that in the speech from the throne of this session, which was written by this government, the existence of unemployment, has at last been recognized but it was late in the day, and the government must bear the responsibility for unemployment, as it waited too long before considering it a serious issue. As a matter of fact, the legislation passed in the first part of this session will in no way immediately remedy the anxiety and suffering which affect more than half a million of our fellow citizens.

The creation of a productivity council, which was moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), is an excellent thing; it is even a necessity under the present circumstances. But there is no reason to believe that an increase in productivity will automatically eliminate unemployment. On the contrary, because, in itself, increased productivity might entail an immediate increase in the number of unemployed, for greater productivity means greater production without additional effort, or even greater production, with less work or equal production with fewer working hours.

Now, an increase in production is, in itself, beneficial. Thanks to such increase we may experience a higher standard of living, ever-increasing comfort, better health, better education, more culture and more leisure but, only on condition that we organize our economic and social life so that productivity serve the general interest, instead of throwing workers into unemployment and subsequent misery.

We must increase national productivity so as to be more able to compete on the world market, and we have to admit the progress of automation, but in the immediate context, this legislation will only bear fruit over several years.

The government chose to bring up another solution to the unemployment problem, which, to my mind, will not have any immediate impact on the employment situation in this country.

The changes to the National Housing Act are excellent and they will promote construction of additional housing, while stimulating Canadian economy to some extent, without, however, solving the problems of unemployment or of economic recession.

There is no doubt that by raising the loan percentage from 90 to 95 per cent of the estimated loan value, a greater number of people will be able to own their own homes, as a lesser down payment is needed to buy or build a house.

The extension of the reimbursement period is another improvement as it will distribute payments over a greater number of years.

However, when reading some items in the press we must admit that there is no cause for exaggerated optimism with regard to building activities in 1961. Can we, indeed ask an unemployed man, who is the head of a family, to build a home at a time when his life is so lacking in security?

[Mr. Racine.]

Even with this belated legislation, there is nothing which would justify the hope of a business revival before the summer of 1961, and unfortunately there again we cannot foresee any improvement over 1960.

The number of jobless who are now placed on equal footing with the seasonal unemployed will therefore not substantially decrease, and unemployment will remain the principal problem to be solved in this country, despite those belated pieces of legislation which will not have any immediate effect.

I read in a newspaper that, as a result, it is feared that the government may take drastic steps to replenish the unemployment insurance fund. Up to now, the government has taken no such step to replenish the fund, but I must admit, as do many workers, that the government did take drastic steps to maintain it.

On September 27, 1960, the commission published a circular letter entitled: "Insurance circular"—"Insurability". It was circular number 13, Mr. Speaker, an unlucky number for the workers, and one that will be irrevocably fatal to the government when it will have the courage to call an election.

This circular letter contains a new definition of the service contract, and will have disastrous results:

1. It will eliminate almost all cases of insurability in casual and seasonal jobs.

2. In the past, unemployment insurance offices decided on the insurability of a job, while today they have to decide whether there is a service contract or not.

3. Employers do not like this procedure, as regards the supervision to be exercised on certain projects, like the construction of private houses, woodcutting, etc.

4. Also displeased are the employees, particularly the hourly paid labourers in private housing construction. This is an encroachment upon their rights and they are placed at a disadvantage as compared to those who work for contractors. As a result they will refuse to work for an individual because he will not be able to give them unemployment insurance protection.

5. This new decision will be a serious handicap to the winter work campaigns, because workers will not be interested in taking uninsurable jobs with individuals for the construction and repair of private houses.

6. Certain employees are being refused unemployment insurance benefits even if they have paid the required contributions.

7. Workers who expected to receive benefits after paying contributions have their stamps cancelled by the unemployment insurance offices; they have to go back home empty-handed and tell their wife and children this sad news which places them in a hopeless situation. This is another doing of the Conservatives who cannot find any remedy to unemployment but who devised this backward method of saving the unemployment insurance fund.

By means of that circular, the unemployment insurance offices are seeking to ascertain whether or not there is a service contract, and to this end, they ask such silly questions as this, for instance:

Who has set the worker's salary? It is well known that when a worker is hired, the salary is set by agreement between both parties.

Here is another question. Why did you hire him? Have you ever heard of someone being hired when he is not needed?

The employer is also asked: What knowledge did you have of the type of work he performed for you? What a question. Do you have to be a carpenter to hire a carpenter?

The following is also asked: Did you remain on the premises while the work was being done? This means that from now on, an individual who is having some repair work done on his home, if he works in an office, for instance, will have to stay away from his job and remain on the premises to meet one of the requirements of the service contract.

Then there is this question: Are you employed yourself? This question is as silly as the previous ones.

One is left with the clear impression that unemployment insurance officials are instructed to supply as little information as possible, to keep benefit payments at a minimum.

In the new definition of a service contract, it is mentioned, among other things, that it is essential that the employer be on the premises when the work is done.

It is also mentioned that no service contract can be involved if the employer is less qualified than the worker himself.

Now, according to this new circular from the commission, in order to have a service contract, a garage owner has to be a mechanic himself if he hires a mechanic. How ridiculous can you get.

This matter should be reviewed without delay and important construction, repair and alteration jobs should be covered as they were on September 27 when this circular was issued.

Apparently, it was not enough to have those new instructions take effect on the date of the circular; they went a step farther and made them retroactive. That is why so many workers are being deprived of contributions paid before September 27, with the result that they are not eligible for benefits. A shabby performance indeed, particularly on the part of a government which has been indirectly responsible for the unemployment situation, through its refusal to recognize it and to take appropriate action to correct such an inexcusable state of affairs.

In order to fight our unemployment situation, the government should have increased the money supply and lowered the interest rate.

The personal income tax should have been lowered in order to leave the taxpayers greater purchasing power.

Considering the number of unemployed, the necessary measures should have been taken by the government to reduce the deficit in our trade balance.

We in Canada are like a young man with great expectations who one day would inherit from his parent several properties. He would then think himself a rich man and go about spending more than he collects in rents. And so, at the end of the year, in order to balance his budget, he would have to sell several properties. At that rate, the father's fortune would obviously not last very long.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

(Text):

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

At 8 p.m. the house resumed.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I should like to go on dealing very briefly with the problems I was discussing before six o'clock.

As we all know, foreign investments in this country have been rising steadily over the last few years, and this has provided us with the dollars needed to foot the bill. We are somewhat in the position of an heir.

Of course, I am not referring here to investments in the development of our natural resources, but to the process of downright and systematic control over our industries and businesses which has been going on, in fact, for two or three generations.

Canada's trade deficit runs to a billion dollars a year, and this cannot go on forever.

If the government were willing to grant tax concessions to any Canadians who, over a certain period of time, would undertake to set up an industry or factory to produce goods that are not now made in Canada and which have to be imported, I feel we would see new industries being established and thus achieve a dual object, namely reduce the trade imbalance and provide jobs for the unemployed. But we would have to go much further than is provided for in this budget.

In 1959, Canadian imports amounted to $244 per capita; this means that we import six times more per capita than the Americans. This points up the need to set up new industries in Canada.

We learned two things in the last two days before the Christmas recess: both the federal treasury and the unemployment insurance fund are depleted.

I should not want to conclude my remarks without saying a few words on a matter which has been and is still making headlines. I wish to speak objectively on question No. 10 on the census forms.

It will be recalled that this mention was introduced in the census questionnaire by an order in council dated February 8, 1960 and that we were informed of it on the 11th of February, that is three days later.

Notwithstanding the statement made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion) to the effect that instructions will be given to the enumerators that will tend to lessen the importance of this item, this opinion is not shared by the associations which submitted a memorandum to the minister of trade (Mr. Hees) on December 19, last. On January 5, officials of the dominion bureau of statistics stated before the special committee on associations that only the cabinet could settle this problem. So, it is the cabinet that will be held fully responsible if this question goes unsolved.

According to the associations which made representations, the mention "Canadian" concerning the origin is bound to falsify the census and I agree entirely with them.

During the last national census, in 1951, enumerators were allowed to accept "the Canadian origin", but the words themselves did not appear in the list.

However, for the 1961 census, greater importance is given this origin by the fact that it is placed at the top of the list. This is possibly a cause of confusion.

[Mr. Racine.]

On the 7th of January, the newspaper Le Soleil published statements from some Conservative members to the effect that the matter would have to be settled. Certainly a correction is called for.

I feel that in this case a dispute has been brought about by the government and it causes a problem. For the sake of a census question, the government does not hesitate to endanger the relations between Canadians of different cultures.

It is important that each ethnic group know where citizens belonging to the group are located.

In October, a Canadian trade delegation visited the countries of the European community. If we look at the official list of the 11 members of that delegation, we find that only one of them is French Canadian. This is not the first time French Canadians have been treated in such a way by the Department of Trade and Commerce, even though that department is one which would need most to be aware of the origin of Canadian citizens, in order that such delegations be truly representative.

As reported in the newspaper Le Soleil of January 7, 1961, the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Brassard) said he was under the impression that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was refusing to consider changing the question on racial origin for the simple reason that he himself had been unfairly treated by some associations.

I hope the solution of this matter will not depend on the minister's outbursts of temper, but that justice will be rendered to all.

(Text):

On behalf of the official opposition, Mr. Speaker, I wish before closing to say a word about our attitude to the C.C.F. subamendment which is now before us.

The C.C.F. subamendment contains as illustrations of the Liberal amendment three specific recommendations from the policy statement on unemployment of the national Liberal rally almost in the precise language of that policy statement. It has been said that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery and we in the Liberal party are naturally pleased—

Mr. Winch: We drafted that subamendment five weeks ago.

Mr. Racine:—to support our own policies even when they are put forward in a C.C.F. subamendment.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity this evening to say a few words in support of the supplementary budget which has been brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). It, of course, ties in closely with the comprehensive and continuing program that the government has been pursuing in order to deal with the problems of this country. In my opinion it will do a great deal to stimulate economic activity in this country, to encourage Canadians to invest in Canada and to bring as much ownership and control as possible of Canadian industry into the hands of Canadians. It will also do a great deal to increase our export trade and to create greater opportunities for employment in this country.

The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell) this afternoon went into great detail in outlining the direct benefits from the budget and it is not my intention to repeat them at this time but rather to deal with the individual items in the light of the criticism that the opposition has made of the budget. First of all, we have had the usual kind of attack that we have come to know so well in the house, a policy which apparently started some time ago when it was first brought out by that bright young Liberal Mr. Templeton who told us on television that he hoped the forecasts of some economists were correct that there would be a recession in Canada because that eventuality offered the best hope of returning the Liberal party to power. Since that time the Liberal opposition in this house have pursued a policy of trying to strike fear into the hearts of Canadians, preaching their doom, gloom and destruction.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) when he started his criticism of the budget, said this kind of talk did not amount to much, it did not have any effect on the country at all. Then he went on to disprove that statement, because very shortly after he had said that it had no effect whatsoever on the country he went on to quote from the Financial Post, which had this comment to make at page 1037 of Hansard:

> In a sharp break with all previous Canadian experience in the post-war years, consumers pulled back their spending during the first quarter"—

That is, the first quarter of 1960. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether that is entirely accurate. Actually consumer spending was up very slightly in the first quarter of 1960, but it was curtailed when we compare it with the income that labour had. During this period labour income was at an all-time high. More Canadians were working than had ever worked in this country before, and certainly there was no reason why consumer spending should have been curtailed.

I would like to suggest to the house that it is the kind of fear that is being spread by the Liberal party in this country that has brought that about. I am sure the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) will appreciate what I am speaking about when I say that a Canadian who is earning more than he ever earned before and who is working just as hard as he has ever worked before will say, "Well, the Liberal party is telling us that things are not quite as good and I am to be out of a job; I will not buy a new car this year". That kind of thing will not help this country very much. I am very glad to see that it is now being taken up throughout the country and is being recognized for what it is, because once it is recognized for what it is, this preaching of doom and gloom, we will have nothing further to fear from it.

I would now like to read what the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has had to say on this very subject in their publication Industry for January, 1961. After pointing out, as I have already said, that the year was a good and prosperous one for all Canadians and individual earnings and savings were never higher, this publication goes on to say this:

> The cause of those without jobs is not helped, for example, when an impression of an economy collapsing into blue ruin is created both at home and abroad. Such far-fetched distortions would be ludicrous if their effects were not so damaging. As it is, the painting of an exaggerated and sombre-hued picture plays a major role in the undermining of public confidence so far as the immediate future is concerned.

I suggest that is exactly the policy the Liberal opposition in this house has been pursuing. They direct a barrage of criticism at every measure that is brought forward. They say it does not meet this requirement, or it does not meet that requirement, regardless of whether the measure was designed to meet that specific requirement or not.

To go on with some of the more specific criticisms that have been made, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River indicated that in his view it was our highly valued dollar that makes our exports non-competitive across the world. Here, again, was a negative attitude. There is no doubt that we have to be concerned with our production costs, and of course the government has been concerned with that matter and has set up a national productivity council. At the same time I think it must be remembered, when discussing exports in this country, that they too are at an all-time high. In 1960 they were 6.4 per cent higher than the previous year. Our trade deficit on commodity trade was considerably lower than it has been for several years, $116 million in 1960 compared with $412 million in 1959, with a record deficit of $731 million in 1956, the last year that we had a Liberal government.

It also shows that he was completely unable to analyse the probable effects of the budget on the economy and on the country, because there is little doubt that although the government does not set the external price of the dollar, budgets do have a good deal of effect on it. After the budget of last March the premium on the Canadian dollar declined from five cents to a little over two cents. The supplementary budget has been followed by a further reduction in the dollar so that it is trading almost on a par with the United States dollar at the present time.

Therefore when we consider the trade position of this country as I have outlined it, that it was at an all-time high, and when we relate that to the fact that we have now taken action which has resulted in the reduction of the premium on the Canadian dollar, which will undoubtedly make it easier for our exporters in world markets; when we consider that the government has set up the national productivity council to make sure we are as efficient as possible in our production; when we consider that the government has taken action to make better financing arrangements for export credits, which were not available before, certainly any criticism of our policy in that regard could be nothing but misguided criticism and not in the best interests of this country.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River went on to indicate that he was not too favourable to the deficit that we had. However, he did not make any criticism of the particular things that were outlined by the Minister of Finance that had brought it about. Nor did he suggest any cutting of expenditures. In fact, his colleagues in the Liberal party, or the liberally-minded persons, or whoever they were who were meeting in Ottawa, went on to suggest that we spend a further billion dollars, not only without raising revenues, but by cutting them. They were going to reduce taxes as well as spend another $1 billion. Therefore any criticism about the deficit would certainly have to have better substantiation than the action or policy they were advocating.

The well-known Winnipeg Free Press—and I do not think there is a more staunch supporter of the Liberal party in this country than that publication—did not seem very impressed by this great policy-making body of the Liberal party. However, it went on to say:

> The fundamental problem facing Canada today so transcends all others as to make any talk of further social reforms and higher governmental expenditures at the present time not only impractical but utterly dishonest.

[Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

I would not go so far as to say the party was utterly dishonest, but certainly they have been advocating higher expenditures and they have been advocating lower taxes, and at the same time criticizing the financial position we are in at the present time.

I think one of the most surprising criticisms that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River made was bleating about the little man. He said, "People are paying more taxes than they used to pay". It is surprising to me that he found it necessary to go through such a complicated procedure to try and convince the average person in this country that he was paying higher taxes and that he was suffering under this government, because I believe that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River represents a riding very similar to my own. It may be described as a labour riding. I would think most of the people in that riding are working people who are working for wages. When they go to discover what taxes they are paying—and I have pointed this out to the house before—they usually look at the income tax form, which has the rates of tax and a table of taxes. They look there to determine what they are going to pay. They do not have to take the gross national product of the country, and they do not have to take the number of inhabitants and go into some complicated financial dealings to try and determine what they are going to pay.

In order that this can be cleared up once and for all, may I say that 85 per cent of Canadians are paying lower taxes today than they were when the Liberal party was in office, notwithstanding the fact that a great deal more money is being paid to the provinces than was the case in their regime. Also, this is notwithstanding the fact that social benefit welfare payments have increased by over 50 per cent and that we have extended the basic income tax exemptions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Where did you get that figure of 50 per cent?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): We have also reduced the sales tax on a wide range of municipal purchases. We have reduced the automobile excise tax.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I could go on and indicate other tax concessions that have been made, but I should like to ask the permission of the house to have the 1956 and 1959 tax tables and rates of tax printed in Hansard. I ask permission for this to be done in order that the public will be able to make a proper comparison and determine for themselves that taxes are lower now for the average Canadian than they were when the Liberal party was in office.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the house agreed that the hon. member should have leave to have these tables printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We shall have to examine them carefully first.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): The public will be able to examine them. They will not have to go by the kind of nonsense the Liberal party has been spouting around here. They will not be the kind of statistics they are used to getting from the hon. member for Essex East. They will be authentic for a change.

[Editor's note: Tables referred to appear on pages 1090 and 1091.]

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should also like to point out some of the increases which have been made in the payments to the provinces. In 1957-58, the total of unconditional payments to the provinces amounted to $382.6 million. For the current fiscal year this amount has increased to $543.3 million. Three years ago the federal government increased the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax from 10 to 13 per cent. This 3 per cent increase has been maintained this year and given statutory enactment for the remaining period of the present tax-sharing agreements which ends March 31, 1962. The effect of this increase amounted to payments to the provinces of $56 million in 1958-59, $67 milion in 1959-60 and an estimated $68.3 million in the current fiscal year.

At the same time the federal government has substantially enlarged its conditional payments to the provinces in connection with shared cost programs. These have risen from a total of $144.8 million in 1957-58 to an estimated $388.9 million in the current fiscal year.

I notice that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has been making a few statements during the recess and at the Liberal rally which was held so recently. He has had something to say about anti-Americanism. I suppose that any kind of action which would tend to take ownership and control of Canadian industry out of United States hands and bring it into the hands of Canadians might possibly be construed as anti-Americanism though I think it would take a considerable stretch of the imagination to place that interpretation on it. I think it would be more logical to say that the policies advocated by the Leader of the Opposition were pro-American or, perhaps, anti-Canadian, looking on it in that light.

Of course, the record of the Liberal party in this regard is clear. The Leader of the Opposition is quoted in the Vancouver Sun of Tuesday, January 10 as making the following statement—surely the most incredible statement ever made by a leader of a political party, because it is a damning indictment of his own party during the 22 years it was in office:

> He (Mr. Pearson) also said that if Canadians have allowed American domination of their development and culture it was because they didn't care enough to do anything effective about it, or even because they wanted it that way.

Perhaps the Liberal party wanted it that way during the two years they were in office, but I am pleased to see the present government taking the kind of action it is taking at this time to encourage Canadian control of Canadian industry because I think this is one of the main reasons why the Liberal party was thrown out of office and one of the things which was so heartily endorsed when this government was elected.

It is most encouraging to see this action being taken at the present time. I do not know whether these are the kind of policies to which the Liberal party wishes to return or whether they are the kind of policies the Leader of the Opposition had in mind when he suggested they would like to have an early election. We can, of course, recall an occasion when he asked for an early election once before and he found the public of this country were not very favourable toward the kind of policies he was advocating at that time. However, the hon. gentleman seems to have changed his views somewhat, because the Liberal party when in office stood idly by and watched control of our natural resources and industry slip into the hands of other countries while doing little or nothing about it.

Now, apparently the Leader of the Opposition seems to think that if we are to continue to let things go in that way we should have some payment for it. He now suggests we should shirk our responsibility in the defence of this continent and charge the United States with that responsibility. I suppose he feels that under Liberal policy they would have control of the entire country so they might as well defend it. I can only say, that I do not think these are very wise policies on which to fight an election and, speaking for myself, any time the hon. gentleman wishes to go to the country on those policies I will be happy to be there to contest them with him.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): On December 20, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) when presenting his baby budget said:

> In previous budget speeches and on other occasions I have recognized the need for flexibility in our economic policies... Not only must policies be flexible from year to year, but there are occasions when it becomes appropriate to reassess the economic outlook and to adjust fiscal policies between the main budget dates. This is such a time.

This is the second occasion on which the Minister of Finance has thought it appropriate to reassess the economic outlook between budget dates. This is the second time he has felt it appropriate to step in, as it were, in midstream. This is the second time he has given a supplementary financial statement. The first time was in December, 1957. He thought then, as he thinks now, that such a time had come.

It might be well to compare these two supplementary statements. It might be well to compare the minister's reassessments on those two different occasions and to observe the results produced or are likely to be produced. In 1957, under the Harris budget, the country was going along and paying its way with a $400,000 surplus each day. As the result of the baby budget in 1957 an era was inaugurated, and when that budget was implemented the depletion of government accounts and the overspending on current account has amounted to $2 million every day since. In other words, the minister substituted a $2 million deficit day for a $400,000 surplus day. Day in and day out the taxpayers of Canada are worse off by $2 million because of the minister's reassessment in December, 1957. Just as sure as day dawns, the people of Canada are worse off by $2 million before the day is spent, and surely for the taxpayers of Canada every day is a dismal Diefenbaker day.

This afternoon the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) referred to the inconsistency of the Liberal party. I certainly cannot accuse the government of being inconsistent about this $2 million deficit day. This $2 million a day, day after day, becomes monotonous. It becomes monotonous for the Minister of Finance. This has already far exceeded the cost of world war I while it was being fought when we had 500,000 men overseas in the three services.

The minister has had to borrow this money from the people. He has borrowed money to pay interest on this money and, what is worse, he has borrowed money to pay the interest on the interest on this money, and this has been going on over three years.

On account of the need of flexibility in the minister's mind, in 1957 the increased interest has already amounted to $200 million a year. This has gone up by over 50 per cent or by over $500,000 a day. This extra interest plus bonuses and commissions over the last three years will approximate $600 million. That is a staggering amount. It is enough to build four Welland canals based on the cost at the time the Welland canal was built. It is enough to complete our share of the St. Lawrence seaway and have a lot of money left over. It is enough to build 40 Hamilton two mile skyways across the Hamilton harbour. This is just extra interest, it is not the interest.

Worse still, a lot of this high interest is built into our financial structure and in such a way that we will have to pay extra high interest on it for a generation or more. This would not be so bad if this extra spending went to pay additional money to our senior citizens or to put men back to work.

The former government raised the old age pension by $6 a month and this government by $9 a month, a total increase of 37½ per cent, but the contributions toward that were raised by 50 per cent. This government changed the old 2-2-2 formula to a 3-3-3 formula, an increase of 50 per cent, more than enough to meet the increase in the old age pension payments.

It is true that this government put men to work in housing but the money spent in housing is capitalized and does not come out of this over-spending. That money is capitalized as is the money used for the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway and as is money used for building the South Saskatchewan dam. It is also true that men were put to work under these schemes but that money is capitalized and goes to add to our gross debt. Our gross debt as of last year was up by $2.5 billion, since this government came into power. It will be up at least by $2.8 billion by the end of this year because the minister has a deficit close to $300 million. When you add to this amount the depletion in two government accounts, the unemployment insurance account and the defence equipment account, we arrive at a figure of between $3.4 billion and $3.5 billion, more than double the cost of world war I between the dates of declaration of war in 1914 and demobilization in 1919.

All this extra spending is a far cry from the promises that we heard to the effect that there would be an increase in social services, there would be tax cuts and the budget would be balanced. As I said, the increase in social services has been more than balanced by the increases in special taxes. We know that this government has collected more taxes than any other government before in our history. It has also spent more and its accounts are more out of balance than at any time in our peace time history. This record of the government's performance and the statement that "no one will suffer by reason of unemployment so long as I am Prime Minister" certainly take the cake to my mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: You ain't seen nothin' yet.

Mr. McMillan: Indeed, perhaps we "ain't seen nothin' yet". On August 10, when speaking on the estimates of the Department of Finance, I pointed out in the house how difficult it is for hon. members of the opposition to make much sense out of the estimates. I know that there were always some lapses in spending over the money voted in the different departments. I think this year they are out $30 million or $40 million and I can understand that but the minister himself under-estimated his financial requirements to service the public debt by nearly a quarter of a billion dollars in two years. I know that the minister excused himself by saying in effect that he would be revealing his mind to the financial community and it might affect the market on new bonds if he were to make known how much interest he expected to have to pay in any particular year but the difference between the estimates and the reality in terms of the cost of servicing the public debt seems colossal alongside the close estimates of former years. The minister is presently out by $243 million in his estimating in two years.

I do not expect that the announcement made by the minister to the effect that he would have a deficit of $286 million this coming year is necessarily right. I say this because when introducing the first baby budget on December 6, 1957, as reported at page 2002 of Hansard, the minister said:

> Mr. Chairman, I have been asked several times in the house to give a financial statement. I welcome this opportunity of doing so and not least of all because of some of the things that are currently being said outside of this house.

On that occasion the minister went on to criticize the former minister of finance, Mr. Walter Harris, who two days previously in London had predicted that the government would wind up with a deficit the following March unless it cut down its high spending. The minister also criticized the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who, according to the Toronto Telegram, the previous day accused the Minister of Finance of hiding the books from parliament until after the next election. The minister doubted that anyone would be so gullible as to believe these remarks. He could not understand why such irresponsible statements were made, he said. The minister went on to state that he accepted the former minister's figure on revenue but was changing his figures for expenditures. He said that there had been increases in expenditures arising in part out of the changing economic developments and in part from new policies of this government.

In discussing the change in expenditures he first of all indicated that he was saving $164 million in relation to Mr. Harris' expenditures. I have smiled about that ever since. The minister said he would then have a surplus of $106 million but ended up with a deficit of $38.6 million in three months. The minister was out by the sum of $145 million in the three months to which the baby budget was to apply. It is therefore difficult for me to accept that the minister may be correct in his figure of $286 million. He is probably out in this estimate and in all likelihood the situation will be worse. I have described what may be characterized as the prologue to all the weird financing we have seen on the part of this government.

I have read much in the current press concerning the recent baby budget. The premier of British Columbia said he would resign if he could not make better predictions than the Minister of Finance. Premier Frost of Ontario said that the Ontario public works program will have to be cut back as a result of United States capital being taxed coming into Canada, unless money becomes more freely available in Canada.

I welcome any provision by which Canadians can develop their own country. The slowing down of foreign capital coming into Canada will depreciate the Canadian dollar. This is all to the good as far as our exporters are concerned although it will tend to increase the cost of living as we will have to pay more Canadian dollars for our imports.

A better way to help our economy in my opinion would be to keep interest rates down. Certainly everything that this government has done has tended to increase interest rates. I admit that this is not the only reason for the stagnation in our economy but it is the main basic reason. Because we protest the high interest rates, because we protest their results, we are accused of being prophets of doom and gloom. We will be accused of preaching doom and gloom because we say that this budget has nothing for the little man, because we say it does not come to grips with the all important problem of unemployment. I certainly think something could have been done to stimulate our economy and help overcome unemployment. I am not surprised that the minister has not done something along those lines to help overcome this problem, particularly when we hear him say that there is no emergency in unemployment. I was going to quote something that I have heard so often. The minister has not denied it and I am sure he said it, that is that there is no emergency in unemployment.

Whenever we predict the truth about interest rates, and they can see the results of those rates, they still say we are preaching doom and gloom. I will give the house two or three examples. At the time of the conversion loan—and we all remember that—the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance went on the air and said that everybody would get money cheaper; that the bond market would be stabilized; and that the provinces and the municipalities would borrow money to better advantage. We said just the opposite; we said that everybody would be paying more for money, and because of this unemployment would increase.

A little later the Prime Minister said, "It will mean bigger and better jobs; it will mean a higher standard of living for everybody". To disagree with the statements is to preach doom and gloom; to state the truth is to advocate doom and gloom. On many occasions when the bonds were plunging down from par to about 20 per cent below their face value the Minister of Finance said that the bond market had been stabilized; only to see the bonds go down again a few days later. We on this side of the house said that something had to be done to stop the drop in the bonds and therefore the high interest rates, and the minister at that time accused us of preaching doom and gloom.

Having in mind the fact that only on two occasions has any Conservative government had a surplus of as much as $1 million since confederation, and having in mind the inept way that this government was running its fiscal policy, I predicted in June, 1958, as recorded in Hansard at page 1587, that this government would never have a surplus. I see no reason to change my mind, although I will admit that the minister predicted a $12 million surplus this year. I have no reason to alter my prediction. It may be doom and gloom, but it is doom and gloom for the taxpayers.

As far back as April, 1959 I made another prediction. I declared that the fiscal policy was going from bad to worse. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance became very expansive in the way they were going to help the provinces. The provinces came here. I predicted on that day, as reported in Hansard of April 14, 1959, at page 2676, that there was no use the provinces coming here for help because this government could not even help itself. What happened? The provinces came here and the Prime Minister in effect told them to go home and collect their own taxes. Nothing was said about the $100 million for Mr. Frost. On different occasions Mr. Frost has said that he wanted more than $100 million.

During the election campaign Mr. Frost was in close liaison with the Conservatives in this house. After that occasion Premier Frost gave the Prime Minister a dinner in Toronto and there was much patting of one another on the back. Mr. Frost never got his $100 million. He was critical of this government because of the fact they were putting this extra tax on foreign capital; but this is doom and gloom for Mr. Frost, who else?

On various occasions I have referred to the fact that the minister gave gimmicks to the wealthy people in order to get them to take bonds or to sell bonds. These gimmicks were given to the wealthy people at the expense of the taxpayers. On August 10 last I referred to the $125 million 3 per cent bonds sold at $94.65, to mature in 19 months. This bond was so conceived as to pay individuals and corporations paying 50 per cent income tax a 5 per cent net after income tax or 10 per cent before income tax. In other words, their net earnings from this bond would be the same as if they had a bond at par paying 10 per cent or over. In his baby budget the minister says that this is an important but technical matter. These are his words:

> But unfortunately increasing use is deliberately being made by others of a device to pay bondholders the equivalent of interest in a form that is tax free.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and I have repeatedly called this to the attention of the Minister of Finance and have told him that this was a device to give the wealthy people an advantage over the ordinary taxpayers, or those who could buy only a very small number of bonds. Now because he catches the provinces doing the same thing that he has been doing he says, "I will stop you". The minister is saying in effect, if you do what I do I will stop you; I agree it should be stopped; it should never have been started. The minister says, "Obviously such issues are very attractive to individual lenders in the high income brackets". The minister is penalizing those who use this practice when buying provincial and municipal bonds. He is penalizing them not because he thinks the practice is wrong but because he wants to collect more money. This amounts to a lot of money. I always thought that a minister who would deliberately load the bond sales so much in favour of the wealthy to the detriment of the ordinary taxpayer is not a fit and proper person to be finance minister of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member can say what he likes within the rules of parliament—nobody will worry very much about that—but when he says the Minister of Finance deliberately loaded the sales to favour the wealthy and thereby give the wealthy a privilege, then I submit that offends all the basic rules of parliament. I ask that it be withdrawn because it is completely untrue in every particular.

Mr. McMillan: I will withdraw, Mr. Speaker, but if the minister did not do it deliberately, he did not know what he was doing. He must have known what he was doing because now he says the provinces are doing it deliberately.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I may deal with that point, I would say that the point is the hon. member has said the Minister of Finance deliberately rigged the rules in order to favour the rich. This is an offence against the rules of this house. He says this was done deliberately.

An hon. Member: He did withdraw.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The rule, of course, is that a member may not impute motives to another. I may say that in my opinion the words used by the hon. member did not directly impute a motive to the minister. If an hon. member says somebody did something deliberately which in itself may not be wrong, I do not think that infringes the rules of the house.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to make a short reference to the 15 per cent tax which will be placed on dividends accruing from bonds owned by non-residents. During the last three years this government has taken all the loose money available. This was done to meet the cash requirements, to meet deficits and for other obligations. Premier Frost of Ontario has said that the provinces and certain municipalities have had to go to New York to borrow money. This has been done in spite of the warning of the Minister of Finance who said it was dangerous to do so. I agree with the Minister of Finance that it would be dangerous for them to do so because they might have to pay back these obligations at some time in the future when the exchange rate was against them. However, if the municipalities had not done this we would have had more unemployment than we have.

If United States money is lent on provincial, municipal or other bonds at 6 per cent, it will only return to the lender 5.1 per cent; at an interest rate of 5.5 per cent it would only return 4.67 per cent. In order to get 6 per cent net a bond would need to yield over 7 per cent. Unless the minister withdraws from the money markets to a greater extent than he has in the past there will be only two courses open to the provinces. The first alternative will be to cut down on their capital expenditures, delay them until some future time. The second alternative would be to pay an interest rate sufficiently high to pay for this tax in whole or in part. This would mean that the minister would be taxing the provinces and the municipalities on their capital expenditures, and I do not believe this is right.

In so far as this tax will make less money available, it will tend to increase interest rates. I would predict now that if the minister goes to the money market, as he has in the past, the interest rate on our federal bonds will go up to 6 per cent or beyond and the rate on provincial and municipal bonds will go correspondingly higher.

Lately our ministers have been going out from Ottawa on a kind of crusade to find fault with members of both opposition parties. I feel their time could have been better spent in Ottawa rather than making political speeches. If the cabinet gave us good government, then politics would look after itself. I do not believe the ministers should embark upon such a crusade as they have done within the last week or two. They might have been better employed in Ottawa carrying on the business of government. I feel that they have been talking to more or less hand picked audiences. I should like to invite them to come to my part of the country to Windsor, Hamilton or Toronto and try to make the statement stick that there is no emergency in unemployment, particularly if the unemployed are allowed in the door. I think these ministers would be better employed in Ottawa trying to find jobs for men rather than trying to tell the people there is no emergency in unemployment.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I believe also that the different members of the cabinet should be helping the Minister of Finance in a department in which we have a continuing and chronic emergency.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, a debate such as we are having here tonight allows each member of this house free and independent expression of ideas and I am, therefore, pleased to take part in this debate. I should like to speak on topics of interest to this house, namely the economic, monetary and fiscal policies of this government. The budget which was presented last December has been qualified by many adjectives, a few of which have been less than commendable but most of which should have been gratifying to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). The adjective which struck me as being most applicable was the word "courageous". The minister has displayed a courage which is synonymous with the Progressive-Conservative party and with Conservative policy ever since confederation, especially since 1957.

Whenever a Conservative government has followed a Liberal government it has been necessary to introduce legislation to protect the financial structure of our country and the well-being of Canadians. Why has this been so? It has been so because the official opposition, when they were occupying the government benches, were giving to this country a careless and lackadaisical administration. Fortunately they were taken off the hook occasionally by forces from outside our economy. Whenever the economy needed legislation to combat weaknesses this has been introduced when the Liberals were out of power.

I do not intend to rehash the statements that have been made concerning the condition of our economy in 1957. I should say, however, that it was a godsend that the population of this country decided to put in power a government with such dynamic leadership and with a minister of finance who was dedicated to the task of putting Canada back in the state of expansion, full employment and a full economy.

There are those who will say that the present conditions do not justify this statement. Truer words were never spoken than those of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he said that the underbrush must be cleaned up and that action must be taken. Mr. Speaker, now is the time of action. Now is the time when this government is moving forward to fulfil the wish of all Canadians for full employment.

Let us look at the throne speech. Never before was a more comprehensive plan given to the Canadian people. It was an attack upon those germs which have crept into our financial composition, not since 1957 but since the early days of the fifties when the handwriting was on the wall and no action was taken. Was it not evident then that automation, shortage of money and a changing economy would have warranted some action? The causes were evident and the effect was driven home. However, lackadaisical and careless administration reigned and stagnation set in. As I have mentioned previously, a few bright spots appeared but they were non-recurrent and hence the slip to a slow pace in our economic expansion.

As to loans to small business, it is true that the Liberals said they thought of that matter. Prior to this government coming to power they were thinking of so much legislation that they did not have time to introduce it. The effect of this legislation will be tremendous. During the recent recess I had the opportunity of speaking to business people who were extremely enthusiastic about plans to modernize, improve and extend the services to the public. It remains to be seen how the chartered banks will play their part and how they will contribute to the welfare of that segment of our business people who have no accesss to revenues from the sale of bonds and debentures or who cannot qualify for loans from the industrial development bank.

The chartered banks have contributed to the existence of small business and I would not say, as is indicated in an expression commonly heard, that the banks lend you money only when you can prove to them that you do not need it. They made a contribution but on the assurance from the financial statement or the assets of the borrower that he was able to repay it on a short term basis. Under present economic conditions and in a changing economy where patterns of business administration are different, the banks must live. They must make loans to those who need them; and with the legislation which has been passed they should lend more money to those in the small business sector. That they have a responsibility with respect to the productive capacity of this nation is beyond doubt and I am sure that they will answer to the call. This being done, investment by small business will put many hundreds of millions of dollars to work in our economy in every sector of the country. Secondary industry, which is the key to full employment, will develop and will walk hand in hand with steady national growth.

The opposition always seem to say that nothing has been done to alleviate the problems of today. What about the productivity council, this bold and imaginative bit of legislation? Getting the brains of primary and secondary industries together with the purpose of finding a solution for those problems of our productive industries, will be of great benefit to this country. I will not delve into the sound effect of a productivity council. However, I would refer hon. members of this house to the speech made in December last on third reading of this bill by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Best) who spoke about our productivity council. In it there was information which was extremely valuable.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I feel that I must rise on a point of order. I do not think that anyone would take the slightest exception to the hon. gentleman's referring to legislation that had already been passed by the house in the present session. However, when it comes to quoting what other members have said in debates that have already been concluded in this session, it seems to me that he is going beyond the rules.

Mr. Keays: I do not believe that I have quoted any one word mentioned by the hon. member for Halton.

Action by the productivity council will solve the problem of cost of production, quality of production and improvements to production, allowing the people to transact more business at home and abroad, making products more attractive and competitive. The economy is changing. Our government realizes this fact and is geared to respond to this challenge. Hence our actions to attack our economic ills.

What about our sales problem abroad? The record speaks for itself. In 1960 we sold abroad 20 per cent more than we sold in the year 1959. The figure is an all-time high. The novel idea of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) of gathering here in convention supersalesmen the world over has had a tremendous effect on many of our Canadian producers who had toyed with the idea but had never studied it seriously. As a result of the revelations at this convention they have gone back home disposed to concentrate on a bigger and better export trade. Is this not more action to attack economic ills?

May I suggest going further in this drive for expansion or for exports and home consumption and patterning a group similar to the productivity council itself in a study directed towards bringing in new industries or expanding present ones. This council within the Department of Trade and Commerce should be made up of people who are experts or professionals in their own trade in countries other than Canada. We are a young nation. We have much to learn from those whose history dates back many centuries.

As to the products made in those countries and which could easily be manufactured here, I am thinking now of products of the nature of those contained in the recent order obtained by the Montreal Locomotive Works Limited for the building of railway cars for the Toronto transit commission. The ingenuity of this company in going south of the border to get engineers to make plans, to study their costs and to tender intelligently on this order are things that we must think of and which are progressive in this country.

I do not believe that the orders given by the Toronto transit commission are the exclusive rights of Americans, Germans or French. The Montreal Locomotive Works has proven that they can also build at a competitive price and give quality equal to any. These people taken from the primary and secondary industries of other countries would be a complement to the productivity council and to those in the business of trade and commerce who are preoccupied with sales to other nations.

Irksome and painful as it may be, we must consider that the forestry industry of Canada is one of our large wage-earners and we must realize that so much saw mill and pulp mill machinery comes from other countries. I trust that this suggestion of a complementary body will find acceptance in this chamber and that we will not export our brains but keep them at home and bring in others who can be of benefit to us.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) has accused the government of not bringing in any legislation which would cure the exchange rate. I am sure he is very sorry for having ever mentioned this. The steps taken by this government have been indirect and the only way of implementing a change in the exchange rate. I do not say that the budget was aimed at this alone, because many consequences of a satisfactory nature will result from this courageous budget.

Let me also assure you—and I doubt whether there are any who do not believe this—that this budget was not offensive to our neighbours to the south. It was a Canadian budget to meet Canadian aspirations, and was not anti-American. We have problems to solve and we should solve them at home, not in an anti-American way but as a neighbour of that country and in the interests of Canadians. Our relations with the United States of America are good, and we should assure them of our desire for co-operation inasmuch as it does not affect Canadian interests.

By raising the ceiling of profit for small business, which is extended to $35,000 before they fall into the heavy taxation bracket, we have rendered tremendous comfort to those people who needed it most. By this relief a large segment of Canadian firms will put the additional reserve profits to work, expand more and provide more employment.

Could we not think of the small firms employing from five to 25 people mushrooming throughout this country, in the west as well as in the east, manufacturing those items which heretofore came into Canada by way of importation. I am thinking of this well-conceived plan of this government intended to affect all these segments of our economy. The incentives for the establishment of businesses in new areas where labour is available, the elimination of the surtax of 4 per cent, the imposition of a 15 per cent charge on dividends paid to non-residents, as I have said before, were planned and prepared for an all-out attack on our economic ills. They were brought into affect by a progressive and systematic removal of the many obstacles which have been referred to as the underbrush. Now the way is clear for an advance towards the goal of a full economy.

What do you see south of the border? You see small towns spread out throughout the country which employ 5, 10, 15, 20 or 30 people, residents of those areas, giving them employment and supplying larger plants of the country. Everyone there has a hand in production, and there is no reason why Canadians should be denied this right.

The attitude of this government toward small business, the investment potential of Canadians, Canadian income restrictions on funds available, trust funds, mutual funds and pension funds, are all part of a well-defined plan. Canadians should produce for Canadians and in order that prices in Canada should be competitive with those of any other nation.

I said earlier that steps taken by the budget were not immediate but that the indirect effect of these steps has caused the lowering of the exchange rate. This, along with the redefinition of goods made in Canada will protect those engaged in manufacturing, thus widening the field of employment.

Think of those classes of goods which are called custom made. How many arguments will be saved at the ports of entry into Canada where purchasers argue by the hour to give their own definition of goods made in Canada. Think of those who are importing heavy equipment into Canada at the rate of $300 million, $400 million or $500 million a year and who are getting these goods across the border by a definition of goods not made in Canada because of the control system of the equipment whereby some additional light, battery or connection is attached thereto.

Those items entering Canada are competing with items being manufactured here, and I am sure that the redefinition of these words will mean more production and more manufacturing in Canada, not solely by Canadian firms but also by subsidiaries of United States firms. Savings will find their way into capital investment or into risk capital, because this government has given to the Canadian people that security which they needed for investment.

It is interesting to know that the total volume of life insurance in force in Canada, related to the national income, is 163 per cent, whereas in the United States it is 135 per cent.

I am led to believe that one reason why some of our Canadians have not invested in Canadian corporations—why they have not put a share of their money into risk capital—is because they did not feel secure about the financial policies of past governments. I am sure that as a result of the direction which is being given us by the present government and as a result of its monetary and fiscal policies Canadians will be increasingly encouraged to invest their money in Canadian companies.

There must be a warning. These pieces of legislation cannot of themselves accomplish the attainment of these ideals. Labour must be aggressive and venturesome. The unions must be understanding and tolerant. Management must be co-operative and patient, recognizing ability and leadership in the ranks. Bankers must give direction regarding our economy, and the government leadership in monetary policies. In its handling of our financial resources the government has shown courage, because it is being realistic and facing up to the demands from industry and labour, and these policies will show their effect much sooner than the opposition hopes. In view of this situation I cannot understand the amendment which is being proposed and I intend to vote freely, independently and justly in favour of the budget as prepared.

A few days ago a rally was held in Ottawa by a party called the Liberal party. It reminds me of a group of people who have assembled in a crater and who have got their heads together there to come up with solutions to the problems of the day. They have squeezed themselves together; they have put their heads together so closely that they have squeezed themselves into a cell, and I believe they have squeezed themselves off the platform of the political parties of Canada.

I see that they mention in their program unemployment benefits and greatly extended trading facilities. They speak about accelerated depreciation, easier credit and control of the Bank of Canada, improving the value of the Canadian dollar and increasing the market for Canadian goods. What kind of a binge has that party been on since this session came into operation? They do not realize that every one of those measures is a measure which has been brought in by this government. They just seem to be going a little further. They speak about the federal contribution to municipalities—here again, I think that is going back to centralization—and there is a reference to an incentive to industries to locate in certain specified areas. This sounds as if I have heard it before. It was proposed by this government.

The program talks about extended winter works and federal contributions to welfare in depressed areas. In the province of Quebec 90 per cent is now being paid, and I think the public at large must absorb at least 10 per cent of the responsibility. In addition to all these benefits there are to be cuts in personal taxation, but there is no mention of where the money is to come from to pay for all this. As I have said before, the opposition is inept, careless and lackadaisical and they are operating today as they did in the days when they formed the government of this country.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Having looked at the time, Mr. Speaker, I get the impression I shall have to defer most of my remarks until we come to a later stage. Listening to the oratory of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) this afternoon and to the oratory of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) this evening I think that at this time, when we are facing many weeks, and perhaps months, of work in this House of Commons, it might be advisable to remind the government of words which should be reiterated whenever a government begins to become imbued, as this government is, with arrogance. I say this because of the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway criticizing the opposition for criticizing the government.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we should all remember on occasions and keep in mind at all times that opposition in parliament is not a luxury to be indulged in occasionally but that it is a necessity. It is the one incontestable advantage which a free government offers independent and responsible people. It is the responsibility of the opposition to give warning, not in order to frighten but in order to instruct. The duty of the opposition is to oppose, is to criticize, is to warn, and no plea of state interest such as that made by the hon. member for Carleton this afternoon can relieve the opposition of its responsibility and obligations. I think the government and its supporters should remember those words. They are not mine. They are very famous words which have been used in the past on similar occasions.

Why is it necessary to warn? It is necessary because of conditions, existing or threatening, which are or may be serious. Listening to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, a supporter of the government, one would take it that there were no problems in British Columbia, that everything is rosy there. Yet there are items and factors of which notice must be taken. I note that according to the dominion bureau of statistics, in British Columbia in the first seven months of last year—and these are the latest figures I had available immediately after hearing the speeches today—7.7 per cent of the working force was out of work. I notice also that consumer spending in British Columbia was down by $30 million as compared with the similar period of the previous year. Motor vehicle sales in the province were down by 8.4 per cent and sales of building material were down by 25.5 percent. I find that in Vancouver the number of employable unemployed on the welfare roll was double that of a year ago. Those are some of the things which have been brought to our attention only through the medium of the D.B.S. figures, and although the figures I have mentioned are not completely up to date they are an indication of the situation.

Anyone who has read the Vancouver newspapers during the last month will know that the jobless total in Burnaby is up 260 per cent over the same period last year, city construction in Vancouver is at an eight-year low, the housing industry has declined in 1960 which was characterized as a black year and on January 1 there were many newly completed homes still unsold and unoccupied.

The government cannot close its eyes to these things. It is our responsibility to point them out, warn the government about them and ask what the government is doing to meet the situation by way of planning, policies and legislation. The government appears to adopt a lackadaisical attitude. It glosses over the unemployment situation as though it did not exist or would take care of itself if it were ignored. Apparently that is the attitude of the Minister of Finance. The minister, speaking in Moncton recently, as reported in the Winnipeg Tribune of January 11 said:

> —unemployment that does exist is due to automation in industry, an increase in the labour force and seasonal conditions.

Is that not a marvellous conclusion? The government has known about automation for years. It must have been warned about this trend by its own departmental officials. It has been warned about automation on the floor of this house year after year. Over the years we have asked how this problem would be approached, faced and met. We are told that one of the reasons is automation. The minister says the problem is seasonal unemployment. There has always been seasonal unemployment in Canada but this does not mean it will always be with us nor that we should ignore it today.

The minister referred to the advantages of the winter works program. I am not going to deny that much good can come of the program although it appears to be the only immediate policy the government has to meet the present unemployment situation.

The city of Vancouver is the third largest in Canada. In the eleven adjoining municipalities comprising what is known as greater Vancouver there is a population of approximately one million. According to figures released by the chairman of the metropolitan committee in charge of this program it will have provided employment to 2,300 people as of January 3. Any measure that provides employment is welcome but that amount of employment in relation to a population of that size is an indication of the inadequacy of the program. I give the government all credit for its attempts at long range planning as mentioned in the baby budget. I believe these measures will be of benefit but it is the immediate situation which must be of vital concern to us. The problem will not be solved as long as the government maintains the attitude that the unemployed are statistics. As a Toronto newspaper editorial pointed out, the unemployed are not statistics but people.

When we have criticized the government for its lack of policies, planning and legislation we are often confronted with the question: O.K., what would you do? The government is supposed to have the answers but nevertheless I admit this is a logical question. There are a couple of things I wish to mention and perhaps in the time at my disposal I shall have an opportunity of developing only one thought. This is a measure that could be speedily undertaken to assist in meeting the present critical situation.

My first suggestion appears to be a natural one. The government should create confidence in the minds of Canadian people and businessmen and give encouragement to businessmen and industry by following through with its declared policy of buying Canadian goods. When the government buys goods it should buy Canadian goods if the specifications are those required and if the price is relatively competitive. I think it is axiomatic that that is what is supposed to be done but I am certain it is not done to the degree it could be with the result that there is a lack of confidence on the part of Canadians and little encouragement to Canadian businessmen and industries. Of course, if you purchase from outside when you could purchase in Canada there is additional unemployment in our country. As a first step the government should rectify that situation where it exists.

It is only a year ago that I asked the then minister of veterans affairs why it was that in our major veterans hospitals the laundry was sent out and not done on the premises as is the case with most large non-veterans hospitals. I was told that it was customary to follow the procedure of sending out the laundry. It is apparently no longer customary because the government has introduced a policy in large veterans hospitals of permitting them to purchase their own laundry equipment. I am pleased to note that.

During the Christmas recess I learned that Shaughnessy military hospital in Vancouver is purchasing laundry equipment. I then received a phone call advising me that although there was a Canadian tender on supplies and equipment which they guaranteed would be produced in Ontario factories to the extent of 80 per cent the contract had been let to a United States firm under which 100 per cent of the equipment will be produced in that country. It is hypocritical of the government and its supporters to talk about the responsibility of industry and labour in this area when the government would allow a contract of this type to go to the United States. That is all I will say about the matter. The government is being unfair to the Canadian people, to industry and labour in allowing this practice to continue.

I hope that whoever is the watchdog for this phase of government administration will see to it that the government purchases Canadian goods if they meet the required specifications and are available at a relatively competitive price. The work would then be given to Canadians.

There is another matter on which I wish to lay stress which I feel could give great impetus to employment in British Columbia if we were to remove some of the unnecessary red tape and regulations applying to exports from that province.

This is something which will help us and our great timber industry. Since I require some 10 to 15 minutes to go into the matter, and since under standing orders you have to put the motion within 30 seconds, I hope that I may be able to complete this phase of my remarks at the next opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 9.45 o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of standing order 58, as provisionally amended, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on the subamendment now before the house.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Regier) which was negatived on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business will be for the rest of the week?

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know that I can answer it for the rest of the week but tomorrow we will carry on with the debate which we have been carrying on today. I understand there have been discussions which will indicate that on the following day we will take up the appointment of committees. If that business is not completed on Wednesday we will carry on with it on Thursday and follow with legislation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I call the attention of the acting house leader to the fact that Thursday is private members' day.

Mr. Nowlan: We shall have to conclude the motion on Wednesday and then go into private members' day.

It being seven minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

T.C.A.—EMPLOYMENT OF STEWARDESSES

Question No. 43—Mr. Howard:

Since January 1, 1958, has Trans-Canada Air Lines hired any stewardesses, and, if so, for each month since that time: (a) how many were hired? (b) what was the country of recruitment by numbers hired from each country? (c) how many were Canadian citizens? (d) how many were citizens of other countries, and which countries? (e) how many, if any, were given passes to come to Canada for employment?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of T.C.A. advises as follows:

It has not been customary to require crown corporations to divulge information which is basically related to internal problems of company administration and management. This is quite distinct from giving information with regard to general policy which the company may follow in major matters.

T.C.A., like every other major international air carrier, has found it highly desirable, if it wishes to cater properly to all the traffic in the foreign countries which it serves, to employ a number of stewardesses and cabin attendants recruited in those foreign countries.

This is a recognized practice on the part of major international air lines, for obvious reasons. It is in no way contradictory with the general T.C.A. policy of employing Canadians wherever possible. In fact, during the last three-year period commencing the beginning of 1958, approximately 85 per cent of the stewardesses hired by T.C.A. have been recruited in Canada and approximately 15 per cent have been recruited in the various foreign countries which are served by T.C.A.

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS FROM HUTTERITES

Question No. 47—Mr. Kindt:

How much income tax has been collected by the Department of National Revenue from the Hutterite colonies in Alberta for each of the years from 1945 to 1960?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. To answer this question would involve a disclosure with respect to the affairs of persons which would be contrary to public policy. Moreover, the secrecy provisions of section 133 of the Income Tax Act operate to preclude the taxation division from furnishing any information of this nature.

SALES TAX COLLECTIONS

Question No. 51—Mr. McIlraith:

1. How much revenue was collected by the federal government from sales tax for each of the years from 1950 to the present time?
2. How much of these amounts was collected from taxpayers in each of the provinces?

[See tables on page 1103.]

PERMITS FOR IMPORTATION OF HEARSES

Question No. 52—Mr. Boulanger:

1. How many permits were granted by order in council during the year 1959 and to date in 1960, for the importation of hearses?
2. To whom were they granted during the above period?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. During the year 1959 and to date in 1960, the prohibitory terms of tariff item 1215 were waived by order in council, on one occasion, permitting the importation of one hearse. This was covered by order in council P.C. 1959-1225 dated 24th September, 1959.

2. Mr. T. W. Curry, Sydney, Nova Scotia.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 17, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CANADA-U.S.—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED AIRPLANE EXCHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to report on the plane swap deal with the United States government?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no information to give the house in that regard at the present time.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Would the minister confirm that the rejection of the deal at this stage is United States economic retaliation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: —for the procrastination, indecision and lack of co-operation on the part of the government of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know how much of the hon. member's assertion in the guise of a supplementary question is on the record, but it was an improper use of the question period.

Mr. Harkness: I think in view of the assertions made by the hon. member I should make it clear that he is apparently proceeding on assumptions which in my opinion have no foundation whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I hear hon. members shouting "order". There was a supplementary question which I considered to be out of order, and in the circumstances I suppose an answer would be equally out of order.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour and ask whether he has given any consideration to the number of jobs that will be lost to Canadair by reason of the loss of this order.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any order such as that to which the hon. member refers.

TRADE

JAPAN—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF CONTROL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister care to comment on a press report from Tokyo that Japan might have to apply its own system of control over exports to Canada because of difficulties in negotiating a bilateral control agreement with the Canadian government? In view of the great importance of the Japanese market for many Canadian commodities, could the minister say whether a successful agreement may be arrived at at an early date?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, negotiations are proceeding with representatives of the Japanese government in Ottawa with a view to arriving at acceptable quotas on exports of certain commodities from Japan to Canada for the year 1961. So far as this report from Tokyo is concerned, all I can say is that it is quite at variance with the statements that have been made to us by the representatives of the Japanese government here in Canada.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLACEMENT OF INTERCEPTOR SQUADRONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say if he plans to replace the CF-100 interceptor squadrons, or is Canada withdrawing from the interceptor role?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, any answer to this question, as the hon. member well knows, would be a policy statement in regard to the air defence of our country. The hon. gentleman knows that this is not the stage in our proceedings at which such statements are made.

Mr. Hellyer: The lack of an answer is also a policy statement.

Mr. Starr: What does the hon. gentleman know about airplanes?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the statements and assumptions the hon. member for Trinity makes along these lines are almost completely incorrect. I think he would be well advised to not base statements on these incorrect assumptions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the minister is speaking to a point of order, but it does not seem to be an answer to the question.

INDUSTRY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CLAIMS AGAINST U.S. OWNED LUMBER COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. I apologize for not giving him notice, but I have been busily engaged on a television program this morning—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herridge: —giving my views on the Canadian flag. I do not know if I upset the apple cart or the bandwagon. My question is, in view of the fact that several small United States owned lumber camps in the Kootenays have failed in recent years and the owners have disappeared to the United States leaving their employees and creditors without recourse, and in particular in view of the recent failure of the Hilco Lumber Company where there are dozens of employees owed money, some to the extent of $900—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herridge: —and the rascals have gone off to the United States—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's preamble is getting too long.

Mr. Herridge: My question is, has the government contemplated introducing legislation that will protect Canadian citizens from this nefarious business practice?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the hon. member that this is a matter for the courts in British Columbia; one that should be dealt with through the regular judicial bodies.

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: May I ask a supplementary question. I did not make myself clear. The point is that this is a federal matter, because these employees have put the firms into bankruptcy and there is no blighter on whom to serve notice. Everybody has disappeared. Should there not be some amendment to the Bankruptcy Act?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Green: There is provision in the law of the land for substitute service and service abroad. The hon. member should consult his lawyer.

COMBINES

SCARBOROUGH TOWNSHIP, ONT.—REPORTED IDENTICAL INSURANCE BIDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I wish to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary. My question is based on a news item in the Globe and Mail of January 10, which indicates that Scarborough township received identical bids on insurance coverage for its buildings in the amount of $3,665.75 from five insurance companies that are listed. Has the attention of the minister or his department been directed to this set of circumstances, in order that the combines investigation branch might take action?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): I will take that question as notice and advise the Minister of Justice.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REPORTED REQUEST FOR CONTRIBUTIONS OF FOOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of a report that the United Nations food and agriculture organization has requested a contribution of food for South Kasai province of the Congo, where 200 persons are reported dying each day. Has Canada received any such request, and what action is Canada taking to make surplus food available to prevent starvation in the Congo?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This question is under consideration at the present time in the Department of External Affairs and in other departments of government.

Mr. Argue: How soon may action be expected, since 200 people are dying every day that action is delayed?

Mr. Green: This government always acts with great dispatch.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REVELSTOKE, B.C.—STATEMENT ON RE-EMPLOYMENT OF NON-OPERATING EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on December 21 the hon. member for Assiniboia asked a question concerning a report that certain non-operating employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the Revelstoke area who were laid off as a result of the threatened strike have not been re-employed.

I referred the question to the railway company, and the management have advised me as follows. When the grain handlers strike became effective on the Vancouver waterfront on November 8, it was necessary to make a reduction of certain employees on the Revelstoke division because of a considerable reduction in traffic. The strike continued until November 30. In addition there has been a general decline in traffic in that area. Also, with the advent of winter conditions, toward the end of November track forces were reduced and one extra gang was laid off.

Up to the present time traffic conditions on the Revelstoke division have not warranted the return to the service of additional staff. It is expected that very soon the extra gang that was laid off will be returned to the service for handling snow and, if traffic picks up, other positions will be restored.

The management add that no reductions were made that could be classed as due to the proposed non-ops strike and in contravention of the act of parliament passed in connection therewith.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. The minister's reply has to do with the grain handlers strike. My question had nothing to do with that; it had to do with the lay-offs which were made prior to the passage of Bill No. C-45. I wonder whether the minister would make further inquiries, since the information I have is to the effect that those employees were laid off in early December and not in November, which is the information he has been given.

Mr. Balcer: As I have explained, Mr. Speaker, the grain handlers strike was one of the reasons for the various lay-offs in that area. There were also other conditions that brought about the lay-offs. I think I have covered the question in my answer.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a further supplementary question. Does the minister feel that the C.P.R. management have given him a correct assessment of the situation, or are they giving the minister the run-around with an erroneous statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt if it is an administrative responsibility of the minister to express an opinion on the C.P.R. management.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO ONTARIO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the parliamentary secretary—the one from Ontario, I presume—to the Minister of Agriculture, in the latter's absence when we may expect an announcement from the government regarding the serious situation confronting the sugar beet industry, particularly that aspect which concerns the growers in southwestern Ontario.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I might state to the hon. member that this matter is under discussion and a definite answer will be provided very shortly.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he any recent information as to when the royal commission on transportation will be handing down its report?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): There is no change in the date announced earlier in the house.

TRANSPORT

EASTERN NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO BUILDING OF CAR FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Transport whether the government has yet reached a decision to build a car ferry for service to eastern Newfoundland, which matter was reported to be before treasury board in August of 1959.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): To my knowledge a decision has not been reached yet.

THE BUDGET

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. Alexander Best (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I am happy today to be able to make a few remarks during the continuation of the budget debate. First of all I should like to compliment some of those who spoke to the house last night, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) and the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Keays), for the interesting information they brought before the house on various aspects of the supplementary budget. The situation was covered to a great extent, as I have said, by these members and others such as the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), who spoke yesterday afternoon.

My own feelings over the Christmas recess, and the impression I gained from my constituents and others, was that the supplementary budget was indeed a sound one and brought forward most important changes in economic structure from Canada's point of view. As some have pointed out, it was not a budget that would perhaps affect directly the taxation position of every individual in this country in the most immediate sense but it was a broad and basic budget, one which in the long run and, indeed, in the short run in many cases, will affect us all. I feel that it was a national budget without being strictly a nationalistic budget, one which was Canadian in its scope, not anti-American, one which should help and aid the growth of our country in the months and years ahead.

It had as a most important secondary effect, and indeed one of the most important effects of all, that of bringing the Canadian dollar closer to par with the United States dollar. This is a problem about which I have received many letters, as I am sure other hon. members have as well. It is a most important matter, and the change in recent weeks is having and has had a very beneficial effect on the economic life of our country.

There are a few matters in this supplementary budget upon which I should like to touch briefly. The first is the increased depreciation applicable to new industrial plants either in areas in which there is a labour surplus or which will be manufacturing new products. I feel this important measure will have a healthy effect on many areas of our country. I can think of more than one manufacturer in my own riding who has mentioned this matter in recent months and years. I am convinced that these manufacturers will be taking positive action now as a result of this budgetary change.

Then there is the question of taxation in so far as the income of university students is concerned or the support they receive from their parents. This is another problem that has annoyed and frustrated people for many years. I believe this budgetary change is a good one. It is one upon which I have received many letters in recent months. I think the Minister of Finance is to be complimented upon these and other measures brought about in the budget.

I believe all hon. members on this side of the house are glad indeed, Mr. Speaker, to see most members of the Liberal opposition back in good health. They seem to have had a rather rough time last week at the Coliseum. As a matter of fact I was wondering, as various members of the Liberal opposition struggled to head up or head off various resolutions, whether or not control of the party was leaving them behind, or where the control really lay. Of course the old timers were there, all the old gang. We saw the old faces; the members of the boards of directors, the people who have been in the background and the foreground of this party, guiding its destiny for many years. Nothing had changed.

Nevertheless there was an outcry from the young Liberals, who were there in large numbers. They really did not get their way. They were trampled, they were pushed into the corner, but they did make their voice heard. Perhaps, at long last, we are seeing a breath of fresh air blown into the Liberal party. I see the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) smiling. We did not hear too much from him. Perhaps he is waiting for some more propitious time to voice his goals and his aspirations. When we did hear from him, it seemed to be in a negative way. He did not seem to agree with the health and welfare resolutions. He did not want his hands tied because at some time in the future he may wish to introduce measures of his own. What really disappointed me, Mr. Speaker, was the fact that we heard nothing at all from him on the subject of agriculture. As the agricultural critic of the Liberal party, and as one farmer to another, I thought at least he should have given the meeting the benefit of his opinions on various subjects such as soybeans, sugar beets, rapeseed and other agricultural commodities. We did not hear very much about that. Their agricultural platform was a void.

As a matter of fact we heard very little about agriculture and about a good many other things. I was interested in fiscal and monetary policy. There were a number of resolutions brought forward about which we heard very little except some vague references to a national planning commission, socialism at its height. Various members of the press have said it is a question whether the members of the Liberal party lunged to the left, lurched to the left or were dragged skyward or the other way. It is still a question, because no one knows where the Liberal party went last week. All that can be said is that it went off in all directions and in a lot of dust.

In so far as Liberal policy is concerned, I should like to refer to a clipping from the Globe and Mail of January 12, a newspaper which cannot be said to be biased toward us these days. The heading refers to the fact that fiscal policy remained on the agenda. Did it ever get off the agenda? I do not really know. Perhaps there are some Liberal subcommittees in some dark recesses of the Coliseum still trying to hammer out some fiscal or monetary policy. Nevertheless they were going to spend a lot of money.

There were lots of comments, of course, and lots of cures at this rally; there were comments about our budget and about other national problems. We only wish—and I say this with great sincerity—that these comments and cures would be voiced in this house and not just at rallies. We would like some positive enlightment from the opposition party as to what they really propose to do, and we would like that in this House of Commons.

Mr. Grafftey: That is asking too much.

Mr. Best: The Liberals proposed a number of things at the rally last week. I note, again in the Globe and Mail for January 12—because this had a fair amount of publicity—their comments on unemployment: "An eight-point program featuring easier credit, lower interest rates and personal income tax cuts". I ask you, Mr. Speaker, does this party really believe in tax cuts and all that sort of thing? Can the public of Canada really believe in this sort of thing?

All we have to do is look at the Liberal record in the years prior to 1957. Look at the huge surpluses that were taken from the pockets of Canadians everywhere, and how do we mesh this with the philosophy and the ideas put forward at the Liberal rally of last week? I think it simply cannot be done, and I question whether the public of Canada will think it can be done; that is, lower taxes, increased benefits and increased expenditures in every sense and form. The Leader of the Opposition and others pointed out that it was necessary to make something attractive to the public, something that they would vote for. But I think one can go too far in this direction. I think the public of Canada will also realize that.

I do not think I am being too unfair when I say to this house and to the Leader of the Opposition that there were a number of rather touching scenes at the Liberal rally last week. One of them I saw as I sat, along with many Canadians, watching the television performance which I think was on Wednesday night last. There was a lot of noise and music and the Leader of the Opposition, the Liberal leader, was waiting to begin his speech. Some of his comments came over television just before that. He said he had only 20 minutes left; his television time was vanishing and vanishing, and all the while the band played on. Stop the band, he cried. It was a touching scene. That program was going out on this evening right across the country to Canadians everywhere, and it was indeed sad.

I sometimes watch the late show on television—

Mr. Chevrier: Are you speaking of the budget?

Mr. Best: —which frequently lulls me to sleep. I am not sure which was more soporific last Wednesday night, the late show or the Liberal rally. I believe they ran tough competition one for the other; there were the good guys and the bad guys in them both, lots of guns popping off, and there was all the bluster, balderdash, and so on that one frequently sees on these late shows, these "go to sleep shows" on television.

There were other things. I was very pleased to see this, and I wish we saw more of it in this house. I am referring to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). I was delighted to hear his bilingual baritone the other evening. One of my friends called it a bathroom baritone, and I think that is perhaps the way to describe it. He has an excellent voice, and if you would allow it, Mr. Speaker, I think if he would only confine his utterances in this house to singing he might carry with him the majority opinion of this house rather than that of a small minority.

Mr. Chevrier: You are doing pretty well on diverting.

Mr. Best: I will not divert, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chevrier: Keep right on.

Mr. Best: —because it seems to me that when we come to serious subjects such as defence, we have heard the hon. member for Trinity support in this house the case for manned interceptors and various principles through the last few months and years. But the other night he changed all this. No more interceptors. I think we should really be serious as we look back on the large flip-flop that the Liberal party had last week in its platform. I do not call that diverting, or perhaps it is diverting; perhaps that is a mild way of putting it. I call that pretty serious for anyone examing the record and platform of this Liberal party.

Something that interested me about the Leader of the Opposition was that in his television speech pointed out—I have forgotten the exact words—that his party had at last decided upon a position or a platform. Which position, Mr. Speaker? Which platform? Which of the 57 different varieties that were offered last week was he deciding upon? I do not know, and I could see in the audience behind him the puzzled, bewildered frowns of his delegates, wondering just which position they were deciding upon.

He said he had decided upon it, but a little later in the same speech, or again at this rally, he covered himself very well because he said something to the effect that "We will not really be committed to anything that has been brought up at this rally. We will take this merely as guidance. It will not hold us down in the house or when we form a government". So really we are getting the best of both worlds, are we not? There are a number of policies from which they can take their choice, and they will not be bound by any of them. I think it must require practice to be able to say and bring about this sort of thing.

The purpose of this rally was very well defined by the hon. member for Trinity at its inception, in his opening remarks and introduction. He referred—to its purpose, and I am quoting from a newspaper report—as "the well-being and happiness of the individual". If ever one could come upon a more generalized, a more vague, a more pleasant-sounding position than that, I do not know how. In a way it sounds like a conference of tranquilizer salesmen; "well-being and happiness of the individual". Perhaps that is what it was meant to do, to lull the Canadian people, to put on a performance.

I did not see them on television and I was disappointed, but I am told about the pigeons. They got out of this meeting and rose to the rafters, much to the consternation of everybody. The band was playing, the dust settled down and it took them quite a long time to clear up that dust.

An hon. Member: They were homing pigeons.

Mr. Best: Perhaps they were homing pigeons. As the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) pointed out to me the other day perhaps they were just chickens going home to roost. In any case they were part of the entertainment value of this performance last week.

There are a number of other things. Indeed, it must have been difficult for the Liberal party to attempt a policy statement last week, with our government going into so many fields with vigour and determination. It must be most difficult for the opposition to try and nail down just a little corner of the canvas on something new which they can do, whether to be right or left. This presents a genuine difficulty, and I sympathize with the opposition in their attempts to do so.

I was delighted, of course, that among the coterie of notables there I saw the photograph of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in the newspapers. He was beaming down at all of us across the country and I am sure he enjoyed his time; also the joint chairmen of the rally, the hon. member for Trinity and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). I am told though perhaps not on good authority, that the hon. member for Gloucester is getting a little jealous of the hon. member for Trinity because of his singing ability, but I am sure that with practice he can achieve something like the same level of tonal quality.

The Leader of the Opposition, with considerable vigour, championed his party's cause with comments such as, "Let us have an election this year; the sooner the better, and so forth. But knowing him as we do here in this house, I think we detect just a faintly hollow note in these utterances, because he has done this before, and he has suffered the consequences of what happened when he did it before. I do not think that this remark was really meant to be taken quite at its face value.

It was quite a performance, all told. They looked at various questions such as red China. There was talk here and there about that with violent disagreements. They did not talk too much about trade. How could they? Agriculture, as I have said, was disappointing to me personally and, I think, to many others, because of the lack of direction from the hon. member for Essex East. But there were other things. It reminded me—these pigeons and all that sort of performance; the Coliseum being used for various purposes—of an opera house of sorts. Some people pointed out that all this had a slightly operatic effect, with the hon. member for Trinity adding a somewhat Wagnerian touch. Perhaps this was meant to give comic relief, or relief of some sort from the tedious round of meetings. There were many odd birds; it had a certain zoo-like quality.

On subjects such as defence, we were puzzled. We have seen, as I say, a change in this Liberal party. A party which, in part at least, was the architect of such organizations as NORAD now swings violently away from commitments and co-operation with our neighbour to the south.

An hon. Member: Bird watchers.

Mr. Best: Yes, bird watchers. They are getting out of the interceptor field. I admit it is an interesting and difficult position for Canadians. There is a large body of opinion which is concerned, as indeed we all are in Canada, about our problems with nuclear weapons. This party has decided to commit itself to the fact that Canadian soldiers will not, I gather, in Canada or presumably in western Europe, use tactical weapons of this sort, or even possibly not use tactical weapons of this sort when the foe they might be facing is certain to be using them.

I question this very delicate, this very, in a sense, distinct line along which this party is moving; and in the opinion of many Canadians it must be moving toward a markedly neutralist position. I say this because our Prime Minister and our Secretary of State for External Affairs, as shining examples, are leading our country in international deliberations toward nuclear disarmament; toward peaceful and controlled disarmament; and I think this man, our Secretary of State for External Affairs, deserves the compliments of all Canadians for the work he is doing in this connection. This, I think, is the honest, the straightforward, the progressive approach that we must take rather than committing ourselves not to using certain weapons, even though we hope we never will, not to doing certain things, toward pulling out of certain negotiations and certain commitments. This is the stand taken by the Liberal party, and I hope it will not be ours.

I think the party rally last week might have gained useful experience from certain members of the New Party. I am quoting from a letter which appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 10, 1961 from the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). In it he emphasizes some of the remarks he had made earlier regarding the new party. He says:

> I hope the new party will have success in its search for power; I hope to help prove some of my doubts wrong. It is a conviction, perhaps a delusion, of mine, that such hopes should not keep one from analysing things as they seem to be or may turn out.

I would recommend to the Liberal party that they try to take some of that philosophy for constructive and useful criticism in their party deliberations. There was a great lack of that last week, and it is only to be hoped that it may come in the future.

Regarding defence matters, one might quote again from the Globe and Mail of January 11. A lot of things were happening about the country around that date, it seems. The leader of the C.C.F. party in this house, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), is quoted as saying at Hamilton, Ontario that there is no defence in nuclear war and that our armed services should disband. Perhaps that is an extreme point of view; no defence and no armed forces. What would we do? Would we just sit and wait, and get out of our commitments and decline to work with our allies? Are we seeing here an example of the Liberal party working toward these socialist principles of isolation and a complete withdrawal from commitments, from national defence, defence abroad and joint agreements abroad? Perhaps we are. There may be some further decision coming in the Liberal party's annals, some further planning in the dark recesses of their minds in preparation for getting out of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and severing our commitments and relations with this powerful and traditional bulwark of freedom. These are the things I think Canadians will question in the months and years ahead in connection with this rally which we saw last week.

The matter of the flag, of course, was brought up and a two-year time limit was set if they returned to power. Little was said about the decades of time during which they might have dealt with this matter before 1957, or of the committee which was constituted, I believe in 1945, and which was flooded with thousands of possible flags and which 12 years later, in 1957, had not made a decision. Little was said about this, but they set this two-year limit, supposing they should be in office. These are the things we saw.

In conclusion Mr. Speaker, I should like to make three constructive points unrelated to the entertainment event of last week. They are three points which are related one to another, and I hope the Minister of Finance and the cabinet may consider them. They are matters of interest to myself and I am sure to other members in this house and to people across Canada. First of all, I should like to make a few remarks about the Royal Society of Canada. This organization, which is a body of scholars in various fields, in the arts, letters and sciences, I believe, is one which could be strengthened in our country. At the present time it is my information that they use some office space in the national research council building. I think it might be a project for the government in the years ahead to promote the independence and strength of this important body, possibly by providing some funds, by which the society might have here in Ottawa a building as its own home. I put forward this suggestion. It is not a new one; it is one which has come from some of the members of this society.

Second, I should like to propose the idea of an agricultural research council for Canada. Speaking in this house last year I complimented the government on the establishment of a new council, the medical research council for Canada, splitting off, as it did, as a section of the national research council, the first and senior body. I know that in our country we have great room, great need for a medical research council, and also for an agricultural research council. We would not entirely be copying the British example in this field where there is a medical research council, an agricultural research council and a department, I believe it is called, of scientific and industrial research, but nevertheless there is a pattern there to follow. We would be fulfilling a need for co-ordination of the tremendously costly yet important agricultural research programs which go on in this country. We have huge amounts of funds spent in the federal Department of Agriculture in this field. We have the farm system, the research and administration stations. We have our various provincial departments of agriculture and their corresponding educational institutions and research stations. I know there is some measure of liaison among these bodies now, but I think a central council which might in itself at first not have its own research facilities but would at least be a co-ordinating and advisory group in the agricultural field would indeed be merited.

Perhaps I am presumptuous in mentioning my third point. It is that in the years ahead a new ministry might be considered for our government, a ministry for science with a minister for science at cabinet level. In this we would also be following the British tradition established in 1959, when Lord Hailsham was made the first minister for science. The American, and other governments, have cabinet level people in this position. There is some value in having at cabinet level a minister who would have responsible to him such bodies as an agricultural research council and, I would hope, the national research council and medical research council now established, probably also Atomic Energy of Canada and possibly other organizations as well. This might be a means of pointing up to Canadians the tremendous importance of research funds and activities and the results of research, and also making such ever more important knowledge directly available to cabinet. There are naturally research matters and research projects which cut across all departments, and which take place in many of them. I am not suggesting that they be taken out of such departments. At first a new ministry might indeed be an advisory and co-ordinating area, or person, to whom the various bodies I have mentioned would be responsible.

I put forward these three ideas in some humility and in the hope they may be considered in the months and years ahead.

[Mr. Best.]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, as custodian of the rules of the house I am sure Your Honour will be relieved when I assure you that I do not intend to follow the example of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Best), who devoted 20 of the 30 minutes at his disposal to what I believe is the most important political event that has occurred in this country for some time, the national Liberal rally. I must say that we on this side of the house are exceedingly grateful for the amount of attention that hon. gentlemen opposite have already given to that important event in this debate, particularly when we compare it with their very sparse references to the speech made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) on Tuesday, December 20, a speech which most of them would apparently prefer to forget.

It is also noteworthy that the hon. member spent another 5 of his 30 minutes grinding his own particular axes, which no doubt could have been done at some time or other but which should not take up time in the budget debate. I assume that is also another measure of the hon. member's evaluation of the importance of the present budget.

I, sir, intend to discuss the budget and matters related to it; and unlike the hon. member for Halton, when I talk about the budget I intend to talk about the reason we had a budget. That is the unemployment crisis that exists in this country at the present time. The hon. member for Halton did not allow the naughty word "unemployment" to pass his lips.

I am not going to say that this budget is all bad. It is like the curate's egg; it is only bad in parts. I suggest, however, that an egg which is only bad in parts is not a very attractive article. That is perhaps one of the reasons the supporters of the government are anxious not to talk about this particular egg which was laid by the Minister of Finance.

There seems to be some doubt in the minds of many people as to why there was an extra or supplementary budget at all. The only reason I can think of for this is that the Minister of Finance himself felt he was being eclipsed in the struggle for publicity, and that the only way he could hold up his end was to bring down a budget. While there are one or two things the minister is proposing to do which are not bad—and we will indicate our position on them when the time comes—there is no adequate excuse for having a budget at all.

If the minister had come in with that modesty which characterizes some of his colleagues and said, "We feel there are a few changes that might be made that would not merit all the paraphernalia of a budget but which might be a little helpful," and had done this in a modest way and then allowed the results to speak for themselves, possibly six months hence there might have been some results to gratify the minister. But the minister cannot do things in that way. His method is the opposite one; he tends to blow things up into great balloons and, like all balloons, the minister's eventually burst. The expectations aroused by the minister both before and after the budget are of a character which cannot possibly be realized by any of the results that are likely to follow.

I am sorry that the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Flemming) is not in the chamber at the moment. He was here a few moments ago, and I wanted to make a reference to him. I think we from the Atlantic provinces all expected that when this great star from New Brunswick—perhaps I should call him a fallen star—came into this house, those fiscal ideas and those claims for the Atlantic region which he professed so loudly from Fredericton would reflect themselves in the budget of his namesake after he became a member of the government. It is pretty disappointing to everyone from the Atlantic provinces to see that the only reference to the Atlantic provinces is that we cannot have regional policies in this country. I paraphrase the minister's statement on that.

I want to say one or two words about one feature of this budget which I think is wholly bad. I may say that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) correctly anticipated that I would say something about this. He correctly anticipated it, of course, because he was perverting history in his speech yesterday. The hon. gentleman was very anxious to suggest that the parentage of these made in Canada proposals of the Minister of Finance was wholly Liberal. He referred to Mr. Fielding in 1904 and even dragged in poor Sir Clifford Sifton by the heels.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What was poor about Sir Clifford?

Mr. Pickersgill: He was having a poor time in the government at that time, as the hon. member knows, and resigned shortly afterward. But then the hon. member attempted to cloak this proposal in the ample folds of the cloak of Mr. Mackenzie King, and said that this government was going back to 1936, to the position taken by Mr. King which had been eroded—I am not sure if that was the hon. member's exact word—

Mr. Pallett: Chiselled.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. Of course the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett), who supplied the word, would know what that word means. I think I will accept the amendment; the word was "chiselled".

The fact of the matter is, of course, that what the government is doing is precisely what it did two years ago over dumping. It is going back just a little beyond 1936. It is going back to Bennett and arbitrary provisions giving all power to the minister, taking it away from parliament and taking away any appeal to the tariff board or on points of law to the courts, and going back to the fine old system they had in the days of Mr. Bennett when you could treat one firm one way and another firm another way, and one commodity one way and another commodity another way. I am not going to go on and debate that point today because there will be opportunity to do so on the resolution and on the bill.

I have a number of other observations I wish to make. There is one great difference; at least Mr. Bennett was not ashamed of what he was doing. In doing it he did not pretend he was a Liberal; he came out honestly and straightforwardly and not in the sly, furtive manner which is so characteristic of the Minister of Finance in dealing with trade. The Minister of Finance, of course, has emulated Mr. Bennett in another matter. He is now threatening the British; he is now waving a big stick at Mr. Macmillan, who apparently is cringing somewhere in Whitehall, fearing to have any closer relations with Europe because of the tremendous threat of retaliation from Eglinton.

What else is the minister doing? He is saying to Mr. Macmillan, "If you do not play ball we are going to rush into the arms of Uncle Sam". That is a shorthand version of the minister's speech at Ste. Adele.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is an erroneous Pickersgillian version, with no resemblance to the facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Halton talked about Liberal isolation; he talked about Liberal isolation in relation to the Leader of the Opposition, a man who, as much as any other man anywhere in the world, was responsible for the North Atlantic alliance. He need have no worry about the Liberal party leading this country into isolation, but I think we have every reason to worry about the Tory government leading this country into commercial isolation if it continues to follow the line it is following, both in this budget and in previous budgets.

Of course I do not think these made in Canada provisions were the main reason that we had a budget or indeed that we had a session before Christmas in which to have a budget. In one of those candid moments which he reserves for his peregrinations about the country, the minister said something in Brantford which was quoted yesterday; but it is such a gem, sir, that I think I ought to quote it again. I have his text here as issued by the office of the Minister of Finance, press release communique division, something which did not exist before the present government came into office, and which I believe is priced at about $10,000 a year. I believe this is to give the minister a sense of humour. I would say that of all the expenditures of the present government this particular expenditure has been the most thoroughly wasted, sir.

In this speech the minister said:

> Parliament was summoned in November to permit early action on the government's program for meeting Canada's economic problems, chiefly that of unemployment.

Then he went on, you know, balancing the one thing against the other, and said:

> It is not in any sense an emergency session; there is no national emergency.

Well, sir, there may not be a national emergency in the mind of the Minister of Finance, but in that respect I do not think he finds himself in agreement with the country, and he certainly does not find himself in agreement with those of us who sit on this side of the house.

I am going to do something which I do not think I have done before in the house. I want to set out my views about the nature of this emergency, this unemployment emergency, and I am going to follow my notes fairly closely in doing so because I want to be very precise about what I am now going to say—

An hon. Member: More sensible.

Mr. Pickersgill: —in view of the tendency of hon. gentlemen opposite both to condemn and to pervert what is said on this subject from this side of the house—

Mr. Pallett: Written by the new P. R. man in the office of the Leader of the Opposition, no doubt.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would possess his soul in patience and see—

Mr. Pallett: A professional.

Mr. Pickersgill:

> Certain facts have emerged from this debate. They are now crystal clear. First, widespread unemployment is a stark, ugly fact in Canada today...
> The second fact is that people in this country are suffering when there are evidences of prosperity, when many people are enjoying the largest incomes ever in their experience.
> In the face of those facts we still have people in Canada suffering as a result of unemployment. There are people in Canada today who are going hungry as a result of unemployment. There are ruptures in family life that are occurring day by day as a result of unemployment. In the great urban centres where unemployment is acute it is the experience of all those connected with welfare, church or philanthropic work in any capacity, or of those who hold positions of public responsibility, that men are deserting their families deliberately because that is the only way in which their families can qualify for relief assistance.
> The third fact is that these large numbers who are out of employment today want work...
> They do not want hand-outs; they do not want cash given to them; they want work...
> The fourth fact is that Canadian resources are ample. The Canadian future is bright with promise. We have not too many people in Canada. We would make no contribution to the unemployment problem if we had fewer people in Canada today. In the midst of abundance, in the midst of surpluses, in the midst of evidences of prosperity, this ugly fact of unemployment continues.
> The fifth fact is that this is a special Canadian problem... The situation that confronts Canada is not one that is paralleled in any other comparable country. The situation is quite unlike that of the days of the depression which began in 1929, when the tide of recession, the tide of unemployment, the tide of depression, struck over the entire world. That tide engulfed countries regardless of their resources and regardless of their form of government; it engulfed them all.
> Sixth, the government has made no proposals to meet the problem of unemployment...
> Not one proposal has yet been made by the government in relation to this problem. The government has hitherto made no preparation for a situation of this kind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why can you not tell the truth?

Mr. Pickersgill:

> But no preparation has been made by this government; it is a tragic fact...
> There have been ample warnings to bring about a sense of urgency to any government that had a sense of realism and sense of responsibility. It is quite apparent and deplorably manifest now that the government has made no preparation in advance to meet the type of situation which confronts Canada today...

I cannot go on, sir. I have three more pages, but every word I have just read—and I have read it, sir; I confess it— was uttered in this house in 1955 by the hon. member for Eglinton; every word.

Mr. Chevrier: Interrupting his own speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not change one single word, sir, because I could not paint such a picture of gloom and doom as the hon. gentleman did on that occasion when, though at that time the unemployment was the highest it had ever been up to then since the end of the war, it was not much more than half as high as it is today, when the same hon. gentleman from the other side of the house says there is no national emergency.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the cure for this national problem? What is the cure offered by this government? An hon. gentleman says "water", and I cannot think of a better description of the cure offered by the present government, but I think I will put it in slightly different terms, again in their own terms. The hon. member for Halton described the Globe and Mail as a neutral paper. I think perhaps it might be said that the Globe and Mail, while it is neutral with respect to the Liberal party all the time, has been driven into neutrality with respect to the government by the present government itself. I happened to be going out west, and while at Malton I bought a copy of the Globe and Mail for October 19 of last year. That was just the time when the P.C.'s, according to the Globe and Mail, were sharpening the focus. I hold up this paper for hon. members to see, because they will see here a picture of what purports to be the Prime Minister and the Premier of Ontario, and it certainly looks as though the focus needed to be sharpened.

What was the program to meet all these problems? What was the program to fight these things? The article by Mr. Godfrey Hudson has to do with a meeting of the Ontario Progressive Conservative association at which it is alleged they were not too keen to have the Prime Minister but to which he insisted on going anyway. He is quoted by Mr. Hudson as follows:

"We have just begun now to fight," he said in an apparent reference to the next election. Mr. Diefenbaker said the Conservatives would expand their information services.

Expand their information services. That is how you deal with unemployment; you expand information services. These are Mr. Hudson's words, of course, but I accept them as my own.

This is another way of saying that the government feels it has not been getting through to the public in the way it would like to and that it is going to try to relay its message with more telling impact. The image it wants is not in sharp focus.

There is a good deal more to the same effect. There is one gem here, sir, that I am sure you will appreciate, as will every member of the house:

Within the party there is a feeling that members of the cabinet have had to spend so much time learning the ropes that their public performances have suffered. They simply have not been able to get away from their desks—

This is the ministers—not able to get away from their desks. One thinks of "Oklahoma"; they have gone "about as fur as they can go".

They simply have not been able to get away from their desks often enough to do the kind of selling job that Conservative advisers—

Conservative advisers; Grosart and company.

—regard as necessary. The pressure of the familiarization process has now eased and Canadians may expect to see a more aggressive approach by the government in defending its actions and explaining its policies.

I suppose that explains these missionary journeys around the country recently. Then these words:

The party feels that the government has had a good program but we haven't sold it.

As a matter of fact, judging from a lot of evidence I think that is quite true. They have not sold it. A few days later the Prime Minister had his own meeting here in Ottawa, and he was still on this theme of more publicity. Then he spoke in Quebec, not to leave out any part of the country and in Quebec he said, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of December 10, 1960:

We have done ... things but failed to advertise. We are going to carry the message across the country.

In Ottawa he had said something that will not be forgotten by the people of the country for a long time. He said "You ain't seen nothin' yet". I thought that was true, sir, when I looked at the newspapers yesterday and saw the picture of that big fish. It is not a very good picture, not a very good technical performance, and when I first looked at it I thought it was an advertisement for Stanfield's unshrinkables. But, sir, when I looked at it again I saw that that was just the effect of the tropical light. I also thought this was not the only fish that the Prime Minister was trying to stuff. I got a sample of the stuffing as soon as I could, the stuffing for the big fish that the Prime Minister hopes to catch in another election, and I have it here. It is called "The Record Speaks". If I had been naming it I am not so sure that I would not have said "the record shrieks". In line with its contents I think perhaps that would have been a more appropriate title.

The most extraordinary feature of this little volume, sir, is that whatever other works of fiction may have been produced in this country in recent months, this one surpasses anything else. I only wish, sir, that I had the time and you had the patience to let me take it to pieces as it should be taken to pieces. However, I simply draw your attention to the inside cover before you even get to page 1. On the inside cover there are what purport to be unemployment figures for what appear to be certain selected years since 1936. When you compare these figures with the figures that the Minister of Trade and Commerce put on the record in answer to a starred question, which will be found on page 1026 of Hansard, you find that there is very little resemblance between the two sets of figures. Which is the truth, what the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us in the house or these figures in "The Record Speaks"? I suggest, sir, that it is a shocking thing to produce something which purports to be a record, which the government that authorized its production are ashamed to put on the records of the house because they know it is fiction.

Now, sir, there is another measure of unemployment they give all unconsciously. In this beautiful summary on page 1 they say:

> The Progressive Conservative government has increased payments as follows—

Listen to these two instances, sir, and I will only give you two; unemployment assistance from $8 million to $40 million, up 408 per cent. Why is it necessary to pay four times as much unemployment assistance today as it was when we were in office? Why? Because there are at least four times as many unemployed; either that or the government is wasting money. I do not say there are four times as many unemployed, but I say there are four times as many unemployment needing assistance or the government is wasting money.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You would not eliminate the threshold provision.

Mr. Pickersgill: The threshold provision would only account for perhaps $1 million of that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are away out again.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister had better go on and account for the other $28 or $29 million. Then they refer to unemployment insurance payments increased from $231 million to $415 million, up 79 per cent. Is unemployment insurance paid to people who are not unemployed? Surely this is the best evidence of the difference between the situation as it was and as it is.

If you want another measure of the fictional character of this work, not going beyond page 1, consider the state of the unemployment insurance fund. It is true that we had some seasonal unemployment, and in two or three winters it was quite serious when we were in office, but every summer and every autumn the fund was restored until it was full again. Now, in spite of the 25 per cent increase in contributions imposed by the government, the fund is nearly empty.

I could go on and quote a lot of other things, but there is just one other thing in this little pamphlet to which I wish to draw particular attention. That is a statement made three times, as found on page 17:

> And yet more than 80 per cent of personal income taxpayers continue to pay less than under the Liberal administration.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

To support that statement the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway put a table on Hansard yesterday in which he carefully gave the rates for 1959 and not the rates for 1960. Why? This is just another of the fictions of the supporters of this government. The rates for 1960 were higher as everyone knows, they were increased by the old age security increase. Perhaps I should not say this table was calculated to give this impression—I do not know why it was put in if it was not—but it was different from the facts. When you take the extra old age security tax paid by every income taxpayer, when you take the extra 1 per cent on the sales tax, and when you take the unemployment insurance increase, every taxpayer in this country is paying more today than he was in 1956, except those who have lost their incomes because they have lost their jobs. Unfortunately there are far too many of them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement is hopelessly untrue.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will have an opportunity to make his own speech in his own time. There is a quotation in this document to the effect that the government of Prime Minister John Diefenbaker has accomplished more for the ordinary man and woman in Canada than any government in our history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: This quotation is not attributed to anybody. There is no author given. However, there is only one man in Canada who, with a straight face, could say that and that is someone who never has anything but a straight face. It was not said by the Prime Minister, as many of you may have suspected. The Prime Minister has a certain sense of the ridiculous which would have prevented him from making this statement, although no doubt he was quite happy to have it made. There is only one man in the whole country, sir, I suggest, who would have had the immodesty, the effrontery and total lack of any sense of humour, any sense of proportion, to say that, and that is the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, following the histrionic display we have just witnessed it is rather difficult to know where one should start or with what one should deal. Certainly the field is wide open, because the hon. member, having spent 10 or 15 minutes in castigating the hon. member for Halton for having dealt with the Liberal convention, then spent 28 minutes in dealing with an alleged Conservative handbook. There is, therefore, no question about what one may discuss in this budget debate.

The hon. member referred to the member for Halton and said something about the curate's egg which was only bad in spots. Certainly my hon. friend and his associates have had a lot of experience with bad eggs, so we will take his judgment on that at any time. I am not unmindful of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that it is a challenge to follow the hon. member who has just taken his seat, because he has not only progressed from the rank of statesman to a leading member of the opposition but he is now entitled to an award for Canadian fiction by virtue of the book which he has recently edited and published. It is on sale now, and I hope he is enjoying substantial royalties from its sale. His fictional ability, as exemplified in the editing of that book, has been demonstrated to a high degree by the speech he made this afternoon, which was fictional almost from beginning to end.

Mr. Pickersgill: Including the extracts from the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was the only respectable part of the speech.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member made a different approach to this problem from that which I expected. I thought when he came to deal with the budget he would deal with it seriously instead of on a fictional, partisan basis which was unworthy of the hon. member in dealing with such an important subject. He having blazed the trail, however, perhaps I can be forgiven for following along somewhat in the same vein.

Mr. Pickersgill: Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member now having finished the display of his fictional ability, perhaps he will sit quietly and let me try to follow along. I cannot hope to emulate the high degree of fiction which he put into his speech, but at least I will try to deal with the facts and the record as it has been established and as it should be reiterated this afternoon.

The hon. member included some references to statements by the hon. member for Eglinton, the only serious reference in his whole speech, when he mentioned the matter of unemployment. As my colleague the Minister of Finance said a moment ago, that was the only part of the speech which was worthy of repetition in the house today. This government, Mr. Speaker, appreciates the problem of unemployment to just as great a degree as hon. members opposite. We know there is some unemployment in this country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Some?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, some unemployment in this country. We know there are pockets of unemployment and that where unemployment exists, whether it is one individual, a family or a group of individuals, if it inflicts hardship upon people it is the responsibility of government to recognize that fact and, in conjunction with provincial governments, business and industry, to attempt to deal with it. I suggest, in that connection, that this government has done a very great deal. I suggest we have done more toward the solution of this problem than would have been thought possible or than has ever been done by any government in the past.

We discussed figures. My hon. friend has questioned the figures which apparently appear in this booklet to which he has referred and which I have not had the opportunity to scan. He knows that there are figures and figures dealing with unemployment. There are figures which have been used by hon. gentlemen opposite and which certainly were highly unrealistic. We have, for instance, a situation which I saw the other day when I was down in my own constituency. Years ago the fishermen came ashore in the fall, they worked in the woods or lived at home and milked the cow. They did work when they were ashore. Now the fishermen are unemployed and their numbers swell this great army of unemployed because they are drawing unemployment insurance. There are other classes who have been admitted to this group, so the group has been greatly increased during the last few years.

There are also, no doubt, a lot of people who are taking advantage of unemployment insurance and who are registering as unemployed. I had an experience the other day. I received a letter, and I am almost ashamed to say that it came from a constituent of mine. This person felt he knew me so well he started "Dear George". He said he started working last spring, worked all summer and last fall. Then he said "last week I went to the unemployment insurance office and asked for my unemployment benefits. What do you suppose they did to me, George? They offered me a job." He said, "George, why did they play this dirty trick on me? You have to do something about it." This is one factor in the unemployment situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a very small factor.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not saying how large it is. I am saying that that factor is the only one not exaggerated by the hon. member when he tramped up and down this country bewailing unemployment, or when he tramped up and down before the television cameras in the Coliseum in his bid for the leadership of his party. Certainly, however, unemployment as he portrayed it is far different from the actual figures. There is unemployment, and we have been doing and are doing everything humanly possible for a government to do. There is not one matter that was suggested in this great convention which the Liberals held last week, no specific statement or promise offered by the Liberals for dealing with unemployment, that this government has not already embarked upon. I challenge them to name one. They talk about slum clearance and sewage projects—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: —will allow me to accept his challenge. To accept his challenge I will name one right off, and that is to pay 90 per cent of the cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Nowlan: Ninety per cent of the cost to complete the trans-Canada highway in the maritime provinces will make no great contribution to resolving the problem of unemployment; none whatsoever.

Mr. Hellyer: There were lots of things. You should have joined us and you would have learned something.

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friends on the one hand talk about cutting taxes to encourage employment. How much of a tax cut are we going to get; $50 million, $100 million or $200 million? It must be a very substantial amount if you are going to increase employment. Yet at the same time they say they are going to spend money on public works. They say there will be a tremendous expenditure on public works. How do they reconcile these two? These are like Grimm's fairy tales that little children read when I was a boy—I did, anyway—and I presume they still read them. Even Grimm's fairy tales could not compare with the Liberal platform that was drafted last week at this convention. There is no doubt whatsoever about that.

They talk to us today about unemployment and the solution for unemployment. I would like to see something produced in that direction. The hon. member talked about this special session of parliament, as he called it. He talked about the budget, and suggested that there was no reason whatsoever for dealing with this matter.

If there is unemployment in this country today—and there is; I admit that—where does the responsibility lie? My hon. friends opposite talk about the failure of this government—the government on your right, Mr. Speaker—to deal with the problem. I have an authority which I am sure will meet with the approval of the hon. gentlemen opposite, because this gentleman has never been recognized as a great friend of this government. He is certainly not a political supporter of this government in any way, shape or form. Certainly in his talks, in his writings and in every reference he makes he usually criticizes this government and the Prime Minister. As we know the Liberals, in searching around for remedies somewhere or other, first had a convention of liberals with a small "l", and that was so discouraging that they decided to hold one last week for Liberals with a capital "L".

At the convention for liberals with a small "l", as one of their speakers they had Mr. Michael Barkway, who is the head now, I believe, of the Toronto Star bureau here in Ottawa. He is one who has been associated, as I have said, in his writings and talks with criticism of this government. I am sure he is one whose judgment my hon. friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and others will be very, very happy to accept. I could quote from various statements which he made before this Queen's University convention which met last fall. This is one thing he said. He was speaking about economic conditions and about the aberration, the insanity which characterized Canada, at least since 1950, and the results of it from 1950 to 1957. He said:

> This places a heavy responsibility upon the Liberal party, which will not be easy to discharge because the Liberals are so closely associated with the Great Aberration of the 1950's.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was a boom.

Mr. Nowlan: Then he said:

> Nowhere in Canada have I heard any serious suggestion that the party has a better leader in sight than Mr. Pearson. But I have several times heard it said that the party cannot win public confidence until it has a leader completely disassociated from the old regime.

That is not a Tory speaking, Mr. Speaker; that is not someone—

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor is it a Liberal speaking.

Mr. Nowlan: —who is sympathetic toward this government. This is a man addressing a Liberal convention, and I must say I admire his courage and I also appreciate his judgment in speaking as he did to that convention. Then Mr. Barkway went on:

> It would be a ghoulish task to try to catalogue the dismal illusions and failures of the later Liberal years. They would fill a book—a history of the 1950's, which badly needs to be written.

Perhaps the hon. member, with the same fictional qualities he portrayed in editing a book the other day, might rewrite this history. Then Mr. Barkway says:

> But for the present purpose it is vital to indicate some of them which hang like millstones around the party's neck.

And he identifies four millstones, dead horses, and so forth. Mr. Barkway then says:

> This record of wilful blindness is the first of the millstones around Liberal necks.

My hon. friend referred to tariff protectionism and objected to what we were going to do in this amendment—I took him to mean the amendment to "class and kind" in the act. He said that we were going backward in this respect. History always repeats itself when Liberal members speak, because they are playing the same record over and over again. I am reminded of the speeches which hon. members made when you, Mr. Speaker, were in the chair two years ago. They said, when we brought in amendments to the Customs Act—that is, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the Leader of the Opposition and I do not remember whether or not the hon. member for Essex East participated —that we were doing a horrible thing; we were going to raise tariffs as high as Haman's gallows. It was said that we were going to invoke this section and we were going to wreck Canadian trade.

We have not had any of these things happen despite the dismal gloom and doom prophesies of my hon. friend. They indulged in the same prophesies, of course, in connection with the C.B.C. when we brought in that act. We were going to wreck the C.B.C.; we were going to make it a political creature; that is what we were told.

We are getting the same spectre again this afternoon, the threshing of old straw and the repetition that we are going, by some tariff action, to revive the days of Bennett. This is the terrible thing that they hold in front of us all. But a worse thing would be to revive the days of the St. Laurent government; I do not think there is any question about that. I do not think the people of Canada are going to revert to that type of government for a long time to come.

With reference to tariff protectionism, this is what Michael Barkway says:

> It is simply unrealistic nowadays to think in the simple theoretical terms of protectionism versus free trade. We might as well debate transubstantiation versus consubstantiation. It is, therefore, distressing to find educated Liberals—

I include my hon. friend very freely in that category:

> —reverting to the ancient familiar stereotype like an old friend with whom they feel at home. Their beloved bogey of protectionism is really one of the most puny and least terrifying of the hallowe'en apparitions which prevent us from tackling our real problems in the light of day.

As I said, that is not the statement of a Tory; that is the statement of a friend of the Liberal party who was giving friendly advice, which I regret to see was not accepted, when he appeared before the Queen's University convention last fall and suggested to the Liberals how they might rectify the situation, which apparently they failed to do.

I think the only parts of the hon. member's speech which deserve comment are those matters referring to protectionism and the unemployment problem. The rest was simply making publicity. I am glad to see that he did it and I hope everybody reads that booklet—

Mr. Pickersgill: So do I.

Mr. Nowlan: —because it is authoritative, it is objective and it is factually correct, and I am sure that if we could get it into the hands of every person in Canada, come the next election the hon. gentlemen will find that the decimated ranks which they have today will not be increased. They will find that this government will be returned with a bigger majority than it has at the present time.

I am not going to deal with figures with respect to unemployment, or the moneys to be paid out. I am not going to deal with the 200,000 or thereabouts who are employed in the winter works program and the measures which the Minister of Finance brought down in the budget the other day; the applications which are coming in for the construction of residences for universities; the municipalities writing in with respect to obtaining loans for the construction of sewage disposal plants, or the score of things which are being done by the Dominion of Canada, in co-operation with the provinces, in order to give an impetus to construction. We are giving leadership, we are providing employment, and we are going ahead to build a better Canada than we have ever had before. The Minister of Finance will, I imagine, be dealing with this matter before this debate is over. He can go into the details. I do not intend to transgress in his field. In addition, the Minister of Labour will undoubtedly be dealing with this.

As I said, there have been references to the great convention, the great gathering, the great assembly, one of the greatest television shows we have seen for a long while, and perhaps I can refer to that for a moment or two before I sit down. As I said, it is a strange thing. They talk about new faces. They talk about young blood. It is true there was youth there. We saw the pictures of very fine looking youths in the television cameras. Some of them looked so intelligent that when they are a little older they will undoubtedly join the Conservative party. Hon. members will remember the words which were once used by an English statesman, that there was something wrong with any young person in Britain who was not a socialist at 21, because he lacked sympathy, he lacked heart, he lacked other characteristics which every young person should have. But, at the same time, if he was not a Conservative by the time he was 30 there was also something wrong, because he lacked intelligence. I am sure this will be the pattern followed by many of the young people who were shown on television the other night.

But there is a tragic aspect to this talk about a new program and the great new light that is to be thrown on our affairs. What do we get? We get the same old hackneyed story; reduced taxes and increased expenditures. This has been the solution used by every opposition party throughout the years, including our own. It has never worked yet, and it will not work with those young people we saw before the television cameras the other day. As far as unemployment or a constructive program are concerned, there was not one thing which has not been advocated and carried out by this government.

There was one thing that was different. There was the situation with respect to national defence and the NORAD agreement. I wonder who was the secretary of state for external affairs before June, 1957? I wonder who carried out the negotiations with the government of the United States in Washington with respect to these matters? I wonder who did not sign a treaty until after the election because they did not want to bring it down before, and then something happened and they did not win the election?

I should like, then, to put this question; and I admit that I am being guided by speeches which were made rather than by the resolution, because I can honestly say I have not had an opportunity of reading all the resolutions which were passed or discussed. In this regard I think I am in keeping with the mass of the Liberal delegates, who have not had a chance to read them either, most of them having been swept under the rug or handed over to the policy committee presided over by Mr. Gordon. The Leader of the Opposition, in refering to NORAD, said that we could man the radar screens but that we certainly could not do any shooting. So apparently the R.C.A.F., with their glorious traditions, are to become bird watchers. They can sit and watch the birds go by; they can count the birds, but they must not do anything more about it. If that is to be the role of the R.C.A.F. I suggest this part of the Liberal platform will not ring a bell too loudly with members of the armed forces.

The Liberal party has obviously tried to outflank the so-called New Party which proposes to come into this house as a result of the marriage of the C.C.F. with the new group. They tried to outflank it by moving further to the left.

An hon. Member: Impossible.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member says "impossible", but that is not for me to say. But how can they outflank it? They have the same old generals. They have Gordon and they have Sharp and they have Drury and they have MacKinnon, and these and others have been the wheelhorses of the Liberal party, official and unofficial, for many years.

Speaking of wheelhorses, I think the hon. member named the gentleman who has been the publicity director for the Conservative party. Every once in a while I hear about the Madison avenue techniques employed by the Conservative party and what a terrible thing that is, a Madison avenue technique. But hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, had a representative of one of the largest advertising firms in Canada, Cockfield Brown and Company, permanently retained at Liberal headquarters, at hand to keep them out of trouble. That is one reason hon. members opposite stayed in power during the terrible fifties that Mr. Barkway referred to. There is no Madison avenue technique as far as this government is concerned.

I noticed headlines during the first part of the convention stating that the Leader of the Opposition wanted a policy, and that he had brought his followers together to create a policy. Well, I think I can give him a policy, and I am thinking of what Sir Winston Churchill once said about blood, sweat and tears. There certainly was enough political blood shed by the Liberals in 1957. The carcasses and corpses of their defeated were lying all over the field of battle, and some of them have not been interred yet, which I think is a matter of regret for the Liberals. When it comes to sweat and tears, I suggest it is humility that is needed here.

That is one quality which hon. members opposite need to acquire. They are defeated, and at once they assume that Madison avenue had something to do with it; that there was some legerdemain on the part of the Prime Minister which unfortunately pushed them out, and the people of Canada are now sorry for it and want to restore them. They forget that the people of Canada kicked them out because they were sick and tired of their policies, and hon. gentlemen opposite have not shown any sign of reform yet. Certainly the conference did not indicate that there had been any change. The same old faces were in charge, and though there were some young ones present perhaps I could describe the situation by saying that the voice is the voice of Jacob but the hands are the hands of Esau.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Esau Pickersgill.

An hon. Member: What a pun.

Mr. Pickersgill: The revised version.

Mr. Nowlan: I was quoting from the old version, not from the revised version which is coming into play today.

When one reviews everything that has been said so far, one finds there is nothing which has been advocated or suggested which is in any way sharp or clear cut. They use words. One thing is sure; they cannot possibly talk about deficit financing now, because one minute we heard talk about the spending of huge sums of money and in the next we heard about the lowering of taxes as a stimulus to employment. There was a very cautious pronouncement: "We will not oppose consideration of the red China question." Then there was a daring promise of free education at all levels, without much respect for the British North America Act. Then again there was one resolution in favour of scholarships, bonuses, bursaries and loan funds; this at the same time as the promise of free education at all levels. You pays your money and you takes your choice.

I understand that reference has been made to a flag that is going to have a green maple leaf as the symbol of national unity. This is the safeguard, of course. It is going to be brought in within two and a half years after the election of a Liberal government. Well, the little maple leaf, in the words of the poet, will be sere and yellow instead of green, because I venture to suggest that many long years will elapse before a government represented by my hon. friends opposite will come into office to establish for us the flag with the little green leaf.

We on this side of the house are all very glad that our Liberal friends had a noisy and well attended convention. Their spirits were low and they needed encouragement. We know what that is like, because we went through it for 23 years and we have no doubt that they will undergo this experience for a longer period than we did. In the words of Joseph Howe, I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, and I have always followed Joseph Howe's advice in that regard. Nevertheless I venture to predict that no one sitting on the front benches of the party opposite today will ever again sit on the treasury benches in this house.

I will admit that is a prophecy, but I feel it is a very sound one. Personally I like hon. gentlemen opposite. They are amiable gentlemen, estimable characters, charming fellows and pretty good citizens. No doubt they will learn in time and mature, and some day they may become a fairly effective opposition. For that reason we welcome the fact that they had this great and noisy rally attended by young people. They made lots of noise and thoroughly enjoyed themselves. Even if they did sing "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow" and upset the whole show, that was enthusiasm. We have all seen those things happen at political gatherings, and I am sure the delegates were delighted to see such enthusiasm.

We on this side of the house also believe in the two party system. We believe there should be two parties in this country and only two parties. Actually we want to see the two party system strengthened. We would like to see hon. gentlemen opposite mature to the point where they could effectively discharge the responsibilities of opposition, and perhaps even some day in the dim and distant future they will again become the government.

After all the noise and applause it was rather disappointing to hear the same old statements made about lowering taxes and increasing expenditures. They spoke of a lotus land where honey dripped from every tree. All you have to do is elect the Liberals and I suppose that even the water itself will be flavoured by some delightful concoction of liqueur and will taste more pleasant than the water that now comes out of the taps in the city of Ottawa. That was the illusion; that was the dream picture; that was the effect and the sum total of the Liberal convention after three days.

As I said, we congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on their success in terms of the noise that was made, and we hope that as years go by they will enjoy success of another kind. I understand they will be meeting again in a year's time and perhaps on that occasion we will be able to congratulate them on having achieved some degree of maturity and judgment in terms of drafting a platform.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with only one of the points made by the minister who has just spoken. In the first place, he was surprised that at one point the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) saw fit to criticize certain aspects of past Liberal policy. This does not prove very much except that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) is truly a dyed-in-the-wool Conservative. He cannot look back upon the past with a critical eye. Therein lies the difference, for we, members of the Liberal party, can look back upon the past in order to seek guidance for the future. If our party has made mistakes in the past, we are not afraid to admit it, because we are conscious of the fact that man is a finite being and that in this world nothing is essentially good and nothing is essentially bad.

This is why I feel I can say the same thing about the baby budget, for it contains some things that are not bad, but the greater part of it is not acceptable to most Canadians. For that reason, when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to past events, I was in complete agreement with him.

As I was saying during the Liberal convention last week, I feel that in the Liberal party, we have to be radical and daring. That, incidentally, was one of the failings of the former party, in my view. I felt it was not radical, and was not seeking, through effective action, to develop our policy in tune with the changing times. The minister was wrong in raising that point, and I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for having had the courage to speak his mind, as he does at all times. I commend him for having done so in this case.

Mr. Speaker, reference has been made to the baby budget. It is indeed that, because it does not seem to have reached maturity; or is it the party that submitted it that has not reached maturity.

In the first place, was this budget necessary? This is a question which is on everybody's lips, and not merely on those of the hon. members who are sitting here on my left. In fact, I am convinced that if we could read the minds of all the hon. members of this house, we would find that several Conservative members too are wondering whether this budget was really necessary. They are wondering how it can help relieve the present situation. For my part, I say it was not necessary at all. It only served to prove that the party in power, the government, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) have all shown a lack of foresight during the three years they have been administering the affairs of this country.

The only thing this budget has offered the Canadian people is the evidence that, when the Minister of Finance made his budget speech on March 31 last, and predicted a $12 million surplus, he had not foreseen the possible difficulties and, while there was no actual prospect of a $12 million surplus, he nevertheless was proud to announce one.

When I took part in the debate, I said that despite the statement of the minister, if he wanted to replenish the unemployment insurance fund, he would create a deficit of at least $300 million. However he denied it at the time. On March 31 last, the minister said an extraordinary surge was taking place in the economic forces of the western world, to which Canada was vastly contributing.

It is true that there has been a revival in the western world, and in Europe. There has been a new movement there. And what has this country done about it?

We have seen some European countries form a common market in order to strengthen their position and to develop their market so as to dispose of their surplus goods and avoid a possibly imminent depression.

And here we were silently looking on while this transformation was taking place.

The minister and his colleagues did not choose to look into the situation and see whether, on this side of the Atlantic, an organization of our markets would not contribute to rid us of our surpluses. Nothing was done. They remained mute before the facts.

The countries of Europe are prospering, and Canada is not. I have been to Japan. It is enjoying a remarkable prosperity. However there is nothing of the sort in Canada. Why? Simply because the administration is bad.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): How much do the Japanese pay their workers?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, some time ago, England proposed, or rather suggested, that we establish a free trade area, the first time at St. Adèle, during a meeting, and on another occasion, at some place the name of which has slipped my mind.

When the British minister spoke of a free trade area, did Canada stop and think about the setting up of such an area, which would help our foreign trade? Not in the least. Canada did nothing, it did not budge. We did not even set up a royal commission, as is generally done, to examine the situation.

Mr. Speaker the budget submitted to us showed an unheard lack of foresight. If we look up the minister's statements, we find the proof thereof.

This is what the minister stated on January 11, at the Canadian Club in Toronto with regard to the budget submitted on March 31:

> The Canadian economy is in a period of pronounced expansion. We welcome this development. But we would not like to see it degenerate into a short-lived wave of prosperity which might result in an inflationary trend.

Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, the minister stating in January 1960 that he did not want an evolution which might degenerate into a prosperity he would have some difficulty in stopping.

> What we want most of all, is an orderly expansion without inflation. That is the aim of our policy in this year of development 1960.

Those were the statements the Minister of Finance made on January 11, 1960. He was afraid that prosperity might escape him, that it might expand to a point where he could not catch up with it.

Was that his only statement? No, Mr. Speaker. Let us read the New Year's message of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) on December 30, 1959:

> Prospects for the coming year fill us with confidence.

At the end of 1959, or at the beginning of 1960, he saw everything through rose-coloured glasses; everything was fine. The Minister of Labour was confident with regard to the future. It was a mistake to nurture this belief and not to see that a stop be put to the wave of unemployment we are experiencing today.

Further on, we see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce not the present minister, but his predecessor—stated on December 28, 1960:

> In the past, the accelerated rhythm has quickened again, and the main economic factors at this time indicate renewed expansion. The international economic climate seems very favourable at this time.

At the end of 1959, the Minister of Trade and Commerce foresaw great prosperity throughout Canada in 1960. And what did we have? Distress, ever and always unemployment. Plants are only working a few days a week, as they are unable to get rid of their surplus production. And this is what the Minister of Labour said, on page 512 of Hansard, of January 29, 1960:

> And what about recession? Everybody knows that it is over.

Again, at the end of January 1959, the Minister of Labour stated:

> Everyone is agreed that the recession is over.

Is that the statement of a responsible man, of a man who is studying the economic reports submitted by government experts? Those reports have simply been shelved and now they come back to the old rigmarole.

Further on, as we may see on page 1701 of the official record, the Minister of Labour said:

> It is not only the government that claim that the recession is over... I am very much surprised that the only people I hear expressing contrary points of view on this matter are the opposition in this house.

He was surprised to see that members of the opposition who although they lacked the same research facilities as the government were the only ones who knew more about what was to happen than they themselves knew in 1959.

May I quote the statement made by the Minister of Finance on March 31, last, in his budget speech, and which we find at page 2670 of Hansard:

> I am confident that employment will rise as the coming of spring opens up new job opportunities and as the economy continues its upward trend.

That is what the Minister of Finance said on March 31 and what happened? He was forced to change his statement because of his lack of foresight and to tell us that instead of a $12 million surplus he had forecast, he would have a deficit of some $300 million.

I could go on like this almost indefinitely, and quote the ministers who took turn in showing lack of foresight.

No mistake about it, none so blind as those who will not see. They do not see, Mr. Speaker, but tomorrow they will see that the Liberal party will form the next government of this country.

After the budget was presented, Mr. Speaker, I ran across an industrialist who told me that that very night he had made a $3,500 profit as a result of the changes that were made. I asked him if he intended to distribute those $3,500 among his employees. Here is his answer: "Not at all; they are all members of the union; they are being paid good wages".

That is what he said. For the little men, nothing at all. The profits go to average and big industrialists. Besides, we notice this tendency of this government to help the big fellow. When we discussed the combines act, the government did even more to help the big fellow at the expense of the little man; the industrialist is given the powers of judge and master of the whole situation; if he thinks somebody has done a certain thing, he does not even have to prove it.

This is the way the Conservative government has been running the country since 1957, and that is why we are in such a fix that the people of Canada regret the mistake they made and are anxious for an opportunity to rectify that mistake.

What is left to the public? What is being done for people who are in need, for the unemployed? Nothing. Has the government tried to reduce interest rates so that construction may pick up and create employment? Not at all. Has there been any attempt to reduce taxes to put more money in circulation, to revive the economy of this country? Not at all. This government is doing nothing at all.

Mr. Speaker, I have here some opinions of certain people who are independent from the government and who have carefully listened to the budget speech.

In an editorial published in the Journal of December 21, 1960, Mr. W. E. Currier said:

(Text):

Eric W. Kierans, former economics professor now president of the Montreal stock exchange, said the budget cannot be expected to produce the economic growth Finance Minister Fleming wants.

(Translation):

A little farther on, there is an article by Mr. Rudy Usick—

(Text):

Rudy Usick, president of the Manitoba farmers' union, said, however:

"The government's trend towards higher tariffs is continuing. We cannot expect to increase grain sales to other countries by making it more difficult for them to sell goods to us."

Dr. A. M. McLeod, economist of the Toronto-Dominion bank, described them as relatively mild measures that would have little effect on investment by Canadians. The budget would not likely do much to reduce Canada's balance of payments deficit.

British Columbia finance officials said the increase in the withholding tax on Canadian bonds owned by foreign investors will "effectively raise interest rates"...

Frederick G. Gardiner chairman of the council of metropolitan Toronto, also felt the budget's effect would be to increase interest rates on municipal borrowing...

G. Arthur Lascelles, Toronto metro finance commissioner, said there simply isn't enough money in circulation in Canada to satisfy all borrowers. H. A. McDiarmid of Vancouver, president of B.C. division of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, commented that if the budget tends to slow investment from the United States, business may also be slowed ...

Karl E. Scott, president of Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited, said he hopes the government is not passing legislation that will be detrimental to the advancement of Canadian companies controlled in other countries.

(Translation):

Mr. Egan Chambers (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Caron: I cannot spare the time; I have only got half an hour.

Mr. Chambers: May I—

Mr. Caron: I said no.

(Text):

Mr. Chambers: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may we know from what the hon. member has quoted?

Mr. Caron: I said so when I started and if you will read Hansard tomorrow you will know what it is.

Mr. Chambers: What document?

Mr. Caron: It is from an Ottawa Journal survey of those who were interested in the budget.

Mr. Martineau: What date?

Mr. Caron: Wednesday, December 21, 1960.

[Mr. Caron.]

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I usually listen to the speeches of the hon. members across the floor without interrupting them; and I hope that they will show me the same courtesy and allow me to go on with my remarks.

I have here another editorial from the Gazette of December 21, 1960 of which I shall quote only one sentence, because time does not allow me to read a longer quotation:

(Text):

It might be said that such measures might better have been presented in the budget last spring, where their effect might have offset some of the subsequent economic decline.

(Translation):

Now this newspaper is certainly not known as a supporter of the Liberal party.

Unfortunately, time passes quickly. I shall probably not have enough time to show how Canadians across the country reacted to this budget, but I should like to quote the following which Mr. Norman Campbell wrote in the Ottawa Citizen of December 21, 1960:

(Text):

The baby budget generally was soundly conservative in the classic sense of the word. As we understand conservative economic theory it is that if the economy generally is healthy then the benefits will distribute themselves to the population generally without specific transfer payments to individuals.

(Translation):

That is indeed the attitude shown by the Conservatives. A Conservative government, according to its theory, believes that prosperity must come from above rather than from below.

There has been an attempt to spread benefits among the wealthy of this world in the hope that it would fall back on the mass like a gentle rain; that is where the Conservatives are wrong.

Mr. Speaker, here is now a headline from the newspaper Le Droit, of Ottawa:

Budget no Christmas gift: Program to help the industry of this country.

And in the same newspaper Le Droit of the same date, that is December 21, 1960, Mr. Jean Taillefer wrote:

A budget for businessmen.

Once again the big fellows were not forgotten but no one gave a thought to the small man. If at least, there had been a tax cut on cigarettes.

Those are some of the objections which could be heard among the general public, Tuesday night, after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) brought down the supplementary budget.

Then again we can read in the Gazette of December 21 an article written by Arthur Blakely in which he said:

(Text):

Economic Self-reliance Target as Canadian Business Aided. Fleming Impresses Himself.

(Translation):

That is the view expressed by this openly Conservative paper about the present minister.

I could go on and on like this quoting newspaper articles from responsible editors who give serious thought to such matters. But I see that my time is running short. Allow me to say, however, that on leaving this house, we wondered how we should describe the baby budget. As he was leaving the house on budget night, a young man said: "It is a bubble gum budget." That would no doubt be a proper expression, as the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) would say. It does really describe the budget. What is bubble gum? Something that is chewed, that is blown out and then gets you all sticky. That is what remains of the budget.

Mr. Tremblay: It describes Mr. Lesage's budget.

Mr. Caron: The hon. member for Roberval is often sticky.

Mr. Tremblay: It is an accurate description of Mr. Lesage's budget.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, what is provided in the budget for the unemployed? Nothing at all. Nothing in the budget is likely to help the jobless right now.

Oh, I admit that there are certain long term measures which could pave the way for things to be done in two, three, four or even five years. But we find absolutely nothing to deal with the present situation.

Here is an excerpt taken from an editorial which appeared in the Gazette on December 8, prior to this baby budget:

(Text):

In the same way—

(Translation):

They were saying that the Liberals were responsible for the unemployment situation, adding:

(Text):

In the same way, the Progressive Conservatives, now in power, will be weighed in the balance, not on the dismal argument whether they brought the depression in with them, but whether they are prepared to take the measures that the new conditions demand. Emergency measures are all very well in their way, as a provision of immediate relief. But the real test is whether the tax structure, and the economic policies generally, can be remoulded in time to give Canada a sound economic footing in a world that is far rougher to walk in.

(Translation):

This accurately describes the situation. The government is judged not by what it says but by its actions. So far, this government has not done anything. Yet for the past three years we have spent our time telling the government what to do and how to do it. In fact, at one time the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has indicated no less than ten measures and we have repeatedly recalled at least twenty five such measures but the minister always came back with the same answer: we have no unemployment problem. This is only temporary. Come spring and the sun will take care of it all.

The government has always refused to hear the real facts and it has always shut its mind to it, which explains our record unemployment. If the Liberal party had not established the unemployment insurance to relieve the distress of the people, we would be worse off than we were under the Tory government of 1930-35.

Mr. Speaker, the minister says that there is an end to everything and that everything will turn out right. We say that there is no ending in sight and that nothing will turn out right unless the government has courage enough to take such actions as will help to correct the situation.

Liberals are accused from different quarters of going about carrying mourning bands and of being calamity howlers. The Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) was saying somewhere near Montreal that unemployment was a Liberal legacy. And that, after three and a half years. He is now speaking like Mr. Bennett in 1934. Well, if unemployment has been inherited, are they not intelligent enough and have they not the qualified men to find a solution to this problem that faces Canada today?

When in Canada the number of unemployed increases, and the increase is tremendous—I see some hon. members smiling, for example the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) a man of letters but a lesser mind—

Mr. Tremblay: The hon. member for Hull knows enough to spell the word stupid.

Mr. Caron: What is there to say about that statement from the Associate Minister of National Defence which is as childish as the one from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) who said that, after the convention, the Liberal party would be ready to take the New Party's place. Newspapers, even Conservative newspapers, answered him that it was all nonsense. What a way to work at correcting the situation.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, a Conservative government means poverty, unemployment, tottering economy. As the English say: "Conservative times, hard times". It is always the same thing.

I was reading recently, what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in 1871 in the Quebec legislature:

> Does the picture outlined to you, he says, really correspond to the facts? I cannot accept that point of view. It is said that we are rich and prosperous. Are we really so? Ask all classes of society: merchants, bankers, retailers, professionals, farmers, simple workers, and everywhere without exception you will note some discomfort, some uneasiness, a state of suffering and dullness denoting there is something wrong somewhere . . . That is the truth! Blind are those who do not see it! Guilty are those who, seeing it, do not admit it—

That is the truth. "Blind are those who do not see it. Guilty are those who, seeing it, do not admit it". That is the present situation of the Conservative government. Blind are those who do not see, guilty are those who, realizing what goes on, do not take the necessary steps to alleviate the situation.

I say that this government is guilty, as seldom any government has been in the past. Guilty, because we still have, as in 1871, a depression under a Conservative regime, as was the case in 1896, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office, a depression such as we have known under the Bennett regime, in the 30's, with soup kitchens on street corners, and such as we have known since 1957.

Will these people on the right some day open their eyes, will they ever try to bring in the necessary remedies to improve the situation? Will they open their eyes once and for all, at least to take into consideration the suggestions we have been offering for the last three years? Or else, are they going to keep on making extravagant statements as they have been making in 1957, 1958, 1959 and 1960, when they were always saying that prosperity was just around the corner, while we never saw the sight of it, instead of putting money in the people's pockets, while unemployment increases and misery prevails all over Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Flynn): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

(Text):

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have followed with considerable interest the course of this debate and have heard what has been said by the speakers from both sides of the house yesterday and today. The unfortunate part about speaking at this stage of the debate is that the five speakers who have already taken part in the debate on behalf of the government have, with convincing arguments and deadly logic, demonstrated beyond doubt that the supplementary budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) is one that is needed at this time, one that is tailored to meet the requirements of this country. It is a budget which is replete with statements of the intentions of the government to improve the economic condition of this country, thus adding even more lustre to the name of this government.

I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that after the events of the last week, to which reference has already been made by other speakers, the members of the official opposition would have come in here stripped for action and, figuratively speaking, with their fangs dripping with blood. I would have thought we would have had some valid criticisms to meet. I say this because the only criticism I have heard advanced by the last speaker was nonsense rather than factual. I prefer to make reference at this time to a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) yesterday, in which I think he wrongly criticized the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) because they, in turn, had levelled factual and proper criticism at those members of the opposition who had spoken in this budget debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It now being five o'clock the house will proceed to a consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

Mr. Gordon Chown (for Mr. Woolliams) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company.

He said: This is a bill in standard form to incorporate the Aurora Pipe Line Company. The counsel for the company in Ottawa has prepared a brief statement which sets out the degree of ownership and several points of interest to the house, and which I will put on the record in order to save the time of the house and because I am acting for the hon. member for Bow River who is unavoidably absent at this time.

This petition to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company is in the standard form of such bills with which the house is familiar. The proposed company would be subject in all respects to the usual conditions set forth in the National Energy Board Act and its operation would be regulated by the national energy board.

It might be of assistance to the house to outline briefly the background of the sponsors of the petition and the immediate project which they have in mind should it become incorporated and should it be successful in obtaining the approval of the Alberta oil and gas conservation board and the national energy board.

The petitioners are two vice presidents and chief counsel of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited which is sponsoring the application for the new company. Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited was established in 1926 and is the second or third largest natural gas producer in Canada and the fifth largest oil producer. It has invested more than $125 million in the exploration for and development of the oil and gas resources of western Canada. In common with other producers, it is vitally concerned with the problem of orderly marketing of the products which will be produced in association with natural gas.

Approximately 10 per cent of the shares of the company are held by 12,000 public shareholders, 22 per cent are held by the Hudson's Bay Company and 68 per cent by Continental Oil Company. Notwithstanding the disparity in shareholdings between the two companies, an agreement provides that they shall have equal voting power. The shares of the company are listed on the Toronto stock exchange and are available to Canadian investors.

The project in which the company is immediately interested is designed to assist a solution of a problem which is now arising in the province of Alberta as a result of the large increase in natural gas production consequent upon the expansion of sales under recently approved large scale exports of natural gas. In the wet gas fields, which form a major source of supply for the newly approved gas exports, condensate is produced in association with natural gas and must be separated from it. It is actually a high quality crude oil. Since condensate inevitably will be produced as a by-product of natural gas, it is obvious that new markets must be found for it in order to avoid distress selling and, equally important, the displacement of western crude oil in its present markets.

The Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company has advanced its project already by application to the Alberta oil and gas conservation board as a solution for this important marketing problem. It proposes to construct within the province of Alberta a pipe line system of approximately 41 miles, costing $1,600,000 which would take condensate from three important gas fields in southwestern Alberta, namely Pincher Creek, Waterton and Lookout Butte.

The condensate would be delivered through the proposed federal company across the international boundary to an extension of Continental Pipe Line Company's system which would be built from Cut Bank, Montana. The condensate would be delivered through Continental Pipe Line's system south to a connection with the Platte pipe line system in Wyoming and through this system and its many connections it would gain access to refining centres in the Rocky mountains and mid-continent areas of the United States which are at present not served by Canadian crude. In the early years of the project it is anticipated that the throughput would be of the order of 11,000 to 15,000 barrels per day.

The advantage of this proposal is that it opens a new market for the condensate produced in southwestern Alberta without interfering with the movement of condensate from the central and northern areas of that province east or west through existing trunk pipe lines and without disturbing or displacing crude oil in any existing markets.

I have been at some pains to outline to the house the sponsorship and plans of the proposed company. The house will appreciate that in seeking incorporation the petitioners in no way ask for approval of their project but wish to disclose it in order to assure the house that the company is being incorporated for a proper purpose. As the house knows, two important boards have been constituted in Canada for the purpose of reviewing the merits of projects such as those proposed by the petitioners and finally deciding, after balancing all factors, which project is in the best interests of the nation.

As I have already mentioned, Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited has already applied to one of these bodies, namely the Alberta oil and gas conservation board, for a permit to build its proposed system in Alberta. If the Alberta permit is granted and if Aurora Pipe Line Company is incorporated, then Aurora would apply to the national energy board for the required approval to construct the line across the international boundary.

There may be detailed questions in the minds of hon. members which can be best answered in committee, in accordance with the standard practice of the house, by the officers of the company.

That is the statement prepared by counsel in Ottawa for the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company who are backing this proposed incorporation of Aurora Pipe Line Company. I suggest to the house that the more technical questions that arise can be dealt with in the standard way in committee, with the officers of the company present to answer questions. Subsequently they have to obtain clearance and approval from the board in Alberta and from the national energy board here in Ottawa.

Accordingly I move the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown) in sponsoring second reading of Bill No. S-2, an act to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company.

The second reading of a bill is important in parliamentary procedure. It is that phase of procedure where one is expected to and should discuss the principle of the bill, not only the principle of—as in this case—the incorporation of a pipe line company, but all principles allied to the incorporation of the company if it pass through all the procedures of the House of Commons and the other place. In other words, at this stage of second reading it is our responsibility, as members of this house, to consider all the aspects in principle that apply to this bill, as to whether its purport is such as to be in the general interest of Canada or in the particular interest of a phase of the economy of Canada or a part of Canada. We must also relate to its subject matter what it says it is going to do in the solving of a problem which the hon. member for Winnipeg South said has arisen in Alberta.

In other words, it is necessary, not only to consider the actual act of incorporation but to decide on second reading, in principle, whether in relation to its purport and all other factors and previous incorporations this one is in the interests of Canada and of Alberta.

I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that I feel the second reading of this bill is not something that can be passed over lightly, because its implications are such that very serious consideration must be given by the members of this house to whether it should or should not pass second reading, in the general interests of Canada, the economy of Canada or the particular interest and economy of Alberta.

I am very grateful for the fact that the notice of second reading of this bill was placed on the order paper prior to our adjournment for the Christmas recess. During the course of that recess we were therefore able, with regard to those matters on the order paper of interest to us, to make inquiries and to obtain information. Because I noted on the order paper the second reading of this bill to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company I remembered that some two years previously we had incorporated another company, namely the Foothills Pipe Line Company, for what I think is exactly the same purpose and to solve the same problem.

Therefore I felt—and I am sure that all members will agree—it was necessary, if one had an interest, to obtain the fullest possible information as to why there should be the incorporation now of a new company to serve a purpose obtained by the incorporation of a company some two years ago which was going to meet and fill the same purpose.

So, over the Christmas recess, I sent out inquiries in all directions in order to have the fullest possible information on the purport and principles of this bill and in order to try to find out whether it was one which should pass on second reading in this House of Commons. I am very grateful to all those with whom I communicated for answering the questions I put to them and for supplying me with reports and statements of accounts, information concerning their plans and objectives and so on. After going over all this material I believe the principle of this bill is of such importance that it is incumbent upon me to introduce the entire picture in principle in order that we may have an understanding of the situation and then decide our course of action in this present debate.

Some two years ago, as I mentioned, this house and the other place, after hearing all the reasons and arguments, incorporated a company known as the Foothills Pipe Lines Company. Upon investigation I find that the sponsor of that company was a company known as the Pembina Pipe Line Limited. Thus, I think it is logical that I should start with the Pembina company, deal with its sponsorship of the Foothills company and the reason we incorporated that, and then relate this to the bill now before us. This is what I found.

I found that Pembina Pipe Line Limited is a very large company in western Canada, that the common stock of that company is owned to the extent of approximately 90 per cent by 2,000 Canadian investors with slightly more than 50 per cent of the outstanding shares held by Canadians in the province of Alberta itself. I am informed in writing, and I also have the reports, that as far as Pembina Pipe Line Limited is concerned 95 per cent of all its debt financing has been raised in Canada by Canadian investment houses. It is a company of many years standing which years ago became interested in this problem of the by-products because of gas utilization development in Alberta. Therefore, they employed a number of top notch Canadians to study the problem of these by-products. The by-products, in the main, are propane, butane, condensate and sulphate and the intention was to see whether there would be a potential market in Canada and, further, if over and above the Canadian market there was a possibility of obtaining an export market across the international boundary should there be a surplus available.

As a result of their studies, the experts felt —and I quote their own figures and also the figures of Stevenson and Kellogg Limited, a well known firm in Canada who made the analysis for the company—there was a possibility of a $50 million industry in Alberta from the proper collection, transportation, utilization and export of products which were in the main going to waste. When I say $50 million, I mean $50 million annually. Because of this finding, the Pembina Pipe Line Limited sponsored a bill before this house some two years ago to incorporate the Foothills Pipe Lines Company. They did this because of the investigation which has taken place by Canadian scientists and experts and because of the report by Stevenson and Kellogg that it was felt that in western Canada there was a potential utilization of between 20,000 and 40,000 barrels of these liquid gas by-products per day, but that there would still be a surplus of some 70,000 barrels per day.

It was recommended by Stevenson and Kellogg, and in the findings of the Canadian experts, that if it were possible to find a market across the border for those 70,000 barrels, between the utilization of the liquid by-products in western Canada and across the line, the way would be clear to establish this $50 million a year industry in our country. That was the basis of the request to this house and to the other house for the incorporation of the Foothills Company. That request for incorporation was granted, and all the procedures which the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown) said the Aurora Pipe Lines Company are now going through have been undertaken by the Foothills Company and its parent company Pembina Pipe Line Limited. As a result, according to information I received only a short time ago, they have now been able to reach a contractual agreement with Standard Oil in the United States under which the United States company guarantees to take up to 70,000 barrels of these liquid by-products a day in the only place in which they say they can possibly be utilized, that is, in the area of Chicago.

As I pointed out, Pembina Pipe Line Limited is for all purposes Canadian owned and Canadian planned and is the pioneer in this new field. Naturally, some agreement has to be made if you are going to have a company in the United States undertake to receive 75,000 barrels a day compared with the 11,000 barrels mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg South which it is felt this new company would be able to export across the line.

Because I knew it would be of vital interest I asked for something official on that and my information is this. As soon as the planned investment now under way comes to fruition the plan calls for Pembina and the Canadian public to own and operate the pipe line facilities in Canada until such time as an export transmission line is built from Alberta to Chicago. This information is under the signature of Pembina. At that time Pembina will sell to Standard three sevenths of its interest in the Alberta facilities. In return, Pembina will purchase 35 per cent of the common stock in all of the United States facilities. On completion of this major transaction the Canadian public will own 30 per cent, Pembina will own 40 per cent, and Standard will own 30 per cent of all the pipe line facilities in Canada. It is estimated that the total project would cost approximately $130 million of which $40 million would be located in Canada.

To initiate the steps required to put such a plant in operation, two years ago Pembina incorporated by special act a company called Foothills Pipe Lines Limited which would be required to transport products across Alberta into the United States. Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, controlled by the Continental Oil Company of Huston, is now trying to compete with Pembina by offering to take the surplus gas by-products liquids from the extreme south of the province of Alberta into the Continental facilities in the United States. It is my understanding that they have no present intention of extending the Alberta facilities to handle production from gas fields in the north. It is further my understanding that if this contention is correct, then Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited desires to skim off the easy cream of the product at the expense of the other production in the province.

What it is necessary for the House of Commons to know, if such action were permitted through the incorporation of the pipe line company which is now before us, is whether it would imperil the comprehensive and equitable system envisaged by the Pembina Pipe Line Limited and its ancillary company, Foothills Pipeline Limited?

The hon. member for Winnipeg South briefly mentioned the makeup of the company. I am glad he raised that question because if he had not I should have had to. In view of the background of this matter, the potentialities involved and the planning and work that has been done, I simply cannot understand how a Tory could sponsor this bill when one calls to mind the principles expounded with such verbosity by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his baby budget relating to Canadian control and Canadian development of Canadian companies. The minister said the government stands for encouragement and support of the development of resources in Canada by Canadian funds under Canadian control in the utilization of our natural resources. It is difficult to reconcile these two things.

Because this matter intrigued me I made an intensive study of it. We now have before us for second reading a bill designed to do exactly what we said we were going to do when we incorporated two years ago a company which, to the best of my knowledge, has seriously undertaken its responsibilities and forged ahead. We are asked to incorporate a company which suddenly realized the situation and wants to come in perhaps to the detriment of the development of the economy of Alberta and of the disposal of what are now waste products.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg South pointed out, the real sponsor of this bill is the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited. Hudson's Bay is a famous name in Canada. When we think of it, we think of something Canadian or relating to the United Kingdom. Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited is controlled by a United States company, the Continental Oil Company of Houston. I sent for the last report of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited on page 14 of which I find that the Continental Oil Company of Houston is said to own 67.8 per cent of the common stock of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited. The remainder is owned 22.6 per cent by Hudson's Bay Company of England and 9.6 per cent by the United States and Canadian public. In view of the statements of the Prime Minister, (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Minister of Finance and the rank and file backbenchers, it is unmitigated gall to sponsor, introduce and ask us to support the formation of a new company which is 67.8 per cent owned in the United States by the Continental Oil Company of Houston.

We cannot lightly pass over the second reading of this bill. It is of vital concern to us. If the findings of experts and oil engineers are correct, it could mean the development of a $50 million industry in Canada in the utilization of the products and the export of the surplus by-products of gas, propane, butane, sulphur and condensate. As members of this house we have a responsibility to give consideration to whether, in agreeing to the second reading of this bill, we are acting in the best interests of the national economy and of Alberta itself.

I honestly admit that I have an open mind with respect to this bill but as a result of my studies of the records and of the proposals made two years ago and of the work that has been done since, I question whether we would be doing a favour to Alberta and to Canada by giving second reading to this bill.

I could say a great deal more because of the information I have on my desk, but I say in all sincerity I believe I have been able to give sufficient of the background and of the ramifications behind the introduction of what appears to be a simple bill to incorporate a pipe-line company to draw to the attention of hon. members the importance of the principle and the necessity of a far clearer understanding of what is involved before we give this bill second reading.

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word not so much in rebuttal of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) but perhaps to try to appeal to logic in so far as procedures are concerned which must be followed in relation to this bill. The hon. member made reference to what was in the best interest of the province of Alberta and Canada as a whole.

When a pipe line company, its sponsors or partners who may be producers, contributors to, or participants in a pipe line company introduce a measure it receives rather close and exacting scrutiny by the provincial authorities. In this instance the scrutiny was given by the Alberta conservation and natural gas board. They make an assessment based on the economic and technical aspects as they affect the jurisdiction or the responsibility of the boards of the provinces. As I say, in this case it was the Alberta conservation and natural gas board.

Then, of course, the sponsors make application to the House of Commons for incorporation. We are at this stage now. If we give this bill second reading it will go to a committee where members will have an opportunity to examine witnesses and discuss various aspects of the proposal. After the bill passes through parliament it will face its most difficult task by going before the national energy board. The responsibilities of the national energy board as we find in the act are to make an assessment similar to that made by the Alberta natural gas and conservation board. As a federal authority its responsibility, of course, is to deal with it from both the technical and economic aspect. After the application is dealt with by the national energy board, and if the application is granted, the company can then proceed to carry out its functions.

I am not suggesting for a moment that the House of Commons does not have a responsibility. Of course we do; but I do point out that by passing this bill we are not in any way losing control over the eventual disposition of the bill itself. First of all, it will go to a committee of the house for further examination. At this committee witnesses will be called. After the committee makes a report this house will make a searching analysis of the report. I mention this only to point out the procedure through which the bill must go before it becomes law.

The hon. member for Vancouver East made two interesting points, and I am not in entire disagreement with him. But when he talks about the interests of the Dominion of Canada and of the provinces I say to him we must look at the problem that faces Alberta. We can relate this problem to the whole problem of marketing crude oil in its raw state and natural gas or, for that matter, any of the by-products, such as butane, propane, sulphur and condensate.

Reference was made to another pipe-line company which received incorporation in this house. Our problem in Alberta is one of markets. It can be summed up simply in that way. This house is aware of the fact that as far as crude oil is concerned we are able to market less than 50 per cent; the remainder of it is left in the ground. As a result the oil industry finds itself in a difficult position.

I hope to be able to show that if we obtain markets either for our crude product in its basic form or the derivatives from it, it will be to the advantage not only of Alberta but of Canada as a whole. We must keep in mind that the sale of the derivatives of oil may mean a replacement of crude oil. If we can sell these derivatives we will be assisting the general economy within the industry and thus benefiting the province as a whole. I do not think the hon. member will disagree with my last statement because I have discussed it with him personally. The desire to improve the marketing position of the petroleum industry is the general concern of hon. members.

Let us make a comparison of this pipe line company with the one which he has described to us. This pipe line company intends to act as a common carrier. They hope to market a variety of products, derivatives and by-products such as were described by the hon. member, butane, propane, sulphur and condensate.

But what is different is that this company has established for itself through Continental Oil Company a market for one of these by-products and the important thing is that they have this market. It is not large but it is going to relieve some of the pressure on the rest of the producers in western Canada through the finding of at least this market. He mentioned that the Pembina company had passed through the usual processes of the conservation board. This is not quite accurate. They have been before the board but the information I have is that no decision with respect to the hearing has yet been made known to the company.

Mr. Benidickson: Is that a federal or a provincial board?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): The Alberta natural gas conservation board is, of course, a provincial board and the decision, as I said, has not yet been handed down. So we are in the position that this house is being asked simply to give second reading so that we can send on for further examination the question of the construction in a small area of a line which may relieve part of the marketing problem of western Canada.

I suggest that if we refuse second reading we put ourselves in this position. First of all, we would in one sense be discriminating between one company and another. I have already said to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) that in the committee, assuming I am a member of it, I also intend to make a searching analysis once we have the witnesses before us. But it does seem to me that in this instance to refuse second reading would be to prevent the potential marketing of a product which in the long run is going to be of benefit not only to the province but to the whole country. We would be refusing this company the right to be heard not by what I would describe as the proper authorities but certainly under circumstances where their plans would receive considerably more scrutiny than they will in a debate of this nature.

I am not denying for a moment that this debate serves a very useful purpose but I do appeal to the house that in fairness not only to the company but to producer and consumer alike we should send the bill on where it may receive the type of examination that it will before the committee and then eventually, of course, come before the federal authority which in the final analysis makes the decision with respect to whether the company will have the right to build the pipe line.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member for Calgary South—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. The hon. member for Calgary South referred to discrimination and I wonder whether he would indicate to what extent parliament has previously given the same thing to other companies and, if so, to what companies.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): If I understand the question correctly, may I say that I merely suggested that by refusing to send the bill on for study by a committee we will then be establishing a principle under which we refuse the right to one company which will be marketing a comparable or similar product when we have already granted it to another. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) referred to the Pembina Pipe Line Company whose bill went through the processes of the house.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the hon. member if he will agree that in any decision made in this house we should not, because of the 11,000 barrels per day which this company estimates can be sold through its operations across the line, imperil the contract already signed for the sale of 75,000 barrels a day in Chicago.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): In answer to that question I would say that this shows the advantage of having witnesses before us at a time when we can examine them to determine the market area. There is very limited information in the brief presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown) and we would have an opportunity in the committee to make this decision on a sound basis. If we come to the conclusion at that time that the plans of this company will endanger the operations of another then the committee can, of course, report back to the house along that line.

But I do remind the hon. member of the fact, and he appreciates it, that the marketing of these products not only in Canada but also in the United States is a highly complicated process, one which takes a great deal of study, and I question very much whether, on the basis of a cursory examination such as we have been able to give the matter up to this point, any member of the House of Commons is in a position to make this decision without having full information available to him. Therefore, all I am asking the house to do now is to send the bill to the committee.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard two very fine speeches on this subject and I can agree with both speakers in many respects. However, I think there are a few other useful points that can be brought into the debate. Both the sponsor of the bill and the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) laid great stress on the fact that other procedures are authorized for dealing with this matter and they ask that we approve the bill in principle on the ground that it would then go to the committee where we would get detailed knowledge.

The bill has already been before a committee of the other place and I can find no details whatsoever about it. There are only a couple of lines in the Senate Hansard and as far as I can determine there were, in fact, no minutes kept of that meeting. When it comes to a discussion of the principle I think we need to know more than we know now. The sort of argument that says that we should pass over our responsibilities to a committee is not one that I can accept. Approval of the principle on second reading is one of the safeguards of democracy, and I am not prepared to give approval in principle of this bill at the present moment with the knowledge I have.

From the information we have received this afternoon we do know that there are two companies involved, Aurora and Foothills. The hon. member for Calgary South has pointed out the need for markets. This need will become greater and more pressing as new gas pipe-line transmission facilities are completed. The by-product situation will then grow more acute because the gas must be transmitted dry without these by-products and we will have so much in the way of by-products in western Canada that marketing, which is now difficult, will in the future become almost impossible. From this point of view there will be room for a company which proposes to market 11,000 to 15,000 barrels a day as well as for the Pembina group with their 75,000 barrels per day.

As indicated by the hon. member for Calgary South, the point is that one company is working with one United States affiliate and the other company is working with another United States affiliate. Both of these affiliated or co-operating companies have their own market areas and marketing and transmission facilities within the United States. So it could well be that the production which the Aurora Pipe Line Company wishes to transmit is production which might not be touched by the Pembina people through their company, the Foothills Pipe Lines Company.

But we do not know. We do not know just how these two projects impinge one upon the other and it is quite important that we do know and know now. I do not know whether there are means within this house whereby this bill could be sent back to the other place for further study because from what I have been able to make out there has been no study in the other place. If there are such means, I would suggest that the bill might start all over again there.

One thing I do know is something that was brought out very forcefully by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). I compliment him upon the research he has done and on his conversion to the Conservative position. He has been giving indications of that for over a year and a half now. I compliment him on the detailed work he has done in regard to the ownership of Aurora Pipe Line Company and also the background as to Foothills Pipe Lines Company. It is my understanding that under the national energy board a minimum of at least one third of the common stock of any pipeline company must be sold in Canada. This was not followed out in respect of various pipe line companies prior to the formation of the national energy board. However, it has been followed out in the one offering of which I know subsequent to the formation of the national energy board. I refer to the Alberta Southern Gas Company. If this is a rule, and it is my understanding that it is, it is not being followed in the way the stock of Aurora Pipe Line is to be sold.

As has been pointed out before, 68 per cent of the Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company is owned by the Continental Oil; 22 per cent by Hudson Bay Oil Company of England and the remaining 10 per cent by Canadian investors. On this basis, and on this basis alone, all other things being equal, there seems to be every reason in the world why this particular competition should not be allowed to enter the field against Foothills Pipe Lines Company. Let us not talk about free enterprise in this regard because—

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question at this point. Would he not agree that the matter of the financing of the company to build the pipe line is a matter that is dealt with by the national energy board at the time of the hearing for permission to construct the line, and that the figures to which he has just referred relate to the ownership of the applicant for incorporation?

Mr. Broome: I am not a lawyer as is my hon. friend opposite. However, it seems to me from a reading of this bill that it is a matter which must be dealt with at the time of the incorporation of the company. In fact, it is dealt with in the bill itself and within the articles of incorporation of this company. This company must be familiar with the national energy board regulations. Either I am mistaken in my assumption that one third of this pipe line stock must be offered to the Canadian public or this is not right and it is in their own articles of incorporation.

Mr. McIlraith: I think you are misreading the latter.

Mr. Broome: It may well be. It might be well if the hon. member were to participate in this debate and give the house the benefit of his legal experience to let us know where we stand on the particular point I have raised.

This matter does become one of markets. It is important that nothing be done by this house to stop the development of markets for these by-products, propane, butane, etc., and all these hydrocarbons which are produced in Alberta and which will be coming into production in northern British Columbia and are now already being produced in Saskatchewan. It is equally important also that we know what we are being asked to approve in principle. I say that at the moment I do not believe we have enough knowledge to make a judgment on the matter. I do not believe the brief presentation by the sponsor has covered the points about which we want to know.

Furthermore, they say, let it go to a committee. How many members of this house are members of that committee? I am not a member of the committee that will be dealing with this matter and I am very much interested in it. We approve the principle of the bill on second reading and during that debate any members who want to know something about this bill can be in their seats and can participate in the debate. I am waiting for some advice from you, Mr. Speaker, as to the type of motion I might move in order to refer this back to the Senate for further consideration, if that is possible. If it is not possible, then I suggest that the hour for discussion of these private bills will be exhausted in a few minutes and there will be time for the sponsor of the bill to secure the information we need.

Mr. Jones: Send it to the committee, that is the way they will get the information.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You can discuss it again on third reading.

Mr. Broome: This is the second reading and we are debating the principle of the bill. At the moment, with the knowledge I have, I am not in favour of this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: I think all members of the house recognize it is really six o'clock and since this is a controversial bill, I would suggest we call it six o'clock.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): There is not a great deal of time left. I, like the hon. member who has just completed his remarks, made inquiries concerning the proceedings before one of the committees of the Senate in order to ascertain whether some information was available on this bill. I found that the proceedings of the committee which dealt with this bill were not reported, which is unfortunate. Perhaps the Senate is concentrating more of its efforts on the divorce committee and has not the time to deal with these problems.

In any event, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order; the time for the consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to consideration of the matter which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

At 8 p.m. the house resumed.

THE BUDGET

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, just before five o'clock I had dealt with what I considered to be the total inadequacy of the hon. members of the opposition in their attempts to deal with this budget and their absolute and dismal failure to come to grips with real, strong issues which are involved in the supplementary budget. I had just started to refer to a statement which had been made by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

I am always glad to listen to the hon. member. He, with two other members of his party —whom it might be embarrassing to name— are what I may call a group within a group. They are hon. members for whom I entertain at certain times certain hopes of salvation. They may well be brands, to be plucked from the burning. But every once in a while while I come to that conclusion they fall from grace with a dull, sickening thud, and yesterday was one of those occasions.

The hon. member had occasion to criticize the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who in their turn had criticized the text and the tenor of the remarks made by opposition members.

As I understood the hon. member for Vancouver East, he took the position that this government was arrogant and the members who supported the government were not entitled to engage in criticism of this kind. I take exception to that for three reasons. In the first instance I think this is a government which has always invited and welcomed criticism. It has a capacity for listening to and acting upon valid criticism.

I think a demonstration of that can be found in the debate on the Combines Investigation Act of last year and the Criminal Code amendments which followed it. That was a perfect illustration, and I think there are no such attributes to be found in this government as suggested by the hon. member.

In the second place, when criticism is ill-founded, is unintelligible, is half-baked and is of no value, then I think not only is it a right but it is a duty which falls upon members who support the government to point these things out. Valid, constructive, intelligent criticism is always welcome, and when it does not fall into those categories I think we have a duty to point this out and in turn criticize those who have engaged in that form of argument.

There was a very excellent example of that yesterday when the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway in the course of his remarks had occasion to ask permission of the house to put upon the record certain figures with regard to tax rates which were falling upon individual Canadians. This statement, which I read with some care this morning, places an entirely different light on some of the arguments which were advanced previously by, amongst others, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). That is an example of when we are justified in criticizing arguments of this kind.

I think I can give two other illustrations. Last night after I left this house I went home and I was just able to get in on the last part of what I suppose, for want of a better name, might well be called a post mortem on the Liberal rally held during the first three days of last week. I do not know what preceded this particular display, but when I got home Mr. Walter Gordon was being interviewed with regard to this rally and his participation in it.

When I first saw him he was rather happily admitting the suggestion that he had been the grey eminence behind the convention, and with a due modicum of modesty he was brought to admit that in the event this unfortunate country might ever be brought to the state of being inflicted with a Liberal government he would be the next minister of finance.

Having done this, he was then subjected to a very keen and very intelligent line of cross-examination by an interrogator who I believe was Mr. Davey. At this time Mr. Gordon no longer had behind him all the panoply, crowds, display and colour of a rally; he was all by himself and he had the challenge to meet on his own. He was asked—and I think this is where he fell down dismally—to try and reconcile the differences, the deep gulfs which have to be bridged between his line of economic and political thinking, which he had indicated, the future planks of the Liberal platform which had been allowed to see the light of day, and the statements made from time to time by members of the Liberal party in this house. Of course, that is probably an impossible task. He could not do it. It was a complete failure, almost a massacre.

Having in mind that this gentleman, according to his own admission, aspires to be the next minister of finance should there ever be a Liberal government—and I should add, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a paid political advertisement on behalf of the member for Kenora-Rainy River—I think it is proper for members of this party to indulge in criticism of the sort of thing which was displayed there and to do our utmost to see that a Liberal government is not inflicted upon the people of this country.

I think that some time earlier it had been announced that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) had made a statement in which he had challenged the government to bring on an election and had indicated that beyond any doubt, if there was an election he would be successful. I know that is the sort of thing political leaders are supposed to do at rallies of this kind. I have no doubt that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) does not believe it. I have no doubt that no one in this house believes it, but it is the sort of thing the hon. gentleman is expected to do, and he did it.

Unfortunately, there may be a number of people in this country who are not aware of this practice and I can think of nothing more calculated to strike fear and apprehension into the minds of millions of Canadians than the prospect of another Liberal government. Feeling that way, as I do, I am sure that along with many hon. members on this side I am entitled by my actions and speeches here to see, along with my colleagues, that this is not brought about.

It is not only the actions and program of the government which are at issue. We must also consider, under our democratic system, the programs of those political parties which hope to offer an alternative, the character of the leaders of those parties and their ability to implement the programs which are proposed. For these reasons I take strong issue with what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and when necessary I intend to continue to criticize the type of specious argument which has been developed ad nauseam during this debate on the opposition side.

It would be all very well for me to say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that this is a good budget and an opportune budget brought down at the right time and containing the right material, but I can go outside my own thoughts and outside the opinions of those who support the Minister of Finance. I have here the annual review section of Montreal Gazette of January 14. The leading article is written by Mr. John A. Meyer who, I think, is a reasonable, intelligent and well qualified observer in the field of political economy and one who, I think, takes an independent attitude. The headlines above this article read:

> Nation on new tack. An economy shaped to national aspirations. Aim is sufficient independence, diversity and strength for maintenance of a political sovereignty.

I should like to read a few of the paragraphs from this very interesting article:

> The Canadian economy never before was subjected to such searching scrutiny as during 1960. The process will continue through 1961. The supplementary budget was a first indication of new directions. The main budget should be even more definitive. A deliberate effort is now being made to shape an economy compatible with national needs and national aspirations. The process, in Canadian tradition, will be slow—evolutionary rather than revolutionary. All that really can be said so far is that a start has been made; with so much yet to be done the going now will not necessarily be easier.

The article continues:

> The results of several enquiries now under way should be available by budget time. The government should be able to implement, with the certainty of thorough prior and public examination, findings on operation of the railroads, on conduct of the automobile industry, the periodical press and the coal industry. It will have the initial results of the Senate enquiry into unemployment. Most important of all, it will have the experience of the supplementary budget to draw upon in the preparation of new measures.

There are other items I should like to deal with, but time will not permit. However, there is just one statement I should like to extract from its context and read:

> If the government's actions now appear to be extreme, it is because, in large part, so much is now being done which should have been done before.

That is a point to which I shall return, Mr. Speaker. This not only lends comfort to the Minister of Finance in connection with the bringing down of this budget and the legislation proposed to complement it, but I think it constitutes by implication a strong rebuke to those members of the opposition parties who have engaged in the form of criticism of this budget to which I have referred.

I wish in particular to comment on a television appearance made, I think, in a program called "The Nation's Business" by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) on the eve of the national rally. I do not remember all that was said, and I did not catch it all, but one statement was made—I do not know which of the two hon. gentlemen made it—containing strong criticism of this budget and the related actions of the government on the ground that it was nothing but a long range program.

In the first place, I reject the suggestion that there are no short range programs of immediate value connected with this budget. If necessary, I could turn to this very authentic document which was branded by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) and which is known as "The Record Speaks" from which the hon. gentleman quoted. I think that having quoted from it he should have gone on to put it on record in Hansard for the edification of the people of Canada.

This is an accurate account, illustrated by chapter and verse with reference to the statutes of this country, indicating what steps have been taken by this government to increase the economic standards and the well-being and welfare of the people of this country. I could go outside this document. In the article to which I referred by Mr. Meyer, and in the articles following it, we find a number of expressions of opinion by various people in different areas of the political and economic life of this country. We find on page 4 of this supplement, for example—and I recommend the reading of this to all hon. members before they engage in further criticism—an article by Mr. H. W. Thomson, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association. Among other things, he said this:

> Additional deposit accounts were opened at a rate of more than 2,000 every banking day during the 12-month period ending September 30, 1960. Personal savings accounts increased by 384,358 and other deposit accounts of the public by 156,780 making a total number of accounts at September 30 of 12,713,000. In the past 10 years they have increased by more than 50 per cent.
> At September 30, 1960, personal savings in the chartered banks stood at $7,310 million, $71 million higher than the year before and the highest figure on record.

I turn also to a statement from a publication cited by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) last night and referred to as "Industry". In the same article which, I think, he mentioned is the statement:

> How many of us, for instance, know that there are 250,000—one quarter of a million—more Canadians with jobs today than there were three years ago.

I think that constitutes an ample answer to those who say there are no short range characteristics of immediate benefit to this country in the government's program. It is my submission—and I submit this with confidence—that the long range programs envisaged in this budget and complemented by the legislation and planned action of the government are something we should have had many years ago long before the Liberal government was thrown out of office in 1957.

The period of gestation of many of the economic movements in a country like ours today is of long duration and the fruits we harvest at present are in many instances the result of seeds sown years ago. That has been a fatal error into which the former Liberal government fell. For that reason I think it ill behooves them to criticize the budget and the other measures introduced by this government because they show, in effect, long range planning. Three of those steps to which I will refer speak eloquently of the values and virtues that will stem from them.

The intention clearly indicated in the budget of enabling Canadians to enjoy a greater measure of participation in the development of their own natural resources and a greater share in their ownership is something which should have been commenced eight or ten years ago when it was fully apparent that a dangerous situation was going to come about because of what was happening with regard to the ownership of our natural resources.

One of the important measures to which I referred is the question of trade expansion under which additional financial guarantees to exporters will be implemented.

A second is the imaginative mass meeting held at the instigation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) under which trade commissioners from various parts of the world and thousands upon thousands of Canadian businessmen were brought together. This has already had a favourable impact. A few days ago I spoke to a person I regard as an informed observer of the economic picture who had just returned from Europe and the United Kingdom. His unequivocal statement to me was that there has already been as a result of this program a most beneficial impact upon the European and United Kingdom political and economic scene.

Finally there is the inquiry instigated by this government in the other place by a special committee of the problems of manpower and the related and integrated effect so far as unemployment is concerned and the direction our economy should take.

These are steps which should have been foreseen as being required eight, 10 or 12 years ago but I suppose it would be too much to suggest that a government and party whose trademark was procrastination and delay, a party of day to day expediency and bits and pieces legislation, who were never comfortable when they had to take a stand and if they could not find a fence available when a decision had to be made would build one to sit on, would be the sort of government or party one would reasonably expect to launch measures of this kind.

Under the present administration these and other forward looking measures will, I suggest, take the people of this country far ahead in their search for prosperity and happiness.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, this budget seems to be remarkable more for what it lacks than for what it contains. That is probably the reason why the speakers on the government side have found it preferable to devote more of their time to debating the Liberal rally than to discussing the proposals which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has placed before the house. Even the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) this afternoon, after admonishing my colleague, the hon. member for Bonvista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) for devoting some time to a Conservative pamphlet, proceeded to revert to form and spent the rest of the time at his disposal discussing the Liberal rally. All of this leads to only one conclusion, that the Liberal rally has really got the government worried.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It should have the hon. gentleman worried.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Carter: Hon. gentlemen opposite find it a very convenient topic on which to fall back because there is actually little in the budget to discuss.

For example, this budget contains nothing at all for the Atlantic provinces and that in the face of those famous Atlantic resolutions which were drawn up and advertised so much in the elections of 1957 and 1958. It contains nothing to deal with high interest rates, one of the most pressing problems at the present time. Such measures as are in this budget are designed more to consolidate interest rates at their present high level than to lower them.

Most important of all, there is nothing in this budget that can be expected to produce any immediate effect on the unemployment situation which is the major problem confronting Canada today, and that in face of the fact that this budget was referred to in the speech from the throne along with other measures to combat unemployment, and the impressions created by the statements made by spokesmen of the government both in and out of parliament.

These impressions together with the government's insistence on bringing down this budget before the Christmas holiday led us all to expect that this would be an important part of the program to combat unemployment. As for the general objectives outlined in the budget, there will be a wide measure of agreement. The objectives of reducing the premium on the Canadian dollar, reducing our international indebtedness, increasing Canadian ownership of our industry, inducing Canadians to invest more of their own capital in Canada and to borrow more at home than abroad, are all worthy objectives and will receive a wide measure of support.

An hon. Member: Will you vote for it?

Mr. Carter: Wait just a moment. However, when it comes to the means by which these objectives are to be obtained there is room for wide disagreement as to their adequacy. Indeed, the question arises whether some other and better methods might have been employed to obtain these desirable results.

Some of the means set forth in the budget are double depreciation for industry, the extension of the 21 per cent tax on corporate profits from the $25,000 bracket to the $35,000 bracket, Canadian income restrictions on investment corporations and pension trusts, the repeal of the 4 per cent surtax on income from Canadian investment, the increase on the withholding tax from 5 to 15 per cent and the tax penalties on bonds owned outside of Canada by non-residents. All these sound very imposing, but when we come to analyse them we find they are not so effective as one might be led to expect.

Take for example the question of double depreciation. We in the Atlantic provinces are keenly interested in this measure because it is specifically designed to attract industry into underdeveloped areas where there is a high level of unemployment. When we come to examine this measure we find it is applicable for only one year and it is hedged around with so many conditions that it is unlikely that many companies will be induced to bother with it at all. Even if a company does take advantage of it, what is gained in the one year is likely to be lost later on by a reduction in capital cost book value. Therefore, actually this measure is not really a tax deduction but a tax postponement, and that is a great disappointment to those of us who are interested in the development of our resources in the maritime provinces. If this is the best that the government can offer—and it is the only thing in this budget—then we may as well forget about it because it falls so very far short of what is required.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What would the hon. gentleman do?

Mr. Carter: If the hon. member will wait a minute he will find out.

Mr. Batten: A rhetorical question.

Mr. Grafftey: Tell us what your government did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It gave the best government in Canadian history, and that is a fact.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You really smile when you say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am smiling at you.

Mr. Carter: The extension of the 21 per cent tax on profits from the $25,000 bracket to the $35,000 bracket will be a welcome tax reduction to those small businesses whose profits fall between these two figures, but it will be no help at all to the vast numbers of small enterprises whose taxable profits fall below $25,000.

Small business enterprises are the backbone of our economy, and if we are to make an all out attack on unemployment this, in my opinion, is one of the best ways of doing it because there are so many small businesses that if we can enable them to employ only one extra member on their staff, by the sheer force of their numbers alone they will make a considerable contribution toward solving the unemployment problem. If we add to them the people who would be employed indirectly by the enlargement of their premises and by additions to their equipment, then we can see that small businesses can make a very important contribution toward creating the jobs that we need if we are to come to grips with this unemployment problem. But to do that we must consider all the small business people who should receive some measure of tax assistance, and not merely those whose profits happen to fall between $25,000 and $35,000.

Restrictions on the pension trusts and on investment houses themselves cannot have very much positive effect on our problem because most of those companies or organizations already have a sufficient proportion of Canadian securities in their portfolios to enable them to comply with the law without increasing them. What we actually need is a more direct incentive which would pay the investor to buy common and preferred stock rather than bonds and mortgages.

The repeal of the 4 per cent surtax on Canadian investment income will help a number of individuals, widows and older people who are dependent on investment income, but it cannot be expected to exert any appreciable influence on the flow of equity funds.

The increase in the withholding taxes illustrates a new feature which is characteristic of the Conservative party, and that is its accent on Canadian nationalism. While it may sound patriotic, we know that forces are at work, ready and eager to exploit this emphasis in such a way as to generate anti-Americanism, and some of those overtones are already audible. The record of the Conservative party is not to be envied in this respect. My hon. friends remember their references to the Texas buccaneers when they were sitting over here in opposition, and they remember their references to the 15 per cent trade diversion and the tough line that they were going to take with the U.S.A., all of which were planks in their election platform. They also remember their truculent reaction to the feelings of the people of the United States which arose in relation to the recent Cuban trade overtures, and now these measures emphasizing economic nationalism with their unfortunate overtones of anti-Americanism.

The United States investor can hardly be blamed if he gets the idea that his risk capital is not welcome here in Canada. The fact is that Canada cannot do without United States venture capital. We have somewhere around 500,000 people unemployed at the present time. Within six months time, after schools are out, around July or August, there will be another 200,000 additional people in the working force looking for jobs. Where are all those jobs to come from? They can come only from the investment of venture capital.

Someone in the United States has calculated that it requires $10,000 of capital to create one job, and I presume that the figure is pretty much the same for Canada. Canada simply has not enough capital to create all those jobs, and furthermore Canadians are not willing to invest what capital they have; otherwise, what would be the necessity for all these special inducements outlined in the budget?

I ask my hon. friends, where would Newfoundland be today but for the investment of United States capital? How much Canadian capital has been invested in my province since we became part of Canada in 1949? It is so trivial that it is too insignificant to mention, and that has been one of our greatest disappointments about confederation.

The United States can hardly be blamed if it feels that it is not obliged to continue the special consideration which we have enjoyed heretofore. A short time ago the Pentagon in the United States sent out orders to its armed forces to restrict spending on purchases for United States troops abroad. As a special consideration Canada was exempted from that order, and that meant a lot to many communities in my province whose economies are tied in with the existence of United States bases.

In Newfoundland our fresh and frozen fish industry is completely dependent upon the United States market. On several occasions the fish lobbies in the United States having made representations to their government and to special committees set up for the purpose have succeeded in getting recommendations put through which would place restrictions upon imports of our fresh fish products. That was overcome on two occasions only by a presidential veto. If such a situation arises in the future the President of the United States would hardly, in my opinion, feel himself obliged to come to our rescue again and if he does not it is going to be very disastrous for my province.

Let us not forget too that the United States is the bulwark of our freedom. Canada is a part of the free world and the United States is the leader of that free world. The main policy of the Kremlin today is to divide Canada from the United States and to stir up disunity between our peoples. Anything that contributes to that disunity endangers the security, not only of Canada but also of the whole free world.

There were two other notable omissions in this budget which in my opinion should cause some concern. One is that there was no indication of coming to grips with the underlying causes of our economic trouble and the other is that there was no recognition of any need for a change in our financial machinery. One of the major causes of our financial troubles today is that the fiscal policy of the government and the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada are not in harmony and, in fact, they have been out of step ever since this government took office.

This raises the question of over-all responsibility. It is true that the Bank of Canada is charged under the Bank of Canada Act with the responsibility of maintaining the stability of our Canadian currency but since our dollar was freed on the international exchange its value has been at a premium abroad while at the same time it has depreciated in value at home by an average of about 2 per cent per year for the past 20 years. That suggests that perhaps we are saddling the Bank of Canada with a responsibility which it is impossible to discharge.

When the fiscal policy of the government and the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada were in close harmony, as they were under the Liberal regime, there was positive leadership and direction which could be easily recognized by the business community, but when they are out of step, as they have been for some time now, confusion and chaos result. Since the monetary policy of the bank is subject to a large extent to the direct influence of the fiscal policy of the government, it is logical that the over-all responsibility should rest with the government and the Minister of Finance would do a lot to clear up the present confusion if he would plainly accept that responsibility.

A second major cause of our economic troubles is the fact that our financial machinery is out of date. Our present system is some 25 or 30 years old and during that time tremendous and fundamental changes have taken place in our economic life but there has been no change at all in our financial machinery. As a Liberal I believe in individual freedom. I believe an individual should be free to do what he wants provided he keeps within the law and does not restrict the freedom of anyone else. Above all, the individual should be free to meet the needs of his fellow men. But we are not free to do so. We may see needs around us, we may have the resources and the will to take care of them but we are not free to go ahead and do it.

The system or somebody behind the system determines what needs are going to be met and who is going to meet them. A young couple may wish to own a home of their own. The home may be worth around $15,000. They can find the $15,000 to lay out for the value of the house but they are not free to acquire that house because the system, in addition to the $15,000 for the house, requires them to pay another $15,000 in interest which they certainly cannot afford.

The fundamental problem facing Canadians today is to maintain and expand our standard of living in a changing world. Our financial system is one of the means by which this is to be achieved. But experience has proved that only on very rare occasions when very special conditions have happened to exist at the same time have we been able to enjoy prosperity without inflation. For the greater part of that time the system has operated so as to compel us to choose between two evils, inflation on the one hand and unemployment on the other.

The primary reason for the existence of our financial, industrial and commercial organizations is to meet the needs of the people. In Canada we have a vast reservoir of human needs crying out to be met, not to speak of the vast abundance of human needs elsewhere. Here in Canada we also have an abundance of natural resources, of materials, skills and industrial capacity, a great part of which is now lying idle. Moreover, we have a huge surplus of manpower of somewhere around 500,000 people.

Surely a financial system adequate to present day conditions would function in such a way as to bring all these elements together and to act as a catalyst so that the industrial machine can start turning over to fulfil its primary function of meeting the needs of mankind. The fact that our industrial machine is slowing down and a large section of it has already come to a standstill, while at the same time we have approximately half a million out of work with millions of needs waiting to be filled, is in itself sufficient proof that our present financial system is no longer adequate.

In addition, no new production or at best very little can come into existence today without generating a corresponding burden of debt and more and more it is becoming the case that new production cannot be consumed without incurring an additional debt burden, so much so that many of our workers today have mortgaged a large part of their earnings for two or three years in advance. How long can this be expected to continue? Surely it is bound to catch up with us some day sooner or later and when it does the effects are likely to be disastrous.

Mr. Coyne has told us on a number of occasions that we are living beyond our means. Mr. Coyne's statements would be much more helpful if he would be more precise in defining his terms and exactly what he has in mind when he refers to "our means". If by "our means" he means our capacity to incur additional debt, then I think we must agree with him because it seems to me that there is something immoral about taking the easy way out by incurring a debt burden which we are going to pass on to the next generation, particularly if they are not going to derive any benefit from it. The next generation will have enough to do to cope with their own problems without inheriting problems from us. Mr. Coyne's statement, as does this budget, appears to be based on two assumptions.

One of these assumptions is that there is no alternative to the present system, and the other assumption is that the present system cannot be improved; that we are stuck with it and we must continue to live with it and adjust ourselves to it whenever necessary for all time to come.

Now, these two assumptions I, for one, am not prepared to accept, at least not with the information that has been made available to date. In my opinion, it is absurd that man can put a sputnik into orbit and guided missiles into space, yet he has not the ingenuity to correct these obvious defects in our financial system or replace it with one that is even better. What should be done? Obviously, the first step is to find out where our financial machinery has broken down. I, for this reason, urge the government once again as I have already done on several occasions to set up a royal commission or some appropriate body to completely investigate and examine our financial system and to recommend what changes should be made to correct its obvious defects and inadequacies.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question? He is recommending a royal commission, yet within the last few days it seems to me we have heard a lot of depredation about royal commissions. Does he really mean he wants one?

Mr. Carter: Yes, I really mean it. There are two reasons for setting up royal commissions. The first reason is to postpone action on something and the other is to get information. The government is prone to set up royal commissions for the first reason I gave, but I want one for the second reason.

(Translation):

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I take the opportunity offered me tonight to discuss the supplementary budget which has been designed to help the Canadian people itself by promoting the manufacture of goods essentially Canadian in nature.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just resumed his seat has stated that in many respects the supplementary budget is unfavourable to the United States and to the other nations as well. It is not so. This supplementary budget is merely a pro-Canadian budget. The measures adopted before Christmas give way to others which will soon be considered.

This supplementary budget, Mr. Speaker, is based upon real Tory principles. The Progressive Conservative party talks about principles, while the other parties, the Liberal opposition and the C.C.F. party, talk only and constantly of doctrine.

(Text):

This evening, Mr. Speaker, I should simply like to suggest, not necessarily by referring to the Liberal convention or their pronouncements inside or outside of this house, to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) that there is nothing really sacrosanct about indecision. I am reminded of the Eatmor candy advertisement, the more you eat the more you want. When I see the stand of the Liberal party on red China I would remind the leaders of the opposition party that the more decisions they make the more they might want to make. As a result of this latter performance I am sure they have become more than ever like a Shakespearian Hamlet opposition; on the one hand, on the other hand, to be or not to be.

My greatest indictment of this opposition is that they have criticized this government time after time in the past and lately I expected they would have a mass of alternatives. However, what do we see? We see confused thinking and indecision. My very learned and hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate said this afternoon that the budget was not bad. It was like an egg, there was some good and some bad in it. I know that those who become addicted to punning often must visit a psychiatrist, but I must say that during his speech I did not hear one constructive or original idea "hatched".

Mr. Habel: Are you going to hatch something now?

Mr. Grafftey: Perhaps I have taken a long time to realize this, but this afternoon I said to myself as I watched my very good friend from Bonavista-Twillingate perform, there is something of the maverick quality in him. A lot of the things he said are feasible, but the point is they have nothing to do with the program enunciated by his own party. I doubt if his cohorts on the front benches realize or have the perspicacity to detect the maverick quality in my hon. friend. When I hear the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) speak I really feel that these gentlemen who form a triad of the 1957 administration have not yet gone through that long purgatory of humility which will be necessary before they ever begin to think of assuming power and taking the reins of office to direct this country.

I have said that it is a great privilege for me to speak in the debate on this supplementary budget. It is a supplementary budget designed, with past legislative enactments put into force by this government before Christmas and with legislative enactments which we are going to put into force, upon Conservative principles. It is a supplementary budget designed to help Canadians to help themselves. It is a supplementary budget that is not anti-American or anti any other country, but it is pro-Canadian. It is a supplementary budget designed to produce more goods by Canadians for Canadians in Canada. In a moment I am going to enunciate what I think are Conservative principles.

Mr. Pickersgill: That will be something new.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That really will be something new.

Mr. Grafftey: Hon. members opposite may laugh, but did you see any principles come out of their convention?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Grafftey: I am going to enunciate principles and I challenge them to enunciate principles of any sort. As a matter of fact, while we talk about principles, the C.C.F. and the Liberals talk about doctrine. Old world Liberalism under Gladstone might have had some doctrinaire benefits, but certainly after listening to the pronouncements of the leaders of this party I believe that Liberalism, especially in Canada, has become a hybrid mixture of expediency and overworked compromises.

What are the principles to which I refer, as contained in our recent legislative enactments and as contained in our supplementary budget? Conservative principles dictate that legislation should help people to help themselves; that central governments are not all-wise, not perfect. Unlike past Liberal administrations, we do not pretend we know all the answers or that we are working, as I have often said in the past, on an equal plane with the deity.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did you say you were or you were not?

Mr. Grafftey: Conservative principles work in co-operation with the municipalities and with the provinces. I ask you to pay attention to the fact that today we see the provinces and the federal authorities working together in a spirit of real progressive understanding and compromise in connection with the repatriation of our constitution. Conservative principles imply an understanding of local self-agency. So I now call our program a progressive program for partnership economic expansion. Hon. members opposite might snicker. At least that expression is original.

I, like hon. members opposite, listened to the debates during the United States election and to all the proceedings before the election. I noticed that the hon. member for Essex East came up recently with the expression that the Liberal program had something to do with Canadian frontiers. Surely my hon. friend, with all his wisdom and originality, can compose something on his own. At any rate, we all enjoyed looking at the United States election campaign.

We understand that this progressive program for partnership economic expansion realizes that modern, contemporary problems must be solved in co-operation with the provinces, in co-operation with industry and labour, in co-operation with the municipalities, in co-operation with agriculture and all Canadians.

I noticed that at the recent Liberal convention, while a great many of the older members of the party had a lot to say about Liberal policy and doctrine on the floor of this house, the old guard were largely forgotten. I hope I have the opportunity, in a friendly discussion outside the house, to discuss the experience with them of being exposed to the grass. I hope it was not too harrowing.

One of the things that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) mentioned during this debate was that so many of the legislative enactments and so many of the decrees passed by this government recently depended upon the initiative of the Canadian people. That is the crux of this whole debate; that underlines one of the major differences between this government and the official opposition. We have faith in the strength and the initiative of the Canadian people, while they do not.

Unlike the Liberal party, which said before confederation that confederation was almost an impossibility; unlike the Liberal party, which said that the Canadian Pacific railway could never be built from coast to coast; unlike the Liberal party, which has called our northern vision something of—I think it went this way, "igloo to igloo", our party—

Mr. Pickersgill: Nightmare.

Mr. Grafftey: —embraces an expansive optimism. We optimistically believe in a Canada moving forward. I am sure that when Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that the twentieth century belonged to Canada he never visualized, in the future, the present-day Liberal party saying that this country is really falling down and has no future. I believe, with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. I wish members opposite in the Liberal party would join in this progressive belief in optimism—

Mr. Habel: He did not know the Tories would be in office.

Mr. Grafftey: —with such philosophers as Plato and romantics as Coleridge—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Plato was not a romantic.

Mr. Grafftey: Our party is also built upon hope. Our legislative enactments are built upon optimism. The Liberals form their utterances around negation. I would like to say that however great the immediate popularity of the destructive philosophy may become, in the long run a demonstration of affirmation will conquer it unless the fabric of civilization first disintegrates.

I believe that the Canadian economy today is healthy. I also believe that pessimism and saying that things are bad can psychologically have their destructive effects. I know that if I were in the peak of physical trim and feeling well every day, and every time I got out of bed one of my family came up to me and said, "You are looking awful"—

Mr. Pickersgill: They may be right.

Mr. Grafftey: —and if this went on day after day, no matter how well I felt, if every day when in fact I was feeling well, when I was feeling fit, when my doctor said there was absolutely nothing wrong with me; if every day I got out of bed feeling that way someone in my family said, "Oh my gosh, you are pale, you are looking awful, Heward, are you feeling well, Heward?", that would make me feel bad. That is what the Liberal party is doing to Canada every time they say to the body politic, the people, "You are looking awful; you are pale; you are anaemic".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You look pretty sick.

Mr. Grafftey: If this were just party politics and political expediency I would not be so irate. But the hon. members opposite do not realize where politics stop and where statesmanship begins. I believe that this continual playing down of the future of Canada and our contemporary position is hurting us at home and abroad. No matter how good the government is, it will have that effect.

I would say that no opposition in the history of this nation has preached such a continual and concentrated sermon of pessimism as the Liberal party of today. But, again, we are a party of hope; they are a party of negation. We are a government of hope; they are an opposition of negation. We believe, with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. We believe that in the end our philosophy is the philosophy that Canadians in a realistic spirit want to hear about.

Mr. Regier: Will you tell that to the unemployed?

Mr. Grafftey: One of the speakers this evening has also made reference to the "Annual Commercial Review and Forecast in the Age of Automation". This was got together by leading men from one end of this country to the other who have no political axe to grind, who in an objective way are assessing our situation today and looking into the future for tomorrow. What do they say? Going very briefly through these pages of this review and forecast issued by the Montreal Gazette we see, "Nation on new tack". This is by John A. Meyer, financial editor of the Gazette. Then he says, "An economy shaped to national aspirations. Aim is sufficient independence, diversity and strength for maintenance of a political sovereignty".

Then, "Steel capacity increases"; this is Mr. H. G. Hilton, chairman and chief executive officer of the Steel Company of Canada. He also says, "Prices stable as efficiency gains." Then we have, "Steady banking growth. Accounts, loans, branches gain". That is written by H. W. Thomson, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association. I notice my hon. friends opposite are paying attention to these remarks.

An hon. Member: Unemployment is growing too.

Mr. Grafftey: "Hydro-thermal increase still 10.5 per cent." Then, "Chemical shipments rise"; "Wide gain in phones. Bell's services cross 3½ million". Then we see, "$6 billion in new life insurance". I intend to keep going here, Mr. Speaker. Then we see, "Mining output up shade"; "T.C.A. sets records".

I think the hon. member for Essex East would like to hear these remarks by Edwin H. Walker, president and general manager of General Motors of Canada Limited, "Good auto prospects. Car-truck purchases at new record". Then we see, "Nuclear program expands. New plant construction is speeded"; "Baby budget approach constructive", by Fred C. Mears, Gazette Ottawa bureau. He also says, "Economic self-dependence the goal—personal tax relief a possibility".

These are expressions of people from one end of the country to the other. Then we see, "Record nickel output. European consumption is heavier. Canada consolidates leading position". That is by Henry S. Wingate, chairman of the board of International Nickel of Canada Limited. Then we have, "Quebec economy stable. Main indexes retain upward trend". That is by the Hon. Andre Rousseau, minister of trade and commerce, province of Quebec. Then we see, "More farm mechanization. Implement sales are best in years". I will not be long—

An hon. Member: Keep going.

Mr. Grafftey: I shall not be long. "Our fur trade progresses—Looming larger internationally". "Meat consumption gains"—by K. R. Graydon, director of public relations, meat packers council of Canada. "Beef market trend quite stable". "Aluminum diversifies —Ever-widening range of products—Long term outlook is optimistic".

Mr. Chevrier: How is the textile industry doing?

Mr. Grafftey: It is having its difficulties, difficulties which this government is facing with a realistic policy. "Oil industry records—Some easing in rate of expansion". "More paint is sold—Dollar volume record set for year". "Iron Ore Company expands steadily". "Gains in asbestos—Volume higher, prices fairly stable".

Mr. Regier: And a high record of unemployment.

Mr. Harkness: What originality.

Mr. Grafftey: "Lumber outlook brightens —Dip in housing has severe effects, but good export volume seems likely".

I am sorry to take up so much time by reading so many of these facts into the record, but I underline that they are facts gathered together by leading men in industry, business and labour across this nation. They are facts which absolutely repudiate the pessimism and the doom and gloom which members opposite are preaching both inside and outside this House of Commons. So ask them to stop this nonsense and join with the government and join with all Canadians in our crusade of realistic optimism.

Mr. Regier: Where is the crusade? We have been waiting for it for a number of years.

Mr. Grafftey: Hon. members opposite have recently criticized the members of our cabinet for going from one end of this country to the other in past weeks. It is a fact that members of this cabinet were recently about the country for the simple reason that this government intends to stay in touch with the people. We are the party of the people, and the voice of the people is our strength. One of the reasons why the Canadian people decided to end the Liberal reign was that the former government became aloof from the people. I have heard Liberal backbenchers say they could hardly get appointments with ministers at the end of those long 22 years. The present ministers were out and about this country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was out and about this country. Members of parliament belonging to this party are going about their constituencies, because we have the intention of keeping in touch with the people. We know our mandate comes from the people of Canada, and unlike those who for so long behaved in a cool, quasi-intellectual way, we are going to keep in touch with the people. We are the party of the people and we understand what the aspirations and desires of all Canadians are.

Members opposite have criticized this government by saying its policies contain a high degree of nationalism. They say we are going to lose friends abroad. They say those policies contain a spirit of nationalism which can do nothing but harm Canada and lose our friends. I say that if the trend started by the past Liberal administration were continued Canada would have become nothing but a banana republic. We believe that many of the things which have been done in this budget should have been done before. I repeat that this supplementary budget is anti-nobody; it is merely pro-Canadian. Let me briefly read some remarks which I have penned, with a friend of mine, in relation to the present budget.

The federal budget, like the early legislation which has been introduced at the present session, gives the impression of having been well conceived and planned. Regarding this spirit of nationalism of which some hon. members have made mention, I say the government's position is made clear in two paragraphs of the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I should like to quote those two paragraphs because I think they are of primary importance:

> It has sometimes been asserted that the participation of foreigners in Canadian business and in our capital markets should no longer be welcome and that investment from abroad should be sharply curtailed by policies directed to this end. This is not the view of this government. The result of blocking out foreign investors and foreign investment would be to produce a "little Canada", cut off from many of the contacts with the outside world that have enriched our national life. We would become comparatively isolated, and most of us would be disappointed by the effects of our economic development.

The minister went on to say:

> As I have already made clear in this speech, and frequently on other occasions, it is my view that the Canadian economy has derived great benefits from the inflow of capital from abroad and benefits still continue to accrue. Our national development has been accelerated thereby; the breadth and depth of our industrial structure have been increased; the scope of productive occupations for our own citizens has been extended. There is no intention therefore of recommending policies antagonistic to foreign capital. To do so would not be in the best interests of Canada.

I think these two paragraphs must be underlined and borne in mind during this debate. They must be borne in mind by those who in an irresponsible fashion would like to pretend that this supplementary budget has undertones or overtones of narrow nationalism in it.

I should now like very briefly to discuss what are, in my opinion, some of the more important technical enactments contained in this supplementary budget.

The imposition of a 15 per cent withholding tax on the interest of federal and provincial government bonds represents one important legislative change. Federal government issues were previously exempt and provincial issues subject to 5 per cent. This action will deter the non-resident buying of treasury bills and short term government securities to take advantage of discrepancies in interest rates in the international money market. It thereby provides the Bank of Canada with freer action in monetary policy without being concerned that the action that should be taken would contribute to a strengthening of the false premium on the Canadian dollar.

Second, incentives earlier were introduced to enable provincial and municipal governments to finance in the New York market. In order to obtain a good reception to such issues legislation was introduced that such issues in United States funds would not be subject to the withholding tax applicable to other non-residents in the payment of Canadian dividends and interest. It is broadly accepted that it is no longer as desirable to have provincial and municipal governments financing in New York, in part because of our already high deficit in international payments—and in part because it adds to the false premium strength of the Canadian dollar. The reasoning is soundly based and it thereby makes sense to eliminate the incentive and to make the financing, regardless as to where it takes place, subject to a 15 per cent withholding tax when the interest and dividends are paid to a non-resident.

Thus the application of the 15 per cent withholding tax on the dividends of wholly owned non-resident subsidiaries only removes an inequity and makes the factors equal for all non-resident investors earning an investment income from the Canadian economy. The United States investment withholding tax with countries with which it does not have a reciprocal tax agreement, such as France, Switzerland, the Philippines and many others is 30 per cent.

A third thing I should like to mention is that the change in the customs tariff is complex but without transgressing the agreement of GATT. It gives the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) discretional authority to more effectively rule with respect to the provisions of section 6 of the Customs Tariff containing the anti-dumping clause which applies only to goods of a class or kind made or produced in Canada. It deals with a qualification of this last clause and defines class or kind more specifically and eliminates the loopholes under which small modifications are made and under which it is then claimed such goods are not produced in Canada. The new resolution proposes that in the case of goods custom-made to specifications they should be deemed to be of a class or kind made or produced in Canada if adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time. It is further provided that goods shall be deemed to be of a class or kind made or produced in Canada if goods of approximately the same class or kind are made or produced in Canada. The change strengthens the anti-dumping clauses in the tariff structure.

I think these facts should be tabled at the present time to clarify general understanding in relation to the intentions of this supplementary budget.

The supplementary budget enacted tax considerations for those individuals who have children at universities. This enactment, coupled with the present government's attitude toward vocational schools in co-operation with the municipalities, underlies the real importance of education in our contemporary society.

(Translation):

And now, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal quite briefly with the Small Business Loans Act. During the recess and the holiday period I received many letters and telephone calls. Several people of my riding also came to see me about this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is meant to provide employment for our Canadian workers this winter. Banks will be ready this month to grant loans.

(Text):

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) suggested to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) yesterday that the banking officials were not aware of this legislation. How completely ridiculous. This is just not according to the facts. I recently received a phone call—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the vociferous, volatile and vehement hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). I listened with great interest to his inspiring innocence. As I listened my mind went back to my freshmen days in college and the freshmen's debating club of 1909.

An hon. Member: Barber college?

Mr. Herridge: I did not attend the same college as the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Henderson). I was also reminded of a remark made, by a former prime minister of Great Britain, Mr. Disraeli, when referring to a speech to which he had listened made by the Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone who had spoken with great confidence and assurance. Prime Minister Disraeli said—and this applies very well to the hon. member who has just taken his seat—"The hon. member when he is speaking speaks with much assurance, as if he had the political ace of trumps up his sleeve and the Deity had placed it there".

My topic this evening will be wrong-doing, wickedness and water and I shall relate those three words to the discussion of a subject which to some extent comes within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I am pleased that the perceptive, patient, perambulating parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell) is in his seat. I trust he will bring my remarks to the attention of the minister tomorrow.

I wish to mention first of all the question of the repeated failures of small United States lumber companies in the interior of British Columbia whose owners and operators after bankruptcy disappear across the United States border. I have been asked to mention this by a large number of the persons affected. I bring it to the attention of the Minister of Finance in the hope that the situation will be reviewed to see if amendments can be made to the Bankruptcy Act to cover up what appear to be present loopholes and to see if some legislation can be introduced to protect the interests of Canadian working people and other Canadian creditors.

The most recent case brought to my attention is the failure of the Hilco Lumber Company, near Fruitvale, British Columbia. I attended a creditors' meeting. This is not my responsibility but my constituents have considerable confidence in my advice and in my willingness to do what I can to assist. I attended this meeting of about 100 people. There were present some 60 workingmen who had been employed for several months by this company. In addition there were storekeepers and other creditors. Some of the workingmen were owed as much as $900. They had been asked to continue working without pay from month to month. The scamps gave them some cheques and disappeared across the border. The lumber, of course, had gone across to the United States. These employees were left without anything in the nature of reimbursement for their services. Storekeepers, oil companies and other suppliers were left without payment for their goods. It was brought to my attention at the meeting that the company had collected income tax from the employees over a period of two years. Approximately $14,000 is owing to the income tax department.

When the employees went to the unemployment insurance office it was found the company had not purchased unemployment insurance stamps. There is some laxity in this respect and checking required for the protection of the workers involved.

To show the indignation of the citizens of the district in addition to those directly affected I shall read excerpts from letters received by me from various persons and organizations. Here is a letter from the minister of St. Paul's United church at Fruitvale, one paragraph of which reads:

With the other leaders of this community, I share their concern in the way the Hilco Logging Company has run off with the profits without paying their employees. I believe that you will be having a letter from the local ministerial association, for we have all been in homes badly hit by this. Please feel free to ask any help that we might give you so that this cannot happen again.

I have another letter from the Beaver Valley ministerial association addressed to me as the Hon. H. W. Herridge. I appreciate that this title is a little premature although possibly I am in the budding stage. The letter reads:

Dear Sir:

We ministers of the Beaver valley ministerial association feel a deep concern in finding many families in our community unjustly treated by the fiasco of the Hilco Lumber Company.

The injustice caused by the non-payment of wages has brought great hardship to families and businesses. The moral impact is something that is hard to gauge but the idea that "Hilco got away with it, so can we" is something to consider.

We are writing you in hopes that something can be done to clarify this situation and to prevent its recurrence anywhere in Canada.

Yours sincerely,

Rev. M. A. Switzer,
Fruitvale Full Gospel Assembly

Pastor W. D. Turnbull

In addition to this, I was supplied with a résumé of the situation as it exists at the present time. I am not going to deal at length with this except to bring sufficient facts to the attention of the parliamentary secretary so that the matter can be reviewed to see whether something can be done to stop this recurring practice—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman suggest the nature of the legislation which he proposes?

Mr. Herridge: I am not a member of the legal profession, I am a forest farmer.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have been following the hon. gentleman with very great interest and I have been hoping that he would come to the point.

Mr. Herridge: I am not qualified to suggest what act should be amended or what legislation should be introduced but I am asking that the matter be reviewed. I am sure the parliamentary secretary to the minister and other hon. gentlemen of the legal profession on the other side, with their experience and knowledge of these things, are much more capable of, shall I say, discussing the technical and legal aspects of this question than I am. I am simply bringing the facts to the attention of the house and making the suggestions which have been brought to my attention by these people and by the leaders of the community and of other communities in southeastern British Columbia.

This company goes broke owing over half a million dollars. About $19,000 is due to the workers by way of wages. Many local businessmen are creditors. Federal and provincial governments are creditors, as I mentioned.

During the last 18 months about 12 million board feet of lumber was taken from the woods, most of same consisting of tamarac, cedar, fir, hemlock and balsam and was shipped to the Hill Lumber Company, also owned by Mr. Pidge, at Curlew, Washington.

Small shipments were made to other companies in Canada.

An unknown number of cheques have been issued which are in excess of the $19,000. They were issued to pay workers, subcontractors and creditors. Many have been returned in an insufficient funds condition. Some have been passed into local businesses which are unable to claim money from the men.

A study of accounts payable would indicate that moneys are owing to the federal and provincial governments. It is believed that seizure proceedings have been taken of the rough lumber remaining.

I bring this matter to the attention of the parliamentary secretary on behalf of these unfortunate people in the hope that consideration will be given to them. This is only one instance. I am informed that this rascal has done this twice before. I am informed he also operates lumber companies in the United States.

It seems to me there is a need for legislation that would protect Canadian citizens under these circumstances. It is the same old story. Wages are left unpaid; the operator ships the last 12 million feet of lumber across the line and disappears with it, telling the men that he will be back on Monday to pay their wages.

This is happening repeatedly. On this account, because of its recurrence and the unnecessary hardship that it creates, I do suggest that the government give consideration to amending the Bankruptcy Act. I say that because first of all the company went into voluntary liquidation. Then the creditors began to realize that voluntary liquidation might mean administration over a long period and there would not be much left for them, and they attempted to enter a petition of bankruptcy. The creditors informed me that they could find no one on whom to serve a summons of petition of bankruptcy; there was no local agent, no officer and no office. There must be a loophole there. With respect to the Bankruptcy Act, some consideration should be given to amending it to prevent this type of thing happening, if it is at all possible. In addition to that, I suggest that possibly there could be some legislation which would require persons operating under those circumstances, who are not Canadian citizens, and who are obviously able to disappear overnight, to post some bond or something else with some provincial or federal authority to assure the payment of income tax, unemployment insurance tax, provincial taxes, wages and so on.

I have dealt with the case rather briefly, but I promised my constituents that I would bring this matter to the attention of the house and the minister, and I do urge that this problem be given some consideration.

In the few minutes time remaining to me, Mr. Speaker, I am going to speak about the proposed development on the Columbia river. I am not going to deal with the issue at stake, whether this is good or that is good, but I have been asked by those opposed to the high Arrow dam in my district to mention this in the house and to give the house some idea of the organized opposition. When hon. members receive literature, as they will from now on from this committee, and possibly have representations made to the caucuses of the various parties, and the government and others receive representations they will understand the well organized opposition that exists. This protest arises out of the building of the high Arrow dam. I am not going into that except to indicate that it means the destruction of 18 communities and the flooding of 40,000 acres of forest and agricultural land and the displacement of 1,700 people, the most of whom have nowhere to go because the water will come up the mountainside.

I have seen references in the press to the fact that I am the owner of property that might be flooded. This is incorrect. My wife is the owner of the property; I live there under sufferance. We are more fortunate than others. We are losing a beautiful beach and besides that we shall probably lose a log cabin. However we can move back a thousand feet or so and rebuild, but many people cannot. Their beaches will be destroyed, their orchards, their fields, their houses and so on. In addition to that, the whole of the industrial area of Revelstoke will be flooded and destroyed. Nothing will be left but the upper town if this flooding occurs. The lumber mills, the pole yards, the peeling plants, the treating plants and the shipping facilities for all these forest products will be flooded.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am puzzled by one thing. We know that this matter has been under review for years. Has there been no opportunity for representations such as the hon. member is now referring to, to be made in the past?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, when this matter has been mentioned to members of the present government I think up to this time they have rightly said the place to go to, or the responsibility is that of the provincial government. Fundamentally, the natural resources are the responsibility of the provincial government. Representations have been made. I might say that I have a telegram here tonight from the president of the Conservative association who wants to know when they can come here and go before the external affairs committee. I am speaking for many people who support all parties in this house. This is a completely non-partisan presentation on my part, Mr. Speaker. The people for whom I am speaking support General McNaughton's view. They are good citizens. They would not object to this destruction of natural resources and dislocation if it was necessary, if there was not some other way of developing the Columbia. That is their point. General McNaughton says it is only necessary to raise the water level of the Arrow lakes for 130 miles to mean high water and that it can be done so as not to flood out anyone and then store the rest of the water behind Mica creek dam. However, I am not going into that. I want to deal with the organization of the people. It is a rank and file movement and we have some interesting and capable characters in our organization. I am a member of the committee.

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is discussing the honest people who live in his constituency, apart from those who have left for the United States. He is discussing the Columbia river program and I ask you, sir, in all humility whether this matter comes within the purview of the budget debate.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I think I am quite correct because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will be the minister chiefly responsible for concluding the financial arrangements with the provincial government to make possible the building of these dams. I think the practice is that a general discussion is allowed on a budget debate.

Mr. Speaker: Unless there is some rule against the subject matter the debate is fairly wide ranging as is the throne speech debate, the time allotted for which was not used this session. Therefore I would think it would not be out of order to discuss affairs fairly broadly provided one does not anticipate discussion of a matter which is on the order paper so as to create duplication. There was a suggestion that this matter would be discussed but it is not on the order paper and I think it would be too severe to restrict the debate.

Mr. Herridge: I want to thank the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Brunsden) for his assistance in proving that I am even more in order than I thought I was. I wish to bring to the attention of members of the house the people who are involved in this organization. The organizations who are opposed not to the development of the Mica creek dam or the development suggested by General McNaughton but to this high Arrow dam are: the chambers of commerce of Revelstoke, Nakusp, lower Arrow lakes, Castlegar and Nelson, the city council of Revelstoke, the mine, mill and smelter workers union of British Columbia, the B.C. federation of labour, the B.C. auto courts and resorts association, the west Kootenay farmers' institute, the west Kootenay's women's institute—God bless the women—the Arrow boat club of Castlegar, the Nakusp launch club, the Nakusp livestock breeders' association and numerous other local organizations. You can see that there is solid foundation of people from all walks of life, business, labour and farmers.

These people have met and have elected what is known as the Arrow lakes and Revelstoke city water resources committee. The members of the committee were elected to represent these groups and the people for the purpose of making representations to the federal and provincial governments, and I am very glad to hear that they will have the opportunity to make representations to the external affairs committee of this house.

They have secured as their engineering consultant Mr. F. J. Bartholomew, a consulting electrical engineer of Vancouver who has had a lot of experience with hydro developments and construction. In addition, they have Mr. Boyd Affleck, an engineer from Nelson, B.C., and the assistance of quite a number of other engineers who are turning up from all sorts of places and who are willing to assist in the preparation of briefs some of whom have also indicated that they are willing to come to Ottawa with Mr. Bartholomew and others to explain their views and give their opinions before the external affairs committee.

I might say at this time that the committee is raising money and it is surprising how concerned and interested people are. They are collecting funds. They have collected nearly $1,000 on the Arrow lakes and the city of Revelstoke is now collecting funds. The people are behind this movement. I happened to visit Revelstoke on the way to Ottawa and addressed a public meeting at the invitation of the chamber of commerce at which members of the municipal council, the chamber of commerce and the public were present. They were representative of all political parties and I never saw a group of people in a city so solidly behind a movement no matter what their party politics are. Once this flooding happens the economic life of the city of Revelstoke will disappear with the exception of the trade from a declining number of C.P.R. employees who stop off there between trains because the divisional points are now Vancouver and Calgary.

To illustrate the interest in the campaign I might say that on Christmas morning a pioneer rancher on the upper Arrow lakes by the name of John Nelson telephoned me and said, "I want to tell you that I was up until Christmas day posting literature on the Galena bay wharf opposing the high Arrow dam and I am sending a cheque for $100". That is the way it is up and down the lakes. If hon. members know of anyone who is willing to subscribe to the fund for the campaign against the destruction of the natural resources of the Arrow lakes, tell them to write to the secretary of the water resources committee, Nakusp, B.C., or the secretary of the committee of the chamber of commerce of Revelstoke. They would be very pleased to receive donations. I may say we have had donations from the Okanagan and from some persons on the coast who are interested in this matter.

Literature is being printed and distributed to members of parliament and members of the provincial house. I urge you to read this literature so that you will have some understanding of this most difficult problem. It is a difficult problem to understand thoroughly unless one lives in the area. I have travelled in Indian canoes on the Columbia. No member of the house knows more about the Columbia than I do, not because I am a wiser person but because I happen to have lived there the greater part of my life. I know the circumstances, I know the depth of water in all the different channels, where the bays are and the dam sites will be and that sort of thing. I should know that because I have lived there. I ask members to study this literature and get some grasp of the attitude of these people in the district which I have the honour to represent because their attitude is completely non-partisan and Canadian.

As a matter of fact, if my own party supported the high Arrow dam I would vote against it but thank goodness my party stands for the preservation of our natural resources and is opposed to any unnecessary destruction of the same. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say in reply to the hon. member for—

Mr. Macdonnell: Greenwood.

Mr. Herridge: —Greenwood—I always think in terms of his former constituency—that the Arrow lakes and Revelstoke city water resources committee did go to Victoria on December 28 and met Mr. Williston, the minister of lands and forests. A brief was presented by Mr. F. J. Bartholomew, the consulting engineer. He had sent the brief a week previously to Mr. Williston and his engineers had studied it. As a matter of fact, after four and a half hours' discussion they had very little criticism of the brief except on two points. One was that his projections of power use in British Columbia for the next ten-year period were not correct, that he should have based them on the expansion period in the states to the south during the war. I cannot see that because that was an abnormal period. The second point was that the storage in low Arrow was not entirely artificial because we have natural storage owing to the water being backed up by the narrow channels but the water there is not held to be used at the time it is required.

I am very interested in this because lately we have received an analysis and progress report initiated by the negotiating committee of the United States. It is a report on the proposed treaty arrangements and as soon as they showed it to the committee Mr. Williston said, "That is just Eisenhower propaganda; the Americans admit a lot of mistakes in it". I notice, however, Mr. Speaker, that in the copy of the treaty that I have on my desk and the appendix, the figures in the report, are based on table 3. This table in the appendix to the signed treaty is stated to be an extension of the table appearing in the analysis and progress report issued by the United States Columbia river negotiator on October 19, 1960. The report was prepared by the Bonneville power administration and the United States army engineers who are responsible for this type of document in the United States. Mr. Williston was wrong, therefore, in saying that this was Eisenhower propaganda and inaccurate.

Then, Mr. Williston addressed a meeting in Nelson on January 9 and he said there was still much work to be done by the committee and he was reluctant, for various reasons, to say that they would be able to proceed. I have a copy of the stenographic notes taken at the meeting in Victoria with Mr. Williston and the question was asked, what about contingencies such as earthquakes or the discovery that Mica, for example, might cost twice the estimate. Did Canada still have to build? He said no, and alternative sites were suggested such as Calamity curve, and so on. When I read this sort of thing I am very suspicious that this Mica creek dam is going to be built at all.

There are a good many other things mentioned in these notes. Incidentally, he made reference to the proposed treaty in terms which indicated that he did not necessarily agree with all its terms. When it was reported to me, I said, surely this must have been initialled or accepted by a representative of the government of British Columbia. In any event, I mention these things to indicate the reason for the concern of the people in my district.

Now, I was very pleased, and the people I represent were very pleased, to note that these organizations will have an opportunity to make representations to the external affairs committee. I am certain they will receive a courteous and sympathetic hearing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): In the few minutes that are left before ten o'clock there is one point I should like to make. During this debate we are actually speaking on the budget and on the amendment which was made. Several questions have been asked, and several times the same question has been asked, why did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) bring down a budget at this time and what good did it do? There is one thing that a budget at this time did, Mr. Speaker, and I think it deserves the commendation of everyone. While the Canadian trade balance has been adverse, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) has made tremendous efforts to increase our trade.

One of the most difficult things that we have had to meet has been the currency exchange rate. The fact that the Canadian dollar has been high in relation to the United States dollar has been one of the difficulties facing our exporters. It has caused a great deal of trouble. As a result of the announcement made by the Minister of Finance in the budget, the dollar has very nearly reached par. At the moment there is only a difference of five eighths of one per cent between the Canadian and the United States dollar. This makes it very much easier for the exporter to sell his products outside Canada at a price which will compete with goods offered in other countries.

Then, too, the achievement of near parity with the United States dollar will be of great assistance to the people in the tourist and catering industries in this country. This has always been one of the things to be met when United States visitors came to Canada. There may be only a few cents difference and the visitors do not mind paying. However, in Canada we have those people who will collect the odd few cents, and in some cases this is necessary, but in so doing they lose a great deal of trade. This achievement of near parity with the United States dollar will do a great deal for our tourist industry and our catering industry during the coming season. We hope that the dollar will remain at par or very close to it. If it does, I am sure it will be a great spur both to our tourist industry and to our exporters in this country.

I have other remarks to make, Mr. Speaker, and I have a plan to evolve arising out of the budget, the speech from the throne and the items of legislation that the government proposes. When this debate resumes I should like to deal with these subjects in greater detail, but I should like now to call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I have some indication of the business for tomorrow, and will the acting house leader be good enough to indicate the order in which these resolutions will be taken?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we intend to leave the debate on the budget and proceed with the setting up of committees. Speaking now from the routine proceedings and the numbers stated therein, the first item with which we will deal tomorrow will be No. 6, the setting up of the committee with respect to procedure of the House of Commons. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister's plane coming from Washington was very much delayed tonight and I have not consulted with him about any commitments he may have for tomorrow. I assume he will be here and we will deal with that as the first item of business tomorrow.

The next item will be No. 9, the setting up of the joint committee on Indian affairs. The next item will be No. 10, which is a resolution in the name of my colleague the Minister of Transport concerning the sessional committee on government railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines. The next one, No. 8, is a minor matter dealing with the setting up of the committee on broadcasting.

After we have concluded the setting up of these commitees tomorrow, we will then proceed with item No. 2, an act in the name of my colleague the Minister of Finance; No. 3, an act in the name of the Minister of Finance and No. 4, an act in the name of the Minister of Transport. I assume that by that time we will have arrived at nearly six o'clock, and we will then consider what we will do next.

Mr. Chevrier: May I have some indication of the business for Friday, in view of the fact that Thursday is a private members' day?

Mr. Nowlan: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but at the moment I do not want to be definite with respect to Friday. Thursday, as my hon. friend knows, is private members' day. I assume—at least I do not want to be definite, so let us speculate on the fact that we will be dealing with legislation on Friday. I do not want to make a definite commitment on that until tomorrow.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT—LEGAL FEES

Question No. 30—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1954, have any fees or remuneration been paid to legal counsel for activities pursuant to the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act?

2. If so, what are the names and addresses of each person, the amount paid, the purpose of each payment, and the date upon which each was made?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. Yes.

2. Names and addresses of each person, the amount paid, and the date upon which each was made are listed hereunder. All payments related to legal fees and expenses incurred by legal counsel retained as agent of the Minister of Justice to act for this department in prosecutions for offences committed under the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act.

Name and Address, Date and Amount—

Adam, G., 60 St. James St. W., Montreal, P.Q., September 1956, $408.00.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 18, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VACANCY

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I hereby give notice, pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, that a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the House of Commons for the electoral district of Kings in the province of Prince Edward Island by reason of the death of John A. Macdonald, the member therefor.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—TABLING OF TREATY AND STATEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows the Columbia river treaty was signed in Washington yesterday. The President and Secretary of State and the under secretary of the interior signed for the United States of America. The treaty was signed for Canada by myself together with the Minister of Justice and the Canadian ambassador at Washington.

I indicated the other day that I would table at the earliest possible date copies of the treaty and also the statement I made outlining some of the features and particulars of that treaty. In view of the widespread interest in these documents I propose that with the consent of the house they be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

May I say that in the signing of this tremendous treaty the course followed was one that gave emphasis to the importance of the occasion. The fact is that it was the last major official discharge of responsibility on the part of the President of the United States. That fact gives it emphasis. During the course of our stay there the Minister of Justice, myself and several representatives from the two countries were entertained at luncheon at the White House, the last function of the kind that will take place during the presidency of Dwight D. Eisenhower.

I agree with the remarks that were made at the conclusion of this treaty, that it represents a major advance in co-operation by the two nations without the sacrifice of the rights, the sovereignty or otherwise of either country, and is indeed a landmark in responsible joint action by nations for their economic betterment.

With the leave of the house, as I indicated earlier, I therefore wish to table the treaty in both English and French, and the summary in both languages.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house concur in the suggestion of the Prime Minister that the documents tabled by him be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of documents above referred, see appendix A.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when this matter came up the other day we on this side expressed our satisfaction at the conclusion—we hope the mutually satisfactory conclusion—of negotiations which have extended over many years. It was a happy circumstance, Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, that almost the last act of President Eisenhower and his administration should have been such a fine demonstration of good and constructive neighbourhood between our two countries.

If I am in order, may I ask the Prime Minister whether it is contemplated that this parliament will proceed with consideration of this treaty before the conclusion of negotiations with the province of British Columbia and the acceptance of the treaty by that province?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all of us in the house listened with great interest to the extremely important statement just made by the Prime Minister with respect to the development of the Columbia. From the point of view of this group, Mr. Speaker, this has its bright and dark sides. I was very pleased indeed when the Prime Minister suggested that the treaty and the other documents be made an appendix to the record, because it is so important that every member here, and as many Canadians as possible, thoroughly understand the treaty and the circumstances surrounding it.

I am going to be quite brief, Mr. Speaker. I would like to say that we in this group are quite happy over the proposed construction of the Mica dam but have objected to the building of the high Arrow dam, and we are still strongly opposed to it. However—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think the hon. member might agree with me that the merits of the treaty are not brought in issue by the statement made. The report was simply on the signing of the documents and their tabling. There will be opportunity to discuss and debate the documents before they are ratified. Therefore I should think comment would be appropriate only with respect to the actual formality of signing.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, with the due respect I think your ruling makes it impossible for me to do otherwise than sing a Sunday school hymn. Anyway, I do say that we are very pleased that the various organizations and persons in British Columbia will have an opportunity to present their views before the external affairs committee. I am sure they will receive a civilized, courteous and sympathetic hearing. Would I be in order now, Mr. Speaker, in quoting briefly from a United States newspaper in concluding my remarks? This is what the Milwaukee Journal has to say about the treaty:

> The vast amount of additional, cheap hydroelectric power will be shared equally with Canada. Canada will also be paid in cash for flood control at the rate of one half of estimated annual savings. If this seems to be extreme liberality on our part, it should be remembered that Canada could have chosen an all-Canadian project which would have meant more and cheaper power for that country.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

REVISION OF DEFINITION OF CANADIAN FISHING VESSEL

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-57, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-58, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960, with respect to the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, this bill becomes more interesting as the election comes closer. It is designed to set up a commission to handle redistribution which, under the British North America Act, is due in 1962.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STARRED QUESTIONS

T.V. SATELLITE STATION, MONT LAURIER

Question No. 38—Mr. Clermont:

1. Has the board of broadcast governors recommended the issue of a licence to establish a satellite station in Mont Laurier? If so, on what date?
2. Has the government issued such licence? If so, on what date?
3. Have tenders been called for the construction of the said station?
4. If so, (a) on what date is such work to begin; (b) how long will such work last?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answers are as follows:

1. Yes, December 8, 1960.
3. No.

No. 4, of course, is answered by No. 3. I should say in further explanation that this Mont Laurier station will be an off-air satellite of the proposed station at Mont Tremblant, the application for which has also been recommended by the board of broadcast governors but subject to the arrangement of channels in virtue and because of the international air agreement which has not yet been finally completed. Therefore the Mont Tremblant application cannot be approved until this international agreement has been completed.

Mr. Denis: May I ask a question—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member defer his supplementary until the orders of the day. [Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue referring to the starred question about the establishment of a satellite station in Mont Laurier. In view of his answer can the minister now give us the approximate date of the beginning of the construction of that station?

Mr. Nowlan: No, Mr. Speaker, because it depends on negotiations with the United States with respect to the international agreement. Mont Laurier being an offshoot of Mont Tremblant, the latter must first be commenced. It is the Mont Tremblant problem which is holding us up at the moment.

It is our hope that the matter will be cleared up in the near future so construction can be started and the station will be in operation before the end of the year, but that is a hope and not to be taken as a guarantee.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether that date appears more remote now than it was before October 31?

Mr. Nowlan: I do not think so, Mr. Speaker.

"UPLANDS TIMES"—WITHDRAWAL OF COPIES

Question No. 48—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Are public funds spent, either directly or indirectly, in the preparation or distribution of a Royal Canadian Air Force newspaper, The Uplands Times?
2. Were Royal Canadian Air Force police employed in seeking out copies of a recent issue of The Uplands Times for the purpose of having them withdrawn from circulation?
3. If so, what was the reason for this action?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answers to these questions are as follows:

1. No.

2. Personnel at the station were requested through their sections to return issues of the newspaper which had been distributed on November 24, 1960. Station personnel including members of the R.C.A.F. police were asked to call at the various sections to pick up the returned issues of the newspaper.

3. The reason for this action was given in an answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Fort William on November 29 last and is reported on page 295 of Hansard of that day.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 49—Mr. Robichaud:

What was the amount remaining in the unemployment insurance fund on the last day of November, 1960, as compared with similar dates for the years 1958 and 1959?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows:

November 30, 1958	$641,880,241.89
November 30, 1959	$475,178,655.52
November 30, 1960	$331,703,558.88

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMANTS

What was the total number of claimants for unemployment insurance benefits on the following dates: December 1, 1955, 1956, 1957, 1958, 1959 and 1960?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): The answer is as follows: 1955, 219, 786; 1956, 215, 378; 1957, 403, 273; 1958, 419, 233; 1959, 417, 541; 1960, 485, 177.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, RESERVE MINES, N.S.

Question No. 53—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the government been considering the building of a new post office on Sydney road, Reserve Mines, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, has land been purchased for this purpose, from whom, on what date, for what amount, and where is it located?
3. Was any member of the local municipal government, or anyone else, consulted as to the suitability of the proposed building site?
4. If so, who were they, what was the nature of the consultation with each, and what advice was received?
5. Was a petition received by the government expressing dissatisfaction with the site chosen by the government?
6. If so, from whom, what date did it bear, when was it received, what were its contents, and what consideration has the government given to its request?
7. Why was the site on Sydney road favoured by the government as opposed to the present site?
8. Has the government agreed to the building of the post office an another location, and if so, where?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): May I through you, Mr. Speaker, ask the hon. member for Assiniboia if, because of the complicated and detailed answers involved, he would agree that this should be made an order for return.

Mr. Argue: I do not think it is as complicated as it is controversial, but I quite agree with the minister's request that it be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

INCOME TAX ASSESSORS

Question No. 54—Mr. Badanai:

1. What qualifications do assessors for income tax department require for employment with the Department of National Revenue?
2. Are these assessors hired by the director, or chief assessor? If not, by whom?
3. What training do they receive in the department before assessing in the field?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The answer to No. 1 is that the qualifications required of assessors for employment with the income tax division of the Department of National Revenue depend on the grade level at which they are hired. For further information regarding these qualifications, please refer to copies of civil service commission advertising posters which deal with the requirements for each specific appointment.

The answer to No. 2 is that assessors, as well as any other employees of the income tax division, are hired through the civil service commission.

The answer to No. 3 is that at the present time the training program for new assessors before they commence to assess in the field or shortly thereafter is as follows:

(a) An indoctrination course describing the organization and operation of the division.

(b) A reading course of 24 lessons on the Income Tax Act.

(c) On the job training in office procedure and desk audit work, under supervision.

(d) On the job training in field audit work plus a classroom course on basic field audit procedures, again under supervision until a certain amount of experience has been acquired.

SALE BY RUSSIA OF WATCH MECHANISMS

Question No. 55—Mr. Badanai:

1. Has the Soviet union made a deal to sell Canadians watch mechanisms, without cases for about $3 each?
2. If so, what does the U.S.S.R. buy from Canada in exchange?
3. Has a trade agreement been made for specific mechandise?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to Nos. 1 and 2 is that Canadian businessmen are free to import Soviet merchandise, subject to Canadian law. They are not required to report such import transactions to the Department of Trade and Commerce; therefore we have no knowledge of the suggested transaction in question No. 1.

The answer to question No. 3 is that the recently renewed Canada-U.S.S.R. trade agreement provides that the U.S.S.R. will purchase twice the value of their sales to Canada to an annual limit of $25 million. At least half the Soviet purchases are to be in wheat.

CITIZENSHIP COURTS

Question No. 56—Mr. Badanai:

1. How many courts of Canadian citizenship are there in Canada?
2. What number of people are employed in these courts, at Toronto, Hamilton and London, Ontario?
3. What salaries are paid to the judges of these citizenship courts?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to the first part of this question is that there are seven courts of Canadian citizenship situated in the following places: Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton, London, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver.

The answer to the second part is that the personnel of the courts of citizenship are as follows: Toronto, a staff of 13, one judge and one assistant; Hamilton, a staff of four and one judge; London, a staff of four and one judge.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

The answer to the third part of the question is that judges of the courts of Canadian citizenship throughout Canada receive an annual remuneration of $11,000.

FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO SASKATCHEWAN, 1960

Question No. 57—Mr. McMillan:

1. What was the total amount paid from the federal treasury to the provincial treasury of Saskatchewan in the calendar year, 1960?
2. What were the purposes of such payments and how much was each such payment?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): I would ask that this question be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

C.B.C.—PROTESTS ON COAL AND LABOUR PROGRAMS

Question No. 58—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation receive any pre-showing protests regarding its television programs on either the Cape Breton coal situation or the four-part series on labour?
2. If so, from what persons, or organization, to what effect and what affect?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did receive two complaints with respect to the program concerning the coal mining industry in Cape Breton. They have received no complaints with respect to the labour program. It is not the policy of the C.B.C. to divulge the names of people writing to the corporation as private individuals because that might discourage them from writing in the future.

In this particular case there were only two complaints received, and both these complainants gave their complaints to the press. Under the circumstances, therefore, I can say one complaint was received from Mr. Duchemin and the other was received from Mr. Nathanson, one owning a newspaper and one owning a radio station at Sydney.

LAKEHEAD TERMINAL PROJECT—WINTER WORK

Question No. 60—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the Department of Public Works give consideration to a special arrangement with Raymond International on the lakehead terminal project which would have kept a work force on the job during January, February, and March, 1960?
2. If so, how much extra was involved in terms of money, and how many men would have been kept on work during this period?
3. What disposal was made of this suggested arrangement, and for what reasons?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Had this proposal been accepted, an extra in addition to the regular cost would have been approximately $41,000. From 40 to 60 men might have been employed for a ten week period.

3. The proposal was not accepted partly because of the extra cost and chiefly by the fact that the pouring of concrete in adverse weather conditions gave us no assurance that it would carry the heavy loads which were involved. Even with extra precautions during January, February and March it would be extremely difficult to ensure proper heating of the aggregate and the protection and satisfactory curing of the concrete to provide proper strength in this exposed location.

It was decided it was better to press ahead with other major contracts at the lakehead to provide employment. Work has now started on one of these, a $3,953,185 contract which includes the construction of two large transit sheds, a number of other buildings, access roads, water and sewer and other services. Within a matter of weeks the number of men employed on this work will exceed those who would have been employed under the proposed arrangement. In addition a new contract will be awarded shortly for the Main street access bridge in the same development. Work is expected to start within a month and this will provide further employment.

CANADA GROCERS LTD., BRANDON—NATIONAL PARKS TENDERS

Question No. 61—Mr. Hardie:

1. Did Canada Grocers Limited of Brandon, Manitoba, tender on supplies for the Riding Mountain national park in November or December, 1960?
2. If so, was it the successful bidder?
3. If not, what was the amount of its bid and the amount of the bid made by the successful tenderer?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer is as follows:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. Canada Grocers Limited, Brandon, Manitoba, $8,610,61; G. McLean Co. Ltd., Winnipeg, Manitoba, $8,046.38.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

POST OFFICE BUILDING, RESERVE MINES, N.S.

Question No. 53—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the government been considering the building of a new post office on Sydney road, Reserve Mines, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, has land been purchased for this purpose, from whom, on what date, for what amount, and where is it located?
3. Was any member of the local municipal government, or anyone else, consulted as to the suitability of the proposed building site?
4. If so, who were they, what was the nature of the consultation with each, and what advice was received?
5. Was a petition received by the government expressing dissatisfaction with the site chosen by the government?
6. If so, from whom, what date did it bear, when was it received, what were its contents, and what consideration has the government given to its request?
7. Why was the site on Sydney road favoured by the government as opposed to the present site?
8. Has the government agreed to the building of the post office on another location, and if so, where?

FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO SASKATCHEWAN, 1960

Question No. 57—Mr. McMillan:

1. What was the total amount paid from the federal treasury to the provincial treasury of Saskatchewan in the calendar year 1960?
2. What were the purposes of such payments and how much was each such payment?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RICHELIEU RIVER—REPORT ON DREDGING

Motion No. 20—Mr. Dupuis:

For a copy of each of the reports made by the economists and engineers of the Department of Transport, in connection with the possible dredging of the Richelieu river between the St. Lawrence river and lake Champlain.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in the unavoidable absence of the minister I would ask that this motion be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreed that this motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

TUNNEL CONSTRUCTION, PARLIAMENT HILL

Motion No. 23—Mr. Cardin:

For a copy of the plans prepared in the Department of Public Works for the construction of a tunnel linking the main parliament building and the west block, and the estimated cost of the project.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this motion is accepted on the understanding that it cannot be complied with until after February 1, at which date tenders close.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

TORONTO BOARD OF TRADE COMMUNICATION, FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL PROBLEMS

Motion No. 31—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of a communication addressed to the Prime Minister by the board of trade of metropolitan Toronto with regard to the federal-provincial fiscal problems on December 8, 1960, together with the reply thereto and any subsequent correspondence.

Motion agreed to.

COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT

Motion No. 32—Mr. Herridge:

For a copy of all telegrams, reports, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources or any officials of his department and any officials of the government of British Columbia, the officials of any corporation or other persons, regarding the development of the hydro resources of the Columbia river in Canada, since January 1, 1957.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): This motion is similar to a motion submitted by the hon. member last July. It was explained at that time by the Minister of Justice that it would not be in the public interest to produce correspondence between this government and the government of British Columbia. The hon. member then stated that this explanation was quite satisfactory and that he did not consider the government of British Columbia an organization composed of individuals in that sense in his motion.

The situation today is the same. I can only say to the hon. member now that it would not be in the public interest to table the documents requested by this motion before the negotiations have been concluded; that is, until the agreement has been considered by parliament and by the United States congress and ratifications exchanged by both countries to make the agreement binding and no longer subject to negotiation. In view of this, I wonder if the hon. member would withdraw his motion.

I can give my hon. friends in this house an assurance that the government is anxious to keep them as fully informed as possible with regard to the essentials of this matter, while respecting the need to keep the actual negotiations with the province and the United States confidential until agreement is ratified. This desire to keep the house informed has been clearly indicated by tabling last December the letter—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. minister is perhaps going beyond explanation and entering upon debate. The motion is not debatable. I take it that the substance of the hon. gentleman's remarks is that the motion is objectionable on grounds of public policy, and that he is requesting the hon. member for Kootenay West to consider withdrawing it.

Mr. Herridge: I am delighted to know that a minister is out of order once in a while. Would the minister consider the motion as being in order if I withdrew the reference to officials of the government of British Columbia?

Mr. Dinsdale: On that point, negotiations with the United States government are not complete until the agreement has been ratified by this house and by congress, so the same restrictions would apply.

Mr. Herridge: I accept the explanation given by the minister. I wished to be quite clear about it.

Mr. Speaker: In view of that explanation, is the mover of the motion willing to have it withdrawn?

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Then it will be in order for me to declare it withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON PUBLICATIONS—COMPLAINTS ON CONDUCT

Motion No. 34—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all representations to the government in any printed form which complained about or criticized the performance of the royal commission on publications or any of its members in the performance of his task.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the announcement this morning by the government of the latest unemployment figures, indicating a regrettable increase in unemployment by some 99,000 over the previous month, will the Minister of Labour make available to the house, in addition to the figure of 528,000 unemployed, the number of unplaced applicants for jobs and the number in receipt of unemployment benefits on the last available date?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): If the hon. member for Essex East wishes to have this information I suggest that he place the question on the order paper, and the requirements of his request will be fulfilled.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the Minister of Labour not recognize that because of the debate now in progress, and because of the urgency of this matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me now that the hon. member is making an argument rather than asking a supplementary question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO EMERGENCY MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the figures on employment and unemployment released this morning by the dominion bureau of statistics, showing that there are now 528,000 unemployed in Canada, an increase over a year ago; and that in British Columbia, in particular, unemployment now amounts to 10.9 per cent of the labour force, namely 63,000, is the Prime Minister in a position to inform this house whether any emergency policies or actions are going to be adopted in view of the present situation of increased unemployment?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Various measures have, of course, been before the house and were discussed, considered and passed prior to the Christmas recess. Other measures will naturally be introduced as events arise.

I would point out to the hon. gentleman this fact. Yesterday while I was in Washington I read of the increase in unemployment in the United States, too, the major increase being during the months of November and December. I also read a report of the committee set up by Mr. Kennedy, the incoming president, in which suggestions were made as to what might be done to meet the situation. On examination of this report I was pleased to see that most, if not all, of the recommendations have already been implemented by this government in this country.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister in the light of what he has said about his visit to Washington yesterday. Is the right hon. gentleman not aware, as is pointed out on page 3 of this morning's release, that the percentage of unemployment in Canada in relation to the labour force is 8.2, whereas in the United States it is 6.5?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure the hon. gentleman is also aware that the same basis of measuring unemployment is not used in the United States in every particular.

Mr. Winch: Is it not correct that the right hon. gentleman's concern as Prime Minister is with the situation in Canada and not with the situation in the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking what seems to be only a rhetorical question.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED REMARKS BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the Solicitor General speaking on behalf of the government when he said in St. John's last week, as reported in the Cape Breton Post of January 13:

—less federal spending "as the government tried to balance the budget" was a principal cause of unemployment in the country.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report to which reference is made, but I must say I am sure such a statement was not made by the hon. gentleman in question.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED REMARKS BY ASSOCIATE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I hope this question is in order. I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), occasioned by remarks credited to him last week in Laval to the effect that if unemployment existed it was provoked and caused by Liberal leaders. I wonder whether he could be more specific, or pass the information on to the Minister of Labour, because we all do want to get to the cause of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure what kind of debate the hon. member for Port Arthur would like to initiate. I suggest that he find a more appropriate time for it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRELAND—INQUIRY AS TO VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his reported intention to visit Ireland, reports of which have inspired speculation that the right hon. gentleman may take advantage of this visit to attempt to reunite Ireland and bring Ireland back into the commonwealth?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I read those speculative articles, and I can only say there has been no agenda yet arranged. As to what matters will be discussed, any questions which might arise will naturally be considered and discussed. The hon. gentleman has had experience in this direction and will realize that one can never fully anticipate the questions which may be discussed in these circumstances.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—CONCLUSION OF AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to repeat a question which I think I heard the leader of the official opposition ask the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to conclude an agreement with the government of British Columbia before bringing the Columbia treaty before this house for ratification?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked that question a little earlier, and of course I had no opportunity to refer to it. It will be necessary for the government of Canada to enter into an agreement with the government of the province of British Columbia. We are prepared to proceed with such agreement at once. As far as we are concerned there will be no delay in proceeding with, negotiating and completing such an agreement.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government proposes to submit this treaty to the committee on external affairs of this house before the agreement has been concluded with the province of British Columbia?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I cannot go any further at the moment than to say to the Leader of the Opposition, as I already stated, that it is the intention to have this question placed before the committee on external affairs. When that will be, I cannot say at this time.

PIPE LINES

POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF OIL LINE TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The president of Home Oil Company has indicated in a special report to its shareholders that construction of the $430 million pipe line from the oil fields of Alberta to Montreal is essential to the Canadian economy. Can the minister inform the house whether the government is giving the construction of this pipe line favourable consideration?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Of course any company is quite at liberty to express any opinion it wants to its shareholders, and most of them do. The government is giving this whole matter very serious and constructive consideration, along with all matters pertaining to the oil industry at this time.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR YEAR END FIGURES ON HOUSING STARTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister say when the December and year end figures for housing starts will be made available?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to look into that matter and give an answer at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Garland: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister say if there is any justification for withholding these figures at the present time?

Mr. Walker: We are very anxious to bring them to the attention of the house, Mr. Speaker, because they indicate a substantial improvement over those of a year ago, and I know the hon. member will be glad to hear that.

Mr. Garland: In view of what the minister just said perhaps he would permit a further supplementary question. Since the 1960 housing starts are unfortunately the lowest since 1953—

Mr. Walker: What is the hon. member's question?

Mr. Garland: —as a result, in part, of the policy of the government in slashing in half direct lending in 1960 as compared to 1959—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has the hon. member a supplementary question? It seems to me he is giving information rather than asking for it at the moment.

Mr. Garland: I am merely laying the groundwork, Mr. Speaker. To return to my question, will the minister tell the house how much money will be made available in the direct lending field in 1961?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, all these matters are questions of government policy and in due course they will be brought to the attention of the house.

[Later:]

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Nipissing may I say I just received some figures. The over-all figures for the year 1960 are not available yet because of the lack of returns from municipalities of 5,000 or less; but for those municipalities above 5,000 there have been approximately 100,000 starts and we expect the number of starts will be 9,000 or 10,000 for the municipalities under 5,000.

I am also very happy to be able to say that I have just received the first two weeks' returns for approved lenders' loans for 1961. In the year 1960, for the first two weeks, there were 32 loans; this year, 904.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that I precisely recall the question, but it seems to me the minister is giving information which goes beyond the question; it would be in the nature of a statement.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, it should be added that the direct loans last year were 34 and this year 1,316.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the minister has just said, perhaps he will admit that it is not hard to improve on nothing.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INDIAN AFFAIRS—IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and ask whether it is the intention of the government to implement the unanimous recommendation of the Indian affairs committee contained in its report last year with respect to the compulsory franchise for Indians.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had contained his soul in patience he would have heard me make that announcement when resolutions are called.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to move for the setting up of the special committee on defence expenditures at the current session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that, of course, is a matter of policy and, as the hon. gentleman knows, when and if a decision is made in that regard it will be brought to the attention of the house at once.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister give it his urgent consideration and report to the house at an early date, in view of the considerable importance and urgency of this matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the government will give the suggestion the attention it deserves.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister now consider the setting up of parliamentary committees to be a matter of government policy rather than procedure in the house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, certainly not; but a question as to whether a committee should be set up for a definite purpose is a matter for government policy.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR EARLY DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has given consideration to the early allocation of a day for discussion in this house of the serious international problems and affairs that abound and, if so, would he do everything possible at this time to win the acceptance of the Leader of the Opposition for the holding of such a debate?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very close relationship existing between the two groups opposite I suggest that the hon. gentleman direct his question privately to the Leader of the Opposition. We tried to secure a date for this purpose but it was opposed by the official opposition. Apparently there has been no change in that regard.

Mr. Pearson: On a question of privilege, the Prime Minister must realize that he has made a statement which he should not make, because it is entirely inaccurate.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a press report to the effect that the report of the royal commission on transportation may be delayed beyond the schedule set by the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether an interim report is likely to be made if the main report is delayed beyond that date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have too much to tell the house in response to that question. I saw the press report, but nothing concerning the commission's report has been brought to my attention.

TRADE

JAPAN—INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I wish to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary based on a statement made in Vancouver by Japanese consul Muneo Tanabe, to the effect that his government might consider imposing restrictions on Canadian goods if Canada placed too many restrictions on commodities from Japan.

My question is this. Has the Canadian government made any representations to the Japanese government with a view to having it refrain from imposing restrictions on the importation of Canadian goods into Japan?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the particular press quotation to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I shall examine it and the Minister of Finance who will be back in the house tomorrow will then have an answer for the hon. gentleman.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STATEMENT ON REPORTED SENDING OF STAFF TO LABOUR INDOCTRINATION SEMINARS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on January 16 the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) asked me a question on the orders of the day with respect to some discussion or representations apparently made by one Mr. Eldon Wilcox, of the C.B.C., concerning the attendance of C.B.C. employees at certain seminars.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from time to time does send certain of its management and supervisory staff to various seminars and short courses in management procedures sponsored by a number of Canadian and American organizations, including the American management association. The corporation feels that, for the proper conduct of its affairs, it must provide senior people with opportunities to learn from the experience of leading business and industrial concerns about new developments and techniques in the field of management.

The corporation has no knowledge or experience of the anti-union activities attributed to the American management association.

GRAIN

REQUEST THAT FEED MILLS BE RETURNED TO WHEAT BOARD JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would again like to address a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a statement attributed to him in a Canadian Press dispatch from Saskatoon dated December 22, to the effect that further action on the exemption of feed mills from grain delivery quota and price regulations would be taken when the government receives evidence that prices for feed grain are breaking down. Since the national farmers' union submitted a document in which they said feed grain prices have in fact broken down, and at one station were 45 cents lower—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: —in price, is the government going to restore feed grains sold to mills under the wheat board both as to price and quota?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not admit, nor does the government, that there have been the results which the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Argue: I would ask the Prime Minister whether he is denying this statement by the national farmers' union.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is starting to argue with the answer rather than to ask for information.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask this supplementary question, which I believe is very much in order. Has the Prime Minister or the government received this document, and has it indeed given a reply to the national farmers' union?

An hon. Member: What is the date of it?

Mr. Argue: January 13, 1961.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The document in question has not yet been brought to my attention.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER GREATER DISPATCH OF BUSINESS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee, to be designated, be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on January 18 last, on my suggestion, a committee of the house was set up under your chairmanship and direction which dealt with the rules, and changes were duly recommended in the report made on July 25, 1960. In that report the committee recommended that certain temporary orders of procedure be adopted on a trial basis effective only for the next session of parliament, the fourth session of the twenty fourth parliament. Those proposals are set out in detail in the report.

I think the experience of the last few weeks has been that the recommendations have been most beneficial. I think members in all parts of the house will agree that the recommendations were of such a nature and have proved to be so simple that they ought to receive consideration toward making them applicable not only to this session but to succeeding sessions. This, of course, is a matter for members in all parts of the house to determine.

There are various other matters which should be considered. Last year, on May 9, a motion to set up the committee was introduced by the Minister of Finance. At page 3687 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in the light of the length of time which was devoted to the study of the rules by the previous committee, I do not think the house will expect the committee to come forward with a final report at this session. If that should be the case, I am sure the house will be pleased to set up the committee again at the next following session to continue its work. The appointment at the present session, however, will at least launch the committee and enable it to carry forward its work. If the committee should see fit to make recommendations about changing the rules at this session, that matter will have to be considered however the report is received.

I believe—and I hope the house will agree—that this committee should be set up to carry on from where the committee of the last house concluded, to the end that the rules which are so necessary for the maintenance of efficient and expeditious debate should be viewed in greater detail than was possible at the last session. After all, rules are not like the laws of the Medes and the Persians. They should be reviewed regularly to the end that their effectiveness shall be tested and, if unsatisfactory in any way, be altered in the light of experience and circumstances.

I want to say a word to the members of the committee. I think the manner in which they came to agreement on recommendations at the last session, as in 1951, speaks highly of all members of the committee. No one wants to put parliament in a strait-jacket. No one wants to interfere with the fullest discussion. No one wants to bring about a denial of the rights of members to express themselves fully with the authority of the people they represent.

I think the experience has been, however, that the reduction in the length of speeches from 40 minutes to 30 minutes has improved the quality of speeches. After all, it is so much easier to make a speech of great length than a short and effective one. On one occasion Woodrow Wilson, I believe, was asked by Princeton University, of which he had been president for many years, whether he would accept an invitation to speak and how much notice he would require. I do not have before me the exact answer he gave and I am speaking from memory, but as I recall, his answer was that if he was to make a speech an hour long three or four days' notice would be ample, but if the speech was to be 10 or 15 minutes long he would require two or three months' notice.

While it is necessary on occasion, in order to elucidate a problem, to go beyond 30 or 40 minutes, in the normal range of debate nothing is more effective than a short, well reasoned and lucid argument. Quite an advance was made by the committee in that direction by reducing the period from 40 to 30 minutes, and I am sure that in consequence of that reduction no thought that the house should have had, no suggestion that would be beneficial, has been denied expression.

I therefore place this motion before the house hoping that it will receive unanimous approval.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side are happy to support the motion for the setting up without delay of a committee to continue the work of a similar committee last session, which I think was effective and produced some constructive proposals under your own wise guidance. Anything that a committee of the house can do to recommend to the house procedures and proposals that will make our proceedings more businesslike should receive the support of all of us subject, of course, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, to the necessity of the fullest discussion of every measure before the house, something which is of particular concern to the opposition.

The Prime Minister mentioned one recommendation of the last committee reducing the length of speeches. In his view it has worked out very well. Perhaps it would not be appropriate for me to comment on that until the time comes when this process of improvement, if that is what it is, can be continued by putting the Prime Minister and myself under a similar time limit, which might make our speeches more effective also.

We support the motion and it is unnecessary for me to say anything more, as it would only delay the setting up of the committee. Therefore I merely express on behalf of our party our strong approval of the setting up of the committee. We hope it will continue its good work of last session in this field.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of being a member of the committee on procedure during the last session of the house and I feel, as other members do, that the committee was able to do effective work and made a report whose recommendations, up until this point during the present session, seem to be working well and in my opinion have made a contribution toward dealing with the business of the house during this session in a more effective way.

The members of the committee were generally agreed that any change in the rules should be first of all a temporary change on a trial basis and, second, should be agreed to unanimously by the members of the committee. So, Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the government using its majority to force the adoption of certain procedures did not arise. All the changes in the rules that are in effect during the present session were agreed to unanimously.

I think the changes have been good. There has been a reduction of two days in the time taken for the debate on the speech from the throne, and a reduction of two days also in the budget debate. There has been a general reduction in the length of speeches from 40 minutes to 30 minutes, with some particular exemptions. Authority has been given to the government to bring forward government measures in lieu of or by interrupting private members' days so that the government can get its legislative program before parliament and committees of the house can be set up. I think this has been a good move and one that has helped in dealing with legislation during this session in a more orderly fashion.

When I spoke on this subject at the time it came before the house last session I recall saying that in the planning of the business of a session the government itself had a good deal to do with the length of the session, and that good management and a program well arranged would invariably lead to a shortening of the session whereas ineffective management of the legislative program by those in charge would lead to delay. I pointed out that all the government needed to do to delay the proceedings of the house was to bring four or five controversial measures before parliament and then deal with each only one day at a time in a kind of round robin process, and that under such a procedure the session could last indefinitely. However, when the government brings forward a measure, initiates a debate and allows the debate to continue until the subject has been dealt with, I think the government then contributes to an orderly expedition of the business of the session.

The change in the rules as to time, referred to by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition applies to members other than these two hon. gentlemen. Unlimited time, of course, is also the right of a person moving a government measure and of the first speaker from the opposition replying to a government motion. I think some progress could be made in setting a time limit in this regard. I would not say that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition should agree never to speak longer than one hour. The Prime Minister may feel that would increase the effectiveness of the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition, or the Leader of the Opposition might think it would increase the effectiveness of the speeches of the Prime Minister. However, when it comes to people who are replying for the opposition I believe there might be a limit of one hour, shall we say, or perhaps a limit of 40 minutes might be applied, without reducing the rights and without reducing the effectiveness of the opposition.

There has been a feeling in some quarters from time to time that we might remove the committee stage preceding money bills. This is a proposal with which I would be unable to agree. I feel that is a very valuable stage of any debate. I think it is a stage, wisely used and seriously considered by the government, which could lead to important changes in the legislation that would follow. I feel this stage enables the members, in a free sense, to deal with the particular principles of the question under discussion.

I would think the committee, Mr. Speaker, should give some serious consideration to the procedures of the committees of this house. I do not believe the committees of this house perform as useful a service as they might, since they seem so often to be the captives of the government majority. I believe individual members should have the right to call for persons and papers and should have a good deal to do with the agenda of the committee. Consideration should be given also to the reports that are made by committees. I do not like to see the practice being followed which seems to have grown up, not under this administration only but under previous administrations as well, namely that a committee of this house that is dealing with a piece of controversial legislation will make a recommendation and, since it is a hot potato, since the government does not want to deal with it, the recommendation is brought to the house but concurrence in the report of the committee is not moved.

I think if a committee brings a report to the house, then the house should have an opportunity to debate the recommendations contained therein. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, the country can be very easily misled into thinking that far greater weight has been given to the recommendations of the committee than is in fact the case. I would refer to a particular instance that I have in mind, namely the report of the agriculture committee dealing with the feed grain and feed mill situation. On June 27 the committee made certain recommendations which were reported to the house. However, the report was never moved in the house. The country has been led to believe that the report of this committee had a very wide measure of approval. The fact of the matter is that it was such a hot, controversial issue, I suggest, and the government felt so uncertain, that no step was taken by any member of the party opposite to move this report of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but he is going rather far afield. It seems to me he is threshing old straw in dealing with the merits of the report of the agriculture committee at this time.

Mr. Argue: I was not dealing with the merits. I was just dealing with the fact that it was a controversial issue and, being a controversial issue, when a report was made to the house no one on the opposite side of the house cared to move the report. I think this makes something of a farce of the so-called recommendations coming from the committee, and it certainly leaves a situation that could be misinterpreted in the country. I suggest that in order to give greater weight to the recommendations of committees, the procedure committee should consider whether or not, when particular recommendations are made, the report should be considered and either approved or rejected by the house itself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this committee on procedure made another reference of great interest and great importance but not quite so precise as certain other recommendations. It is found at the bottom of page 827 of Votes and Proceedings for July 25, 1960, and reads as follows:

> In addition, the committee has given preliminary consideration to a number of other procedural problems and has initiated studies which will assist in a more comprehensive review of the matters referred to it.
> It is therefore recommended that a similar committee be appointed early in the next session to carry on these studies including the procedure on private bills of divorce which the committee has been asked and is willing to consider in so far as the problem is capable of procedural solution.

We are in a very difficult position, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this question at this moment, in that we are not certain whether the members of another place are going to approve a bill that was approved by this house. Parliament itself, therefore, may have given its stamp of approval to a procedure for the handling of private bills of divorce different from the cumbersome, awkward and exasperating system that has been in vogue for many years. The constitutionality of this procedure has been raised. I am not a constitutional authority. Since I am a farmer, perhaps my attitude on this question is just too simple. My attitude is that if a thing works, let us approve it. Of course I know the constitutional authorities will look at the matter exceedingly carefully to see if parliament has gone beyond its right in dealing with the matter, and I agree that such a look is important.

If it should, and I hope this is not the case, be necessary for the committee to deal with this question in the light of the old procedure, I hope it will be able to make some recommendations that will result in removing consideration of divorce bills from this House of Commons, while granting to the people who are involved the rights and protection that come from established legal procedures.

The Leader of the Opposition said he did not wish to speak too long. He was in favour of the motion, and he wanted action on this subject. Well, there is good reason to pass this motion on its own merits. There are other good reasons, namely the statistics on the continuing unemployment situation, which suggest to all members of parliament in January, as they did in November, that the House of Commons, parliament and the government have not yet effectively dealt with this situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may initiate a debate, if he pursues that line, which would not be relevant to the subject matter under discussion.

Mr. Argue: If we took a long time on this procedural debate it would be suggested, I am sure, that we were delaying other far-reaching measures dealing with the emergency which might be presented to the house. Since this is not our attitude, and since we think this resolution is a good one and that the former committee made real progress, we are happy once again to support this motion. I hope that I may have the good fortune to be a member of Your Honour's committee again during the present session.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN ACT

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved:

That a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to continue the examination and consideration, begun by a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, pursuant to a resolution of the House on April 29, 1959, and continued by a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, pursuant to a resolution on March 9, 1960, of the Indian Act, chapter 149, R.S.C. 1952, and amendments thereto, and to suggest such amendments as they may deem advisable, with authority to investigate and report upon Indian administration in general and, in particular, on the social and economic status of the Indians;

That twenty four members of the House of Commons, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the house as members of the said committee, and that standing order 67(1) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the records, exhibits and evidence received and taken by the joint committees appointed at the last two sessions to examine and consider the foregoing matters be made available to the said committee and made part of the records thereof;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses under oath; to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time; and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and that standing order 66 be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution proposes to reconstitute the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Indian affairs which was first established in 1959 and was reconstituted last year to pursue the examination and consideration of the Indian Act and the Indian Act administration in general. I do not think I need to dwell upon the details of the resolution itself, which is presented in essentially the same form as that which was approved by the house a year ago. When the joint committee reported on July 5 last year it made the following recommendation, which I quote from the final report of the committee:

Your committee unanimously recommends further that immediately after parliament reassembles next session, a similar committee be reconstituted to continue and complete the hearing of representatives of Indian and other organizations, departmental officials and also review the Indian Act.

Those members of the house who have followed the work of this committee during 1959 and 1960 are well aware of the substantial amount of work which remains before the committee can be ready to formulate its final recommendations. The committee will first of all, I presume, wish to complete the hearing of Indian organizations and other interested non-governmental groups. It will then proceed to examine and hear from the appropriate departmental officials whom it may wish to call. I would assume this would be their procedure, and that probably only then would it be able to turn its attention to the detailed examination of the Indian Act itself and the formulation of those legislative changes which it may wish to recommend for consideration by the government and by parliament.

It is the government's hope that the committee, by getting an early start this session, will be able to complete its monumental task and present its final report with recommendations by the end of the present session.

I should perhaps make reference in conclusion to the recommendation contained in the committee's final report of July 5, 1960, which was referred to by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) earlier this day with respect to section 112 of the Indian Act. I gave an assurance to the committee last year and also in 1959 that I was in agreement with the committee's view that section 112 should be amended at the earliest possible opportunity by removing the much criticized provision for the compulsory enfranchisement of Indians.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I have never made any secret of the fact that I thought this particular provision in section 112 should never have been in there in the first place. It has not been used either by this government or by the preceding administration. Consequently I felt there was no point in keeping it in the act. I would have brought in an amendment to the act last year had it not been for the fact that I had anticipated that the committee might have finished its work last year and that all the amendments could be made at one time. However, I am glad to announce that the government has accepted this recommendation of the committee and that it intends to introduce at the present session of parliament legislation to amend section 112 in the sense recommended by the committee. In that way those persons who will appear before the committee this year will be assured of this action, and whether or not the committee is in a position to make its final report we will at least have cleared up this one section of the act which has caused considerable controversy.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, during the past two sessions of parliament I have had the privilege of serving on the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Indian affairs which was established by a resolution, as intimated by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in April, 1959. This committee continued to operate during last session and heard a great number of submissions and briefs from nearly every Indian tribe and reservation, supported by various competent speakers.

The sum total of all these meetings was the conclusion drawn by several members that our Indians were more than justified in asking for a revision of the act which would give them the same rights as those enjoyed by all Canadians.

The mere change or amendment of the act will not bring immediate integration of the Indian population. Before we can obtain the desired result it will require patience, guidance and financial assistance by both federal and provincial governments. The ultimate objective, however, should be a full integration of Indians and whites, which can be seen bearing fruit in several parts of Canada.

As an example I will refer you to what has taken place in the Kenora district of northwestern Ontario. There a public school which had 75 pupils accepted 50 Indian students, and it was found that there is no intellectual difference between them and the white pupils. The principal of that school made an observation to the effect that while a slow Indian student may be slightly slower than a slow white student, a bright Indian child is every bit the equal of a bright white child. The principal of this school—and I wish that we had more principals like him —made the statement that the younger Indian children integrated with the white children immediately, and that the older ones took longer only because they were shy. However, he is certain that if this policy of integration continues, even the slightest variations of racial behaviour will in time disappear.

A special effort should be made to ensure that no Indian pupil will be deprived of the benefit of secondary education. A definite policy should be established by the Indian affairs branch, in co-operation with the provincial departments of education and school boards, in order to make sure that every Indian boy and girl be encouraged to attend high school, vocational and technical school. Where necessary assistance should be provided for transportation and in some cases also for noon meals during the school period. I also strongly urge the government to set up scholarships to be given to pupils qualifying for higher education. This is a most important feature and it should receive the hearty approval of the minister, who has shown a sympathetic understanding of the serious need to improve the educational standard of our first citizens.

I am told that while the doors of immigration are partially closed to most classifications of trades and labour they are wide open for trained domestics. I offer no criticism of this. I do, however, suggest that we are passing up an excellent opportunity by not making an effort to make use of a great number of girls living on reserves. Why not set up special classes in our elementary or vocational schools? Why not institute a training program for young Indian girls to train them in household duties, child care and a general idea of what to expect in domestic service? This would be assistance of inestimable value.

While the Indian on the reserve retains many of the traditions of his forefathers, some of the traditions have been dropped. The heredity principle, if not altogether scrapped, has been greatly modified as can be seen through the present method of choosing chiefs. Chiefs are now elected in very much the same way as our own communities elect their mayors. These elections are the cornerstones of a new era of democracy on the reserves which might well pave the way to self-determination among the first Canadians.

Last year Indian chiefs and counsellors from reserves scattered throughout northwestern Ontario met at a conference in the Quetico training centre. They went through a course of training under the direction of officials from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, Indian affairs branch, and I am sure the minister has a full report of this meeting. This course was designed to bring better understanding of the responsibility of leadership that rests with the chiefs and counsellors in the reserve.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I call his attention to the fact that the question before the house is the setting up of a joint committee and not the subject matter and details of Indian affairs which will come before that committee. All members of the house, if we accept this resolution, will have opportunities to present to the proposed committee such ideas as the hon. member for Fort William is now presenting here and it would seem to me inappropriate on this resolution, which is confined to the simple question of whether or not we are to establish this committee, to go into the matters which would naturally come before that committee, at any rate at length. I hope the hon. member will govern himself accordingly.

Mr. Badanai: I am endeavouring to point out the need for a committee to deal with these matters, and I believe I should bring to the attention of the house some of the questions which I think it will be desirable for the committee to take up. I am pointing out some of the ways by which this committee might function more effectively on behalf of our Indian population.

Mr. Speaker: I accept the hon. member's view to that extent. He would not be out of order in enumerating the matters that this committee might deal with but it seems to me it would be out of place to elaborate on them, because it is asking the house to do the work which the committee itself is being set up to do.

Mr. Badanai: I will modify my remarks to conform with your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I would say that the Canadian Indian, to whom I shall refer during my remarks as the first Canadian, by virtue of legislation passed at the last session, is now a full-fledged voting citizen with representation in the Senate, and here I should like to record the facts that in 1940 a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons recommended to the government of the day that the federal franchise be extended to all Indians. Unfortunately opposition developed among some of the Indians themselves, as a result of which the parliament of that day decided not to put the committee recommendation into effect. As indicated by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) it appears there is still some opposition today to this worth-while recommendation, but I point out that these objections will in time wear out. It has taken 20 years for opposition to the voting privilege to wear down to the point where this privilege is being accepted as a right.

May I say for the information of the house that on September 26, 1959, at my invitation, Senator James Gladstone visited the reserve at Fort William. The city council tendered a luncheon in his honour, and in the evening a large meeting of several hundred Indians and others was held at Chippewa park. The reception was held under the auspices of the board of parks management who supplied the refreshments.

Chief Frank Pelletier of Fort William acted as chairman and arranged a pow-wow to celebrate the visit. All in all, it was a great day for these people.

I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to express the grateful thanks of my constituents to the senator who represents all the Indians of Canada for his keen interest in their welfare, an interest which he has demonstrated by making personal contacts and visiting Indian communities across the country.

Notwithstanding the recognition that Indians should enjoy equal rights with all Canadians the truth of the matter is that they do not by any means possess those equal rights. Take, for example, the case of an Indian ex-serviceman in my own constituency, who on the field of battle won no less than six medals. Yet this man was denied the privilege of having a bottle of beer in his home. His name is David Kimball of the Fort William Indian reserve. He was charged for having beer in his home. He was fined $70 and costs, or 50 days in jail. When he appeared before the magistrate—and I quote his remarks as reported in the press—he said: "I fought for this country. They gave me six medals. They advertise beer on T.V., but I can't bring it home. I plead guilty." The magistrate told him that he had to obey the law as it was presently constituted, and that until a change was made Indians could not have alcohol on the reserve.

Of course, this is no indictment of the magistrate. It is the law which should be changed. Here I should like to point out that there is a clear responsibility on the part of the Indian affairs branch to inaugurate an adult education program by means of films, lectures and reading material to make the Indians realize the dangers of alcoholism and its effect on their homes and social life.

Unless substantial changes are made in the Indian Act, changes or amendments which will give these people opportunities and privileges equal to those enjoyed by all citizens, the bill of rights which was so ceremoniously introduced during the last session of parliament will remain only a limited declaration of intentions.

The question of rights and privileges for Indians is so confused that there is little wonder that so many petitions and briefs were presented to the committee during the last two sessions of parliament. The bill of rights in its present form does not protect the Indians. To be effective it requires that a number of changes be made in the Indian Act. I dare say that a considerable number of Indian leaders are demanding that necessary changes be made in order that whatever privileges may exist under the bill of rights be extended to them. One of them has to do with the title of reserve lands and the right of Indians to own lands, the lands comprising the reserves used by their ancestors for centuries and the homes which have been built on them.

Owning property is one of the principal rights which is recognized in the bill of rights as one of the freedoms but as the title to the reserves is in the name of the crown the Indians are barred from owning their own land. Therefore, under the present act, the Indian can obtain a certificate indicating possession but he cannot sell or transfer the title to anyone not a member of the band, the whole purpose being to prevent a break-up of the reservation. That is the reason why some groups made representations to the committee urging the abolition of the certificate system in order that all lands be held in one parcel.

The restriction imposed on the sale of land only to another member of the band will militate against his being able to obtain a fair price for his property, a practice which of course is not in keeping with the fundamental freedoms enunciated in the bill of rights.

Another flagrant violation of human rights is suffered by an Indian girl if she happens to marry a non-Indian. In that event under the provisions of the present Indian Act she ceases to be an Indian and is disqualified to inherit her father's property or home.

Mr. Stewart Udall, a member of the United States house of representatives, who was recently appointed secretary of the interior by president-elect John F. Kennedy, immediately after his appointment made this statement:

> We have not done enough for our Indian citizens —we can do and intend to do a better job.

That is precisely the spirit in which this resolution should be accepted by all members of the house irrespective of where we sit. No lesser objective and determination should be shown by the government in dealing with amendments to the present Indian Act which should be expected to be brought into this house at the earliest possible moment.

The department should consider the establishment of modern fish processing plants which would encourage many Indians to enter into the commercial fishing field. As an example, Armstrong Fisheries was organized by a group of commercial fishermen in northwestern Ontario which will operate a processing plant at Pickle lake, capable of handling one million pounds of fish a year. This plant will provide good cash returns to the Indian population of the district of Patricia.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. member wants to observe the rules of the house. The matter he is now embarking upon is one that should perhaps come before the committee. Although he is at liberty to put the suggestion at this time the hon. member might well reserve the details for the committee.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to point out the great advantages that could accrue as the result of the government encouraging the establishment of such plants and I hope the committee will approve such a recommendation in order that it may later be implemented by parliament.

I now pass on the subject of education which I feel is paramount. Indeed, in my opinion it is the key to a successful contribution toward a higher standard of living for our first citizens who have for far too long suffered economic inequalities in relation to the white man, inequalities in opportunities for education, inequalities in opportunities for employment in various occupations, inequalities in cases of public welfare apart from the treaty pittance which is doled out annually on the reserves. What is needed, in short, is a recognition of the right of the Indians to equality with all Canadians.

These people feel, and not without some justification, that they have been neglected. They point out the difference between the white communities and the slums on their reserves. They feel deprived of the opportunity to make a reasonable living on the reserve and sometimes despair as to what should be done about it.

In the brief presented by the Blackfoot Indians to the joint parliamentary committee during the last session they suggested changes which called for a reform of the entire structure of Indian policy and a program of assistance. I wish to quote from an article written by William Morris which appeared in the magazine section of the Globe and Mail of December 3, 1960:

> Answers will not be found until the government takes a new look at its entire treatment of the Canadian Indian. Radical changes will have to be made in its legislative program and the administration of the Indian affairs branch—both long overdue. At a recent meeting of the joint parliamentary committee on Indian affairs, the Blackfoot Indians pressed for such a sweeping change. But they believe that the government, which while in opposition appeared to be their champion, is not capable of giving them the leadership they badly need.
> They have good reason for their belief. In its 3½ years of power, the government of John Diefenbaker has failed to introduce any policy which would come to grips with a major question affecting Indians.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. gentleman in his interest in the Indians but the article he is now reading is a most controversial one which in parts bears little resemblance to the truth. If this is to be introduced in this debate then we are going to open this up into a full debate on Indian affairs policy having very little to do with the actual setting up of this committee. In that event I shall certainly feel called upon to refute the arguments described and put forward by the author of the article which the hon. member is now quoting. I personally feel that this would be much more appropriately discussed on the estimates of the department or at such time as the act is before us for amendment.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to say anything in support of his right to read the article I will hear him, but I must consider the position which has been taken.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the minister I am quoting an opinion reported in the Globe and Mail. I appreciate both the minister's sympathy and her concern about opening up too wide a field of debate. I am merely quoting what this author says about the lack of government legislation. I am sure the minister is considering, and I know she will introduce, legislation which will be beneficial to all the Indian people of Canada. I am merely pointing out the defects to show that up to now the Indians have been neglected. That is the only reason why I am pointing it out and attempting to read this particular observation.

Mr. Speaker: May I just say for the guidance of the hon. member that it seems to me he is going too far when he attempts to introduce a controversial matter which discusses the merits of the issues which the house now seeks to refer to the committee.

The only question before the house is whether the former joint committee will be continued for the purpose of considering the affairs of Indians and the administration of the Indian Act. That is the point before the house, whether or not it is expedient to continue this committee. The various matters which the committee will have to consider are not in debate. If the hon. member introduces too many of them—I have been patient with him up to this point—then the only result will be to encourage other hon. members to extend the debate beyond its proper scope, and I hope he will not put me and the house in that position.

Mr. Badanai: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall forgo the reading of the rest of the quotation, which, in my view, is important in relation to the question we are discussing, namely the purpose of the establishment of the committee. In my view its purpose is to rectify any injustices which have been perpetrated upon the Indian people up to now. That is the only purpose. In any event I shall forgo the reading of this particular article which is very good indeed. I commend it to every member of the committee.

It has been established, of course, that more and more of our first Canadians are becoming integrated into city life and are leaving the reserves. Some have made a success as farmers, tourist camp and gas filling station operators, and in dozens of other trades and professions. Therefore, there is no valid reason to believe that they cannot succeed in fields which up to now have been considered as the white man's preserves. All they need is education and training.

In answer to one of my questions, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) assured the house that the vocational training provided under Bill No. C-49 would apply to Indians on the reserves. I express the hope that the Indians on the Fort William reserve, as on all the reserves in Canada, will avail themselves of this opportunity, because it is the kind of assistance that I have been advocating ever since my election to parliament.

I also wish to point out to the minister that the method by which men are selected for training under this scheme should be such that it will not discriminate against applicants from the reserves, and that adequate assistance be given to them while they are in training to the same extent as it is given to others. The minister said that the selection would be the responsibility of the provinces. While I do not think that the provincial authorities will discriminate in any way against Indians, nevertheless I should like to suggest that a special recommendation on behalf of the Indians be made by the minister to those who will have charge of approving the applicants for vocational training as outlined in the legislation.

The Glenbow foundation, which is a charitable institution organized in Calgary, has recently submitted a recommendation urging the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to give consideration to the enactment of legislation to protect archaeological remains or sites on Indian reserves, especially in areas which are threatened with destruction by excavation for power projects and other developments. I commend this suggestion to the minister as being worthy of serious consideration, with the added recommendation that in this work of preservation of historical sites preference for employment be given to local Indians.

I cannot think of anything more appropriate to conclude my remarks on this important and challenging subject than to quote a few sentences from a report of the Indian-Eskimo association of Canada:

> We see that there has to be a continuing effort to create among the Indians, material well-being, civic sense, and social cohesions. We do not see how present safeguarding of the peculiar Indian rights and present enforcement of their disabilities can be combined harmoniously with their journeying to the good life.

I submit that while there may not be easy solutions of the various questions which I have endeavoured to bring to the attention of this house, I do believe however that if we approach the problem with good will and determination, satisfactory results will be produced to the end that our first Canadians will eventually share with all other Canadians the responsibilities and privileges of citizenship.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few comments on the motion before us I too, like the hon. member who has just resumed his seat and also the minister, of course, look with great expectations upon the establishment of this committee and the results which we hope will flow from it.

As the minister indicated, the committee last session made a unanimous recommendation with respect to the compulsory enfranchisement section of the act, recommending that it be removed. I do not think there is anyone in the country who would disagree with that recommendation. Had the government moved with alacrity and undertaken to accept the bill that I introduced last session and again this session they could have accomplished that object, namely the deletion of section 112 from the Indian Act. This course is still open to the minister. In fact, it would mean less work for her if the government adopted the bill I now have on the order paper for the elimination of section 112, and that could be done without any difficulty.

During last session and the session before it was my privilege to be a member of the committee and I hope I shall have the opportunity to be a member during this session. There are, of course, others of my colleagues in the C.C.F. party who have an intense interest in Indian affairs. Owing to our democratic process of electing members to the committee I may have some difficulty in overcoming their desires but I hope I shall be successful.

I for one expect that the committee will have sufficient opportunity and length of time at its disposal not only to conclude its hearings during the present session but also to conclude its work with respect to all details, the most important of which, of course, is the making of recommendations to parliament for amendments to the act and changes in administration and other Indian affairs.

I think these recommendations must be couched in the most definite terms. I do not think they should be to any degree wishy-washy or hopeful that certain circumstances will develop. As I have said, they should be strong and definite and as all-inclusive as possible, covering all facets of the problems confronting our native Indian people. There should, of course, be a striving toward unanimity of the committee with respect to whatever recommendations it produces. In my opinion, the stronger, the more definite and conclusive these recommendations are, the better the chance will be of their becoming a reality in statute form and in policy and administrative procedures on the part of the government in office.

Our attitude in the past toward our native Indian people is something of which we should not be too proud. I have mentioned a number of times in the house and elsewhere that the history of our treatment of our native Indian people leaves a great deal to be desired. We—when I say "we" I mean the non-Indian population because in this relationship I do not think the term "white man" is correct—in effect have ruined their economic structure without attempting to replace it with something else with which they can cope. To a great extent we have disregarded their historical background, their arts and their culture without bending too much effort even to understand or appreciate them and have attempted to force them to accept our way of life.

We have discriminated against them in employment, in educational opportunities and in other ways too. To a great extent we have disregarded their rights as individuals and as a group of people. A recent case in point is the action of the government of British Columbia in its almost callous invasion of the Kitwanga reserve in my constituency for the purpose of building a highway. When I say "callous invasion" that is just what I mean. Officials invaded the reserve without even the initial courtesy of writing a letter to anybody saying that this was going to be done, and subsequently they were forced to sit down and negotiate with respect to the value of the land taken and the timber destroyed. That is just one recent example of attitudes that have been displayed in the past.

I hope that this committee after its extensive hearings and consideration of the matters before it will be able to make a start on reversing past actions and attitudes so that our native Indian population can have all the opportunities available to other citizens of this nation, so that they can develop their individual potentials, so that they can live a fuller life, so that their culture and history can be absorbed by us to help to enrich our culture and history.

One of the most important things leading toward this end which should be considered by the committee and by everyone concerned is the question of education. I refer not only to the type of formal education we have in mind when we think of children going to school but also to adult education because a great many elderly native Indian people are still illiterate so far as our language is concerned, never having had the opportunity to attend school. They have never had a chance to absorb our ideas or to impart to us their own ideas. Education should be extended to include adults also but with more importance being placed on the children because the native Indian children of our nation in the same way as other children are the ones who hold the future of their race and of our society in their hands. They are the ones who will be making the greatest strides toward assimilation, integration or whatever term you wish to use in dealing with the relationship between Indian people and non-Indian people.

I think the committee should consider that education should not be confined solely to the teaching of traditional school subjects such as reading, writing, arithmetic, etc. I envisage an amalgamated school system and, hoping that the committee may consider it favourably also, I hope that the committee will take into account teaching native Indian people about their way of life in the past, their history and their background and also teaching our children the same thing so that all of us can benefit by the process of education.

I think the committee should look carefully into the experience gained in past years through the use of the so-called amalgamated schools. Under this system the Indian affairs branch enters into an agreement with a local school board for the teaching of Indian children in schools under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. The Indian affairs branch pays a certain per capita amount and in some cases contributes toward the capital cost of construction of schools or additions thereto. This is an important thing. It is a new development in the last 10 or 12 years and to quite an etxent it is still considered by some to be an experiment.

This matter should be carefully considered by the committee, for it is my hope that the eventual result will be that all our native Indian children will be taught in schools under provincial jurisdiction where non-Indian children are taught. As quickly as possible and as much as possible the Indian affairs branch should get out of the picture so far as education is concerned so that it will all be under provincial jurisdiction.

The basis for this argument, of course, is a simple one, equality of treatment. This is one thing which I think the members of the committee should always keep in their minds, that we should look toward the placing of our native Indian children in such schools on an equal basis and there should be equal rights and responsibilities resting upon all of us in this regard.

There is another question of general importance but of more importance in some parts of the nation than others and of more importance to some individual native Indians than others. I refer to the question of liquor rights. As I say, some people have more interest in this than others.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member whether that is not entirely a matter of provincial administration? I noticed that the hon. member for Fort William referred to the question and I am not sure whether the Indian Act deals with that subject.

Mr. Howard: On the point of order you have raised, Mr. Speaker, there is what one would call divided jurisdiction in this field. The Indian Act deals with the question of liquor as it relates to Indians and provincial statutes also apply in this field. A most discriminatory situation results from this two-fold jurisdiction. The Indian Act provides that they cannot have liquor and then it says that they can have liquor under certain circumstances and in certain parts of the province, depending on what the province says. This is discriminatory. In so far as liquor is concerned, in British Columbia we treat our native Indian people not even as second class citizens but perhaps as third or fourth class citizens, more as children than as adults.

We have had a Social Credit government in that province for some eight years. They have continued this discrimination by refusing to act. In fact, I would say they have done nothing in the field of Indian affairs in all the years they have been in office. However, this is a provincial matter. There are references in the Indian Act itself, which this committee will be considering, to liquor and its relationship to the native Indian people. The committee might very well consider, therefore, the question of removing the federal government entirely from jurisdiction in so far as liquor is concerned, removing all the sections in the Indian Act that relate to liquor. The basis for this argument is equality of treatment, equality of rights and responsibility. The provincial governments might be left to legislate in the field of liquor as they see fit. I believe this procedure would remove one of the most unfair parts of the statute as it relates to this particular social matter. The basic point from which to start is consideration of equality of rights, equality of responsibility. If the other citizens of this nation desire to have a drink of liquor of some sort, they do not have to resort to a bootlegger and pay $10, $15 or even $25 for a bottle of cheap, rotgut whisky. The only reason the Indians have to do this is the fact that they are Indians.

I was just reading a newspaper article which recites some of the results from this state of affairs. The Vancouver Sun of January 17—

Mr. Speaker: Order; if the hon. member is pursuing the question of the law with respect to the use of liquor by Indians, I think he is going beyond the scope of the debate. He has indicated, very properly, that the committee might well consider that matter, but the other submission would be better deferred and made to the committee if this question is to be properly debated.

Mr. Howard: I do not wish to contravene your ruling in any way, Mr. Speaker. I was simply going to make reference to an occurrence that would point up the necessity of the committee giving this matter intense consideration because the lives of people are involved. The Vancouver Sun of yesterday points out that 14 people became seriously ill on a reserve at Kamloops, one of them is still blinded and two others died as a result of a drinking party. They made the error of drinking methyl hydrate, which is rather poisonous. This occurrence just illustrates the results of these unfair and discriminatory liquor laws. I think the committee should take this into account because it is more than just a social problem when people's lives are involved.

The committee should give intense consideration to the field of health and welfare. A number of submissions have been made to the committee on these subjects in past sessions. In this field again we are, in effect, saying there is twofold jurisdiction because in so far as the Indian people are concerned the federal parliament can legislate and in so far as the various provinces are concerned they, too, can legislate with regard to matters of health and welfare which affect the residents of those provinces. It would seem to me the committee should give adequate consideration to whether the federal government should take the step of transferring jurisdiction over Indians in the field of health and welfare to the provincial governments who now have extensive health and welfare departments established. Perhaps this step would eliminate such cases as the 90 school children who received some public attention recently when they had to have teeth extracted. This caused some furore and resentment amongst the Indian people against the department of health and welfare, the Indian affairs branch and everybody else.

The committee should consider another matter of extreme importance, namely the economic development and the economic opportunities available to native Indian people, especially on our reserves. Their employment opportunities are restricted now even more than by the collapse of our economy generally occasioned by this government. Their employment opportunities are restricted primarily because of the fact they are native Indians and have not had the educational background necessary to enable them to fit in to our type of economy, even when it was running properly. This is a matter to which the committee, I believe, should give intense consideration.

I believe the Indian affairs branch itself realizes this is a problem, and has realized it for some time. In fact, the annual report of the department for the year ending March 31, 1960 refers to the problem of employment opportunities and the economic difficulties that native Indian people encounter when they try to compete in the various areas outside of their reserves. Many of these people, because of a lack of education or because they were channelled into particular types of employment, now find their economic life rests on one form of employment and they have not the ability to move to another type of employment. I know that on the coast of British Columbia, for instance, almost the entire economic life of the native Indian population rests upon the fishing industry. Their chances of expanding into other fields of employment are rather restricted. This is something the committee must take into consideration and I think must correlate with its consideration of the educational question.

Another matter to which the committee should give some attention is one which is often referred to in my province as the B.C. land question. Unless a solution is found to this particular land question the chance of advancing very far in other fields is somewhat limited. I know the Indians of British Columbia, for instance, claim that, apart from a couple of small sections, they have never extinguished or relinquished their title to the land in that province. There are no treaties in British Columbia except those connected with the one or two small areas to which I referred. The Indians say, in fact, that the land upon which the provincial legislature building is situated is properly owned by them. This is a problem that has rankled them for many years and to which they have tried to find a solution. I feel the committee could help to find that solution by recommending negotiations by the government for the purchase of the land. Perhaps a court decision will be necessary to determine whether the Indians in fact have title to the land. I think they do.

The government, as we know, has already established a policy of re-negotiating treaties with the Indians. If they are willing to renegotiate certain treaties then we can assume the government would negotiate a treaty where none now exists. This is a question of property rights and equality of treatment of the people. If I own land or if you own land, Mr. Speaker, you have title to it and you have the opportunity of relinquishing that title. Unless a solution is found to this most important problem in British Columbia it will continue to remain a barrier between the native Indian people and the non-Indian people in these other fields I have mentioned such as education, housing, welfare and liquor rights.

I think my remarks should be drawn to a close now. As I said, Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely wide, broad and important field, and one in which I myself have an intense interest. I have a deep desire to see justice obtained for these people. This committee can start a reversal of the process that has taken place in the last 100 years or so in Canada. They can start us back on the road toward equality of treatment for our native Indian people. They can start us back on the road to the extension of justice to these people in all of their problems. They can start us back on the road of making provision for them to have an honourable existence; a full, secure and peaceful life; and equal opportunities for themselves and for their children in the same way as they are available to others of us in this nation.

The native Indian people I know, and with whom I have communicated and have spoken, are looking toward this committee with great expectations. Many of them have written letters to the committee itself. Many have appeared and presented briefs. Some of them were short, others were extensive and well documented. They are looking to this committee for a solution to their many problems. The committee has a great responsibility resting upon its shoulders with regard to the treatment of our native Indian peoples in Canada. I certainly hope that this committee does not disappoint these native people.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now she will close the debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a point of order. I think Your Honour did not see my friend the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Michaud) rising as the minister was rising.

Mr. Speaker: No, I did not see the hon. member for Kent, I am sorry to say. I recognize the hon. member for Kent.

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, my reason for not rising perhaps as quickly as I should have risen was that I expected another hon. member behind me to do so. I just wanted to say briefly that I welcome the motion which is now before the house to establish this committee. The motion reads in part as follows:

> —and to suggest such amendments as they may deem advisable, with authority to investigate and report upon Indian administration in general and, in particular, on the social and economic status of the Indians.

I think this is a valid purpose indeed in the establishment of this committee. My only suggestion at this time stems from a conversation I had during the Christmas recess with one of the chaplains on an Indian reserve in my own riding. I refer to the Big Cove reservation. These are the two suggestions that were expressed to me by this chaplain and I should like to impart them to the minister at this time.

In the course of this discussion it was suggested that it would be to the great advantage of this particular reservation if a chaplain were established in permanence on a reservation. It was recognized that in certain respects this procedure might present certain difficulties but it was thought that possibly this result could be arrived at in the following manner.

I perhaps should say that this reservation is now possessed of adequate school facilities but that one of the handicaps is that no vocational training is being given in these schools. It would seem that vocational training is essential if we wish to improve the economic status of the people living upon this reservation. The suggestion advanced by this chaplain was this. Of course I should perhaps say that all the people living on this reservation are of the same faith. The suggestion advanced was that it would be to their advantage, both in the material sense as well as in the moral sense if, as I have just mentioned, this chaplain had permanent residence upon the reservation in order to give to these people the social leadership and moral guidance which is required.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member was here when I intervened previously. In essence, he is pleading a particular cause or grievance of the Indians. The proposal is to set up a committee to hear all these matters. To my way of viewing the matter that would be the proper time at which to pursue problems such as this one. I have perhaps allowed hon. members to go further than they should strictly be allowed to go on this motion.

Mr. Michaud: I appreciate your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I have already achieved what I had intended to achieve when I rose. My purpose was just to impart to the minister the suggestion to which I have already referred.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Before the minister replies, Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a matter that has been brought to my attention by some of those who are dealing with the Indians in northern Ontario and northern Quebec. It is true that I should like to be on the Indian affairs committee but I do not represent any Indians of a reservation nature. There are no reservations in my riding. However, I have some interest in the problems in the adjoining areas that have reservations.

In talking to a gentleman who has an influence on and is closely connected with a number of mission schools in the Hudson bay area I was interested in some of the comments he was making. A year or two ago I had discussed the problem of enfranchising the Indians, some of the problems that might be expected to result from that franchise, and the fears that the Indians themselves were expressing. I was pleased to hear from him the other day that these fears had in the main been allayed.

He was telling me that they have a problem that the Indian affairs officials in the mission are in no way able to deal with, namely the problem of taking the children of Indians, particularly of those who go into the bush in the winter, and asking them to reside in schools with other Indian families or in boarding schools for short periods of time. He pointed out to me that seldom do the children ever get more than four years in school on this basis. It has been the practice in the last two or three years to get children in these schools from the age of 12 years to 16 years. They are beyond the normal school age when they get them. They have been with their families who travel into the bush in the winter time. When the family goes out in the fall they may be persuaded to leave one or two of these children with the mission or with one of the schools.

Those members of the family who do go into the bush learn in an Indian way the abilities of their forefathers. They learn in the bush itself to pursue the family tradition and to successfully follow the pursuits in which the family has been engaged for generations. The children who attend school, and who may receive four years of formal education, do so at a time when they would normally be learning to carry on in the footsteps of their forefathers. By the time they are 16 they are satisfied with schooling but are no longer able to return to the particular occupations available to Indians who have not had the opportunity of attending schools. Thus it means they have been deprived of part of their normal education, an education which they would have received if they had followed their families.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member was absent from the chamber and did not hear the view which I expressed several times during the course of this debate. This is a problem which could quite properly be presented to the committee if the house decides to set it up, but it is not in my view relevant to the question now before us and it is not in order to discuss it at the length at which the hon. member is discussing it.

Mr. Peters: I heard Your Honour's ruling on several occasions, Mr. Speaker, and did not intend to contravene it, but this is a problem which has come to light quite recently in the Hudson bay area and it is one which as far as I know has not yet been considered by the Indian affairs committee. I was only trying to outline sufficient of it to indicate that the problems of education are different in the Northwest Territories where we have trained people for other purposes. This is an academic educational training which is being given now. This was not necessarily the type of education which was being given before. It is not connected with vocational training—

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I have indicated, I think the hon. member has already gone as far as he can in discussing this question. The problem to which he is referring is not before the house except by way of illustration of the need for having a committee set up.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): There is no particular desire on my part to prevent my colleagues displaying their knowledge of Indian affairs and their sympathy for the Indians, because I know it is very real. However, I do think some of the remarks made would leave the house with a false impression of the circumstances that exist today, particularly in the field of education where we recognize there is a great deal left to be done. Possibly I could transgress the rules long enough to say that today 90 per cent of all Indians of school age attend school. This, I think, is a great improvement. Moreover, the situation continues to improve almost from day to day.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) was insistent on scholarships. We already have scholarships. In fact, there are 44 scholarships of various types available for which Indian children can compete, and I say, further, that any Indian student who demonstrates a capacity to absorb knowledge can acquire just as much education as he is able to absorb. This is the result of a progressive policy which has grown over the years. The whole problem of education will only be solved in a matter of time as these people become more and more convinced of the necessity of encouraging their children to acquire as much education as they possibly can.

Once more, I do not want to try to answer all the various pleas that have been made, because you, Mr. Speaker, have already told us that this type of debate is out of order, and I think it is. However, I did not want to let all the comments which have been made on this educational question remain on the record without throwing some light on the situation as it is at the present time.

I should like to thank hon. members for their participation in this discussion, and I trust that when the committee meets they will throw their efforts wholeheartedly into the work of this committee and give us and the Indians every assistance in the direction of clarifying the requirements of the Indians today in an effort to produce for them an act more in keeping with the present day circumstances.

Motion agreed to.

BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON RADIO AND TELEVISION

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue) moved:

That a special committee be appointed on broadcasting to consider radio and television broadcasting with power to examine and inquire into the matters herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon and to send for persons, papers and records;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable or necessary;

That the committee shall consist of 35 members;

That standing orders 66 and 67 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if before the minister rises I could raise a point of order.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member, but I have not yet put the motion before the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rose before Your Honour put the motion because it seemed to me on reading the motion, which I read just before the Clerk did so, that there seems to be some defect in it. It asks that a special committee be appointed to examine and inquire into matters herein referred to, but I have scrutinized the motion and find that in fact there are no matters referred to therein. I am wondering if at some stage a paragraph has not been left out of the motion.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member reminded me the other day, no motion is void because of its vagueness. He may have an opportunity to move an amendment later.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I noticed the line to which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has drawn attention. This motion was drafted by the law officers and I assume that a line has been left out, perhaps in the printing. I will check on it. At the moment we will take it for granted that we have a resolution before us.

The resolution was drawn in wide terms in order to permit of a full and complete investigation of all matters respecting broadcasting and telecasting, private and public. I do not intend to take the time of the house, because I know there are several hon. members who wish to speak on the subject and time is somewhat limited. In addition, I am, of course, always an optimist, and hope I can get this motion approved before six o'clock. All I can say is that this committee is being set up early in the session so as to permit a full study of all matters respecting the broadcast industry of Canada, public and private. This is one of the most important public media of information we have, and one which, I know, deserves the careful scrutiny of the house. I am sure the committee will give it the study which it deserves.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that Your Honour has drawn attention to the vagueness of the motion and that it has been underlined by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) because I think it will be very difficult for the minister, the Chair or anyone else to rule out of order anything that I may choose to say about this motion so long as it has any vague reference to broadcasting.

I have complained, sir, and I complain again at the outset, about this motion. We in the opposition do not want a vague and general reference. We have asked over and over again for a specific and particular reference to which we feel we have been entitled as a result of an understanding which we believed was reached with the government at the time the present Broadcasting Act was enacted in 1958.

At that time we forewent the right to have this bill sent to a special committee at the request of the government in order to enable the bill to get through in that session in a reasonable time. We understood that when a committee was set up the first task entrusted to that committee—and that the terms of reference of the committee would so indicate —would be to examine the operation of the Broadcasting Act clause by clause so that we could see how it was really operating, because we in the opposition took as strong exception to certain sections of that act at that time as we have taken to any legislation which has been introduced in this house by the present government and we believe the experience with that act has shown that the exceptions we took to that legislation were soundly based.

We realize that because of our conventions in this house the opposition will be in a minority in the committee as it is in the house. I am not complaining about that fact. We also realize that unless the terms of reference are specific it will be possible for the majority, as has happened previously when committees on this subject have been set up, to introduce other matters and vote down our efforts to carry out what we believed was the inquiry pledged to us by the government.

I hope that before this motion is passed the minister will see fit to have one of his colleagues propose an amendment to indicate that in the investigation to be conducted by the committee priority should be given to a clause by clause examination of the act. Otherwise, the opposition—of this I feel quite confident—will once again be denied the opportunity to carry out that investigation because the majority of that committee, which was not very respectful of the minister two years ago as the hon. gentleman will recall, will pay no attention and will proceed to ride their own horses.

I am not complaining about that, either. If the motion is left vague and indefinite they have, of course, every right to do that. The undertaking which we understood was given to us by the government should, I feel, be carried out in good faith by the government and I am once more asking that this be done.

Unlike the Minister of National Revenue, I am not a lawyer and I have ceased even the formal study of law. In order to remove some misapprehension in the house I thought this a suitable occasion to make a public declaration to that effect. On a careful appraisal of the matter I have come to the conclusion that there are other fields of endeavour which perhaps may be more immediately rewarding and in which, perhaps, the fictions do not necessarily need to be legal. However, I am afraid I am, even on the vague terms of this resolution, somewhat out of order at this moment and so I come back to the resolution itself.

As I say, if I read this language correctly, there is no matter herein referred to that is going to be before this committee on a strict reading of this motion unless "radio and television broadcasting" can be described as matters, and "broadcasting" is a singular noun and therefore it seems to me it would be hard for it to be "matters". It does not seem, therefore, that the motion in its present form makes any sense at all. I intend to suggest that there should be certain priorities given and the highest priority, I repeat again, should be the carrying out of what we understood to be the undertaking given by the government in 1958.

The second matter that I believe the committee ought to discuss is that of the granting of private television licences in those communities where the C.B.C. has up till now had the exclusive licence. This has been a matter of great public controversy particularly in the city of Toronto where notwithstanding the fact that the board of broadcast governors said they had the greatest difficulty discriminating between the nine applicants, they chose to give the licence to one of those which was also a newspaper. I would not have cared which newspaper it was, I would have objected, because I think that when the applicants are equally good a licence should not be given to the proprietors of a newspaper. If they are not equally good, that is another matter, and there are some places where that is the case. I must say, speaking for my personal preference, that the newspaper chosen would be the last newspaper to which I would have granted a licence in Toronto, or practically anywhere else, but that is a matter of bias, sir.

Mr. Nowlan: The Toronto Star would be slightly ahead of it, I suppose?

Mr. Pickersgill: Or even the Globe and Mail, Mr. Speaker, even the Globe and Mail. I just do not happen to like the Toronto Telegram and I have the impression that they reciprocate my feeling, but that again is a little beyond the vague terms of this motion.

As I say, the second matter for discussion should be the principles on which these exclusive licences—because that is what they are, licences of bits of the public domain; that is what the privy council said this was

—are given to one person rather than another person, and I use the word "person" in the legal sense. This is a matter of the greatest possible moment and one about which I think parliament properly should be concerned.

The third matter to which I feel the committee should direct its attention is the problem of the financing of the C.B.C. My views on this subject and the views of my friends in the house are well known. We take the position that the Fowler commission and all preceding royal commissions on this matter were right when they said that the financing of public broadcasting should not be dependent upon the whim of the government or based upon annual votes by parliament for the reason I have stated many times before in this house but which cannot be stated too often, that the moment an agency has to come to the treasury board and argue its case it becomes a creature not of parliament but of the government no matter how many safeguards of theoretical independence are put into the legislation.

In those circumstances human nature being what it is there will be an inevitable tendency—it may be repressed by persons of very high character but it should not be necessary to have it repressed—to lick the boots of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and of other members of the government in the hope of getting a little more largesse.

My view is that public broadcasting, like the courts, should be guaranteed its income by parliament in such a fashion that there is no incentive whatsoever to this kind of action. As the Fowler commission said, there should be some formula—and there are many formulae that might be used—for a period of years, at least sufficient to be slightly longer than the life of any one parliament, during which the revenues are fixed.

Mr. Speaker: The subject which the hon. member is now debating is really not the issue of the motion, and if he pursues it, of course, then other members will be entitled to debate the whole issue of how the C.B.C. should be financed. I take the view, rightly or wrongly, that the motion is to set up the committee and is not a review of the whole of the matters to be referred to the committee. It is simply a request to the house, and it is for the house to decide whether a committee is or is not desirable at this time, and that is a relatively narrow field of debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that with a restraint which I do not often exercise, I listened in silence to rulings this afternoon which I must say startled me very much, sir, if I may say so with the greatest possible respect, because I have been observing the proceedings of this house since the year 1937, and I have seen debates on the setting up of committees go on for days and days, and I have never before heard it suggested that all we should consider is whether or not is is expedient to have a committee at all.

I know that one can go back into the rules, particularly the rules at Westminster, as was the case, of course, in another similar matter in another debate to which I cannot refer as a precedent. But a wholly different practice, I think, has been consecrated in this house, perhaps wrongly. It may be one of those wrongs that is consecrated, surely, by so much modern usage and by so many accretions of custom that I think it would be quite restrictive of what are deemed, and what have come to be regarded as the rights of parliament, to suggest that the matters which are going to come before the committee should not have, I do not say extended debate, but some consideration on such motions.

And I might add, sir, in this particular case there seems to be the additional circumstance that there is no specification of what the matters are that are to come before this committee, and I am appealing to the minister to put a list of those matters in. I was seeking to justify the importance of putting this particular question in and also seeking to establish certain priorities in the order of these matters. However, I think I have sufficiently made my point with respect to this matter of financing. To me, the financing—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member goes on may I say I appreciate the force of what he says. I have taken the position I have taken with full cognizance of precedents to the contrary. I know that a motion to set up a committee has been used deliberately by the house as a vehicle for debate on external affairs for example but that, of course, is by consent. I think many times the house has debated the substance of a matter to be referred to a committee more by consent than because of its relevance. Having taken that view and realizing the difficulties, I would not feel at all embarrassed, in fact, it might settle the practice if an issue were made of it and the house made its own decision. However, I do not think we have reached that point.

Mr. Nowlan: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I can agree with both points of view which have been advanced. I think you are perfectly right in your interpretation of the rule. I know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate can give sanctions of usage which have gone a long way to deprecate the importance of the rule. I would say with deference that I think the hon. member is within your interpretation of the rule up to the moment because as I understand it this is a motion to set up a committee, and he has been simply specifying and urging on Your Honour various matters which he thinks the committee should deal with without debating them. Perhaps he was starting to debate the relative matter of financing.

So long as the hon. member confines himself to specifying matters which he hopes, believes or thinks the committee should deal with I would suggest that within that limit he is within the rule. Certainly, if he goes further and starts to debate the matter of whether one should get a television licence or a broadcasting licence in this area, or some other area, which has been done before, I think he would be going beyond the rule. I would suggest the hon. member has been within the rules so far.

Mr. Speaker: I would agree with that. I take the opportunity of rising again because I think this is a matter of some consequence. It does arise from time to time. I do not want to be running counter to the wishes of the house or to be unduly restrictive. The point of view I took would permit reference to the various matters. It seems to me to be unreasonable for the house to spell out in detail all the issues which are to be referred to the committee for the purpose of saving the time of the house. We might just as well have the debate at the beginning and dispense with the committee altogether.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may say so with deference, I cannot agree with the last view because we cannot deal with witnesses here and that is one of the most important functions of a committee. But I would not like to see the sense of the house taken without more debate and discussion. This is a very important point. If I may advert to something which came up earlier this afternoon. We had a motion to set up a committee to consider with Your Honour the rules of the house, and I would suggest that this might very usefully be considered by that committee; but that, in the meantime, we should be jealous not merely of the rules that are in the rule book at Westminster, or even the ancient precedents of this house, but that we should respect some of the modern precedents as well.

I remember on one occasion, sir, if I may just add this reminiscence, one of the best debates that ever took place in the house in which Mr. Drew, then leader of the opposition, and the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), who was then minister of transport, participated and in which the whole broadcasting policy of the government was debated, if my recollection is right, for nearly two days, on a motion similar to this, without any question of consent having arisen. I do not offer this as a menace, sir, or even as an incentive; I merely recall it.

As I was saying, I do believe that this whole problem of financing does need consideration for the reason I have given and also for another reason which I intend to give without elaborating. I think that the cost of broadcasting—I know you can work it out at so many cents per head per day and it does not sound very much—to the treasury is a matter which must give even the reckless Minister of Finance we have at present some concern from time to time. This is another reason why I think this committee should give the most careful consideration to this matter.

There is another matter to which I think very careful consideration should be given. I refer to the question of the commercial policy of the public broadcasting system. In that regard, one of the reasons why the Aird commission recommended public broadcasting in the first place, and why every committee of the house and every commission that has ever considered the matter has recommended its continuation, was for the maintenance of a Canadian identity. I may say that I fully subscribe to that view and I have, I think, in my private life and in my public life, always been a supporter of public broadcasting for that reason and for that reason only because I do recognize the dangers of public broadcasting as they were manifest in some parts of Europe 25 years ago when some of us were rather younger than we are now and as they still exist today in many totalitarian countries. This is potentially a very dangerous instrument in the hands of an unscrupulous government and it needs to be safeguarded in every possible way against control by the government, as opposed to control by parliament itself in which people are freely elected whether or not the people who elect them like the government.

I say, sir, that this commercial policy is something which I think should be considered very carefully for this reason. Every morning I turn on station CBO just before I get up because I want to find out what the temperature is and some other things of that sort and then listen to the news. One thing that has been dinned into my mind in the last few weeks is that the most important message CBO has for us every morning is that we should buy the Saturday Evening Post and McCall's magazines. I do not see how you could be more ridiculous than that.

Mr. Nowlan: That is at 7.30. At five minutes to eight you find out where you should have your shirts laundered.

Mr. Pickersgill: Here is this public agency spending millions of public money to preserve our Canadian identity while this same agency, which is supposed to be doing that, is doing business with people, among all the thousands of potential advertisers, who are trying to sell magazines not produced in this country, this at a time when the government is trying to undo an error it made a year or two ago by setting up a commission under a very distinguished and loquacious journalist to inquire into means of keeping Canadian magazine and periodicals alive. It does seem to me that as a mere matter of good taste and good judgment the management of the C.B.C. has erred very sadly in this particular case.

I know, and nobody has said it oftener than I, that we in this parliament should not substitute ourselves for the management of the C.B.C. and I do not intend to do so. But I have also said, when on the treasury benches, and I say now that I see no reason why because we are members of parliament we should not feel free to criticize the C.B.C. I say that applies to those who sit on the treasury benches. I do not take the narrow view that was taken by the hon. member for Eglinton and one or two gentlemen when they sat on this side of the house that a minister must never speak to anybody connected with the management of the C.B.C. I think that is utter nonsense. I do not think being a minister deprives one of one's rights as a citizen.

For a minister to bring pressure to bear on them is one thing but a minister should be just as free as anyone else to express an opinion and to criticize and the C.B.C. should be so independent that the minister's freedom will not in any way influence them in any improper sense. That is the ideal and I admit it is a very difficult ideal to achieve. It is an ideal toward which all of us in this house should strive, and it seems to me that is a vital and important thing.

As I have said so often, it is almost more important in the modern world but certainly just as important today to preserve the independence of public broadcasting from pressure by the executive as it is to preserve the independence of the judiciary from pressure by the executive. They should be on the same basis. We should be sure that this pervasive influence, broadcasting, much more pervasive than the press though less lasting, will not become an engine of potential tyranny, however brief and however transitory that might be. Therefore I think it is most important that at all these points where this potential danger arises we should, as a committee, try to put partisanship aside and consider this matter from the point of view of the preservation of our free institutions. Quite frankly, if we lived a thousand miles from any other country, if Canada were an island with 18 million people on it, I am not so sure, taking everything into account, that I would feel that public broadcasting was necessary at all.

I do think, considering the situation we have in Canada, that we have achieved a pretty good compromise between public and private broadcasting, but it is a compromise and the boundary line is and always will be, I think, a somewhat fluctuating one. I do not think it can be a hard and fast line. In that context I think it is desirable that the committee should give consideration to the continuing place of private broadcasting in the whole national structure of broadcasting. In this context I should simply like to affirm again the view that, after three years' experience and notwithstanding the many criticisms I would make of the board of broadcast governors as at present constituted, I do think that the Fowler proposal that there should be a board of broadcast governors was a sound proposal that should be continued.

But, and here again this is another matter that I think the committee should consider, I think the committee should give very careful consideration, which of course would be done if my first suggestion that the act should be the first matter to be considered by the committee were carried out, to carrying out the Fowler recommendations in their entirety in this respect and bringing the C.B.C. as well as the private stations under the jurisdiction of the board of broadcast governors, thus removing that direct nexus which now exists between the management of the C.B.C. and the government, which did not exist under the old regime and which to my mind is entirely undesirable even if everybody behaves in the most proper manner possible. It seems to me that the insulation provided by the old board of the C.B.C. or the insulation of a board of broadcast governors between the government and the management of the C.B.C. was in the past a sound principle and should be restored. However, again I am expressing a view upon a matter which I think deserves further scrutiny by this committee.

Notwithstanding the fact that I feel I should perhaps go on speaking merely to assert my right to debate these matters, I really feel I have said all that in principle I wanted to say. I shall now conclude by reiterating my appeal to the minister to have one of his colleagues move an amendment to this motion to define the matters herein referred to and, in particular, to give priority to a clause by clause examination of the act which is now in its third year of operation. It seems to me this would be the most appropriate function of that committee even if there had been no undertaking in that regard, but in view of the undertaking I believe it should be carried out.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I want to seize this opportunity of commending the government for proposing to set up a special committee on broadcasting, and I should like also to offer some suggestions to the committee which will be entrusted with the study of business of the C.B.C.

I wonder whether it would not be a good thing for all crown corporations, including the C.B.C., to be under a single department.

Nobody is shocked by the fact that immigration employees are placed under the authority of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration or postal employees under the Postmaster General. Why should they be shocked at a single minister being responsible for the C.B.C., the national film board, and other crown corporations? The question may well be asked. It is too easily avoided on the ground that crown corporations should be free from political interference.

We are living under a democratic system of responsible government and it seems to me that the representatives of the people are entitled to know down to the last detail what is happening within the crown corporations. Indeed, all crown agencies should always be directly responsible to parliament.

To imply, as some have done, that doing so would put the C.B.C. under political control is simply ridiculous. To my mind, it is a question of knowing whether parliament or the C.B.C. will have the last word with regard to the way part of the taxpayers' money is to be spent so that the corporation might avoid bankruptcy.

Moreover, there would be, to my mind, some urgency in this committee considering a recommendation with regard to a committee of experts. Such a body might consist of parents, educators and members of the clergy, who would act as moderators of the C.B.C. programs.

A great number of complaints have been made with regard to the field of ethics. On January 16 last, La Presse published an open letter over the signature of Rev. Father Ubald Villeneuve, O.M.I. and addressed to Mrs. Nicole Germain, of the C.B.C., in which he upbraided her about a television program having to do with liquor.

I also point out to the future committee and remind the house that in 1959, as reported in La Presse of September 28, 1959, his Eminence Cardinal Leger stated:

> Broadcasting facilities must serve the cause of truth, good and beauty.
> The Church considers broadcasting techniques as precious gifts from God but points out that they have a mission to accomplish: namely to serve the cause of truth, good and beauty.

I also ask the C.B.C. authorities to purge their programs a little and to be extremely cautious in their selection of films and programs shown on television in order that they do not tend to destroy the family but rather to bring its members closer together.

Among the resolutions passed in July 1959 during the radio and television fans congress held at the University of Montreal under the auspices of the Federation of Holy Name societies, there is one that should be singled out. It reads as follows:

> T.V. station operators should take great care to avoid broadcasting programs that might be harmful to children during hours when children have not yet gone to bed.

I have here also a resolution adopted by the Quebec council of the Knights of Columbus, requesting that the C.B.C.'s attention be called to certain T.V. programs that take no heed of moral law.

Furthermore, I ask the committee that will be established to consider whether it is true, as was asserted by the authors and artists, according to Le Devoir for Saturday, December 10, 1960, that:

> The C.B.C. is unilingual at top level and does not care two hoots about its French speaking employees.

It would be worth while, I think, to go carefully into this matter.

I am also speaking on behalf of the Société St. Jean Baptiste which takes a firm stand against certain T.V. programs that do not respect the French language, programs which are broadcast mostly on the French network. Let me mention four of them: "Un homme et son péché", "En haut de la pente douce", "Jamboree" and "Cent farces".

In addition, the Societe St. Jean Baptiste of the diocese of Sherbrooke protests on the ground that the language used by the writers is not only disrespectful but offends the French language.

I also urge the committee that will be established to ask the C.B.C. to consider the possibility of extending its broadcasts to countries of the French community in Africa. A headline in the newspaper La Presse said: "C.B.C. reaches out to Africa". Therefore, it is important that broadcasts be relayed not only to commonwealth countries but also to countries of the French community in Africa.

I also urge the committee and C.B.C. authorities to extend French television coverage to Saskatchewan.

I also urge the members of the committee to call before them Mr. Rene Levesque who, some time ago, charged the C.B.C. with discrimination against the Liberals. I was quite surprised at Mr. Levesque's stand since for many years this man made a living out of the C.B.C. He reminds me of the fable—and he should read it—of "The Woodman and the Snake". In view of the unfair criticism he has made, it would certainly be proper that Mr. Levesque be called before the committee which is to be formed.

Mr. Ouimet said—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a well known rule of this house, quite often honoured in the breach, that attacks are not made in this house on provincial ministers and members of provincial governments. I suggest the hon. member is transgressing this rule.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) must be relevant to the resolution before us. I have not been in the chair this afternoon during the discussion of these motions, but I thought we were discussing the appointment of committees. No doubt an hon. member can make suggestions concerning what should come before a committee, but I would not think he would be right in discussing the matter that might come before the committee. He might suggest certain things should come before the committee, but not discuss them fully.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I repeat the same suggestion. I strongly recommend to the special committee which is to be set up to summon Mr. Rene Levesque in order to study the unfair attacks he has launched against the C.B.C. That man is biting the hand that fed him.

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is not proper to get into provincial politics while we are discussing a motion to appoint a committee for the study of the C.B.C. situation. I therefore ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to be a realist just for once and to forget about his ties with the Union Nationale.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, as usual, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville is screaming, roaring and groaning. One can only give what one has. In any case, the hon. member was out of order and I would suggest that he read the editorial recently published in the paper Le Devoir and entitled: "Once a drunkard, always a drunkard!" Thus he would have a good idea of what the Liberal convention was and about the attitude of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier).

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I again rise on a point of order. I would ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to stick to the matter under discussion. For my part I surely have no intention of following him on this ground. There are rules governing this house and members of the Union Nationale should comply with them like everybody else.

Mr. Fortin: That is why you were expelled from the house.

(Text):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) just said that I was thrown out of the legislative assembly of Quebec. I say in this house that I have never been expelled from the legislative assembly of Quebec and I should like the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet to withdraw his declaration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): If the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville has denied it, then of course the hon. member who made the original remark will be obliged to accept his word.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, in withdrawing my words, as I evidently do since I accept the hon. member's statement, I would add that the Speaker of the Quebec legislature has been extremely patient.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member to withdraw his words unconditionally.

Some hon. Members: Order. Order.

Mr. Pigeon: I feel that the statement made by Mr. Levesque is dangerous and casts aspersions on C.B.C.

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): That matter having been cleared up, I take it that we can now get back to the motion that is before the house. Has the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) concluded his remarks?

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I am only making a suggestion. If the matter is considered by the committee, the committee will decide and it may summon as a witness that person who is so ungrateful to a crown corporation which was so good as to give him the opportunity of making a living.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering who is in the chair, whether you are or whether the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville is. He reminds me of the member for Laurier who often shouts, shut up, sit down, as if the Liberals were still in office.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: I had some remarks for the new committee that will be established and I again ask the committee to consider my suggestions and to summon this person—

Some hon. Members: Order.

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I have already reminded the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) that we were not to go into a full discussion of matters that may be brought before the committee.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: I am making this suggestion so that the committee may find it advisable to summon him.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: This man who is launching an attack detrimental to the C.B.C.—

Mr. Habel: You are the one who is damaging its reputation.

Mr. Dupuis: This is really pathetic.

(Text):

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a position somewhat similar to that of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in that, after reading the resolution which is now before us, I could not quite figure out exactly what was being referred to the committee. I was therefore forced to come to the conclusion that the present wording could only mean that all matters which apply to radio and to television broadcasting are being referred to the committee.

I am not going into any lengthy statement on the many broad principles of radio and television. I am not going to speak on the many important questions that should be considered by the committee because others will do so. However, because I am not and will not be a member of that committee I want to draw to the attention of the house one subject which I sincerely hope will be considered by the committee. I feel that it is of the utmost importance. I refer to the interpretation which is being placed by the board of broadcast governors on the section of the regulations that deals with what are known as controversial broadcasts. The interpretation that is now being placed on that matter is of such a nature that, before I am through, I shall have proved that it is in the process of wrecking some of the finest broadcasts in Canada, one of which has been on the air for some 17 years.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire of the acting house leader what the business will be on Friday? I take it that tomorrow will be private members' day.

Mr. Nowlan: Tomorrow will be private members' day. On Friday we are proceeding with the budget debate. Under the rules this will necessitate a division on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the acting house leader tell us what the business will be on Monday and next week?

Mr. Nowlan: Monday, I believe, is private members' day again. Beyond that I cannot go. I will be able to give it tomorrow but I could not give it tonight.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX A

TREATY BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA RELATING TO CO-OPERATIVE DEVELOPMENT OF THE WATER RESOURCES OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER BASIN

The governments of Canada and the United States of America

Recognizing that their peoples have, for many generations, lived together and co-operated with one another in many aspects of their national enterprises for the greater wealth and happiness of their respective nations, and

Recognizing that the Columbia river basin, as a part of the territory of both countries, contains water resources that are capable of contributing greatly to the economic growth and strength and to the general welfare of the two nations, and

Being desirous of achieving the development of those resources in a manner that will make the largest contribution to the economic progress of both countries and to the welfare of their peoples of which those resources are capable, and

Recognizing that the greatest benefit to each country can be secured by co-operative measures for hydroelectric power generation and flood control, which will make possible other benefits as well,

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

Interpretation

(1) In the treaty, the expression

(a) "average critical period load factor" means the average of the monthly load factors during the critical stream flow period;

(b) "base system" means the plants, works and facilities listed in the table in annex B as enlarged from time to time by the installation of additional generating facilities, together with any other plants, works or facilities which may be constructed on the main stem of the Columbia river in the United States of America;

(c) "Canadian storage" means the storage provided by Canada under article II;

(d) "critical stream flow period" means the period, beginning with the initial release of stored water from full reservoir conditions and ending with the reservoirs empty, when the water available from reservoir releases plus the natural stream flow is capable of producing the least amount of hydroelectric power in meeting system load requirements;

(e) "consumptive use" means use of water for domestic, municipal, stock-water, irrigation, mining or industrial purposes but does not include use for the generation of hydroelectric power;

(f) "dam" means a structure to impound water, including facilities for controlling the release of the impounded water;

(g) "entity" means an entity designated by either Canada or the United States of America under article XIV and includes its lawful successor;

(h) "international joint commission" means the commission established under article VII of the boundary waters treaty, 1909, or any body designated by the United States of America and Canada to succeed to the functions of the commission under this treaty;

(i) "maintenance curtailment" means an interruption or curtailment which the entity responsible therefor considers necessary for purposes of repairs, replacements, installations of equipment, performance of other maintenance work, investigations and inspections;

(j) "monthly load factor" means the ratio of the average load for a month to the integrated maximum load over one hour during that month;

(k) "normal full pool elevation" means the elevation to which water is stored in a reservoir by deliberate impoundment every year, subject to the availability of sufficient flow;

(l) "ratification date" means the day on which the instruments of ratification of the treaty are exchanged;

(m) "storage" means the space in a reservoir which is usable for impounding water for flood control or for regulating stream flows for hydroelectric power generation;

(n) "Treaty" means this treaty and its annexes A and B;

(o) "useful life" means the time between the date of commencement of operation of a dam or facility and the date of its permanent retirement from service by reason of obsolescence or wear and tear which occurs notwithstanding good maintenance practices.

(2) The exercise of any power, or the performance of any duty, under the treaty does not preclude a subsequent exercise or performance of the power or duty.

ARTICLE II

Development by Canada

(1) Canada shall provide in the Columbia river basin in Canada 15,500,000 acre-feet of storage usable for improving the flow of the Columbia river.

(2) In order to provide this storage, which in the treaty is referred to as the Canadian storage, Canada shall construct dams:

(a) on the Columbia river near Mica creek, British Columbia, with approximately 7,000,000 acre-feet of storage;

(b) near the outlet of Arrow lakes, British Columbia, with approximately 7,100,000 acre-feet of storage; and

(c) on one or more tributaries of the Kootenay river in British Columbia downstream from the Canada-United States of America boundary with storage equivalent in effect to approximately 1,400,000 acre-feet of storage near Duncan lake, British Columbia.

(3) Canada shall commence construction of the dams as soon as possible after the ratification date.

ARTICLE III

Development by the United States of America Respecting Power

(1) The United States of America shall maintain and operate the hydroelectric facilities included in the base system and any additional hydroelectric facilities constructed on the main stem of the Columbia river in the United States of America in a manner that makes the most effective use of the improvement in stream flow resulting from operation of the Canadian storage for hydroelectric power generation in the United States of America power system.

(2) The obligation in paragraph (1) is discharged by reflecting in the determination of downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled the assumption that the facilities referred to in paragraph (1) were maintained and operated in accordance therewith.

ARTICLE IV

Operation by Canada

(1) For the purpose of increasing hydroelectric power generation in Canada and the United States of America, Canada shall operate the Canadian storage in accordance with annex A and pursuant to hydroelectric operating plans made thereunder. For the purposes of this obligation an operating plan if it is either the first operating plan or if in the view of either Canada or the United States of America it departs substantially from the immediately preceding operating plan must, in order to be effective, be confirmed by an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America.

(2) For the purpose of flood control until the expiration of 60 years from the ratification date, Canada shall

(a) operate in accordance with annex A and pursuant to flood control operating plans made thereunder

(i) 80,000 acre-feet of the Canadian storage described in article II(2) (a),

(ii) 7,100,000 acre-feet of the Canadian storage described in article II(2) (b),

(iii) 1,270,000 acre-feet of the Canadian storage described in article II (2) (c).

provided that the Canadian entity may exchange flood control storage under subparagraph (ii) for flood control storage additional to that under subparagraph (i), at the location described in article II(2)(a), if the entities agree that the exchange would provide the same effectiveness for control of floods on the Columbia river at The Dalles, Oregon;

(b) operate any additional storage in the Columbia river basin in Canada, when called upon by an entity designated by the United States of America for that purpose, within the limits of existing facilities and as the entity requires to meet flood control needs for the duration of the flood period for which the call is made.

(3) For the purpose of flood control after the expiration of 60 years from the ratification date, and for so long as the flows in the Columbia river in Canada continue to contribute to potential flood hazard in the United States of America, Canada shall, when called upon by an entity designated by the United States of America for that purpose, operate within the limits of existing facilities any storage in the Columbia river basin in Canada as the entity requires to meet flood control needs for the duration of the flood period for which the call is made.

(4) The return to Canada for hydroelectric operation and the compensation to Canada for flood control operation shall be as set out in articles V and VI.

(5) Any water resource development, in addition to the Canadian storage, constructed in Canada after the ratification date shall not be operated in a way that adversely affects the stream flow control in the Columbia river within Canada so as to reduce the flood control and hydroelectric power benefits which the operation of the Canadian storage in accordance with the operating plans in force from time to time would otherwise produce.

(6) As soon as any Canadian storage becomes operable Canada shall commence operation thereof in accordance with this article and in any event shall commence full operation of the Canadian storage described in article II(2)(b) and article II(2)(c) within five years of the ratification date and shall commence full operation of the balance of the Canadian storage within nine years of the ratification date.

ARTICLE V

Entitlement to Downstream Power Benefits

(1) Canada is entitled to one half the downstream power benefits determined under article VII.

(2) The United States of America shall deliver to Canada at a point on the Canada-United States of America boundary near Oliver, British Columbia, or at such other place as the entities may agree upon, the downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled, less

(a) transmission loss,

(b) the portion of the entitlement disposed of under article VIII(1), and

(c) the energy component described in article VIII(4).

(3) The entitlement of Canada to downstream power benefits begins for any portion of Canadian storage upon commencement of its operation in accordance with annex A and pursuant to a hydroelectric operating plan made thereunder.

ARTICLE VI

Payment for Flood Control

(1) For the flood control provided by Canada under article IV(2)(a) the United States of America shall pay Canada in United States funds:

(a) 1,200,000 dollars upon the commencement of operation of the storage referred to in subparagraph (a)(i) thereof,

(b) 52,100,000 dollars upon the commencement of operation of the storage referred to in subparagraph (a)(ii) thereof, and

(c) 11,100,000 dollars upon the commencement of operation of the storage referred to in subparagraph (a)(iii) thereof.

(2) If full operation of any storage is not commenced within the time specified in article IV, the amount set forth in paragraph (1) of this article with respect to that storage shall be reduced as follows:

(a) under paragraph (1)(a), 4,500 dollars for each month beyond the required time.

(b) under paragraph (1)(b), 192,100 dollars for each month beyond the required time, and

(c) under paragraph (1)(c), 40,800 dollars for each month beyond the required time.

(3) For the flood control provided by Canada under article IV(2)(b) the United States of America shall pay Canada in United States funds in respect only of each of the first four flood periods for which a call is made 1,875,000 dollars and shall deliver to Canada in respect of each and every call made, electric power equal to the hydroelectric power lost by Canada as a result of operating the storage to meet the flood control need for which the call was made, delivery to be made when the loss of hydroelectric power occurs.

(4) For each flood period for which flood control is provided by Canada under article IV(3) the United States of America shall pay Canada in United States funds:

(a) the operating cost incurred by Canada in providing the flood control, and

(b) compensation for the economic loss to Canada arising directly from Canada foregoing alternative uses of the storage used to provide the flood control.

(5) Canada may elect to receive in electric power, the whole or any portion of the compensation under paragraph (4)(b) representing loss of hydroelectric power to Canada.

ARTICLE VII

Determination of Downstream Power Benefits

(1) The downstream power benefits shall be the difference in the hydroelectric power capable of being generated in the United States of America with and without the use of Canadian storage, determined in advance, and is referred to in the treaty as the downstream power benefits.

(2) For the purpose of determining the downstream power benefits:

(a) the principles and procedures set out in annex B shall be used and followed;

(b) the Canadian storage shall be considered as next added to 13,000,000 acre-feet of the usable storage listed in column 4 of the table in annex B;

(c) the hydroelectric facilities included in the base system shall be considered as being operated to make the most effective use for hydroelectric power generation of the improvement in stream flow resulting from operation of the Canadian storage.

(3) The downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled shall be delivered as follows:

(a) dependable hydroelectric capacity as scheduled by the Canadian entity, and

(b) average annual usable hydroelectric energy in equal amounts each month, or in accordance with a modification agreed upon under paragraph (4).

(4) Modification of the obligation in paragraph (3)(b) may be agreed upon by the entities.

ARTICLE VIII

Disposal of Entitlement to Downstream Power Benefits

(1) With the authorization of Canada and the United States of America evidenced by exchange of notes, portions of the downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled may be disposed of within the United States of America. The respective general conditions and limits within which the entities may arrange initial disposals shall be set out in an exchange of notes to be made as soon as possible after the ratification date.

(2) The entities may arrange and carry out exchanges of dependable hydroelectric capacity and average annual usable hydroelectric energy to which Canada is entitled for average annual usable hydroelectric energy and dependable hydroelectric capacity respectively.

(3) Energy to which Canada is entitled may not be used in the United States of America except in accordance with paragraphs (1) and (2).

(4) The by-passing at dams on the main stem of the Columbia river in the United States of America of an amount of water which could produce usable energy equal to the energy component of the downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled but not delivered to Canada under article V or disposed of in accordance with paragraphs (1) and (2) at the time the energy component was not so delivered or disposed of, is conclusive evidence that such energy component was not used in the United States of America and that the entitlement of Canada to such energy component is satisfied.

ARTICLE IX

Variation of Entitlement to Downstream Power Benefits

(1) If the United States of America considers with respect to any hydroelectric power project planned on the main stem of the Columbia river between Priest Rapids dam and McNary dam that the increase in entitlement of Canada to downstream power benefits resulting from the operation of the project would produce a result which would not justify the United States of America in incurring the costs of construction and operation of the project, Canada and the United States of America at the request of the United States of America shall consider modification of the increase in entitlement.

(2) An agreement reached for the purposes of this article shall be evidenced by an exchange of notes.

ARTICLE X

East-West Stand-by Transmission

(1) The United States of America shall provide in accordance with good engineering practice east-west stand-by transmission service adequate to safeguard the transmission from Oliver, British Columbia, to Vancouver, British Columbia, of the downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled and to improve system stability of the east-west circuits in British Columbia.

(2) In consideration of the stand-by transmission service, Canada shall pay the United States of America in Canadian funds the equivalent of 1.50 United States dollars a year for each kilowatt of dependable hydroelectric capacity included in the downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled.

(3) When a mutually satisfactory electrical co-ordination arrangement is entered into between the entities and confirmed by exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America the obligation of Canada in paragraph (2) ceases.

ARTICLE XI

Use of Improved Stream Flow

(1) Improvement in stream flow in one country brought about by operation of storage constructed under the treaty in the other country shall not be used directly or indirectly for hydroelectric power purposes except:

(a) In the case of use within the United States of America with the prior approval of the United States entity, and

(b) in the case of use within Canada with the prior approval of the authority in Canada having jurisdiction.

(2) The approval required by this article shall not be given except upon such conditions, consistent with the treaty, as the entity or authority considers appropriate.

ARTICLE XII

Kootenay River Development

(1) The United States of America for a period of five years from the ratification date, has the option to commence construction of a dam on the Kootenay river near Libby, Montana, to provide storage to meet flood control and other purposes in the United States of America. The storage reservoir of the dam shall not raise the level of the Kootenay river at the Canada-United States of America boundary above an elevation consistent with a normal full pool elevation at the dam of 2,459 feet, United States coast and geodetic survey datum, 1929 general adjustment, 1947 international supplemental adjustment.

(2) All benefits which occur in either country from the construction and operation of the storage accrue to the country in which the benefits occur.

(3) The United States of America shall exercise its option by written notice to Canada and shall submit with the notice a schedule of construction which shall include provision for commencement of construction, whether by way of railroad relocation work or otherwise, within five years of the ratification date.

(4) If the United States of America exercises its option, Canada in consideration of the benefits accruing to it under paragraph (2) shall prepare and make available for flooding the land in Canada necessary for the storage reservoir of the dam within a period consistent with the construction schedule.

(5) If a variation in the operation of the storage is considered by Canada to be of advantage to it the United States of America shall, upon request, consult with Canada. If the United States of America determines that the variation would not be to its disadvantage it shall vary the operation accordingly.

(6) The operation of the storage by the United States of America shall be consistent with any order of approval which may be in force from time to time relating to the levels of Kootenay lake made by the international joint commission under the boundary waters treaty, 1909.

(7) Any obligation of Canada under this article ceases if the United States of America, having exercised the option, does not commence construction of the dam in accordance with the construction schedule.

(8) If the United States of America exercises the option it shall commence full operation of the storage within seven years of the date fixed in the construction schedule for commencement of construction.

(9) If Canada considers that any portion of the land referred to in paragraph (4) is no longer needed for the purpose of this article Canada and the United States of America, at the request of Canada, shall consider modification of the obligation of Canada in paragraph (4).

(10) If the treaty is terminated before the end of the useful life of the dam Canada shall for the remainder of the useful life of the dam continue to make available for the storage reservoir of the dam any portion of the land made available under paragraph (4) that is not required by Canada for purposes of diversion of the Kootenay river under article XIII.

ARTICLE XIII

Diversions

(1) Except as provided in this article neither Canada nor the United States of America shall, without the consent of the other evidenced by an exchange of notes, divert for any use, other than a consumptive use, any water from its natural channel in a way that alters the flow of any water as it crosses the Canada-United States of America boundary within the Columbia river basin.

(2) Canada has the right, after the expiration of 20 years from the ratification date, to divert not more than 1,500,000 acre-feet of water a year from the Kootenay river in the vicinity of Canal Flats, British Columbia, to the headwaters of the Columbia river, provided that the diversion does not reduce the flow of the Kootenay river immediately downstream from the point of diversion below the lesser of 200 cubic feet per second or the natural flow.

(3) Canada has the right, exercisable at any time during the period commencing sixty years after the ratification date and expiring 100 years after the ratification date, to divert to the headwaters of the Columbia river any water which, in its natural channel, would flow in the Kootenay river across the Canada-United States of America boundary, provided that the diversion does not reduce the flow of the Kootenay river at the Canada-United States of America boundary near Newgate, British Columbia, below the lesser of 2500 cubic feet per second or the natural flow.

(4) During the last 20 years of the period within which Canada may exercise the right to divert described in paragraph (3) the limitation on diversion is the lesser of 1000 cubic feet per second or the natural flow.

(5) Canada has the right:

(a) if the United States of America does not exercise the option in article XII(1), or

(b) if it is determined that the United States of America, having exercised the option, did not commence construction of the dam referred to in article XII in accordance therewith or that the United States of America is in breach of the obligation in that article to commence full operation of the storage, to divert to the headwaters of the Columbia river any water which, in its natural channel, would flow in the Kootenay river across the Canada-United States of America boundary, provided that the diversion does not reduce the flow of the Kootenay river at the Canada-United States of America boundary near Newgate, British Columbia, below the lesser of 1000 cubic feet per second or the natural flow.

(6) If a variation in the use of the water diverted under paragraph (2) is considered by the United States of America to be of advantage to it Canada shall, upon request, consult with the United States of America. If Canada determines that the variation would not be to its disadvantage it shall vary the use accordingly.

ARTICLE XIV

Arrangements for Implementation

(1) Canada and the United States of America shall each, as soon as possible after the ratification date, designate entities and when so designated the entities are empowered and charged with the duty to formulate and carry out the operating arrangements necessary to implement the treaty. Either Canada or the United States of America may designate one or more entities. If more than one is designated the powers and duties conferred upon the entities by the treaty shall be allocated among them in the designation.

(2) In addition to the powers and duties dealt with specifically elsewhere in the treaty the powers and duties of the entities include:

(a) co-ordination of plans and exchange of information relating to facilities to be used in producing and obtaining the benefits contemplated by the treaty,

(b) calculation of and arrangements for delivery of hydroelectric power to which Canada is entitled for providing flood control,

(c) calculation of the amounts payable to the United States of America for stand-by transmission services,

(d) consultation on requests for variations made pursuant to articles XII (5) and XIII (6),

(e) the establishment and operation of a hydrometeorological system as required by annex A,

(f) assisting and co-operating with the permanent engineering board in the discharge of its functions,

(g) periodic calculation of accounts,

(h) preparation of the hydroelectric operating plans and the flood control operating plans for the Canadian storage together with determination of the downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled,

(i) preparation of proposals to implement article VIII and carrying out any disposal authorized or exchange provided for therein,

(j) making appropriate arrangements for delivery to Canada of the downstream power benefits to which Canada is entitled including such matters as load factors for delivery, times and points of delivery, and calculation of transmission loss,

(k) preparation and implementation of detailed operating plans that may produce results more advantageous to both countries than those that would arise from operation under the plans referred to in annexes A and B.

(3) The entities are authorized to make maintenance curtailments. Except in case of emergency, the entity responsible for a maintenance curtailment shall give notice to the corresponding Canadian or United States entity of the curtailment, including the reason therefor and the probable duration thereof and shall both schedule the curtailment with a view to minimizing its impact and exercise due diligence to resume full operation.

(4) Canada and the United States of America may by an exchange of notes empower or charge the entities with any other matter coming within the scope of the treaty.

ARTICLE XV

Permanent Engineering Board

(1) A permanent engineering board is established consisting of four members, two to be appointed by Canada and two by the United States of America. The initial appointments shall be made within three months of the ratification date.

(2) The permanent engineering board shall:

(a) assemble records of the flows of the Columbia river and the Kootenay river at the Canada-United States of America boundary;

(b) report to Canada and the United States of America whenever there is substantial deviation from the hydroelectric and flood control operating plans and if appropriate include in the report recommendations for remedial action and compensatory adjustments;

(c) assist in reconciling differences concerning technical or operational matters that may arise between the entities;

(d) make periodic inspections and require reports as necessary from the entities with a view to ensuring that the objectives of the treaty are being met;

(e) make reports to Canada and the United States of America at least once a year of the results being achieved under the treaty and make special reports concerning any matter which it considers should be brought to their attention;

(f) investigate and report with respect to any other matter coming within the scope of the treaty at the request of either Canada or the United States of America.

(3) Reports of the permanent engineering board made in the course of the performance of its functions under this article shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein contained and shall be accepted unless rebutted by other evidence.

(4) The permanent engineering board shall comply with directions, relating to its administration and procedures, agreed upon by Canada and the United States of America as evidenced by an exchange of notes.

ARTICLE XVI

Settlement of Differences

(1) Differences arising under the treaty which Canada and the United States of America cannot resolve may be referred by either to the international joint commission for decision.

(2) If the international joint commission does not render a decision within three months of the referral or within such other period as may be agreed upon by Canada and the United States of America, either may then submit the difference to arbitration by written notice to the other.

(3) Arbitration shall be by a tribunal composed of a member appointed by Canada, a member appointed by the United States of America and a member appointed jointly by Canada and the United States of America who shall be chairman. If within six weeks of the delivery of a notice under paragraph (2) either Canada or the United States of America has failed to appoint its member, or they are unable to agree upon the member who is to be chairman, either Canada or the United States of America may request the president of the international court of justice to appoint the member or members. The decision of a majority of the members of an arbitration tribunal shall be the decision of the tribunal.

(4) Canada and the United States of America shall accept as definitive and binding and shall carry out any decision of the international joint commission or an arbitration tribunal.

(5) Provision for the administrative support of a tribunal and for remuneration and expenses of its members shall be as agreed in an exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America.

(6) Canada and the United States of America may agree by an exchange of notes on alternative procedures for settling differences arising under the treaty, including reference of any difference to the international court of justice for decision.

ARTICLE XVII

Restoration of Pre-Treaty Legal Status

(1) Nothing in this treaty and no action taken or forgone pursuant to its provisions shall be deemed, after its termination or expiration, to have abrogated or modified any of the rights or obligations of Canada or the United States of America under then existing international law, with respect to the uses of the water resources of the Columbia river basin.

(2) Upon termination of this treaty, the boundary waters treaty, 1909, shall, if it has not been terminated, apply to the Columbia river basin, except in so far as the provisions of that treaty may be inconsistent with any provision of this treaty which continues in effect.

(3) Upon termination of this treaty, if the boundary waters treaty, 1909, has been terminated in accordance with article XIV of that treaty, the provisions of article II of that treaty shall continue to apply to the waters of the Columbia river basin.

(4) If upon the termination of this treaty article II of the boundary waters treaty, 1909, continues in force by virtue of paragraph (3) of this article the effect of article II of that treaty with respect to the Columbia river basin may be terminated by either Canada or the United States of America delivering to the other one year's written notice to that effect; provided however that the notice may be given only after the termination of this treaty.

(5) If prior to the termination of this treaty Canada undertakes works usable for and relating to a diversion of water from the Columbia river basin, other than works authorized by or undertaken for the purpose of exercising a right under article XIII or any other provision of this treaty, paragraph (3) of this article shall cease to apply one year after delivery by either Canada or the United States of America to the other of written notice to that effect.

ARTICLE XVIII

Liability for Damage

(1) Canada and the United States of America shall be liable to the other and shall make appropriate compensation to the other in respect of any act, failure to act, omission or delay amounting to a breach of the treaty or of any of its provisions other than an act, failure to act, omission or delay occurring by reason of war, strike, major calamity, act of God, uncontrollable force or maintenance curtailment.

(2) Except as provided in paragraph (1) neither Canada nor the United States of America shall be liable to the other or to any person in respect of any injury, damage or loss occurring in the territory of the other caused by any act, failure to act, omission or delay under the treaty whether the injury, damage or loss results from negligence or otherwise.

(3) Canada and the United States of America, each to the extent possible within its territory, shall exercise due diligence to remove the cause of and to mitigate the effect of any injury, damage or loss occurring in the territory of the other as a result of any act, failure to act, omission or delay under the treaty.

(4) Failure to commence operation as required under articles IV and XII is not a breach of the treaty and does not result in the loss of rights under the treaty if the failure results from a delay that is not wilful or reasonably avoidable.

(5) The compensation payable under paragraph (1):

(a) in respect of a breach by Canada of the obligation to commence full operation of a storage, shall be forfeiture of entitlement to downstream power benefits resulting from the operation of that storage, after operation commences, for a period equal to the period between the day of commencement of operation and the day when commencement should have occurred;

(b) in respect of any other breach by either Canada or the United States of America, causing loss of power benefits, shall not exceed the actual loss in revenue from the sale of hydroelectric power.

ARTICLE XIX

Period of Treaty

(1) The treaty shall come into force on the ratification date.

(2) Either Canada or the United States of America may terminate the treaty other than article XIII (except paragraph (1) thereof), article XVII and this article at any time after the treaty has been in force for 60 years if it has delivered at least 10 years written notice to the other of its intention to terminate the treaty.

(3) If the treaty is terminated before the end of the useful life of the dam built under article XII then, notwithstanding termination, article XII remains in force until the end of the useful life of the dam.

(4) If the treaty is terminated before the end of the useful life of the facilities providing the storage described in article IV(3) and if the conditions described therein exist then, notwithstanding termination, articles IV(3) and VI(4) and (5) remain in force until either the end of the useful life of these facilities or until those conditions cease to exist, whichever is the first to occur.

ARTICLE XX

Ratification

The instruments of ratification of the treaty shall be exchanged by Canada and the United States of America at Ottawa, Canada.

ARTICLE XXI

Registration with the United Nations

In conformity with article 102 of the charter of the United Nations, the treaty shall be registered by Canada with the secretariat of the United Nations.

This treaty has been done in duplicate copies in the English language.

In witness whereof the undersigned, duly authorized by their respective governments, have signed this treaty at Washington, District of Columbia, United States of America, this seventeenth day of January, 1961.

For Canada:

JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER
Prime Minister of Canada

E. D. FULTON
Minister of Justice

A. D. P. HEENEY
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Canada to the United States of America

For the United States of America:

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER
President of the United States of America

Under Secretary of the Interior

ANNEX A

PRINCIPLES OF OPERATION

General

1. The Canadian storage provided under article II will be operated in accordance with the procedures described herein.

2. A hydrometerological system, including snow courses, precipitation stations and stream flow gauges will be established and operated, as mutually agreed by the entities and in consultation with the permanent engineering board, for use in establishing data for detailed programming of flood control and power operations. Hydrometeorological information will be made available to the entities in both countries for immediate and continuing use in flood control and power operations.

3. Sufficient discharge capacity at each dam to afford the desired regulation for power and flood control will be provided through outlet works and turbine installations as mutually agreed by the entities. The discharge capacity provided for flood control operations will be large enough to pass inflow plus sufficient storage releases during the evacuation period to provide the storage space required. The discharge capacity will be evaluated on the basis of full use of any conduits provided for that purpose plus one half the hydraulic capacity of the turbine installation at the time of commencement of the operation of storage under the treaty.

4. The outflows will be in accordance with storage reservation diagrams and associated criteria established for flood control purposes and with reservoir-balance relationships established for power operations. Unless otherwise agreed by the entities the average weekly outflows shall not be less than 3000 cubic feet per second at the dam described in article II(2)(a), not less than 5000 cubic feet per second at the dam described in article II(2)(b) and not less than 1000 cubic feet per second at the dam described in article II(2)(c). These minimum average weekly releases may be scheduled by the Canadian entity as required for power or other purposes.

Flood Control

5. For flood control operation, the United States entity will submit flood control operating plans which may consist of or include flood control storage reservation diagrams and associated criteria for each of the dams. The Canadian entity will operate in accordance with these diagrams or any variation which the entities agree will not derogate from the desired aim of the flood control plan. The use of these diagrams will be based on data obtained in accordance with paragraph 2. The diagrams will consist of relationships specifying the flood control storage reservations required at indicated times of the year for volumes of forecast runoff. After consultation with the Canadian entity the United States entity may from time to time as conditions warrant adjust these storage reservation diagrams within the general limitations of flood control operation. Evacuation of the storages listed hereunder will be guided by the flood control storage reservation diagrams and refill will be as requested by the United States entity after consultation with the Canadian entity. The general limitations of flood control operation are as follows:

(a) The dam described in article II(2)(a) —The reservoir will be evacuated to provide up to 80,000 acre-feet of storage, if required, for flood control use by May 1 of each year.

(b) The dam described in article II(2)(b) —The reservoir will be evacuated to provide up to 7,100,000 acre-feet of storage, if required, for flood control use by May 1 of each year.

(c) The dam described in article II(2)(c) —The reservoir will be evacuated to provide up to 700,000 acre-feet of storage, if required, for flood control use by April 1 of each year and up to 1,270,000 acre-feet of storage, if required, for flood control use by May 1 of each year.

(d) The Canadian entity may exchange flood control storage provided in the reservoir referred to in subparagraph (b) for additional storage provided in the reservoir referred to in subparagraph (a) if the entities agree that the exchange would provide the same effectiveness for control of floods on the Columbia river at The Dalles, Oregon.

Power

6. For power generating purposes the 15,500,000 acre-feet of Canadian storage will be operated in accordance with operating plans designed to achieve optimum power generation downstream in the United States of America until such time as power generating facilities are installed at the site referred to in paragraph 5(a) or at sites in Canada downstream therefrom.

7. After at-site power is developed at the site referred to in paragraph 5(a) or power generating facilities are placed in operation in Canada downstream from that site, the storage operation will be changed so as to be operated in accordance with operating plans designed to achieve optimum power generation at-site in Canada and downstream in Canada and the United States of America, including consideration of any agreed electrical co-ordination between the two countries. Any reduction in the downstream power benefits in the United States of America resulting from that change in operation of the Canadian storage shall not exceed in any one year the reduction in downstream power benefits in the United States of America which would result from reducing by 500,000 acre-feet the Canadian storage operated to achieve optimum power generation in the United States of America and shall not exceed at any time during the period of the treaty the reduction in downstream power benefits in the United States of America which would result from similarly reducing the Canadian storage by 3,000,000 acre-feet.

8. After at-site power is developed at the site referred to in paragraph 5(a) or power generating facilities are placed in operation in Canada downstream from that site, storage may be operated to achieve optimum generation of power in the United States of America alone if mutually agreed by the entities in which event the United States of America shall supply power to Canada to offset any reduction in Canadian generation which would be created as a result of such operation as compared to operation to achieve optimum power generation at-site in Canada and downstream in Canada and the United States of America. Similarly, the storage may be operated to achieve optimum generation of power in Canada alone if mutually agreed by the entities in which event Canada shall supply power to the United States of America to offset any reduction in United States generation which would be created as a result of such operation as compared to operation to achieve optimum power generation at-site in Canada and downstream in Canada and the United States of America.

9. Before the first storage becomes operative, the entities will agree on operating plans and the resulting downstream power benefits for each year until the total of 15,500,000 acre-feet of storage in Canada becomes operative. In addition, commencing five years before the total of 15,500,000 acre-feet of storage is expected to become operative, the entities will agree annually on operating plans and the resulting downstream power benefits for the sixth succeeding year of operation thereafter. This procedure will continue during the life of the treaty, providing to both entities, in advance, an assured plan of operation of the Canadian storage and a determination of the resulting downstream power benefits for the next succeeding five years.

ANNEX B

1. The downstream power benefits in the United States of America attributable to operation in accordance with annex A of the storage provided by Canada under article II will be determined in advance and will be the estimated increase in dependable hydroelectric capacity in kilowatts for agreed critical stream flow periods and the increase in average annual usable hydroelectric energy output in kilowatt hours on the basis of an agreed period of stream flow record.

2. The dependable hydroelectric capacity to be credited to Canadian storage will be the difference between the average rates of generation in kilowatts during the appropriate critical stream flow periods for the United States of America base system, consisting of the projects listed in the table, with and without the addition of the Canadian storage, divided by the estimated average critical period load factor. The capacity credit shall not exceed the difference between the capability of the base system without Canadian storage and the maximum feasible capability of the base system with Canadian storage, to supply firm load during the critical stream flow periods.

3. The increase in the average annual usable hydroelectric energy will be determined by first computing the difference between the available hydroelectric energy at the United States base system with and without Canadian storage. The entities will then agree upon the part of available energy which is usable with and without Canadian storage, and the difference thus agreed will be the increase in average annual usable hydroelectric energy. Determination of the part of the energy which is usable will include consideration of existing and scheduled transmission facilities and the existence of markets capable of using the energy on a contractual basis similar to the then existing contracts. The part of the available energy which is considered usable shall be the sum of:

(a) the firm energy,

(b) the energy which can be used for thermal power displacement in the Pacific northwest area as defined in Paragraph 7, and

(c) the amount of the remaining portion of the available energy which is agreed by the entities to be usable and which shall not exceed in any event 40 per cent of that remainder.

4. An initial determination of the estimated downstream power benefits in the United States of America from Canadian storage added to the United States base system will be made before any of the Canadian storage becomes operative. This determination will include estimates of the downstream power benefits for each year until the total of 15,500,000 acre-feet of Canadian storage becomes operative.

5. Commencing five years before the total of 15,500,000 acre-feet of storage is expected to become operative, estimates of downstream power benefits will be calculated annually for the sixth succeeding year on the basis of the assured plan of operation for that year.

6. The critical stream flow period and the details of the assured plan of operation will be agreed upon by the entities at each determination. Unless otherwise agreed upon by the entities, the determination of the downstream power benefits shall be based upon stream flows for the 20-year period beginning with July 1928 as contained in the report entitled Modified Flows at Selected Power Sites—Columbia River Basin, dated June 1957. No retroactive adjustment in downstream power benefits will be made at any time during the period of the treaty. No reduction in the downstream power benefits credited to Canadian storage will be made as a result of the load estimate in the United States of America, for the year for which the determination is made, being less than the load estimate for the preceding year.

7. In computing the increase in dependable hydroelectric capacity and the increase in average annual hydroelectric energy, the procedure shall be in accordance with the three steps described below and shall encompass the loads of the Pacific northwest area. The Pacific northwest area for purposes of these determinations shall be Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Montana west of the continental divide but shall exclude areas served on the ratification date by the California Oregon Power Company and Utah Power and Light Company.

Step I

The system for the period covered by the estimate will consist of the Canadian storage, the United States base system, any thermal installation operated in co-ordination with the base system, and additional hydroelectric projects which will provide storage releases usable by the base system or which will use storage releases that are usable by the base system. The installations included in this system will be those required, with allowance for adequate reserves, to meet the forecast power load to be served by this system in the United States of America, including the estimated flow of power at points of interconnection with adjacent areas, subject to paragraph 3, plus the portion of the entitlement of Canada that is expected to be used in Canada. The capability of this system to supply this load will be determined on the basis that the system will be operated in accordance with the established operating procedures of each of the projects involved.

Step II

A determination of the energy capability will be made using the same thermal installation as in step I, the United States base system with the same installed capacity as in step I and Canadian storage.

Step III

A similar determination of the energy capability will be made using the same thermal installation as in step I and the United States base system with the same installed capacity as in step I.

8. The downstream power benefits to be credited to Canadian storage will be the differences between the determinations in step II and step III in dependable hydroelectric capacity and in average annual usable hydroelectric energy, made in accordance with paragraphs 2 and 3.

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

It is with great pleasure that I am able to announce that the treaty for the co-operative development of the Columbia river basin has been signed in Washington today. This marks the successful outcome of nearly three years of intensive work on a project that will, in years to come, bring very great benefits to both Canada and the United States.

Knowing the great importance that a suitable arrangement for development of the Columbia basin could have for Canada, the present government began work on it almost immediately after it assumed office. The project had been under consideration for many years and engineering studies, under a reference to the international joint commission, had been pursued since 1944. The problem was to get the matter actively advanced and to put negotiations with the United States on a profitable and fruitful basis. Essential to the whole plan, so far as Canada was concerned, was the need to secure recognition by the United States—which there had never been before—of the principle that a downstream country should share the benefits it might get from storage works in a neighbouring upstream country. I regard it as a great achievement that, not only were we able to get negotiations under way with purpose and action, but we were also successful in securing agreement on that principle of such basic and far-reaching importance to this country.

It will be recalled that at the end of January 1959, the governments of Canada and the United States requested the international joint commission to report to them on:

(a) the benefits which will result from the co-operative use of storage of waters and electrical interconnection within the Columbia river system; and

(b) the apportionment between the two countries of such benefits more particularly in regard to electrical generation and flood control.

The commission reported and submitted the principles on which it had been able to achieve agreement on December 29, 1959. Less than a month later, on January 25, 1960, the two governments announced the appointment of delegations to represent them in negotiations looking toward the formulation of a definite agreement for development of the Columbia basin. Eight months after that, on September 28, the two negotiating teams were able to submit a progress report that set forth the basic provisions that they recommended for inclusion in a treaty. That progress report was accepted by the two governments in an exchange of notes on October 19 last.

The total usable storage of the base system as so adjusted will be 13,000,000 acre-feet.

Since October the negotiations for a treaty have proceeded with meetings in Washington and Ottawa. On January 8 of this year the negotiating teams signed a report to the two governments submitting a draft of the treaty that they recommended for signature and ratification. That draft treaty has now been considered, not only by the national governments in Ottawa and Washington but also by the government of British Columbia in Victoria. It has been approved by all governments and has been signed today on behalf of Canada by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and Hon. E. D. Fulton, Minister of Justice and chairman of the Canadian negotiating group, and by the Canadian ambassador in Washington.

The treaty does not depart in any fundamental respect from the program that was recommended in the progress report of September 28, although a number of improvements have been made.

So far as Canada is concerned, the most important single feature of the treaty is the one I have already referred to—the recognition of the principle of division of downstream benefits. From that principle all the great advantages that are possible for Canada as a result of co-operative development of the Columbia basin flow. Without that principle the entire arrangement would be fruitless for this country. Our predecessors in office had failed to achieve recognition of this basic point. We have succeeded. The treaty embodies the principle that downstream benefits are to be divided equally. That alone is a success of the most outstanding character.

We have been able to achieve this in a way which will fully respect the sovereignty of each country. By avoiding any complicated cost-sharing and by making the arrangement as self-enforcing as possible we have ensured that there will be no unnecessary intrusion into each other's affairs across the international boundary.

The Columbia river treaty calls for construction of three major dams for the storage of water on the Columbia river system in Canada. The largest of these will be located near Mica Creek on the main stem of the Columbia river and is estimated to cost some $247 million. The second dam will be near the outlet of the Arrow lakes at an estimated cost of nearly $72 million. The third dam will be on the Kootenay system tributary to the Columbia river, probably near Duncan lake, at an estimated cost of nearly $26 million. The total expenditure involved in the Canadian storages is thus estimated to be approximately $345 million. Table 1 attached sets forth these figures in greater detail.

The dams in Canada will store very large quantities of water for regulated release to increase the production of power downstream. Initially that increase in power production will be entirely in the United States since Canada does not now have any generators installed on the Columbia river in this country. In return for the very valuable regulation of the flow of water, the treaty provides that Canada will receive 50 per cent of the increase in usable power in the United States. This increase in power downstream is the gain that is commonly referred to as the "downstream benefit". It is these benefits that the United States has agreed to share with us.

The magnitude of the increase in power production as a result of the Canadian storages is very great indeed. This results in part from the fact that the Columbia river has an extreme variation in flow in its natural state. The flow at the border can vary as much as 40:1 because of seasonal fluctuation. The increase in power output is also great because of the enormous investment that the United States has made in the installation of power producing facilities downstream. The control of the widely variable natural flow of water in order to cause the passage of regulated quantities at a planned rate through the very large United States facilities is what produces the valuable downstream benefits. It has been agreed in the treaty that the Canadian storages will be put in the most favourable position in the attribution of benefits to storage. In the terms of engineering science, this is described by giving the Canadian storages "next added" position in the credit that is to be given to our 15.5 million acre-feet in regulation for downstream benefits. By agreeing that our storages have that position, the United States has agreed, in effect, that their benefits shall be of the largest order that this storage can achieve. This is a point of very great importance in ensuring the maximum share of power for Canada.

To give some idea of the magnitude of the power benefits I am advised that the Canadian share attributable to the storages and delivered to load centres in British Columbia will amount to 6.856 billion kilowatt hours per year and to a firm electrical capacity of 1,-118,000 kilowatts. Table 2 attached gives a detailed example of the power benefits to be received in a sample year.

There has been some confusion concerning the sharing of the downstream benefits because figures released in Portland, Oregon, on October 19, 1960, dealt with the question in a somewhat different way than figures released here have done. I want to make it quite clear that I am not suggesting that those figures were inaccurate. I am advised that, so far as Canadian information goes, they are entirely accurate. Moreover, on the extent of the downstream power and its division between the two countries they are entirely consistent with the figures released here. The problem is to analyse them without a knowledge of electrical engineering. In order to help clarify what has been a point of uncertainty table 3 has been prepared and is attached hereto.

The power that Canada secures from the treaty projects will not only be great in quantity, but it will also be low in cost. The treaty provides that the United States will deliver the Canadian share of the power free of charge at a point on the Canada-United States boundary near Oliver, British Columbia. They will also provide stand-by transmission facilities at a cost of $1.50 per year for each kilowatt of Canadian capacity. These stand-by facilities will make it unnecessary for British Columbia to incur substantial costs that would otherwise be necessary to build an additional line to ensure the regular delivery of the power to Vancouver. As a result of all these factors it is estimated, on what I am advised is a conservative basis, that the Canadian share of power can be delivered at load centres in the lower mainland and interior at less than 4 mills per kilowatt hour.

The United States will, of course, secure an equal amount of the increase in power brought about there by the control of the Canadian storages. In considering the cost of this power to the United States, it is important to bear in mind that, although they do not now have to make new expenditures equal to those in Canada to secure this power, this is only because the United States has already expended upwards of $2 billion at 1957 prices on plants and developments on the Columbia river in their country. As I have said, it is only because this investment has been made that the increase in downstream power from Canadian storage is possible.

The securing of downstream benefits from the Canadian storages is only the initial stage of the results that will flow from the Columbia river development. It will be possible later on to instal generators at the dam near Mica creek and also, as the power requirements of British Columbia justify it, to construct additional plants downstream in Canada to make use of our regulated flow of water.

The treaty makes provision for flexibility in the plans under which our storages will be regulated. As power generation facilities are installed on the Columbia river in Canada it will be possible to devote steadily greater proportions of the stored water to increasing power generation in Canada and the United States jointly instead of in the United States alone. There will thus be a shift of emphasis in the future from shared downstream benefits to Canadian power production. While the nature and timing of Canadian power plans cannot be definite at this stage, I am advised that it seems reasonable to estimate that the Columbia river development will ultimately produce 20.2 billion kilowatt hours of power each year in Canada over and above the 6.856 billion kilowatt hours that is our initial share of downstream benefits. It is estimated that the average cost of this entire block of power delivered at British Columbia load centres will still be approximately the 4 mill figure that I have mentioned.

While these later developments cannot, as I have said, be scheduled at this time the character of the projects and the magnitude of the power they would produce can be calculated. Table 4 lists these possibilities.

In order that the full magnitude of the investment in the initial phase of the program may be understood, I should mention, as the tables will disclose, that in addition to the $345 million for the storages that I have already referred to, there will be investment in new transmission in British Columbia to an estimated cost of some $114 million. The total investment in the first phase will thus amount to about $458 million. The ultimate investment to provide for a full development of the kind I have referred to could be in the vicinity of $1.5 billion.

I have dealt thus far with only one aspect—although the largest aspect—of the advantages that will flow from the Columbia river development. I have spoken entirely of power. The regulation of the flow of water in Canada will provide other benefits through the reduction of the danger of serious floods in the United States. Under the treaty Canada will receive a substantial return for this service.

I mentioned that the three Canadian storages will impound a very large quantity of water of which 15.5 million acre-feet will be operated under agreed plans for the optimum production of power in the Columbia river basin. Of these 15.5 million acre-feet, 8,450,000 acre-feet will be handled from time to time under agreed flood control plans. These will be designed to control the flows of water downstream in the United States so that they will, at the flood periods, not exceed 800,000 cubic feet per second at The Dalles, Oregon. This plan of operation for flood control will continue for 60 years. In return for this service the United States will make payments to Canada upon the commencement of operation of each storage dam. These payments will be calculated on the basis that Canada is entitled to a return equivalent to 50 per cent of the estimated damage that is prevented to downstream developments as they would stand in 1985. The calculations are complicated and involve a number of assumptions, but they have been established to the satisfaction not only of the engineers but of the financial experts on both sides. As the payments for the full amount of the service over the entire 60 years will be made to Canada in lump sum on the completion of the various storages, they will help substantially in the financing of the dams. The treaty calls for the dams on the Arrow lakes and near Duncan lake to be completed in five years from the ratification date. The dam at Mica creek is larger and its completion is not called for until nine years from the ratification date. The total of the flood control payments to be made at the five and nine year completion dates is $64.4 million in United States funds. In order to enable the completion schedule to be maintained the treaty calls for the construction of all three dams to begin as soon as possible after the ratification date.

While I need not enlarge on the obvious advantage of the very substantial lump sum flood payment in helping with initial financing, I think I might point out that this is not the whole story. If the payment is invested in the projects, it is not an obligation to repay and it bears no interest. The saving from that fact is very great. It can be demonstrated by assuming that the money invested in the projects earns money at a low borrowing rate over the amortization period. The end result is a value to Canada over a 50-year period of $190,200,000. There is attached a table on this matter (table 5).

During the 60 years that the agreed flood control plan is to operate, Canada will also stand ready to provide additional flood control on an "on call" basis if it is required. For this service Canada will be paid $1,875,000 on each of the first four calls up to a total of $7.5 million. This amount is related to a plan that was originally contemplated in the progress report on September 28, 1960, but which has now been varied in order to provide greater freedom for Canada to use the stored water for power production. In addition to the cash payments that I have referred to, Canada will also receive compensation—in cash or in power at our option —for any loss in power that may be suffered through the control of water to avoid flooding beyond the primary flood control objective. This is a compensation that was not originally provided for in the progress report and is an improvement from the Canadian point of view.

The dams that are contemplated will have a life and usefulness well beyond the 60 years of the flood control plan. After that time Canada has agreed, so far as existing facilities may then permit, to provide flood control for the United States to the extent that the flows of water down the Columbia from Canada continue to constitute a flood hazard. If any call is made for such flood control after the 60-year period the United States is committed to pay Canadian operating costs, together with compensation for any economic loss to Canada that results. Any losses in Canadian power may be taken by Canada in power, rather than in cash.

I have dealt with the three storage dams planned in Canada. There is a fourth major storage contemplated under the treaty which would involve construction in the United States and some flooding into Canada. This is the storage on the Kootenay river in Montana that has been referred to as the Libby dam. Under the treaty the United States will have five years from the ratification date to decide whether it wishes to build this dam at its own expense. If it exercises this option, the treaty requires Canada to make available the land in Canada that is needed for the reservoir. This land would cost, it is estimated, from $7 million to $12 million. In return for that, Canada would secure all the increase in power capacity that results on the lower Kootenay river after it has reentered Canada below the Libby dam as well as valuable flood protection. It is estimated that the gain in power in Canada will amount to between 250,000 and 300,000 kilowatts. The United States, which meets the entire cost of the dam, will secure the benefis that accrue on their side of the boundary. For purposes of convenience, the tables that I have submitted give an indication of the results for Canada if the Libby option is exercised.

The treaty makes provision for a number of diversions of water that may be made by Canada from the Kootenay river in its natural course in different circumstances and at different times. It will be possible, even if the United States exercises its option to build the Libby dam, to divert 1.5 million acre-feet of water per year from the Kootenay river in Canada into the head waters of the Columbia river to increase power production in Canada. It will not be advantageous to do this until generators have been installed on our part of the Columbia, which will not be for some years. This right, is exercisable by Canada at any time after 20 years from the ratification date. If the United States does not exercise its option to build Libby dam, the treaty provides that Canada has the immediate right to make a major diversion from the Kootenay river into the Columbia river that would send approximately 90 per cent of the flow down that course. There are also provisions for major diversions at the end of 60 and 80 years even if the United States has built the Libby dam. The permanent rights of Canada to the free use of the waters of the Kootenay river are thus protected.

I might emphasize at this point that the position of the boundary waters treaty of 1909 has been kept very much in mind in recent negotiations. The applicability of that treaty to the Columbia has been preserved to the fullest extent consistent with the great and beneficial developments envisaged in this new treaty and our rights under the boundary waters treaty have been completely protected against the time when the new treaty may approach an end. The application of the boundary waters treaty to other waters along the international boundary will, of course, be unaffected by the Columbia river treaty.

The outline I have given of the main features of the construction projects and returns to Canada under the Columbia river treaty has, of necessity, been brief and general. A study of its terms and of the tables I have submitted will fill in much of the detail. There is one further matter, however, on which it might be useful for me to provide some information that will help in an evaluation of the proposed development.

I mentioned that the principle of sharing downstream benefits is basic to the treaty. I also mentioned that while, in the initial phase, the main power advantage to Canada will be downstream benefits returned by the United States, there will be a steady shift in later years to power produced in Canada. Of the three Canadian storages, those in the Arrow lakes and near Duncan lake will provide the major returns in the early years, because their value is largely for downstream benefits. The great dam near Mica creek will produce its largest advantages in the later phase because it makes possible very great power production in Canada. The costs of the Arrow lakes and Duncan lake storages are so low in relation to the power return they secure that they can, in effect, go a great distance toward easing the burden of the Mica costs in the early years before its full benefits come in. Similarly our returns from the Libby dam, if it is built, will come at a very small cost. I have a table (table 6) that shows the large accumulations of revenue that can be made in the early years from the sales of power deriving from the Arrow lakes and Duncan lake storages and downstream from Libby in Canada. These figures are all on the basis that the power is sold at the 4 mill figure I have referred to. The other assumptions are shown and all are, I believe, conservative.

This table shows that, on the basis I have mentioned, the dams at Arrow lakes and Duncan lake as well as the new transmission to return the downstream power, together with the new facilities on the lower Kootenay, can be fully paid for in accumulated revenues by about 1983. The interest on the earned revenues of these projects can more than offset their total annual costs by 1991. The table is based on a decline in downstream power benefits at that time which may or may not occur to the extent assumed. In no event, however, can the projects after that point be net losers. They will, moreover, have served their purpose in securing great amounts of low cost power in the early years and in assisting to make the Mica dam possible and thus ensuring its enormous benefits in later years.

Implementation of the program under the treaty will require the designation of responsible operating entities in both Canada and the United States. In the case of Canada it is expected that the operating entity will be the British Columbia Power Commission. There will also be a permanent engineering board, consisting of two members appointed by Canada and two by the United States, to make periodic inspections, to require reports from the operating entities and generally to watch the operation of the plans provided for by the treaty. The board will report to the governments of Canada and the United States whenever there is a substantial deviation from the hydroelectric and flood control operating plans. The board will also have additional functions including that of assisting in the reconciliation of any differences on technical or operating matters.

If the entities cannot reconcile any differences that arise between them with the help of the permanent engineering board, or if there are other unresolved differences, the treaty provides that either party to the treaty—that is, either Canada or the United States—may refer the matter to the international joint commission. If the commission does not render a decision within stipulated times, either party may submit the difference to an arbitration tribunal. There is also provision for alternative procedures, if they are agreed on, including reference to the international court of justice.

The treaty, if ratified, will remain in force for a minimum of 60 years, terminable on 10 years' notice by either party. There are, however, as I have mentioned, special provisions that extend beyond the minimum 60-year period in relation to flood control and certain diversions of water from the Kootenay river.

I have dealt only with the highlights of this extensive and complex agreement. The government will, of course, submit the entire treaty for consideration by the parliament of Canada and for its approval before ratification takes place. The timing of ratification will depend, so far as Canada is concerned, partly on action by British Columbia. So far as the government of Canada itself is concerned, we would be prepared to initiate action for parliamentary approval and subsequent ratification at once. The significance of this treaty, and the program contemplated by it, for the economic development of Canada is such that any undue delay would be most unfortunate.

The government of Canada has made it clear to the government of British Columbia that it is prepared to join on an equal basis in the financing of the construction costs of the storage dams I have referred to. It has been made clear that we are prepared to do this on a basis that will call for repayment, not on a fixed schedule but as returns are earned through the sale of power. That offer is still open. My colleague the Minister of Finance has made it clear that he stands ready to meet the premier of British Columbia in order to discuss the offer at any time that may be mutually convenient.

In conclusion, the treaty that is being signed today is without precedent in the relations between nations. It represents a new level of co-operation for mutual advantage. Without the proposed agreement neither country could secure benefits for its people equal to those that can be realized through the action that the treaty contemplates. The treaty is, I believe, fair and equitable to both parties. Its implementation will be a splendid example of co-operation between neighbours. It will also through the great investment involved and by reason of the low cost power it provides serve as a most important stimulus to the Canadian economy.

Other power benefits are realized by the United States at the Libby project and downstream in the United States from Libby, and by Canada at the West Kootenay reach in Canada downstream from the Libby and Duncan lake reservoirs.

[1] This table is an expansion of a table appearing in the "Analysis and Progress Report" issued by the United States Columbia river negotiators on 19 October 1960.

[2] There is no additional energy in this column for the United States as a result of the construction of the Canadian storage. What happens is that energy presently available but not sure at worst possible flow conditions becomes sure at all times, i.e. "firmed up".

Totals	64,400,000	190,200,000

TABLE 6

The assumptions used in the calculations for the attached table (which in most respects are less favourable to Canada than is likely in fact to be the case, especially in relation to numbers 2, 6 and 8) are as follows:

(1) High Arrow lakes completed or partially completed by 1965; Duncan lake completed by 1966; Libby completed by 1967; extensions to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting generation facilities in the West Kootenay area completed in 1969 and further facilities (the canal plant) completed in 1970.

(2) No market in the United States for surplus Canadian downstream benefits.

(3) Power sales in Canada made at 4.0 mills per kilowatt hour.

(4) An 8 per cent annual load growth in British Columbia. This is based on load forecasts excluding special industrial loads such as Kitimat.

(5) An interest rate of 5½ per cent applied to both construction costs and accumulated operating benefits or deficits.

(6) No co-ordination agreement with the United States and thus a continuing annual charge of $1.50 per kilowatt for downstream capacity benefit stand-by transmission.

(7) Capacity benefits traded for energy benefits at the rate of 1.65 kilowatts of capacity for 1.00 kilowatt years of energy, giving an end result at a 70 per cent load factor.

(8) An average reduction in downstream benefits of 100 million kilowatt hours annually in the 1970 to 1985 period and a reduction of 169 million kilowatt hours annually in the 1986 to 2010 period.

NOTES: [1] This analysis does not include Mica which, in addition to its substantial downstream benefit advantage under the treaty will make possible very large power production in Canada.

[2] Cost of Libby flowage in Canada added in 1966.

[3] Annual transmission costs include the $1.50 per k.w. paid to U.S. for stand-by downstream benefit transmission.

[4] Interest on accumulated benefits has exceeded annual costs at this point. Interest will continue to increase and costs will continue to decline from here on. The profitability of the projects is thus assured. Substantial power benefits will continue to be derived.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 19, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that consequent upon the notification of a vacancy in the representation given in this house on Wednesday, January 18, 1961 by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Tucker), and pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, I have addressed my warrant to the chief electoral officer for the issue of a new writ of election for a member in the electoral district of Kings.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—TABLING OF REPORT OF NEGOTIATORS

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of the report of the negotiators appointed to negotiate a treaty with the United States for the co-operative development of the Columbia river. It is a very short report, and if hon. members wish it might be printed as an appendix to Hansard or reproduced in Votes and Proceedings.

I should mention that a copy of the treaty which the negotiators recommended was attached to the original report. I am not attaching a copy because the treaty itself has already been tabled in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that the report tabled by the Minister of Justice be printed as an appendix to Hansard of today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of document above referred to, see appendix.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COLOMBO PLAN—ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO INDIA

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief announcement to make concerning assistance to India under the Colombo plan. Out of the $50 million appropriated for Canada's participation in the Colombo plan for the fiscal year 1960-61, an amount of $25 million has been allocated for capital assistance to India.

Discussions have been proceeding with the Indian government on the projects which might be financed out of this grant. I am now in a position to inform the house that Canada has agreed to provide the following economic assistance to India under our Colombo plan program for 1960-61: Wheat to the value of $7 million; aluminum, copper and nickel to the value of $11.7 million; a final allocation for completion of the Canada-India atomic reactor in the amount of $600,000; an initial allocation of $3½ million for stage 3 of the Kundah hydroelectric project.

Our agreement to these allocations brings Canadian Colombo plan assistance to India already approved under 1960-61 appropriations to a total of $22.8 million.

The wheat has already been shipped in order to have it cleared from Canadian ports before freeze-up on the St. Lawrence seaway. Arrangements are being made to have the non-ferrous metals shipped without delay.

As is the usual practice in the case of commodities, the Indian government has agreed to set aside counterpart funds in local currency equivalent to the value of the Canadian grant. These counterpart funds will be spent on economic development projects in India to be agreed upon between the two governments. The Canadian wheat will of course be most helpful to India in meeting the food requirements of her growing population which cannot be met from local sources. The metals will assist Indian industry to maintain production and enable development plans to go forward in the face of an acute shortage of foreign exchange.

The Canada-India atomic reactor near Bombay has now been completed, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs represented Canada at the inaugural ceremonies which were held on January 16. The allocation of $600,000 to this project in the current fiscal year is required to cover final expenditures on the Canadian share of the cost of the reactor.

Canada's participation in stage 3 of the Kundah hydroelectric project in Madras state represents a continuation of Canadian interest in this major Indian development scheme, since we have already made a substantial contribution to stages 1 and 2. The first two stages were formally inaugurated yesterday, January 18, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs also represented Canada at these ceremonies. Additional power from the Kundah project is urgently required for agricultural and industrial development in south India. Canada has, therefore, agreed to provide Canadian equipment, material and engineering services representing the foreign exchange costs of the third stage of Kundah.

This year's allocation of $3.5 million will cover the first instalment of the Canadian contribution and, subject to the appropriation of funds by parliament, further allocations will be made in future years up to an estimated total of $22 million. In addition, Canada has agreed that India should use counterpart funds to the equivalent of $25 million, accruing from the sales of Canadian commodities previously provided to India, to defray the local costs of the Kundah scheme.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by the minister has to do, of course, only with assistance given by Canada to India under the Colombo plan. I presume from what the minister has said that India continues to be the largest beneficial recipient of Canadian assistance under the Colombo plan.

Mr. Green: Yes. India gets one half.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That has always been the situation and that continues to be the situation—

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —largely because India was among the first of the recipients, along with Ceylon and Pakistan.

The minister has referred to a number of forms of assistance some of which, like the atomic reactor at Bombay and the hydro-electric project in Madras state, are continuing projects. Significance will be attached to the continuing assistance in respect of the atomic reactor, which was participated in by Canada on an equal basis with India, at a time when assistance was being given by the United States in the establishment of atomic installations in the Philippines. This is further evidence, of course, of Canada's interest in helping certain countries which require this assistance. In this way we are making a constructive contribution to the friendly relations that we hope will prevail among all nations.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the minister was interesting and, of course, welcome to the house, although there was nothing particularly new in it by way of new policy or different policy. It was merely an outline of the way policy announcements, made on previous occasions, are being carried out. I am sure that every member of this house, and every Canadian, will support this kind of policy to help our sister nation in the commonwealth, and by this means assist the growth of democracy in that area and lift the living standards in India.

I just want to say, speaking for this group, that I think the government should raise its sights and consider a very great expansion of Colombo plan funds for this kind of program. The minister has said some $7 million worth of wheat is to be shipped to India. He did not tell us how many bushels that would represent, but I assume it would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of four million bushels. He said this was to take care of needs that could not be provided locally.

I remind the minister that the United States is doing much more for India in this way. There is an agreement whereby the United States will provide some 146 million bushels of wheat a year under a loan-gift plan. I would suggest that Canada should raise its sights. To do this would help India strengthen democracy and would help take up the slack in our own economy.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HARDIE—REFERENCE TO TELEVISION STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Last night on a nation-wide T.V. program "The Nation's Business" the Prime Minister made the following statement:

> In the Yukon and Northwest Territories, projects have become realities which were glibly dubbed as merely visionary a few years ago. Four thousand miles of access roads and two thousand miles of development roads are being built to tap new and known resources which otherwise would be delayed for years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hardie: My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is this. The Prime Minister in this statement is misleading the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member claims as a question of privilege the fact that he does not agree with a statement made by the Prime Minister, I think he is extending the question of parliamentary privilege far beyond what was ever intended. The statement, so far as the words which the hon. member has read are concerned, does not seem to me to involve any of the privileges of any of the members of the house or of the house itself. Any member is at liberty to make a statement outside the house. If an hon. member disagrees with what is said, and it does not involve him personally, then that is a matter for debate, not a question of privilege.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Speaker, I do not disagree with the statement except that the facts represented to the people are not true.

Mr. Speaker: That, as I have already told the hon. member, in my opinion, does not involve a question of privilege.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not propose to raise a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, on the statement by the hon. member. I simply say the hon. gentleman took advantage of this house and its privileges to make the statement that the ideas I advanced were misleading. They were factual.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised his question of privilege, the member concerned has commented on it, and if there is anything further to be said I suggest that it be said in the way of debate at the appropriate time.

Mr. Hardie: Closure.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will have to withdraw that word because it is a reflection on the Chair, and that is something that cannot be permitted.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I made this reflection on the Chair. However, after my question of privilege was ruled out of order by Your Honour I think the Prime Minister had no right to make the statement he made.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the hon. member has expressed his regret at having used the word and that we can consider the matter closed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PERSONNEL OF SELECT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER GREATER DISPATCH OF BUSINESS

Mr. John Pallett (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister) moved:

That the select committee on procedure appointed January 18, 1961 be composed of Miss Aitken and Messrs. Argue, Churchill, Crestohl, Fulton, Flynn, Macquarrie, McCleave, McGee, McIlraith, Meunier, Pallett, Pickersgill, Rea and Ricard.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED STATEMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER ON TELEVISION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can confirm to the house a statement he made over the air last night, namely that unemployment has been less in comparative terms in Canada than in the United States of America. If so, would he give us his basis of calculation in making that statement?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any time the hon. gentleman wishes to debate this question he may do so, but a question such as this one on the orders of the day is improper.

Mr. Hellyer: Just give us the facts.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the reply just given by the Prime Minister and the reply he gave yesterday to a question of mine, may I ask him this question. Is he not aware that the system of measurement employed in the United States is that employed in Canada, both systems conforming to the recommended standard of the international labour office?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman had studied the matter a little bit more carefully than his question would now indicate, he would realize the fact that in the United States there are differences and they are of great importance. In addition to that fact there is in the United States a call-up which takes from the labour pool men for service in the armed forces.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the Prime Minister not aware of the fact that the system employed in Canada and in the United States is that recommended by the international labour office, which means that both systems are identical?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: Wrong again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the truth; and you added yesterday—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: This seems to me to be a subject of debate, and I suggest that it might be pursued at the appropriate time.

[Later:]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the position taken by the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary secretary that there is no recession, would the Prime Minister explain what he meant last night when he talked about the recession which we are in, which could have been foreseen in 1957?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have never had a greater tribute paid to me by the opposition than today. It indicates that what I said last evening, for the purpose of giving the Canadian people the facts, has hurt the hon. gentlemen.

ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED EVICTION NOTICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister or his department received reports that unemployed people are being sent notices of eviction from their homes in Elliot Lake because of their inability to keep up their mortgage payments?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I have received no such reports, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

LOW RATIO OF SUMMER JOBS GIVEN TO QUEBEC STUDENTS BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Is the minister aware of an article published in today's issue of Le Devoir concerning the small number of summer jobs made available to the students of the province of Quebec? Could the minister also inform us whether the government intends to take action in order to correct this situation?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the article referred to by my hon. friend has come to my attention. I must say that in general the various departments try to deal in all fairness with French-Canadian students and meet, as far as possible, the requirements of the various universities.

(Text):

UNEMPLOYMENT—REFERENCE TO NEW YORK SPEECH BY FINANCE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Finance if he succeeded in convincing his audience in New York yesterday that the Americans were to blame for unemployment in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the minister would not hesitate to reply, but it seems to me the question is hardly appropriate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor was the speech.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH UNION REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys arising out of the reported continuing lay-offs in the coal mines of Nova Scotia. Is the minister in a position to inform the house whether he has received a request from the representatives of the united mine workers union, district 26, to meet with him on this important subject, and will the minister say whether he will meet with this delegation some time today?

An hon. Member: Keep up to date; they are in the gallery.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, if the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) would look in the gallery, he would see them all there.

An hon. Member: He would not recognize them.

Mr. Comtois: I will be very pleased to see them in my office right after the question period.

Mr. Argue: Since the welcome delegates are in the gallery, I wonder if the minister can give them some assurance that he will have a policy to present to them to maintain employment in the coal mines, as the government has promised.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has too much experience not to know that his question is out of order.

Mr. Argue: It is very much in order.

THE CENSUS

FORM OF QUESTION RESPECTING RACIAL ORIGIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he is aware of a unanimous resolution passed by the legislative assembly of the province of Quebec asking that the printed words "Canadian" and "American" as racial origins be removed as a possible answer to question 10 of the forthcoming census; and what action does the government intend to take with reference to it, if any?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to the first part of the question the answer is in the affirmative. As to the second part, government policy, as the hon. gentleman knows, is announced when it is considered appropriate to do so.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister and inquire whether, when the Associate Minister of National Defence was speaking recently at Chicoutimi he was giving the views of the government when he said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: —that the absence of the names of countries of French origin as a possible answer to question 8 of the forthcoming census was an unpardonable anomaly?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the quotation referred to and I do not intend to make any observations on a statement that is uncorroborated.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was just in the press.

[Later:]

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and ask if he can inform the house whether the government has decided to appoint a committee of experts to study the possibility of removing the printed word "Canadian" as a racial origin as an answer to question No. 10 in the forthcoming census, as reported in last night's issue of Le Droit.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member perhaps did not hear an earlier question on the same subject matter which, if I am not mistaken, covered the same ground.

Mr. Bourget: I think this is a very different question from the one asked by the hon. member for Laurier. My question has to do with the formation of a committee of experts who will study the question of removing that word as an answer to question No. 10.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The same answer applies as to the earlier question, Mr. Speaker. Government policy in this regard will be announced when it is considered proper to do so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—PROTEST OVER REPORTED TREATMENT OF CANADIAN STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I made a promise to an indignant young lady who came to my office this morning—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Herridge: —and in view of my promise I ask this question. It is a somewhat borderline case, and I throw myself on your mercy, Mr. Speaker. My question is based on a newspaper report in today's Globe and Mail on page 4 under the headline:

Ontario Youth Involved. Claims Insult by U.S. Biologist Stages Fast.

In this report Professor Haldane is reported to have planned to introduce two young students, two young Canadians, to Indian scientists at a dinner, but when he went to get them at their hotel they told him United States information agency officials had forbidden them to attend and had insisted that they dine with an American.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that the responsibilities of the Secretary of State for External Affairs are very broad, and if he wants to encompass Mr. Haldane's dinner party in his administrative responsibilities I will not prevent him from answering, but it seems to me it is scarcely a matter under the responsibility of the minister.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Kootenay West will read this article again—if he has in fact already read it, which I doubt—he will find that the heading is not to be interpreted the way he is interpreting it. It reads:

Ontario Youth Involved

Then there is a larger heading:

Claims Insult by U.S., Biologist Stages Fast

According to my reading of this it was not the Ontario youth who was insulted but an Indian citizen who claimed to have been insulted by United States officials. This so-called insult, if it was an insult, was to a Professor J. D. S. Haldane who is the former chairman of the editorial board of the Daily Worker, the organ of the British communist party in the United Kingdom, which fact is mentioned in this same article. Professor Haldane went to India and took out Indian citizenship. It is the professor who claims to have been insulted and not the Ontario youth at all, so where we fit into the picture I do not understand.

Mr. Herridge: I want to say—

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member is getting senile.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herridge: —I quoted the heading of a Conservative newspaper.

LAOS—REASSEMBLING OF SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question arising out of a statement in a Reuter's dispatch attributed to the Prime Minister of India, which appeared in last night's Ottawa Journal, to the effect that Great Britain was the only country which had agreed to the reactivation of the international supervisory commission. I ask this question in the light of the statement made by the minister on Monday last.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it would be improper for me to comment on the report of a statement made by the Prime Minister of India. I do say this, however; that each of the countries concerned with this crisis has its own view as to the conditions under which the commission should be reconvened. I set out the Canadian point of view in my statement on January 16, which the hon. member will find at page 1062 of Hansard. What we are hoping will be arranged is that the two co-chairmen of the Geneva conference, namely the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, will ask that an exploratory mission be sent to Laos in an endeavour to obtain the consent of the Laotian king to the commission undertaking certain efforts in Laos designed to help bring about peace in that unfortunate country. Negotiations are still under way, and I am very hopeful that something of this kind can be worked out.

TRANSPORT

MONTREAL—BILINGUAL BILLBOARDS AT INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister inform the house whether representations have been made to airlines and lessees operating at the Montreal international airport, in order that their signs or billboards be bilingual?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all lessees have officially been requested to follow the example of the Department of Transport which has fully respected bilingualism at the Montreal airport and, in addition, verbal representations were made to those concerned. I am pleased to report that up to now results have been most satisfactory.

(Text):

PRODUCTIVITY COUNCIL

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF SETTING UP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the great importance attached to the matter by the government, may I ask the Prime Minister if he can give to the house any information about the probable date for the setting up of the council on productivity?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is under way at the present time. Naturally we are endeavouring to secure the best possible men and women for that council. We are considering the names not with regard to area or region, but are seeking to appoint those who in our opinion could best contribute to the discharge of the very important and heavy responsibilities attendant on the membership of that council.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN MEDICAL FEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would his department be prepared to review its scale of fees paid to private practitioners for medical services supplied to Indians on its behalf, and consider an increase in these rates?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this scale of fees is being studied at the present time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

HOCKEY—REQUEST FOR FULL COVERAGE OF SATURDAY EVENING GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue and ask him if he would convey to the management of the Canadian broadcasting company the desire of many Canadians to have all the periods of the hockey games broadcast and televised on Saturday nights.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the minister spends half his time in conveying to the corporation the wishes and prejudices of the Canadian public with respect to the programs of the C.B.C. I shall be very happy to convey to the corporation this request, which is not original; and I should also appreciate some constructive suggestions from the hon. member as to where the C.B.C. will obtain funds to replace those lost through the cancellation of those programs which would have to be cancelled during this period.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REPORTED BEATING OF MR. LUMUMBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which question originated in the mind of the hon. member for Kootenay West. I apologize for not sending him notice. My question is based on a headline in today's Globe and Mail, which headline I trust is correct:

U.N. Troops Look On As Lumumba Beaten By Katangan Police

In view of the fact that the Canadian government quite properly protested most vigorously the beating of Canadian troops by South Congo troops—I think at the time termed "Lumumba troops"—has the Canadian government protested against the beating of Mr. Lumumba while United Nations troops looked on, which is an injustice according to our approach to life?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no protest launched. It would keep us very busy if we were to protest all the beatings which take place in the Congo. I agree with the hon. member that it was an unfortunate incident.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTS OF C.N.R. AND T.C.A.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and ask him when he expects to table the annual reports of the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I cannot give the exact date, but I will let the hon. member know tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister propose proceeding with the setting up of the special committee that deals with the accounts of those two crown corporations although the annual reports will not have been tabled?

Mr. Balcer: Of course not, Mr. Speaker. We will form the committee and they will start sitting when the two reports are tabled.

GRAIN

FEED MILL AGREEMENTS WITH WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture, or in his absence to the parliamentary secretary. Could he tell us how many feed mills in the wheat board area have now completed agreements with the Canadian wheat board, enabling them to purchase grains outside the normal quota established for deliveries of grain? Could he also tell us whether this trade is confined to provincial boundaries? Will those mills entering into agreements be required to submit statements showing the extent of their purchases and sales of grain and grain products?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member had given notice he might have received an immediate answer. Otherwise, that type of question is much more appropriately put on the order paper, because it obviously requires some preparation and research in order to be answered.

REQUEST THAT FEED MILLS BE RETURNED TO WHEAT BOARD JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Prime Minister a question regarding a statement made earlier that action would be taken by the government if evidence was submitted showing that grain prices had reached a distress level in relation to purchases by feed mills. The Prime Minister replied that he had not at that time received a report from the national farmers' union. My question now is, has this report been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister? Has a further report which I received a few hours ago, pointing out a further distress price, also been brought to the Prime Minister's attention?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, upon my return to my office yesterday I found that the first report in question was on my desk. I think it was dated January 16.

Mr. Argue: January 13.

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, the hon. gentleman is ahead of me on the other one which he has just received. Apparently the report is sent to him before it is forwarded to me, or his mail service is better than mine.

Mr. Argue: Since the Prime Minister has now received the report, may I ask him what action the government is contemplating on the evidence put forward?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for an expression of the government's policy. As the Prime Minister has already pointed out today, it is not normally declared on the orders of the day.

Mr. Argue: If I may put it this way, what action is the government considering in the light of the statement made by the Prime Minister in this regard on December 22?

Mr. Speaker: The effect is the same. Of course if the Prime Minister wishes to answer he may do so, but I regard the question as one which asks for a declaration of policy.

HOUSING

REFERENCE TO REPORTED SPEECH AT MEETING OF HOUSE BUILDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising from a speech made by Mr. John R. Campbell at a meeting of Canadian house builders being held in Montreal at the present time, in which he is reported to have said:

> More than $31 million in new money for housing has already been produced through a secondary market for securities backed by N.H.A. mortgages—

We know that this matter has been the result of about six years of negotiation. The article goes on to state, and this is the basis for my question:

> One snag to the plan is finance minister Fleming's "baby budget" restriction on the flow of United States funds into Canada—

In view of the importance of this matter would the minister care to comment on it?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any comment on this statement is called for. It happens to be a statement made by an individual concerning a matter in which he is evidently interested. He is not speaking for the government or declaring government policy in any sense.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO LETTERS CONTAINING UNCANCELLED STAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. According to sections 209(e) and 553 of the postal rules and regulations, letters which contain uncancelled stamps must be treated as first class mail and stamped accordingly. Can the minister explain how thousands of letters sent out by Reader's Digest—and I have received one myself—containing uncancelled stamps, as is indicated by the window on the envelopes, have been accepted as second class mail and charged accordingly?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): As I remember them, the rules prohibit the giving of a legal opinion in this house and the asking for it. However, I shall be glad to look into the matter which has been raised.

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT TO PLACE CEILING ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-3, to amend the Interest Act.

He said: This bill, Mr. Speaker, is not a new one in this house. As a matter of fact I have moved this kind of bill now every year since about 1954. After having presented this proposition to parliament in the years immediately prior to 1956 I was able to get a great deal of support across the nation and a good deal of support from members of parliament, and as a result of growing public opinion at that time the government of the day took some steps toward controlling the interest rates charged by small loans companies on particular loan arrangements.

This is a very important question. It is something that affects hundreds of thousands of Canadians, and it would be of benefit to the thousands of families and the tens of thousands of people in this country who are on very low incomes.

The purpose of the bill, Mr. Speaker, is very simple. It would set by law—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether I might interrupt the hon. member and ask for better attention. There is a great deal of conversation and shuffling going on while the house settles down to debate. I hope hon. members will give their attention to the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I was saying the purpose of the bill is very simple. It would provide a statutory limit of 12 per cent on all interest rates charged in this country. As I was saying, in 1956 parliament took action to control within a certain range the interest rates set by small loans companies. The area of control affected by the measure of that day was all loans made by small loans companies up to a maximum of $1,500, and the limits on the interest rates were set as follows, as found in the act:

> The cost of a loan shall not exceed the aggregate of
> (a) 2 per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance not exceeding $300,
> (b) 1 per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance exceeding $300 but not exceeding $1,000, and
> (c) One half of one per cent per month on any remainder of the unpaid principal balance exceeding $1,000.

By this means there was a reduction in the interest rates that might be charged by small loans companies. Even with these changes in the interest rates, however, the business of the small loans companies has flourished. Business done by small loans companies in 1956 amounted to $343 million, and loans outstanding by small loans companies in September of last year amounted to $490 million. So, although there was a slight reduction in interest rates, these companies have flourished, have increased their business and have in no way been harmed by the measure that was passed at that time.

As the years have gone by the effect of this particular measure has been lessened because more and more small loans companies are going into the field of loans in excess of $1,500, and a small loans company making a loan in excess of $1,500 is able to charge any interest rate set forth by agreement, because loans larger than $1,500 do not come under the provisions of the act of parliament.

One of the purposes, therefore, of this particular measure is to bring under control all interest rates charged by small loans companies, and not leave control merely within the area up to $1,500. The whole purpose of the bill, of course, is much broader than this. It would apply to lending rates and interest charges by any loan company, by any firm providing instalment credit or by any individual making a loan.

The field of personal credit is exceedingly important in this country, is exceedingly large and is steadily growing. According to the Bank of Canada statistical summary for September, 1960 the total amount of money now on loan to consumers by finance companies and retail dealers comes to $2,253 million. For quite a period during 1956 and 1957 the amount of instalment or consumer credit in this country was relatively stable, but since 1957 there has been a steady, increasing growth in consumer credit. In 1957 credit in this field amounted to $1,968 million. In 1958 the figure was $2,030 million, in 1959 $2,205 million and in September, 1960, the latest figure available, $2,253 million.

Therefore the area of credit to which the bill would apply is steadily growing and is likely to continue to grow in the future, I suggest, even though we are in a very serious recession at the present time. I think the fact of the matter is that many people who have very little money and very little income are forced in such circumstances to go to small loans companies; therefore business in this particular field may increase at a time when there is very widespread unemployment.

The bill would apply to all the major fields of consumer credit. It would apply to credit obtained when financing automobiles. The general rate of interest charged on automobile financing is in the neighbourhood of 16 per cent to 19 per cent. These are the rates charged by the ordinary acceptance corporations doing business in this field. However, there are other fringe companies, smaller companies, fly by night companies, that are charging much higher rates, some of them fabulous and extortionate, and I will refer to this later.

The bill would apply to all instalment credit provided by retail firms doing business on an instalment basis. This is a very important part of credit in Canada, and it is running now in the neighbourhood of $258 million. Companies that sell goods on instalment credit are allowed by law to charge any interest rate they wish to apply to the particular purchase that is made. These interest rates range anywhere from 20 per cent to 50 per cent or more. Some of the large mail order houses in this country, Eaton's, Simpsons-Sears and others, very frequently charge rates of 15 per cent to 20 per cent, and the highest rate charged by Eaton's and Simpsons-Sears works out to 54 per cent per year, a fabulous rate for such reputable firms to be charging on this kind of credit.

Mr. Chown: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he give the house the authority for the figures he has just cited with respect to interest?

Mr. Argue: With respect to Eaton's and Simpsons-Sears, I do that on my own responsibility. I happen to have made the calculation myself. I made it years ago and I have repeated the statement in the house on many occasions. The arithmetic has never been successfully challenged. I suggest to the hon. member that he get hold of Eaton's catalogue or Simpson's catalogue and do the arithmetic, and inform himself and the house whether my figures are correct. I used these figures on a television broadcast one night and counsel for Simpsons-Sears was on the telephone a few minutes later telling me all the things that were going to happen. I have never heard from them since, so I presume they checked these statistics too. These are facts.

I want to be fair. The very high rate to which I have referred applies on the smallest purchase that can be made on credit. It is not the rate on every purchase, but it is the beginning rate. I think it is a shame that consumers should have to pay such a high rate, and through this bill I am suggesting that consumers should not have to pay any rate in excess of a maximum of 12 per cent per year.

I hope the government will take action in this field, and I do not know why they have not done so before. Even when we were putting forward a similar bill from the opposition side of the house in earlier years when a Liberal government was in power, we got no assistance or support from the Conservative members of the day. The Liberal party has been a party of high interest rates. The Liberal party has resisted the efforts that we have made to bring down interest rates.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not so.

Mr. Argue: My friend refers to Duncan MacTavish—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I did not.

Mr. Argue: My friend behind me, not the hon. member for Essex East. I know he would not want to refer to Mr. MacTavish with respect to this matter at this time, because I am sure he would not want to be responsible for doing that. However, as I was saying, the Liberal party has resisted the efforts that we have made—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That, of course, is not a fact.

Mr. Argue: —to bring down the maximum rate of interest to 12 per cent. I challenge the hon. member for Essex East to rise at the appropriate time and say how he stands on this question and how he would vote on this bill if it were brought to a vote.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have to catch a train this afternoon. I am going to my constituency, but I will deal with it right now.

Mr. Argue: All right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to say to my hon. friend that there is no one in this house who is a spokesman for the Liberal party who has castigated the government of the day for the high rate of interest—

Mr. Argue: How would you vote on this bill?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will make my own speech now that I have the floor.

Mr. Argue: No, you will not. Are you in favour of the bill or against it?

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want you to know that the Liberal party and the member for Essex East take second place to no party and to no man in this house in trying to arrange the financial burdens imposed on the Canadian people—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Answer the question instead of evading the issue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have the floor.

Mr. Speaker: I am beginning to think the hon. member for Essex East has the floor and that the hon. member for Assiniboia has finished. I take it that was not the intention of either party and when the hon. member for Essex East was allowed to answer a question—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman yielded the floor to the member for Essex East. Unless the member for Essex East is out of order, I do not believe anyone should interfere with his right to accept the opportunity which the hon. member for Assiniboia has given him. It is not open to anyone in this house, no matter what officer, to intervene on such an occasion. The only one who can withdraw my right is the member for Assiniboia, who can do so by complaining I am abusing the privilege he has extended. If he takes that position, then I will be prevented from making—

Mr. Speaker: I cannot see what the point of order is. If the hon. member for Essex East is claiming the floor, then I think I will have to give it to him although I did not recognize him. No member has the right to give the floor to another member. A member speaks on recognition by the Chair. Although the proceedings were somewhat irregular, they seemed to have been taken in good part and I do not propose to interfere with them unless a serious point is made of it.

Mr. Argue: I thank the hon. member for Essex East for carrying forward—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not finished.

Mr. Argue: —our gentlemen's agreement. Since he is taking an undue length of time to reply to a simple question and has failed to give me an answer, under the rules I am obliged to resume my speech.

The hon. member for Essex East has said he takes second place to no one in his sympathy for the people who are paying high rates of interest. What he should have said was that the Liberal party takes second place, a very close second, to the Conservative party in being the party of high interest rates, a party that has successfully maintained high, extortionate interest rates in this country—

Mr. Henderson: That is not true.

Mr. Argue: —for many years. I have been saying that the Liberal party was a high interest party. But even that party, bad as it was and bad as it is, did give consideration to the bill we presented in this house in 1955 and 1956. They gave consideration to the proposition and sent it to the banking and commerce committee. While the members of the C.C.F. did not agree that the Liberals had gone far enough, they did go a considerable distance in the face of opposition from Conservative members in introducing a measure of control in the small loans field. But this government has not—

Mr. Pallett: Would the member indicate where this opposition to which he adverts took place?

Mr. Argue: The speaker will understand when I say the Minister of Finance was one member of the committee who ran interference for the small loans companies, but he was not alone.

Mr. Pallett: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Assiniboia has the floor.

Mr. Pallett: He has made a very serious charge. He has suggested the Minister of Finance ran interference in the committee, and that should be withdrawn immediately.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is raising a point of order I will hear him. I understood he was simply disputing what the hon. member was saying.

Mr. Argue: I was there.

Mr. Pallett: So was I. The member is suggesting that the Minister of Finance, in a committee dealing with a certain reference some years ago, was running interference for the finance companies. Those are the words he used. I suggest they be withdrawn because they impute a motive or a course of conduct that is not in keeping with a member of this house.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt if there is any question of a breach of privilege there. Any member is entitled to espouse any cause he wishes in committee. I do not think there is any suggestion necessarily arising of improper conduct. If the hon. member is not satisfied I will reserve the point until the Minister of Finance is consulted. After all, he is the party concerned.

Mr. Argue: I was not imputing any improper motive to the Minister of Finance. I do not understand the thin skin of hon. members opposite—

Mr. Speaker: The matter might be considered disposed of; it is not a subject for debate under the bill.

Mr. Argue: I cannot understand the thin skin of members opposite—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: I am on another point altogether. I cannot understand the thin skin of members opposite when it comes to dealing with the question of the loan sharks, the racketeers, these people who have fleeced innocent Canadians by charging extortionate interest rates, thereby ruining the lives of many Canadians. I have ample evidence on my desk to support this statement, and I intend to refer to it. I do not understand, for the life of me, why the government does not take some action in this field. Why does the government allow interest rates which are legal—I am not questioning their legality—in this country but which are a disgrace to the nation? These interest rates have been and are being charged.

I have in my hand a copy of Liberty magazine for August, 1959. It contains a long story entitled "How Loan Sharks Put The Bite On". On page 58 an example is given of a Mr. and Mrs. Bert Thompson of Toronto, who paid $878.50 for a car they never owned. They made a down payment of $400 on the car and signed a contract to pay the rest at $36 a month. They paid $618 and had the car just six months. They then turned the car back because they were unable to meet their payments. The car was subsequently sold, and in spite of the large sum of money that had been paid, the Thompsons were left owing a balance of $262.50. I have not the time to give all the references in this article to this particular case, but it shows just what fabulous charges are made by some companies in this field.

I have in my hand an article that appeared in the Globe and Mail of April 28, 1960, entitled "Oakville Man Forced into Paying 87 Per Cent Interest on Second Mortgage". I ask hon. members opposite if they like this. I ask them if they are in favour of it. I ask them if they are opposed to this kind of legalized gangsterism. If they are, why do they not do something about it? The article goes on to say this:

> Reports of bonus payments for second mortgages in the Oakville-Trafalgar area brought to light yesterday the case of an Oakville man who was forced to pay effective costs of 87 per cent on a second mortgage for a three-year period.
> Three years ago, Edward Waddington went to his lawyer to make arrangements for the down payment on his new home. He had $2,000 in cash, and needed to raise $1,680 more on a second mortgage to make up the total required of $3,680.
> "When the mortgage came through, it was for $2,700," Mr. Waddington said, "bearing an interest rate of 6 per cent per annum."

"I thought when I got the papers that it was a typographical error," he continued, "that they had put down $2,700 instead of $1,700, but it wasn't."

Next month, when Mr. Waddington pays his final payment on his second mortgage, he will have repaid $3,186, or 187 per cent of the amount of money he actually got—$1,680.

Experts in the field of real estate report this fantastic cost for a second mortgage was probably not uncommon.

Are the members of the Conservative party in this house in favour of allowing a legal extortionate rate of 87 per cent, as in this example, to be continued in this country? Liberty magazine, the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Daily Star have all given a good deal of thought and publicity to this important problem. Pierre Berton had a series of articles in the Toronto Star in May of 1960. I have an example that I should like to put on the record, and I think it shows just how far some of these gangsters are prepared to go in extorting heavy charges from unsuspecting people. On May 2, 1960 Pierre Berton had this to say in part in one of his articles:

When he—

That is a certain person wishing a loan, namely a Mr. Huider.

—entered Quay Funding's offices he had two mortgages on his home. One had a year to run. The other was not due for almost three years. The total amount he owed on both mortgages was $6,130.19.

When the Lundy-Solnik company was through with him, Mr. Huider had two brand new mortgages on his house. And now he owed $8,795.

In order to get $200 in cash, Mr. Huider allowed Quay Funding to negotiate two new mortgages to replace two old ones. The "finance charges" for this transaction totalled $2,300. In addition, "recording charges" totalled $190. In addition, Mr. Huider must pay interest at 7½ per cent and 12 per cent, respectively, on the total value of the mortgages plus all the added charges.

This works out to a real interest rate of 18.3 per cent on his new first mortgage and a real interest rate of 34 per cent on his new second mortgage.

And all Mr. Huider has to show for this is $200 in cash from the people he asked to be his friend.

I'll repeat this for the benefit of those in the back who may not have thought they heard me distinctly:

Mr. Huider got exactly $200, plus the nebulous advantage of a slightly extended period in which to pay his debt. In January, he owed $2,665 more on his house than he owed in December. His monthly payments and his interest rates are now higher than they were before he applied for his loan.

I find this almost unbelievable, but I have the loan agreements and the reporting letter from Quay Funding before me, and I have had the mortgages checked. Mr. Huider is only dimly aware of what has happened. He still does not know what his real interest rates are.

There is something else, alas, that Mr. Huider is not aware of. His loan agreements call for him to make monthly payments of $90. This means that, in four years, when these new, expensive mortgages come due, Mr. Huider will have paid some $4,300 to the Lundy-Solnik firm.

Yet he will still owe more on his house then than he did when he first applied for a loan.

Last December he owed $6,130. Four Decembers from now, if he pays at this rate, he will owe about $7,300. He is paying more than 1,000 per cent interest per annum on his $200.

I ask my hon. friends opposite if they think they are justified in allowing this kind of extortionate practice to continue in our country. I think the government should take action in this field, Mr. Speaker. If the government took action in this field I think there would be other means by which credit could be obtained. If a few of these loan sharks decided that they did not wish to continue in business I would say good riddance, because it would be better to have firms charging 1,000 per cent interest out of business than in business continuing to charge such fabulous rates of interest.

We have credit unions which are doing a good job and which can do an even better job. We have in this country banks which, according to law, can make loans with an interest rate up to 6 per cent. I give the banks credit for having tried in recent years to develop their small loans field at a more rapid rate. I feel that some of the pressure and some of the publicity that has come from discussion in parliament have been instrumental in bringing the banks to exert a greater effort in this field. But it is also a fact, in my judgment, that the banks have cut some corners today by methods that are certainly not established as being legal, in order to bring about for themselves a much higher interest rate than the 6 per cent set forth in the Bank Act. There is on the record and there has been for sometime evidence that the rates are 9 per cent, 10 per cent or 11 per cent. I refer to the effective rates.

I have had sent to me an unsigned letter, but I should be happy to show it to anybody in the house. It sets forth in a detailed way the charges now being made by the Bank of Nova Scotia in the small loans field. The writer of this letter, whoever he may be, has come to the conclusion that the rates are some 12.6 per cent. I suggest that the government should have this practice checked and should inform the house whether in fact these rates are being charged. Certainly they are cutting corners. Certainly they are charging rates in excess of 6 per cent.

Mr. Broome: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Broome: I will make it short. Is the hon. member not in favour of the banks entering this field under these conditions that he has stated?

Mr. Argue: I am very much in favour of the banks entering this field.

Mr. Broome: Then why take up all this time?

Mr. Argue: I think they should enter this field in a legal way and not try to cut corners; that is all I am saying. I think they should not be charging 12.6 per cent interest, if this is a fact, and I am suggesting that the government check on the matter. I think they should not be charging 12.6 per cent interest when the law says the rate should be 6 per cent. If the banks require a higher interest rate in order to do business in the small and personal loans field, then this matter should be dealt with by parliament in a proper manner and particular rates should be set out for particular business. There should not be any of this practice of cutting corners and doing things that are not well established as being legal.

This discussion also took place in the banking and commerce committee some years ago, but at that time there was not evidence that some rates even in excess of 12 per cent were being charged.

Mr. Hodgson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Hodgson: Does the hon. member pay much attention to unsigned letters? All his argument has been based on a letter he received on which there is no signature.

Mr. Argue: I asked the government if they would check on the matter and see whether the Bank of Nova Scotia is in fact charging these rates of interest.

Mr. Hodgson: The hon. member does so because he received this letter with no signature on it.

Mr. Argue: Sometimes I would rather pay more attention to unsigned letters than to some statements made by some hon. members I could think of.

Mr. Hodgson: Yes, and yours included.

Mr. Argue: I am asking the government whether or not the Bank of Nova Scotia is charging this interest rate. This is something that the parliamentary assistant, I am certain, will make inquiries about, because I am sure the government would not condone this practice. It is a fact, of course, that the Canadian Bank of Commerce for many years has charged rates of 9 per cent and 10 per cent—there is no dispute about that—even though the rate in the Bank Act is 6 per cent.

We want action; we want the government to do something. I do not know why the government will not move in this field. They claim they are not afraid to bring forth legislation that will mean a new Canadianism. They are provoking Canadianism all the time. If they are doing this in a real and effective sense they should not be afraid to bring in legislation that will limit the charges that are made by finance companies in our country, since approximately 70 per cent of the business done by finance companies is done by companies that are wholly owned in the United States.

Why should we allow Canadian companies or any other companies the right to levy these extortionate rates of interest? This field is dominated by United States corporations. A government that has the attitude which this government has to outside capital from the United States surely should not be backward in doing the right thing, affecting all companies in this field, more particularly since 70 per cent of the business is in the hands of companies wholly owned in the United States.

I have given examples of some of the fabulous rates of interest that are being charged in this country. The thing that amazes me is that they are being charged in a legal manner, that this government has taken no steps to control these charges. I know it is going to be said that property and civil rights belong to the provinces, but long ago it was established that interest rates are under the control of this parliament, and every other charge that is associated with a given transaction has been interpreted as being an interest charge. Therefore this government has the right to legislate in this field.

I suggest that this government, badly in need of political support as it is at this time, badly in need of some moves that will carry some popular support, could do nothing better than extend the area of interest control and limit the interest rates along the lines I have suggested.

The banks can do a better job, the credit unions can do a better job, a bigger job. They are capable of doing it. I suggest that to allow a maximum rate of 12 per cent is allowing a rate, if anything, too high, but a rate surely that is adequate for normal, legitimate, efficient businesses to carry on their operations and make a return on those operations.

I have made forecasts in the past, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes I have been wrong. I am going to make one now. I hope I am wrong. My forecast is that when the time for adjournment comes tonight a Conservative member will be telling us, perhaps, some of the things that are wrong with this bill—maybe things very much unconnected with the bill—and carrying on the practice of talking out this measure. That is my forecast. I hope I am wrong.

I think the government should allow the members of parliament to vote on this bill. It would be very interesting to me to see how the Liberal members would vote on it. The hon. member for Essex East has announced his departure, with his own position unstated, after I had been courteous enough to give him adequate time to make his reply.

I would hope we would get some support from the Liberal party. I think this measure deserves the support of members of this house. I would like to see it come to a vote. The attitude of the Liberal party in the past was very often, "We do not agree with opposition bills", though we have seen some of their members vote for opposition bills. But in most instances—not every instance—Liberal governments of former days allowed private members' bills to come to a vote.

I challenge the government to take off the whip. I challenge the members of the Conservative party to give the house a chance to make a decision on a bill that I think is of extreme importance to the Canadian nation at this time. It is of importance in normal times; it is of greater importance when hundreds of thousands of Canadians have lost their jobs, when people are on very low incomes and may be forced, through family difficulties, into the hands of these loan sharks who can ruin them financially for the rest of their lives.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, once again we come to discuss what the sponsor of the bill has stated is a simple proposition. I agree that the purpose as set out is simple, but I must also contend that the implications are not as simple as they appear on the surface.

I have had the privilege of speaking on this bill on two or three previous occasions. Like hon. members from the other side of the house who have introduced this bill, I have been able to bring to the attention of this house and the country very serious instances where people have misused the second mortgage market. Perhaps as a result of having spoken in this house I have been the recipient of a great deal of literature pro and con this question. I must confess that the more I study this subject the more complicated it seems and the more confused I become. It is not quite as simple as the hon. member has stated.

I would like, in all fairness, before I deal with this matter to answer in part some of the things that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has stated. He has pointed out, and I think quite properly, some of the abuses that have been prevalent in the second mortgage field. He knows that I have brought similar instances before this house. But I think in all fairness he must admit that in 1960 legislation was passed in the province of Ontario, in an act known as the Ontario mortgage brokers act, where it is set out and required that people who are registering mortgages must set out in detail what are the interest rate, the bonuses, and so on. It is hoped that this will overcome the difficulties of people not knowing what they are signing. If they are over 21 years of age, can read and go to their lawyer, they can be advised. But if they refuse to do those things it is going to be difficult for us to help them.

That was one step in this direction, and it was a step within the jurisdiction of the provincial government. That is what the provincial government is doing. What is more, they are still investigating other instances of these irregularities that have been brought to their attention perhaps by members of this house and by writers such as Pierre Berton. I must advise this house that they are not sitting idle and letting these things go by. Incidentally, it is a Conservative government that is doing it.

Mr. Argue: They are allowing it to be done.

Mr. Morton: The hon. member says "They are allowing it to be done". They are doing whatever they can in their power to stop these practices. One of the difficulties confronting us today is the lack of recognition on the part of many people of the problems and complications involved in economic questions. The hon. member for Assiniboia brings forward many proposals, but until he realizes the complications involved and stops tarring everybody with the same brush his suggestions will be of no value in solving the problem.

The subject of interest and interest rates has been discussed many times in this house. As the result of discussions in years gone by we have on our statute books the Small Loans Act which came into effect in 1938-39 and was amended in 1956. There is also the Pawnbrokers Act and the Interest Act. What we are now dealing with are the weaknesses in this legislation which permit certain companies without ethics to prey on those who need money.

In dealing with this problem we have to consider what is the thing we call money. Some people consider it a commodity, others a means of facilitating trade, and still others consider it to be both. Interest rates are usually set by competition, the natural level at which money can be obtained in normal competition. When money is in short supply interest rates go up. Interest rates also vary in accordance with the risks involved. Hence, rates of interest on loans with collateral security are less than those without security, and interest rates on first mortgages are less than on second and third mortgages. These are basic assumptions.

The problem of interest rates is further complicated by monetary policy. In times of threatening inflation those who control the monetary policy encourage high interest rates in order to discourage the demand for money. Also, if money is in short supply interest rates may be increased by the demand. If there is too much money in circulation which is causing inflation there is a tendency for monetary authorities to encourage high interest rates. The more we study the problem the more confused we become and the more complicated we realize it is. A simple declaration by act of parliament that the rate of interest should not be higher than 12 per cent seems destined to failure when we consider the sense of balance of our complex economy.

The hon. member for Assiniboia in drafting this bill did not direct his attention to the economic theories behind the various forces which influence the rate of interest. The hon. gentleman, like many of us, is more impressed by and concerned with the abuses of greedy moneylenders. The buying public, being unaware and trusting, fall prey to encouragement to increase their debt, and thus overanxious consumers become committed to various loans.

This bill is an expression of a desire to protect people. It is prompted by the same motive which prompted the introduction of the other acts to which I referred which are on our statute books for the protection of the public. It is perhaps for the same reasons that the province of Ontario recently passed an act to protect people who have been involved in second mortgages and is continuing its investigation of the activities of certain unscrupulous moneylenders.

The sponsor of this bill appears to share the hope that people who wish to borrow on future earnings to pay for present needs should be able to do so at a lesser cost. Hence we are faced with two different approaches which are seemingly contradictory and conflicting. If we were to adopt the principle that people should be able to borrow all they want to buy whatever they wish and pay only a low rate of interest, one way to do this would be to create more money so that the money supply would be sufficient to meet the demand and interest rates would remain naturally low in a competitive market. On the other hand the government could go directly into the lending business and create the money it wished to loan at a low rate of interest.

I am not an economist. I can, however, foresee some of the consequences of a course of action of this nature on the value of our dollar. We would probably wind up with greater confusion, and perhaps we would create a greater hardship on the people we are seeking to assist.

However much we may speculate and dream about these things, we have to face the realities of the situation. We cannot create money at will, nor can we in our every day needs and requirements simply go out and buy everything we see just because we want it. We have to buy things in accordance with our needs and means. We should be astute enough as individuals not to sign contracts which are averse to us. If we do not know what these contracts mean or involve, we should be intelligent enough to have a friend or lawyer check them over. This is an important subject because of the implications it has relating to our whole economy.

The hon. member for Assiniboia set out some figures illustrating the scope of consumer credit in our Canadian communities. The dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin of November 16, 1960 shows that the balances outstanding on the books of sales finance companies at the end of September amounted to $1,245,500,000. Outstanding balances on consumer goods at the end of September were $849,200,000. Bank loans at the end of October last were $6,257,000,000.

In July of 1960 United States consumer credit stood at $53.5 billion. John Kenneth Galbraith in his recent book "The Affluent Society", page 201, sets out some interesting figures relating to the United States economy which may have some general application here. Between 1952 and 1956 total consumer loans increased from $27.4 billion to $41.7 billion, or by 53 per cent. In that time the disposable income increased by only 21 per cent. In other words the people of the United States seemed to be spending more money than they had available.

In the period to which I referred instalment credit increased by 63 per cent and that for automobiles by nearly 100 per cent. In 1955 one family in four with an income of between $3,000 and $4,000 bought automobiles, 69 per cent of them on credit. One family in three with an income between $4,000 and $5,000 bought automobiles, 66 per cent on credit. Those with income in excess of $10,000, in the majority, paid cash for their automobile purchases. There is no indication, however, as to whether some of these seeming cash transactions were in fact purchases made with cash borrowed elsewhere unknown to the seller of the automobile.

Both in our economy and that of the United States the question of consumer credit is of great importance. Because of that fact the finance and mortgage companies have moved in to fill a need. We cannot deny that there is a need, nor can we deny that there have been abuses. It is the duty of the government to study these things and try to eliminate the abuses. I differ from the hon. member for Assiniboia, who takes the examples of the abuses and then proceeds to paint everybody in the business with the same brush. I think he is doing a disfavour to those who are giving a service in the provision of consumer credit.

The hon. gentleman pointed out two or three groups that he feels can handle this better than others. But even at that perhaps he has been too broad in his accusations. I am not saying that the instances he gave are wrong, but I feel that they do not reflect the practices of the majority of those who are in the consumer credit business.

Before we come to the conclusion that 12 per cent is the easy way out of the difficulty and is the be-all and end-all, we have to realize that in coming to that conclusion there are costs involved. There are certain charges, and this bill, regardless of what the hon. member for Assiniboia says, cannot cover them. The hon. member made the statement, and I question it, that every charge can be interpreted as an interest rate. Unfortunately I have not the law before me, but it is my understanding that when the Small Loans Act was enacted and the control of charges was included in the act it was done with the permission of the provinces concerned. The hon. member shakes his head. I have no way of repudiating it; we will have to leave that for future examination.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether I may just say something to the hon. member. My statement, at least in part, was based on the evidence given by the deputy minister of justice before the banking and commerce committee back in 1956, when, at one place in the evidence in answer to a series of questions, he made it perfectly clear that in his view the federal government had the power to control all charges because that power flows from the undisputed power of the federal government to control interest charges, and it would not be controlling the rates if the government controlled the interest rate and a company could charge what was in fact a higher rate by calling it something else.

Mr. Morton: I think that points up the difficulty we are in, when we say that 12 per cent would be the most that could be charged. If other charges and costs amounted to 10 per cent of the 12 per cent, the interest would be only 2 per cent. If we were to add up the sum total of the cost to the person obtaining the loan under those conditions, it would not be any more than 12 per cent. We might be able to do that indirectly, but this brings up the point as to how practical it would be, because for some loans and in some places the charges for services are greater. It may be doing indirectly what you cannot do directly. This points out the constitutional difficulty.

As I say, in some provinces they are going as far as they can, and what they need is assistance. This sort of thing should not be done by the provinces and the dominion separately. I think the time has come when this whole matter, like many other matters in our economy and in relation to our constitution, must be dealt with by the provinces and the dominion together if we are to have effective legislation to meet the problem.

The hon. member mentioned a department store charging 40 per cent or 50 per cent on a purchase. That could be worked out in this way. Someone purchases something in a store for $30 and has to make his payments over a three months period at $10 a month. He is charged $2 interest. This amounts to 40 per cent per annum. Without explanation this seems to be an enormous charge, but to the person buying the article the $2 does not amount to very much, and he feels it is worth it. The same thing can be said of service given to a loan which costs $2 or something of that order. The loan is small. We cannot be too dogmatic in saying that the charges should be 12 per cent.

If the hon. member would read the act in conjunction with his bill, Bill No. C-20, he would realize that there is an anomaly there, because in one section of the act it is said that on a loan of $1,000 to $1,500 the total cost of the loan is less than 1 per cent per month, whereas in Bill No. C-3 the interest rate is 1 per cent per month. There is an anomaly there.

Mr. Argue: The rate is lower for the portion of the loan between $1,000 and $1,500 than is provided in this bill.

Mr. Morton: If you look at the statistics of the loans made you will see there are fewer loans in that field between $1,000 and $1,500. This is not so much because people do not want them in that amount but because finance companies do not find it profitable to make loans in that field. The field of loans over $1,500 is more profitable.

These are some of the difficulties connected with interest rates. There are various ways in which to set interest rates. You may have a 6 per cent interest rate on a monthly instalment contract. It could be 6 per cent per annum or it could be a 6 per cent flat add-on rate, or a flat 6 per cent discount rate. You may borrow $100 and pay 6 per cent, but you receive only $94. Therefore, in effect you are paying on that $94 almost 12 per cent. It becomes very complicated when you try to calculate actually what is the interest rate. That is what I am trying to point out to the hon. member. It is not as simple as he appears to make it to be. That is why it is most difficult to control these things.

Perhaps hon. members would be interested in knowing who are the people who make these purchases, or who purchase by this method. Let me give their occupations. According to a pamphlet put out by the federated council of sales finance companies, with headquarters in Ottawa, 13 per cent of the loans are made by proprietary and managerial groups; 5.9 per cent by professional people; 4.1 per cent by armed forces personnel; 6.2 per cent by farmers, fishermen and lumbermen; 5.8 per cent by salesmen and agents; 50.3 per cent by skilled and semi-skilled labour; and 14.7 per cent by clerical people and others. That gives a sort of cross-section of the people who need this assistance, and indicates its importance.

The question has sometimes been brought up whether we need regulations. Of course we do, and I should like to refer to an example in the United States. In a pamphlet called "Consumer Credit Facts For You", published by the bureau of business research, Western Reserve University, there is the following on page 16:

> Legislation has an important influence on maximum rates. Only five states set maximum rates for retail instalment financing transactions. In these states maximum rates vary from 24 per cent on new cars to 43 per cent on used cars. Evidence collected by legislative bodies indicates that corresponding maximums in uncontrolled states are at least 120 to 275 per cent.

So there is merit in legislation. We do not deny that, and there is all sorts of proof of it. The question is how best to regulate this field. The fact is that this problem raises many questions. Recently I received a pamphlet, which perhaps many hon. members also received, from Saunders Cameron Limited, 55 Yonge street, Toronto, containing suggestions concerning a royal commismission on Canadian monetary matters. Under the heading "Trust and Loan Companies" certain questions are raised which I think indicate that this is not a simple matter. Many people more learned than ourselves with respect to economic conditions are raising questions. The author of the pamphlet has this to say:

> Are the trust and loan companies satisfactorily fulfilling the place of the English or United States building and loan societies in Canada? Should there be close ties between such companies and chartered banks? Should there be any provision for Bank of Canada control over trust and loan companies and, if so, how can it be applied to companies under both federal and provincial charter? Many more questions can be imagined which should shed light on the place of these institutions in our structure.

With respect to finance companies this statement is made:

> Here we enter an area of conflict between the federal powers over interest rates and provincial powers over property and civil rights which might cover conditional sale agreements. Should the Bank of Canada be given powers over these companies and how they may be operated? How can companies with access to foreign funds be satisfactorily controlled on the same basis as domestic concerns? Would some form of taxation, exempting companies which are under or place themselves under federal jurisdiction, induce companies dealing in conditional sale agreements to operate in the same manner as loan companies where there are rules respecting interest rates, etc.?
> What about consumer credit interest rates? Do they affect the individual's willingness to borrow? Should they be spelled out as an annual rate of interest, or should it be recognized that some charges are legitimately made for investigation, etc., and morally not a form of interest? Are there abuses and how may they be prevented?

I think this points out the difficulty of the situation and the need of a genuine investigation into the matter. I think that in all legislation dealing with this matter we have to recognize the philosophy that we cannot legislate for, shall I say, the lack of morals and poor ethics of some people in our society. There is a limit to which we can go in protecting people. We can set up ground rules, but we cannot legislate that a person be good when he does not want to be good. If he wants to be a crook he will do all he can to get around the rules that we make.

The greatest protection that we might have in this field would be a better ethical code on the part of those involved in these activities. A similar question was raised in the winter edition of "The Canadian Banker", in which it is said in effect that if businessmen want to keep the government out of business through legislation, if they want to prevent the government from interfering with the details of their day to day business, they will have to improve the ethical code under which they operate because as they become less ethical in their business operations they invite the government to come into the field to try to control them.

I think that is perhaps pretty much the situation in the matter of consumer credit today. Many of these people have been unethical. We can only go so far in establishing rules, but there must be an ethical code established by responsible companies in the field and they should help the government to ferret out and put out of business those people who do not adhere to an ethical code. On page 29 of the article, which is written by Mr. A. Beedle, the author comes to these conclusions. I quote in part:

Business should therefore:

(1) Be willing to let government share in the guardianship of business conscience. Some desirable results can only be obtained through government action. State action acts as a stimulant of conscience. Business, however, should try to see that government does not entirely usurp its role. Business should not abdicate its role. Achieving this balance may be delicate...

(2) It should recognize and accept the beneficial aspects of countervailing powers and be willing to adopt readily measures for the common good, instead of regarding countervailing powers as always representing detrimental interests.

(4) It should not ignore religion. It does not have to back all Moral Re-Armament groups; it does not have to hand its conscience over to the religious authorities; but it should be willing to adopt as practical politics those measures of which it approves. It is too prone at the moment to pay mere lip service to or completely ignore religious principles.

(5) Above all it should educate and train in economic statesmanship. It should support studies in the universities and other academic institutions. It should set up its own study groups. It should make pronouncements on moral issues.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that the bringing forward of this bill by the hon. member for Assiniboia has provided an opportunity to disclose to the public those abuses that are prevalent and need to be rooted out. In bringing this matter before the house he has brought forward something that needs a great deal of discussion, and I think the debate should impress upon the government the need of further study as to the role of interest in our economy.

Although the purpose is laudable and the principle is simple, I feel that the application of the bill is not as simple as it may appear on the surface, but that should not deter us from studying the matter and bringing people here who know all the implications of interest with respect to the economy. We should be able to devise some method of control that is not too rigid and yet will be effective in dealing with those people who like to live by sponging off others who cannot afford it, people who do not know how to protect themselves, people who are in unfortunate circumstances not always through their own fault. They should, in some way, be protected. I agree in this respect with the sponsor of the bill, and to that end I have, on occasion, brought before this house examples of the things I felt were wrong, especially in the second mortgage market. I believe this has borne some fruit because I know some investigations have taken place in Ontario. The Ontario department has moved to remedy that situation and they are still investigating those who have been unconscionable in their activities.

I should like to urge upon our government and our cabinet the making of a study of the implications of the interest rate as it relates to the consumer credit field, that vast field in which people are dependent upon loans to assist them in buying the things they need. I think we should say the things they need and not what they want because they cannot afford everything they want. I believe the government should ascertain that these institutions which need to fulfil a vital role are filling that role at not too great an expense to those who need their services.

Mr. Gordon Chown (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I would preface my remarks by stating my sympathy with the point of view of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) who has pointed out the hardships people have to sustain as a result of the unethical and unscrupulous practices of these loan sharks and moneylenders in a field which has done so much to contribute to human unhappiness. I wonder if the loan companies who are under discussion here today because of the interest rates they charge had not filled this area in the money lending market, it would not have fallen to more unscrupulous and unethical operators?

This bill, presented by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is becoming an annual old friend. I do not doubt the honesty or sincerity of purpose of my hon. friend, and I commend the suggestion of the hon. member for Davenport that the situation would bear detailed study by a committee of this house from time to time. The great value of such a study would be that arguments could be refuted by the reputable people in this industry, by facts and figures, by specific cases and especially in terms of their own public relations.

All of us are aware of the very seductive advertising that has become a prelude to every Christmas and which is to some extent inflated and misleading to those who are on the receiving end. These people, not knowing better, soon find themselves lured to attend at one of these offices where they are offered a consolidation of their Christmas debts. I trust they are told not only what the net loan will be but what the gross cost of the loan may ultimately be. I am assured by reputable members of the industry that this is indeed their approach and that the interest rate is clearly disclosed. In many cases, it is disclosed in the area of the signature. I only hope the supplementary information is given, namely that you are borrowing $300 but you will be expected to pay $350 or $375 or whatever it may be. I have not precisely calculated that amount, I have only guessed at it.

The hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out that these companies have been flourishing since 1956. I think that was the date he used. I have before me a report from the department of insurance for the year ending December 31, 1959 which contains a chart listing the 77 finance companies. Of these 77 companies, 14 showed a loss and 63 showed a profit. There were 24 companies that had a profit of less than $10,000; nine had a profit of less than $20,000. Only 30 out of the 77 loan companies made a profit in excess of $20,000. This does not reflect the rosy picture of pyramiding profits the hon. member was pointing out in his general remarks, but there are some companies—

Mr. Argue: These 30 companies did very little of the business. Most of the business is done by half of the companies.

Mr. Chown: I have no doubt that at the moment the gross loans of many of these new companies would be small but will grow in volume over the years. However, I picked out two companies that did a substantial business. I found that company A had a gross profit before taxes of $1,317,125.

Mr. Argue: What company was that?

Mr. Chown: I am not giving the name of the company, I am just calling it "A".

Mr. Argue: It is public information. The country knows it. You do not have to call it "A".

Mr. Chown: The figures are in that report. I do not think it really matters whether I call it by a letter. It is public information and perhaps the hon. member has the report in front of him.

Mr. Argue: No, I have not. Mine is a year older than yours.

Mr. Chown: In any event, I took these figures right off the sheet here and the gross profit in the case of company A is $1,317,125. The net profit was $791,431. Therefore, they paid income taxes to the tune of $525,694. Company B had a gross profit before taxes of $1,933,282. The net profit after taxes was $990,780, so they paid taxes of $942,502. I picked out these two large business enterprises to indicate that they did contribute substantially to our federal treasury by way of income taxes which, in turn, find their way back to the people of Canada through the social security measures that exist as a result of the work of our government. I was going to add that co-operatives and credit unions also make loans, as we all know and that they are non-taxable.

Mr. Argue: That is not correct.

Mr. Chown: Will the hon. gentleman give me his authority for saying that?

Mr. Argue: Yes. I should be pleased to do so. The laws of this country apply to all companies in exactly the same way. The law says this. Every company must pay at least 3 per cent on its capital invested and further that every company is allowed if it wishes to take all or part of its profits and pay the profits in patronage dividends and any profit paid in patronage dividends is not taxable. So the law applies precisely the same way to every company in Canada including co-operatives. They pay every tax that any other company pays.

Mr. Chown: With the exception that they have the right to pay out patronage dividends which in many respects would disburse the profit that would normally accrue.

Mr. Argue: The Beneficial Finance Company could do the same thing if they wanted to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order.

Mr. Chown: I was glad to note that my friend the hon. member for Davenport alluded to the situation where the interest rate was said to be 54 per cent. I am sure that my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia was being quite honest and true when he said that that interest rate was computed on an extremely small amount of money with a monthly charge over a period of perhaps three or four months. But that certainly is misleading as far as the major retail companies are concerned to suggest that they are charging interest rates at that level because by and large, on charge accounts and so on, it is not their custom to charge any interest rate whatsoever.

Mr. Argue: Mail order houses?

Mr. Chown: I would say as far as retail companies are concerned. The other point I want to come to has to do with the fact that this industry has grown to a point where there are 150 financial houses across the country and over 550 branches. If we take into consideration the fact that each branch might conceivably employ ten people, we arrive at a substantial number of employees, namely a minimum of 5,500 employees in this industry across the nation. Hence, if we were to pass this bill in its present form I would think the tendency in the industry, because of their high risk factor and the cost of the multiplicity of loans on a small quantum basis which results in heavy services and other charges, would be that these companies would not be able to continue in business, with the consequent loss of employment across the nation.

I have always been of the opinion that given honest service with good public relations they have a gap to fill in the economy and that they fill it very usefully.

My friend the hon. member for Assiniboia referred to the many legislative studies that have taken place over the years both in the Senate and the House of Commons banking and commerce committees. I want to quote in part some of the conclusions that came out of these committee hearings up to the time the present act was passed. As an authority for this quotation I am using the pamphlet entitled "Consumer loans in Canada". At page 3 these five conclusions are stated:

1. —our modern economy creates a need for small-sum, short term loans to wage-earners and salaried people.

2. —the demand will be met, either by legal and supervised agencies or by unlicensed lenders at unregulated rates.

3. —the actual cost of making and servicing such loans far exceeded the 12 per cent per annum provision of the then existing Money-Lender's Act.

4. —if legal, supervised service was to be provided, the permitted maximum charge—to cover every element of cost, including interest—must be adequate to enable efficient management to earn sufficient profit to attract enough capital.

5. —prohibitory legislation would be ineffective and would result only in forcing needy borrowers into the hands of unlicensed lenders.

In the Interest Act in part I there is a clause which reads as follows:

5. No person shall transact the business of a moneylender unless such person has first obtained from the minister a licence: but this section does not apply to a moneylender the cost of whose loans does not in any case exceed an amount equivalent to 1 per cent per month on the unpaid principal balance thereof.

It is obvious that consumer lenders would not take out licences and accept the many restrictive provisions of the Small Loans Act unless the Interest Act were further amended to specifically exclude them from its rate requirement. If there are no licensees there are no annual reports, no examination of lenders' books and records and no restriction of such matters as length of contract, reduction in charges for prepaid accounts, minimum charges, and many other features which now offer excellent protection to the borrowing public. The result would be a long step backward in the history of borrowing and lending in Canada, and I think this would be a mistake of the first magnitude.

Consumer lenders actively advocated a small loans law and accepted the terms and conditions of the Small Loans Act in 1939. They have not seriously objected to it since then, mainly because the act provides a rate of charge higher than for other kinds of lending in recognition of the higher costs involved in making personal instalment loans. These lenders may feel differently about a definition of interest as broad as that suggested in Bill No. C-3 if the statutory rate is reduced to the point that it becomes impossible to earn a profit.

Since the Interest Act covers a much wider field than the Small Loans Act there will no doubt be many other kinds of lenders who will find such a definition of interest unpalatable. For example, loans on real estate often incur heavy expenses for inquiries, appraisals, recording fees, commissions, et cetera. If these must be lumped into one total charge along with the rate of interest on the loan as a 1 per cent per month maximum it would certainly seriously slow down the rate of mortgage lending, especially on secondary security.

This mortgage problem in the lending field —I refer to second and third mortgages— was brought to the attention of the house by my friend the hon. member for Davenport and it points to a real and difficult situation and the need for supervision of loans of this nature by way of some sort of provincial act such as that which is now on the books in the province of Ontario which should point a good example to the other provinces in Canada. As a lawyer I have dealt with many people who were confronted with this situation of being overly mortgaged, with 20 per cent to 30 per cent discount on second and third mortgages, and to have suddenly found themselves out of work and unable to meet the payments they found that their equity in their home had been swallowed up, with the net result that they lost their home and their place of living at an extremely difficult time when they are in financial straits.

This kind of legislation is of great credit to the province of Ontario, and of course that province has a Conservative government. This is the kind of legislation that I believe should be followed by all the other provinces of our nation. I have here the Bank of Montreal Business Review issue of September 26, 1960, which I think contains a rather good definition of consumer credit:

Consumer credit is generally regarded as consisting of contractual obligations entered into by individuals, as consumers but not as house buyers, for personal rather than business reasons. As such it includes indebtedness incurred in the form of charge accounts, or commitments to pay for goods and services by instalments, or personal cash borrowings without attendant collateral in the form of stocks and bonds.

Prior to world war II there were only $400 million outstanding in Canada in consumer credit. By 1943, due to the exigencies of the second world war, the production especially of household goods, and so on, this dropped to $200 million. By 1946 it advanced to $400 million again and it had passed the $1 billion mark by 1950. It was again restricted during the Korean war, for obvious reasons, and ever since has been on the rise until now it stands at $3½ billion.

This is a tremendous increase in the field of consumer borrowing, but in my opinion it is rather the sociological trend of our times. People want to have possession of some desirable and useful chattel now and pay for it later. In most cases I am sure they understand the consequences of the charges that ensue by way of interest. But there is that small segment of the public which is drawn into these financial offices, and if these people are not treated with the respect, understanding and sympathy which they deserve they are apt to be committed to a loan to pay for such goods and chattels which they really cannot afford.

In the same Bank of Montreal Business Review there is a table showing consumer credit as a percentage of personal disposable income. I thought it would be of interest to the house to put this table on the record. In 1950 it was 8.3 per cent of personal disposable income; in 1951 it was 6.8 per cent; in 1952 it was 8.9 per cent; in 1953, 10.5 per cent; in 1954, 11.3 per cent; in 1955, 12.6 per cent; in 1956, 13.1 per cent; in 1957, 13 per cent; in 1958, 13.3 per cent. Then in 1959 it rose to 14.1 per cent and in 1960, as at the end of the first quarter—which is the last figure available—it was 13.5 per cent.

At the present time, when there is a slight recession in the economy, consumer credit shows a definite falling off. When times are good it shows a sturdy gain. To suggest, as the hon. member for Assiniboia did, that in times when there is high unemployment—as there is at the moment—the credit companies are in a more advantageous position is quite wrong. These statistics clearly indicate that they are as buoyant as any other business in good times, and their business falls off very substantially when times are not so good.

There are different types of consumer credit. First of all you have the charge account type of credit, which is the short term, almost month by month account and the account is paid at the end of each month. Even though it is not paid until it becomes pretty badly in default, there are no interest charges on it. This type of charge account increased by 50 per cent in 1959 over what it was in 1951 and now represents 13 per cent of total consumer debt, as opposed to 29 per cent in 1951, which is an interesting development.

Then there is instalment credit. This type of credit, instalment buying, by way of contrast to the charge account type of consumer credit, increased 4½ times between 1951 and 1959. This aspect of credit is dealt with on page 2 of the Bank of Montreal Business Review, as follows:

> The unevenness of annual increases already noted in consumer debt generally has been particularly apparent in instalment credit. Most of the rise since 1951 occurred in the years prior to 1957 when, despite the arrested growth in 1954, instalment debt grew at an annual compound rate of about 25 per cent. In the past two years the rate of increase has been notably lower, averaging less than 4 per cent. Thus, while nearly half of consumer debt was in the form of instalment credit at the end of 1957, the proportion now approximates two fifths.

The third type of consumer credit is personal cash loan. This has become a major component of consumer credit. It started out very slowly in the 1950's and increased in volume until at the present time it represents nearly one half of all the consumer credit in our country. Hence, when you use the chart issued by the superintendent of insurance, probably if one went back to 1951 he would find just a small handful of these finance companies. Today, as I pointed out, there are 77, each of them growing year by year.

It is interesting to know that more than half of the non-farm family units have no consumer debt whatsoever, and one third of these do have liquid cash assets in excess of the amount of their own indebtedness. So that when you look at the whole picture it is not quite so bad as it seems. Assuming that this is really becoming a social change of our day I should like to quote the Radcliffe committee of the United Kingdom which aptly summed up the role of consumer credit in the following terms:

> While he (the purchaser) escapes the necessity of saving in advance of his purchases, and draws on the savings of others to finance his investment, the act of repayment restores those savings for other uses, and there remains in the hands of consumers, after the discharge of their obligations, a stock of goods that may be presumed to make as real a contribution to the amenities of life as any other form of investment.

That would appear to indicate that the money being loaned out across the country by these finance companies is in its own way doing good in that it is keeping a substantially growing amount of money in circulation which keeps up the level of consumer purchases and, in its own fashion, contributes to the general buoyancy of our economy.

I wish to quote from a pamphlet called "Facts about consumer loans" prepared by the Household Finance Corporation which company has been in business in Canada since 1927. The pamphlet points out:

> The need for satisfactory sources of small sum loans to wage earners and consumers has only developed in Canada during comparatively recent years, with the change from an agrarian to an industrial economy and the consequent shift of population from rural to urban area. The resulting dependence of a growing number of people on cash income rather than on the physical products of their own hands, has produced this need. Early laws did not protect borrowers, and many people needing small loans were victimized by unscrupulous lenders charging exorbitant rates.

This condition did not develop as soon in Canada as in the United States, where intensive studies of the problem commenced in 1908. Most active in this field was the Russell Sage foundation, a philanthropic body dedicated to the improvement of social and living conditions.

Studies by the foundation showed that laws limiting interest on all loans regardless of size, were inadequate as far as small loans were concerned, since they only prevented small loans being made legally, and drove people into the hands of the loan sharks. It was also apparent from experiments with the operation of philanthropic lending agencies that the need for small loans could not be met in this manner. The foundation concluded that the only answer was to pass laws which would provide small loan rates low enough to protect borrowers, but high enough to attract sufficient capital to the business to meet the public need. Only by doing this could the borrower be protected.

The foundation received the support of legal lenders, among them Household Finance, and by 1917 the first uniform small loan law had been passed in several states. Since then improved versions of this law have been passed in the majority of states.

In Canada by 1936, it was apparent that a small loan law was necessary, for here, as had happened in the United States the high rate lenders were plying their trade. Realization of this condition led to the passage of the Small Loans Act in 1939—

There was a reason and purpose for these companies coming into existence. The experience here in Canada clearly points to the fact that people were being stung by unethical and unscrupulous operators. The change in our whole economic set-up, the movement of the population from rural to urban centres, higher wage rates, higher employment and the consequent greater amount of cash available to working people led these companies into a field which investigation establishes was clearly needed. Accordingly I cannot agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia when he says that we would be doing the public of Canada a service by accepting the hon. member's proposed bill at face value realizing the constitutional anomalies that were already pointed out in this debate and realizing the conflict between this bill and the existing Small Loans Act even at this level leaving out the provinces entirely.

Before accepting such a measure I feel we should conduct a full and thorough investigation. With that in mind I feel that a more intelligent decision could be reached if all the evidence were placed before the banking and commerce committee. We should take into consideration the fact that the present act has remained relatively unchanged since 1936. From the evidence obtained and the witnesses heard we could come to a sober conclusion as a result of having another and very close look at this whole general problem.

In the meantime, it would be difficult for me to support this bill. I do not know how my hon. friend arrived at 12 per cent as a figure for the maximum interest rate. It appears as though he has simply taken the present allowable maximum of 2 per cent per month, chopped it in half and reduced it to 1 per cent and said, "That will do because that is what my friends in the co-operatives and credit unions are charging, and that seems to be a fairly reasonable interest rate".

It is important to remember that those in co-operatives and credit union societies are not coping with such a broad area of risk where you have thousands of small loans in the amount of $200 and $300 apiece thinly spread among hundreds of thousands of people all of which loans have to be serviced, checked and rechecked and pursued when they are in default.

When a loan is in default the lending institution must decide whether it is advisable in terms of the possibility of collection to pursue the account through legal processes. Even if the money is collectible the institution must determine whether or not to pursue it through legal processes and face the consequences of bad public relations.

My hope is that they will find that recourse through the courts, or by way of chattel mortgage through a bailiff and a seizure is an unprofitable move from the standpoint of their general public relations because they should know better than to become involved in that type of situation in the first place. In other words, they have to take a very responsible attitude toward each risk they accept and when a poor risk is discovered they should reflect on the fact that there was bad judgment on their own part before they incur the poor public relations that will follow if they pursue the account through legal processes.

The philosophy that the customer is always right is more applicable to finance companies than to retail stores. No human being can sit back and be happy over the dire results of playing along with a poor risk, and least of all a finance company. I think finance companies are charged with a very grave responsibility in this regard, a responsibility to tell the public the true story of the interest that is being charged, to state with courage the fact that 2 per cent per month means 24 per cent per year, and to look with caution and with care, into the background of people whom they are servicing and to weigh up the consequences of a default by a person through loss of employment or disaster in the family or any other cause.

If finance companies do not accede to the charge made against them, and accept this very grave and heavy responsibility, then the time will come when they will face the possibility that public clamour will rise to the point where some action will have to be taken, both at the federal and provincial levels, to police those corporations with even greater care than they are policed at the present time.

Mr. Deschatelets: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he have any figures showing losses resulting from recent loans by finance companies?

Mr. Chown: I have not that information before me. I have already pointed out to the house that 14 of those listed in the annual report of the superintendent of insurance actually showed a year end loss, no profit whatsoever; 24 had a profit of less than $10,000; and nine had a profit of less than $20,000, which amounts to a total of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am advised that his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Alfred Belzile (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, my remarks on this matter will be very brief, as I merely wish to support the principle of Bill C-3, even if I do not fully agree with its terms.

Bill C-3 will, if passed, decree that the maximum interest rate that may be charged by companies or loan institutions be set at 12 per cent.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, as the mover of the bill is none other than the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who is also leader of a party with socialist tendencies, and who, at least in theory, claims to be able to provide our country with more favourable legislation in the economic field, it is obvious that, in this case, we might have expected something more spectacular.

My purpose in speaking at this time is to submit to the house and to defend the position of the working classes, of the small wage earners.

However, I am not of those who advocate the principle of lending money without interest.

On the contrary, I recognize that if borrowed money is useful to the borrower, it should provide a return to the lender.

I think that if I rent an apartment, a car, or some other article I have to pay something for the wear and tear of the merchandise or premises.

I must admit that credit unions and chartered banks are charging reasonable interest rates in this field and are rendering a great service to their customers.

Unfortunately we cannot say as much with regard to other loan companies regularly established on the market, some of which advertise on television, or on the radio, claiming that they are ready to give tremendous service to people by advancing them the money they need.

First of all, let it be clearly understood that I have nothing to reproach, either directly or indirectly to the management or employees of those companies. Most of them are very honest people, working for modest salaries. Yet, I would state categorically that those companies are doing a disservice to people, in the majority of cases where our fellow-citizens deal with them.

The interest rates charged on the full amount of the loan, or on any outstanding balance for the purchase of an article, on the basis sometimes of a rate of 9 per cent, and even more in some instances, on the total amount, and for the whole period of repayment on purchases paid by monthly instalments, amount to twice the interest rate provided in the contract.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of parliament, I am often visited by some constituents of mine who come and tell me about their financial difficulties. Most of them, after we have discussed their financial troubles, fish out of their pockets what is known in our province as a finance contract. They have borrowed money from lending institutions whose interest rates are exorbitant. Those companies, I can well appreciate, are probably taking greater risks than do our credit unions and our charter banks, but a man would be better off in being refused a loan at a reasonable rate of interest, if it would be too much of a burden to him, than to be granted one at a rate of interest he cannot affort to pay.

Toward the end of 1959, the Bank of Canada had instructed all chartered banks to restrict their credit facilities. And, of course, as a consequence, chartered banks had to curtail loans which they normally grant to their usual borrowers. However, for reasons unknown to me, no restrictions at all were imposed by the Bank of Canada on the companies I have now in mind, with the result many patrons no longer applied to banks and credit unions and turned to these lending companies which charge higher rates of interest. Consequently low wage earners have had to pay more in interest for money they had borrowed and which, in certain cases, they could have done without.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the services rendered by such companies to people buying cars, furniture and so on. However I feel that in proportion to the service rendered, the interest rates charged are far too high.

As I have said, I admit that in some instances lending companies have operated at a loss. In fact the previous speaker mentioned that 14 companies had run into deficits.

Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that I do not want to suggest that the financial reports of those companies might be doctored. But I wonder whether figures are not somewhat like music and whether it is not possible to make them give off various sounds.

In any case, I wonder how our caisses populaires, making loans at 6 and 5 per cent interest in some instances, can manage to accumulate reserves and lend money at rates much lower than those charged by these lending institutions? How is it that in every town and city of every province in this country chartered banks can lend money at reasonable rates and get along, as far as I know, while other lending companies charging twice the same rates are showing a deficit?

Mr. Speaker, it is without any trace of bitterness that I sought to express my humble opinion in this debate about financing and money in Canada.

I happen to come from an area which is rather average, if not downright poor and, as I was saying earlier, I have in many instances witnessed the dire predicament of some of my fellow citizens who had been lured by credit or loan facilities at very heavy rates of interest.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to find that this government is taking action in the sense I have just suggested, as evidenced by the Small Loans Act passed before the Christmas recess. I am sure that this measure will greatly benefit small businesses and provide a reasonable interest rate. I sincerely hope it will be followed by other legislation enabling Canadians in need of credit to secure loans at reasonable rates of interest.

(Text):

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my first thought on this subject is one of some surprise that the official opposition has in effect bowed to the claims of those who claim they are the effective opposition in presenting measures of this sort. My second thought is to express some pleasure that it is again possible to debate a measure which is so important and which should be very carefully considered before parliament takes action on the proposal of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue).

In my contribution to the debate, Mr. Speaker—and I hope I will be reasonably short—I should like to present some figures which would suggest that if we adopted this measure the small loans companies of Canada would immediately disappear from the landscape because they would all be forced out of business by bankruptcy. To this I have no particular objection. Fortunately I have never had to use their services but it still is a fact that we should consider that if we were to give effect to this measure it would mean the disappearance of the loan companies.

The reason I say that is that according to figures compiled by one of these companies the costs of operating their services amount to about 13.3 per cent of the average outstanding on loans. The hon. member for Assiniboia proposes that the effective rate of interest should be 12 per cent and it is apparent on the face of it that 12 per cent is less than 13 per cent. I am not going to vouch for the accuracy of these figures. They are but projections and would have to be carefully examined in a committee. Notwithstanding whether or not they are correct, it is still an assertion by one company which has compiled these figures that if the effective rate of interest was set at 12 per cent the loan companies would immediately suffer losses.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McCleave: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If, as he states, the figure is 13 per cent for the operation of such businesses, can I assume that the hon. member is in favour of operating inefficient businesses?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, the question is simple but I am afraid the answer will have to be somewhat complex. The trouble is that the people who have to use the services of small loans companies are the unfortunates of the world and the unfortunates of the world do not always find it easy to obtain the money they need on simple terms. They are the people who go to the small loans companies or loan sharks, and may I say I have no objection to the use of that term. If the money is to be repaid they are the people who have to be hounded by the collectors who work for the loan companies and by their letter writers, and all this adds up to cost. Unfortunately, it must be paid for out of the business. I certainly am not in favour of this business. Most of the people are honest and do repay the money in time, but still the collection of money from these other people is a very expensive item and it adds to the cost of operation of these companies.

I think that is a point that has to be faced squarely. Assuming that the cost of operation is that high—I would think that would have to be very carefully examined because, as I have said, I am only passing on the information I have received from one of these companies—and assuming these companies did disappear, the inevitable result would be that the people who needed the money and who had gone to these loan companies before would have to find their money from other sources. I would suggest they would find that money, Mr. Speaker, by going to bootleg sources. If a man is desperate, he will pay almost anything to obtain what he wants.

Those are the facts, and they cannot be ignored. This is not the best of all possible worlds. Some of these people are the victims of their own circumstances. They do not enjoy a first class bank rating, for example, so many of them would find difficulty in borrowing money from credit unions. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am looking at the number of accounts in Canada under the small loans operations for a year and I find there are approximately one million. There are only 213,000 Canadians who have loans of more than $1,100. I am looking at the figures which were compiled for, and set forth in the annual report of the department of insurance for 1958. These are precisely small loans, Mr. Speaker, when people have to borrow up to $1,100.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. McCleave: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Deschatelets: Do those figures to which the hon. member referred include the financing of automobiles?

Mr. McCleave: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, I know these figures cover the operations of all licensed lenders in Canada and I presume they would include the financing of automobiles. However, I cannot give a categorical answer.

May I suggest, sir, that there are two types of people who go to the small loans companies for loans at interest rates which go up to 24 per cent. The first group would be those who are misled by the advertising or who are ignorant of the actual rates they are paying and so go to the premises of the loan companies. The second group would be those who are beyond what I call the twilight zone of basic credit. I mean they have not the standing which would enable them to borrow money at from 6 per cent to 12 per cent from the chartered banks or any credit unions or any of the other reputable sources. The remedy, apart from the bill we are considering, could include education for the former, that is to clearly show the effective rates of interest one pays by going to finance companies. The remedy for the latter group who are forced to go to high interest sources for their money is a very difficult problem. I suggest that this bill cannot be the answer. Before I conclude my remarks, perhaps I may be allowed to present my own solution to this social problem which is an extremely important problem.

First, may I make it clear that the remarks made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton), who referred to money under certain circumstances as being a commodity, are very true. People have to get bread and butter for their living and a roof for themselves and their families. Under special circumstances they may have to also obtain money for the things they need. Money, therefore, is a commodity that has to be sought on a market in which the factors of supply and demand exist. A person's credit rating will determine how much money can be given. The lending of money, under certain circumstances, can be a life raft to a man. Under other circumstances, it can shackle him and drag him down into a river of debt in which he forages for himself forever among the loan sharks. One pretty method they have for dragging in their clientele is the offer of consolidation. We hear that so frequently. Do not be nagged by a dozen creditors, come in and consolidate your debt. Then, of course, you have one big nag instead of a dozen small nags a month. When the consolidation does not quite work out, the interest that is owing and overdue mysteriously becomes part of the principal. The debt is rewritten, and so the story goes and a small debt becomes a very large debt which can hang like a millstone about a person's neck for all his working days.

Recently I had occasion to examine an example of refinancing in my own city. A man had decided to consolidate two debts on which he was paying interest at 6 per cent, amounting to about $2,500. He secured a second mortgage of $5,200 at 8 per cent, but unfortunately there was a bonus provision so he actually received two thirds of that $5,200 or about $3,500. He was paying a nominal rate of interest of 8 per cent, but the effective rate of interest when all this was done was 16 per cent, and possibly much greater. Obviously instead of two short term worries which were causing great hardship but which would have been solved in a reasonable length of time, this man adopted a long drawn out process in which he is paying less per month but still exchanging a short term debt for a long term debt under very unattractive circumstances indeed. Perhaps this man could never have solved the problem by the traditional methods. Perhaps no bank would have advanced him the money or he could never have re-mortgaged with the traditional mortgage companies. Perhaps some method of educating him to the use of this money would have served its purpose and saved this man from decades—I am sure it will be decades—of misery.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could mention my own solution to this problem if I am not straying too far from the subject matter under discussion. It seems to me that circumstances differ when people borrow money. What is usury for one man may very well under the circumstances be life saving and the proper thing to do for another. The person who is a victim under one set of circumstances comes out very well indeed under another set of circumstances, even though the amounts borrowed are the same and the terms of the payment are the same. In short, a person who goes into a contract to buy money and to pay a large rate of interest on it may do so knowing full well the risk he is taking, and accepting that risk knowing that it is for his benefit. On the other hand, he may enter into that contract knowing that he is the victim of his own circumstances, that he is helpless, that he must accept almost any terms that are thrown at him.

It seems to me then that the best approach the law could make to help such people would be this. I am convinced that they should be helped; and if all else failed, I would certainly support this bill and hope that it could be given proper study. Then it seems to me that there should be a discretion in the law—an act to deal with usury, to make it an offence—so to contrive it that all circumstances could be brought forward and a judge or a judge and jury could determine in any one particular case whether there was in fact usury and unfair practice against the borrower. This could be done at the instance of the borrower himself so that if he felt aggrieved he would have his remedy. With policing done by the person himself instead of the more impersonal policing of society which may not work out in this particular bill, I think we would have an answer.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise in my place to take part in a debate in which I participated some time ago. I cannot help once again congratulating the hon. member who proposed this bill because I feel that his intentions in this regard were good. I am sure that he means no ill by introducing it. At the same time I am not too sure in my own mind that this bill is going to achieve what the hon. member has in mind.

Much as I am concerned with the possible hardship on the people of Canada by having to pay high interest rates I am more concerned with the thought that they must be able to continue to borrow money. No matter how or where he wishes to borrow the money he needs, and no matter in what circumstances he may have to pay it back, the decision in this regard should be that of the borrower. Today we have an alternative.

It is hardly fair to suggest that if a person has been refused a loan by a bank, he should not be able to borrow money at all. The alternative is the small loans companies. It is true that their interest rates are higher than are bank interest rates but I suggest that this is where the risk factor comes into the picture. If interest is the reward for allowing someone else to use your money, some part at least must be the lender's reward for taking the risk that he may lose his money.

On an individual transaction the amount of reward by way of interest will set the limit on the amount of risk a lender will take. The one thing that bothers me in this bill is that the rate of interest will be set at 12 percent. I am afraid that this figure may fall short of the incentive that may be needed in order to induce lenders to lend money to people in certain categories. I refer specifically to an individual case of which I know in the city of Edmonton, that of a man who was refused a normal bank loan. This individual resorted to the higher interest institution. He was able to get his money there at a time when the interest rate was less important than was the fact of being able to borrow the money. Today that man is a successful businessman. I do not think that man would be in the desirable position in which he is today had he not been able to borrow this money, even at an interest rate which was higher, so as to be able to establish himself.

Risk, however, has an over-all effect on the interest rate covering any particular class of borrowing. There are always some losses. These losses in the money lending business are part of the cost of running that business. They are just as much an expense as are office help, office rent, the cost of light and water or the maintenance of the office itself. As part of the expenses of the business they must be included in the selling price of the product. Every borrower therefore must pay part of the cost of losses in his class since it is reflected in the price of the commodity he wishes to borrow. This means that interest will go up or down depending on the degree of losses on that particular class of loan.

Like governments and businesses all over the world, the Canadian consumer also depends on cash loans in order to tide him over emergencies or rough spots. This is a form of service which he has come to expect in much the same way as he expects schools for his children, electricity for his home or life insurance for the protection of his family. The Canadian consumer is willing to pay for these advantages in the form of interest and he expects them to be made available to him.

One important point which many people fail to recognize is that the costs of conducting a credit business are dictated by the size of each transaction. As an example, an institution which could profitably make loans of say $12,000 at 6 per cent interest per annum would find it extremely difficult, I am sure, to make sufficient $200 loans in order to take up that $12,000 at 6 per cent. This conclusion follows because it would require 60 times the amount of work. Obviously then the smaller loans must require a higher rate of interest.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) made reference to a banking and commerce committee which sat some time in the past. I was able to obtain some information on the banking and commerce committee which sat in the House of Commons in 1938, and whose report formed the basis for the Small Loans Act. They recognized this cost factor in making smaller loans and expressed this recognition in the following words:

> Quite obviously the purchase of a block of 12-year Canadian government bonds requires little expenditure for investigation and none for supervision; investments in 50 farm mortgages for varied periods entail considerable cost both for investigation and supervision; while the investigation of 1,000 applications to effect loans to 500 people for a few months with meticulous supervision becomes expensive business when expressed as a percentage rate of $100 on a monthly basis.

This quotation emphasizes another important cost factor in connection with consumer loans and interest, the cost of investigating the considerable number of applications which do not result in loans being made. This cost is considerable, as the investigation of applications which do not result in loans is in many cases as expensive as for those applications which do result in loans. The parliamentary committee referred to in the statement I have just made expressed its main objective as follows:

> Throughout its inquiry your committee's objective has been to secure the best procurable rate for the borrower.

It is evident from the exhaustive nature of of the 1956 committee's examination that they had the same objective in view. While keeping in mind that the rate should be set as low as possible in the interests of borrowers, the original committee recognized that, for the same reason, it must also be high enough so that lenders would be able to continue to provide this service. This point is emphasized by the experience in certain of the United States. When changes in the laws reduced rates below the level necessary to produce a fair return to the lenders the supply of licensed capital rapidly decreased. The result was a return of high rate, illegal loans in considerable volume.

In the United States, where small loans legislation was first passed in 1917, a great deal of study has been given to the subject of consumer borrowing by legislative committees. In Great Britain, however, the small loans laws and interest laws are considerably different. The law is not as clear-cut as it is in Canada and the United States. If there is a complaint that the rate in a particular loan transaction is too high, and it is not over 4 per cent per month, the onus is on the borrower to show that the rate is unconscionable. If the rate is more than 4 per cent per month the lender must satisfy the court that it is justified.

During the legislative hearings in 1956 in Great Britain an executive of a British loan company told the banking and commerce committee at that time that in practice most consumer loans are made at a rate of approximately 60 to 70 per cent per annum and that, furthermore, there is no restriction as to the kind of security that may be taken by lenders.

I want to say again that I firmly believe the intention of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is nothing but sincere. However, I do hope that he will give some consideration to allowing some body to study the merits of this bill so that there will be some means of determining a right and just form of interest to be set for small loans in the future. On the grounds that I have put forth this evening, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that if the bill should come to a vote I would have to vote against it.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to follow my confrère the hon. member Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko). It is the first time in this house that I have had a chance to take up right where he left off.

I would like to carry on, if I may, from the last part of his speech; that is, the effectiveness of this bill and whether we should pass it. I suggest that one facet that has perhaps not received enough consideration today is this: How willing are we to interfere with the rights and privileges of the citizens of this country?

Each law that we pass, no matter what it is, may be called in some instances another interference with the freedom of the citizens of this country. Approached in that manner, I suggest that the particular objectives to be gained by this interference must be very carefully studied and weighed alongside the possible harmful effects it may have.

The objective aimed at here by the hon. member who introduced this bill is the protection of the citizens of this country from excessive interest rates. On the other side of the scale I think we have seen clearly that the danger to be reckoned with is the possibility that those we seek to protect may not be able to borrow money at all if we set up a too high and artificial value.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, just before the supper break I had mentioned that in considering whether this bill should be voted for or against we had to consider whether it would do more harm than good and consideration of that question, I suggest, requires that we look at the present situation.

The purpose of the bill we are considering this evening is to place on interest rates a ceiling of 1 per cent a month or 12 per cent per annum. I suggest that to look at it properly we should have some real idea whether in this country today anyone is forced to pay more than that a month and, in so far as we can, we should determine what are the factors or circumstances that have caused people to pay more than that rate.

Before proceeding I should say it is not my own personal protection I would necessarily be seeking if I were to speak in favour of this bill. I believe it is fairly well known that while hon. members of this house are not overpaid they happen to have a credit rating unsurpassed in the country so that we can all go into debt at a much lower rate of interest. Not all people in this country are so blessed. Actually some of my friends and relatives and especially many of those who come to me for help in my legal office find themselves stuck with bills that cost them a great deal in excess of normal bank rates, even more than the bank charges me on my overdrafts, I must add.

A proper consideration of what people are paying by way of interest must in my opinion take into account some of the factors which influence interest rates. Since interest rates are determined, on one side at least, by the willingness of people who have money to lend it to others who want it, it is perhaps a good idea to start with some of those considerations which lead people with money to lend into the lending business. What are some of the factors which induce a man to invest his money in a bank, business or loan company rather than into a service station, garage, saw mill or grocery store? Obviously people enter the business of lending money for the same reason they enter any other business. It is an investment. People invest their money to make a profit.

I suggest that a good starting point in considering some of the possible effects of the bill before us is to examine some of the problems confronting those who go into the finance business. Every business has its own financial problems, even the money lending business. Every business must contend with a few fundamental expenses and must undertake some risks and uncertainties. These are some of the basic factors of the matter of going into a business with the idea of making a profit.

I suggest that financial houses of every nature and kind whatsoever face the same business problems that are faced by our local garage men and corner grocers. To do business you must get business. You must attract customers. You must have something to sell. You must convince the public that you are the person with whom to do business. And so, even in the lending business, it is automatic that you will have one overhead expense, the cost of financing your advertising. It may be that your advertising will cost you in direct proportion to the competition in the field, to the type of audience you must reach and to the type of advertising medium that is necessary to reach that audience which is most likely to need to borrow money.

Next, you must figure on the cost of your own money. Most finance people lend other people's money. Because they are so safe, banks are able to obtain money from people who are interested in saving, the safest possible way in which they can keep their money and earn interest. Banks lend that money. Most people I know are not accustomed to thinking of bank deposits as a source of loans but banks do business with the money which they borrow from investors. Because of their very secure position they are in the happy circumstance of having to pay a very small premium for the use of it. However, there are others who borrow from banks, including finance companies. I suggest we would be most unrealistic if we failed to take into account the legitimate cost to the finance companies of the money they must borrow from the banks.

I suggest also that whether or not they borrow from the banks, if they are financing, entirely depending on their own capital, they must as a cost of their business include the amount of money that that capital could earn in any other business, even at a modest rate of 5 per cent or 6 per cent at which most people can borrow. So that that is an item of cost of at least 5 per cent or 6 per cent as it is for most businesses.

Naturally they require a staff of personnel. They are making loans and therefore they must have bookkeepers and auditors to check their accounts. They must, as all other businesses do in this complex society of ours, have perhaps a little extra staff to keep track of those records, the keeping of which we have of necessity imposed on them over the years, the returns to this and that government department, income tax deductions, unemployment insurance records, and so forth. The cost of overhead in financial institutions, as in all other businesses, is a considerable item which must be paid for by someone.

Since there is not sufficient lending money, and since lending money is a good business only to the extent that you follow sound business practices, it requires good judgment on the part of management in selecting those with whom they will do business. There is, therefore, a good deal of staff work on every application for a loan. It is necessary to know what type of person you are dealing with, to know what security he has, what are the chances of having your money repaid, and perhaps in some instances a case history of the person with whom you are dealing and his record. It may be necessary to check the value of securities and most of those factors which go into determining that perhaps the most important factor of all is the risk you are running in doing your business.

It is in this business of lending money that we really find the risk factor to be all important. It is a straight case of cash being handed to some person. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that just a cursory glance at the criminal convictions in this country for any short period of time would indicate that it is not really insulting the Canadian people to suggest that there are some dishonest people among us. In fact, the easier it is to steal money the easier it will be to find the hardest working people among our criminal element. Since the easiest thing in the world to steal and to make use of is money, the financial institutions of all kinds are likely to find that attracted to the market are criminals who calculate that the easiest part of the job is where there is no risk of getting rid of the money when you get it.

Therefore, of necessity investigation must amount to a pretty healthy, shall I say, insurance item in this regard. The financial institutions have to be sure first of all in so far as they can that they are dealing with honest men. But this is really only a start. Even if the borrower is honest, such a factor as his general security rating must be taken into account. Does he have a house and furniture? Does he have a steady job? Has he been long in the community? Does he own a car? How much are his debts? What is the worth of all this?

Next is the extent of the loan, the period for which he wishes to borrow the money. If he looks too good in one way, then why has he not gone to an institution which will charge him less for the money? This in itself could appear suspicious enough to warrant further investigation. All of these questions are most pertinent, because, of course, every mistake that the financial institution makes in this regard means a loss, not just of the interest that is charged for advancing the money but on the capital advance itself.

Now, as I said, I am considering some of the cost factors that people in the business of lending money have to take account of and since those who borrow must of necessity pay all the costs that are incidental to running that business and provide a profit to the man himself before he goes into it, we have in those considerations that I have enumerated some very specific items that are brought to bear. Certainly it cannot be expected that a man who has to build his own house and who has paid for practically all of it and who owes on a $10,000 house only $2,000, who has a car that he has paid cash for and a house full of furniture on which he owes nothing, a steady job that he has held for 10 years or 15 years, and a couple of promotions in between, is going to borrow money, taking into consideration the risk factors, at the same price as a recent high school graduate who perhaps may have married too young, taken a job with a new company in a new location, who does not own his house and has not had time even to acquire furniture free of debt; who does not own a car but merely has loads of responsibilities and nothing to tie them to that location, and in fact nothing that can probably make them move faster than an overbearing load of debt.

I suggest, therefore, that bearing all this in mind we must find this risk factor of such considerable importance that taking into account all the other costs of running this finance business and allowing first your bank interest as a capital cost of running the business we have an awful lot to squeeze in to make the 5 per cent or 6 per cent that stands between that cost of the capital and that return which this bill suggests should be the maximum in any event for any loan.

But I suggest to my colleagues in this house that we have only begun to scratch the surface when we have considered risk only or the cost of running the business. I suggest that the cost is only one item. Risk is another item. There must also be the attractiveness of the business itself if we are going to induce anyone to lend money or come into the money lending business at all. Therefore, I suggest we must consider what competition there is for the money. Certainly we are old enough and have been around long enough to know that the price you pay for anything may be considerably influenced by the supply of that item at hand. If there are too many automobiles on the local car sales lot in a small town where in fact there are only 40 potential customers and 200 cars, we are going to have what would be called a buyers' market, and it is the same story with money.

In certain circumstances at certain times and in certain localities it may very well be that every basic industry is earning very good profit. It may be that the local retailers, the local service businesses, are earning a return on their capital much in excess of the 12 per cent suggested by the bill and that in these localities at these times and under these circumstances there would not be a single person in the money lending business. I suggest that business conditions may never be quite so good that there is no one in the money lending business but certainly we have seen periods when business generally has been so good that for a period of two or three or perhaps more years people have been able to invest in any number of businesses without the degree of risk that we find in the finance business and with a much better assurance of a higher return on their investment.

I suggest that the basic problem today is that we have not given enough consideration to the fact that over the years we have seen built up in this country so many finance companies, so many lending institutions, so many places where one can get money at interest rates so much in excess of 12 per cent per annum. There must be a reason for the growth of these businesses and there must be a reason for interest rates in excess of 12 per cent.

Obviously the demand is there. We happen to have in this country such a high percentage of people who for various reasons must have money that they are willing to pay more than 12 per cent, and I am suggesting that this is where we run into our major difficulty. I say there are various reasons. I have mentioned the example of the young couple just starting out. The young husband must have a few necessities to furnish a home for his young bride and perhaps he is young and foolish as well as desperate enough to pay much more by way of interest. But between that type of case and our solid businessmen we have any number of independent-minded Canadian citizens who have great faith in their own ability, some of whom, like the one mentioned by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko) earlier today, happen to have a greater knowledge of the business in which they wish to become engaged and its opportunities than those in the loan business. All the way down the scale, whether it is a matter of pressing needs of the moment or the vision of a man who is going places in business, each one of these people has for his own reasons, for his own needs and desires and to attain his own ends, decided to pay more than 12 per cent.

When I started my few words on this subject I suggested that every law we introduce here must by its very nature be a curtailment to some extent of the freedoms that we all enjoy. Here is my principal fear with regard to this bill, that up to this time and especially in these days of world tension and a feeling of insecurity generally we have seen and are seeing more and more an attitude of looking to the government to do things for us, to take care of us, to make sure that we do not by our own foolishness get into too hot water and of looking to the government to pull us out of the hot water when we do get into it.

I am suggesting that this is not the spirit that we must foster. This is not the spirit that has made our country a rapidly progressing one. This is not the spirit that is needed for democracy itself. I suggest that those who feel most strongly a necessity for us to mollycoddle people to this extent would really, whether or not they recognize it in their hearts, be much happier in some country behind the iron curtain where most of their worries would be taken care of for them.

As a lawyer I have had much experience of the hardship suffered by those who have been adversely affected by high interest rates, but my principal objection to the bill is that we seem to forget completely that it is not a hardship to have to stand on your own feet, that it is very important for each and all of us and for this country to foster the spirit of the man who says: I will take my own risks, I will make my own way, I reserve the right to be a damn fool in this way if I want to but I want my freedom.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) spoke on the bill this afternoon he made note of the lack of interest in it on the part of the official opposition.

Mr. Deschatelets: The debate is not finished yet.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I do not know about hon. Liberal gentlemen to my left. Just over a week ago they met together to develop a new policy and certainly with regard to high interest rates their policy apparently is silence. But I must say that I believe the hon. member for Halifax must have had his tongue in his cheek if he implied that the members of this party are not interested in this bill.

I believe he first came to the house at the same time as I did and that this is the fifth session we have both attended. This is the fifth time that members of this party have introduced this bill in the house during that period. In that time we have heard many speeches, some good, some bad. We have heard many pious platitudes but we have yet to see the house get around to voting on the bill. I would suggest to the hon. member that opposition members are becoming, so far as this bill is concerned, a little bit like people across the country. They are getting sick and tired of all talk and no action.

I have spoken on this bill in previous sessions. I have put the case for the bill before the house as have other hon. members in this group. It is my intention tonight to devote the time at my disposal to rebuttal, which I believe is in the interests of proper debate, of some of the points made by hon. members on the government side. I am not one of those who maintain that all Tories are bad. Unfortunately only the majority of them are.

For example, Mr. Speaker, we heard a very good and forthright speech by the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Belzile). I must say I was delighted to see a member on the government side have the courage to come out and say that only two years ago when this same government was in power it appeared that instructions had gone out from the Bank of Canada to the chartered banks to cut down on small loans so that people who were in need of such loans would have to go to these finance companies. That is the kind of thing we should hear more of from government members. It should not always be left to the opposition to bring out points of this kind. I was delighted to see that the hon. member had the courage to stand up and disagree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) who claimed the very opposite at the time this point was brought up by members of the opposition.

It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is the opinion of many others in this country, that the duty of the Bank of Canada should be to serve the interests of the people of Canada and not be used in this way for the purposes of the moneylenders. This amounts almost to a monstrous conspiracy, Mr. Speaker, a conspiracy to gouge the public, to gouge the unwise, those people who are ill equipped to defend themselves.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that toward the end of his speech the hon. member tended to weaken what I thought was an otherwise excellent speech by trying to make the point that action taken by the government at this session is going to go some way toward correcting this situation. Regardless of the merits of any action taken by this government at this session, it is not going to deal with the problem with which we are dealing in this debate. It may help in other fields, but it certainly will not help in this one.

Then, we had the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton), for whom I have great personal respect, and his speech in this debate was mostly good. However, I thought he tended to treat the situation rather lightly. He tended to feel that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who introduced this bill, was slightly unfair. He felt the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia could be construed as making a charge that was applicable to all the people in the money lending field, whereas it was only the greedy moneylenders who should be charged with gouging the public. I believe the hon. member completely missed the point, Mr. Speaker. These greedy moneylenders, as he calls them, are operating within the law. This bill is designed to change that law so they will no longer be able to operate in that fashion.

I would suggest, that the innocent people in the money lending field to whom the hon. member referred should welcome legislation of this kind because they are, in fact, tarred with the same brush. The hon. member for Davenport also tried to make a case for the charges made by these companies over and above the interest charges. I should like to know what the interest charge is for if it is not to pay the administrative costs of these companies. I am not familiar with the operations of finance companies because I have never worked for one and I have never dealt with one. However, I am quite familiar with the operations of credit unions. I know that the maximum of 12 per cent which is charged by credit unions—in fact, in many cases it is much less than that—looks after all the costs of operation of the credit unions. This 12 per cent is to look after the costs and to pay interest to the people who invest in credit unions, as well as to set aside a sum every year to take care of uncollectible debts.

Mr. Speakman: Do they pay any income taxes?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If the hon. member is not familiar with the operations of credit unions in this day and age I would advise him to join one so he could ascertain how they operate. The income tax is paid by the individual who draws whatever interest he draws from that credit union. This goes in as income, and the tax is paid in that manner.

The hon. member for Davenport suggested this was not something for which we could have a simple answer and it should be given a lot of study. I would suggest that after five sessions, and after a full day of debate in each one of those sessions, it is about time we had a vote on the bill rather than further study of the subject matter.

Then, of course, Mr. Speaker, we had the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown), who started off his remarks by expressing sympathy for the people who were caught in the toils of these finance sharks or money-lenders. I think it is quite true to say that sympathy expressed by any hon. member in this house is not going to make the payments on the washing machine for the people who are caught in these traps. After expressing his sympathy, the hon. member went on as usual to defend the finance companies. I should like to compliment the hon. member because he had the honesty to come out and defend what he believes. It is obvious to me that he represents the majority of the members on the government side because if he did not they would have done something about this in the last five years.

Then the hon. member went on to talk about the noble role that finance companies play in our society. They make money available to people who cannot get it elsewhere. I would suggest, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane, that one of the reasons they cannot get money elsewhere is that this service is denied through the proper channels. The hon. member went on to say that it was not really too bad for these companies to gouge the public as long as they paid income tax. In my opinion, this was the worst defence for action of this kind. One needs to go only a step further to condone Chicago gangsterism as long as the gangsters pay taxes.

The hon. member went on to point out that 14 companies had lost money or were losing money. As the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane suggested, it is very easy to juggle the books in this game and to make a statement that so many companies make so much money. We should consider their costs of promotion, and I do not say advertising, I say promotion. I think there is a distinct difference between the two. I am sure hon. members who have had to fight an election campaign by using the T.V. medium realize that television costs money in this day and age. If you are on television as often as most of these finance companies are, then your costs are going to be very high.

In my opinion the most fantastic defence of all was the statement by the hon. member for Winnipeg South that the finance companies were not really so bad because they provided employment across the country. If ever there were an example of Tory employment, this would be a good one. It is evidently a good thing to employ people across this country to gouge the public the way the finance companies have, as has been put on the record on more than one occasion.

I wonder if the hon. member realizes that one of the major problems facing this government today, the problem of unemployment, is caused to some extent by the fact that the people who are caught in the toils of these finance companies pay 33 cents of every dollar for interest and other charges. Once this money is lost to the purchasing field, a chain reaction is set up. This one third of the purchasing dollar which is siphoned off at this level means there is that much less consumer goods purchased by the consumer. It means the people producing these goods have to be laid off. Furthermore, it means that this government will have to find money to pay unemployment insurance benefits to these people. This sets up a chain reaction. I think if the money these people pay in taxes were tallied up and the employment they provide counted, that would certainly be more than balanced by the disadvantages that accrue from their operations.

The hon. member for Halifax again referred to the cost of operation of some of these companies, and I do not know where he obtained a figure as high as 13 per cent. He then went on to suggest that maybe the reason for this situation was the high proportion of uncollected debts owing to these companies. As I said, I do not know what the average is of uncollectable debts of the finance companies. I have been told by former managers who worked for them, until they finally became so sick of the whole business that they were compelled to get out of it and get into another field, that the proportion of uncollectable debts is nowhere nearly as high as the public is led to believe. However, I know that in the credit union movement the figure amounts to less than one half of one per cent.

In order to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member that it is because of this high amount of uncollectable debts that the interest and carrying charges are so high in these finance companies, I should like to know the reason for the difference between the uncollected bills of the banks and credit unions and the supposedly uncollected bills of the finance companies. If there is that much difference I would suggest that one of the major reasons is that the public has a respect for the credit unions in this country and for the banks but that the public has no respect for these loan sharks, and certainly they have no reason to have any respect for them.

The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko) made one point and unless I misunderstood him I must confess that I was rather shocked. As I understood what he said, in making a similar point he said that the reason for the high cost of these finance companies was the class of people with whom they were dealing. I do not think the people across this country are going to appreciate too greatly that type of remark.

I think of the honest people who have fallen into these traps that we see set every day on television and advertised in the newspapers: "Come in and consolidate". They should say "Come on in and compound your financial problems", not "Come in and consolidate". I am thinking of the many thousands of immigrants who have come to this country and who, before they become accustomed to the financial system here, find themselves almost hopelessly embroiled in the clutches of these finance companies. I am thinking of the people who have turned to these companies in desperate circumstances, the people whom the banks are unable to help. I have had more than one bank manager tell me that many times they would like to grant loans but they are unable to do so because they have instructions otherwise. I do not think it is right or proper for any hon. member to pigeon-hole all these people as a class who deserve what they get because they do not pay their bills.

Most hon. members who have spoken in this debate, both on this occasion and on previous ones, have expressed concern about the problem. However, I would suggest that this problem will never be solved as long as it is legal for financial buzzards to prey on the unwise and unfortunate in this country. The banks must be freed from whatever control it is that prevents them from making small loans to our citizens, when they refuse to grant loans to citizens but will grant loans to the finance companies which, in turn, will lend to the citizens. The banks must be freed from whatever control it is that prevents them from going into this field. The credit unions and the caisses populaires must be nourished and encouraged to take an even greater share than they have taken in this field, and the finance and loan companies that come under condemnation in this bill must be checked. As long as they know that all we are going to do is talk about the matter in this house, they have nothing to fear. As long as they see five sessions in a row when this matter has been discussed and no decision has been arrived at, they have little to fear. I would say that the only way in which to take the first step in solving this problem is to have a vote on this bill.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken and, I believe, an hon. member on the Conservative side this afternoon referred to the fact that we in the Liberal party have not spoken on this bill. I am in favour of lower interest rates to all sectors of our community, particularly to those in the lower income group who must avail themselves of money from the small loan companies. These rates are extremely high indeed. Our party is in favour of lower interest rates generally. We will vote for the second reading of this bill if it is allowed to come to a vote. However, evidently the government members are ready to talk it out, we shall not have a chance to vote on it and this bill will die this session. This filibuster will kill the bill.

I listened to the remarks of the sponsor of the bill this afternoon; I refer to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). He described the conditions of people in the small money market. If the conditions are half as bad as he said they are—and I have no reason to doubt his word—I think this matter should be referred to the banking and commerce committee so that they might hear some evidence and send for persons and papers. In that way I think we could come to a better understanding of conditions in the small money market. We should like to vote for this bill but I fear that we are not going to get any chance to do so. I should therefore like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Tucker):

That the bill be not now read the second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the banking and commerce committee for consideration and report.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the government would not be tied by any decision or by any report. The motion does not tie the government to anything. It just empowers the committee to hear evidence in connection with conditions in the money market.

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): In rising to speak on the motion for second reading of this bill and the amendment I first of all, along with so many other members who have spoken, offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) for introducing this bill today. Most members of the house, whether or not they have spoken on the bill and whatever side they have taken in the debate, have expressed the opinion that this is a matter that should be examined and, above all, is a matter worthy of the concern of the house at this time. I certainly agree that it deserves this attention, in particular since the problems of consumer financing and the questions that revolve around the matter of interest on consumer loans are growing in complexity every day.

Actually the instalment buying system, or the method we now have of distributing goods by virtue of the instalment contract, is a relatively new thing. Only a few years ago credit in the consumer line was much simpler than it is today. If a man wished to buy goods he bought them, charged them to his account, if he had credit at the retailer's, or if not he arranged at a bank or with a friend for the credit to carry him over until he could repay his loan.

This was relatively simple and the credit limits of the borrower, or the purchaser, were well defined. But today we have a situation where oftentimes the term "purchaser" and the term "borrower" are synonymous. A large percentage of our people today who go to a store to buy goods—cars, appliances, all manner of household goods—plan while they are there to arrange for the financing of these goods. The retailer has become not only a purveyor of goods but also a financier for many people.

From my experience as a lawyer doing business with finance companies and people who had done business with finance companies, acceptance corporations and instalment buying generally, it seems to me that more and more people are relying upon the retailer to provide their financing for them and to decide whether or not the financing system is satisfactory.

It seems to me that too few people bother any more to read the finance contract that they sign. Too few understand the agreement they are entering into, and very few seem to appreciate the rate of interest that is involved in the transaction. As a matter of fact the situation as regards the finance companies which dispense funds by way of loans, such as Household Finance, is not as bad as some aspects of the general instalment financing that is done by department and retail stores and, I think, by the acceptance corporations.

The consumer loan companies, as they are called, are now regulated by the Small Loans Act and except in the case of loans under $300 there is a limit now of 12 per cent on loans up to $1,500. Over $1,500 there is no limit in law to the interest which can be charged. I sincerely believe the latter is a field which should be studied very carefully. I understand that while loans in this bracket are not as numerous as smaller loans—generally speaking the consumer finance companies are set up to handle and prefer the smaller type of loan—at the same time loans over $1,500 are becoming more common and the interest rates on them are certainly considerable.

It seems to me, however, that a bill of this type is not the whole answer to the problem. I support the amendment that the matter should be referred to the banking and commerce committee, because it certainly is not a simple problem. The first thought of the ordinary man in the street, or in this house, for that matter, in considering a bill like this is that 12 per cent is enough interest for anybody. Indeed, that is my first reaction. I am sure that in most cases interest of 12 per cent is enough for anybody. Indeed, in some cases it is far too much. But on the other hand I think we have to acknowledge that there is a danger that the passage of this bill would act to prevent people who need and want credit in certain high risk fields from getting it when they should have it. Indeed a case can be made out that there is a certain area of lending where an interest rate of 12 per cent is not at all excessive.

Interest rates are generally set, of course, by supply and demand on the market. I remember when I first began to practice law in my home province of Nova Scotia the prime mortgage rate was 4 per cent. Some 12 years later it was almost double that. The difference was not in the value of the security, because if anything I think the security of properties in my part of the province was greater in recent years than formerly. But the difference was that the supply of money for mortgages was not nearly as great in the latter part of the 1950's as it was in the latter part of the 1940's.

Since money was not in such great supply the mortgage companies had to pay to the investor a higher bond yield so he would make his money available to them. When they added to that the cost of administering loans they were able to say with justice that they needed a much higher interest rate in the late 1950's than they required in the 1940's, when the supply of money outran the demand in most cases. Supply and demand affects interest rates; there is no question about that.

Another thing that affects interest rates, of course, is the risk involved in the loan. Where interest is considered as the reward paid to a lender for the use of his money it is obvious that a man is not going to lend money for the same reward, or price, on a dangerous risk as he would on a good risk. It is also obvious that that is the reason why on most mortgage risks the interest rate is much lower than it is on unsecured loans. All these factors enter into what the interest rate should be and what it is at any particular time.

For that reason, in considering any proposed legislation such as this bill now before us respecting maximum interest rates, we must consider the various types of loans that are made available and how the bill will affect each type of loan. Anyone who would suggest, for example, that the bank rate should be increased from 6 per cent to 12 per cent, or that the banks should be allowed a maximum of 12 per cent would be scoffed out of court. We feel that for business loans 6 per cent is high enough. At the same time many of us will forgive the banks for not entering into the personal loan business in a big way over the years, with a return limited to 6 per cent.

I have mentioned the risk situation and the supply situation. Another very important factor in determining interest rates—as has been said so many times here today—is the cost of administering the type of loan that is made available. Obviously if I borrow $10,000 from a mortgage company or a bank it costs much less for the lender to earn his interest on that money than if I obtained 100 loans of $100 apiece. The same checking has to be done on small loans as on large ones, because no matter what the amount of the loan the lender wants his money returned.

The cost of lending money is much greater in the case of non-business personal loans. The cost of collecting the money is much greater, and of course we do have to give a margin to the man or the company who is in that field for the extra work, trouble and expense to which he goes. However, I feel that there is one particular area of consumer financing where a 12 per cent interest rate would certainly be sufficient, and I refer to the field of the acceptance corporations.

If I go to a car dealer to buy a car on credit the usual situation is that the dealer, after requiring a certain down payment, will ask me to sign a contract to repay the balance owing on the vehicle along with finance charges. I then sign the contract and also a note in which I undertake to pay separate from the contract the amount of money owing on the car plus the finance charges and usually also insurance charges.

If this were a contract between the dealer and me, and the dealer were wondering whether or not he could collect his money there might be some excuse for the high interest rate in view of the risk factor and the cost of administering the loan. But what actually happens is that the car dealer or the retailer of appliances, as the case may be, has in fact nothing to do with the loan. Rather he assigns that contract and the note to the acceptance corporation. Then I must turn up weekly or monthly to make my payments to the acceptance corporation. The rate of interest on these purchase contracts is usually very high. Certainly the rate is high compared with 6 per cent charged by the banks. I cannot help but wonder what justification there is for such high rates in cases of that kind. The acceptance corporation has much more security than the banker ordinarily does on personal loans. And certainly he has twice the security of the consumer finance company which makes an unsecured loan directly to the customer in its office.

The acceptance corporation first of all has a chattel mortgage or rather a conditional sales contract mortgage on the vehicle. Secondly, the acceptance corporation has my signature on the note so that if it must repossess the car and sell it, I can be sued by it for any deficiency on the resale price. In addition to that, since I have signed a note to the dealer as payee which he has endorsed over to the company, the dealer's signature is on the note as an additional endorser. The security of the acceptance corporation is the vehicle itself, my endorsement and the endorsement of the dealer. Certainly the amount of risk in a transaction of this type is small indeed. Indeed, in actual practice if the car is repossessed the acceptance corporation need not even find a market for it. The company merely returns it to the dealer, who under his contract with them is bound to pay the acceptance corporation the balance owing on the vehicle. The dealer in turn must sell the car to get what money he can and if he is interested in so doing he may sue the initial purchaser of the vehicle for any deficiency.

My argument is that, in the case of the acceptance corporation merely accepting contracts from retailers, they ask very high interest rates in relation to the risk they take and the work they do. Indeed I might go further and say they take so little risk the interest rate paid to them is chiefly payment for their work of administering the loan in place of the retailer. It seems to me this would be a proper case for an inquiry and perhaps for an agreement with the provinces which would allow a national regulatory act to come into being with respect to acceptance corporations and instalment companies.

I also believe that the instalment purchase system used by department stores and retailers generally, since it is becoming so important in our modern merchandising, is a field that would be well worth our searching inquiry. I feel that conditions could be improved by introducing some regulation to the system. It is vital that our free economy should be kept free; and that we should interfere as little as possible in the producing and merchandising sectors of the nation. But on the other hand it seems to me that this is a sphere where we could well exert some control as we have done in the case of bank loans. I think the public and the nation would be better off as a result of some machinery to regulate interest charges on instalment contracts particularly in the field of lending of acceptance corporations.

Certainly, however, the answer to the whole problem of the modern citizen in relation to the retailer-financier is not to be found solely in regulation. Some hon. members have spoken of the work done by the credit unions in providing a source of credit to people who otherwise would be unable to obtain it except at high interest rates. While this work has been important, even more important has been the educational work the credit unions have done in this field. Many people who knew little or nothing about financing or modern merchandising methods before joining a credit union, or coming into contact with credit union philosophy, have achieved a better understanding of modern business and of the type of contracts they were entering into with the retailer on the street and merchandise dealers generally, as a result of credit union educational programs.

The best answer is education. Before children leave school they should have some knowledge of interest and instalment purchasing. It seems to me there are too few people who really understand how much interest can increase the cost in the purchase of a car, a home or other goods. Few realize how much the cost of goods can be increased by high interest rates. Certainly it is as important to children as any other part of their education that before they leave school they should be taught what instalment contracts involve and the fundamentals of modern buying and selling.

I agree in principle with the mover of this bill and of the amendment. I hope this subject can be studied more exhaustively either by the banking and commerce committee or a special committee because it is a field which will bear more inquiry as years go on and the merchandising methods of today are extended to additional products.

Instalment contracts have gone hand in hand with mass production and probably mass production and the cheap goods resulting therefrom would not have been possible without the combination of modern merchandising and financing. We reach into many fields to see that the public is protected and to ensure that there is little room for fraud, exploitation and the operation of the clip artists. We could well do it in this sphere as well.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I only want to talk a few minutes so that this important legislation may come to a vote. A few moments ago, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) submitted to the house an amendment to the bill proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), and, if I am in favour of the principle of Bill C-3, which would mean a protection against the flagrant abuse of our working classes, it becomes quite obvious when reading the bill—and I know very well that the hon. member for Assiniboia has no illusion on the matter—that it will not solve the problem of high interest rates.

Many times, in the course of our law practice—and I think that all hon. members who belong to the legal profession will agree with me—do we see legal action taken against people who, after having paid the total amount of their debt and part of the interests are sued for a considerable balance of interest? In those instances, we always say: you are dealing with finance sharks, your are entirely without protection, there is nothing we can do except ask for an extension of time to enable you to pay the balance.

Today, instalment buying has entered our way of life to stay, and we hear often of teams of salesmen who, having been trained for selling from house to house, do some high pressure selling, and often under false pretences, of goods at exorbitant prices. And the buyers, often after having signed a contract they do not quite understand, wake up to find that they are owing considerable sums of money at an extremely high interest rate.

Mr. Speaker, I think that from the social point of view, we cannot leave people unprotected and that it is time the government put a stop to the practice of charging unduly high interest rates, so as to protect the unwary.

I feel that the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Welland is a good answer to this problem. If Bill C-3 is not an answer to the problem, we should therefore give it careful study. Indeed, was it not the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself who said that he had to keep his many members occupied and that the best way to do so was to keep them busy in the committees? Well, here is a perfect opportunity; let the matter of high interest rates be referred to an appropriate committee. That committee could at one and the same time go into the matter of interest rates charged by the banks, the caisses populaires and the lending institutions. I feel that if a comprehensive study of the problem were made, that committee could come up with interesting suggestions. The government could then introduce a bill to meet the problem of high interest rates.

Today people sometimes wonder why chartered banks do not engage directly in car sales financing, for instance. I am fully aware that a few years ago when the going was good—I refer to the years prior to 1956 and 1957—some banks had undertaken to finance that type of contract, but since the rate a bank is allowed to charge is restricted to 6 per cent, they were unable to meet the demand.

In my opinion, if the committee on banking and commerce considered the matter, it might result in banks being able to engage in this type of financing. I am convinced that chartered banks would not charge 12 per cent but that they would be satisfied with an interest rate not exceeding 8 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, there are two undeniable facts. On the one hand, as I was saying earlier, sales on the deferred payment plan exist and will perhaps be even more readily available in a few years, while, on the other hand, loan companies can also render services to people in cases where chartered banks and credit unions might not be in a position to do so. It is therefore a question of finding out what legislation could answer the needs of those who wish to borrow money.

I think that the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Welland should be put to the vote by the government and that we should look carefully into this matter this very session.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. members who have spoken before me have pointed out the fact that members from this side of the house have not yet taken the floor. Now, the proposed amendment which constitutes a proper solution to the matter now under discussion was introduced by a member of the official opposition. We are therefore providing the government with an opportunity of finding an answer to this problem.

I hope that the hon. members opposite will stop talking before ten o'clock so that the amendment of the hon. member for Welland may come to a vote.

(Text):

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I find that while I can agree with the spirit of the amendment. I cannot accept the wording of the bill although I can agree with its spirit also. I believe the members of the C.C.F. group could do a service to this parliament if they would put a little more research and hard work in preparing the bills which they bring before this house. All that we have heard from the two spokesmen of the C.C.F. party are intemperate, wild and unfounded statements. For instance, Mr. Speaker, if you refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) when he introduced this bill on February 12, 1959, you will find that in three places on pages 951 and 952 he suggests that the chartered banks should be charged with providing money in small amounts, and that they were not doing this job. And yet, when he introduced his bill today he took a fair amount of time telling us how he believed the chartered banks were cutting corners because they are lending money in small amounts to small borrowers. He intimated that they are acting in a strictly illegal manner when they do this.

The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), who certainly should know better, referred to the fact that this is the fifth time and he thinks it is the fifth full day of debate on this bill. If he will only cast his mind back to last session he will recall that he was closest to the flood of oratory from the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) who filibustered for the entire session and not only this bill but all bills put forward by a private member were held up. No bills got other than first reading which, as the hon. member knows, is strictly a formality in introducing a bill into the house and takes only a few seconds. Yet he stands up and in spite of this recent event, the memory of which should be in his mind, makes this statement. He goes after hon. members on this side of the house who have spoken, who have honestly and conscientiously tried to place the bill before the house in its proper light by giving the points in favour and the points against. Oh, he says, they are not doing their job. This is not what they are supposed to do. He says that they are filibustering. As an expert in filibustering himself perhaps we should take his word, but this is not so.

Members on this side of the house are trying to do the job that the sponsor of the bill should have done and did not do. The sponsor of the bill should have prepared a case. He should have been able to give us facts and figures as to the profits made by these loan companies. He should have been able to present a case to the house which could have been debated and a decision then arrived at, but all we got was sound and fury, wild accusations as to the horrible part played in our economy by the loan sharks. That phrase was repeated time and again. He damned everybody who lends money as being a loan shark.

In his rebuttal, as the hon. member for Timmins called it, he carried on in the same way. He referred to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) saying that certain loan companies had lost money and, according to the hon. member for Timmins, the answer is that they juggled the books. He talks about people being victimized by very high rates and says it is because service is denied them through the proper channels. What proper channels? What facts are we given? What work has been done by members of the C.C.F. party in preparing the case to put before the house so that we can come to a reasoned decision? I suggest that they did not do their homework. They did not prepare the case properly and that has been the reason for this day-long debate during which members on this side of the house have earnestly tried to search out the truth with respect to this problem.

This is a seemingly simple bill, Mr. Speaker. It simply says that no one shall charge any interest rate in excess of 1 per cent per month and that is the end of it. The job we have had to do is to show that the problems is not that simple. Since the beginning of time legislatures have tried to cope with the problem of usury and as recently as 1956 representatives of all parties in the house sat on a committee that considered representations from all interested parties and the result was the Small Loans Act. That is not such a long time ago and conditions have not changed so drastically since.

This does not mean that a case could not be made out for amendments to the act but not in the form in which the hon. member for Assiniboia has presented them because all he has done in his omniscient, omnipotent and all-knowing manner is to say: This is the answer, accept it and there you are. That is why I say that the amendment proposed by the official opposition brings a breath of reason and sanity into this debate which has been lacking in the presentations made by hon. members of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Broome: Certainly.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Does the hon. member think it could bring about a vote?

Mr. Broome: I do not know. I have not the faintest idea how many members wish to participate in this debate. We on this side believe in the free discussion of every problem that comes before the House of Commons. I am not one who is going to try to deny the right of any hon. member to speak in any debate to which he feels he has a contribution to make. I have noticed that members of the C.C.F. party have never hesitated to pose as experts on every subject that comes before the house. All you have got to do is look at the index of Hansard to see what restraint they have exercised.

Mr. Cardiff: Whether or not they knew anything about the subject.

Mr. Broome: That is exactly the point I have been trying to make. Society today is built almost entirely on credit. I would venture to say that the cessation of credit would bring about a depression of a depth and magnitude which would satisfy even the fondest hopes of hon. members on the other side. They would get everything they want. If we dry up credit, if we try to stop this way of life we have developed we will be in trouble. I am not saying that the system is good, bad or indifferent but I am saying that we live in an age in which our economic life is based on credit and credit is perhaps the most important factor in our western economy.

Such a bill could be of advantage by eliminating abuses but it could also do irreparable harm. It is like tinkering with the control mechanism of a mighty engine. It cannot be done in a brash manner. It must be done after full investigation and having obtained full knowledge of what the results will be. Therefore the amendment to refer the bill to a special committee which will be able to study all the problems and to assess what are the true costs of doing business and what are proper interest rates is a welcome one. I honestly do not believe that the hon. member for Assiniboia knows what are the proper rates that should be charged for different types of business and under varying circumstances.

These are answers that would have to come out and the answers would not be easy to arrive at. Such answers would have a profound effect upon our economy if the matter was not fully considered. I remember that the Social Credit people had a phrase to the effect that what is socially desirable is economically feasible, and this bill is the sort of grab-all type of thing which has just about as much substance to it as the phrase I have just cited.

I am not going into the points of view which have been covered by other members on this side with regard to the degree of risk which is taken in respect of different accounts and what should be the compensation to the lender if he does assume these risks. The greater the risk, the greater the return the lender will ask, and that is only natural. The same is true of insurance. Have two or three accidents and you will find out what you have to pay for insurance. That is normal business practice. It is not normal business practice and it is not even common sense to think that you can legislate common sense into people, that you can legislate goodness into people, that you can legislate righteousness into people.

But that is not to say that the state does not have a responsibility to see that the people of the nation are protected against outrageous rates of interest, against deceptive advertising, against the almost crooked dealing in the way contracts are drawn. I abhor just as much as any member of the C.C.F. party second mortgages with very high discounts, the trickery that goes with them and the fact that a person can pay and pay and after paying for five or ten years can owe more at the end of that time than when he started to pay. These conditions are not right, and they should be looked into and corrected. I do not agree that the hon. member for Assiniboia is the person who knows what is the right answer. It was for this reason I started my remarks by saying it would have been a service to this house if this case had been better prepared, if a little bit of work had been done to really substantiate what the hon. member said was the right thing to do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel I have injected other factors into this debate. This was my intention. I must say, in conclusion, that if this bill comes to a vote I certainly believe the amendment will receive the support of many people who feel as I do.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): It was not my intention to say anything in this debate. However, I cannot allow to go unchallenged the statements made by the handsome member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome), who used a very old, worn out vocal broom to try to sweep away the arguments of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Broome: What arguments?

Mr. Herridge: First of all, he referred to the intemperate arguments of the hon. member for Assiniboia. He is mistaking emphasis and repetition throughout for intemperance. Then, the hon. gentleman mentioned that the hon. member for Assiniboia had not presented any facts. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that the hon. member for Assiniboia has been presenting this bill to this house year after year. You cannot continue to repeat and make the same speech year after year. He has to present the argument in another form, and that is what he did today.

Mr. Broome: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Broome: Can the hon. member tell me how this speech differed from any other speech the hon. member for Assiniboia has ever made on this subject?

Mr. Herridge: It did not differ in principle and purpose, but it differed in so far as the arguments and evidence were concerned. I think if the hon. gentleman reads the previous speeches of the hon. member for Assiniboia he will see that.

Mr. Broome: I have and they don't.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman reads.

Mr. Broome: A person who was caught out this morning on orders of the day for only reading the headlines should not be mentioning such a touchy problem.

Mr. Herridge: I am quite tolerant toward the hon. gentleman. He is wandering around, but I do not mind listening. He is doing it, of course, to take up the time until ten o'clock.

Then, the hon. gentleman accused the hon. member for Timmins, or at least some of the members of our group, of filibustering in connection with other debates. Does he not realize that the end of that filibuster resulted in a member from his own party moving a bill which partly achieved the aim of those who were filibustering. They were successful in that respect. They moved a member on the government side to action partly in the direction they intended the government to go.

Mr. Broome: I think in all fairness the hon. member will agree I was not criticizing the filibuster, as such, but simply using it to point out that the hon. member for Timmins must have sat there time after time and made statements in rebuttal which could not have been true because of the filibuster.

Mr. Herridge: This is a most interesting debate between the hon. member for Vancouver South and myself. I am very pleased to see I have caused him to rise from his seat for a few minutes during this session.

He accused our members of filibustering in several respects. What has happened in the last five years when the hon. member for Assiniboia has introduced this bill? Members on the government side of the house have talked out the bill on each occasion. There has been no suggestion for improving the bill by way of amendments. I am sure the hon. member for Assiniboia recognizes fully that it is possible to improve the bill. He would welcome assistance from members on the government side of the house to improve this bill and in securing the legislation that he desires to protect the interests of the people who suffer under present circumstances.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I rose to support the principle and purpose of the bill. There is no need for me to repeat the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Assiniboia or the hon. member for Timmins which, in my opinion, cannot be successfully challenged. No one has challenged the principle of the arguments or the purpose of the bill today. I think all members of this house, if they approach this question fairly, recognize that the bill aims to deal with a financial cancer and evil that exists in our society because of the needs of certain people who find themselves in difficult circumstances.

I want to say that while I think it is essential that we have some legislation along the lines suggested by this Bill No. C-3 as moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia, I do have great faith in the value of the credit unions mentioned by the hon. member for Timmins in assisting, shall I say, or co-operating with legislation in overcoming the grip these financial companies have on those who are in need of short term credit to alleviate certain difficult and temporary circumstances. I have had some experience in that respect. I like this idea of legislation and rank and file action in the work of the credit unions in finally removing, shall I say, the evils we are seeking to remove. I think both are necessary.

We have been very successful with the credit union movement in Kootenay West. I can never speak on this subject without mentioning my constituency. We have a number of these credit unions in such places as Rossland, Trail, New Denver and Nakusp. I remember 10 of us got together many years ago to form a credit union with $200. A lot of the hon. gentleman's friends laughed at us on that occasion and said the workingman is not capable of running his own affairs. Fancy running a bank; they will go broke in four years. Now, I cannot remember the figures, but I think the Trail credit union has assets of $4 million, and I know some people have been advised to go to the Trail credit union to get loans that the bank would not provide. This actually happened during the last year. It is training in the practice of the principles of economic and social democracy. I say we want legislation to supplement the activities of these, shall I say, rank and file organizations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must say we support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) which proposes that this bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee for consideration and report. Conditions have changed in the last few years. I think this was a sensible amendment. I want to say right here that I consider the hon. member for Welland a very practical and common sense member. He does not speak at great length. I never saw a doctor who could needle a lawyer to better advantage when it comes to financial questions than the hon. member for Welland. I think his suggestion is a good one, and we support it. It is obvious the members on the government side of the house are not going to allow this bill to pass. They are going to talk it out. I have seen the whip running in and out trying to get some of the boys to come along and carry on the debate. I understand how this is done.

We support this amendment because it is obvious the bill is going to be talked out. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver South supported the amendment timidly but, as he suggested, it will provide an opportunity for a committee to study this question, which is a serious question. An opportunity will be provided to hear representations from credit unions, from trade unions, farmers' organizations and other types of organizations, as well as from the finance companies themselves. We will have an opportunity to get the facts as they are at the present time and make a report to this house.

Surely no one can object to that. No one who has any concern about the welfare of these people and who recognizes the need for legislation of this type can oppose the amendment moved by the hon. member for Welland. This procedure will provide the facts, the opinions and the opportunity for a report to this house. I am certain that report will further strengthen the opinion of the members of this group as to the need for legislation to correct the present situation.

In conclusion I make this request of members on the government side of the house. If I am correct, I presume that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, could use his tremendous influence within the party to which he belongs with a view to having them support this amendment this evening so that this matter could be referred to the banking and commerce committee as recommended by the hon. member for Welland. I may be wrong. It may be the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois)—I note that he is taking a great interest in the question—or it may be the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) or it may be the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Dinsdale). I know that he is a man of heart. He is a man of principle whom I respect as I respect the others. I urge the responsible cabinet minister or the person on the government side this evening responsible for leading the house that he pass the word around to their members that this is a golden opportunity presented to them by the introduction of this bill and by the hon. member for Welland to have this question studied, to have the public concerned present evidence and make representations and to have the banking and commerce committee make a report so that at least next session we shall have legislation to which the government can point with pride as something to the advantage of the Canadian people.

(Translation):

Mr. Rene Letourneau (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, just a few words to express my views on Bill C-3 now before us and which deals with the limitation of interest rates.

The buying power of a country is the criterion of its economic strength. Whether you live in town or in the country, when the goods put up for sale by large or small dealers do not sell because there is no money about, it clearly indicates bad times.

It is obviously among the small people that you find an often unfulfilled wish to buy. One man wants clothing or toys for his family; another wants to buy furniture. Others again dream about owning a car.

Anyway, people want to buy, but have they always got the necessary money? It is at this point that the loan companies come in. They advertise everywhere, in the papers, on the air, on television, in short they use all media of publicity.

Now here is the man who has obtained some money thanks to a loan. He is pleased, and buys what he wants. But the finance company which has given him this loan will expect each month a call from that small wage earner. And he will have to pay to the last cent, not only the amount lent to him, but also unduly high interests.

Everybody has a right to live, of course. A finance company cannot operate and survive without guarantees. The man who asks a bank or a credit union for money to pay his mortgage, must give some guarantee for his solvency; this is but normal.

But, if it is used to strangle the borrower, it must be avoided.

The bill now submitted to us is a step in the right direction. It aims at lowering to a maximum of 12 per cent the interest rate on loans.

I feel that it is the duty of any government to administer the affairs of the nation and to protect its citizens. This field offers a good opportunity to give such protection. Any abuse is to be condemned. There should be no usurers in this world of ours.

I am not an expert in the legal field but I know, as a businessman, that this bill has some merit. Many years ago people who could not pay their debts were sent to jail. Society has become more civilized and the law has been wisely modified.

I am one of those who believe that everyone has a right to live. There should be no hardship in this world. Luxury is out of reach for the poor while the destitute lack the necessities of life.

It is understandable that at one time or another one should have to borrow money. One is short of money and goes to a lending institution which grants the loan but this does not give the institution the right to strangle the borrower by charging him prohibitive interest rates.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the principle of this bill is good and deserves my support.

In my constituency, there are many people who live in small towns, others in rural areas on farms. They all have the right to live and be happy. And I am happy to see, when I visit rural areas, that many enjoy television and that many have a car to drive around.

It is a good sign. It means that business is not so bad after all.

However, much remains to be done. Perfection is not of this world. However, I think our government has shown its willingness to help the people of Canada by providing means for better technical training. Let us at the same time protect people from profiteers, it will be a further good answer to our many problems.

(Text):

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have heard some good arguments in the house today against the hurried passage of this Bill No. C-3. These arguments need not be repeated here but I think we should all read them carefully in Hansard in an effort to decide exactly what is involved. As the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) said earlier today there are in this bill greater implications than would appear on the surface. All of us are in sympathy with the principle of placing reasonable limits on the rates of interest that can be charged to borrowers of money. I am sure we all wish to protect the interest—if I may be able to use that word in another sense —of those who find it necessary or perhaps to their advantage to apply for a loan from some lending institution. The sponsor of this bill has no monopoly on this desire to protect borrowers.

Just in order to put the record straight, may I say this. I think it could be taken for granted that there would be few dissenting votes against putting a limit on interest charges at the rate suggested if we could be certain that by so doing we were not working a hardship on any prospective borrower; that is to say, if we could be certain that such a regulation would not remove or at least greatly reduce the borrowing sources of those who might not be able to obtain loans through low interest lending channels.

Reference has been made to the more recently established practice of making small personal loans through chartered banks or credit unions. I have a copy of a statement by one of the banks showing its rates of interest on these small personal loans. These lending operations by the banks and credit unions fill a big need in our present-day borrowing practices. But they do not and they cannot under their present set-up satisfy all the demands of all borrowers. The most likely effect of a measure such as the one proposed in this bill, as I see it, would be to greatly hinder the granting of small personal loans from what are now somewhat generally described as finance companies.

Reference has been made by previous speakers to the operation reports of these companies. The completeness of these reports indicates that they are under very close supervision, as indicated by this report of the superintendent of insurance for Canada. It is entitled, "Small loans companies and moneylenders licensed under the Small Loans Act". The completeness of the report certainly indicates that these small lending companies are very closely scrutinized and supervised. The table of contents shows, "Statements of small loans companies; Abstract of annual statements of small loans companies and moneylenders; Consolidated exhibits of small loans companies and moneylenders; List of small loans companies and moneylenders showing the location of their head offices".

Then in the appendices, "Appendix A—List of licensees showing number of branch offices of small loans companies and moneylenders at December 31, 1957 and 1958". That is the last report we have. Then "Appendix B—List of localities by province in which small loans companies and moneylenders operate and number of offices in each locality as at December 31, 1958". "Appendix C—Statement of assessments made upon small loans companies and moneylenders for expenses of supervision for the year ended March 31, 1958".

That is a complete statement of the operations of these companies for the last year. There are four small loans companies and 75 companies listed as moneylenders. Each one shows the number of accounts for small loans made, and the amount; small loans balances, number of accounts, amount and the total income.

I suggest that under this very close supervision the operations of these companies, although they probably charge more than the interest named in this bill, are very closely scrutinized.

I have very little time left at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, before the ten o'clock adjournment. I have not had time to fully develop my argument against the passage of this bill without further study. I think we have had a very good day bringing out the different points. I think each member is entitled to express his opinion.

As I said, I think we all agree with the principle of this bill and I think we all agree that the proposer of this bill is sincere in his beliefs in introducing such a measure to limit the interest rate to 12 per cent. But I repeat that I do not think limiting small loans to 12 per cent at this time would be in the interests of all.

I referred a short time ago to small loans from the banks under the new policy they have established. They list in this advertisement that one can obtain a loan with six months to pay, and they set out the cost of the loan to the borrower. I think that is a good idea and I think that could probably be developed to a greater extent, to show the borrower what he is paying.

However, I repeat that some borrowers who cannot borrow under this arrangement are willing to pay higher interest rates to obtain the money they need at a certain time. In conclusion I want to express agreement with the suggestion that the problems connected with small loans and rates of interest be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the house leader what the business will be tomorrow, and perhaps at the same time we could get some indication of what it will be next week.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, as I think I have already said, the budget debate will be carried on tomorrow. As I understand the new rules which are in effect, there will be a division late tomorrow afternoon.

On Monday, according to the rules it is private members' day, which rule will be followed. On Tuesday we will again proceed with the budget debate. Further than that I would not like to go at this moment, but we will make an announcement either tomorrow or Monday with respect to Wednesday and Thursday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY—REPORT TO THE GOVERNMENTS OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

On October 19, 1960 the governments of the United States of America and Canada accepted as a basis for drafting a treaty the joint progress report which had been submitted by the negotiators on September 28, 1960.

The two delegations accordingly submit the attached draft of the treaty which they recommend for signature and ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the respective Governments.

Signed at Ottawa this 8th day of January, 1961.

The house met at 11 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH COSTA RICA, HONDURAS, NICARAGUA, PANAMA AND ECUADOR

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform hon. members that the Canadian government and the governments of the republics of Costa Rica, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama have agreed to establish diplomatic relations. The Canadian ambassador to these four republics will be appointed shortly. He will normally reside in San Jose, Costa Rica, but will spend some time each year in the capitals of the three other republics to which he will be concurrently accredited: Managua, Nicaragua, Tegucigalpa, Honduras and Panama City, Panama. The four governments have indicated their intention to be represented in Ottawa by giving double accreditation to their ambassadors to neighbouring countries until such time as resident ambassadors can be appointed to Canada.

I wish also to announce that the Canadian government and the government of the republic of Ecuador have agreed to exchange ambassadors. The Canadian ambassador to Columbia, Mr. Jean Morin, will be accredited as Canadian ambassador to Ecuador. Mr. Morin will continue to serve as Canadian ambassador to Columbia and will normally reside in Bogota but will spend some time each year in Quito. During the ambassador's absence from Quito, the Canadian embassy in Ecuador will be under a resident chargé d'affaires ad interim. The Canadian government is looking forward to receiving the first Ecuadorean ambassador to Canada in the near future.

Representation at this high level reflects the intention of the Canadian government and of the governments concerned to strengthen and improve diplomatic, cultural and commercial relations. It is a further recognition of the importance of the growing ties between Canada and Latin America.

Finally, hon. members will be pleased to learn that the Canadian government has now formally accepted an invitation from the council of the Organization of American States to send an observer to the eleventh inter-American conference, which will be held at Quito later this year.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the members of the house will have listened with considerable interest to the minister's announcement regarding the extension of our diplomatic representation in Latin American countries. I gathered from his remarks that this extension of our Canadian diplomatic representation will now cover practically every Latin American country, although I understand there are four still outside the diplomatic field. I do not know how the minister is going to be able to explain to them their exclusion from this relationship.

Mr. Green: If I may interrupt, I should point out that moves are under way with regard to these other countries.

Mr. Pearson: I think the extension is a desirable one because it underlines the friendly relationship we have with these countries and the growing importance of that relationship to Canada. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it represents another stage in our approach to membership in the organization of American states. There seems to be some doubt about government policy in that regard, but with our extension of diplomatic representation and with our acceptance of the invitation to be an observer at the next meeting of the organization of American states, I believe a decision on this matter will have to be made before long.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group welcome the announcement which was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which indicates the growing importance of an increasing number of the Latin American countries, coincidental with the growing importance of the African and Asian countries, and the development of democracy in those nations, their influence and their prestige in the world. We welcome this announcement which will provide another opportunity for Canada to work with these nations in a spirit of good will and co-operation.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF NEXT MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him if a date has yet been fixed for the resumption of the dominion-provincial conference.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Are discussions being carried on by correspondence between the federal government and respresentatives of the provinces?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There has been some correspondence, and discussions naturally continue from time to time in that regard.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL AND TERMS OF REFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the great interest of Canadians in his announcement that a royal commission on national health requirements would be set up. I ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to announce the terms of reference of this commission and the full personnel, as he indicated he would be prepared to do early in the beginning of the new session.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the Prime Minister could give some indication to the house as to when he may be in a position to make this announcement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will let the house know as soon as I am in a position to do so.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REPORTED TENDERS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF UNDERGROUND BUNKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Fairfield (Portage-Neepawa): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a press release which states that the government is now ready to call for tenders on contracts for construction of underground bunkers to house priority government and military personnel in time of nuclear war. Would the Prime Minister be prepared at this time to make a statement on this matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The hon. member gave me notice that he intended to ask this question. I presume he was motivated by the fact that the Financial Post set forth in rather dramatic form a description of what was being done or was anticipated or at least, in so far as that article was concerned, the view of the editor or the writer in question. Because of the fact that it was rather overdramatized I have a statement in this regard which, with the leave of the house, I should like to make in answer to the question.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the Prime Minister has the leave of the house to make a statement at this time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The article in question refers to the program of building regional centres for emergency purposes in wartime. That program was announced by me on May 31, 1960 and in the announcement I set forth in part the situation in these words, which will be found at page 4359 of Hansard of that date:

> The plan is to provide in each province a centre from which a small core of federal, provincial and army personnel can direct emergency operations within the province, even in the presence of radioactive fall-out, the loss of normal means of communication and possibly the destruction of some provincial capitals.

Then later on I said this:

> Regional centres will be established speedily in each of the provinces.

In accordance with that announcement work has gone forward on the preparation of designs and specifications for these centres and the choice of sites for them. No further announcements have been made since the announcement in question because it was necessary to acquire property in certain provinces for construction purposes with regard to six of the sites. The properties are now acquired. The designs are completed, and the army will be ready within a few weeks to have Defence Construction Limited call for tenders. This program has been discussed in detail with the provinces, and the provincial governments are co-operating in the preparations for carrying on government under conditions of nuclear war with the assistance of the use of these various centres.

Again I point out in this regard that the fact that these precautionary measures are being taken and action in this regard is being proceeded with is not in any way to be taken by the Canadian people as evidence of a worsening of the international position or of imminent fear of possible nuclear attack.

[Later:]

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question based on the question asked by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa. Can the Prime Minister indicate to the house what action is to be carried out by the government to maintain the processes of government, in the event of a nuclear attack?

Mr. Diefenbaker: On July 17, 1959, I stated that facilities were being made ready from which a central corps of the dominion government would carry on under conditions of nuclear war even if there was a serious fallout in the area. All I can add to what I said then is that we are now considering dispersing a number of key persons who would carry on emergency government functions in wartime in small groups outside Ottawa, so there would not be a concentration within the city of Ottawa. I think I can go no further than that.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED RETRAINING OF UNEMPLOYED WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, and I apologize for not having had time to send him notice of it. It arises out of an announcement in the Toronto Star of a metro Toronto program for the training of unemployed workers. It reports that federal officials of the Department of Labour are vague about the details of the retraining program.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pitman: Can the Minister of Labour indicate the reasons for the vagueness of his department in a matter of such great importance?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): There does not seem to be any vagueness about the plan in the other provinces because of their activity in this field. No other province has indicated that there is any vagueness at all about this program.

Mr. Pitman: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate why these programs of retraining of unemployed workers are being set up under schedule M of the Canadian vocational training act, 1952 rather than under section 3, article (1) (a) of Bill C-49 recently passed in this house?

Mr. Starr: The training is under the new act, under schedule M.

ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED EVICTION NOTICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Public Works whether he is now in a position to deal with the question I put to the Minister of Labour yesterday concerning the housing situation at Elliot Lake?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): This morning on my return from Toronto I learned of the question which had been asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I shall be very glad to get that information for him.

THE CENSUS

FORM OF QUESTION RESPECTING RACIAL ORIGIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister inform the house whether changes are going to be made regarding question No. 10 of the census. If the answer is in the affirmative, can we hope that the changes will be announced before the beginning of the census?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recall, as I do, that two questions were asked yesterday on this matter. As I recall it, the reply given was that it was a question of policy, to be announced when any decision was made.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister recall having promised the opportunity for a discussion on this matter of the census, and if so, when can we expect this discussion to take place?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting to hear some discussion on this. We have a debate on the budget proceeding at the present time and every opportunity is available to hon. members to voice their views on this or any other matter.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege respecting the question of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) and the answer of the Prime Minister. The undertaking was given in the house by the Prime Minister, when the supplementary estimates were before the house, to the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) that an opportunity—not the budget debate, but an opportunity—would be given for this debate. It was on that basis that those supplementary estimates went through the house with great expedition on that occasion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to let Hansard speak and not to accept the misinterpretation that has become the prominent and effective means of criticism on the part of the hon. gentleman. I ask him to read where I said that a day would be set aside or the opportunity would come. For some reason, with the opportunity here for the fullest discussion in the budget debate, silence has been the order of the day of the opposition in this regard.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): On the question of privilege, sir, I think we will be quite happy to take a look at Hansard and recall what was said on that occasion. But I cannot let the words of the Prime Minister go unchallenged when he says that silence of the opposition is the order of the day. In so far as this question is concerned—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: —silence of the government has been the order of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the hon. member for Laurier wishes to make a new question of privilege out of the comment of the Prime Minister, what he says about silence does not relate to the original question.

Mr. Chevrier: I was asking to be allowed to speak on the question of privilege which was raised by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hees: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Chevrier: And, sir, I was taking this opportunity to say that on the question of the census there has been greater silence from the Prime Minister than from this side of the house, and he has an opportunity—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not entitled to raise a debate on the question of privilege. I have not yet found that there is a prima facie question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, so that the record will be clear and so that even hon. gentlemen opposite will understand, I would refer to Hansard of December 20, page 989. This is the question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate:

> In view of the fact that the leader of the house did not object at all when we had a debate about the parliamentary restaurant on an item dealing with the Senate manpower committee—

We were at that time dealing with the question of the expenses of a royal commission on Canadian magazines. That was the item before the house at the time the hon. member for Levis asked the question. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate then followed and said:

> In view of the fact that the leader of the house did not object at all when we had a debate about the parliamentary restaurant on an item dealing with the Senate manpower committee, in which debate no one in this house participated—

Mr. Benidickson: It is "this party".

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker:

> —I suggest that we would save a great deal of time if the hon. gentleman were allowed to proceed.

In other words, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked that this matter should come up under the heading of the expenses of the royal commission. The Hansard report continues:

> As a matter of fact, I should like very much to hear this matter discussed. We shall have it discussed immediately after we resume in January. We are going to have a debate on the baby budget. I presume that if the usual course of discussion is allowed and is followed, every opportunity will be given for the fullest discussion of this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of what has been read by the Prime Minister it is quite obvious that the Prime Minister is right and that my memory is mistaken. I express regret that my memory was mistaken.

An hon. Member: What about the hon. member for Laurier?

Mr. Chevrier: Since the Prime Minister invites me to comment on his statement, I have no comment to make because, as the record makes clear, I said we would abide by what was said by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Argue: Silence would have been much better this morning.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask a question supplementary to the original question, occasioned by representations made to me by some members of the Native Sons of Canada. In the consideration being given to the 1961 census, question 10, and possible changes in it, would the Prime Minister and his colleagues keep in the forefront of their awareness the thought that many Canadians think of themselves as Canadians, not as hyphenated Canadians, and would so wish to declare themselves?

Mr. Speaker: I take it the hon. member is presenting an argument to be taken into consideration when a decision on this matter is reached. I think it would be more appropriate if he were to take advantage of future opportunity for debate.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY MINISTER OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. With a view to having the Department of Labour operate in the most efficient manner possible at this time, will the Prime Minister say when the appointment of a deputy minister of labour may be forthcoming?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): That will not be long delayed.

AIRPORTS

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION AT INTERMEDIATE POINTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In the light of the applications now before the air transport board for air service as a milk run between Montreal and/or Ottawa and Oshawa and/or Windsor, will the department or the government build airports at intermediate points between two large centres such as at Cornwall and Brockville?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): These applications are before the air transport board at the present time. They are being discussed. So far I have not been approached about the building of those airports. I do not know what decision will be arrived at on this subject. Of course it will depend on the decision of the air transport board.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. What is the policy of the government with respect to the construction of airports at intermediate points, such as the two I have mentioned?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Department of Transport, so far as airports are concerned, has been to give excellent service to Canadians as it is needed and I am quite sure that that policy will be carried on in this case.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1959-60 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture on his return to the House of Commons. In view of the very difficult cash situation on the prairies, will the minister be in a position at an early date to announce an interim payment on the 1959-60 wheat crop?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think it is the plan of the wheat board to continue as usual. I think the payment the hon. member refers to will be forthcoming about the middle of February.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question. Has the minister or his department given any consideration to the possibility in the future, if not at this time, of having those payments made at an early date instead of following this very discreditable pattern set by the former administration?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): All I can say in answer to that question is that we do not like the pattern of the previous government in so far as borrowing money and making payments is concerned. It certainly is the plan of the government to follow the procedure of making the payments when the money is available.

Mr. Argue: The money should have been there.

THE BUDGET

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 17, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated my approval of the budget proposals which, coupled with the governments's legislative program, will do much for the national economy and to stimulate employment. I have a proposal to present to the house—perhaps you might call it an idea—which I believe would more closely be the next logical step in this development. In presenting this proposal I hope that hon. members will permit me to refer to my notes more closely than usual.

I wish to call this plan the Canadian products plan. It is a plan designed to improve the Canadian internal economy and to make better provision for those Canadians on welfare assistance. It is put forward as a beginning only, and can be enlarged and developed to encompass additional segments of the economy as circumstances require.

The plan is based on several assumptions. First, Canada is rich in food, clothing and products for shelter and comfort, all the basic necessities of life. There is no economic reason why any needy person should be deprived of these basics. However, it is much too simple to literally reach into our wheat bins for bread, into our orchards for fruit and into our mills for lumber and textiles. On the other hand the mere handing out of increasing sums of money to be spent in an economy overbalanced with imported goods. makes the situation worse instead of better. We must find a way to get our Canadian products into the hands of the welfare recipients for the benefit of the Canadian economy which provides both products and money.

The second assumption is that the needs of those receiving welfare payments are constantly on the increase in an expanding economy. The government is now facing demands from all sides for increased welfare and pension benefits in order to maintain recipients on the standards reached even three years ago. These demands will have to be met, and in the course of the development of human betterment policies, new categories may be created in the future.

The third assumption is that in the past, two methods have been attempted in order to sell Canadian products to the Canadian public. The first has been the control of imports by arbitrary methods such as tariffs. Experience has shown the futility of relying solely upon such external pressures. We are a trading nation, and we must not jeopardize our export markets. We are also legally bound by the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and the cumbersome methods of international amendment make external changes difficult.

The second method has been that of trying to stop Canadians from buying imports with "buy Canadian" campaigns and by appealing to the patriotism of the public to buy Canadian, even if the product costs a few cents more. Sad as it may seem, these appeals largely fail. A housewife working on a limited budget is more interested in saving a few cents here and there than in inquiring about the source of the product.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I should like to ask for a little better attention for him. There seems to be more conversation than usual going on in the house. I hope hon. members will give the hon. member who has the floor a courteous hearing.

Mr. Aiken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am presenting what I consider to be a very important and even spectacular proposal. It may not be as interesting to listen to as some of the debates we have, but I feel it is a proposal that deserves very serious consideration.

The situation of the housewife in trying to save money here and there applies even more to welfare recipients. We must, therefore, devise a plan to be applied internally in Canada, without imposing direct trade barriers, to provide recipients with an incentive to buy Canadian products. This will provide Canadian markets for the industries and producers who are paying the taxes, without depriving them of their export markets. Quite aside, Mr. Speaker, from the question of welfare payments, it is surely a basic principle that when public funds raised by Canadian taxes are being used in public works the content of such works must be Canadian in order to provide full employment and continuing tax revenues.

My plan is divided into two separate parts. The first I call the Canadian products incentive plan. Simply stated, this plan would provide for payment by the federal government to pensioners of a bonus, which I have set arbitrarily for the moment at 10 per cent, on all purchases of certified Canadian products made with pension or welfare funds. The plan would extend to non-contributory pensions provided or subsidized in whole or in part by the government of Canada, including such welfare payments as old age security, family allowances, veterans pensions, war veterans allowances, old age assistance, blind and disabled persons pensions. This plan, if it were thought fit, could also be extended to contributory allowances such as military, R.C.M.P. and civil service pensions and unemployment insurance, or to any other segment of the economy as circumstances might require.

This plan would envisage first the setting up of a Canadian products certification board; second, setting up a paying authority and, third, the application of the plan to such Canadian products as are required for food, clothing, shelter and household furnishings but not including items generally regarded as luxuries.

The second part of this plan would be called the Canadian products requirement plan. This would require that all materials provided and labour performed in buildings and works for which the federal government provides funds or lends funds in whole or in part shall be Canadian labour and Canadian products as defined by the Canadian products certification board. This plan would extend to residential or commercial buildings constructed under the National Housing Act, with industrial development bank loans or with any other public funds of Canada, and would apply to all contracts for public works awarded by the government of Canada, defence contracts for armaments not available in Canada excepted. Where Canadian products are not available or for aesthetic reasons imported materials are considered advisable or necessary, non-Canadian products up to 15 per cent of the total contract amount could be used, but a penalty of 10 per cent of the cost of such non-Canadian goods would be imposed, payable to the paying authority under the Canadian products plan. This plan could be extended to any other classification of public spending now or hereafter established, such as the small business loans recently provided by the house.

In connection with administration, simplicity of administration is a primary object of the plan. There would be three separate phases of administration, the first being classification of products. For this purpose a new agency known as the Canadian products certification board would have to be established. Every manufacturer or producer of a Canadian product could apply to the board for a certificate bearing an identifying number upon proof that any described product is a Canadian product. Where practical, a distinctive marker bearing the certificate number could be applied to the product or printed on the label. Otherwise the product would be identified by a certain certificate number.

The board could classify products as Canadian in the following manners or in such other manner as they may adopt:

1. Products wholly produced, processed, fabricated, packaged and distributed in Canada.

2. Products not native to or normally produced in Canada, which are in common use and accepted as necessaries, and which are imported into Canada in raw form and wholly fabricated, processed, packaged and distributed in Canada so that at least 50 per cent of wholesale cost is developed in Canada, and for which there is not a similar product or substitute available in Canada.

3. Products fabricated, processed, packaged and distributed in Canada, partly of imported raw products and partly of Canadian raw products, provided that the Canadian raw content be not less than equal value with the imported raw product.

The second phase would require certification of purchase. One might ask how, if these products are so classified, purchasing would be controlled and on what basis. My plan would be that every retail dealer in Canada could apply for and receive authority to act as a certifying agent under the act, with the appropriate responsibilities. Upon request such retail dealer would provide a purchaser with a separate invoice or sales slip for certified Canadian products, giving the identifying number of each item and certifying that all goods shown on such invoice were Canadian products certified under the act. Wholesalers dealing directly with contractors could obtain similar entitlement.

As to payment, having established that the recipient had purchased a Canadian product, attached to each cheque issued under the Old Age Security Act or other qualifying statute would be a duplicate or additional voucher, in the form of a carbon copy if required, certifying that such payment qualifies for bonus under the Canadian products incentive plan and giving the date, amount, pension number and name of payee. This voucher, when accompanied by properly certified invoices of purchase, would support payment by the paying authority. In the event of doubt, however, the name and pension number would permit speedy cross reference.

The bonus cheque issued as the result of this payment would be redeemable in certified Canadian products at an authorized dealer's premises, and would bear a printed endorsement so certifying for signature by such dealer. The paying authority could be either a special branch in existing paying offices or a special authority set up under the plan, and possibly quarterly applications would be more convenient to handle rather than monthly.

Under the Canadian products requirement plan, the second of those I have mentioned, final payment of any loan or contract amount would require certification by the architect, government inspector or other supervising agent that the provisions of the plan had been complied with. This plan, Mr. Speaker, has a number of direct objectives. They are:

1. To move toward self-sufficiency in Canada, commencing with the welfare field where the taxpayers, the Canadian public are providing the funds.

2. To grant welfare increases on a useful basis.

3. To stimulate Canadian production in a natural manner.

4. To stimulate employment by the creation of industries to supply the market.

5. To restore trade balances by internal application and without special tariffs.

6. To mark clearly Canadian products and make the public conscious of them.

7. To establish the habit of purchasing Canadian products, with a bonus incentive. Such habit may naturally extend to normal purchases. I should add, Mr. Speaker, that it would only be welfare or other federal government funds to which this plan would apply initially.

8. To establish a system which could be extended into other categories as circumstances indicate.

9. With regard to the Canadian products requirement plan, to circulate public funds strictly within the national economy so that employment and taxes would be created for the benefit of the national economy.

10. To offer a bonus incentive for the purchase of Canadian goods, but providing no limitation on the freedom of spending.

11. The plan would not underwrite excessive prices of uneconomical Canadian production. If the price were too high, this 10 per cent incentive bonus would be applied to other Canadian products or to competitive or non-competitive products.

Now, with these objectives in mind and with this background plan, we have to consider whether there would be any real impact on the Canadian economy. My effort is to set up a system whereby within Canada the spending would be upon Canadian goods by those people who receive the benefit of public assistance. I feel this is the only fair way in which such public spending can be justified. The value of the foregoing plan would depend entirely upon its impact on the economy. I have used the dominion bureau of statistics booklet, national accounts, income and expenditure 1959, which is the latest booklet, also the Bank of Canada statistical summary, financial supplement, 1959, and the 1959-60 spending found in the estimates.

Now, referring to the estimates and to these booklets, we find the following figures. Personal expenditures on consumer goods in Canada in 1959 amounted to $14,058 million; personal expenditures on consumer services, to $8,203 million, making a total expenditure on consumer goods and services of $22,261 million. Comparing that with the total of consumer goods imported into Canada, as found in the bank summary, page 153, we find that amounted to $1,799 million. Then I should like to relate this to the welfare payments and other payments that potentially would come under the incentive plan. We find that the federal government's transfer and welfare payments, not including interest, as shown on the dominion bureau of statistics table 44, amount to $1,801 million. We find that all governments, federal, provincial and municipal, have transfer and welfare payments, not including interest, amounting to $2,785 million.

Taking first the Canadian products incentive plan, we find that imports of consumer goods amounted to about 12.8 per cent of the total expenditure on consumer goods in Canada. Therefore if we assume that the federal government contributes directly or indirectly to all government welfare spending, which amounts to $2,785 million, we can assume that 12.8 per cent thereof or $356.4 million of goods would be purchased in Canada under this plan which would otherwise be imported. This is relating the plan solely to imported goods and solely to the spending of the Canadian public who are welfare recipients.

Taking next the Canadian products requirement plan, that is the plan under which you would require absolute use of Canadian products in all government supported spending, we turn to the figures on gross national expenditure as found in the dominion bureau of statistics booklet at page 20. We find that imports of goods and services valued at $8,065 million represent about 18.9 per cent of the gross national expenditure of $42,655 million. We find also that government spending represents 15.1 per cent of the imports of goods and services of $8,065 million, which is $1,217 million that would be redirected into the local market.

These two figures, while no doubt subject to error adjustments because of factors which are not obvious to me, total $1,574 million, which is more than sufficient to balance the 1959 international current account deficit which amounts to $1,429 million. It may be said that much of the incentive plan funds would be spent on Canadian goods which would have been purchased anyway. This is true, and in fact the above figures are based on the premise that Canadian goods are normally purchased in 87.2 per cent of the cases anyway. It is the other 12.8 per cent which would make the difference. These are estimates of the amounts of goods and services imported into Canada which are purchased with welfare funds. The same applies to the requirements plan in somewhat a different ratio.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have given a great deal of thought to this matter over the last couple of years. As I stated at the outset, this is not the sort of speech that one finds perhaps as interesting as others which have been made in this debate. However, I have had a feeling for some time that we were moving in the wrong direction in connection with such things as welfare spending and Canadian products. I feel that this plan could be extended. The welfare field is only a beginning, and it is a logical beginning because we have the goods, we have the national assets and in addition the money is coming from the Canadian taxpayer and the Canadian manufacturer. There is no reason why this money should not be used for the purchase of Canadian products.

However, I recognize the fact that you cannot force people to do things in a free economy. You cannot force them to go out and buy Canadian products. For this reason I feel it is better for the increase in welfare payments to be by way of a bonus incentive to buy Canadian products. In this way the funds will be used for the benefit of the Canadian economy.

By way of summary may I say that the total cost of this plan to the federal government would be a 10 per cent increase in welfare payments. As I stated, this is an arbitrary figure. It might very well be more. However, it is the amount which I feel will be required immediately. All of this increase of 10 per cent will be funnelled back into the Canadian economy. It must be funnelled back because it is redeemable only for Canadian products. In addition to the 10 per cent which will be funnelled back, 100 per cent of the basic payment will also be funnelled back into the Canadian economy because it is with these funds that purchases of Canadian products will be made. Those people who prefer to use imported products will be free to do so. They merely will not qualify for the bonus. I feel that the administrative costs would not be heavy, requiring only the establishment of the certification board. I would not anticipate any payments to retail merchants because their appointment and duties would be a matter of routine. Their appointment as agents would be of benefit to themselves as well as to those people who are purchasing these products.

The benefit of the plan, however, could be of the financial order which I have already set out. If correct, this sum would be sufficient to offset our international deficit on trade balances. I think this plan can offer an incentive for new businesses and an expansion of existing businesses which would coincide with the announced plans of the government and which are, in fact, in the legislative program for this session.

I am submitting this plan for consideration. If my figures are in error, then the extent of the initial impact may be varied or may be less than I have stated. However, the application of the idea would still be just as valid.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister reminded us this morning that this debate roams or can roam over all aspects of the state of the nation. When I use the expression "state of the nation" I do not mean that caricature of the state of the nation which was obtained from the Prime Minister the other evening on television, when he confirmed once again the thesis that seems to be held by himself and so many of his colleagues and supporters, namely that the history of Canada began three years or so ago.

It is quite true that some bad history began at that time. It is not true—and it is a caricature of history to try to make it true—that the expansion and the development of this country ended with Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and began again in June, 1957 after 22 years of sterility and stagnation. The answer to that thesis, Mr. Speaker, was given very well the other day in a speech from which I will quote just one sentence. That sentence is this:

In past years—

I may say that this speech was made on January 9.

—when our economic capacities were stretched to the limit in the process of unprecedented economic expansion—

Unprecedented expansion in past years.

—we supplemented our own resources both financial and physical with goods and capital from abroad but today our resources are not stretched.

That statement, which is a true one was made on January 9, 1961, in Toronto by the Minister of Finance, whose past statements seem to be arising to haunt him these days.

When we discuss this special budget, this baby budget or whatever you wish to call it, the first question we ask ourselves, of course, is why there is a special budget at this time at all in view of the fact that the government denies that there is any special emergency which would require this kind of special treatment. Of course a special budget in December gave the minister an opportunity, if he had desired to take advantage of it, to recant his wrong predictions of earlier months. I suppose it would have been a little bit less embarrassing for him to do that in December than to do it in March or in April when the regular budget would be introduced, and when he might well have even more to recant than he had last December.

He took a more realistic view of the economy in his speech last December—I am referring to the Minister of Finance—than he did earlier in the year, but his confession of mistaken predictions was certainly only partial. He was less naively optimistic than in his budget speech in March, but he still flatly refused to recognize or to admit the seriousness of the situation which this country now faces. That makes his position now only a little bit less realistic than his optimistic predictions of a few months ago made it.

With ignorance of what was happening then and with a refusal to face the facts now, the proposals which have been put forward by the government are naturally inadequate to deal with this situation of employment emergency which they deny. Of course the Prime Minister and his supporters may get some comfort out of the statement by the Prime Minister the other night that the situation was worse in 1936 and 1937. It certainly was worse in 1936 and 1937.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Up until 1940.

Mr. Pearson: At that time the Liberal government inherited a situation with 17 per cent or 18 per cent of the labour force unemployed, and it took a few years to get that figure down.

An hon. Member: It took a war.

Mr. Pearson: If he would not be misleading in these comparisons, let the Prime Minister take comparable figures in the last 10 or 12 years and see whether the Canadian people will get any comfort out of those figures in comparison with the present emergency.

Mr. Rowe: Will the Leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Rowe: If his party inherited that situation in 1935, what does he think the Conservative party inherited in 1930?

Mr. Pearson: In 1930 the Conservative party inherited the beginning of a great depression; and when the Conservative party left office in 1935, after promising to cure that depression, it was worse than ever.

Mr. Rowe: That is definitely not a fact.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: The question arises as to where the Minister of Finance gets the information on which he bases his economic forecasts. The main source of this information used to be the report known as the Canadian economic outlook, that report which we know as a confidential document which we were accused of hiding in 1957 and which, after removal of the word "confidential", was in that year made public in carefully selected passages out of context.

What has happened to that report now? It has been abolished, destroyed and buried. The reason is quite obvious. The kind of economic analysis and economic information based on the researches of experts, the kind of prediction of trends which would appear in a report of that kind now would be extremely embarrassing to the government as a reminder of their own false predictions and inadequate actions. Therefore the report has been cancelled.

If the Minister of Finance took a somewhat more realistic view of the situation in December than he did in earlier months of the year, he is still not prepared to admit that there is a recession in this country. Indeed, the very idea of a recession was denied very vigorously by his parliamentary secretary in his contribution to this debate.

"There is no recession", say the minister and his parliamentary secretary, echoing other members of the government, including the Prime Minister, who told us last spring and summer that all was well, that we were going through a pause out of which we would soon emerge, and that in 1960 everything was going up and up and on and on in the economy. He also told us that the gross national product would be up 6 per cent in 1960. That was the prediction, and that we would have a surplus, after successive deficits, of $12 million. We all remember the banging of desks when that announcement was made in the House of Commons, a banging and excitement which was only equalled a little later in New York by Mr. Khrushchev when he banged his desk at the United Nations.

Those members who took part in the debate last spring and summer will remember that we on this side refused to accept this easy optimism of the government spokesmen. We warned the minister at that time—and he must be aware of the warning—that his rosy predictions were not likely to be realized. In return for these warnings, which have turned out to be correct, we were accused of being prophets of gloom and doom.

An hon. Member: Correct.

Mr. Pearson: We were accused of being prophets of gloom and doom, and last March, April, May, June and July we were accused of selling Canada short.

An hon. Member: Correct.

Mr. Pearson: We were accused of being subversive; it was said that we must not mention these difficulties and dangers. Well, who was right last spring and summer, and who was wrong? Who was blind? Who were the false prophets?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You were.

Mr. Pearson: Who had their heads in the sand last spring and last summer, and who now worship the sand their heads are buried in? Let the facts speak. We said the gross national product would not likely be up 6 per cent. We warned the minister it would not; and what are the figures?

An hon. Member: It went up just the same.

Mr. Pearson: It went up just the same; it went up by 2.9 per cent in value in the first nine months of last year and 1.6 per cent in volume, which is a far cry from the 6 per cent prediction on the basis of which the minister made his calculations for a surplus, which we told him at that time was unrealistic.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not a far cry at all. Have some sense of proportion here.

Mr. Pearson: There was an increase of 1.6 per cent in the volume of the gross national product, which itself is the explanation for the unemployment we are now suffering in this country. And the Prime Minister now tries to take our minds off this question of unemployment by pointing out that we have the highest employment at the present time in the history of this country.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. Pearson: It is not true. It could not be less true. The dominion bureau of statistics figures for January 18, the day before the Prime Minister spoke on this matter, show that employment, not unemployment, decreased by 127,000 between November and December. Is it true, then, that we have the highest employment in our history, as the Prime Minister said?

Instead we have unemployment which is the highest in this country since the 1930's, and no manipulation of facts and figures by government spokesmen can alter that hard and cruel fact. The figures published on December 10 show that 528,000 men and women in this country are out of work. And these are figures with which we all agree; the dispute over calculations I hope is over. On the basis of agreed figures we have 528,000 people out of work, as compared with 406,000 a year ago. The figures show that 8.2 per cent of our labour force was out of work in December, as compared with 6.5 per cent a year ago, or indeed as compared with 7.6 per cent in 1958, when conditions were so bad.

In 1960 the per capita national production in this country was 5 per cent lower in volume than in 1956. If present trends continue, by March we might well have in this country 14 per cent of the labour force jobless and an unemployment insurance fund diminishing rapidly.

When we predicted this trend, as we did, we were jeered at. But unhappily our predictions have been shown to be correct—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pearson: —and the minister's predictions almost invariably, in almost every respect, wrong. The seriousness of this problem which hon. gentlemen on the other side do not seem to yet realize is confirmed by even more significant quarter to quarter comparisons with 1960 made on the basis of seasonally adjusted figures at annual rates.

What do they show? They show that the picture is very different from that painted by the minister or the Prime Minister in March, July or last December. I know that in putting these official figures on the record we will again be accused of gloom and doom. The government would like to silence this kind of talk in this house, but there is no possibility of dealing with this situation unless the facts are made clear, until the government become aware of the facts and aware of the seriousness reflected by these facts. Until they are aware of these things, how can they possibly deal with a situation which they refuse to admit exists?

The first quarter of 1960 was relatively good; it was encouraging and it marked, I suppose, the peak of the 1957-59 cycle. During the second quarter the gross national product declined by 1.5 per cent, which was the first decline since the last quarter of 1957 and the biggest drop in any quarterly period in the post-war years. This record reduction marked the beginning of the 1960-61 recession and was accompanied by lower exports, mainly to the United States. Then during the third quarter of 1960 the overall depressed conditions of the second quarter continued to prevail, with one very significant change; the value of our exports during the third quarter increased by more than $400 million.

Since our gross national product remained at about the same level during those two quarters, it means that the domestic sector of our economy continued to weaken during the third quarter. We were saved, at that time at least, from a further over-all decline by increased exports, especially to Europe. This is the exact opposite of what the minister stated in his budget speech, when he attempted to blame our depressed conditions on external forces and on the slowing down of economic activity in Europe.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true; that is not even half true.

Mr. Pearson: The minister can interrupt all he likes, but he cannot deny the logic of facts and figures.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. gentleman is purporting to attribute certain statements to me. He has not chosen to read what I said. He is choosing to take some things I said and turn them as though they were all I said, and so I say his statement just now is not even a half truth.

Mr. Pearson: That has nothing to do with privilege. We can easily get the position from the minister's speech. I have plenty of time, and I shall be very glad to take it. The minister left the impression, I repeat, and his words can convey no other impression, that one reason, indeed the major reason, for our present depressed condition was external forces in Europe and the United States. Does the minister deny that he gave that impression in his budget speech?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I reviewed the whole situation and I pointed out those factors both external and domestic which accounted for the change in conditions in Canada. I gave the whole story. If the hon. gentleman is going to attempt to deal with my remarks, I suggest that in all fairness and fidelity to the truth he should deal with them in a balanced way and not in this selective way.

Mr. Pearson: I am being perfectly fair to the Minister of Finance, and his own words will prove my fairness. He attributed our present depressed situation in large part to the European situation, and before I conclude I shall be able to put on the record exactly what he did say in that regard. In any event I should not have attributed to the minister words which mention our depressed situation, because the hon. gentleman does not admit we are in a recession. He says there is no recession in this country and in this, as I mentioned, he was echoed by his parliamentary secretary. But his view in this regard is denied by the Prime Minister, who the other night talked about "a recession which was foreseeable back in 1957"—a recession which, according to the Minister of Finance, does not exist.

Is there any outside, objective evidence on this point? Perhaps the minister does not feel we are objective witnesses to the existence or otherwise of a recession.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I certainly do not.

Mr. Pearson: Well, let me put on record the views of some of the minister's friends, or at any rate the views of those who, if they are not his friends, have no reason to be unfriendly toward him. There is the Letter Review of Fort Erie, a respected publication, and it had this to say on December 26, 1960:

> 1960 has been a year of doubt, uncertainty, grave difficulties so far as Canadian economy is concerned. Unemployment has begun to haunt the country as at no time since the thirties.

Was the man who wrote that selling Canada short? Then there is the Toronto publication Saturday Night, which had this to say on January 7, 1961:

> By any meaningful measurement, the Canadian economy is in recession.

Is the man who wrote that selling Canada short?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was mistaken.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has acquired the habit over the years of assuming that if he keeps on saying things often enough they become true, in his own mind at least. However, the facts are against him. Here is an American magazine, Fortune, an authoritative enough magazine in business and financial affairs, as the minister will at once admit.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have run out of Canadian ones already?

Mr. Pearson: There are plenty of others, but I shall produce evidence from all over the world as well. Fortune had this to say:

> In Canada nobody minces words about it—

I admit the author is wrong when he says nobody minces words about it.

> The economy has run out of steam.
> Canada is in a short term cyclical recession.

Then there is the evidence of the Economist and the Financial Times in London, and the Manchester Guardian, which is dismissed by the Prime Minister and by the minister as being founded on biased and inaccurate reports based on opposition speeches. It is really quite a tribute to the intelligence of these particular publications to say that they have been misled in their comments by what we have said in opposition in this house. That is the situation, Mr. Speaker, and the minister's budget shows no appreciation of it or of the need for emergency measures to get expansion going again.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you could protect us from some of these chattering primitives on my left?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are referring to your own members, you know.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the house that there is a good deal of interruption of the Leader of the Opposition from all parts of the chamber. This is not in accordance with the rules, and hon. members might recall that standing order No. 12, paragraph 3, specifically says:

> When a member is speaking, no member shall interrupt him, except to raise a point of order.

I hope hon. members will take note of that and give the Leader of the Opposition the rights to which he is entitled.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you for intervening, Mr. Speaker. I hope that will make it a great deal easier for those members of the house who are so disposed to hear what I am saying.

The minister and his parliamentary secretary who take this optimistic view of the situation now, though it is not quite so optimistic as it was, have stated in this house, especially the parliamentary secretary, that the general reaction to this particular budget was most favourable and that everybody praised it. I do not wish to misquote the parliamentary secretary, but he was certainly very emphatic in his claim that there had been general and widespread approval of this particular budget. I could quote editorial after editorial in support of the opposite view, but I will mention only two. The Vancouver Sun of December 22 stated:

> Mr. Fleming's budget does not meet the needs of the economic crisis.

Indeed it does not. I might also quote the Conservative Globe and Mail of December 22, 1960 which said this:

> It was his own optimism that led the minister astray back in March.
> To this disappointment (falsification of his hopes) the Finance Minister has responded with a supplementary budget which itself is widely described as disappointing.

This particular budget was, of course, heralded in advance. It got a great build-up as dramatic evidence of the government's realization of the situation even at the last minute. We were led to believe that something exciting was going to be brought down. There were press predictions based on the usual informed sources that at last something really worth while was to be done about unemployment. Our hopes were deceived, as the minister's predictions were falsified earlier. There is nothing in this particular budget which deals in any adequate way with the unemployment emergency. Indeed, it increases the over-all tax burden. It fails to recognize the recession. It fails to recognize that there is an unemployment emergency. It is without planning or direction in dealing with this recession, this emergency. How could it be otherwise when the government is not aware of it?

There is, of course, a deficit now. The $12 million surplus is gone with the snows and we now have a $287 million deficit. But that is in no sense a planned deficit such as might have been justified at this time to deal with the emergency. How could it be a planned deficit when there was to be a surplus only a few months ago? This deficit is not the result of any policy decision brought about for the kind of purpose in a recession for which a deficit could be useful. It is not a remedy for a recession; it is the result of a recession. It is a very good example, to use the phrase of the parliamentary secretary, of budgeting by accident.

We shall be reviewing the proposals in this budget in detail when we get to the resolution stage. As my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate has indicated, there are some good things in this budget. There are some proposals which may be very useful from the long range point of view even though there is nothing which could deal effectively with the emergency at the present time.

Even those good proposals, as we will point out when we come to discuss them in detail, are for the most part too limited, too little and too late. The special encouragement to small business is an example of this. The encouragement of new business activity in depressed areas is another example of something which is good in itself, but which is too limited in its application to deal with the situation we face at the present time. The proposed use of double depreciation is another example of something which is good in itself but, as we will point out, should go farther. If, for instance, this device is used merely to overcome temporary difficulties by accelerating development which would in any event occur, that effect will be purely temporary and inadequate.

Another measure which is good in principle but unsatisfactory in application is the tax concession offered in this budget to students and to parents of students. This particular measure is regressive in this sense, that it offers the most assistance to those who are in the best position to help themselves.

Then there are the proposals to discourage the inflow of foreign capital. The method adopted by the government in this budget is apparently to make it less attractive for non-residents to invest their funds in Canada.

The Minister of Finance was pretty emphatic in New York the other day in telling his audience down there that it is not the purpose of the government in this budget or in any aspect of its financial policy—I think I am paraphrasing what he said—to discourage foreign investments, to discourage United States investors in particular. What is the particular provision if it is not to cut down on non-residents' investments in this country? One result of this is that it will be more expensive, not less expensive, for Canadians, especially the provinces and the municipalities, to finance their own needs.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that it is difficult at this stage, of course, to assess the effect of the measures, but surely it is clear that they will increase the financial difficulties of the provinces and the municipalities. If they do seriously discourage long term foreign investment in this country, they will delay our development and they will delay that expansion which is so necessary for the cure of our present economic ills as well as for our long term prospects.

The other day the governor of the Bank of Canada, who is making some very interesting speeches these days—whether with the knowledge and approval of the Minister of Finance I do not know, but he is the governor of the Bank of Canada and naturally his relations with the government and the Department of Finance must be very close—said this in one paragraph of a speech he made in Ottawa, I think on January 17:

> I venture the proposition that it is not healthy and will not be fruitful or successful for a country such as Canada to pursue any other course than to stand on its own feet, finance its development out of its own savings...

There could hardly be a more important statement in respect of Canadian economic development than that. It will be interesting to know—perhaps he will tell us—whether the minister agrees—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he cares to comment on it and tell us if he agrees with it or not?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I will comment on it. I think it is not possible for Canada to finance the kind of development which we must have in this country; it is not possible, and therefore it is not desirable, to try to finance that kind of development exclusively out of our own resources.

Mr. Pickersgill: Tell us what you think.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I refer to the speeches on this subject where the matter is very plainly dealt with; the speech on the budget, the speech in Toronto on January 9, and the speech in New York this week. The hon. gentleman has the speeches.

Mr. Pearson: I have quoted from the statement of the governor of the Bank of Canada, which has a very important bearing on this question of national development. There are two methods which can be adopted by the government to reduce the inflow of foreign capital and incidentally to eliminate the premium on our dollar which the minister said not so long ago could not be done except by controls.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that. Will the hon. gentleman point to where I ever made such a statement? Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman if he will indicate the source of the statement which he ascribes to me. I never said that.

Mr. Pearson: If the minister denies that in the last year he has ever said that action by the government to reduce the premium on our dollar could be taken only by the imposition of controls, I accept his denial of that fact. Does the minister deny that he ever made that statement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I made several speeches on this subject. I pointed out in very plain terms about five different courses which could be taken. I dealt with each of them, and this was one of them. I said that in the circumstances then existing, with respect to each of them, the damage, the harm that would be done by any of those courses would greatly outweigh the benefits that might accrue from them.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there are two methods by which this inflow of foreign capital can be reduced. One is to reduce the supply of foreign funds and increase the cost of borrowing abroad. That is the method adopted in this budget. The other is to make borrowing in Canada easier and less costly by easier credit and lower interest rates at home, which in our view is the better way of doing it. We are confirmed in that view by some impressive financial, and economic experts and businessmen in this country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. member be telling us how?

Mr. Pearson: I will be coming to this. On December 5, 1960, the president of the Bank of Montreal had this to say, and I quote from Mr. Hart's speech:

A restrictive credit policy designed to offset the consequences of the excessive creation of debt could go beyond the salutary checking of a boom to become a deterrent to normal and desirable economic growth.

He went on:

A policy which was necessary and inevitable when inflationary pressures were active may have been maintained too long and may even have been unsuited to a situation characterized by unemployed productive capacity and, more seriously, unemployed people.

We on this side agree with that statement, Mr. Speaker. That is why the method advocated by us in this present situation, which I have just mentioned, in our view is much better adapted to our present economic conditions. It is a method also advocated by many other respectable and experienced banking and financial experts. It would not discourage long term foreign investment, but it would prevent the inflow of international—and I mentioned this when I spoke on the budget a year ago—hot money coming to Canada for speculative purposes only because of the higher interest rates prevailing in this country. Moreover, this method that we prefer would help meet the borrowing requirements of the provinces and the municipalities in a way that would reduce rather than increase their financial burdens. In our view the method proposed by the government is restrictive. It is likely to prolong the recession and the present stagnation. Our method is expansionist, and it would promote prosperity and growth.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the time has come to question the validity of traditional thinking on monetary and fiscal matters; the kind of thinking that keeps money tight and interest rates too high at a time of recession and high unemployment; the kind of thinking which relates, if you like, living beyond our means as a danger to this situation where half a million people in this country have no means to live on at all except unemployment assistance. Perhaps in this connection I might quote an authority who is often quoted with approval by hon. gentlemen opposite and I think has already been so quoted in this debate. I refer to the financial editor of the Montreal Gazette, Mr. Meyer, who wrote this on December 15, 1960:

> Traditional thinking dominates the government's approach to economic problems. The way must be found to achieve flexibility of application—

He was talking of fiscal and monetary policies.

> —within the broad lines of constant policy.

We are not likely to have this, Mr. Speaker, until we once again have close, constant and constructive co-operation, togetherness, if I may use that word, between the federal government, which has the ultimate responsibility in fiscal and monetary matters, and the Bank of Canada, whose policies must be acceptable to and in harmony with the policies of the government if the right kind of relationship between them is to exist, for if the right kind of relationship does not exist this country suffers.

There must also be confidence and a frank and constructive relationship between the Bank of Canada and the private financial institutions of this country. It seems that something has gone wrong in this field of government and bank collaboration. The governor of the Bank of Canada, for instance, continually emphasizes—and I am not quarrelling with his right to emphasize, or suggesting that there is not some validity to the emphasis—the danger of living beyond our means. But spokesmen for the government take the opposite point of view. Indeed, last spring the minister of trade and commerce, who is now Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill), took direct and definite issue on that statement with the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance himself. On March 31, 1960, as found on page 2672 of Hansard, the minister had this to say:

> Over the years of our history economic growth has taken place at a faster rate—

"Has taken place at a faster rate."

> —than the additional net financial indebtedness to the outside world which has been incurred in the course of achieving it.

What is apparently a lack of complete understanding between them makes it difficult to appreciate whether the governor of the Bank of Canada is or is not speaking for the government in his public appearances when he discusses monetary policies in terms which, quite rightly, command a great deal of attention. The uncertainty on this point seems to me to be bad for economic and financial confidence in the country. If the governor of the Bank of Canada does not speak for the government in these matters and his words have no relationship to government policy we should know this. We should also be told, and perhaps we will be when the minister winds up the debate, the views of the government on credit policy and on the dangers of our current imbalances which are so emphatically and so continuously pointed out by the governor of the Bank of Canada and, indeed, by others.

Does the Minister of Finance, for instance, agree with Canadian bankers and officers of the Canadian Labour Congress, who have more than once in recent months expressed surprise that under present circumstances measures to limit inflation have not given greater way to measures to cope with unemployment? There is another feature of this budget—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. gentleman goes on to another subject, which I understand he is about to do, I wonder whether he would now come back and deal with the matter I raised when he spoke about the desirability of lowering interest rates and other measures. Would he tell us how he proposes to accomplish this purpose? Would he give us the means and particulars?

Mr. Pearson: The minister has the resources to do this, and I will come to this point later in my speech. I could spend a great deal of time on that one point alone, but we will be dealing with it when the budget resolutions come forward. I do suggest at this point, seeing that he has brought up the matter, that he has made it much more difficult for himself and for the government by the mistakes in financial policy that were made two or three years ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I asked a question—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a question.

Mr. Speaker: If the Leader of the Opposition yields the floor, yes, but at the moment both hon. gentlemen were standing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I asked him earlier if he was going to tell us how, and I meant in the course of his speech today. I gather he has made his statement and is turning to something else. Would he tell us today, now—

Mr. Pearson: I will make my own speech in my own way.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —how he proposes to bring about a reduction in interest rates?

Mr. Pearson: In spite of the interruption of the minister I will repeat what I said a moment ago, that the minister's policies of some time ago, especially his conversion loan policy, have made it more difficult to do this now than it otherwise would have been.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are running away from your own statement.

Mr. Pearson: The minister might also pay heed to what had been said on this matter by my colleague the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), who is not in the house this morning. He gave the minister some very good advice on this matter and in detail, not only in this debate but in previous debates; advice that was sneered at by the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let us hear you make good on your promise to tell us how now.

Mr. Pearson: The worst and probably the most far-reaching proposal contained in the budget is that relating to changes in the application of the definition of goods of a class or kind made in Canada. This, Mr. Speaker, certainly is Tory budgeting with a vengeance. The proposed changes, if they meet with parliamentary approval as no doubt they will, will confer new, wide and arbitrary powers on the Minister of National Revenue, without any appeal from those powers, in determining the tariff on a great variety of goods but mainly on machinery. Whenever these new powers are used, and they can be used now by an arbitrary decision of the Minister of National Revenue from which there is no appeal, they will mean an increase in the tariff from 7.5 per cent to 22.5 per cent. Since a great increase of this kind will apply in most cases on goods used in Canadian production, and I am thinking particularly of machinery, surely that will weaken the competitive strength abroad of our export industries and of our manufacturing industries in the domestic market, because it will increase the cost of production.

This proposed step announced by the minister is inconsistent with and, indeed, is in direct contradiction to some of the warnings issued by the minister himself, including one contained in his budget speech. How can the minister reconcile this proposed change with his own words in his budget speech when he said, as found on page 1001 of Hansard:

> . . world markets are becoming increasingly competitive, and unless we can keep our costs of production in line with those in other important trading countries we shall find it increasingly difficult to sell our goods abroad and meet the competition of imports at home.

Those words are true. That is a good and salutary warning. How can the minister reconcile that with this proposal to give arbitrary powers to the Minister of National Revenue which, on commodities such as machinery, can result in increasing the duty from 7 per cent to 22 per cent? The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) has been talking about this policy. He has been talking about a lot of things these days, but this is a remark which is more sensible than some he has been making lately. I am reading from a Canadian Press dispatch of the minister's speech in London, England, on January 7, in which it is stated:

> The trade minister said that Canada's living standards and her ability to provide full employment depend on her ability to remain competitive in international trade.

If this is the kind of government action that is taken to help us become competitive in international trade, it is more likely to invite retaliation from other countries and especially from the United States. We should not refuse to take action in this country in this field or any other field merely because it may invite retaliation, if we are sure the action is wise and good. But to invite retaliation because of an action which is neither wise nor good does not seem to me to be a very sound government financial or economic policy.

We intend, Mr. Speaker, to oppose this particular provision with all our strength. I warn the Minister of Finance that we will expect much more detailed information from him than we have now or than he gave us in his speech, before we are prepared to come to a final decision.

In the face of all these shortcomings in this budget, in the face of these inadequacies and these inconsistencies, the minister still says, as reported on page 1015 of Hansard for December 20, 1960:

> Here are measures to overcome the deeper causes and manifestations of unemployment;

You may ask what our policy would be in this matter. This is a question that is continuously being addressed to us by hon. gentlemen opposite. But, having asked it, they never bother about reading the proposals we have put forward or are putting forward. When we tell them what we would do, they come back again six months later and say, what would you do?

I will tell you what we would have done, Mr. Speaker. For one thing, we would have begun our anti-recession or anti-unemployment policies three years ago. We would have based those policies on certain principles, the most important of which is the obligation of government to accept the requirement of full employment in the economy. By "full employment" I do not mean 100 per cent employment, because that is not the economic meaning of the phrase. I think that, in Canada, anything below 3 per cent would be considered as reasonably full employment.

I know quite well, as the minister would no doubt point out to me if he cared to interrupt again, that in a mixed economy with the private sector quite rightly being the most important sector of the economy, the government alone cannot and should not be asked to ensure full employment. This depends on the work, energy and initiative of the citizens and on an association of all the economic elements in our society, whose co-operation with government and whose vigour and enterprise on their own are essential if we are going to have full employment in this country. There is no doubt about that. There has to be this kind of co-operation before the government can be blamed for the inadequacies of its policies. But the government can, and the government must, as almost a first obligation, provide by its actions and by its management of affairs a climate of confidence based on sound policies for expansion and growth in which full employment can best be achieved, and indeed can only be achieved.

Only by, and only in, an expanding economy can the resources be found to meet the demands which the individual now makes on the government. If we have such an economy—and we have not got it at the moment—with full employment, then the government can carry these financial burdens without either inflation or excessive debt. In this way a government can give sound and progressive leadership. The principles upon which that leadership should be based were well expressed by a former minister of finance, Mr. Walter Harris, on April 5, 1955, in his budget speech, which I commend to the attention of the minister. This part of his speech may be found at page 2732 of Hansard for that date. He said at that time, and these were the principles upon which budgeting in our post-war years was based:

> When employment and incomes are high, and the economy expanding at a normally healthy rate, we should fully balance our budget, with a modest amount for the reduction of debt. I think there will also be general agreement that under boom conditions, when abnormal demands are putting undue strain on our resources and inflationary pressures are building up, fiscal policy should play its part along with other appropriate policies in placing some restraint on such boom conditions. Conversely, when the rate of economic advance slackens, and the economy as a whole is not fully employed, a moderate budgetary deficit should be no cause for alarm.

In the same speech he later said this:

> I propose to recommend to the house a tax policy and a tax structure that would produce a balanced budget under conditions which represent a high level of output and employment.

This was in 1955. A Liberal government, Mr. Speaker, would confirm and restate those principles in the handling of budgetary and economic policy, as it did in the past. It would confirm and restate them in a special employment bill which would be the 1945 white paper on employment and income brought up to date and put in legislative form as laying down objectives in reaching which a government should lead. In the implementation of those principles there must be more careful planning, better research and continuous consultation and co-operation at all levels of government and, as I have said, between government, labour, industry, business, consumer and expert.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, at the luncheon recess, in outlining our own approach as a party to the economic, financial and fiscal problems with which I was dealing, I had emphasized the necessity for planning and for co-operation and consultation between government and other elements in our society. As a central agency for this forward planning and for the consultation which is required in the circumstances of today, instead of the limited and inadequate productivity council which the government proposes to set up, we would set up a national planning commission. We have made this proposal more than once in this house. Indeed in the last few years it has been put forward in every session from this side of the house, although I think in earlier days we called it a national commission on employment and automation. A commission of this kind would have members drawn from government, labour, management, agriculture and consumers. It would have an expert staff and it would have adequate resources.

When this suggestion has been mentioned in the past, and whenever government spokesmen have taken any notice of it at all they have always countered with the suggestion that the government itself must take responsibility in these matters and cannot designate any other agency for that purpose. Of course, Mr. Speaker, that is correct. But a commission of this kind would not interfere in any way, shape or form with the responsibility of government. It would be advisory and consultative only. But in the growing complexities of economic society and in the growing burdens of responsibility placed on senior officials of government who can give the government advice in these matters, it is becoming increasingly necessary—and other governments and countries have recognized this fact in their machinery of government—to set up some kind of over-all advisory planning body, not to interfere with government responsibility but to assist government in discharging that responsibility.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, our major economic goal as a party would be full employment in a mixed economy such as that which we have, through careful planning. To that end, of course, it is obvious that no single tool, governmental nor non-governmental, will do the job. All the tools of trade, fiscal and monetary policy, must be used with full co-operation between governmental and non-governmental agencies. The correct use of these tools is the art of government.

More specifically, Mr. Speaker, a Liberal government would accept what this government refuses to accept, namely ultimate and overriding responsibility for monetary policy and would direct that policy to promoting healthy economic expansion, something which in present conditions certainly requires easier credit and lower interest rates.

We would also separate the existing industrial bank from the Bank of Canada and would hope that it would act vigorously in order to provide risk capital for the purpose of assisting enterprising Canadians in starting new businesses. In addition, we would establish a municipal loan fund—and we have been advocating this course for years—to make additional finances available to municipalities on a long term basis for every kind of municipal improvement. Such measures would surely stimulate increases in output and in employment immediately and on a much broader basis than could be done by grandiose and expensive federal public works projects.

In the field of fiscal policy, as I already stated, a Liberal government would so manage its affairs as to balance its budget only at high employment levels. I know that during a period of economic emergency with high unemployment that policy will undoubtedly result in deficits but they will be planned deficits for a good social and economic purpose, and not accidental deficits. There would also be surpluses in boom years, as there were during our period of government, when they were derided by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Pigeon: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Opposition. I should greatly appreciate being allowed to ask it. May I do so?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pigeon: Will the Leader of the Opposition tell the house whether he is in agreement with the views expressed by Mr. St. Laurent concerning "Answer Canadian" to question No. 10 on the census?

Mr. Pearson: I will ignore that interruption, Mr. Speaker, which is worthy of the hon. member.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member is afraid to answer.

Mr. Pearson: There would be deficits in time of recession and there would be surpluses in times of boom. It was on that basis that Mr. Walter Harris, as I mentioned this morning, planned for a deficit and in order to stimulate the economy proposed tax cuts amounting to more than $200 million in a full year. Surely that is in contrast to the planless drift of the present government which predicted a surplus in this current year and budgeted for that surplus when it was obvious all along that there would be a deficit.

When a recession begins a government must inevitably face a deficit. It must plan for that deficit at once so as to stimulate the economy and thereby lessen or shorten the recession. The opposite course, the passive, planless course followed by this government results in a larger deficit and a longer recession. The Liberal party believes that in conditions of emergency, but only in conditions of emergency, deficit financing that gets the economy rolling is better than a depressed economy and mounting deficits resulting only from the depression.

But that kind of deficit—and I want to emphasize this—should be planned in such a way as to produce quick results and should be ended with a balanced budget as soon as the emergency situation ends.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the Leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have the leave of the Leader of the Opposition to ask my question.

Mr. Speaker: There is an intervening point of order. Perhaps I should hear it before the minister proceeds with his question.

(Translation):

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, some members of the Union Nationale on our left are engaged in a quarrel and prevent us from hearing what is being said in the house. Would you please call them to order.

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I must remind the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel) that those are not members of the Union Nationale but representatives elected by the Canadian people in the same way as members on the other side of the house.

An hon. Member: They are still quarrelling.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The point of order is a simple one. It is a question whether there is order or disorder, and hon. members well know better than I whether they are interrupting.

It is quite improper to interrupt the speaker who has the floor, particularly from one's seat. If an hon. member wishes to ask a question, and the speaker who has the floor is prepared to yield the floor and take the question, that is in accordance with our practice. But to interrupt, particularly with words or phrases, from a member's seat is not conducive to effective debate. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have the permission of the Leader of the Opposition to ask him a question.

Would he indicate to the house what size deficit he considers to be appropriate to the economic conditions of the country at the present time, as he assesses them.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that is a very stupid question coming from a man who of course knows better than I do that—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then would you answer?

Mr. Pearson: It is not so much the size of the deficit; it is important that the deficit should be of a character planned in advance to correct the recession.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But what amount?

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Finance asks me, the Leader of the Opposition, to make a declaration during the budget debate on the amount of deficit we should have at this particular moment, to do the job that I am saying should be done by the government, which has a deficit that is accidental, was not planned. They did not even know the amount of it themselves three months ago, because they thought it was going to be a surplus. In the face of that, the minister asks me this afternoon what the deficit should have been.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What would you plan?

Mr. Pigeon: You are afraid to answer my first question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member who is interrupting has no right to comment from his seat, nor to rise for a question unless he can secure the attention of the member who is speaking and the member who is speaking resumes his seat.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we—and this has some bearing, no doubt, on what the Minister of Finance is driving at—would propose four fiscal measures, among others, which could be easily adjusted so that they could be brought to an end when the circumstances made that desirable.

The first one would be a temporary reduction of the rates of personal income tax. That is not—as the minister and others have indicated in their public utterances—an irresponsible proposal. It is a sound economic proposal for the present emergency situation.

This method of dealing with a recession is not new. We used it with good effect in this parliament in 1954 and 1955. We on this side advocated it in 1957 and 1958, when it was ignored by the government, who preferred what they called a billion dollar public works program. It is being advocated today by economic and financial experts in this country, a great many of them, objective economic experts. It is being advocated today in the United States by the economic adviser to the new democrat administration, Professor Samuelson. It is being put forward by the governor of New York in the budget he is going to introduce in a few weeks time, and he is no long haired, left wing reformer. It is an eminently sound and sensible proposal to make in circumstances such as we face today, and only in those circumstances.

Our second proposal would be that unemployment benefits should be increased for those taking vocational courses. That would have both an economic and a socially beneficial effect.

Our third fiscal measure would be accelerated depreciation allowances to help all business firms that wish to expand and put in new equipment, without the limitations placed on this device in the minister's proposal.

Our fourth measure would be that federal contributions to municipalities undertaking urban renewal projects should be increased and broadened.

These are all emergency, anti-recessionary and employment measures and they are put forward only in that sense. Other Liberal proposals which we have recently put forward do involve new, long term financial commitments, as contrasted with the emergency measures which I have just mentioned. Perhaps the most important of those would be a medical health plan.

But these long term measures, these long term proposals, should be implemented during an expanding and not a receding economy. That is the only way it can be done. But they should be implemented when the present emergency ends, because they correspond to the needs of Canada in the sixth decade of this country, and because in an expanding economy we can carry the financial burden that they involve. After all nobody can carry it but the taxpayers of this country.

As I have already said outside this house, all the money for these things, these long term measures and indeed the short term measures, comes out of one pocket, the taxpayer's pocket; and if we are going to take it out of his pocket—and in these circumstances that is the right course to adopt—then we should arrange our economy so that we put more money in his pocket from which we can draw. Only then would the burden be supportable.

Careful and sound planned requirements with priorities should be established. The present unemployment emergency comes first. That is the greatest evil, the greatest social, economic and human evil that we have to face. That is why we Liberals advocate, as we have for three years now, an all-out planned attack against unemployment in order to get Canadians back to work. Such a program will be an emergency one and should be an emergency one. It will not be needed when our economy starts to move forward again and full employment has been restored.

There is one other subject which I wish to touch, because the minister devoted a good deal of time to it in his speech, and indeed in that speech he related it to the present position in Canada. I am referring to our export trade. While we have talked in this house during this debate mostly about domestic trade problems, it is impossible to underrate the importance of the problems of our external trading relationships.

The expansion of our exports is essential, and restrictionist policies which might prevent such expansion are bad and dangerous. I mentioned one of them this morning, and there are some others in this budget. We must do everything possible to encourage exports. Before I say a few words about the general problem I will make one concrete proposal. It is this; to encourage domestic manufacturing industries to increase their exports, tax incentives should be offered, including a reduction in corporation income tax on the profits earned on increased export sales.

It is quite clear to every member of this house that export trade is more important than ever. It is also encouraging and a cause for satisfaction that it has held up so well during 1960. But there are circumstances at the present time—and the minister has mentioned some of them—which give us some cause to worry about the prospects of export trade in 1961.

The trend in regard to our increase in exports over the years is interesting. The physical volume of exports rose between 1950 and 1953 by about 20 per cent. From 1953 to 1956 it rose 13 per cent, and from 1956 to 1959, 5 per cent. This year, as the minister has pointed out, an expanding European market proved, I do not think it is an exaggeration to call it so, a life-saver. But the United States market continues to be the most essential factor in the development of our export trade, and there are certainly dangers here. One danger would be to prejudice increased access to that market by adopting trade policies with regard to some other markets which, though they might have certain immediate benefits, might injure the long range development of our access to the United States market.

It is impossible to talk about the export trade and our markets abroad without talking about the regional associations which are now developing all over the world and particularly in Europe. There are today international trade developments taking place in the building up of regional trade associations, common markets and free trade areas which must disturb and, possibly, dislocate the customary pattern of multilateral trade from which Canada in the past has benefited as much as any single country in the world.

These developments, especially those in Europe, could have important and far-reaching potential effects politically and economically. They could also, as has been pointed out, if they are carried out in the wrong way, weaken instead of strengthen the free democratic countries, especially if they result in increasing rather than decreasing the obstacles to trade between the free nations within these associations and the free nations outside. That is true, but it is no good Canada or any other country trying to protect itself against that kind of result by giving irritated lectures to the British or other European governments on the sanctity of special arrangements.

Canada should take a very different kind of leadership in this matter in the advocacy of closer integration on the widest possible basis. We should seize that kind of initiative, help break through these European developments in the interest of making them Atlantic developments before it is too late. Surely, this is a strategic moment at which to do this, with a new and forward looking administration taking office in Washington.

Surely this is the time—and it may not persist over many months—when we should make such a break through in the direction of converting these European associations into an association on a broader basis than that of Europe alone. We had a wonderful opportunity to begin that process in this country three years ago when the British made their free trade offer. That is gone. Let us try to manufacture new opportunities now, because if these developments take the wrong course we shall suffer more than perhaps any other country. Let us try to build up an Atlantic trade area with nations cooperating closely together in an association which would be open to others who might wish to join.

What has this government done in pursuing such an objective? It has threatened our friends in Europe that if they take certain steps we may have to retaliate. The Montreal Star of November 18 quotes the Minister of Finance as saying—and this speech has been referred to already in this debate—that a common agricultural policy for Europe if adopted by the United Kingdom in whole or in part would be totally unacceptable. The report goes on to quote the minister as saying that if that happened:

> —the pressure for Canada to embark on closer trade associations with other countries, particularly the United States, would understandably be increased.

I take it that is a kind of threat of massive retaliation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not a threat at all.

Mr. Pearson: Well, it has been interpreted in practically every country, which has commented on it as a threat.

Even more peculiar was the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), among other recent peculiar statements which he made in Paris on December 15 when he entered for the first time into the international economic club, that if the E.C.M., that is, the European common market, put their announced tariff schedules into effect, we would retaliate. I may be wrong about this, but I understand that these tariff schedules have been put into effect.

According to the Paris correspondent of the Winnipeg Free Press of December 15, the Minister of Trade and Commerce went even further. He warned European ministers at the O.E.C.D. signing, this report states, that unless the European common market substantially reduced its announced tariff affecting imports from Canada at the GATT negotiations in Geneva Canada would retaliate by increasing its barriers against imports from the six European countries.

I suggest that this kind of talk is not very sensible economic diplomacy as, indeed, was pointed out by the financial editor of the Gazette who wrote, referring to the speech made by the Minister of Finance on November 24, and I quote from Mr. Meyer's editorial:

> Mr. Fleming must be very careful, however, not to become a victim of his own forthrightness. Retaliation has its place in international dealings but it can never substitute for policy. One would wish Mr. Fleming were more forthright about the alternatives. He does recognize at least one alternative—"Closer trade association with other countries, particularly the United States"—but there is no indication this would be any more satisfactory than retaliation.

A correspondent of the Financial Post, Mr. Clive Baxter, writing in that paper on December 10, goes further. He is writing from Brussels after having talks with officials of the European common market, and he has this to say, quoting an E.C.M. executive:

> Please explain to Canadians that while we sympathize with your problems you cannot scare us with the sort of threats Mr. Fleming used.
> If you don't like what we are doing you are, of course, free to take whatever measures your government sees fit...
> Much as we like Canada and Canadians, don't ever think that a market of 17 million people can threaten us into changing our basic plans...
> Please don't lose your sense of proportion. You are going to have to live with us in the future, and to withdraw into an angry protective shell can only mean more and worse trouble for your economy.

I should like to give the minister a little piece of advice, namely that he will not be successful in blasting his way into the markets of Europe at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to give the hon. gentleman some advice, not to misinterpret what other people say.

Mr. Pearson: The language is plain.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is reckless misinterpretation.

Mr. Pearson: I have reported what has appeared in a very influential Canadian economic newspaper.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not accurate then, and it is not now.

Mr. Pearson: If that is the kind of interpretation which can be placed on the statements of ministers they ought to look into the wisdom of their statements. Instead of using this kind of verbal threat, it would be much more constructive if they took the initiative in trying to project this European common market into an Atlantic market. There is a good opportunity for it now. With new developments in Washington, I suggest it would be a great thing if the Canadian government could take the initiative in realizing this opportunity.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this particular budget does not recognize the seriousness of the problems we face. Our country will solve these problems, of course. We on this side have faith and confidence in the Canadian people and in the destiny of Canada; but we have no faith or no confidence in a government which is not giving leadership, steady and wise administration, and which has not played its full part in the solution of those problems.

Our worry is not about the Canadian people; our worry is about the government, and that worry is shared by an increasing number of Canadian people. We have no illusions about the complexities and difficulties of the problems. We know there is no single solution for our problems. In this respect, maybe I can quote with complete approval another paragraph from the speech of the governor of the Bank of Canada. He said the other day:

> Our difficulties have a variety of causes, and some combination of a number of various lines of attack will no doubt provide the best solution. It is important to realize, however, that there is no single easy solution, no method which does not involve effort and thought and the adaptation of earlier ideas to the actual conditions of the day.

The lead in such effort and thought and in the adaptation of earlier ideas to the problems should be given by this government. That is not being done. That is why we moved this amendment, and that is why we will vote for it.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the Leader of the Opposition permit a question? Mine is a very simple mind, particularly with respect to finance. The Leader of the Opposition deplores federal deficits; he advocates cuts in taxation, in corporation and personal income tax. He advocates more spending. How does he reconcile these three?

Mr. Pearson: I would not try to reconcile what the hon. member has just said because I never advocated any such thing.

Mr. Clement O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I will not undertake to comment at any length on the remarks just concluded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). I will simply say I was deeply disappointed that he continued to parade that note of pessimism so characteristic of the party that he leads. I was also a bit amazed and surprised at the inconsistency obviously shown when he indicated certain agreement with the principles of this budget and yet at the same time he continued to criticize the policies set forth in it.

On Tuesday evening the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) commented that this budget contained nothing for the Atlantic provinces. When I have concluded my remarks I believe I will have proved conclusively that this statement was inaccurate. I will refer to direct benefits that will accrue to my constituency from this budget, and I will also refer to indirect benefits, and I would ask the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo to put the two of them together and recognize the fact that these indirect benefits apply to us in the Atlantic provinces as Canadians. I must admit there were a number of years when I doubted whether Ottawa did recognize the Atlantic provinces as Canadian provinces. However, this government, in one of its first acts, very quickly dispelled any doubts that we had in our minds. I refer, of course, to the special grants of $25 million to the Atlantic provinces.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) first of all on having seen fit to introduce this supplementary budget at this time; and, second, on the nature and content of it. That it was timely was well expressed by the minister himself in his opening remarks when he said, as reported at page 999 of Hansard:

> Not only must policies be flexible from year to year, but there are occasions when it becomes appropriate to reassess the economic outlook and to adjust fiscal policies between the main budget dates. This is such a time.

The recognition of the need for flexibility in our economic policies to which the minister referred both last month and on introducing this present interim budget is the reason we have this budget before us. I noted that on Monday my respected friend, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) did not embrace too warmly the concept of flexibility that the minister pointed out; but I sincerely believe that this hon. member is the type of person who, if he were in the minister's position, would not permit changing economic conditions both at home and abroad to take place without taking what he would feel would be appropriate action as quickly as possible to cope with such a fast changing national economy. This is exactly what the Minister of Finance has done.

During my few years in this house I have gained the impression that the Liberal party on more than one occasion felt, or at least attempted to convey the idea, that this government did not act promptly enough or was too inflexible or did not adapt itself readily enough to change. Obviously the hon. member for Welland does not support this idea.

On Monday last the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell) neatly summed up the objectives of this budget. He did this in five propositions and I feel they are well worth repeating here. I quote from page 1079 of Hansard:

> To provide immediate stimulus to employment; to intensify the impetus to balanced economic development; to encourage more effective use of Canadian savings in the development of our resources and industry; to assist in the improvement of our balance of payments situation and to keep a tight rein on inflationary pressures.

So far in this debate I have not heard any of the opposition members provide anything by way of conviction that such objectives could not or would not be attained.

It is quite true, Mr. Speaker, that this supplementary budget, because of what it sets out to do in order to meet the challenge of the times, will mean a deficit at the end of the fiscal year rather than a modest surplus as predicted by the Minister of Finance last March. I ask, what is the reaction of the people of Canada to this deficit as forecast? I think it is obvious that they recognize it as a further indication of the Progressive Conservative party keeping faith with the people and, more specifically, with the Prime Minister's pledge to the effect that the welfare of Canadians would be a prime consideration, deficit or no deficit.

Certainly no one in this nation should be shocked by deficits as such and certainly not in this instance when the budget provides for these worthy objectives which I have already outlined. As has already been pointed out by speakers on the government side in this debate, deficits have been experienced many times in this country both under Liberal and Conservative administrations. Then too, it has been quite correctly pointed out that the present forecast deficit represents but 5.6 per cent of our total expenditures for this year whereas under Liberal administrations in the past we have had deficits representing 14.6, 19 and even as high as 35 per cent of the total expenditures in those days. These reflections should cushion the pretended shock of even the most pronounced opposition critics.

The tax and fiscal measures outlined in the budget plus the legislation already passed by the house during the pre-Christmas session provide for an increased program of assistance to municipalities for winter works projects; improvement in the terms of mortgage lending; Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in partnership with provincial authorities undertaking the purchase, improvement and rental of existing housing; loans to universities for students' residences; establishment of a productivity council; loans to small businesses; generous assistance to provincial vocational training programs, plus a further 21 measures to come before the house, all this adds up, Mr. Speaker, to a program of such a nature and of such magnitude as should allay even the voiced fears of the gloomiest of opposition members.

Representing a constituency of farming, fishing and small businesses of various types and, incidentally, the seat of a university world renowned in the field of adult education, I know that the people of my area will quickly recognize and appreciate the several items in the government's program which directly apply. I will not labour the matter by reciting the entire field where these various measures directly apply, but considering the productive components of my constituency as I have already stated them it is obvious from which measures it will benefit most.

However, I do feel that I must make brief reference to the rural rehabilitation and development program referred to in both the throne and the budget speeches. In so far as my constituency is concerned, this legislation and the ensuing action will be warmly welcomed. I know this will be true right across the country, and I would point out that it is but one more of many progressive steps toward a well-rounded national agricultural policy as announced by the Prime Minister on August 30, 1958. I wish to quote briefly and in part the words of the Minister of Finance with reference to this item in his budget presentation on December 20, as found at page 1003 of Hansard. With reference to the rehabilitation and development program, he said:

> This measure envisages a far-reaching program of rural development which taken together with existing facilities and program for assistance to farmers adds up to a well rounded and comprehensive agricultural policy for Canada. Under this program, to be undertaken in co-operation with the provinces, we may look forward to a general betterment in the quality of our agricultural resources through projects for soil improvement and water conservation; the diversification of economic opportunities available in rural areas; the more effective use of marginal lands by converting them to community pastures and woodlots. These and other related activities encompassed in this program are directed to the long standing objective of the government to raise the standard of living and improve the economic opportunities of our rural population.

In view of the fact that at the present time a large section of our rural population is trying to make a living on marginal and submarginal land and that approximately one third of our farmers across Canada have a gross income of $1,200 a year or less, the need of such a program goes unquestioned. Incidentally, in the province of Nova Scotia and in my constituency the number who have a gross income of $1,200 or less considerably exceeds one third of the total number.

I know that the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan), the constituency adjoining mine on the east, will agree with me that this measure is timely indeed. I refer to the $40 million pulp mill being constructed in his constituency directly across the strait of Canso from Guysborough county and which it is planned will be in operation in the first quarter of 1962. Both our constituencies can provide ample scope for the conversion of marginal and submarginal land into specialized use for forest crops and thereby provide an additional source of wood supply for this new mill.

In addition, of course, to the forestry aspect of this legislation, we hope that there will be embraced such other urgent matters as farm surpluses, more productive use of our land and water resources, drainage, erosion control and the establishment of many of our farmers on economic family farm units. I believe the hope of this legislation is to provide new and diversified opportunities that are at present not available to traditional agriculture. Those farmers who have not classified as at least reasonably productive in the traditional field will be afforded an opportunity to move into other new and specialized fields, and those whose higher productivity warrants their remaining in traditional agriculture will as a result immediately increase their opportunities to pick up markets formerly supplied by an aggregate of these low productive farmers who have moved into other than traditional fields of agriculture. Thus we see that all farmers in all regions of Canada will benefit by this legislation.

The Nova Scotia federation of agriculture in its 1960 annual brief presented to the Nova Scotia members of the house recommended practically the identical solutions which we understand will be part and parcel of this rural rehabilitation and development legislation as outlined in the budget.

At this time, because it is directly related and is of vital concern to our farm woodlot owners, I wish to commend the government on its establishment of the Department of Forestry last year. I compliment the Prime Minister on his excellent selection of a minister to head this department. At the same time I warmly congratulate the minister on his appointment.

Like other members, I have received numerous inquiries for information with respect to the small business loans legislation and I was very pleased to hear the Minister of Finance say on Tuesday in replying to a question that the regulations and application forms had been distributed to the banks and it was expected that lending operations would commence yesterday. I am pleased too and I know that all across Canada our university students and their parents welcomed the budget announcement with respect to the allowance of tuition fees before calculating taxable income where applicable.

When listing the items of legislation enacted during the pre-Christmas session I included loans to universities for students' residences. I do not think I need remind the house that such a measure is much appreciated by almost all Canadian universities so hard pressed to accommodate their ever-growing student bodies. Unprecedented numbers of students are entering our universities. As a matter of fact, the annual increase in enrolment since 1955 has considerably outpaced the forecast of the statisticians. This would lead one to believe that even though the granting of scholarships offer desirable opportunities to Canadians and therefore have genuine merit the great problem in this field today is the plight of our universities in attempting to provide facilities and accommodation for the increasing numbers of our young people who presently have or may secure the funds with which to attend university and who cannot be accommodated.

The Canadian Universities Foundation made this very clear when presenting its brief to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in October, 1960. This brief states in part, and I quote:

> Scholarships to aid the individual are good in part, but it must be remembered that a scholarship, like a cheque, is valuable only if the institutions possess the assets to back it up.

The brief goes on to say, and I quote:

> The present preoccupation of the universities is to find sufficient funds to look after unprecedented numbers of students.

Obviously the Liberal party, in its recent pronouncements outside of this house, almost wholly ignored this important fact. It is true that in their resolution on this subject they did indicate that present federal grants for the support of universities would be continued and extended as necessary. I wonder, however, if they would not have exemplified a greater grasp of the problem if they had included something more akin to this government's recent action in introducing the loans to universities legislation.

Appreciating this splendid legislation, never forgetting to be grateful to this government for being the first administration to tangibly recognize the special needs of the Atlantic provinces by making available to them some $25 million annually; not losing sight of the fact that this government since taking office has increased direct assistance to universities by 20 per cent of the total grants made between 1952 and 1957 or paid 60 per cent of the total grants made between 1952 and 1960; not overlooking the fact that in 1958 this government increased per capita grants to universities from $1 to $1.50, I now call to the attention of the Minister of Finance the unique and unfortunate position of Nova Scotia universities with respect to these per capita grants. I would point out immediately that the formula for these grants was not set up by this government but rather by the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences in 1952. I know that the minister is already aware of this situation and would welcome an immediate solution.

Simply stated, the problem results from the fact that all the universities of Nova Scotia draw their students from outside the province to a greater extent than universities in the other nine provinces. For example, the rates of student population to total population in the university year 1959-60 was 1 to 136. By contrast, the rate for Newfoundland was 1 to 424. In terms of dollars received, this meant that for 1959-60 Nova Scotia universities received $203 per student or $432 per student less than Newfoundland. This amount was $63 less per student than the average grant per student for all Canada which was $271. I realize that comparing the per student grant for the province of Newfoundland is scarcely fair in view of the circumstances. However, I do so only because Newfoundland receives the highest per student grant of any of the provinces. The case I wish to make here is that Nova Scotia university grants should immediately be brought up to the national average, if at all possible.

If Nova Scotia universities had received grants equal to the national average they would have received an additional $359,312 in the academic year 1959-60 alone. St. Francis Xavier University at Antigonish would have received approximately $100,000 more for that year alone. Recognizing the great need for steadily increasing operating income for all universities, as is illustrated by Edward Sheffield in the publication entitled "Financial Needs of Canadian Universities", it is not difficult to understand why the position of Nova Scotia universities particularly is becoming precarious.

Mr. Carter: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. O'Leary: Certainly.

Mr. Carter: Before the hon. member finishes his speech, would he be good enough to explain to the house which of the budget resolutions arising out of this budget are going to be of special benefit to agriculture in his province, which of the resolutions is specially designed to take care of development problems in the Atlantic provinces, and how they are going to work?

Mr. O'Leary: I will send the hon. member a copy of Hansard tomorrow, and he can look for it himself.

If Nova Scotia universities had received a grant equal to the national average, as I have already pointed out, they would have received $359,312 for the academic year 1959-60. Lest there be any misunderstanding of my argument for Nova Scotia universities by hon. members from British Columbia, Manitoba and New Brunswick, the other provinces where the per student grants to universities fall below the national average, I believe it best to quote from the Canadian Universities Foundation brief of October, 1960, in which it was noted that Nova Scotia constituted a special case. Arguments were advanced as to why this was so. Appendix C was added to this brief entitled "The Nova Scotia Universities: A special case". I will quote briefly the appropriate extracts from both the brief and appendix C. On page 12 of the brief, we find the following, and I should like to emphasize that this is not a Nova Scotia brief but the Canadian Universities Foundation brief:

> We would like to emphasize here the point that Nova Scotia constitutes a special case, and that the problems in that province would not be solved even by the increase in per capita grants that we recommend. Dalhousie University, for instance, is responsible for a large part of both the professional and the graduate education, not only in Nova Scotia but in all the maritime provinces. All the universities of Nova Scotia draw their students from outside the province to a greater extent than universities elsewhere.

Then, on the same page the brief continues:

> For this unusually large student population—the largest proportionate to provincial population of any section of Canada—there exist resources substantially lower than in any other area of Canada.

Then going to appendix C of this brief, page 1, we read:

> —because this province has a large number of universities for its size and consequently a larger number of students in proportion to its population than the other provinces, its universities are inadvertently being penalized under the present system of federal grants in receiving a smaller grant per student than those of any other province.
> Nova Scotia differs from the other provinces that also receive federal grants per student below the national average in that all of its universities are private foundations, except a provincial technical college which provides only the last two years of the engineering course. They are not therefore in receipt of the very extensive provincial support accorded to the provincially-operated universities by other provinces and extended to their private universities as well. Moreover, the very existence of the larger proportion of students in relation to provincial population in Nova Scotia would make such an undertaking more onerous than in the higher income provinces of central and western Canada.

On page 2 we find the following:

Not only are the Nova Scotian universities hampered in cultivating the province's most precious resource—its people—they are, in educating many young people from other provinces and many young Nova Scotians who move to other parts of the country, trying to discharge a national responsibility under a severe financial handicap. The national outlook and function of Canadian universities, referred to earlier in this submission, is no less characteristic of Nova Scotian universities than of those of other provinces. Indeed, the relatively greater pressure of increased enrolment in central and western Canada is bound to induce more and more students from other provinces to enter Nova Scotian universities and thus to enhance their national character. Here then is an added reason for assuring the universities of this province of adequate support.

Then on page 3:

It has been pointed out that even though the need for federal financial support has, if anything, been greater in Nova Scotia than in the wealthier provinces, the federal grants to Nova Scotia per student have been, since their inception, not only below the national average, but the lowest received by any of the provinces.

Then in its conclusion the appendix states:

Only extraordinary financial assistance can save Nova Scotia's universities from severe deterioration in the next few years.

I fully realize, Mr. Speaker, that this whole subject of per capita grants to universities is an integral part of federal-provincial agreements and I have no doubt that under the new agreements of 1962 a more equitable formula will be set up. However, in view of the emphasis which the Canadian Universities Foundation, voicing the sentiments of the majority of our universities across Canada, has given the subject of Nova Scotia universities with respect to these grants, I hope that the Minister of Finance and this government may see fit to offer some alleviation of the problem at the earliest opportunity.

I stated earlier, Mr. Speaker, that I would not recite in detail all of the measures in this budget which directly affect and offer assistance and relief for the people in my constituency, the people of Nova Scotia and the people of the Atlantic provinces. I have mentioned but a few of those direct benefits. I will now conclude by way of a general statement indicating that those measures to which I have not referred, those measures which indirectly affect not only my constituency but my province and Canada as a whole, are but further positive proof of this government's genuine concern for the people of Canada, for Canadian ownership and control of our country's resources and industries, for expanded productivity and full employment and its determination and ability to carry out its pledges to the electorate.

[Mr. O'Leary.]

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) for the masterful speech he just made in this house. I know that others among my follow members will have the opportunity to air their views and say whether they consider the opposition leader's allegations justified.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, before coming to the point of the matter—I say to the point of the matter, because some of my friends will find in it matters that are rather pointed—I would like to rectify a statement made this morning by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker), when he asked in this house why we, the Liberals, were not bringing up that famous question of national census, which has aroused so much protest. First of all, Mr. Speaker, it is not because the Prime Minister mentioned the matter that I am dealing with it. I might say to the Prime Minister that if he had taken the trouble of reading the official record or if some of his friends had done so, he would have found that the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine) did refer to the matter of the census and expressed some very clear and concise views on the subject. He was one of two Liberals in the house who dealt with the matter. His share was 50 per cent, whereas on the Conservative side, the percentage is zero. Mr. Speaker, this is the proportion of those in the two great parties who are discharging their responsibilities in the house, and that is not all.

I now come to what I shall call "the Pigeon incident." When the Leader of the Opposition was speaking a moment ago, an hon. member rose and said: "Tell us about Mr. St. Laurent and his view." I am delighted that my good friend should like to hear our views on Mr. St. Laurent's statement. He will realize that inside the Liberal party, we are free to express our opinion.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I shall say that I, for my part, am proud of my ethnic origin. That ethnic origin is French and I am proud of it. I owe it to my ancestors, while for my Canadian nationality, of which I am also proud, I am indebted to Mr. St. Laurent, the former Liberal prime minister, who caused that origin to be recognized in this house.

Now, since our friends are anxious to hear about Mr. St. Laurent, may I say this: When Mr. St. Laurent was prime minister of Canada he assumed his responsibilities.

When, in 1961, he gives his personal opinion as a citizen of the province of Quebec, I respect that opinion to which he is entitled. But I would point out to my friends opposite that if Mr. St. Laurent assumed his responsibilities when he was prime minister, the present Prime Minister should also assume his. And the outcry arising from various parts of this country at the moment is directed against the head of the present government and the arbitrary decisions taken by his government, and he is the one who must assume any responsibility, so long as he remains the head of the government.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, with reference to Mr. St. Laurent, I should like to compare the 1951 census taken under Mr. St. Laurent to the coming 1961 census. Mr. St. Laurent's government, like all former governments, always respected ethnic origin. Question 17 in the 1951 census read as follows:

What is your origin?

In answer to that you have:

English, French, Irish, and so on.

How can our Conservative friends from Quebec remain complacent or at least silent while the 1961 census, under their administration, is about to do away with ethnic origin completely and while such data is essential if the census is to have any historical significance?

Mr. Speaker, I am definitely against this item which has been introduced into the 1961 census form, item No. 10 which says:

What is your origin on your father's side?

The first answer suggested to that question is "Canadian origin".

Mr. Speaker, my own ethnic origin is French, and I am proud of it. At the same time, I know that people whose ethnic origin is other than mine are also proud of theirs. If anyone anywhere is ashamed to say that he comes from Germany, or elsewhere, let him use, as was indicated on the 1951 census form, the last square of question No. 17.

Did you know, that in the 1951 form, a special clause or space was provided for anyone ashamed to say that he came from Germany or elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, this concludes my remarks on the census. I am anxious however to see our friends opposite assume their responsibilities.

As for Mr. St. Laurent, I shall be forever grateful to him for giving Canadian citizenship to Canada, and I shall keep calling him a great Canadian. I respect his personal views, knowing that he respects ours.

I shall now deal with the speech delivered on television the day before yesterday by the Prime Minister of Canada. Yesterday's issue of La Presse reported that speech as follows. The Prime Minister stated:

The Progressive Conservative government has been criticized for its inability to provide an answer to the unemployment problem since it came into power three and a half years ago. But far from being a new problem, unemployment had been a chronic uneasiness, affecting the Canadian economy for a long time. Because those things were not done when they should have been, the entire Canadian economy found itself defenceless against the foreseeable effects of the recession that was already in progress when we came into power in June 1957.

I like it very much when the Prime Minister says he was defenceless against the effects that were nevertheless foreseeable. Therefore he did foresee the effects he mentioned. If he did foresee those alleged effects, why then did he proclaim throughout Canada during his 1957 and 1958 election campaigns:

(Text):

"No one will suffer as long as I am Prime Minister".

(Translation):

Why did he state to the whole country that he, John Diefenbaker, was able to settle all those problems in no time?

Why all those mutual commendations and rejoicings on the part of our friends opposite, after the first budget? Why did they claim that the worst was over and that we would recover from that temporary recession.

What those hon. gentlemen were calling a temporary recession in 1958, has now become, in the Prime Minister's own words in a T.V. broadcast, a situation into which he claims to have been pushed and against which he is powerless.

I would like to recall, for a few minutes, how right people are to say of the Conservatives that the more they change, the more they remain what they were. As I said before in this house, under the Conservative rule of Bennett, Borden, Bracken, Meighen et al—

Mr. Fortin: The hon. member was not born at the time.

Mr. Dupuis: Nor were you yourself born at the time of Napoleon, and yet you know about him. As I said before to your colleagues—

Mr. Tremblay: All repetition loses in savour.

Mr. Dupuis: Last year, the member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) recommended to certain fellow members to read the "Journey of Mr. Perrichon". As for me, I advise the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet to read "The True Face of Maurice Duplessis". This will hold him for a while.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, the more things change, the more they remain as they were before.

Mr. Fortin: As in Quebec.

Mr. Dupuis: Now listen to this.

Mr. Fortin: As in Quebec.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Bennett, prime minister of Canada, stated on March 17, 1931, that is, a few months after he came to power in this country—you will think, Mr. Speaker, that it was the present prime minister speaking. This is what Mr. Bennett said in 1931:

> Why is it that present conditions prevail in Canada? Do you realize that this new land, in the present world-wide depression, should have been able, had its policies been adequate, to escape such results? Do you realize that if this country had been making thoughtful provision for the future, if its leaders had been looking into the future, with eyes of vision, there should not have come this disaster to the Canadian people?

And Mr. Bennett added:

> Do you realize that this government has been in power eight months and that whatever conditions prevail in Canada today are attributable, not to it but to the governments that preceded it?

Mr. Speaker, the more we compare Mr. Bennett's words with those of Mr. Diefenbaker, the more we realize that they are similar, to the point of completely merging together.

Mr. Speaker, here is another gem spoken by Mr. Bennett, who was still prime minister, but by then he had been in power five years, since the statement is dated 1935. Four years had elapsed since the first and the second statement. In the first instance, after eight months in power he had said: "Blame that on the others, and give me time."

The following statement was made four years later. In January 1935 the same R. B. Bennett shortly before his notorious downfall said this:

> Is there one hon. member opposite who is so unfair as to ignore the circumstances under which we found ourselves in 1930?

Just imagine—

> Does he not recall the words spoken by the prime minister of that time when he denied that there was any unemployment in this country, and read statistics to back up his statement? Is there one fair-minded member in this house who fails to understand that those were the circumstances we had to deal with?

The laments of the 1935 prime minister, we find them again in the mouth of the present Prime Minister, and in the words he spoke on television. The 1935 prime minister said: "We have been in power for only four and a half years and if things are not so good, others are to blame".

As for the statements made by the present Prime Minister during the last election campaign, I will not refer to them again. I quoted about thirty of them last year. I could quote three or four hundred of them.

Instead of statements by the present Prime Minister, let me quote Mr. Bennett's. You would definitely think that the words are from the same man. The present Prime Minister has probably delved into history to learn the art of achieving power quickly by means of promises.

What he seems to forget is how one falls from power when promises are not kept.

On June 25, 1930, speaking at a meeting at Cobourg, Mr. Bennett also said—and again you would think that the words are from the present leader:

> If we are elected, we will undertake and complete the St. Lawrence seaway.

On another occasion the same Mr. Bennett said:

> This is a young country and there is no reason why there should be unemployment in the country, if the government knows its business.

And here is another statement by Mr. Bennett dated July 13th, 1930:

> There was no need to call a conference to settle the unemployment problem; the solution to the problem is quite obvious. Is it work you want instead of conferences? You are going to get it! I do not want to get into power at the cost of broken promises.

The same words have been uttered by the present Prime Minister.

Here is another statement made by the same Mr. Bennett on June 25, 1930, at Woodstock. The present Prime Minister seems to have drawn inspiration from it.

> Promising that, if elected, he would immediately call a special session to put a stop to unemployment, Mr. Bennett stated: "During the special session, we plan to pass legislation to create jobs for our people."

And we are able to do so.

> On highways, on large canals and on our great seaways:

"Vision, vision, vision." And Mr. Bennett goes on:

> We must undertake great work projects such as branch lines or projects of that kind to provide jobs for our people.

One would think that those were the words of the present Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I still have many quotations, but my time is running short. They are all equally amusing and they prove that the more the Tories change the more they remain the same.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to the Prime Minister's speech, in which he states that there is nothing he can do. Yet, he had promised work for everybody.

(Text):

"No one will suffer as long as I am Prime Minister".

(Translation):

He had also promised to build highways to the north, to venture on the discovery of the great north. That was the "vision" about which he said so much.

Mr. Speaker, we witness now the woeful failure, the fourth consecutive woeful failure of the Fleming-Diefenbaker budget.

The Conservative party has been in power three and a half years now and this is its fourth deficit. I remember last year hearing the Minister of Finance, rising and with his pleasant smile and his set teeth, as you know him, tell the house: Next year, at last, we shall have a budget surplus of $12 million, because we finally managed to get through the recession period and we are now entering upon the good Conservative days.

Mr. Speaker, the same Minister of Finance comes back this year, his teeth set even closer, and tells us: I am forced to confess now that the $12 million surplus I had forecast has now become a woeful $287 million deficit. This is the fourth consecutive deficit of a government that made so many promises.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the public is becoming aware of those things.

Now, I should like to refer to another French Canadian minister, that is, the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny). Oh. he left before his chief, that one. His chief started, the day before yesterday, by blaming the Liberals for his present misadventure, but the Associate Minister of National Defence beat him to it by a few days—which shows that they had conferred beforehand. That minister stated last Saturday, in the constituency of Laval, that if things went wrong, that if there was unemployment, that if the economy was unstable, it was the fault of those bad Liberals who had preceded such a good and competent Conservative government.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. minister—and I regret he is not here at this time—whether the Royal Military College of St. John is now the responsibility of former governments or of this government. I would also ask him, before he goes about preaching across Canada that we, Liberals, made mistakes four years ago, to look into what goes on in his own department, in the province of Quebec where he lives, and in one of whose constituencies he represents in this house. I would suggest to him to ascertain what is going on at the Royal Military College of St. John where French Canadians who are registered for officers' courses find themselves in an unbearable situation because they cannot complete their courses there.

Further, I say to the Associate Minister of National Defence that, if we did not bother him too much when his last estimates were considered, it is because we pitied him; but I warn him right now to prepare himself for his next estimates, because he will have to reply to questions we will put to him in this house, and he will not be able to blame former administrations, because his own responsibility will then be under scrutiny.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word to another French-Canadian minister—

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Dupuis: With pleasure.

Mr. Martineau: Since the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville is talking about responsibility, would he mind referring to the responsibility shouldered by the premier of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Lesage, with regard to the settlement of the unemployment problem?

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I have no time to talk about that right now, but if you want me to reply to that question, I shall do so, because it is very easy to reply to such an idiotic and inappropriate question.

The Hon. Jean Lesage, premier of Quebec, has inherited a financial situation—

Some hon. Members: Oh. oh.

Mr. Dupuis: So, the hon. members do not want me to reply—

Mr. Martineau: Answer the question.

Mr. Dupuis: Will you let me answer?

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes.

Mr. Dupuis: Hon. Jean Lesage has come into a deplorable legacy which looks like—

An hon. Member: The same as we have here in Ottawa.

Mr. Dupuis: Hon. Jean Lesage has come into a deplorable legacy which looks a lot like the financial situation we too can expect to inherit from this government when we take power.

An hon. Member: Tell them that the Lesage government is paying for a good part of those winter works.

Mr. Dupuis: They all know that the Quebec premier is paying 40 per cent of the cost of those winter works, compared to the Duplessis government which did not do a thing. They all know that, and it is because of that knowledge that they want to draw a red herring across the trail.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself to another of their idols, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer). Let me say to him that when he will be sent to the four corners of the country by his chief, in an attempt to make the people believe that the Liberals are to blame for the present plight of the government, he will have to give accurate answers to the questions we shall put to him when his estimates are up for consideration, and he will not be able to clear himself of the charges brought against him.

Perhaps the Minister of Transport might then draw inspiration from the statements made by Mr. Bennett saying:

> If we come into power, we will undertake and complete the seaway project.

On the 23rd of June 1930, the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett stated in Brandon:

> We must develop our agriculture, our basic industry, and lower transportation costs by way of the St. Lawrence seaway.

That was a promise made by Mr. Bennett. We shall undertake the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway.

The St. Lawrence seaway was in fact built by a Liberal administration which thus kept a promise that Mr. Bennett did not care to keep.

Mr. Speaker, today, in our area, which includes part of the St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville electoral district and both the Brome-Missisquoi and the Chambly-Rouville districts, there are thousands and thousands of unemployed, and it is nevertheless a rich area and most certainly one that lends itself to further development.

The Minister of Transport who is from Quebec, should have endorsed—

An hon. Member: Say that to Mr. Lesage.

Mr, Dupuis: —the request from the chamber of commerce of Quebec asking for—

[Mr. Dupuis.]

(Text):

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dupuis: I heard enough from you last year.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport—

(Text):

Mr. Grafftey: Unemployment is down in Brome-Missisquoi compared with last year.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you kindly call to order those who are interrupting me.

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member whose riding—but only for the time being—adjoins mine, wishes to ask me questions once I am finished, he knows very well that he may do so, and that his questions will never embarrass me.

Mr. Speaker, I am saying to the Minister of Transport that there is unemployment in our area. As a matter of fact, each winter, approximately 3,000 men register for unemployment benefits at the St. Jean office of the national unemployment service, while there were less than 800 under the Liberal government.

Mr. Fortin: There were the armed forces.

Mr. Dupuis: Everyone agrees, Mr. Speaker, that to help the area the deepening of the Richelieu river should be undertaken. This project was thoroughly examined by the chambers of commerce and recommended by them to the minister. He was even invited to go to a Montreal hotel and give a lecture on that vital subject. What did that French Canadian minister from Quebec do? He came and told the people present who had confidence in him: "Forget about the deepening of the Richelieu; it would not be a self-liquidating project for the government".

Since when, Mr. Speaker, is the government an organization which, before undertaking any project, will ask what immediate return it will get out of it? Is it not the duty of the government to get busy and take its responsibilities whenever an emergency prevails in an area and jeopardizes the economy? The government should say this: If the deepening of the Richelieu may result in industries settling along its shores, allowing the area to expand and to relieve the unemployment situation, then we shall promote such a project. If the government had wished to show some courage, that is what they should have said, but just like Mr. Bennett, Mr. Borden and the present Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport is not shouldering his responsibilities.

Before resuming my seat, I would say this to the Minister of Transport: Mr. Minister, we have not bothered you during the previous sessions because we meant to give you a chance to get used to present your estimates; but this year you will not be in a position to say in this house that governments of the past are to be blamed for not undertaking the deepening of the Richelieu, because both Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Chevrier had stated that, as soon as the St. Lawrence seaway—a Liberal accomplishment—was completed, they would immediately consider the advisability of the Richelieu project. There have been many Liberal undertakings in this country, all of them successfully completed.

Mr. Speaker, we will have the Richelieu waterway. If it is not this year, it will be six months or a year after the present Prime Minister yields the reins of government, before it is too late.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have only four minutes left, I would like, before resuming my seat, to hearten my friends from the province of Quebec, whom I specially favour by asking: What have you done about your promises to do away with unemployment? Nothing. The difficulties you claimed you would solve in no time at all are increasing. The economic difficulties we are facing, you were to solve them, but they are increasing; the railway dispute that you were to settle was merely put off until May. And what about the appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican? All those things are summed up by your position with regard to the 1961 census. The flag, the national anthem, are discussed, but nothing is done about them. The matter of assistance to universities which you were to disapprove, you voted for it with a smile of satisfaction.

Mr. Speaker, if hon. friends on my left want evidence of what Quebec and the rest of the country feel about their promises they only have to recall the by-election in Labelle. The member for Labelle (Mr. Clermont), who sits on our side of the house, is a living example of the prevailing opinion.

Mr. Speaker, under the Diefenbaker administration everything is going wrong; everything is becoming worse. And about the name Diefenbaker, the prefix "Dief" announces stagnation; difficulty, different, differently, deformity and difficulty in getting re-elected the next time.

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Will the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) allow a question? At the start the hon. member pointed out that one of two of the opposition members spoke of the census, which would give an average of 50 per cent. Now, there are two out of three, which gives us 25 per cent. The average was lowered when the hon. member spoke.

Mr. Dupuis: I find that this average of two out of three means 66⅔ per cent. If the hon. member did not go to school, it is his own loss.

Mr. Fortin: The hon. member spoke of the views expressed by the hon. Mr. St. Laurent. Now here is my question. Since the Leader of the Opposition did not express his opinion to us in his capacity as leader, I shall ask the hon. member if the views stated by Mr. St. Laurent are those of the Liberal party?

Mr. Dupuis: I am happy to say that the opinion of Mr. St. Laurent—you want to know if it concurs with the views of the Liberal party?

Mr. Fortin: Is there agreement between yourselves?

Mr. Dupuis: We do not share all the personal views of Mr. St. Laurent. Those he expressed as a private person are strictly his own. However, I maintain that Mr. St. Laurent assumed his responsibilities as prime minister, and that when he occupied that post he did better than the present Prime Minister who sticks his head in the sand in order not to see anything.

Mr. J. N. Tremblay (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the spoken language of the hon. member who just sat down was such that I did not quite grasp his meaning.

Mr. Dupuis: I will not allow myself to get caught in the trap he is laying.

Mr. Tremblay: This house will admit, however, that he has given us an excellent demonstration of what cheap theatricals probably were like at the time of the caveman. His loquacity is in strange contrast with the silence of his leader on this matter of the census. That is a question that I, for my part Mr. Speaker, would not hesitate to discuss in this house.

Mr. Dupuis: Do not discuss me.

Mr. Tremblay: Some moments ago, while the Leader of the Opposition was speaking, my friend from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) rose to ask him if the opinion expressed by Mr. St. Laurent concerning the census was that of the Liberal party.

I am amazed that the Leader of the Opposition found nothing else to say but this: "I will not answer that question."

Mr. Pigeon: He is afraid; he is a coward.

Mr. Tremblay: Under the circumstances and in view of the demagogy used once again by the Liberals, I find it enlightening that the Leader of the Opposition did not dare to assume his responsibilities and tell the Canadian population clearly what he, as leader of the Liberal party and Leader of the Opposition thinks of that census problem which is being dramatized.

I think this is an important problem. And if I have chosen to deal with it today in connection with the budget, it is because I meant to express my opinion on the matter.

The problem is an administrative one, which is both technical and scientific in nature. It is too bad that some people had to drag politics into it for reasons that are quite obvious from a partisan viewpoint.

Organizations for the preservation of French culture in Canada and a number of other societies for the promotion and defence of French culture in America have made representations to the government in an effort to have question 10 changed.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat what I said on another occasion on this matter. I told a newspaperman in reply to his questions that I was willing to work with French organizations and to do everything in my power to bring about the changes desired by those organizations.

I carefully studied the many suggestions made, one of which recommends that the term "Canadian" be stricken from the census form.

According to newspaper reports, that would still appear to be the opinion and desire of those French organizations. As far as I am concerned, I think that if that solution was to be reached, I should accept it, but in my opinion it would not solve the problem completely, because the whole census form, as pointed out by a newspaperman in the morning issue of Le Devoir, is wrong from a demographic viewpoint, since it leads to no conclusion of any scientific value.

I think that a special commission made up of capable demographers and statisticians should be set up for the purpose of reconsidering the whole problem from the start, reviewing all the census forms and reaching rational conclusions, so that proper authorities would get suggestions that would give the Canadian decennial census an unquestionable scientific value.

Mr. Speaker, having worked for many years among French organizations I know how important that census problem is to them. I know that they want the census clearly to show the extent of French culture in Canada. They want the census to determine the total number of the French Canadian group. They also want this census to show the trend in the development of the French Canadian group. I for one am willing to do everything possible so that their request is met and the census give the very results they expect.

Mr. Speaker, before passing to another subject, I should like once again to express my regrets of the fact that even in this house an attempt has been made to mess up that vital and important subject. I should like to express my regret, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that attempts are being made to play politics with this important question, and I deplore even more the fact that some people are taking this opportunity to criticize the intentions of the Conservative government, criitcism which can only result, Mr. Chairman, in impeding the national unity which we are striving for.

Mr. Grafftey: Divide and rule.

Mr. Tremblay: There has been an attempt to indict the intentions of the hon. Prime Minister. He has been charged with questionable intentions and just a few moments ago I heard the previous speaker direct cheap innuendoes at the Prime Minister of Canada.

An hon. Member: He is a boor.

Mr. Tremblay: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am proud to say in this house, before my colleagues of the Conservative party and before those members of the Liberal party who still have some self-respect and political honesty, that the Prime Minister of Canada has given to the whole Canadian nation unmistakable evidence of his sincerity, most obvious proofs that he had no other desire than—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tremblay: —to promote Canadian unity.

Mr. Speaker, has there been a prime minister in Canada, before the present Prime Minister, who dared choose a French Canadian and a Catholic as Governor General of this country? Was there ever a prime minister of Canada who had the courage to translate into action that section of our Canadian constitution which enables members of this house to speak in their own language? Is there a prime minister, Mr. Speaker, who has been a better ambassador of good will and national unity across the country than the present Prime Minister?

What a contrast between my leader's attitude, and that of his predecessor as the administrator of the affairs of this country, that man whose testimony was used a moment ago in order to better repudiate him and stab him in the back.

Never, Mr. Speaker, has the Prime Minister of today had the perfidy of saying one thing in one province and something else in another province. He never travelled across the western provinces, and the province of Ontario, stating: "You know, I am considered as being too sympathetic towards French Canadians." He never came round in the province of Quebec to say: "You know, in the other provinces, I am considered as not being very sympathetic towards the English speaking element in Canada." And that, Mr. Speaker, because the present Prime Minister follows a philosophy which, a long time ago, made short shrift of the tricks of that kind of electoral demagogy to which the previous speaker has again resorted in this house.

And I say that the Liberal members' approach at this time is but diversionary tactics. They have been in a position to appreciate the disastrous results of some resolutions of the Liberal congress, particularly in the field of education. They have realized that, already the people of Quebec were about to denounce the Quebec-Ottawa axis which Premier Jean Lesage is about to forge again. They have realized that the centralizing policy which originated with and was developed by the Liberal party, is about to be resumed, thanks to the complicity of the premier of Quebec. They have realized, Mr. Speaker, that the electoral impact of their recent congress is absolutely dangerous. They have realized, Mr. Speaker, that resolutions such as the ones they have adopted, declaring, first of all, that the federal government has a responsibility in the field of university education, cannot be accepted in the province of Quebec, because they are unacceptable and contrary to the Canadian constitution. That is why they are resorting today to diversionary tactics, in order to make us forget that they have taken a dangerous course. In the province of Quebec, the evil effects of that last congress will soon be felt.

Mr. Speaker, I have here an article which, I am sure, did not please the former member for Cornwall, the Quebec visitor, an article by Mr. Gerard Filion of Le Devoir, entitled:

Once a drunkard always a drunkard.

I quote from that article:

The Liberal party has just wound up an important meeting in Ottawa. It has drawn up a program which, obviously, will serve as the theme for the general elections of 1962. We find in it some good, less good, and definitely bad things. The resolution about education underlines the policy which it has never ceased to promote since the last war. It contains the most specific statements, not to say the most impudent on the matter. First of all, they state that "education is strictly a provincial responsibility". But right after that, they add that such jurisdiction is limited to primary education.

And the writer goes on to say:

And there is still more cause for wonder. One of the leaders of the Liberal party, Mr. Lionel Chevrier, and a member of parliament besides—

Yes indeed, Mr. Speaker.

—for a Quebec constituency, raked his mind to find some explanation. He referred to scholarships as a logical extension of family allowances. In that case, old age pensions could be mentioned in the same breath. Why not make both ends meet by setting up an assistance program under which family allowances would stop when old age pensions begin?

I proceed with the quotation:

After delivering such nonsense, Mr. Chevrier states from the heart:—

As he often does in this house.

—Never would a Liberal government in Ottawa interfere directly or indirectly in this field which, as I said, comes exclusively within provincial jurisdiction.

This is how those people make light of specific sections of our Canadian constitution and, above all, how they come to the rescue of the merchant of dreams that the Quebec premier showed himself to be by launching not so long ago an extravagant assistance program for education for which he must now seek support from his former Ottawa colleagues.

I said earlier that the Quebec-Ottawa axis was being set up again on the basis of an efficient and practical centralization. Just as under the former Godbout government, that axis is being re-established because the province of Quebec is headed by a political leader who is of the same stamp and shares the same views and the same political and constitutional ideology as the Liberals here in this house, who last year left no doubt as to their centralizing constitutional philosophy during the debate on university grants.

Last year, the Conservative party settled an extremely delicate situation created by the Liberals. At that time, Mr. Speaker, we found a solution that did justice to the province of Quebec. But I hope, as I said then, that such a solution is only the first step toward a final settlement through which the provinces will be allowed from now on to exercise their full jurisdiction in the field of education.

Mr. Speaker, the recent Liberal convention tried to give a new lease on life to the Liberal party. The sittings of this congress were unusually advertised in an effort to prove that the party had changed. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party today is still exactly what it was in 1957 when the people lost faith in it. This party, Mr. Speaker, is the centralizing party which was defeated in Quebec in 1957 and again in 1958.

Mr. Deschatelets: We won in Labelle.

Mr. Grafftey: It was a by-election.

Mr. Tremblay: A moment ago, the census was mentioned and forgive me for coming back to it, it was said that if the Conservative government were to accept certain proposals it would eventually amount to a retreat.

Mr. Speaker, should the Conservative government accept the proposals put forward by French-Canadian associations, not only would it not retreat but it would once again show the people that it is a democratic government, a government of the people for the people, a government which has been able once more to take into consideration the representations made to it. A democratic government, Mr. Speaker, is elected by the people and as such must take the wishes of the people into consideration. In accepting the proposals submitted to it by its citizens, the government does nothing but show that it respects our democratic institutions and that it intends for them to be respected.

Whatever they say or do, our colleagues from the Liberal party will never succeed in making the least change in the policies they have advocated and which repeat word for word the ones put before the nation in 1958 by the Leader of the Opposition. That program was rejected by the nation in a resounding way and that is why we on this side are here in such great numbers.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that a political party is a free association of free men. I have always been free in my party to say what I wanted to. And if today, I took the liberty to say openly what I felt about that question of the census, it was because I knew that no one in my party, not even the Prime Minister, would blame me. However I have noticed how a member of the Liberal party had humiliated the former prime minister of Canada by rejecting—

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Tremblay: By declaring, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dupuis: To whom are you referring?

Mr. Tremblay: —that the former prime minister was no longer expressing the Liberal party philosophy. If that is the case, why then did they drag him on the hustings during their recent rally.

An hon. Member: Only that?

Mr. Tremblay: Their aim once more, Mr. Speaker, was to try and use demagogy in—

Mr. Dupuis: In the Pigeon way.

Mr. Tremblay: —the province of Quebec, and then to repudiate later on their actions and their words in the other provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to go on. I would have liked however to talk about some of the features of the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I will only say in concluding that the Minister of Finance has found a perfectly constitutional means of helping education in the province of Quebec by allowing certain tax deductions for university students.

Mr. Speaker, this is a constitutional measure. It indicates a political evolution towards a solution which will definitely settle the thorny problem of aid to education that is once more jeopardized by the Liberal party.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, allow me to express the wish that the problems we now face will be solved to the satisfaction of all, and above all that the solution will contribute to national unity.

I believe in national unity because I belong to a racial group which has perhaps paid a higher price than others for the privilege of free expression in the Canadian confederation.

Because I was young and trusted those dynamic men who once in a while offer themselves to the nation to realize great projects, I believed that the Prime Minister of Canada was the man who would enable us to make great strides towards national unity, which is the aim we all want to attain, and I do not intend now, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw the confidence I placed in him.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, because this debate permits a rather unusual latitude, I had hoped to use most of the half hour to make some comments on the official opposition, the Liberal party, its leader, and the party image, real or fancied. Unfortunately, I outsmarted myself in finding a spot on the debate roster, and I have not enough time to do the job properly. I can only promise the members I shall try to carry on later and complete the job at a proper time in the house.

First, however, I should like to note that a previous member for Port Arthur, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, died as last year ended. The normal eulogies and services have taken place, and perhaps it may seem superfluous or impertinent for me to comment now. However, C. D., as he was known in Port Arthur and beyond, was, and perhaps justifiably so, considered the greatest person our community has put on the Canadian public stage. I say "perhaps", not niggling, because another former M.P., for our area, who has tended to be very much admired by many people, was a great Canadian and was also an engineer. I refer to Mr. S. J. Dawson who built the famous Dawson trail westward and opened up the west in a way that set a tradition for Mr. Howe. In any case, the name of Dawson appears in Canadian history books as a pioneer developer. I think it likely that Mr. Howe's name will also do so.

If that seems over-cautious, you should check your history text and find out little attention has been paid to other great nation builders of the past. One might hazard that Mr. Howe's place in history books a half century from now will be secured by two things, namely his role in the political controversy of the pipe line debate and the subsequent electoral upheaval and by his creation of quasi-socialistic entities such as T.C.A. and Polymer Corporation. There may be an irony and a lesson in this because C. D. was thought of as a rugged individualist rather than a creeping socialist and also because the incidents that destroy an administration linger longer in memory than do its achievements.

By most people in the lakehead Mr. Howe was immensely respected, although I think it would be a fair generalization to say that he was not generally beloved. His integrity as a powerful minister in relation to his community was a model. There were never stories of graft or personal interference in the handing out of jobs as far as Mr. Howe was concerned. Mr. Howe was a grand loser as a politician defeated in his own constituency. I met him a few minutes after he had conceded defeat. His manner was brusque, but not because he was downcast or hurt but because he was already restless to get on to something else. His comment to me was "Young man, young man, there are so many things I want to do; we're really going to enjoy ourselves". I think he meant by that he and his wife. One felt that the whole future was ahead of him.

That aspect of purposefulness, the refusal to be petty or morose were fine characteristics of Port Arthur's most famous citizen. His memory as a member and as a man will last there for a long long time. The historians and the economists will in time set out his national significance. I felt it incumbent upon me, with respect to this famous member for Port Arthur, to give that analysis and to pay that tribute.

The second topic I wish to touch on briefly relates to my constituency, the pre-Christmas legislative program and the baby budget. In an area where unemployment is high, there was interest and approval for several items enacted, particularly loans to small businesses, the vocational training program and the subsidies for municipal sewage projects. I found in the recess that this approval was tentative because the effectiveness remains to be seen. The budget has made little impact of a positive kind, in my opinion, because it has so little direct bearing on the average taxpayer personally. In a sense it seems to have been taken by my constituents as a mysterious exercise in monetary and fiscal policy which will be judged not even on results but on what more concrete steps may be taken in the spring regular budget.

The third point upon which I wish to touch relates to the census of 1961 which has developed somewhat of an issue, as witness the motion unanimously adopted in the Quebec provincial legislature protesting the federal government's acceptance of the word "Canadian" as an answer to a census question on ethnic origin. The assembly is to forward a message to Ottawa asking that "Canadian" and "American" be deleted from the printed list of possible ethnic origins on the next census forms.

We will hope that some accommodation can be made to French-Canadian wishes to have statistical information on their particular language and cultural group. However, I hope the government appreciates the fact that many Canadians think of themselves as Canadians rather than as members of some ethnic group of hyphenated Canadian. In my own case, I happen to be a fifth generation Canadian. Probably my paternal ancestors came from England but if you came to figure out my ethnic nationality, what is it? What about the Irish, Scotch, Pennsylvania Dutch or any of these others that entered the strain? I would have a hard time in determining it.

To take my own constituency as an example, I may say that it is a real swirl of national backgrounds if you were going to carry the matter back and examine each citizen's antecedents. In one class a few years ago I happened to make this check. I had children whose paternal line apparently or actually—apparently as far as they knew—was linked with Ukrainia, Finland, Poland, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Estonia, Latvia, Hungary, Serbia, Macedonia, France, Russia and the British Isles. What were they, even for statistical purposes or any other real purpose, but Canadians? I believe it is right that people like that should have the right to consider themselves as Canadians, simply as Canadians to declare or to register as such. I hope that point of view can be confirmed in the arrangement or in the change that may be made in order to accommodate this kind of protest that has come from the province of Quebec.

It is not in the same way that the governor of Alabama said, "Some of my best friends are niggers", that I say that some of my best friends are Liberals. It is not in that way at all. I was brought up in a Liberal family; I have voted for Liberal candidates; I have run errands as a boy for Liberals during elections; and I am sure some of my closest relations still vote Liberal. I took a full year at university studying Liberalism in its Canadian context. The biggest files I have in my filing cabinet relate to Liberalism and the Liberal party. It is with that intense interest that I should like to move on to an analysis of the Liberal party, especially in the light of the rally it has just had.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The Liberal party has not had too many rallies but I would suggest to the majority of the members of the house who are Conservative that they should go back and take a look at the previous records of such rallies which took place in 1893, 1918, 1948. There was a smaller convocation in 1943 that might be considered a rally and there was one in 1958. I think the Liberal rally of 1961 was a most important political event. I do not downgrade it at all. Political rallies are going to become more and more important in our democratic process. I think one of the reasons—and I will say this offhand—is that people notice their circus aspects possibly more than they do the traditional development of party position each day in the House of Commons.

This rally was an important event. It would seem to have confirmed the party leadership and made partial steps at least to a new party platform. One of the things it did was the bringing of several thousand Liberals from across the country to engage in open discussion. A sizeable achievement. I cannot comprehend the pundits amongst the Liberals or the press who have said they felt there were some risks in these open discussions. Surely the process of democracy is always risky, being in the open, but that is what the party should be doing, namely democratically discussing things out in the open. I would be shocked if at the convention that our group is going to enter into this August the discussions of policy were not out in the open. I would be surprised if the Conservative party rally in March holds its discussions in secret. It seems to me that the rally, in this sense of bringing people together for the exchange of ideas was a success for the Liberals and should be so recognized. I am delighted, of course, that it means that their organization is going to be strong and they are going to be able to go out to the hustings with a better organization and bags of money. I was elected in a good tight three-way fight and I think most members will be elected in the coming election in a three-way fight. We want the Liberals to have some strength for such battles.

At this point I should like to ask this question. What have the Liberals? They are a party that has a tradition of power in the country. A great many families pass it on from father to son. These loyalties endure for a time. That is one of the reasons why they will continue to have across the country a modicum of support. That support is no longer as important as it was, but it is important.

They have a great deal of strength in the province of Quebec, and it is very apparent from the Liberal administration there now that Quebec is still in that tradition which dates back to Riel, was buttressed by the conscription issue in the first world war and follows on to the present day. So many members of the Liberal party in this house are from Quebec, a further indication of continuing strength there.

Another source of Liberal strength, in our part of the country at least, is among those immigrants who came into Canada from 1896 to the first world war, and their descendants —I do not mean the French Canadian—and these immigrant groups, were exclusively Liberal or have so continued, but these, plus those Irish-Catholic grouping have kept the Liberal tradition very strong. Their thinking and feeling—except for those who may have become radicals—is perhaps the greatest Liberal asset. Another is that, until recently it has been the party in power and there is the fresh memory of jobs, emoluments and money that have been handed out. Many of the lawyers in our community are still staunchly Liberal, still hoping, I think that they will be handling C.M.H.C. mortgages again, will be considered for judgeships, and so on.

I know many of the intellectuals, the academic people in the universities fairly well. Many of them are continuing Liberals because they were consulted and had jobs from the Liberals, a practice so well-instituted by Mackenzie King.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 4.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 5 of standing order 58, as provisionally amended, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on the amendment now before the house.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Benidickson) which was negatived on the following division:

Canada Elections Act

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT PUBLICATION OF STRAW POLL RESULTS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-13, to amend the Canada Elections Act, (publication of straw poll results).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is not new; it has been discussed in the house over a period of time. Its purpose is to prevent the publication of the results of straw polls conducted after the issuance of a writ for an election. Some provinces, notably British Columbia, for many years have had on their statutes legislation which prohibits the publication of the results of straw polls. British Columbia has found that this has produced no hardship and has left the people of that province free from the erroneous results which sometimes flow from opinion polls conducted to ascertain what the wishes of the people are going to be at election time.

One of the good things that flow from polls conducted for election purposes is that eventually the people themselves do have some say as to whether the poll is right or not and they do settle this problem. It is unlike some of the results of opinion polls which are conducted in the commercial sphere, where people never have the opportunity of deciding whether they as the majority wanted whatever the opinion poll suggested they wanted and got. While there is this final answer, the answer that will be given on election day, it seems to me that for a number of reasons the influences that are afforded by various media of publication can be misdirected during an election period.

The main discussions that have taken place in this country and in other countries in recent years concern the election between Mr. Dewey and Mr. Truman in which all the opinion polls, not only the opinion polls as we hold them in Canada but polls that were conducted among various news commentators, radio people, television commentators and others, indicated overwhelmingly the election of Mr. Dewey. Since that time a great deal of study has taken place into why the results of the opinion pollsters—all of them, of course supporting Mr. Dewey—should have been so overwhelmingly in error, and why those opinion pollsters should have been taken in by the pseudo scientific polls that took place.

When we had this bill before us the last time I was very interested in the discussion by members of the government and their defence of the newspaper industry and why they considered this to be placing a limit on the freedom of the press. Since that time I have taken upon myself the duty of examining into how opinion polls are formed. I have read some of the discussions that have taken place between pollsters and commentators with respect to the disreputable position in which they found themselves by having put forth pseudo scientific information which they later found to be no real information at all.

If any hon. member wishes to read the explanatory notes of the bill he will see that some of the things I was accused of wanting to accomplish by the introduction of this bill were just not so at all. I have no objection to the taking of polls on elections because, as I have said, the final decision rests with the voters, and we can check the pseudo scientific examination made by the pollsters against the actual record that is available after the election has taken place. Therefore, we have no objection to the polls being conducted, but we do have objection to the results of those polls being published.

This raises the question of why we should be opposed to anything which indicates that the voters are all going to vote for one particular party, or 41 per cent of the voters are going to vote one way and 43 per cent another way, and 16 per cent are going to vote in a still different way. Why should we object to this? I hasten to suggest that we have no objection to this; but if we are to form an opinion on opinion polls and the results of those polls, then we must ascertain for ourselves—and the press has an obligation to assess for us the honesty and the integrity of the people taking the polls—how accurate those polls are. When we are told that the people are going to vote one particular way, then we should be told how the pollsters know they are going to vote that way, what questions were asked, how much of the general public was sampled, in what areas the sampling took place, how general it was and what was the multiplication factor that applied to all the people of Canada, or to whatever country the polls happened to be taken in.

In the recent election in the United States—and it is too recent for us to find out what was the actual error in the so-called scientific polls—according to some of the articles I read, there was a difference of opinion, or an indication of a difference of opinion, among the voters of over 3 per cent.

As we know, in the recent election in the United States there was a difference of much less than 1 per cent in the results of the vote. Therefore, it is quite possible, although I am not suggesting this was the case, that those voters represented by the over 3 per cent could have been influenced when it came to casting their votes in the United States election.

I have here volume 80 of American Mercury for 1955 and I should like to refer to an interesting article on page 134 by Joan Tara. It is headed "Can You Trust Opinion Research Polls?" She gives some consideration to this matter. She points out that opinion pollsters are always highly educated and that she and most of her fellow workers were educated in the academic sense. She herself has a bachelor of arts degree and I believe that of all those whom she knew only one had specialized in statistics. She says that she studied under a professor who scarcely knew what he was talking about and consequently she says that she knows even less. She goes on to say:

> I suppose you are curious to learn the inner workings of a poll. It is a very curious business. The most spectacular polls are of a political nature. What percentage of the adult American population wants to throw brickbats at Senator Bosh this week as compared to last week? How many farmers favour the price of putty in New Zealand as compared to the price of coals in Newcastle? These are the opinion findings that make front page (second section of your newspaper) headlines.

Then she goes on to talk about the bread and butter polls in industry. She points out some very interesting facts. I do not want to read everything she says but if anybody is interested I would recommend that he read this article. On page 135 she goes on to say:

> How does the pollster go about prying the answers loose from the great American public? First of all, he and his hired experts hammer out the list of questions which they believe will best elicit the required information. Armed with these preliminary questionnaires, the experts approach the man in the street. Sometimes the client prefers or needs, instead, the opinion of the man behind the plow, the man in the factory, or the man who owns a $15,000 ranch type house in the suburbs. If so, the experts get 100 questionnaires answered. This is called a sampling. From this sampling flows all the rest.

This is the interesting part as to how they arrive at the sample.

> Back in the office, with its imposing views of the New York harbour, east and west, the experts study the questionnaires, smooth out the kinds, clarify questions that are too vague, misleading or unprofitable information-wise. They then compose a list of questions as near ideal as possible. Meanwhile, the official statisticians break down the answers from the sampling into categories, and the categories into percentages based on 100.

She uses an example of polls with regard to commercial activities and points out that once these are made the real pollsters go to work. They go out and ask questions of people across the country in more or less minute numbers and these samplings are returned to the office. On the wall before them always is the indication of the answers of 100 American people, so many having answered this way and so many that way and no matter how vague the answer appears to be it must fit into that pattern. When they arrive at the total, those that do not fit into that pattern are considered to be too vague to be of any importance to the poll and are discarded.

It is her contention that when the results of the poll are arrived at they are never more than 1 or 2 per cent out from the original sample because they have been tailored to fit into the sample which is always before the people who are compiling the statistics. She points out that the people compiling the statistics are also well educated in the same way she was and therefore she places no reliance on the results of these polls. She ends her article by saying:

> It is time the nation's economic mills cease to depend upon largely imaginary figures to tell it what and what not to produce. It's time to put quality ahead of quantity. Either you have faith in your ability to produce the best possible mousetrap, faith in your own integrity to give the best you are capable of creating to the public, or you are cheating. Statistics mean nothing.

These words, of course, can easily be applied to politics and it is here that we do not agree with many of the people who spoke against the bill the last time it was before the house. We believe in the integrity and the intelligence of the man in the street. We know that if he is given the opportunity to decide for himself he will make a decision according to his own likes and as he sees the question. We think this is the way it should be done.

In the last year or so reference has been made in the House of Commons to an instance where the head of one of the largest polls in Canada was also engaged in other activities and was the head of another organization which certainly allowed no opinion to be expressed but decided itself what the view of the public should be on the matter. I refer, of course, to the trading stamp issue that came before parliament in several forms last year. These are the type of people whose integrity has already been questioned and is doubtful, people who are mainly concerned with such things as selling automobiles, ties, new hats and other things of a commercial nature.

I think that the people of Canada are entitled not to be confused as they are in the commercial field by high pressure gimmicks of one type or another used by high pressure pollsters but rather are entitled to all the facts and to make their own decision on those facts. I suggest that many occasions will arise, as happened in the United States particularly in the election contest between Truman and Dewey, when you will find a great deal of influence exerted. We will never know in that particular case how much influence was exerted by the newspapers through their adherence to polls of various kinds and the views of commentators who conducted other polls of a different nature. We will never know how much influence that had on the people and what the results of that election might otherwise have been.

All we are suggesting is that we do as British Columbia has done with no particularly bad effects, prohibit the publication of the results of these polls prior to election day so that the people themselves can vote with all the facts before them and without undue influence being exerted on them through being told that 1,217,000 people are going to vote for John Doe's party on election day and so many other people are going to vote for somebody else.

It is impossible for these pollsters to say this, Mr. Speaker. They never at any time take a poll of that number of people. They are estimating that according to the sampling they have taken this is the number of people who may vote in a certain way and their estimate is based on the questions they have put to these people. They are giving the people a false impression. They do not say how many people have been questioned. They are saying that this is the percentage of the whole. They may have sampled only a very minute part of the whole.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be advantageous to the freedom of the press if they curtailed their activities in this field. If they use the Gallup, or other national polls, then by all means they should tell the people after the election, we conducted a poll at such and such a time and this was the result. This was the question asked and this was the result as we projected it into the national total. This is the indication that we received. If they do this, and if their statement proves to be relatively correct, then I think they will reap benefits in the future from any predictions they may make in other fields. I believe if this course was followed the public will give much more consideration to these polls than they are going to give if mistakes of the nature to which I have referred are allowed to continue.

In closing, I should say that I believe the Canadian people are democratic enough, are smart enough and have the integrity to assess all the facts, without the necessity of pollsters giving them false impressions. The people are able to assess the facts and make their own decision without undue pressure from these statisticians.

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is there any particular reason why the bill makes reference to a company, person or corporation in any province but does not refer to the two territories, each of which returns a member to this house, the Yukon Territory and the territory of Mackenzie. Is there any particular reason why that is so?

Mr. Peters: It was my understanding that, in the legal sense of the term, they are considered to be provinces under the Canada Elections Act. However, if the hon. member wishes to make this amendment and include them, I would be very pleased to accept it.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had before us what was described as a perennial bill. Although it did not come to a vote because of the number of members who wished to speak on it, the bill had a very commendable purpose, namely the limiting of interest. Today we have before us what could be described also as a perennial C.C.F. bill. The purpose of this bill is not so commendable, although its passage would also limit interest. Bill No. C-13 would limit interest in elections, and along with this limitation of interest it would also have the effect of reducing public information.

The mover of this bill made his purpose very clear. He said he wanted to make sure that people were not taken in by the public polls. He believes that the polls are taken to fit a certain pattern. High pressure pollsters was the way he described those who conduct these polls. He also makes his purpose, and I imagine it is the agreed purpose of the C.C.F. group of eight in this house, very clear in the wording of his bill. The bill reads in part as follows:

> No person, company or corporation shall, in any province after the issue of the writ for an election, or after the dissolution of parliament or the occurrence of a vacancy in consequence of which a writ for an election is eventually issued, and before the hour of closing of the polls in such province, publish the result or purported result of a straw vote or poll of the political opinions of the electors or any of them in any electoral district or districts in Canada,—

He also makes his purpose even clearer in the explanatory note, which reads:

> The purpose of this amendment is to prohibit, and to make punishable as an illegal practice, the publication in any manner before election day of the results of a straw vote or poll of the political opinions of the electors. The proposed amendment does not prohibit the taking of such a poll for private purposes.

Let us look at this explanatory note a little closer.

> The purpose of this amendment is to prohibit, and to make punishable as an illegal practice, the publication in any manner before election day of the results of a straw vote or poll of the political opinions of the electors.

Then, there is the usual C.C.F. joker.

> The proposed amendment does not prohibit the taking of such a poll for private purposes.

In other words, a political party can take its own straw vote and make use of it for its own private purposes. Coming from Saskatchewan and knowing the tremendous publicity organization of the C.C.F. out there, I can see that party taking advantage of privately conducted polls and broadcasting favourable comments only all across the country. It would be a case of, we want to tell you only what we want you to know and only what is in our favour. I do not believe such high-handed information censorship is in keeping with our system of free expression of opinion in a free democracy. I am sure that there are few in this house who would be party to instituting such a flagrant attempt at controlling press, radio and T.V. coverage during an election campaign.

I know the press, radio and T.V. of Canada can very well present their own defence against this attempt of at least some form of censorship, and they need no champion of their cause. However, as a former newspaperman I should like to make a few comments with regard to the freedom of the press, one of the main bulwarks of our way of life. I certainly do not agree with everything that appears in our press or everything that comes over our radio or T.V. In fact, I disagree most forcibly with many of the comments by the columnists. I do not agree, for instance, with the latest Gallup poll results because I have just returned from the prairies. I know from personal observation and personal contacts that the government's popularity in the west is much higher than the latest published poll would indicate.

Mr. Howard: That is why you ran last in Medicine Hat.

Mr. Pascoe: I repeat, I find myself in disagreement with a lot of the writing from the press gallery and a lot of other newspaper stories. Perhaps I am a little closer to the actual facts than they are and know how the stories might better be written. Although I disagree with the latest Gallup poll results, I will not agree that these forms of expression of public opinion should be abolished.

We had this same attempt at censorship from the same member in 1959. The Hansard report of that debate makes interesting reading. On page 2897 of Hansard for April 21, 1959, the sponsor of this bill said:

> For some odd reason, possibly a quirk of the Canadian mind, quite often our people have a tendency to accept these polls and decide that they have to vote in an election for the party that is going to win.

What a concept of the Canadian mind. What a concept of the Canadian people. In the opinion of the sponsor of this bill, the voters in our country cannot be trusted to make up their own minds and are waiting to be spoonfed with someone else's opinions before they can cast their votes. I do not think the Canadian people will welcome this assessment of their intelligence and common sense.

Public opinion polls are part of our election campaigns. These polls are conducted in other countries, that is to say in other free countries. They are not conducted in the U.S.S.R. or in soviet dominated satellites. Communist leaders will not tolerate such expressions of public opinion there.

Another interesting suggestion arises from the statement of this bill's sponsor that a Gallup poll might cause the Canadian people to decide they have to vote in an election for the party that is going to win. Coupled with this remark the move to prevent publications of Gallup polls is an admission that the sponsor's party is not going to win. This, it would appear, is the main reason for the bill before us.

I referred earlier to the freedom of the press. On other occasions in this house I have referred to this freedom which, as we all know, carries with it responsibilities of fair and accurate reporting. I do not need to elaborate on this matter because these facts were all brought out during the debate on the bill of rights.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to the expressed purpose as stated by the sponsor.

I would hope that this bill would come to a vote because I want to vote against it. I know, however, that others will wish to express their opinions and I am sure the whole hour will be taken up in these expressions of views.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, every year the socialists keep bringing in this bill to prohibit the sampling of public opinion just before elections and I can never understand why they do so. This is legislation against freedom of speech and freedom of the printed word. It is a direct contravening of the bill of rights. If a government banned the printing of election polls, would the next step be the banning of opinions of editorial writers or columnists or by radio and television commentators?

I suppose a time comes to all of us in public life when we do not like what the polls tell us. We look upon polls then with scorn because the opinion disclosed is not our opinion. The time has certainly come many times when the C.C.F. party has had a right to be scornful about polls on that basis, but that is certainly no reason to legislate against them. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) is insulting the Canadian people every time he brings this bill before the house. He is in effect saying that the Canadian people have no individual convictions and that they follow the majority blindly. He is saying that the Canadian people are a lot of sheep. He is exposing a personal superiority over the elector that does not become him.

Public opinion polls have been functioning around this world for 25 years and I think we would be a laughing stock in Britain, France and India if we suddenly decided that our people were so much influenced that public opinion polls were a menace.

There is now an international association of public opinion institutes which can and does poll 17 or more countries within 72 hours. The idea is that if a world-wide crisis develops an almost immediate reaction can be obtained. I think this international polling association was used during the Suez crisis. Dr. George Gallup of the United States was the founder of this international organization and in a speech he made last year he said this:

> It takes courage, as well as ability, to stand up and be counted. The awful drubbing we pollsters received in this country—

He meant the United States.

> —in 1948 is ample proof of this. Therefore,—

Dr. Gallup concluded.

> —we salute those hardy souls who are willing to stake their reputation in this toughest of all fields of research, the prediction of human behaviour.

Incidentally, may I say that the hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned a figure of 3 per cent in speaking of the margin of error in the last United States election. I think it is much closer to .03 per cent. The margin of error was less than 1 per cent. This prediction of human behaviour is, I believe, big news especially around the time of an election. Hence the hon. member for Timiskaming is asking this government to legislate against the circulation of specific news.

I noticed that the hon. member kept throwing out innuendos about the integrity of polls and the objectivity of polls. I can only say that the polls, whether they be political or commercial, always have to prove themselves. If they are consistently wrong, no one will believe in them. As for objectivity, may I say that this is done all over the world. Anything of current interest—that is news, whether it is controversial or otherwise—must find its place in every worth-while poll. In our personal election campaigns we all conduct straw polls. Would this bill make it illegal for us to mention our findings from a platform and thence to the press?

The hon. member for Saint Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Webster) asked that question when we debated a similar bill in 1959. He asked: Are we to make this a crime? Are we to make it unlawful to mention from a platform predictions regarding our own election?

I know that most Toronto newspapers before an election send reporters right across the country with instructions to find out what people are thinking and how they are going to vote. These findings are always published in the newspapers before an election. Is this legitimate news gathering assignment also to become illegal? Indeed, Mr. Speaker, what people think and what people do are the two most important areas of news all over the world. Even to contemplate legislation against these facets of news is not only nonsense but dangerous nonsense.

As I said the last time we debated this subject, the mere introduction of this kind of bill by the socialists is a warning to the Canadian people. If this is what socialism would do if it should ever gain power, I say this: Let us be warned and see that socialism does not gain power.

This bill is definitely an infringement of freedom. It is a demonstration of gross arrogance in which the elected representatives would be saying to the Canadian people: You are so stupid that we must save you from yourselves and not let you know what your fellow Canadians are thinking.

The hon. member for Timiskaming, as reported at page 2898 of Hansard of April 21, 1959, said that publication of polls during an election:

> —is eliminating one of the basic rights which the people possess—the right of choice.

If that is not an insult to the Canadian people, I do not know what is. He is saying that the elector is incapable of making up his own mind and that the thinking of others should not be published because then everyone would think the same way. I have a healthier respect than that for the elector's capacity to think for himself, and I shall certainly vote against this bill.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has suggested that the passing of this bill would be contrary to some of the rights set out in the bill of rights. In view of that I was wondering if she does not feel that she has an obligation to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) whether this is an infringement against the bill of rights and the legislation that has been in effect over the last 20 years in the province of British Columbia which enacts what we are asking to be enacted nationally.

Miss Aitken: I do not know anything about British Columbia; I have enough to do here. But I do say that I do not think I should ask the Minister of Justice, because I believe it is an infringement against the bill of rights in the freedom of the press clause.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the hon. member who has just resumed her seat, by her own admission says she does not know much about British Columbia, and I am sure that British Columbians throughout the province would be quite pleased to have her visit the province at any time. We would benefit by that visit and I am sure the hon. member would also.

Miss Aitken: Mr. Speaker, may I just say that when I said I did not know much about British Columbia I was referring to her laws, not to her beauties.

Mr. Howard: I am quite sure from that statement that the hon. member realizes it is the most beautiful province in our nation.

I listened very carefully to what the hon. member who has just concluded her remarks said about this bill, and I think it is extremely unfortunate that the two members who have spoken had to resort to innuendo type accusations about the motives of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) who introduced this bill.

There was the insinuation that it represented some desire to restrict the freedom of the press, to control people and to rigidly dominate them in some fascist type of way. This is, of course, just puerile silliness on the part of hon. members who use this type of argument which they know themselves is not valid. It is only designed to take up a bit of time so that we might not have to vote on this particular issue.

I can understand the views of the hon. member who just resumed her seat on this matter of public opinion polls and people who conduct public opinion polls, because of her very gentle affection and close relationship to an individual in Canada who participates in conducting this type of poll and who rigged a particular question at a poll in order to produce a particular answer and misinterpreted the results in order to prove a particular point. This was a misuse of a public opinion poll on the trading stamp issue, so I can understand what the hon. member says because of the gentle relationship which exists between her and this individual. I can understand that the hon. member would want to protect this sort of activity.

I do not know whether or not they realize it, but I also understood both hon. members who spoke to condemn themselves quite roundly for doing precisely the same sort of thing that they now accuse my hon. friend for Timiskaming of trying to do. I will use their words. I think they are the wrong words to use, but these hon. members used them in this application and so I will use them also.

During the last session both of them supported wholeheartedly the idea of the restriction of people's rights, the idea of restricting the freedom of the press, the idea of rigidly controlling when particular radio broadcasts should be made when it came to election results. If one looked at the Elections Act, which we reviewed and revised and spent many hours on in the privileges and elections committee, and if he looks at the revisions we made—some changes were necessary because some things had not been changed for years—he would find, for instance, if I may use this as an example, that on election day it is completely contrary to the Elections Act to broadcast the results of an election in the eastern part of Canada when, because of the time zone difference, the election has not been completed in the western part of Canada.

It is illegal to report that sort of thing until the results are finally in from British Columbia and all across the nation. This is a restriction on the freedom of the press. The hon. members supported it without any qualms or hesitation at that time. They have supported year after year, practically every time the Elections Act has been amended, and again last year, the provision that restricted the press and radio in regard to using radio broadcasting for political purposes for a certain period of time before election day. That is a restriction on the press and certain individuals who want to get across their point of view. This attitude that has been taken is just silly nonsense, as I said a moment ago, levelling these accusations at the hon. member for Timiskaming.

They also supported this new legislation last year that we should not use certain kinds of radio stations to broadcast election material. This was endorsed unanimously by this house. It was a restriction on the right of an individual to use a particular radio broadcasting or television station in a federal election in order to get across points of view to the public.

This house endorsed that legislation, including the two members who have just sat down. The use of posters in our election headquarters, the use of buttons, ribbons, and so on to be worn on election day are all, in the words of the hon. members who have just completed their speeches, restrictions on the freedom and the rights of individuals, but they support those things unanimously.

They come into this matter now merely because one of the hon. members might disagree with my hon. friend for Timiskaming in another field, namely the field of divorce. They come along and drag out all these cliche phrases of "rigid, fascist type control", and it is just a lot of silly nonsense.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) first attacked the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) and then the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Pascoe) on what they said. He mentioned a list of restrictions that we have in the Elections Act. Practically all the restrictions he mentioned refer to the day voting takes place. This bill seeks to restrict certain publications from the day parliament is dissolved or the writs issued, and before. That is a considerable length of time.

Gallup polls of one form or another disseminate information. Before condemning or proposing a piece of legislation we should be familiar with its contents. I think previous speakers in this debate have laid particular stress on what effect this legislation would have on the press. But this bill goes further than that. It makes one guilty of an illegal practice under the Elections Act—and the penalties under that act are, I would say, pretty stiff—to do these things from the time parliament is dissolved, or the writs issued in the case of a by-election. As a matter of fact, it even refers to a vacancy in a constituency, I presume on account of the death of a member.

It prohibits Gallup polls or straw votes being broadcast over our radio—not only newspapers—by means of a news sheet or by means of a poster. I presume the law under this bill would go so far as to prohibit a class at school from putting up on a bulletin board the results of, call it a straw vote if you like, elections that schools are in the habit of taking amongst their students.

I think everyone is interested when an election is on. All parties are interested in the outcome. Notification must be given on billboards, in handbills or in some other manner. I presume anyone who took a straw vote could not even communicate it by way of a letter to his sweetheart. That is covering a lot of ground. That is a lot of prohibition. Nevertheless, this measure does not make it illegal to conduct such a poll, and if you could whisper the result around, if you could get the information around by word of mouth, or from house to house and get away with it you would not be liable to be punished under the provisions of this bill.

I was very interested in what the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) had to say in his introductory remarks, and I tried to find the reason that prompted him to introduce this bill or what prompts him to introduce it annually. We have heard nothing on that score. We have not heard that any section of the Canadian people or any individuals have asked for the enactment of such a law as he proposes. The hon. member referred to the fact that the legislature of British Columbia has passed such a law prohibiting the publication of straw polls or Gallup polls. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) interjected that it was the Conservative party that did it. Well, it is a long time since British Columbia had a Conservative government.

Mr. Howard: And it will be a lot longer yet.

Mr. Mandziuk: That is what you think.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mandziuk: I know the British Columbia legislature passed a bill prohibiting the publication of polls of this type in 1939 and I am going on the authority of the hon. member for Timiskaming who in his address to this house on April 21, 1959, said, as reported on page 2897 of Hansard:

> British Columbia faced this matter in 1939 when they passed section 168 of the British Columbia elections act which reads:
> "No person, corporation or organization shall after the issue of the writ for any election take any straw vote which will, prior to the election, distinguish the political opinions of the voters in any electoral district."

I have not had time to call for the British Columbia statutes but I know from memory, without calling on the statutes, that in 1939 there was a Social Credit government in British Columbia, and I have a recollection that a government of the same political colour in a sister province to the east had tried to censor the press by passing certain legislation—

I appreciate interruptions. I want to be set right if I am wrong in saying this was passed in 1939. I am only going on the authority of the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Howard: That is not what I said, and you know it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mandziuk: I have not much time. I consider that this piece of legislation has nothing else in mind but controls, controls and more controls. If we are going to control public opinion we might as well start by controlling the press. We might as well abolish the press gallery and keep the newspaper men out. We might as well censor everything they write. We might as well pass a law censoring everything that is said on radio and on television. We might as well censor everything. Then what? Mr. Speaker, then we would be nearer to that socialist heaven behind the iron curtain where everything is controlled.

Mr. Howard: That is a wrong interpretation, and you know it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his contribution to this debate and he has no right to interrupt from his seat.

Mr. Howard: Even if what the hon. member is saying is false?

Mr. Speaker: No matter what the provocation is. If the hon. member wishes to speak, he must rise.

Mr. Mandziuk: One step leads to another, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Howard: That is just not true. It is misinterpretation.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member finds that he has been misinterpreted he will have an opportunity at the conclusion of the remarks of the hon. member who has the floor to make an explanation.

Mr. Mandziuk: In concluding, because our time is limited, may I say there are some people in this house and some people in this country who are suffering from control phobia. They would like to control everything.

Mr. Speaker: I see it is six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I have some indication of what the business is to be on Monday, Tuesday and the rest of next week?

Mr. Nowlan: I think I can oblige the hon. gentleman, at least to some extent. Under the rules, Monday is private members' day. On Tuesday we shall continue with the budget debate, and on Wednesday we shall proceed with item No. 10 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of my colleague the Minister of Agriculture dealing with certain measures of co-operation between the federal government and provincial governments. Further, I cannot go at the moment.

It being six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

GREAT LAKES—PLATFORMS FOR DRILLING EQUIPMENT

Question No. 63—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received representations from any body requesting the refusal of applications by oil or gas companies for the construction of platforms in the great lakes or connecting rivers for the purpose of sustaining oil or gas drilling equipment?

2. If so, from whom have such representations been received, and what reply has been made?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.

2. From the Essex county council, in the form of a resolution. Resolutions endorsing the request of the Essex county council have also been received from the town of Kingsville, the township of Mersea, and the city of Windsor.

The department's reply was to the effect that this department is responsible for processing applications under part 1 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and our jurisdiction in the matter is limited to the aspect of possible interference with navigation.

The licence to carry out exploratory drilling on the beds of lakes and rivers is granted by the province, and the question of possible water pollution, resulting from the drilling operations, should be referred to the provincial authorities.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 23, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE CENSUS

STATEMENT ON SUGGESTED CHANGES IN QUESTIONS

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, during the past few weeks I have received representations from various parts of the country and from various groups to the effect that certain of the population census questions which have been used for some time do not produce the exact statistical information required in some respects for the analysis of the characteristics of the Canadian population for such purposes as social analysis and some general business requirements. For this reason I asked the dominion statistician and his staff to give me their opinion as to whether improvements are possible in the questions in order to produce more accurate results so that the needs of the users may be better served.

I have received from the dominion statistician this letter, which I shall read to the house, dated January 20:

Dear Mr. Hees:

You asked us a short time ago to let you have our considered opinion about the adequacy of the form of questions on the ethnic and cultural and religious background of the Canadian population and their birthplaces as obtained through Canadian censuses over the years. We have given this matter some study and we have some observations and suggestions to offer.

An example of the type of change which I believe would be most desirable is found in the existing questions on citizenship and origin.

The existing form of the origin question has, indeed, limitations, some of which are very difficult to overcome and others which we think can be remedied. The principal problem arises from the practice which originated with the 1951 census of accepting Canadian as an answer to the question on origin, whereas in fact the information which was being sought related to the ethnic groups and cultures of the old world. It would be desirable to bring the 1961 census data back into line with information obtained prior to 1951 and to avoid the confusion which inevitably arises out of mixing North American with European and other origins. This could be done by rephrasing the inquiry to make the intent of the question clearer to the respondent.

If it were felt advisable to take steps to overcome this difficulty to the extent possible in a general census, it would be necessary to rearrange the questions somewhat.

I believe that the question on citizenship should be asked in the following form: "Country of citizenship—Are you a Canadian? If not, of what country are you a national or citizen?"

To clarify the question of ethnic origin, it should now read, "To what ethnic or cultural group did you or your ancestor—on the male side—belong on coming to this continent?" Obviously there will be some change in the listing of possible answers to the question on cultural origin.

The rephrasing of these questions will result in considerable increase in the clarity of the information and help to avoid the confusion between citizenship and origin.

There are several other changes which could be made in the population form at the same time to facilitate the operation of the census. If the suggestion set out above appeals to you, I shall have a new census form prepared and submitted for your approval.

Yours faithfully,

Walter E. Duffett,
Dominion Statistician.

Mr. Speaker, I am much impressed with what the dominion statistician has told me about the need for revision of the census population form so that it will produce the exact information required. I have therefore asked the dominion statistician to submit a new and revised form embodying the changes which he and his associates believe are necessary to produce the information for which the census is intended. These changes will, I am sure, meet the points raised by the various groups who have pointed out to me some deficiencies in the form as originally proposed.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, we have listened with great interest to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees). Of course, we would have to look carefully into this statement before we express an opinion.

For the moment I shall only say that it is obvious that the minister has completely reversed his position on the census.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Morissette: That is what you think yourself.

Mr. Chevrier: It is also obvious that because of the unanimous views held not only in one province but elsewhere in this country, the minister has seen fit to revise his position, as the government has done.

(Text):

Here, sir, I would like to add that the distinction, as we on this side of the house have maintained all along, is with reference to questions 7, 8 and 10. One of these questions had to do with nationality and the other with racial origin, and by the conduct of the government there was confusion with reference to the origin of a citizen. That confusion would lead to only one thing, that those who are interested in compiling data for the information of all Canadians on the complexity and diversity of the Canadian population could not have found it possible to obtain that information by means of the manner in which question 10 had been established.

Then again, there is the very important problem for which the census has been established. The census has been established for the purpose of obtaining information with reference to the diversity of the population, the age, the occupation, the racial origin, the religion, and so forth. That has been the practice since 1891, I am informed, and the position so far as we on this side of the house are concerned was this. We could not understand why it was that this practice which had been in existence since 1891 should be changed at this time. As I said earlier, we would like to study the statement made by the minister now to ascertain just what its effect will be on the representations that have been made, but on the whole there can be no doubt that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who considered this matter not too serious in the house when questions were put to him earlier—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that this statement is a statement of intention, of fact, of action being taken on a subject which has been controversial in the house. We have debated the same point in the course of the budget debate.

I hope that the hon. member, in commenting on the proposed action, will refrain from this kind of controversial or argumentative approach to the announcement that would necessitate or evoke an answer at this time. I say this because this is not a debate on the matter; it is a statement of intention presented to the house, without argument, and it seems to me to be appropriate to comment on it without provocative or controversial language.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I am reminded that the Prime Minister has indicated that there would be an opportunity to discuss this on a later occasion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: Now that everything is settled.

Mr. Chevrier: —and that opportunity may or may not have to be taken, having regard to the statement which has been made.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Where were you on Friday?

Mr. Chevrier: But there is one thing which I think should be brought to the attention of the house, and it is this. It is unfortunate that the minister and the government should have seen fit to rely now on the recommendations of the dominion statistician. If those recommendations had been followed in the first place—they were made quite clear—there would have been no difficulty at all about the matter.

Mr. Balcer: St. Laurent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are criticising Mr. St. Laurent's decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again, but it seems to me he is debating the issue. If he proceeds in that vein it will be very difficult for me to prevent a debate arising at this time. This is not the appropriate time at which the matter may be debated in full, and I would ask the hon. member to leave his remarks at that point.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in making the statement I did was not only in answer to what was said by the minister, but in answer to interruptions which came from the other side of the house. I think I am entitled to reply to those interruptions.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard no interruptions and hope that they are not part of the record.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group welcome the statement that has been made by the minister this afternoon. With the hon. member for Laurier, we will study it carefully. It is a fact that because of the original form in which this census questionnaire appeared, certain difficulties have arisen and there have been certain criticisms. We hope that the suggestion made by the minister will in fact solve those difficulties, and that the government's suggestion will be acceptable to all Canadians. We in this group think that the form used in the taking of the census should be such as not to cause conflict and criticism, but that it should be a form to which all Canadians would very readily give their approval.

Mr. Hees: Might I suggest, answering the hon. member for Laurier, that the intention of the government is not to confuse anyone but to clarify the mistake which Mr. St. Laurent and the Liberal government made in 1951.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister feels that something which has been said is in conflict with the truth, or gives a wrong impression of his announcement, he may, I think, properly explain what he thought was the misinterpretation, but if it is a question of answering along lines which I feel he should not pursue, I would ask him to leave it to a more appropriate occasion.

Mr. Winch: Is there anyone here who objects to saying he is a Canadian in answer to a census question?

TRADE

GRAIN—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ANTICIPATED BARLEY SALE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): I am pleased to be able to report to the house that negotiations between the Canadian wheat board and the representatives of the China Resources Company, Hong Kong, who are in Canada, are continuing. The Canadian wheat board anticipates that 12 cargoes of feed barley, representing approximately 120,000 tons, will be booked within the next few days for nearby shipment out of our west coast ports.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEWFOUNDLAND—DISPOSITION OF PEPPERRELL AIR FORCE BASE FACILITIES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): By leave of the house I should like to make a statement at this time. On August 6 last I said that if and when we received an official notice of abandonment from the United States government in regard to the Pepperrell air force base there would be the fullest consultation with the government of Newfoundland on this matter. Formal notice was received on August 11 to be effective a year later, that is in August of this year, 1961.

We have had a number of informal discussions with the government of Newfoundland on the reversionary rights respecting the ownership of the base and on the equitable distribution of the facilities between the government of Newfoundland and the government of Canada. We have come to the conclusion that the question of ownership should be the subject of a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, and preparations are now being made for that reference.

The premier of Newfoundland has been informed of our decision in this regard, and I hope it will be possible to reach an agreement on the statement of facts to be presented to the court. In the meantime, informal arrangements have been worked out with the government of Newfoundland and the United States authorities to ensure that the facilities of the base are adequately maintained and protected pending the determination of their disposition.

COLOMBO PLAN—ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO PAKISTAN

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On Friday next the Warsak hydroelectric project in Pakistan will be formally inaugurated, with the Minister of Veterans Affairs representing the government of Canada. This is the largest Colombo plan project in which Canada has participated. It is also the largest project of its kind in Pakistan. Warsak will produce 160,000 kilowatts of power and help irrigate 110,000 acres of virgin land. In the process of construction some 10,000 Pakistanis, mostly tribal people, have had training in modern trades and techniques.

In the course of his current visit to Pakistan the Minister of Veterans Affairs is also representing the Canadian government at the inauguration of two other projects in which Pakistan and Canada have co-operated under the Colombo plan. Yesterday the Shadiwal hydroelectric project in West Pakistan was inaugurated, and tomorrow there will be a similar ceremony at the Goalpara thermal power station in East Pakistan.

With the completion of these major projects we are now discussing with the Pakistan government other projects in which we might assist Pakistan to further its economic development. From the $50 million appropriated for Canadian aid under the Colombo plan in the fiscal year 1960-61, $15 million has been allocated for capital assistance to Pakistan. Discussions have been proceeding with the government of Pakistan on the projects to be financed out of this allocation, and I am now able to inform the house that Canada has agreed to provide the following goods and services to Pakistan in 1960-61: wheat to the value of $3,650,000; fertilizers to the value of $2 million; aluminum to the value of $1,140,000; wood pulp to the value of $1,300,000, and an aerial survey and forest inventory in the Chittagong area of East Pakistan at a cost of $500,000.

These grants total $8.6 million. We are continuing our discussions with the Pakistan government on projects which might be financed with the remainder of the $15 million. I will be making further announcements when we have reached agreement on other items in this year's Colombo plan program for Pakistan.

In the case of the wheat, fertilizers, aluminum and wood pulp, the government of Pakistan has agreed to set aside counterpart funds in local currency equivalent to the value of the Canadian grant. The counterpart funds will be spent on economic development projects in Pakistan to be agreed upon between the two governments. The aluminum will be used to help maintain an adequate level of production and employment in Pakistan's metal working industries. The fertilizer is urgently needed for increased food production in Pakistan to meet the demands of the increasing population. The wood pulp will enable a new paper mill in East Pakistan to operate while adequate local supplies of pulp are being developed. These commodities will help provide imports essential for the maintenance of the Pakistan economy and the success of its development plans in the face of an acute shortage of foreign exchange.

The aerial survey and forest inventory will provide essential information on which Pakistan can base plans for a program of development of resources in a forested area of East Pakistan.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this is the second announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding assistance by Canada to an Asian member of the commonwealth during the last few days. The announcement the other day had regard to the completion of the atomic project at Bombay, and now this announcement with regard to Canada's assistance to Pakistan under the Colombo plan is further evidence of the interest which this country and all hon. members of this house take in the assistance that is provided under the Colombo plan.

The minister has mentioned a number of instances of gifts to Pakistan which Canada is continuing in one form or another. Among those mentioned today, of course, was that with regard to the Warsak dam, which is situated on the Khyber pass between Afghanistan and Pakistan. This is a matter that I know has engaged the special interest of the Leader of the Opposition. The Secretary of State for External Affairs will recall that not only was this project begun when the Leader of the Opposition was secretary of state for external affairs, but that hon. gentleman had the distinct honour of pushing the button which began the entire operation. Other hon. members of this party have had something to do with the Warsak dam. I, too, had the great honour of visiting this project, as did the hon. member for Ottawa West.

I hope that some time the Prime Minister, who evinces great academic interest, will also have the opportunity of seeing that the very worthy projects which hon. gentlemen of the present government are carrying on were well founded by the administration of which the present Leader of the Opposition was the secretary of state for external affairs.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this group have been longtime proponents of increased expenditures under the Colombo plan, we are naturally interested in and welcome the announcement made this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. However, Mr. Speaker, the fact that during recent weeks the Secretary of State for External Affairs has taken the opportunity about once a week to announce some further development or expenditure under the Colombo plan indicates that the government's ear is attuned to the popular will in this case. In our view expenditures on behalf of countries within the commonwealth are a method for building peace.

Finally, I simply say on behalf of this group that we urge the government to transfer some of its expenditures on obsolete and useless weapons to the Colombo plan and greatly increase its expenditures under that plan at this time. I am sure that in so doing they will receive the approval of the vast majority of the Canadian people.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. W. F. Matthews (Nanaimo) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-59, to amend the Representation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Matthews: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to change the name of the electoral district of Nanaimo to Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Motion agreed to and the bill read the first time.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF CANADA COUNCIL

On the order: Government notices of motion:

January 20—The Prime Minister—the following proposed motion:—

That the report of the Canada council for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, laid before the house on July 13, 1960, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts in order to provide for a review thereof pursuant to section 23 of the Canada Council Act.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

On the order: Government notices of motion:

January 20—The Minister of Finance—the following proposed motion:—

That the public accounts, volumes I and II and report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, and the financial statements of the Canada Council and the report of the Auditor General thereon for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RICHELIEU RIVER—REPORT ON DREDGING

Motion No. 20—Mr. Dupuis:

For a copy of each of the reports made by the economists and engineers of the Department of Transport, in connection with the possible dredging of the Richelieu river between the St. Lawrence river and lake Champlain.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on the two previous occasions when this motion was called I explained that the papers requested are departmental reports and therefore privileged under the established practice of the house. In the circumstances I would hope the hon. member would agree to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Dupuis: Could I have the motion stand?

Mr. Speaker: The motion has been put. With the consent of the house it may stand or be withdrawn.

Mr. Dupuis: I will withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The mover of the motion requests leave to withdraw the motion. Is it the pleasure of the house that the motion be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, RESERVE MINES, N.S.

Motion No. 29—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, resolutions, petitions, and other documents exchanged between the federal government and the municipal council of Reserve Mines, Nova Scotia, the government of the province of Nova Scotia, and any other persons or organizations since January 1, 1960, regarding the erection of a post office building on the Sydney road at Reserve Mines, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we accept this motion subject to the usual reservation.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the reservation expressed by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, RESERVE MINES, N.S.

Motion No. 30—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Prime Minister, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Public Works since January 1, 1960, regarding the erection of a post office building on Sydney road at Reserve Mines, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the hon. member for Assiniboia withdraw this motion in view of the fact that these documents are privileged.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the minister is completely accurate in making this suggestion. I was rather surprised that the motion got to this position and, for the reasons the minister has given, I shall be very happy to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: As the motion has not been placed before the house and the hon. member who is the mover consents to its withdrawal, it is withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

PENSION VESTING FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES

Motion No. 33—Mr. Herridge:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence or other documents exchanged between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue or any officials of their departments and any officers of any trade union with respect to pension vesting for income tax purposes, since January 1, 1958.

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker we accept the motion in so far as it has to do with documents exchanged between the federal government and organizations and persons outside the government.

Mr. Herridge: I accept that condition.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who moves the motion accepts the reservation expressed by the minister. Subject to this reservation, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FLAGS OF CANADA

PROVISION FOR REFERENDUM ON ADOPTION OF CANADIAN FLAG

On the order: Notices of motions:

November 17—Mr. Regnier—the following proposed resolution:—

Flags of Canada

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to provide for a referendum concerning the adoption of a Canadian flag.

That the questions submitted in said referendum be as follows:—Are you in favour of a flag consisting of (a) a green maple leaf on a red and white field, or (b) the red ensign?

Mr. Speaker: Before placing the motion of the hon. member for St. Boniface before the house may I note a technical difficulty which results from the fact that there are two public bills standing on the order paper both dealing with the question of a distinctive national flag, which is also the subject matter of this motion.

The problem of conflict between two items on the order paper dealing with the same matter has arisen before in the house. Hon. members will recall that there were two bills dealing with the printing of negotiable securities in French, and that debate on one of them was refused pending the disposition of the other on the grounds that the house will not enter into a discussion of identical subjects under two categories.

As this motion is now, I take it, about to be offered to the house, there is before us not quite the same problem of the same subject matter in two bills on the order paper, but rather the same or a similar subject matter in a motion and in two bills. That raises the question of whether discussion of this motion now would not be in anticipation of the order for resumption of the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill No. C-8, an act to authorize a Canadian flag, which was moved by the hon. member for Lincoln and discussed some days ago, as well as in anticipation of second reading of Bill No. C-17, an act respecting flags of Canada, which stands in the name of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. The relevant citation from Beauchesne is citation 131, in his fourth edition, which reads as follows:

The anticipation rule, which forbids discussion of a matter standing on the paper being forestalled, is dependent on the same principle as that which forbids the same question being twice raised in the same session. In applying the anticipation rule, preference is given to the discussions which lead to the most effective result, and this has established a descending scale of values for discussions —bills, motions, amendments, etc. Thus a bill must not be anticipated by discussion of a motion, amendment, or subject raised on another motion.

Then citation 148, section 1, is to similar effect.

It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Citation 200, section 3, reads:

A motion dealing with the same subject matter as a bill standing on the order paper for second reading cannot be considered.

I think that sufficiently indicates the principle involved. A question remains whether the subject matter of this motion is the same as that of the two bills, or either of them, and I should be glad to hear the hon. member on that point. In discussing this, I think it is relevant to consider whether, if this motion proceeds, the debate can be restricted in any way to distinguish it from the debate on the other bills, both of which are for a method of selecting a flag.

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): The resolution relating to the flag is No. 2 on the order paper as the result of a draw made prior to the opening of the session. The bill presented by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith) was No. 8 on the list. This is the first point I want to make. If this line of reasoning were followed there would be danger that a resolution might be defeated, although it had priority on the order paper, by the placing of a number of bills on the order paper.

My second point, Mr. Speaker, is that the principle of this motion is not the same as the principle of the bill. My motion requests a referendum to choose a flag. Not only is this resolution in a place of priority on the order paper, but I believe this is the first time this subject has been introduced in the house for discussion. I do not believe the subject of a referendum to choose a flag has been debated before. I would say there is as much difference between the resolution and the bill introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln as between night and day.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I have listened to the citations which you have just given to the house, Mr. Speaker, and it would seem to me that the point made by the hon. member for St. Boniface is one which should commend itself to Your Honour.

The reason for that is that it seems to me that the principle involved in the motion now before the house is entirely different from the principle contained in the bills. Bill No. C-7, respecting flags of Canada, which was submitted to the house by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has not been brought to our attention thus far. As the hon. member has said the other bill, No. C-8, moved by the hon. member for Lincoln, is one that deals with one matter; but this motion deals with a referendum and the principle, on the face of it, strikes me as one which is entirely different. We have from time to time in the house matters that are amended because of a different principle, and Your Honour has had to deal with that.

It strikes me, on the face of it, that it would not be in order—I say this with respect to Your Honour—to give priority to either of these bills in view of the fact that the matter of referring this subject to the country is one which is not contained in the other bills.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. members for the distinctions they have drawn. There is, of course, a very distinct principle in this motion; that is, that there be a referendum to the Canadian people to decide as between two flags. I assume that referendum is for some purpose, and that purpose is to provide a method of establishing a Canadian flag. I am quite prepared to accept that distinction, if the house is agreeable, and to allow the debate to proceed, although I must say I have little hope of maintaining any distinction between the debate which will arise on this motion and the debate which we have already had or will have on the other bill.

Mr. Herridge: My group believe this resolution is much more acceptable than asking the lord lyon king of arms of Scotland to design a flag for us.

Mr. Speaker: If the house will then permit me to accept this motion, with the very definite reservation that it will not be too weighty a precedent, I shall be glad to call upon the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to provide for a referendum concerning the adoption of a Canadian flag.

That the questions submitted in said referendum be as follows:—Are you in favour of a flag consisting of (a) a green maple leaf on a red and white field, or, (b) the red ensign?

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I rise today with pride and humility to speak in favour of the resolution appearing in my name on the order paper with regard to a referendum on a Canadian flag. Lacking the eloquence to deal with a matter so dear to the hearts of all Canadians, I shall be brief.

If I rise today to discuss the matter of a referendum with regard to a national flag, it is because the people want it. Canada needs a flag. It is a necessity. The pride of the whole nation is at stake. It is not only a matter of self-esteem, but of national pride. It is essential for strengthening the unity and harmony of the two great races which, along with all the other ethnical groups living together in Canada make up the Canadian people. A country must be proud of the flag which represents the nation. A flag would be the symbol of our independence and brotherhood.

Personally, I believe that the love and faithful devotion we feel for our country can only be strengthened by such a symbol.

Comparing nations with individuals, the lack of a flag makes us like a man who has grown up without a name and, who wants to gain not only the respect of his fellow men, but hopes to become a leader or chief. He cannot succeed for want of a name.

Canada has been making tremendous efforts in favour of peace and disarmament. That is an excellent reason why as an independent country with a growing influence in world affairs, Canada should have its own flag. Because it has no flag, other nations can say that Canada cannot speak with a single voice. We lack the unity we are urging other nations to achieve as a prerequisite to peace and disarmament. As a result, our efforts to get the support of other nations in favour of peace and disarmament can only be weakened. If we are unable to pick our own flag, it means we are controlled by another country, and therefore incapable of independent action.

Mr. Speaker, a number of my French-speaking fellow Canadians are afraid that the resolution I am proposing involves some risk. They fear that the Canadian red ensign may be chosen. By way of reassurance, I shall tell them that, if my grandfather had borne the same name as my grandmother, I would be called MacIntosh, and as a true Scotsman, I only go in for a pretty sure bet.

I am certain that the province of Quebec has no monopoly on patriotism, and also I am sure that if a referendum did take place Canadians would choose a flag with a maple leaf design and without any symbol from some other country. In fact, when the special joint committee on a distinctive Canadian flag met for nine months in 1945 and 1946, an hon. member, Mr. McNicoll, spent 25 hours studying the 2,409 designs which had been submitted at the time. And this is what Mr. McNicoll found. Of the 2,409 designs submitted 1,611 showed a maple leaf, which means two in three, or 61 per cent; 383 had a union jack, that is one in six, or 16 per cent; 231 had stars; 184, fleurs-de-lis; 116 a beaver; 49 a crown; 22 a cross, and 14 the great bear.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that was a real referendum taken among all Canadians who were interested in the choice of a flag. Sixty seven per cent wanted the maple leaf and 16 per cent the union jack.

The institute of public opinion reports in the Star Weekly of March 21, 1957, after having taken a poll involving 1,110 adults of all ages and professions, that is four times as many as in the ordinary Gallup polls, that in Canada, three people in four are favouring a distinctive flag, which would differ from that of any other country.

At the junior chamber of commerce the answers of 2,400 of its members to a set of questions gave the following results: English-speaking members: 79 per cent in favour of a Canadian flag with no emblem of any other country.

Of 3,800 English-speaking Canadians asked to take part in this vote, 70 per cent were in favour of a distinctive flag. According to press reports during the recent Liberal rally, a referendum by the Calgary young Liberals indicated that 7 per cent voted, at the Calgary Stampede, in favour of a flag showing a maple leaf and nothing else.

Moreover, it may be concluded from the fact that in 1946 the joint committee recommended the adoption of a flag with a maple leaf in autumn colours and the union jack in the canton and that this proposal remained buried in some office drawers for 15 years, this decision was certainly not based on evidence received by the committee. If we take as basis the analysis made by Mr. McNicoll, M.P., we are satisfied that the members of the joint committee in 1945 and 1946 did not take any decision with regard to the evidence submitted, because as can be recalled and as I have read in the official record for 1945 Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. St. Laurent, who was then minister of justice, had, during the three days of debate on this matter, expressed the view that the union jack should be included on any flag that might be chosen.

When the leader of a party in power or the minister of justice gives his opinion to the committee, can the committee be expected to take a decision contrary to the opinion stated in advance by the government? That is why this flag has remainded and still is out of sight.

This is why I am asking for a referendum the possibility of which has already been considered. Indeed, I feel that a referendum is not necessary, because every day, the Canadian people express their opinion on the matter and this is enough for the present government to act upon.

Maybe the government declines the honour of selecting a flag for Canada. All the same, that honour should not be denied to the Canadian people.

[Mr. Regnier.]

If a referendum takes place, I suggest that it should be held at the same time as the next election, so as to avoid additional expenses.

Mr. Heward, an Ottawa lawyer, had this to say about the 1946 flag committee:

(Text):

This recommendation was made by the committee:

(Translation):

Pardon, Mr. Heward then refers to the committee's recommendation. I quote:

(Text):

Your committee recommends that the national flag of Canada should be the Canadian red ensign with a maple leaf in autumn golden colours in a bordered background of white, replacing the coat of arms in the fly; the whole design to be so proportioned that the size and position of the maple leaf in relation to the union jack in the canton will identify it as a symbol distinctive of Canada as a nation.

(Translation):

Such was the recommendation, Mr. Speaker. This is actually the flag that I should like to see included in the referendum.

(Text):

This recommendation was arrived at by the committee on the 11th July, 1946. A bill was not introduced by the government at the session then sitting to implement the report and was not introduced at the next session. The government no doubt recognized very well that because of the very great opposition to such a flag, as recommended by the committee, they would lose the support of Quebec certainly and also lose some support in other places. The government might, quite possibly, be defeated on such a bill.

(Translation):

And further on, he stated:

(Text):

The introduction of a bill to adopt a flag has apparently been indefinitely postponed. This, it is believed, is a very proper policy for it is much better to wait even for some years to adopt a flag than to decide on a design now which is opposed by so many Canadians. Canadians are not yet sufficiently Canada-conscious to appreciate the necessity for a flag of purely Canadian design; the patriotism of very many of them is still given to the United Kingdom and only what is left is given to Canada. They do not consider, as do their French compatriots, that Canada is their homeland, their fatherland. This unfortunate condition is being rapidly changed; the effects on the soldiers who have been overseas have been very great. They have come back Canadians. And until Canadians have acquired a Canadian national consciousness it would only divide the country into distinct opposing groups to adopt a flag that has the union jack in the upper staff quarter. How long this delay should be depends on the development of that national consciousness—three, five or perhaps more years might be needed, but it would be time well spent in doing nothing towards adopting a flag but spent in education in Canadian citizenship and appreciation of the fact that Canada is now, and has been for some years, a sovereign independent state entitled to a purely Canadian flag.

(Translation):

In my opinion, we have waited all those years mentioned by Mr. Heward in his book on the Canadian flag. I am convinced that today Canada is ready to be given a flag by its government or to select one if the opportunity arises.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I know that many still believe and are sincere in their opinions that the union jack should be chosen in any Canadian flag. I have been indebted to Mr. Cumberland, who was the supreme president of the native sons of England, for his book "The History of the Union Jack".

I have great respect for the union jack and great admiration for what it represents. I do not believe that Canadians, by adopting a flag which is absolutely different than the union jack, would have less love or respect for the union jack or what it represents. To use a famous phrase of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when speaking on another subject, "It is not that we love Great Britain less, but it is because we love Canada more".

The union jack dates from the time of the third crusades, when Richard Coeur de Lion, instead of going overland like most other nations, equipped a fleet and had a naval battle against the Saracens near the city of Beirut. Close to that city there was a grotto dedicated to St. George. As the result of a visit there Richard Coeur de Lion decided to choose the cross of St. George for the flag of England. It has been argued by many people that Richard Coeur de Lion was a French Norman king, and that really we should have nothing against the union jack because, after all, there were some French connections. But the racial connections should really have nothing to do with the flag that is the flag of this country.

In reading this book I find that it was James VI of Scotland who in 1603 became king of England. He was, I believe, the second cousin of Elizabeth and the great-grandson of Henry VIII. In 1606, in order to avoid quarrels between Scots sailors and English sailors he decided to have a flag that contained the cross of St. George and the cross of St. Andrew. But this flag was what they called an additional flag, and each country kept its own national flag. It was only on merchant ships that this new flag, called the union flag, would be at the main-top mast and the national flag was fore-top.

However, in 1707, in the reign of Queen Anne, the parliament of Scotland was abolished, with the result—and only then—that the union flag of what they called the two Britains, north Britain and south Britain, was adopted as the flag used all over Scotland and England. But it was not until 1801, when the parliament of Ireland was abolished, that the real union jack was formed by also including in the union jack the cross of St. Patrick.

So we have a formula. That is, if it is necessary to have the union jack as a flag we must have unity of parliament. As long as Scotland had her own parliament, the Scots people had their own flag and the English had their own flag. Only when the Scots parliament was abolished was the union jack used in Scotland and in England. But the king of England was the king of Ireland long before he was king of Scotland, and the Irish used their flag as long as they had their own parliament. It was only in 1801, when the parliament of Ireland was abolished, that they adopted the union jack. So, while they had the same king, they had different flags.

To be logical, those who want the union jack as their flag should be in favour of abolishing our parliament here and having it in London. Then we would be part of the same kingdom; then we could accept it. But as long as we have different parliaments we cannot have the union jack as our flag unless we first admit that we are not independent, that we are a colony. If we are prepared to do that, yes.

As far as the red ensign is concerned, the way the red ensign is now composed, every time I see it I feel a deep humiliation because the place of honour of the flag does not belong to Canada. It belongs to another country. I prefer the old union jack which we use in Manitoba to the flag which shows Canada to be subservient to another land. This is no reflection on Great Britain. It is no reflection on the other country whose emblem is in that flag, because it is not there because the other country wants it; it is there because Canadians have not had the courage to do anything about it up to now.

I am asking for a referendum because this question has been discussed for the last 35 years without action being taken. Motions and private bills have been brought down by members of all political parties. Perusing Hansard I find that as far back as 1925 an order in council is set out fully in Hansard providing in part as follows:

> The minister therefore recommends that a committee be appointed to consider and report on the most suitable design that should be adopted for a national flag.

In 1934 and again in 1935 motions were introduced by Mr. Dickie, the then Conservative member for Nanaimo, respecting a Canadian flag. In 1938 the Liberal member for North Battleford, Mr. McIntosh, put forward in this house a proposal for the adoption of a Canadian flag. This resolution was debated on February 14, 1938 and during the discussion both the then prime minister of Canada, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, and the leader of the opposition of that day, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, declared themselves in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. I should like to quote excerpts from the speeches of these two statesmen. On February 14, 1938, as reported at page 438 of Hansard, Mr. King said:

> I would conclude this part of what I have to say with the observation that the continued use of the union jack gives a false impression abroad, and particularly in the country immediately adjoining.

Further on, as reported on page 440 of Hansard, Mr. King went on to say:

> Let me conclude with these words. There has never been a time, I believe, when the relations between Canada and the mother country were so cordial so completely friendly, helpful and co-operative in every way as they are at the present time. The present is the time, then, to consider this question. It will not be disposed of, in my opinion, until it is settled in Canada as it has been in the other dominions. If we do not settle it now, some issue may arise in the course of a few years which will provoke another discussion and lead to the settlement of the question in a manner that may be misunderstood elsewhere. Today there is no possible danger of misunderstanding on the part of anyone in this country, in Britain, in Europe or elsewhere in the world, as to what Canada has in mind in seeking to have a distinctive national flag.

Now I should like to quote the words of Mr. Bennett as reported at page 442:

> Upon the large question, I expressed an opinion in the house some years ago that I believed it was desirable, as I do tonight, that the country should have some flag by which it could distinguish itself from other parts of the world.

I might also refer hon. members to page 415 of Hansard of 1938 where there are quotations given in support of a distinctive flag from the Winnipeg Free Press, the Hamilton Herald, the Winchester Press, the Stratford Beacon-Herald, the Collingwood Bulletin, the Recorder and Times, Brockville, the Kingston Whig-Standard and many others. The Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, Saskatchewan division, passed a resolution calling unanimously for the selection of a suitable flag to be known as the flag of Canada.

As I said earlier, the greatest work in this direction was done by the joint committee of 1945 and 1946. In 1956 at Windsor, Ontario the Ontario command of the Canadian Legion adopted a resolution demanding a referendum in respect of the two flags which were submitted by the minority and majority reports of the committee of 1945. This was, in a sense, erroneous, because the committee only reported one flag, but two flags were voted upon during the sittings of that committee, I believe on the last day of its deliberations. One of them was the flag coloured red and white and containing a maple leaf. The other was a flag which had not, in fact, been submitted at all. It was a flag which had been manufactured by members of the committee, though it is claimed some ten models had been produced to which the latter flag was similar.

The line of division in that committee was between those who were in favour of a maple leaf without the union jack and those who were in favour of a maple leaf with the union jack. As I mentioned earlier, if the committee had decided on the evidence before it, the position would have been clearer. The division was 67 per cent in favour of the flag with the maple leaf without the union jack, and 16 per cent for the flag containing both the maple leaf and the union jack.

In my first speech in the House of Commons I dealt with the subject of a distinctive flag for Canada, and I give credit for that, in part, to the first two people who wrote to me after my election in 1958. These letters were both dated April 2, and they asked me to work for a Canadian flag. I have also received cards from people in my own constituency, some containing pictures of a suggested Canadian flag, asking me to do the same thing. One of the letters I received came from an old man, who claims he was 90 years of age last October. As a matter of fact I received three letters. The first two letters were written by the man's daughter explaining that her father was too old to write. I answered those letters, and the third letter arrived in the handwriting of this old Canadian. I should like to name him; Mr. W. Gascon, of the city of Ottawa. He had kept clippings on the subject and had himself written to newspapers in an endeavour to have a flag adopted.

I should like at this point to commend the past president of the Canadian Legion, Montgomery command, who has a file about six inches thick on this subject. He is the one who brought me the draft of the resolution which was passed by the Ontario command and also the draft passed by the dominion command at the convention of 1958 held in Edmonton, asking for a referendum on the two flags which had been voted upon in the committee of 1945.

In the committee of 1945-46 a number of questions were raised. I wish to quote from the proceedings dated May 29, 1946 of the joint committee of the House of Commons and the other place:

The Chairman: I will ask Senator Lambert to present the report of the steering committee.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: The subcommittee beg to submit a resolution in the following form bearing upon the further procedure to be adopted in connection with the two flags voted on yesterday, namely:

That a subcommittee be appointed to which the two remaining flags be referred and that the subcommittee be directed to make suggestions that will go as far as possible toward reconciling the conflicting views expressed in the committee and toward working out a design which will be generally acceptable to the committee.

At page 119 of the proceedings Mr. Hansell, the then hon. member for MacLeod, said:

So what is there to compromise on if it is not the union jack? Therefore I think I am reading into this motion something that is pretty true, and I cannot see my way clear to vote for it. I do have a suggestion to make. It is not along the line of a motion at all. I do not know whether it will be acceptable to the committee, but I should like to see these two flags submitted to the people of Canada and let them decide. I think it would be well worth the time and money that would be involved. Let them decide.

Hon. Mr. Howden: In what way?

Mr. Hansell: By way of a plebiscite.

At page 130 Mr. Hansell said in part:

Here is my point—and this could very well be done without taking any political sides at all. When the next election comes along, I suggest that a referendum be taken at that time. The parties do not have to kick the thing around as a political measure. All they have to do is this. When the people go to elect their government, they are also given another ballot with two designs put on the ballot. You are not voting Liberal, Conservative, Social Credit, C.C.F. or anything else. That is a separate matter altogether. That can be done without costing the country a dollar except for the printing of the paper with the two designs on. Let the people mark X opposite the one or the other design. That I say is a reasonable suggestion and I do not know if it is in order—

The Chairman: No, it is not.

Mr. Hansell: The chairman shakes his head, so I presume it is not in order.

The Chairman: You can make that suggestion in the house.

Mr. Hansell: But if the decks were cleared—

Mr. LaCroix: Everything which is common sense is always out of order with you, Mr. Chairman.

I should also like to quote extracts from the second and final committee report dated Friday, July 12, 1946:

The joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons appointed to consider and report upon a suitable design for a distinctive national flag for Canada, begs leave to present the following as a second and final report: Your committee held fourteen public sessions. The submission of designs to the committee was publicly invited and up to and including this date, 2,695 designs were received and considered. In addition, communications in the form of written letters, resolutions and printed form cards and printed form letters to the number of 42,168 were received and whenever the sender's name and address were given, receipt was acknowledged—

In the discussion of all phases of the subject assigned to the committee an admirable spirit of tolerance and co-operation was reflected.

The committee adopted a flag. I presume that the choice of design was directed by the government of the time. I do not think the committee decided on the evidence. As I said before, both prime minister Mackenzie King and Mr. St. Laurent, the then minister of justice, had indicated what should be on the flag.

I think the evidence is clear. It is open to the government to give the Canadian people what they want. If we simply study the type of designs submitted it will be clear that the Canadian people are interested in having a flag. I believe that action should be taken not by the government but by the people. If the government does not want to take the glory, then it should let the people have it.

Perhaps it is a good thing that the government should not impose its choice of a flag on the people. Such a flag would not please everyone. A flag chosen by referendum by a large majority of Canadians would be more acceptable to the nation than one selected by the government. There would always be people who would bear a grudge against any party that imposed its choice of a flag upon the nation. Resentment would build up, and the design would not be wholly acceptable. If, however, the design were picked by the nation it would be readily acceptable.

It is almost scandalous that a nation of 18 million people does not have its own flag. Young nations like Ghana and others who are also members of the commonwealth adopt their own flags the same day they attain their independence. It is my sincere hope that long before the celebration of our centennial this nation will have adopted a flag of its own that will be a symbol to everyone of our independence, unity and fraternity.

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise after my hon. friend to tell him how glad I am that he has brought the flag question into this house, a question of great interest for all Canadians who are proud of that name. I am particularly happy that the hon. member who put forward that motion represents a Manitoba constituency. Not so long ago we had an opportunity to hear the matter of a national flag raised in this house by a member from the province of Ontario.

For the first time, Mr. Speaker, I should like in turn to voice my opinion on the flag question, and more particularly on the referendum suggested in the motion before us, whereby the Canadian people would be asked whether they favour a flag bearing a green maple leaf on a red and white background, or what is known as the red ensign, the flag of the Canadian merchant marine.

I would say first, Mr. Speaker, that the flag question is a burning issue today, because more than ever we can discuss it without fear of hurting anyone's feelings in this beloved country of ours, Canada.

In this country we have Canadians whose relatives are still living in the old European countries and especially Canadians who came to Canada quite recently and who, in fact, still have in England, Ireland, Scotland or elsewhere relatives who are still close to their hearts. It is among those Canadians that we find the majority of those who are emotionally bound to the union jack and would like to keep it in the design of a Canadian flag.

A few years ago, Canadians whose French origin goes back approximately 100 years would certainly all have preferred to have the fleur-de-lis on our new Canadian flag. But over the years, and as Canada grows and acquires greater maturity, Canadians are becoming increasingly conscious of the need for a truly Canadian flag. It is so true and so right that the longer we have been in Canada, the more we feel ready to accept the idea of an essentially Canadian flag.

As an example, let me only mention the province of Newfoundland which joined confederation a few years ago. Its people, having only recently become Canadian citizens, are more devoted than Canadians anywhere else to the union jack, which only yesterday was their official flag.

All those attitudes are understandable. However, since the trend is that the longer one has been a Canadian the more one wants a distinctive flag, why not accept immediately the fact that an essentially Canadian flag, without any symbol from any other nation, would be best suited for a nation which now claims to be sovereign?

Mr. Speaker, I could recall several incidents but I shall mention only a few to draw the attention of this house to the many disadvantages resulting from the fact that we do not have a truly distinctive flag.

Last October, while in Paris, with my colleagues I happened to attend a reception given in honour of the chairman of a Canadian company. When the time came for us to enter the banquet hall, we noticed a small American flag on the table in front of the cover of the guest of honour who was a Canadian. So we asked: Why did you place a small American flag where the guest of honour is going to sit? The answer was: Well we wanted to please our visitor, as we do every time we play host to a distinguished guest from abroad. We always place in front of him the flag of his country. And since we have tonight a Canadian guest, we also wanted to please him by placing his flag in front of him. We inquired about the Canadian flag and none of those we questioned knew anything about a Canadian flag. That is why we placed an American flag in front of the guest because he came from America.

Well, Mr. Speaker, you can see from this incident how clearly the lack of a Canadian flag is prejudicial to us not only here in Canada but also abroad. Canada is a sovereign country, a country we are proud of, a country which has its independent government as well as its independent army and to which Canadian citizens are proud to belong.

Recently, on a C.B.C. television program, I saw visitors from India, Germany, Switzerland, who were discussing with a commentator that ticklish subject and who were asking: "How is it that you, in Canada, have no distinctive emblem, that you have as yet no Canadian flag"?

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useless for me to insist further on the urgent need of a Canadian flag. I would not like to labour the point unduly. So I come at once to this resolution now before us: Should we vote in favour of a resolution providing for a referendum at the next national election, in order to know whether the Canadian people prefer a flag bearing a green leaf on a red and white background, or the red ensign?

Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) for bringing the matter before the house.

I agree with all he has said about our duty, as Canadians, to do all we can to obtain a distinctive flag; I fully agree with him on that, but where I do not agree, is on the way the referendum should be held.

You are going to ask Canadians, at the polls, whether they prefer the red ensign or a flag bearing a green leaf on a red and white background. To my mind, the weakness of the resolution lies precisely in that restriction imposed upon the Canadian citizen. Surely there are many Canadians who have the right or privilege to suggest a design for a flag, whatever it may be.

To restrict the debate to the consideration of two flags would amount to evading the question for the moment. In the first place, I do not believe that, from a strictly heraldic standpoint, Canadian citizens are prepared to select a particular flag in preference to another. In the second place, I believe the government is entitled first to sound out the opinion of the people on the most important point, i.e.: Are Canadian citizens prepared to accept a really distinctive flag, one which would include no emblem already belonging to another country. That is the major question, at the moment. The government will then shoulder its responsibilities.

We want to know whether the people of Canada wish to have a flag bearing an emblem of another country, such as the union jack or the fleur-de-lis, or any other emblem, or whether they prefer a strictly Canadian flag, bearing no sign whatever of any other nation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the whole matter right now hinges on that point. That is why, I should like to submit respectfully to this house an amendment to my friend's resolution.

My amendment reads as follows:

(Text):

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger):

> That all the words after the word "flag" in line 4 of the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "by including the following question in the 1961 census: Are you in favour of a distinctive national flag which does not contain the emblem of any other country?"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does any hon. member wish to discuss the validity of the amendment? Otherwise I shall put it.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the motion and, of necessity now, to the amendment. Once again we are engaged in a discussion of the question of a distinctive Canadian national flag. This matter keeps coming before the House of Commons on a perennial basis by way of motions, and once again we have it before us this afternoon. Undoubtedly it is of interest to a great many people.

In introducing my remarks this afternoon I should like to remind the house of something I said in opening my statement on a similar motion on February 20, 1959. I said this, as recorded on page 1265 of Hansard of that date:

> There can be no question but what there is a great deal of interest in Canada in the question of a distinctive Canadian flag. I think I can say also that there are a great many ideas as to what that flag should be. I know that there is hardly a week goes by that I do not receive letters on this matter and a number of designs. In the main, each one is different. All these people are sincere, and everyone seems to have a good, basic reason for suggesting his own design.

I do not feel I can do better in introducing my remarks this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, on the motion that is now before us, than by repeating what I said on that occasion. This afternoon we do have a motion which is somewhat different from the many which this house has considered in the past. The hon. member is introducing a suggestion that the government should consider the advisability of holding a referendum concerning the adoption of a Canadian flag. The motion refers to only two designs. The question to be submitted in this referendum would be:

> Are you in favour of a flag consisting of (a) a green maple leaf on a red and white field, or (b) the red ensign.

This, sir, is a somewhat different suggestion from that which we have considered in past years. I want to say, first of all, that so far as the C.C.F. are concerned, we have by convention decisions over the years stated that we were in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. May I give two illustrations. I have here, sir, the report of our thirteenth annual convention held in July, 1954, where this motion was carried:

> Resolved that, in view of existing C.C.F. policy in support of a distinctive national flag for Canada, this convention urge the parliamentary group to exert continuous pressure in parliament for the adoption of a flag at an early date.

In order to illustrate that we felt the same in 1956, I may say that at our August convention that year there was a reference to the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag and a national anthem. The position of this group, Mr. Speaker, is therefore very clear, not only because I say so but because by national convention opinion there should be a distinctive Canadian flag.

However, there are aspects of this question and of this particular motion of the hon. member which I feel require some enlargement. I was most interested in the remarks of the sponsor of this motion when he referred to the maple leaf. It has been my privilege, sir, to be in many countries of the world during the past two years. I was most intrigued and proud to find that wherever I went with my colleagues from this house and the other place, be it the United Kingdom, Australia, Israel, Iran, Pakistan, Ceylon, Indonesia, Thailand, as soon as anyone saw the little maple leaf in the lapel of my coat they said "Canada". The man on the street said "Canada". This indicates that already there is something symbolic to everyone in the world that means Canada, and that is the maple leaf. I hope, sir, that will not be forgotten in any consideration of a distinctive Canadian flag.

I must admit I was a little disturbed by a remark made by one of the previous speakers who, if my interpretation of his remarks was correct, indicated that the pride of Canada required that we have a distinctive national flag. I hope we are not going to consider this resolution on that basis. The pride of Canada, sir, is not in the colour or design of a flag that we may have or may have had up until now. The pride of Canada is in what the flag stands for, not the colour or design. It is what the flag stands for that is the cause of Canadian pride, not whether it is the fleur-de-lis, the maple leaf, the beaver or the red ensign.

This question, without a doubt, can be and most likely is an emotional one. I was born in England, but I have lived in Canada since 1910. There are others in Canada whose cultural and ethnic background is French, Scandinavian, Ukrainian, Indian or Chinese. In my estimation the important fact is that I am a Canadian, and this is Canada. Surely, sir, the importance of a flag is what it means, not the colour or design. I do not believe those who feel so emotional about the design feel they are any worse Canadians because their background is represented by the fleur-de-lis than I do because mine is represented by the union jack. Ever since there has been a Canada we have had a flag. We have had a flag in peace; we have had a flag in war.

This brings to my mind something about which I have thought quite a bit. I believe that one of the greatest organizations for peace and progress in the world is the British commonwealth. I have often wondered why we have not given consideration to not merely a distinctive flag for each of the individual countries that make up the commonwealth but something which would be a representation to the world of a population of 600 million people who believe in peace, freedom, prosperity, mutual understanding and international good will. It would mean a good deal more to me to have a flag for the commonwealth, recognized by all of us, flown over Canada, for that which I maintain is the purpose of a flag, than for any purpose of distinctive nationalism.

However, as I say, it is to a certain extent something of an emotional nature. If the majority of the people of Canada feel that it means more to them in our commonwealth to have a distinctive Canadian national flag, then let us have it. But let us not in this House of Commons try to consider in a motion or even to debate what form the design of that flag shall take, and I will tell you why. A few years ago the House of Commons and the Senate tried to do just that, and I think my memory serves me correctly when I say that there are now in the files in these buildings something in the neighbourhood of 1,400 designs. I believe my memory is correct.

Mr. Hodgson: Over 2,700.

Mr. Winch: The hon. member says there are over 2,700. When he spoke my hon. friend said there were 800. I remember at that time there were 1,400. Now there are over 2,700. You cannot have a referendum, I submit, on the question "which one do you want?" I know everyone was sincere in the reason behind his submission. I think I can agree that a referendum should be put to the Canadian people as to whether they feel that it is necessary or that it is going to help them to have a distinctive national flag. However, I cannot agree that a referendum should be put on the question "Do you want one of two?" That is the question contained in the motion before us.

I think this has reached the point now where the discussion is going to go on all day, as I think has occurred every year I have been here and for many years prior to that time, with no decision or conclusion being reached. I think it would be a wonderful thing if this house would now reach a decision on this matter. I believe it is a good idea to put this matter in a referendum to the Canadian people, to ask them whether they want a distinctive national flag and to let them answer that question.

However, I want to say this also. It should not be a referendum on one or two flags. No one can make a decision on this 2,700 designs that are now on file in the buildings here. I say this, and it is only my personal opinion, however, I want to put it forward as a personal opinion. There is only one way to handle the situation. If the Canadian people decide by referendum that they want a distinctive national flag, there is only one way to settle the design and that is for the government to have the intestinal fortitude—having received an affirmative vote of the Canadian people, if such is forthcoming—to reach a decision on the design and go through the necessary procedure, namely to bring a bill before this House of Commons, have it passed and sent to the Senate and passed there.

Otherwise we are going to be carrying on in the years to come as we have been doing in the past, I imagine, almost since the time of confederation. Let the people decide by referendum—and in this I agree with the sponsor of the bill—whether they want it. If they say yes, then let the government—this government or a succeeding one—have the fortitude, after all their studies and consideration, to bring in a design, have the guts to stand by it and let us pass it.

As I said, there will be backers of 2,700 designs who perhaps will not like the design chosen. There will be a few weeks or a few months of criticism and obstruction. But if I know the people of Canada at all and the way in which they react, my opinion is this. If that decision is made and passed by the House of Commons and the Senate, it will not be long before they will all be saluting the flag and will be proud of the fact that they have now obtained what they want, namely a distinctive flag.

I put that suggestion forward. In conclusion I say that this is an emotional matter. I am quite happy under the flag under which I now live. If the majority of the people, however, want something different, that is all right. It is then our responsibility to see that they get it. I hope the amendment will not be considered with a view to just putting forward a referendum on two ideas for a flag. That is why I rather like the principle of the amendment. I think this is a wonderful time to have a referendum by including it as one of the questions in the census. I want to commend the hon. member for that suggestion. I think it is a wonderful idea. But I suggest that his amendment be amended, or that he consider amending it, in order not to ask again "Are you in favour of a distinctive national flag which does not contain an emblem of any other country?"

How partisan can you get? There once again we are running into the old trouble with regard to the union jack or the fleur-de-lis. We are now getting a great influx of people from other parts of the world. On that score we are running right back into the trouble that has been bothering us all this time. I think this idea of a referendum in the original motion is good. I think the principle of the amendment with regard to having the referendum put in the census is a wonderful idea. Then if the government in the census gets the answer that Canada wants a distinctive national flag, let them have the gumption to bring in a bill embodying a design, and I think we shall then finally solve this problem of a flag for Canada.

Mr. Harris Rogers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in entering this debate may I say that my remarks will naturally be brief, inasmuch as my colleague the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) covered the matter rather fully and in detail. At the outset I want to say that in his remarks the hon. member for Vancouver East has made a suggestion that I think could be worked out in principle.

It is not considered good form to refer to one's background or activities in life. However, Mr. Speaker, in order to keep the record straight I think I should be permitted to do so today. I belong to that component of British origin that descended from the united empire loyalists. On tracing the lineage back one finds that it is quite a mixture. In it there are traces of Huguenot, English, Irish, Scots, Welsh and Dutch which, I submit, when all welded together have made me a Canadian and a proud one. Apart from this consideration I served in the armed forces for some nine or ten years. So altogether—let us have no misunderstanding about this—I have always been loyal to the crown and to the union jack and our membership in the commonwealth of nations. Be that as it may, in all sincerity I think the time has arrived when we should have a distinctive Canadian flag.

Geographically Canada is the third largest nation in the world. Our population is made up of peoples from all over the globe and the flow of immigrants must be kept up if we ever intend to build a nation in keeping with our heritage. The time has passed when we can sit back and be told that the British and French laid the foundations of present day Canada. During the second world war, following an accident in my first unit, I was given the honour of recruiting and organizing a second army service corps unit. I found it difficult to pronounce the names of most of the servicemen who formed that unit. Suffice it to say they were simply Canadians, and proud of it.

This is Canada, and in my humble opinion nothing could give us more confidence and national unity than a distinctive Canadian flag. We have Canadians in the services—in fact, they are ambassadors of the highest order—serving all over the world. From what I can gather, their hue and cry is for a distinctive Canadian flag, something they can cling to and something they can look to with pride.

I submit that the purpose of a national flag is to indicate the sovereignty of a nation, which I contend our present flag does not altogether do. It honours the union jack, which is an honourable symbol but not the symbol of Canada. This has been quite an issue over a number of years and dates back to 1925, as far as I can find out, when the government of the day set up a committee of civil servants to study the problem. This was short-lived, in as much as it did not have the required representation. Subsequently to this, in the years 1931, 1933, 1934, 1935 and 1938 motions and resolutions were talked out, much as I suppose will happen today. Following this, in 1945 the government set up a committee of members of parliament and senators, the report of which was not presented to the House of Commons.

Almost concurrent with this the then prime minister, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, passed an order in council recognizing the red ensign as our national flag. This was gradually accepted over the years, but certainly there was not very much direction to it. That is the reason why certain sections of our country have not really accepted the red ensign. In other words, we have a Canada part of which recognizes the union jack and the rest the red ensign. The history of our past efforts to get a distinctive Canadian flag indicates, I think, lack of leadership and certainly heart. I think it is fair to say that Canadians are not a boastful people. As a matter of fact they have often been accused of being too reserved.

In regard to the flag itself, there is a minority of Canadians who could not care less. There are other sections who think it is the final break with the mother country. But there are a great many others—and in particular, young Canadians—who want a distinctive Canadian flag. I think this feeling has been growing over the years, particularly following the two world wars, and has had a great deal of influence on our thinking. There is the first group, which tends to assume that what was good enough for their fathers is good enough for them, and I submit that the second group is not assessing the matter correctly.

There will always be a Great Britain, and the fact that Canada decides to have a distinctive national flag will never break our ties with the mother country. In fact, I think it will enhance our relationship with her. We should be proud of our birthplace, but our first allegiance must be to Canada. Facing the situation fairly and squarely, no one in his right mind will quarrel with the concept of loyalty to his birthplace. This does not, however, alter the fact that our first allegiance should be to Canada. And we need a distinctive flag. Nothing could instil in us more pride and confidence as a nation than a distinctive flag.

These, of course are my own personal views. In conclusion, to date there has been no opportunity to definitely assess the feelings of Canadians as a whole on this vital question. I am therefore most happy to second this motion urging that provision be made for a referendum to consider the adoption of a Canadian flag. I submit that only in this manner will each and every Canadian have the opportunity to express his views and wishes on this question, which is of such vital concern to every Canadian.

[Mr. Rogers.]

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, although I do not share the views of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier), I still wish to offer him my congratulations for the splendid speech he delivered a few minutes ago concerning a distinctive national flag for Canada.

He developed his argument in a knowledgeable way, free of all partisanship. Once again, I wish to offer him my congratulations. I do not doubt his sincerity and it is in the same spirit that I want to express my own opinion.

The problem as put by the hon. member for St. Boniface has, in my opinion, two different aspects, a theoretical aspect and a practical aspect.

On the theoretical side, the effect of this resolution will be to bring nearer the adoption of a distinctive national flag by allowing this subject to be discussed in the house. On the practical side, the resolution is not the answer to the aspirations of the Canadian people, since it invites them to decide on a flag design which is not authentically Canadian.

That the Canadian people wish a flag of their own, a flag which would be free of all ties with any other country has been obvious for some time. Why then a referendum on the choice of a flag bearing the red ensign?

The question is not whether the Canadian people care to have the union jack or the maple leaf, but what design is going to appear on this emblem.

Objectively, let us say that the resolution of the hon. member would have carried more weight if it had been phrased in such a way as to call for an expression of opinion.

We know the feeling of the population, concerning the design which has been mentioned so often, the design advocated by the National Flag League, that is the white and red flag with a green maple leaf in the center.

If the hon. member's project were adopted it would contribute, contrary to the motives which inspired it, to create disunion among the different racial groups of the nation, since Canadians could not take to an emblem which would bear signs of dependence or submission to other countries.

I believe I speak for the majority of my fellow citizens when I say that we do not want a flag which would remind us of our ties with France or Great Britain, that is to say that Canadians would not accept an emblem with either a fleur-de-lis or the union jack.

This question has been under discussion here for a long time. I do not want to give the background of those discussions. The hon. member for St. Boniface has quoted many statistics which show that public opinion is ready for a distinctive national flag.

However, a real change has occurred in the last 25 years.

In 1946, 68 per cent of the people wanted a distinctive national flag. Canadian High Life News under date of January 25, 1955, reported on a questionnaire circulated among the students. Here are the results: 86.8 per cent of the boys were in favour of a distinctive national flag and 80.7 per cent of the girls were of the same mind.

I am pleased to support the amendment introduced by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), because I feel the question should not be asked at a general election but rather during the next census to be held in June. We were told that new forms are to be printed for the census. May I ask the house then why that question inquiring whether or not the Canadians are in favour of a distinctive national flag should not be included in the form?

Another reason that should prompt the hon. members to vote for the amendment put forward by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville is the fact already mentioned that 95 per cent of the candidates in the 1945 general election declared themselves in favour of a distinctive national flag, while 3.7 per cent were against it. The others did not answer the questionnaire distributed before the 1945 election.

The whole nation calls for an emblem showing that Canada is now an adult nation and a completely independent country.

There are, however, exceptions and this is understandable. There are a few citizens who do not wish a distinctive flag for Canada but they are a very small minority.

I am happy to be able to say in this house that those people are not to be found in the ranks of the Liberal party, as evidenced by the resolution adopted by the party at its recent rally, to the effect that it would give Canada a distinctive flag two years after coming into power. It will therefore happen in 1964 or 1965, just in time to celebrate the centenary of confederation.

A noteworthy fact is the clear position taken on this issue by our leader. Indeed, both in newspapers and on television, he has put himself on record as being in favour of a distinctive national flag. He was not afraid to make that question part of his electoral program in 1958 and to talk about it from coast to coast. What position was taken by the leader of the government since he was chosen to lead his party? What are his views on the question? He would certainly like us to forget what he said in 1945 and which it is unnecessary for me to repeat in this house.

Mr. Pigeon: What about Mr. Pickersgill?

Mr. Dupuis: I referred to Newfoundland earlier, but you were not in the house. You are never here. If you want to hear all that is said, stay in the house.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has put the same question at least ten times. We heard it, but it is not worth answering.

Mr. Pigeon: You are incapable of answering it.

Mr. Boulanger: During this debate, we may have an opportunity to hear the Prime Minister's opinion. It is the Prime Minister's opinion that we would like to hear, not that of the hon. members'. When will we hear it? He has today the opportunity to make known to the house what he thinks of the issue. Will he have the courage to do it?

I wish to recall a resolution which does great honour to the one who introduced it. That resolution was put forward during the 1956 Conservative convention where the present Prime Minister was chosen as leader of the party. It was introduced by the speaker of this house (Mr. Michener) who tried to have a resolution passed in favour of a distinctive national flag. Here is the resolution:

> We have proclaimed that Canada is an independent nation. We sit at the United Nations as an independent nation. We went to war as an independent nation.
> I am sorry to see that the Conservatives do not have the courage and the wisdom to introduce such a resolution.
> The time has come to say to our children: here is our Canadian flag; it was denied to you by the Liberals but the Conservatives gave it to you.

Such an attitude is a credit to him and I must congratulate him for his courage in moving this resolution at the Conservative convention in 1956.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken part in a discussion concerning the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag maybe five or six times. I have never suggested any particular design and I agree with the hon. member from Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) that what we want is not a design but a symbol. A symbol which will represent the whole nation, its pride, its unity, its maturity and its hopes.

It is the government's responsibility to give it to us.

These are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, and I hope it will be passed.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Following an interruption in the course of the speech made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) said that I never attended the sittings of this house, which is not true. If one were to take a count of all the votes recorded since I have been a member of this assembly, one would see that if a member attends faithfully the business of this house I am certainly the one, and I feel that the remarks he made about me should instead be directed to the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville.

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the question of privilege, I should like to point out to the house that in the case of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, his body is here but his mind is away.

(Text):

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this resolution let me say at the outset that I have listened to discussions on this subject in this house for the past three years. On the basis of my study of the question I understand it has been raised since 1925, for about 35 years. I personally am satisfied with the flags we have in Canada but apparently the question of whether Canada should have a truly distinctive flag is a subject of continuing interest.

The resolution suggests that we should have a referendum. I do not think it is necessary to go to the trouble and expense of doing so when we will be taking a census this year. I agree with the hon. member who proposed an amendment to the resolution. In the census I believe the only question that should be asked is: Are you in favour of a truly distinctive Canadian flag? That is the first question that should be answered. If the answer is overwhelmingly in the affirmative then the government in power should have the courage to decide on a truly distinctive flag. It could establish a committee such as the one that met in 1945-46, if it wishes. I am convinced that those who expressed themselves in the census as wanting a flag would accept the design on which the government of the day decided.

I do not think the matter should be dropped there because we sometimes see the work dreamed up by artists which can only be described as weird. Surely an artist in designing a flag should adhere to simplicity and present a design that is well known and recognizably representative of Canada, one that would be recognized and accepted the world over. I think a flag must be emblematic of the country it represents so that it will not be mistaken for the flag of another country.

As I mentioned before, the flag should be of simple design. We would not want anything bizarre or complicated which would detract from the flag and create confusion as to what it represents. I think a truly distinctive flag would bring greater unity in Canada and that all Canadians would pay their allegiance to it if a design were brought in and presented by the government following exploration of the question through the census.

The idea of a distinctive flag for Canada has been suggested over the years and the question has had the continuing support of the armed forces. I believe the question will always interest them. The union jack has been suggested as our flag. A long time ago I learned in school how the union jack originated. It is a composite design embodying the cross of St. George, and the emblems of those countries making up the British Isles. They were all put together and the union jack came into being. Since Canada is no longer a colony of the British empire the union jack is not a Canadian flag in any true sense. I am told that the red ensign is a flag given to Canada for its merchant fleet. While this is all right I do not think it is representative of all of Canada nor should it be taken that way.

Previous speakers have mentioned that some countries of the world are in doubt as to what is the Canadian flag. I have met people from the United States who were visiting Canada and who, seeing the union jack flown here, have expressed the opinion that Canada still owes some allegiance to Great Britain and is tied to her apron strings, as it were.

Some people accuse Canadians, this government and politicians on both sides of the house of becoming too nationalistic. I think that is an exaggerated accusation. I believe that Canadians should be able to speak their piece without being accused of being anti-American, anti-British, and so on. We are Canadians, we speak from a Canadian point of view and this fact should be accepted by other countries. I am certain there would be greater acceptance, particularly in the United States, if we had a truly distinctive flag.

I think that any attempt to include the union jack or red ensign in the flag would merely degrade two well known and honourable flags. Between now and 1967, when Canada will celebrate its centennial, we hope that Canada will continue to grow in stature and as a nation. Right now the provinces are meeting with the federal government in order to work out ways by which Canada can amend the British North America Act without having to go to the British government for final approval of amendments. When this day arrives I think we will have passed another milestone in becoming a truly independent nation, and surely when we pass that milestone and celebrate our centennial we should feel entitled to have a truly distinctive flag.

A great many people come to Canada from the United States, Great Britain and other parts of the world and they accept the Canadian standard of living and all we have to offer to them, but when the question comes up of their becoming citizens of this country and avowing their allegiance to it it seems that they still think a great deal of their motherland. They still think that perhaps there is nothing wrong with the good old United States and they are somewhat dubious about whether they should take out Canadian citizenship although some go ahead and do so. If we were a truly distinctive country with a truly distinctive flag and saw to it that those who took out citizenship understood what our flag stood for, what our national anthem was and so on, I think they would value their citizenship more. I know that if you spend five years in some countries you are asked rather politely to consider becoming a citizen and if you say no they want to know why not.

Canada, as I have said, is becoming a nation more and more every day. At times the former government and the present government have found themselves in disagreement with Great Britain or the United States, and as far I am concerned that is all right. Certainly we should be able to declare ourselves one way or the other with no strings binding us to any country. Mind you, I am in complete agreement with the drawing up of treaties and agreements with other countries, but we should have a distinctive flag which would symbolize Canada as a nation. As a mature and growing nation of over 18 million people, the period of the next five years is the time when we should consider this question and solve it.

Canadians should be proud of being Canadians, of belonging to a country with a truly distinctive flag, an independent country ready to voice its criticisms to the United States or to any other country in the world with no fear of being accused of being anti-American or anti-communist or anti-anything else. Certainly we should have the right to make up our own minds as to how we wish to amend the British North America Act and whether we want to have a flag that sets us apart as belonging to the commonwealth or to any other group of nations.

While I do not support the idea of a referendum as put forward in the resolution, I support the idea that we should have a distinctive flag and that a question should be perhaps included in the census such as: Are you in favour of or do you think that Canada should have a truly distinctive flag? If it were put in that manner I think it would be wide open for those who want to retain the present flag and those who want a new one to express their views. If the majority voted in favour of a new flag then the people generally should be willing to accept it and place their faith in the government to have someone design a properly distinctive flag which would be truly symbolic of Canada.

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, my remarks with regard to the resolution and the amendment will be quite brief. First of all, I should like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier), for bringing this resolution before the house and also for the great deal of research and time he must have spent in gathering together the facts and other information which he imparted to the house. He told us of the efforts over the years to obtain a distinctive national flag for Canada. To that extent I support his resolution because I believe as he does, and as everyone else does who has spoken in the debate so far, that we should have a distinctive national flag.

However, I agree that there is some objection to the terms of the resolution, which was pointed out, of course, by the mover and seconder of the amendment. I understood the substance of their remarks to indicate that there was an objection to the limitation placed upon the referendum in that citizens when called upon to express their opinion only had a choice between two flags. I agree that there should be no such limitation.

Likewise, however, I cannot support the amendment because I believe it is objectionable for the very same reason in that it asks for an expression of opinion with respect to whether citizens are in favour of a distinctive national flag that does not include the emblem of any other country. Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is a limitation that is wholly unnecessary and which in my opinion destroys the objective of the amendment, namely to secure an expression of opinion respecting whether the majority of the people of this nation desire a distinctive national flag.

I for my part am in favour of a distinctive national flag but I cannot say that I would be opposed to including in that flag some emblem that would be significant of our ancestry and of the two nations which have contributed so much to this nation. I therefore believe, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), that first and foremost we must put this simple question, are you in favour of a distinctive national flag?

Before I conclude, I should make some reference to the impression which has been left that the red ensign is not in any way distinctive or symbolic of this country. The red ensign certainly is a flag that is distinctive. In my opinion, it is also a flag which is national in this aspect, that it relates to and is symbolic of Canada. It may be slightly confusing when compared with the flags of some other nations of the commonwealth, but certainly no one would say that the red ensign is symbolic of any nation other than Canada. I believe that our armed forces over the years have fought and died under this flag. I do not believe it is mistaken in any way for the flag of any nation other than Canada. I agree also with the hon. member for Vancouver East in his references to the maple leaf. Certainly, over the years the maple leaf has been established as emblematic of Canada.

I suggest that if we get an expression of opinion as to whether Canada should have a distinctive national flag, that expression of opinion would be very strongly in the affirmative. If we were to stop at that point we would have settled nothing. Studies which have been made in regard to a national flag indicated there were some 2,700 different designs. I am quite sure we would never arrive at that degree of unanimity that would enable us to come up with a design that would be supported by the majority of the people to the exclusion of other designs. However, having regard to what I have said about the red ensign, and to what I believe to be a considerable body of opinion in favour of the red ensign, I believe the second question on the referendum should be whether or not you are in favour of the red ensign as a Canadian flag. I know there is considerable opposition to it, but the suggested referendum in the motion now before us does include the red ensign and I certainly approve of that portion of the resolution.

After having asked for an expression of opinion as to whether there should be a distinctive national flag, the individual as I have said should be asked whether he is in favour of the red ensign. Unless there is a preponderance of opinion in favour of the red ensign, then consideration ought to be given to some design for a Canadian national flag which would attract greater support than may be manifest in so far as the red ensign is concerned.

So, Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that I certainly commend the mover and seconder of this resolution upon bringing this matter before the house. I like the idea of a referendum. I believe this is a matter which could better be dealt with by the rank and file of the people. We who sit in this house have our personal ideas in connection with this matter, but we may be a bit prejudiced or a bit biased in our point of view. We should not be unmindful of the fact that it cannot be said this country is composed primarily of people of French or English ancestry. This country is more and more becoming populated by peoples from all parts of the world. Since the last war, there have been over two million immigrants to this country, and we are more and more taking on the aspects of a truly Canadian nationality. I think it is desirable, therefore, that the people as a whole be consulted on this question and given the opportunity, as indicated by this resolution, of expressing their opinion on an important subject which has been bandied about in this house for so many years without any results being achieved. If for no other reason, the mover of this motion should be commended for bringing forth the idea of a referendum, because a referendum will at least represent some progress toward finding a solution to this problem which has been causing so much concern over so many years.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief contribution to this debate and express some views concerning this resolution.

Let me, first of all, congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) for moving this resolution. I should also like to extend the same congratulations to two other members of this house, namely the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr.

Boulanger) and the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) who have both brought in similar resolutions. One of these has been discussed in two previous sessions; the other, in the form of a bill, is now on the order paper of the house.

The resolution moved by the hon. member for St. Boniface reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to provide for a referendum concerning the adoption of a Canadian flag.

That the questions submitted in said referendum be as follows:—Are you in favour of a flag consisting of (a) a green maple leaf on a red and white field, or, (b) the red ensign.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is a good thing to discuss this question in order to have a general idea of how hon. members feel about it. So far, I have heard no one oppose the idea of a national distinctive flag. However, it seems to me that the formula suggested by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier), in the second paragraph of his resolution, will not give the results he hopes for.

The reason for this is because, as was pointed out by several members, the choice is limited to two designs: on the one hand, the maple leaf on a red and white field and, on the other hand, the Canadian red flag, that is the red ensign.

In all likelihood, many symbols are as good as, if not better, than those mentioned by the hon. member.

Furthermore, under such a scheme, it might well happen that at the time of the referendum, 51 per cent of the people would vote for the design with a green maple leaf on a red and white background, and 49 per cent for the red ensign.

What would the government do in such a case? Would they consider the majority adequate to reach a conclusion?

That is why I prefer the formula put forward by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville in his amendment. The question should be included in the next census, next June. Then it would be put in different terms:

Are you in favour of a distinctive national flag bearing the symbol of no other country?

It seems to me that this amendment, first is more in keeping with the wishes of the Canadian people, in view of its phraseology, and second, that it would allow an expression of opinion by the people in a relatively short time, as the census is to be conducted in a few months.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Why did you not do it in 1951?

Mr. Chevrier: I would point out to the hon. member for St. Boniface, who no doubt moved this motion in good faith, that at the time of the Progressive Conservative convention in 1956, the following motion had already been put forward:

That the Conservative party affirm its immediate support for the adoption of a national flag for Canada.

The word "distinctive" is not contained in the resolution, at least not according to the report I have before me, which is taken from the Ottawa Journal, a Conservative newspaper, for December 13, 1956.

Therefore, it seems that the motion of the hon. member for St. Boniface does not take into account the resolution submitted at the Progressive Conservative convention in 1956. That convention merely expressed vague support, whereas this resolution suggests a referendum.

That is why I repeat what I said earlier: in my opinion this amendment adequately provides for the present situation.

Mr. Speaker, there is also another matter that I would like to raise in the house, and it is this: by virtue of the law at this time, it is up to the parliament of Canada to select and design a distinctive Canadian flag. If such is the case then, our present government after more than three years in office has not yet decided or has not yet come to the conclusion that it must implement the resolution however vague adopted by their party.

I was asked a moment ago: Why did your party not take action when they were in office? Well, I think that 30 years ago, it would not have been possible to adopt a national distinctive flag, because the people of Canada were not prepared to accept it. It was the same thing in 1945 when the government of the day established a joint committee which, after considering the matter during several sittings, could not reach unanimity. As a matter of fact that was what prompted Mr. St. Laurent to state in this house regarding the Liberal party's stand that a flag was meant to be a symbol of unity, not a sign of disunity. National unity would be prejudiced if part of the people of this country imposed its choice upon another important element of Canada. That is why Mr. St. Laurent's government could not possibly have initiated such action at that time.

However, in recent years, as a result of the progress accomplished towards national unity, and also because of the petitions submitted by many organizations throughout the country, and because at the United Nations and abroad, Canada has no distinctive emblem, as was pointed out by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), and as a result of many Gallup polls carried out throughout the country confirming the fact that a majority of Canadians are in favour of a distinctive national flag, I believe that Canadian public opinion has developed to the point where today a very large majority of Canadians do want a distinctive national flag.

Therefore, we feel that parliament should accede to this expressed wish with the shortest delay. We have repeatedly raised that point in the House of Commons.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska and others have raised the point in two or three sessions; in each instance, the debate dragged on endlessly until the end of the sitting, making it impossible for the house to reach a decision.

As was mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) a moment ago, had this matter come to a vote in the house, I am sure that a majority of the members would have come out in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. I would add that if the resolutions submitted by hon. members on our side had been accepted, the government could have taken action.

That is why, during the great rally held in Ottawa early in January, the Liberal party definitely committed itself to giving our country a distinctive national flag within two years of its coming into office.

I would not like at this time to enter the realm of contention but I could, if I wanted to, put on record a series of statements, starting with those of the Conservative members who used to sit on this side of the house, but who have now emigrated to treasury benches, statements in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag, although since their coming to office they do not seem to have made any progress in that direction.

Earlier, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) was asked what he thought of this resolution. The answer to that question is simple. Give the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a chance to make his decision known. Cut down on your remarks and let him express his views on the amendment submitted by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, and on the resolution of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier). Those who put that question to him will then immediately see that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will support the amendment of my hon. friend the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

I said at the outset that I wanted to be brief. It is still my intention. I rose only to express those few opinions, and in closing I say that, under the existing law of parliament, by virtue of the powers of this government, if we are to have a distinctive national flag, it is up to the government, either by the establishment of a committee or by some other means, to give it to us. I believe that those who spent much of their time criticizing the former administration instead of giving us a distinctive national flag, had better address their claims and their representations to the government that sits to the right of Mr. Speaker. If they did that, we soon, might have a distinctive national flag which I think, the great majority of the Canadian people want.

Mr. V. F. Dubois (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, the resolution moved by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) is such as to command, in a very special way, the attention of all Canadians. It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to provide for a referendum concerning the adoption of a Canadian flag.

The hon. member for St. Boniface would like to have the two following questions asked: 1. Are you in favour of a flag consisting of a green maple leaf on a red and white field; 2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?

The first question has to do with a distinctive national flag, while the second would ask for a vote in favour of a flag denoting Canada's attachment for England.

Why those two questions? I believe the hon. member for St. Boniface should have asked only one question, that is: Are you in favour of a distinctive national flag? Then, the government would have the responsibility of choosing the kind of flag suitable for our country, according to the result of the referendum.

Since July 1, 1867, Canada is a democratic country under the British North America Act. It has the right to make its own laws, to choose its representatives through consultations in order to form a government. Since then also, it rests with Canada to select a flag suited to its essentially Canadian character. Furthermore, under the Statute of Westminster of December 11, 1931, Canada has become an independent and sovereign country. Since that time, we have our own supreme court. The cases that used to be referred to the privy council in London are now heard in Canada.

The Canadian government appoints its own Governor General who is chosen from among the most distinguished citizens of Canada. I am proud to commend the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for having given the Canadian people as a second Canadian Governor General, His Excellency Georges Vanier, a career soldier, who not only has done honour to our people on the battlefields but who also is a great French Canadian of the Catholic faith.

Canada has ambassadors and consuls in a great many countries. It is represented in the United Nations by an important delegation. Canadian observers are sent to international conferences of interest to our country.

Everywhere Canada is represented by men of great merit whose ability is beyond question, but there is no Canadian flag symbolizing our country and permitting our representatives to be identified.

On September 26, 1960, the Prime Minister of Canada delivered a magnificent speech against the communist bloc before the United Nations General Assembly. Knowing how successful he was in putting Mr. Khrushchev out of countenance, and having regard to the wide approval he gained in the free world, don't you think he would have been proud to see the flag of his beloved country for which he exerts himself so much waving over the U.N. building?

Canada has taken part in two world wars. Our soldiers have fought in Europe and in Asia. However our forces have never been able to fight under their own flag, but had to serve under some other country's colours. Nevertheless, our soldiers did not fail to distinguish themselves on many occasions by winning signal victories. We have in this house members who fought in both world wars. They had only a foreign flag in which to bury their comrades in arms who died on the battlefields.

Is it not the prime concern of some of the colonies achieving independence to give themselves a flag of their own?

Is the referendum suggested by the member for St. Boniface really justified? That is the point to which we must give our attention at the present time.

Different associations have already carried out surveys of public opinion. In 1958, the Canadian junior chamber of commerce held a referendum in all its branches and in all localities where a chamber of commerce is to be found. On July 3, 1959, it made public the following results: 79 per cent of its English-speaking members voted in favour of a distinctive national flag, while 78 per cent of the citizens of those localities declared themselves in favour of a flag. The report of the French-speaking chambers showed a 100 per cent vote, among both members and citizens, in favour of a distinctive national flag. An ever increasing unanimity is to be noted in that regard. All our French-Canadian organizations, which so efficiently uphold the interests of their members and of their fellow citizens in every country are asking for a distinctive national flag for the whole of Canada. They are not asking either for the union jack or fleurs-de-lis on our future Canadian flag.

Even the senior chamber of commerce of Canada, at its October 1958 convention, adopted a motion asking for a distinctive national flag.

Canada is a great country, playing an increasingly important part in international affairs. We are approaching the centenary of the confederation, which will be celebrated in 1967. We must reach unity on the one design of a flag which will be ours, without any tie, without any narrow and petty partisanship, in accord with the sovereignty of Canada, a distinctive national flag.

We must give the hon. member for St. Boniface the credit he deserves for introducing a motion to ascertain the public views and also for presenting a comprehensive and well-ordered argument. I extend to him my most sincere congratulations for having discussed the question of a national flag and for having done it so broadmindedly in order to reach the ultimate goal of a distinctive national flag for our country, Canada.

I express in this house the wish of all my constituents: that Canada be provided, as soon as possible, with a distinctive national flag. It is a subject of glory and pride for every people, a distinctive sign which, through the symbols that appear on it, invites respect from other powers.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthbaska (Mr. Boulanger) and the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) mentioned the Liberal party motion adopted during their convention in January to the effect that their party would give Canada a flag two years after assuming power. In the first place, the Liberals will not assume power after the next general election nor in the following ones because the people of Canada know only too well the value of promises that never materialize.

Besides, although the Liberals were in power for 22 years, they never gave Canada a flag which it could really call its own.

I remain convinced that the hon. member for St. Boniface, as a Canadian is a great patriot who proclaimed himself in favour of a distinctive national flag.

I feel, however, that a referendum is not necessary, but that it is the responsibility of the government to give the Canadian people the distinctive national flag they want so much.

I have confidence in this government, and I am convinced that if it does not manage to provide Canada with such a flag many other governments will come and go before we can have a national flag of our own.

Mr. Alfred Belzile (Matapedia-Matane): It is with great pleasure that I rise, Mr. Speaker, to make a small contribution to the debate on the resolution now before the house and which was put on the order paper by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier).

This resolution does in no way call for the opinion of experts, but rather for the opinion of true Canadians. It is therefore my duty to make known my personal views on this always timely subject, and I may say that these views undoubtedly reflect the ones held by almost all those I have the privilege of representing here.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am in complete agreement with this resolution, for a number of reasons I shall now make known.

This matter of a flag has been repeatedly dealt with in this house. Different views on the subject have been expressed in all parts of the country by many representatives from various political parties. But it is encouraging to note a growing tendency to favour a distinctive national flag displaying no emblem recalling any country other than our own. This is a development which is welcomed by all Canadians who have patriotism and national pride, for it fosters the best of unity.

While retaining great respect and great admiration for our forefathers, for the traditions they have left us and also for the culture, the faith and the language that have come to us through generations, we should not forget that we are first and above all Canadians.

We all recognize Canada as our country. We love and revere Canada. Thanks to the efforts of the preceding generations, and to the constant work of the present generation, Canada has shown a remarkable economic and cultural development in a relatively short period of time. A former colony, we have rapidly developed into a country whose importance is recognized the world over, a country which is proud of the independence it has conquered within the framework of the commonwealth. Our contribution to the fight for peace and freedom in two great world wars has won the admiration of all free nations. We are universally recognized as a mature and proud nation where two great cultures exist in complete harmony and which have both contributed to the greatness and development of Canada.

Being a mature and independent nation, we must act accordingly. Any nation that can play the part which has been ours for more than a quarter of a century among the free nations of this world must, if it really possesses the proud feelings so generally acknowledged, behave and act as a proud and free nation.

Can we really be the people we pretend to be when, unlike other nations of equal importance and even unlike nations that have not yet reached the degree of maturity of our country, we are still without a national flag, an emblem of our own, a symbol of our pride and independence?

Why this anomaly? Why are we so short on Canadianism? The answer is obvious. If every one of us had refrained over the years from making this matter of a flag a political football, and if we had made an effort, harmoniously and dispassionately, to find an answer to this important problem, there is no doubt that by now Canada would have a national and distinctive emblem. Sad to say, however, our political feelings have been stronger than our patriotic feelings. This is a cruel truth, I agree, but I for one will have the honesty to confess it publicly.

On this question which has seemed to us to be one of the thorniest, we must admit, to our shame, that we have too long questioned the patriotism and the intelligence of all our fellow citizens, of whatever origin.

Sometimes, we were afraid to hurt the feelings of a certain section, at other times we had to cater to the extreme nationalism of another section of our population. However, whatever the reasons which dictated our attitude, the main one at all times was the thought of possible effects on the outcome of the elections. In all cases, unfortunately, we seemed to have forgotten that, before the thought of garnering votes, and because we were either of French or of English origin, it was our imperative duty, above everything else, to be Canadians worthy of the name.

Today, however more than ever before, we must realize that the prejudices we had yesterday have disappeared, that our conflicting opinions are not as far apart as they were in the past, and that due to our better understanding of that nature of true Canadianism, we are about to fully agree on the matter.

In 1945, Mr. MacKenzie King, then prime minister of Canada, surely with a view to please an increasingly wide-awake public opinion, promised, during the election campaign which was to bring him back to power, to have a national flag adopted by parliament. Moreover, the same promise was to be found in the speech from the throne of that year delivered at the opening of the first session of the new parliament.

That same year, a joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons was appointed to study and report on the choice of an appropriate and distinctive design for a national flag for Canada. Twelve members of the Senate and 25 members of the House of Commons were on that committee. They represented various political groups.

The setting up of that joint committee of both houses aroused a keen interest among the Canadian community; from all over the country, Canadians of all racial origins sent to that committee designs they thought should be accepted as our distinctive symbol.

By May 9, 1946, 2,409 different designs had been laid before the committee and the great majority of them positively indicated that our proposed national flag should bear no symbol of a country other than ours, in spite of the fact that the two most important racial groups in Canada still had ties, though remote ties, with Great Britain and France. In order to prove the truth of the statement I am making, which, moveover, the debates of that time will bear out, let me say that of the 2,409 designs proposed, 1,611 had the maple leaf as only symbol, 383 had the union jack, 231 had stars while 184 designs suggested the fleur-de-lis.

In 1946, Mr. Speaker, a movement of sound Canadianism could already be felt all across the country. The great majority of Canadians already recognized the importance of showing our maturity and independence in that respect. More than 15 years ago, Mr. Speaker, Canadians of all origins, increasingly proud of their country, wanted to show their pride in being first and foremost Canadians. The heartening development I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks had made itself felt in an unequivocal way.

Unfortunately, after two years of discussions, the committee that had been formed to study and report on the question, had failed to reach unanimity on the choice of a distinctive flag for Canada. As we all know, the whole thing was to be forgotten, to the great dismay of the majority of well-thinking Canadians.

In 1948, Mr. Louis St. Laurent, not only assumed the leadership of the Liberal party, but also assumed the important functions of prime minister. This was sufficient to revive the question of a national flag. On all sides, constant pressures were made urging the new chief of state to re-establish the joint committee and to give our country as soon as possible a distinctive national flag, the symbol of our legitimate pride and of our absolute sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker, it is six o'clock.

(Text):

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Belzile: If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to resume the speech I had begun before recess.

In the face of an aroused and constantly alert public opinion, Mr. Louis St. Laurent, as leader of the government and of the Liberal party, on the opening of the election campaign in Winnipeg, in 1949, undertook to give our country a distinct national emblem which would be the glory of all Canadians. More than 3,000 persons were present at that meeting, including some members who are now sitting in this house. The newspapers of the time did not fail to report the prime minister's words. However, that formal promise, which all Canadians generally and the Liberals in particular had warmly applauded, was, once again, to fall by the wayside along with many unfulfilled Liberal promises. Since then and until 1957, while the people showed their disapproval, our friends opposite and their predecessors deliberately forgot that promise, and left in the limbo of oblivion the joint committee they themselves had set up and then buried.

Flags of Canada

It is obvious that a distinct national flag for Canada is more than ever in demand. Many associations and groups of all kinds are constantly sending resolutions to that effect to members of this house. Then too, many people who at one time were asking that our flag bear emblems of other countries, have now changed their minds.

Early in December of 1958, in Victoria, B.C., the junior chamber of commerce of Canada, then meeting in annual congress, took a vote on the matter of a distinctive national flag. The results of this vote, which deserves attention, was as follows.

Out of 2,400 members of that chamber who replied to the question, and among English-speaking members only, 79 per cent approved the project of a Canadian flag which would bear the emblem of no other country. On that same occasion, as a result of a vote taken among the public, also of English origin, 78 per cent of the 3,800 persons consulted gave the same answer.

More recently still, that is, at the Calgary Stampede last year, the young Liberals of that city also put the matter to a vote among the thousands of people who attended that always popular sporting event. And, Mr. Speaker, 77 per cent of those who voted were categorically in favour of the maple leaf on our flag, repudiating all other emblems belonging to other countries.

Let no one tell me that the majority of English-speaking fellow citizens are against the adoption of a distinctive national flag; the facts I have just referred to sufficiently contradict those who dare make such a statement.

All Canadians are asking themselves this question: How is it that a country such as Canada, which plays such an important role among the free nations of the world, does not yet have a strictly distinctive emblem which would show to the world its pride and sovereignty?

A flag, Mr. Speaker, is not only a sign of independence, it is first and foremost a symbol of pride and unity. It is our duty to show our pride to the face of all peoples of the globe. Since the Conservatives came to power we have achieved a degree of unity greater than it ever was before, and it surely exists among all racial groups forming our vast and beautiful country. It even symbolizes a magnificent example of co-existence and sincere co-operation between various cultures, which are none the less important to the greatness of our nation.

[Mr. Belzile.]

The patriotic and historical action we have taken today will, I am sure, bring us the eternal gratitude of our fellow citizens and more particularly of the future generations. More than ever, and while preserving unfailing ties of friendship with regard to the nation which was once their mother country, Canadians are now loudly and proudly claiming to be Canadian citizens. As to those who, each year, elect our land as their country of adoption and of choice, the very fact of their coming here to live eloquently shows that they want to have Canada as their true and only country, for themselves as well as their descendants.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not further delay the discussion on this important resolution so that all my hon. fellow members who want to do so may take part in it. In concluding my remarks I want to tender the hon. member for St. Boniface the most sincere and fully deserved congratulations for a deeply felt patriotism which does him credit. I sincerely hope that, on both sides of this house, and in spite of our differences, we may, on a question which transcends political disputes, show complete unanimity, for the greater edification of every Canadian.

It would certainly not be too bold a wish to hope that Canada will soon be endowed with a national flag.

This will give our government the opportunity to select an essentially distinctive emblem which would truly answer the justified hopes of most Canadians. That flag which is our aim, will, apart from being the symbol of our national unity, rally all men of good will in a collective effort which will further prove the ascending march of Canada towards its destiny.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise because I have a few words to say on this resolution. Let me say first I think it is a good thing, whether or not we come to a conclusion tonight, that we discuss this question. It shows we are interested in a subject which is of interest to many Canadians. I must say, first of all, that I find myself unable to support the resolution because it asks for a referendum. The question asked is:

> Are you in favour of a flag consisting of (a) a green maple leaf on a red and white field, or, (b) the red ensign?

I do not believe the matter is as simple as that. In my opinion, you cannot decide on a satisfactory, distinctive Canadian flag by submitting to a referendum two designs of this type. However, Mr. Speaker, the resolution introduced by the hon. gentleman does provide an opportunity for the annual presentation of ideas on this question, and the discussion does bring forth some new and on occasion, as previously this session, distinctly novel ideas.

Recently I read in the newspapers about the great Liberal rally. The drums sounded, the horns were blown and the brass was there. They passed a resolution in favour of a distinctive national flag. Where are the brass this evening? Where is that great proponent of Canadian babies, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)? Where is the leader of the official opposition? Where is that very capable and likable member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), that gentleman who speaks so fluently in both languages and who has had an experience in life denied to many of us, having a good knowledge of French-Canadian culture and an intimate association with the other cultures of this country?

I cannot understand why, Mr. Speaker, after passing that resolution, after its publication in the press of Canada, these hon. gentlemen do not seize the opportunity presented to them tonight to advocate and support, whether or not they agree with the motion, the need for a distinctive national flag for Canada. Once again they have failed to take advantage of the opening of the door of opportunity, even when it was opened by a government member.

Having said that, I want to say a few words on this resolution to express my personal opinions and, I trust, make some contribution to the debate. I am delighted to see the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith) listening so carefully to what I have to say. I happened to be a member of the flag committee in 1946 which went very thoroughly into this question and, strangely enough, at that time came to a conclusion. The one member who differed from that conclusion was Mr. Lacroix. At that time we accepted the red ensign with the union jack in its fly, less than one quarter size, and the maple leaf imposed on a white background. We were told by those skilled in heraldry that as long as the union jack was a little less than a quarter size in the fly, it did not indicate domination by another nation. I forget the details, but I think the maple leaf on the white background was symbolic of Canada, and the union jack indicated that Canada was a member of the British commonwealth of nations.

This committee reported, but the report never came before the House of Commons. There were some influences at work behind the scenes. Apparently the prime minister of the day got cold feet later in the proceedings, and nothing happened. We have had quite a number of discussions since that time. I cannot go into all the bills that have been presented, but I think one of the most interesting was known as the Hollingworth bill, presented by a Liberal member in 1955. This hon. gentleman suggested that the secretary of state should be authorized to prepare a design for a distinctive national flag for Canada, and submit the same for approval of the government of Canada. During the discussions the hon. member was supported by a number of his colleagues in the house. At least it was a constructive suggestion, but the government of the day failed to take action on the bill. Personally, and I think my colleagues at that time, expressed the opinion that this was not a satisfactory way of providing a distinctive Canadian flag. There was a good deal of discussion on the bill, but that was the last we heard of it. That was the Hollingworth bill.

Later on a bill came before the house known as the Lincoln bill. I have great respect and admiration for the hon. member for Lincoln. Every time I listen to his interesting and musical burr I can smell the heather; I see the swish of kilts and I can hear the drone of the bagpipes. I give him full marks for the best of intentions and for being an excellent Canadian citizen and member of this house.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I want to say right now that the hon. gentleman achieved a distinction by introducing this bill. Some persons achieve distinction by birth; others achieve distinction as a result of great achievements in the public service, something after the fashion of the hon. member for Essex East. Some people achieve distinction as a result of their accomplishments in science and other fields of activity. However, it was left to the hon. member for Lincoln to achieve distinction in a most unusual and unique way. He achieved distinction by introducing a bill into this house 300 years too late. He should have been a member of the executive council of 1760 instead of the House of Commons in 1960. However, I give him full marks for good purpose and good intentions. I am sure I can speak for the united opposition when I say that I have their permission to bestow upon him the accolade of the royal and ancient and honourable order of Rip Van Winkles.

I want to express a few opinions with respect to this question. I often find a great conflict between my emotions and my intellectual conceptions. I notice the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) listening very carefully. He is as usual hoping I will make a slip and upset our political applecart. Let me say first I am a great believer in the value of a knowledge of history, the value of traditions and the value of the symbols that represent history, traditions and culture. I have a great affection for my French-Canadian colleagues. I love their Gallic vivacity, and their sometimes volatile approach to life, their liveliness. I am very fond, also of their charming ladies.

I may say, too, that I have a great respect for the union jack. I was brought up in a home where the union jack was very much respected. The union jack, to me, is symbolic of the struggle for freedom in Great Britain through the centuries, the development of parliamentary institutions and the laying of the foundation of the democracy we enjoy today. You cannot sweep that history away overnight, or by a motion. You cannot forget it that easily.

If I had my way on this question I should like to see a flag upon which were emblazoned the symbols representing the traditions and history and culture of our French-Canadian colleagues and their compatriots all over Canada. They have a great past and history. The fleur-de-lis represents the chivalry of France. What more inspiring national anthem is there in the world today than the Marseillaise. I ask that of anyone. When it is played it almost makes you wish you were a Frenchman. The Canadian people of French ancestry have made a great contribution to the evolution of democracy and the development of many facets of our national life. As I was saying before, I wish we could design a flag acceptable to all Canadians that would provide for the representation of the symbols that represent the traditions and culture of the French, the history behind the union jack, and in some way include symbols that would represent the other races that go to make up our nation. However, that is my personal opinion. I am a democrat and I am willing to accept the decision of the majority, on this and any other question.

I am sure that the time will come in the future when public opinion will be crystallized sufficiently to make a decision. As I said before, I should like to see a flag which blended the symbols of these races that make up our nation. However, there is a strong sentiment in favour of a distinctive national flag. Let me say this, though.

When you say "a distinctive national flag" I find that opinions as to what composes a distinctive national flag are as varied as are the flags of the world today. I speak to one person in my constituency and he says, "Certainly I am in favour of a distinctive national flag with a union jack on it". I speak to someone else and he says, "Yes, I am in favour of a distinctive national flag but I do not wish to have a union jack on it; I want something distinctive on it". In my opinion we can have a satisfactory compromise; that is to say, when the time is ripe, when public opinion is crystallized, we can have a distinctive Canadian flag and at the same time fly legally in Canada the union jack as the symbol of our membership in the commonwealth of nations.

The matter of obtaining a design is not as simple as it appears to be on the surface. I was on the committee in 1946 and at that time I think that we had 2,600 designs.

Mr. Hodgson: There were 2,695, to be exact.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the hon. gentleman for his assistance. The hon. gentleman is so inactive that the figures remained in his mind throughout the years. I thank him for the assistance. These designs were submitted then. Personally, I am of the opinion that that is not the correct way in which to choose a national flag. A flag is something to be designed by experts, those interested in heraldry who understand procedure, history, custom and practice and the meaning of symbols. I think that part of the matter is for experts. Let them submit for adoption not more than half a dozen designs. I would prefer to see two or three.

A properly designed flag conveys a signal. That is the point. As I mentioned with regard to the flag the committee suggested, we were told that the maple leaf in the centre on a white background to anyone on the sea or elsewhere or to anyone who understood the signals, meant Canada and that the union jack in the right hand corner, a little more than quarter the size of the flag, represented Canada as a member of the commonwealth. Design is extremely important. For instance, when you come to design a flag these matters must be taken into consideration.

I may say that I have done a little bit of reading on this subject; I did it some time ago, about as many years ago as when the figures mentioned by the hon. member were imprinted upon his mind. Vertical lines in flags represent strength. Horizontal lines represent repose. However, lines at an angle of 45 degrees in heraldry represent instability and represent, shall I say, something falling rather than support or strength. These things all must be considered and many people do not understand that designing flags is a science and an art. I therefore believe it is a question of the public having some understanding of the necessity for experts to design a flag, having regard to the meaning of heraldry and the meaning of the signals that a flag is intended to convey.

I am sure that we can design a flag which will be acceptable to the great majority of the Canadian people and whose signals will represent first of all that we are Canadians. Then as I said before, I suggest we should fly in Canada on an equal basis the union jack as being representative of our membership in the commonwealth of nations.

It is my opinion these debates on the flag give an opportunity for expressions of opinion. They also create some discussion in the country. I think more education must be done on the part of all of us in the parts of Canada represented by our French-Canadian colleagues and in other parts of Canada with regard to what is implied in the design of a Canadian flag and the signals we want to be represented or conveyed by that flag. Then we shall have a crystallized informed public opinion. Then, in my opinion, the time will be ripe, as a result of a referendum or a plebiscite, for the Canadian people to determine their wishes in this matter according to our thoroughly democratic practices and procedures.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) for bringing this matter before us at this time. He is to be commended for his diligence in this matter. I think it can be said that there is no matter that is of more interest and importance to Canadians than the matter of a distinctive Canadian flag. In a few more years we shall be celebrating our centennial here in Canada and at that time it would be well if all Canadians could share that measure of unity that may be enhanced by a distinctive Canadian flag.

The union jack, which to many is reminiscent of colonial days, has served us well during the past 94 years. To many it is the flag of Canada. I can understand the significance that it must assuredly have for all of those who have followed it in line of battle, whether on sea or land or in the air. To many of them there can never be any other flag that will so surely represent those things which they were prepared to defend, and which in their minds represented the Canadian nation. Then too, there are those who, through direct descent, look on the union jack as the flag of conquest in so far as Canada is concerned. It is among these persons that there exists a measure of difference of opinion with regard to the solution of the problem as to what shall be a truly Canadian flag. That division seems to have been drawn between many of our English-speaking Canadians and many of our French-speaking Canadians.

As one who represents the third dimension in Canadian life, namely that of those Canadians of other origins, I wish to offer my contribution to this debate. In doing so I am conscious of the measure of the differences of opinion that divide a number of Canadians of English ancestry and a number of Canadians of French ancestry as well on this issue. The argument I wish to advance is in support of the premise that we are not yet ready as a nation to face a referendum on this issue in so far as a choice of a particular design for a flag is concerned. Indeed, a referendum might serve to emphasize division rather than unity in this nation at this particular time. I will also try to establish the premise that the section of the Canadian population that I feel is neutral in this matter may indeed be the one that will have to be a deciding factor when we finally come to adopt a flag other than that which we now acknowledge as our own.

There are good arguments that can be advanced to support this premise. Most of those in this third section of our population are relatively free from any of the pressures that may be regarded as prejudice by either of Canada's founding families. Most of us want the flag of Canada to represent the true complexion of this nation. The argument is often used that it must therefore not include any symbol that might emphasize the dual personality of the foundations upon which this nation had its beginning.

I am inclined to believe that the flag of Canada should emphasize that dual personality and preserve it for future generations. This is a matter that is taking on more importance with the passage of the years. As the intermingling of the two great races, and those others included in our third dimension, are gradually and surely changing by a process of erosion and diffusion, the differences that in the beginning seemed so important are today still important because they are giving this nation a distinctive character and personality before the world.

Our parliamentary system, our judicial system and our membership in the British commonwealth of nations all stem in part from our connection with the British people and the union jack. It would seem to me that Canadians, particularly in that third dimensional group, certainly appreciate and value the opportunities and the justice that these instruments of government, law and mutual security have provided.

Many of them fled the old lands of Europe and other continents to escape conditions and circumstances that these institutions have prevented from taking place here in Canada. To many of them the union jack will forever be a reminder of their homeland or birthplace, simply because it represented a haven here in Canada against the old established inequities which had held for them little or limited hope for the future in the land of their birth. To them a Canadian flag without some resemblance to the union jack just does not seem possible.

Before we leave this aspect it might be well to mention those who through the history of their homelands were at one time or another, because of their national background, in conflict with Great Britain. Their decision to come to Canada was not overcome by the fact that we had a Canadian flag in the form of the union jack. In most cases it was because of this flag and what it represented that they became interested in emigrating to Canada.

I have known some of these people who could never really cherish any great warmth of affection for Great Britain as such, but who nevertheless looked upon the fruits of her handiwork here in Canada as most desirable. That feeling has continued to grow during the two wars, and with the advent of atomic power, together with our geographical position, almost as the axis upon which contending forces in world power are revolving, a new appreciation has been growing in this country in so far as the contribution of the mother country—and I refer to Great Britain—in placing us on our own feet as a distinctive nation. The British connection which to many people, if not altogether repugnant was not too desirable, has now taken on a new complexion, particularly in so far as the gallant stand that the people of Britain made for all mankind during the last war.

These people coming to Canada from all around the globe to find security from the insecurities of their homelands have seen, sometimes almost unwillingly, the union jack emerge as the symbol of their fondest hopes and dreams built here in Canada. Those who in the years gone by have looked upon the wars in Europe as something detached from Canada, and who considered our intervention on the side of Great Britain, and sometimes France, as something compelled by colonial ties with either of these nations, are today faced with the other alternative because the shift in the power balance of the world has placed their chosen land in the position where it could conceivably become the battleground should world conflict again overcome the better judgment of men and nations.

The contribution of French culture to Canada's personality is a living reality. We see it everywhere we go in Canada, and particularly so in the province of Quebec. The constitution of our nation embraces and compels a recognition of a continuing application of those influences that should not be forgotten in building the fabric of a distinctively Canadian flag.

Those who say that there must not or should not be any indication of that unique influence in the pattern of a distinctive Canadian flag do not have any more proper appreciation of Canadian history than those who would deny the identities that are called to our national mind by the union jack.

As the hon. member for St. Boniface stated today, we should have a flag that would represent the image of our nation. This debate should serve a useful purpose at this time; it will inspire all of us to give this matter increased attention. There is still time in which a decision can finally be reached without a referendum.

Whatever the design finally approved by parliament and the Canadian people, it should be a reminder to us of our beginnings as a nation. It should reflect the part that Great Britain played in the development of our institutions. It should also reflect the personality of Canada as it has developed under the enriching influence of French culture. But more than that, it must also reflect the personality of a nation having that third dimension, that of those who chose Canadian citizenship after the destiny of Canada was decided in the articles of confederation.

Because of our history this nation has a distinctive personality. It would be a poor Canadian who would be ashamed of any of that heritage. It is one of our greatest strengths upon which we can build in the future. It is also one of the best examples that any nation can show to her friends and neighbours in the world community.

We cannot rewrite the history of our country. Our task is to take that history and bring it into the fabric of our national life in such a way that unity may be multiplied until all our people can truthfully feel distinctively Canadian. That day is nearer now than ever before in our history.

I want to congratulate once more the hon. member for St. Boniface for giving all Canadians a reminder that there are still some objectives which remain to be achieved before the true distinction of Canadian citizenship becomes clearly established here in Canada.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montclam): Mr. Speaker, even if we do not share the views of some of our fellow members, be they Liberal, C.C.F. or Conservative, it is nevertheless permissible, under our democratic principles, to speak according to our conscience on a subject of essential significance, like the adoption of a distinctive national flag.

This afternoon, I heard the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), deal as he has done but rarely since sitting in this house, with the matter of a distinctive national flag.

At this time, I refer to an order in council enacted on Wednesday, September 5, 1945, of which I will read a few excerpts:

The Canadian red ensign should be flown on federal government buildings and all doubt with regard to the relevancy of flying this ensign whenever a distinctive Canadian flag is to be flown, should be dispelled.

It is desirable to authorize the flying of the Canadian red ensign on federal government buildings within as well as without Canada, and to remove any doubt as to the propriety of flying the Canadian red ensign wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag;

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, is pleased to order and doth hereby order that the red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly may be flown from buildings owned or occupied by the federal government within and without Canada.

That departmental order was enacted in 1945, under the Mackenzie King government. And who was a member of the cabinet council at the time? None other than the hon. member for Laurier who then co-operated in the enactment of that order in council. How is it that the hon. member, the former member for Stormont, was in favour of a flag bearing the red ensign in the fly, while today, as the member for Laurier, he wants a distinctive national flag? I cannot understand his attitude. He is not sincere, he is not consistent. He changes his views as he moves from one province to another and he will probably be a candidate in some other province at the next election, and he probably will then have some other conception of a distinctive national flag.

Mr. Speaker, may I read here part of a statement Mr. Pearson made during the election, when campaigning in the province of Quebec. This item from Le Devoir of March 7, 1958 reads as follows:

Mr. Pearson's statement on the necessity of a national flag has been welcomed in the capital city. However, it has been noted that during his meeting with the students, at the Reform Club of Montreal, the Liberal leader saw fit to add, on the matter of the flag, that it may be necessary then to discuss whether such a flag should or should not contain the union jack. A Conservative with nationalist tendencies observed that in the province of Quebec Mr. Pearson gave some guarantee to a certain well known English-speaking group. That is, he maintains—or at least, does not clearly repudiate—the avowed opinion of Jack Pickersgill and James Sinclair on that matter. This is not what had been expected by the people of Quebec who are irrevocably in favour of the adoption of a distinctive national flag, without any sign of subservience to any country. A Liberal told us this: "If Mr. Pearson said he is in favour of having the union jack in our national flag, he would have done better to hold his tongue. His statement will do more harm than good to the Quebec Liberals."

Ladies and gentlemen—

Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I am so conscious at this time of addressing the people of Canada, since all the hon. members in this house represent the people of this country, that I have perhaps disregarded the rules of the house.

But I cannot understand the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition, who is very much of a diplomat. He reminds me somewhat of that non-committal type of diplomat who says no and yes at the same time. He is always sitting on the fence whenever he goes in the province of Quebec. During the last election campaign, he was in favour of a distinctive flag and, if he is asked to be specific, he favours a flag bearing a union jack. The Leader of the Opposition reminds me a little of the hon. member for Laurier whose views about the adoption of a Canadian flag change from year to year.

As for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)—a member of this house referred to him this afternoon—I put a question to him, Mr. Speaker, following which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made a correction, as reported in Hansard. This is what he said:

I stated many times and I state again that the Canadian flag is the one stipulated by order in council of December 5, 1945.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate's feelings about the Canadian flag are the same as those of the hon. member for Laurier at the time his government passed the order in council in 1945.

I understand the attitude of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate since his leader is not the Leader of the Opposition, but rather the premier of Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker, a flag is not only the symbol of an adult nation, it is also the result of that nationality itself, its official confirmation by means of an order in council emanating from responsible authorities. Is there anything more depressing for Canadian delegates at international gatherings than to note the absence of their own flag?

Those of us who have visited foreign countries, who have stayed in our embassies, legations or consulates abroad have felt ashamed because of the absence of a Canadian flag.

Why should we proclaim to the whole world the importance and strength of Canada when we do not even have a flag waving on our public buildings or on the hood of our ambassadors' cars?

A flag means much for a free citizen. In its folds, he rediscovers his whole history. Looking at it, he can feel the spirit of the nation, whose heart beats in unison with his own. For its flag, a nation lives, fights and dies. And we have not even got a distinctive national flag. For years, the Canadian government has refused to shoulder its responsibilities, because it did not seem to think it had the necessary authority to choose a flag representative of our nation here and abroad.

Many of us are aware that national unity is now materializing under the wise stewardship of the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker). It would be superfluous to give a recital of the numerous statements made here by the Prime Minister in an effort to cement national unity. I can assure hon. members that the government is giving consideration to all suggestions bearing on this subject. I am sure that a possibility exists and that in the near future we will have a distinctive national flag in keeping with the aspirations of the nation which will give a feeling of pride to every Canadian.

A great man has said that the last shot for the defence of the British Empire would be fired by a French Canadian. Those of us who have witnessed the warm and imposing reception granted Her Majesty the Queen and all the members of the royal family know that French Canadians do not harbour any hostility against royalty. The question need not even be asked about the English Canadians. The two groups realize the importance of the British monarchy within the commonwealth. Thousands of designs have been proposed. A joint committee of the Senate and the house has seriously studied the problem, but it left us without a symbol. Among all the designs already submitted, I remember one which thrilled me and made me very proud. It was proposed by the college of Joliette, in my riding. It was a very beautiful flag which honoured both our English and French ancestors by describing in a single design the development of both our groups.

Mr. Boulanger: Who wrote that speech?

Mr. Pigeon: By the way, in reply to what the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) just said, we have no Mr. Lamontagne to write our speeches for us.

Mr. Speaker, are there still people saying that we do not yet deserve a national distinctive flag or an official national anthem? I see members on the other side laughing while such a serious problem as the choice of a distinctive national flag is being discussed. I know why, Mr. Speaker. They have always shirked their responsibilities in the matter. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) is one of those who in 1945 showed their true face to the nation. Like the Leader of the Opposition he runs with the hare and hunts with the hounds; he is always running back and forth, afraid to take a stand, afraid to say what he thinks, since he cannot erase his past record as minister of the crown.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it is high time the government of Canada examined the possibility of giving the country a distinctive national flag. I congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface who introduced the resolution. It should bring him congratulations from all his colleagues. I am very much disappointed, Mr. Speaker, to see members like the hon. members for Cochrane (Mr. Habel), for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) and Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) sitting there talking and laughing while such an important matter as the adoption of a distinctive national flag is being discussed. Seeing them, I cannot help thinking about the hon. member for Laurier who is Canada's number one joker.

(Text):

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of taking part in this discussion of the proposed resolution introduced by my friend the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) and wish to take this opportunity, too, of congratulating the hon. member upon sponsoring this debate.

Certainly there should be extended discussion on the topic of the national flag before any action can be taken. Even the mention of a referendum concerning the adoption of a Canadian flag will initiate some serious thinking on the matter and in this way prepare all individuals for making the best selection possible.

However, taking action in a situation of this nature which crosses the complex lines of heritage and culture requires serious study. We cannot deny that a national flag would be an indication of greater unity but judging from the opinions expressed from time to time on this question the adoption of a flag of a particular design at this particular time may well create a little dissension.

While a flag itself is only a symbol it should be truly emblematic of the spirit and character of its people and before a referendum is even considered we as a people must recognize the need to designate in our flag a design which is typical of a free and independent nation.

The suggestions contained in this resolution regarding the type of flag are quite restricted and certainly offer only a limited choice. Surely in asking for a referendum it would be unwise to offer only one other pattern besides that of the red ensign and expect a popular reaction to such a move. Those who have prepared and submitted other designs are equally entitled to consideration should steps be taken to promote the acceptance of a flag other than that in use at the present time.

I am prompted to say something further about the adoption of a Canadian flag because only as recently as Friday of last week I received several suggestions in this subject from a group of high school students from the town of Neudorf, Saskatchewan. The designs in question were both original and artistic and were forwarded with the approval of the local chamber of commerce. This action certainly shows an awakening in the minds of some of our younger students to the need for some action as suggested by the hon. member for St. Boniface, but even as we are discussing the possibility of a distinctive flag the fact remains that in the face of change, custom and tradition die hard and there are those—and I must include myself in this group—who are imminently satisfied with existing arrangements.

It will be recalled that during the war a referendum was called on the conscription issue and in spite of the wishes of the majority no action on the part of the federal government was forthcoming. More recently in Saskatchewan a plebiscite was held on the time zone question which proved little except that such a vote was an expensive proceeding in view of the result achieved.

In conclusion I should like to make this point. I believe that we, the representatives of the people, should be guided by the wishes of those whom we represent and if any government action in this respect is taken in the future it should be done on the basis of a referendum.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the question now before us is one, as I said before, of great importance to me. I would say by the way that if we laughed a bit during the speech of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), it is because he seems to be carried away so easily that he makes us laugh even if he is speaking about rather serious questions.

There is nothing new in the question now before us. I talked about it in May 1939 in the Ontario legislature during the visit of their Majesties in Canada.

I remember very well that my first words went something like this: The previous speakers talked about their Majesties, the King and Queen of England; they also talked about the British empire. I added: I am sorry that no one saw fit to mention the fact that we were talking about receiving our king in Canada. In fact, His Majesty George VI had been crowned King of England and also King of Canada and of the other dominions of the empire and of the commonwealth.

Thus the king of England was at that time, as Her Majesty the Queen is now, Sovereign of Canada as well as of England.

I sincerely believe that the great majority of Canadians are happy to safeguard this symbol of monarchy. Our people are quite happy to live under a monarchy.

However, this does not prevent the question of a flag from making the headlines from time to time and to give rise to a discussion which in time will inevitably show the way towards the solution of that problem.

Mr. Speaker I have here a letter from a grand-niece of mine, daughter of my nephew whose father is French Canadian and whose mother is English. They live in Toronto. On December 14, I received from that grand-niece of mine a letter which I shall not quote in its entirety because the little girl tells me at the same time about the whole family. But here is the main point of her letter:

(Text):

The question I wanted to ask was, why haven't we got a Canadian flag?

(Translation):

A little ten year old girl attending an English school in Toronto puts the following question to her uncle: How is it that we do not yet have a Canadian flag?

In other words, an effort must be made, not only by youngsters but by older people to have a better understanding of this question.

Last year, I said that that question had to be discussed with calm and consistency, somewhat like the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Belzile) did this afternoon. Evidently, he managed occasionally to blame the previous prime minister. But, in politics, one must expect to be criticized occasionally.

We must admit that this is a question that must be discussed with moderation in order that the feelings of one and all may be properly understood.

Some people still believe that there should be room in the Canadian flag for the British coat of arms; others believe that we should add the fleur-de-lis.

It is only through a thorough study of the arguments put forward that we shall no doubt find the design of a really distinctive flag, which will be the very proof of our mutual understanding.

Not so long ago, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith) introduced a bill in this house. Although it was never disposed of, and since I do not want to be out of order, Mr. Speaker, I would ask your permission to refer to it. The measure was rejected due, perhaps, to certain pressures although a resolution was passed by the city council of St. Catharines.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, a copy of the resolution adopted by the municipal council of that city. I do not find anything in that resolution that bears any resemblance to the wording of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln.

That resolution calls for a distinctive flag for Canada.

With unanimous consent of the house, I should like to put that resolution on record.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who has the floor suggests that a copy of a resolution passed by the city council of St. Catharines be made an appendix to today's Hansard. Has the hon. member leave of the house to do so?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hodgson: This will interfere with the bill of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, that resolution is already recorded in Hansard. I read it myself.

Mr. Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent to the hon. member's proposal.

Mr. Habel: Then, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to two municipal councils in my riding which have supported the same resolution I will have to read the resolution. The council of the town of Cochrane has accepted this resolution without reservation and has written me a letter asking me to support the demand for a distinctive flag. The council of the town of Hearst has also endorsed the same resolution. Because of the fact that members on the government side refuse to allow the resolution to be embodied in Hansard I will read part of it. It is in these words:

> That whereas this council is aware that on the fifth day of September, 1945, the federal government by its order in council number P.C. 5888 declared it appropriate to fly the Canadian red ensign within and without Canada, wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag...
> Now therefore be it resolved that the federal government and the Right Hon. the Prime Minister of Canada be and they are hereby required to amend order in council P.C. 5888 or to pass a new order in council to provide forthwith for the establishment of a distinctive Canadian flag.

These two municipal councils in my riding support the resolution passed by the city council of St. Catharines and this goes to show that the resolution is absolutely in accordance with the amendment we have moved today.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the matter of a flag arouses great interest among Canadians, more particularly among our young people. It seems that time ripens too slowly for some older people, or that we take too long to come to a final decision. Just the same we have to admit that the idea has made some headway, and that the moment will soon come when we shall have to take a decision.

To the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm who, a moment ago, indulged in cynical remarks regarding certain statements or newspapers' reports about the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), and who said that the hon. member for Laurier seemed to change his mind as he changed provinces, I would remind him that it is strange that a native of the province of Quebec, as I am myself, should say such things, because I was elected to the Ontario legislature not only by French Canadians but also by English-speaking citizens and people of other origins. And this happened only six years after my arrival in that province, which is now my province of adoption. In my opinion, this means that the province of Ontario—which some people like to call the imperialistic province—accept natives of Quebec province to the point of making them their provincial members. I am therefore amazed that Conservative members from Quebec should be shocked at seeing a native of Ontario being elected in Quebec. I quite fail to understand that. It is something that only proves the narrow-mindedness of certain members.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I must say that I usually have regard for the statements made by the hon. member for Cochrane but today he puts into my mouth words I have never uttered.

Mr. Habel: Did the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm not say, a moment ago, that the hon. member for Laurier changed his attitude regarding the adoption of a distinctive national flag just in the same manner as he moves from one province to another?

Mr. Pigeon: That is true, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Habel: Did he not also say that he would not be surprised to see him run in another province at the next election?

Mr. Pigeon: I would not be surprised if he did.

Mr. Habel: Instead, he should realize that some of his friends are trying to give him good advice, that he should follow more carefully. If he is sick, he should be in the hospital, not in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, "once a drunkard, always a drunkard". Those are precisely the words that the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) has learned. This hon. member, a university teacher, seems unable to do anything but to repeat himself over and over again like a trained parrot.

An hon. Member: You resent the fact that he is a better speaker than you.

Mr. Habel: Then, Mr. Speaker, while the other countries—

(Text):

Mr. Hodgson: You are endeavouring to adopt the idea of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, divide and rule.

Mr. Habel: If I were you, I would talk about a flag rather than interrupt an hon. member who is speaking. Now, Mr. Speaker, the other countries of the commonwealth have their own flags.

Mr. Hodgson: We have a flag which was put up in 1946 by the Liberal party.

Mr. Habel: The countries of the commonwealth such as South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, all have their own flags. I do not see why at this stage, after this question has been discussed so often in this house, and after all the reports and surveys that have been made by newspapers which clearly demonstrate the Canadian people as a whole want a Canadian flag, the government does not decide to do something about it.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Kitchener-Waterloo Record. It is not new because it is dated February 27, 1954. It reads as follows:

> Reports from Australia indicate that Queen Elizabeth and the Duke of Edinburgh are receiving a tumultuous welcome wherever they go. The Australians are giving a wonderful demonstration of loyalty at this first visit of a reigning sovereign to their country.
> The fact that Australians have a distinctive national flag of their own isn't cooling their loyalty to the crown in the least. Opponents of a distinctive flag for Canada, please note.

I do think, Mr. Speaker, it is time for us to try to find a solution to the problem. As Hon. Mr. Drew said in the house in 1953 —I have to quote in French because this clipping is from a French newspaper:

(Translation):

During the course of a debate on a similar motion, the Hon. Mr. Drew expressed the following views, as reported in the L'Action Catholique of December 10, 1953:

> Therefore, Mr. Drew does not feel that any more information on this matter could be obtained through the establishment of another parliamentary committee. The government must assume full responsibility in this regard...
> The Leader of the Opposition clearly states that he is in favour of a distinctive flag. However, he does not specify whether or not the union jack should be embodied in its design.

Mr. Speaker, in closing my remarks, I will say that the young generation of today will be our population of tomorrow, that the country will draw administrators from their ranks and that our young people may again—and I express the wish that they will not—be called to the defence of their country. Therefore, it is time for the government to make a thorough examination of this matter free from political considerations, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Belzile) this afternoon, and to try to find a solution to this problem once and for all.

(Text):

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): My remarks at this time will be rather brief, Mr. Speaker, because I am mindful of what you said at the time this motion was introduced. You said you did not want this to develop into a debate on another bill which had been presented some time ago. I shall not therefore, say too much at this time. I am mindful of the fact that the bill which I presented had a rather rough experience. I might say, though, that it did result in a great deal of discussion, both in this house and across Canada. It also proved that one who is a backbencher and does not take too much part in the debates has to say something quite smart or do something very controversial if he wishes to catch the headlines.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I caught the headlines and I received letters and newspaper clippings from all parts of Canada. Some of them were not too complimentary. Nevertheless, there was not one that was against the principle of a Canadian national flag.

I am sorry the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) is not in his seat at the moment. I had a letter from the lord lyon in Edinburgh. He was not suggesting he would design a flag for us, but he suggested that if we did not have a college of heraldry in Canada we should get one because he does work at the moment for governments and private individuals in Canada by way of designing coats of arms, flags, badges and a number of other things. However, be that as it may, I was pleased that the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) was allowed to present his resolution. I was afraid that perhaps my bill had deprived him of the opportunity of doing so, and that was far from my thoughts. I should like to say that I appreciate the hon. member's sincerity in bringing a measure of this kind to the floor of the house. While there are some things in his motion of which I do not approve, I do not feel it is necessary at this time to put the question to the people in the form of a referendum which suggests the design of the flag.

I feel there has been enough discussion and enough talk on the subject throughout the country. It is a matter for the government to decide. I feel a decision should be taken much in the same way as the bill of rights was decided upon when it went through this house last year. If the government is ready to present a motion in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag, the matter could be studied by a committee of this house and reported upon. I am sure if that were done a satisfactory solution would be brought forward. I have always been very much in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. I have taken every opportunity to express my views that the time is long past when Canada should have a distinctive flag.

I am not going to repeat the things I said when I presented my bill. However, since that time several things have been brought to my attention by means of letters which I received. It has been brought to my attention, for instance, that at Niagara Falls, which is a border city, there is no Canadian flag of any kind flying over the customs building. There is not even a picture of Her Majesty the Queen in that building. I am not referring to the Peace bridge, which is at Fort Erie, and which is in a little different situation. I am quoting now from a letter I received from an Anglican minister who visited the three bridges, the Rainbow bridge, the lower bridge and the Queenston bridge. He said that at the customs houses at those three bridges he found no sign of any Canadian flag or any pictures of the Queen. You can cross the river to the United States side and find the beautiful stars and stripes flying over the customs building. This flag is lowered each evening, with dignity and according to tradition. Inside the United States customs building, they also have the United States flag. I saw it there myself when I was in the building.

There is no doubt about it that in this country we are losing our appreciation for our flag and even for our national independence. In my opinion there is nothing that portrays the independence or the loyalty of a country as well as a national flag. It is extremely unfortunate at this time that we do not have a national flag. I urge the government to take whatever steps are necessary, by way of bringing in a government bill and setting up a special committee to consider it, in order to give us a national flag for Canada. If this is done, I am sure that everybody will be satisfied.

I think that is all I have to say at this time. Again I express my appreciation to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) for bringing this matter to the attention of the house, although I do not entirely approve his motion.

(Translation):

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, after a long enough debate on this matter, I would not like to take too much of the time of the house. Therefore, I will express my views as briefly as possible and at the same time make some comment which I feel will be of general interest to hon. members.

First of all, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier) for offering this resolution to our discussion and for affording public enlightenment on this matter which has been debated for so many years.

It proposes, of course, a referendum. I am entirely favourable to the principle of that proposal, but I wonder whether it would not be advisable to be more precise and to deal with the heart of the matter with the following question: "Are you in favour of a flag with a green maple leaf on a red and white background?" This being said, Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty of briefly relating with comments the history of this matter of a national flag. This is not the first time such a matter comes up in Canadian politics. In the past, governments, organizations, members of parliament and many Canadians raised that significant issue, without obtaining definite results. I hope that, thanks to this discussion, we shall make some progress in this field.

In 1925, the Canadian government entrusted to a committee composed of government officials the study of designs for a national flag. That short-lived committee had to be dissolved because of its non-representative nature.

Later on, some hon. members engaged in discussions in the House of Commons but did not succeed in obtaining a vote of approval. We may recall, among other things, the motions that were submitted in 1931, 1933 and 1938. Other resolutions were introduced in 1934 and 1935.

More recently, that is in 1945, after the second world war, upon the return from overseas of our men who had been many times humiliated by other allied soldiers because Canada, though claiming to be independent, did not yet have a flag, the matter was taken up again. Public opinion had evolved by then, that is after the last world war and the matter gradually progressed.

For instance, in 1945, the government set up a joint committee of both houses, composed of 12 senators and 25 members of this house. That committee sat until July 11, 1946, but no report was ever tabled. Several hon. members who preceded me mentioned that fact during this debate.

I should now like to quote a few excerpts in order to prove that unanimity has gradually been reached in the matter of a distinctive Canadian flag. However, before doing so, I want to mention an editorial published on the subject in Le Soleil quite a while ago, on November 19, 1958. In view of the length of this text I propose to read, I suggest that it be printed in Hansard as read.

Mr. Dupuis: Oh. No.

Mr. Martel: Well, if I am not allowed to do so, I shall not read it in full, but just the more interesting parts. The editorial dated November 19, 1958 is entitled:

New reasons for choosing a Canadian flag.

And, it must be said, we often are the laughingstock of our neighbour, the United States—as I shall show in a few moments, quoting from Time magazine—and of other nations throughout the world. That situation is reflected in the editorial, which says:

The press agencies who report news items from abroad often give their articles a savour which they don't suspect. Sometimes however, they do get somewhat suspicious.

Such is the case concerning a report of the United Press International from Karachi following the arrival of Prime Minister Diefenbaker in the capital city of Pakistan. We know that this is one of the main stopovers in Mr. Diefenbaker's visits to the capital cities of the commonwealth countries. It is reported that upon his arrival at the Karachi airport the Prime Minister was standing between the "Canadian" and Pakistanese flags. It is not without reason that the news agency puts the word Canadian in quotation marks.

As Canada assumes increasing international responsibilities, which is normal for a country in full development like ours, the absence of a really Canadian flag is tragically felt. One might say that a flag is only a symbol. It must be recognized that it is a particularly important symbol since all great countries are jealously safeguarding their respective flags. Is it not a fact that even the smallest nation upon reaching independence hastens to adopt its own national flag?

And the editorial goes on as follows:

Should we conclude that we are not yet completely independent? Such an objection would certainly not come to the minds of Canadians. But what about foreigners? Besides, the facts are there to show that we do not miss an opportunity on that score.

We are living in an era where international exchanges are numerous; no doubt the Prime Minister had a strong feeling about it when he was in Karachi. While Canada considers increasing its material assistance to Pakistan, that country could perhaps adopt for our benefit some kind of a Colombo plan to bolster our national pride and bring all its contribution to an underdeveloped country in that respect.

And the editorial goes on:

Nations of Asia . . . might unite their efforts to advise us concerning the question of a flag. In order to spare our national feelings, so that such an aid does not bear any sign of heraldic domination, the best procedure would be no doubt to pass their suggestions through an international organization such as the United Nations, for instance. This organization in turn could dispel the fears of Canadians and explain to them that the suppression of a foreign emblem on their own flag does not necessarily constitute a provocative action which might cause an armed conflict, since there are after all a few nations which are not afflicted now with such a flag.

Lastly, since we are talking about international organizations, it might be useful if UNESCO were to organize in our country a comprehensive program of public education (through moving pictures as it is done in India, since a nation without a flag is certainly illiterate) to teach Canadians, slowly and painlessly, all that a national flag represents for a nation. With all the international organizations on our side, with the support of countries like Ghana and Pakistan, we would certainly obtain concrete results—which our Liberal and Conservative governments did not manage to obtain. If we make haste, the news agencies will be able to write Canadian flag without quotation marks during the next trip abroad of the Canadian prime minister.

That shows clearly, Mr. Speaker, that concerning that question of a national flag, which we have not even adopted, not only among our neighbours in the United States, as I mentioned at the beginning, but also throughout the world, in all the other countries, when we proclaim our independence, we are the laughingstock of all those countries because they, at least, have adopted a national flag. And that is to what that article I have just read refers.

I have here another article from the same magazine, Time, for January 12, 1959. Since my hon. friends are opposed to my putting it on the record unless I read it, I shall not read it in full; I shall spare them that long ordeal but shall read only a few extracts in English, in order not to abuse the time of the house. That article is entitled:

(Text):

Much of old-line English-speaking Canada is well content to chant God Save the Queen and to hail the union jack. But French-speaking Canada resents these as symbols of subservience to Britain, prefers to sing O Canada and to salute the Canadian red ensign, though it, too, bears the union jack in the corner. Now another element has entered the flag fight.

(Translation):

I have read this to show that, at times, we are being laughed at, not only in remote countries, but south of the border, in those communities where people are not fully informed on the matter.

And further on, reference is made to a matter brought up by the native sons of Canada. I shall not quote the text in full, but only a few extracts. However, I would not like to be accused of selecting only opinions bearing on a particular context. The article goes on as follows:

(Text):

The flag is serious business for the native sons, mostly blue-collar workers and low-income clerks, who bar foreign-born citizens from regular membership and who, until a few years ago, admitted only Canadians of "white or Canadian Indian descent". They are yammering for parliamentary action. When one son recently urged that Liberal Leader Lester Pearson take a stand on the flag, Pearson replied that "the matter will be raised in the House of Commons when parliament reconvenes".

(Translation):

Well, Mr. Speaker, I see that the Leader of the Opposition is not at his place at the moment.

Mr. Dupuis: Neither is the Prime Minister.

Mr. Martel: Surely he would have derived benefit from that discussion, because he stated to the native sons of Canada that the matter would be discussed in the house when parliament would reconvene.

[Mr. Martel.]

There are other matters related to that problem which, necessarily, are bound, some day, to unite rather than divide us. That matter of a distinct flag is very important, and I am in favour of the adoption of a Canadian flag, precisely in order to ensure the greatness of Canada, to achieve recognition for Canada all over the world as a fully independent nation, and in order to definitely establish that Canada is a fully independent country, which is guaranteed by the constitution. Therefore, I sincerely wish that the matter be definitely settled, so that the flag may become a rallying sign and not a symbol of division.

I have here another editorial taken from the review Jeune Commerce, and which is signed by Jules G. Tessier. I shall only read its conclusion, unless my hon. friends allow me to put it on the record. Since they do not seem inclined to allow me to do so, I shall therefore read only its conclusion.

Our so-called differences of opinions and our distinct cultures do not prevent us from being Canadians above all. Besides, when we take time to know ourselves well, we readily realize that there is more affinity between French and English Canadians than there may exist between us and France or England.

If only we could remember and forget at the same time.

To remember the heroic actions of our ancestors and forget who were the enemies. When we can face history with pride but without fanaticism, when we can understand that the respect due to France and England does not make us share their identity, we will then have our distinctive national flag and anthem which will only be the external signs of adult Canadianism.

Those are the conclusions of that article.

And before concluding my remarks, may I refer to the few facts mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel). He said that he has received a letter from his niece. For my part, I have received a letter from a young student girl of my constituency. In fact, she sent me in June 1959 a flag design and at the same time expressed her views. It was a young student from Amos—I may give her name, since she is not my niece, she is Miss Anne Bigue—and she told me that this question should be definitely settled before the centennial of confederation, in 1967.

To our youth, the Canadian flag is a matter of burning interest.

Before concluding, I should like to call your attention to a report published in Maclean's magazine of February 1958, which is a true picture of the views of all young Canadians across the country.

(Text):

This is from "Backstage with Youth" in Maclean's magazine:

Has it rejected old ties for Canada-first?

Young Canadians have tended to rebel against historic ties with Britain and France in favour of greater nationalism throughout this century. The current generation is heading more swiftly than any other down the path of Canada-first, it is suggested by a recent opinion survey among 1,200 high school students.

(Translation):

I will omit the part that deals with the national anthem since it has nothing to do with this debate. I come directly to the conclusion about a distinctive flag.

(Text):

On the flag question the sexes were split more widely.

(Translation):

The question had been put to the boys and the girls in this way:

(Text):

That is between boys and girls:

Here's where the 83.7 per cent who favoured a distinct Canadian flag stand on the question—

(Translation):

Please note, Mr. Speaker that 83.7 per cent are in favour of a distinctive national flag.

(Text):

"Should it include the fleur-de-lis or the union jack, or parts of both, or be completely different?"

(Translation):

So, to that question, an average of 35.7 per cent of the boys and girls answered that the flag should be different, namely 40.7 per cent of the boys and 30.7 per cent of the girls. It should be noted that a great number did not give any answer. However, the majority declared themselves in favour of a distinctive national flag.

In addition, the table shows that 2.4 per cent of the boys, as well as 1.4 per cent of the girls, or an average of 1.9 per cent, were in favour of the fleur-de-lis. In favour of the union jack, were 11.7 per cent of the boys, against 13.9 per cent of the girls, or an average of 12.8 per cent. Also, 26.4 per cent of the boys and 29.9 of the girls, or an average of 28.2 per cent, would prefer to have both in part. But the general average, that is the majority, is in favour of a distinctive flag and do not want to see any sign of allegiance on the flag.

The article goes on:

(Text):

The kid's apparent lack of interest in the fleur-de-lis is probably explained by under-representation of French Canada in the sample. But the survey is well balanced otherwise. The 1,200 youngsters whose opinions make up the percentages were chosen at random from a list of 200,000 of the country's 380,000 high school students. Their answers are weighted according to the populations of the cities they live in.

(Translation):

I would like to correct an opinion which may still exist among Canadians of other provinces, because it was mentioned in the house by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) when he said that the French Canadians or the Canadians from the province of Quebec were in favour of a flag including the fleur-de-lis. I, for one, have never suggested including the fleur-de-lis. We want a flag without any symbol of an outside allegiance, and it is on that note that I wish to conclude my remarks.

I want to underline here something said by the member for Kootenay-West (Mr. Herridge):

(Text):

When the time is crystallized, we can have a distinctive national flag.

(Translation):

Well, I hope the time will soon come when we will have a distinctive national flag. I also hope we will be able to submit this question to the Canadian people for a final decision on the matter.

With regard to the fleur-de-lis, we in the province of Quebec have a provincial flag of which we are proud.

Last year, the province of Ontario decided to fly on its parliament buildings in Toronto the red ensign with the maple leaf. Here perhaps, is a means of implementing the suggestion that each of the ten provinces should have as an emblem a flag of its own, which need not be the national flag but one in keeping with the group of Canadians represented and recalling the particular history of such groups. Then we could hope to have a really distinctive national flag, and we would have unity in diversity.

But, I repeat, Canada as a whole must have a distinctive national flag. Let us enable Canadians from coast to coast to decide once and for all on a truly distinctive flag which would give added strength to its motto "A mari usque ad mare" and strengthen national unity at all times and especially in trying periods.

(Text):

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the different members expressing their views concerning the resolution proposed by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Regnier). I heartily agree that we should have a distinctive flag. Visitors coming to our country are puzzled as they see the union jack and the red ensign flying in the different cities, towns and hamlets of our country.

Flags of Canada

During the last ten years our country has grown rapidly and our new Canadians have made a great contribution to the welfare and progress of our country. I have been associated with people of many nationalities, especially in my own riding of Waterloo North, where we have one of the greatest cosmopolitan centres in Canada. The great majority of these people have been constantly enquiring about a distinctive flag. Evidently they have become real Canadians and are interested in many matters, including that of a distinctive flag for Canada. By royal proclamation of November 21, 1921, the King declared:

> The King, at the request of Canada, assigns to Canada the national colours white and red and declares that the national emblem of Canada shall be three red maple leaves on one stem, on a white field. These shall be used to represent Canada on all appropriate occasions.

I believe that a Canadian flag when chosen should be easily recognizable and unlike any other. It should be visible at a distance, characteristic in structure, and appropriate. It should be symbolic of our country and of our position as a sovereign state in the family of nations, lending itself, also, to variation for different purposes.

It may be of some value at this time to note that the history of the Canadian flag from the treaty of Paris in 1763 to the present date is as follows:

1763-1801—the flag of Great Britain (England and Scotland) was used officially and for all purposes.

1801-1911—the union jack was assumed to be and, with certain minor and generally unofficial exceptions, was used as the official flag of Canada.

1870—the blue ensign, defaced by the Canadian coat of arms, was designated for use on Canadian government vessels.

1892—the red ensign with the Canadian coat of arms in the fly was authorized for use by merchant vessels registered in Canada. This was confirmed in the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

1911—the union jack was officially declared to be flown at the stern and the blue ensign with the Canadian coat of arms in the fly to be flown at the jack staff of all vessels of the Royal Canadian Navy.

1924—the red ensign with the Canadian coat of arms in the fly was authorized to be flown "over all premises owned or occupied by the Canadian government abroad."

1924—the present coat of arms was substituted for the old Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick quarterings for use on the fly of all Canadian flags.

The dominion command of the Canadian Legion passed the following resolution in 1958:

> Be it resolved that this convention requests the federal government to place the selection of a Canadian national flag before the people in the form of a referendum using > (a) the flag recommended in the majority report of the parliamentary committee of July, 1946, or > (b) the flag recommended by the minority report of the same committee.

I am in favour of a referendum concerning the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): It seems to me the Canadian people are going to be surprised at the activities which have taken place in the Canadian parliament today. All hon. members who have spoken have said we should have a Canadian flag, knowing full well that the longer we talk today the less chance there is of it coming to pass this year. It seems to me the people are going to wonder at our inability to solve our problems in the normal way. It seems to me that if the government of the day had any gumption they would take action, either through a committee or by coming right out and saying that tomorrow, for instance, the Canadian ensign is going to be the national flag, and that is final. Three weeks later there would be no more noise heard about it, and we would have a flag whether we were all in favour of it or not.

For years and years we have been dithering about this question. We have been a nation for more than a hundred years and we are no closer to getting this flag than we were decades ago, except that we now have thousands of suggestions to choose from when originally we had only one or two. I was talking to a girl from Australia who was at the United Nations representing that country. We were talking about flags and national anthems and she pointed out that Australia had got a national anthem by the back-door method. Americans had come to Australia and decided that the Australian national anthem was "Waltzing Matilda". They always played that tune in honour of Australians at every type of function and very soon it became the national anthem. It seems to me that if we fool around for many more years in an attempt to satisfy each of 18 million inhabitants of this country we shall be getting a flag in the same way as Australia got a national anthem, that is to say, through the United States, and it will be only the addition of another star or another bar.

If we believe in majority decisions why cannot we accept the majority decision of the last committee which we had, and adopt its recommendation as our national flag. It seems to me that it is the responsibility of the government to take action. They could do this by passing an order in council with a great deal more immunity from controversy than arose in respect of a lot of other things they did by this method. I do not think this is something we ought to raise such a fuss about.

Certainly we all have preferences in this field, but it does appear we are all united in wishing to have a Canadian flag, and I think this business of talking about it in five or six ways every year is not bringing us any closer but, rather, dividing us. It is up to the government of the day, or to the government which will replace it, to take responsibility. When they have gumption enough to take action we will end up with a flag. It will not be one which will satisfy everyone in Canada, but that is undoubtedly too much to hope. I hope this government will see fit to instigate proceedings which will result in a Canadian flag rather than in a lot of talk about what we would like to have in such a flag.

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, in any real sense Canada is a monstrosity. But Canada was not created by small, British, rational men; it was created by men of courage whose imagination stretched from sea to sea and from the coastal rivers to the ends of the earth. This country of Canada was created in defiance of geography. All the economic and geographic lines run north and south. The lobster fishermen from Peggy's Cove and Cape Cod suffer the same storms; the prairie farmers in Montana and Saskatchewan each suffer the effects of the hail that crushes their wheat; the people from beyond the mountains in British Columbia and in Oregon both suffer the same sense of claustrophobia. Only our history has held us together as a country, and it is to our history that we must look in order to remain a country.

I believe that next to the fundamental issue of war and peace and the survival of the species the issue of the greatest importance to this country in the next half century will be whether we can maintain a separate, independent and prosperous country in the northern half of this hemisphere. I think we should be ever conscious of and should cherish those things which give us an individual character. These things include our connection with the commonwealth, our common loyalty to the crown and our bilingual culture. These are the things on which we must concentrate as a bulwark against absorption by the great mass represented by the United States.

One of our greatest writers, Mr. Hugh MacLennan, has made what I think is a most cogent commentary on Canada. He looked around at our divergencies and conflicting interests on the Canadian scene and asked this question: What do we have in common? Have we anything in common? He drew this one conclusion which has great relevance to our immediate situation. He indicated that the one common bond among all the significant groups that comprise our great country is the fact that at one time or other they have shared in suffering the experience of defeat.

The highland Scots in 1745, our French Canadians in 1759, our United Empire Loyalists in 1776, all went through the traumatic experience of defeat. These are the original and perhaps most significant groups that make up the mosaic of Canada. The others who came to Canada in later years were refugees in one sense or another from famine, war or persecution. The Irish came and later the Jewish people and then came others from many countries in Europe especially in the years following the last two wars. They came to our shores in search of peace, freedom and security.

This is the one thing we have in common, the one thing all Canadians share. Born of this is something else we all share, the determination that we will not expire, disappear, be absorbed but will somehow or other in our struggling, muddling way maintain a separate, independent and proud existence on this continent.

Like many of my neighbours in Stormont I am proud of the fact that members of my family have defended the independence of Canada under the union jack on three different occasions. I am proud that we have had this opportunity. However, I believe we are in the position referred to by Kipling in these words:

> Daughter am I in my mother's house;
> But mistress in my own.

I think we are very privileged to have enjoyed this honoured and respected position but I believe we have grown to maturity. We are no longer entitled to share in this honour or to enjoy the dignity and prerogatives with which it is associated. We must now build something of our own and we must stand or fall on the basis of what we have built.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: I am happy to notice that tonight, we have a new interim leader in the person of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois). I congratulate him and would ask him to indicate what is the business for tomorrow and for Wednesday.

Business of the House

Mr. Comtois: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, the house will conclude the budget debate. On Wednesday, we will begin consideration of item 9 on today's order paper, a resolution sponsored by the Minister of Agriculture.

If that business is completed on Wednesday, we will go on with the resolutions on the setting up of the committees, according to the order to be set tomorrow night.

Mr. Chevrier: What will be the business for Thursday?

Mr. Comtois: I think that is enough to cope with the earnestness of the opposition leader.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 24, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED RAIL STRIKE—REQUEST FOR RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that in the debate on third reading of the Railway Operation Continuation Act on December 2 last I said that I would do everything I could to bring the parties together and regularly call them together to assure that discussions would continue and that justice would be done.

Accordingly I have written to the chairman of the negotiating committee as well as to the representatives of the railroads requesting the parties to the dispute affecting the non-operating railway employees to meet together and resume their negotiations for the settlement of the dispute. The Minister of Labour will make available to the parties the conference room of the Department of Labour at Montreal, and will provide whatever other facilities are suitable so that, pending the receipt of the report of the royal commission on transportation, the position of the matters at issue may be reviewed and an endeavour may be made in the national interest to come to an accommodation that will resolve their differences.

Furthermore, I have advised these parties that the minister would provide any advice or assistance to facilitate the meeting. In that connection I pointed this out in the letter:

> It is imperative when determined steps are being taken by the federal government to stabilize the Canadian economy and maintain its growth that every effort be made to avoid a cessation of railway transportation and the drastic dislocations which would result therefrom.

Accordingly I have asked the co-operation of Mr. Hall and those he represents and the presidents of the two railways and the other railways affected to co-operate in the resumption of negotiations.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this announcement by the Prime Minister comes, of course, as no surprise. I can only say that I think it would have been much better to have done more to have this situation settled in December than to have the problem still with us. I express the hope of this group that when the parties come together the government will not only make available to them the facilities of the Department of Labour, but that the government itself will take an active part in the negotiations by making proposals and by trying to bring the parties together so that in fact an agreement can be reached.

I would have liked the Prime Minister to elaborate a little in regard to his reference to the royal commission on transportation. Our view is that after the eventual settlement of this dispute it should be government policy, and we make that request, that in no circumstances should there be an increase in freight rates.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member, in going into a discussion of the royal commission and its report, is enlarging the scope of the statement which was made from the government benches.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order you have raised, I was not endeavouring to discuss, nor do I think I was—and I think you will agree on reflection—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: —the report of the royal commission itself, nor the report of the royal commission even in relation to the government's announcement. What I was discussing, however, was the statement of policy that the Prime Minister made last December, and I make the suggestion and the request that in no circumstances should there be an increase in freight rates.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It was at that point that I thought the hon. member, in going back to an earlier statement, was departing from the practice.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the announcement he made a few moments ago about the invitation to resume negotiations in connection with the railway dispute. Has the government any proposals to submit to the resumed meetings which may facilitate the search for a solution to this important and difficult problem?

Threatened Rail Strike

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sure the hon. gentleman would agree that any designation of proposals on the part of the government would not be beneficial to bringing about that spirit of negotiation that is so desirable as between members of the labour unions and the railways. There was a full and complete discussion in this house on this matter, and I am sure the views that were expressed, as recorded in Hansard, by members on both sides of the house will naturally be known to the officials of the unions concerned and the railways.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the statement the Prime Minister made a moment ago, and the fact that the hearings of the royal commission on transportation have just been completed and there will be a date fixed for argument, I wonder if the Prime Minister is still of the view, as he was on an earlier occasion, that it will be possible for the commission to hand down its report on the matters under discussion by March 31?

Mr. Diefenbaker: While I have not received official word in that connection, my hope is that there should be available, if not the complete report, an interim report in respect of those matters with which the royal commission was charged so as to enable the fullest consideration to be given by the house prior to the date mentioned as a target date during the progress of the debate on this matter.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a further supplementary question for clarification. Does the Prime Minister anticipate that this interim report will be sufficient for the carrying out of all the statements he made earlier this session, namely with reference to applications to the board of transport commissioners in connection with freight rates; or can the Prime Minister now say whether the freight rate freeze will continue until the final report has been made?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman would not expect me to engage in a hypothetical discussion as to what decisions might or might not be recommended by the royal commission, or indeed to cross that stile he asks me to walk over before we are actually in a position to see the stile.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I ask a supplementary question regarding the proposed negotiations between the parties. I wonder if the Prime Minister is going to take any steps to put into effect the statement he made on November 30, as recorded on page 359 of Hansard:

> If there is an agreement to raise wages it shall go back to January 1, 1960.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to redebate the questions that were debated at that time on the orders of the day.

Mr. Argue: You made a lot of commitments.

DRUGS

ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING TREATMENT OF ADDICTS

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the government has approved a new approach to the problem of drug addiction and the treatment of both criminal and non-criminal addicts in Canada. I am making this announcement also on behalf of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The program has two main aspects; steps that will be taken by the federal government in the field of purely federal authority, and measures that may be taken in co-operation with the provinces, if they so wish, in areas where the authority is primarily provincial. The broad general outline of the second portion has already been laid before the provinces for their consideration.

Under the first head, important changes will be made with respect to the apprehension, trial and sentencing of offenders, as well as with respect to their treatment while within, and their supervision after release from, our institutions. The full program envisages the establishment by the federal government, as soon as possible, of special institutions for the segregation and treatment of drug addicts. The timing of the establishment of new institutions, and their nature, will depend to a considerable extent on the degree to which the provinces wish to co-operate, under the portion of the program to be mentioned later. In any event, however, it is of the utmost importance that facilities for segregation should be provided in the existing penitentiary system as soon as possible. Only by segregating the addicts from the general penitentiary population can adequate treatment programs be undertaken. Such segregation will also represent a significant step forward in preventing the spread of addiction.

In order to enable the system to produce the most effective results with respect to criminal addicts, legislative changes will be made to provide procedures for the determination of the question of whether an accused is an addict, and to provide further that if so found, and if convicted of the charge of illegal possession, appropriate sentence to "custody for treatment" may be imposed. The legislation will also provide for release from custody only upon approval by the national parole board and under supervision for an indeterminate period and upon terms to be laid down by that agency. Those so sentenced will of course be committed to the new institutions as soon as they can be set up. The new institutions will be operated under the present federal penitentiary system, but will include the most up-to-date program for treatment of addicts.

This is not just a plan to hold addicts in custody, but rather an earnest attempt to treat their addiction by the most modern methods available, with the hope that a substantial number may be returned as useful citizens to society.

The program will also provide for increased penalties for those involved in trafficking drugs. Under this approach, the law and the enforcement of it will be based on the view that the trafficker who peddles drugs primarily to pay the cost of his own addiction is no less a menace to society, while at large, than the trafficker who peddles for some other purpose. Details of the legislation will be announced in due course, but it is generally proposed to provide that anyone convicted of trafficking may be sentenced to imprisonment for life, and in the case of a second or subsequent offence, will automatically receive an indeterminate sentence. The duration of the period of probation or parole for such persons will similarly reflect the view that narcotics traffickers require permanent supervision, and must not be allowed to associate with juveniles or other addicts. Other changes with respect to sentencing will also be made.

With regard to that field involving co-operation by the provinces, we are primarily concerned with the prevention of addiction and the treatment of those who may be prone to the use of drugs but are not criminals. The problem here is that the federal government has no jurisdiction over such a person unless or until he has committed a crime, but the main effort should be to treat him and prevent him from becoming a criminal. The full answer to this problem therefore depends upon provincial co-operation.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has established a committee to study and report upon improved methods for dealing with the non-criminal addicts, and this committee will be working in co-operation with the provincial departments of health. It is anticipated that a few centres will be established in suitable locations where a trained staff can study methods of treatment and guidance of non-criminal addicts. These would be community based services with emphasis on follow-up and prevention of reversion to addiction.

In addition and in order to be able to deal with recalcitrant individuals who are not amenable to treatment in a community centre, we have proposed to the provinces that they provide a procedure, under provincial legislation, for the referral of suspected addicts for medical and psychiatric examination and for commital for treatment of those found to be addicts. Such persons could then be commited for treatment to the new federal institutions to which I have referred, if the provinces so desire, under appropriate financial arrangements to be worked out.

An important feature of this proposal is that those committed for treatment under provincial legislation will not have any form of criminal record nor be subject to the stigma attached thereto, but there will be available to them the extra care and treatment as well as the rehabilitative program which it will be possible to develop under a co-ordinated plan designed to achieve maximum results in terms of the prevention of crime, the treatment of addiction, the rehabilitation of offenders, and the curtailment of a social evil.

To us it is clear that the fullest benefit from the program can only be achieved if there is co-operation at both levels of government. Some of the changes can, of course, be proceeded with independently, but the full extent and effectiveness of the program can only be realized when we determine the extent of the co-operation that will be available. We are encouraged by the expressions of interest received so far, and are proceeding with the preparation of detailed plans as rapidly as possible.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): The extended statement made by the Minister of Justice today is one which the hon. gentleman was asked to make a year and a half ago in this house because of a declaration he had made outside parliament, speaking in British Columbia. The statement deals, however, with a matter of the greatest importance, and the house generally will regard it as one which should receive the most serious consideration, in the light, of course, of what specific recommendations may be made.

The minister has said there are two aspects of the problem of drug addiction; one which involves criminal jurisdiction and is assigned exclusively under the British North America Act to the federal government. Another involving administration, depends upon the exercise by provincial governments of the authority extended to them under section 92 of the B.N.A. Act. In any event, the treatment of non-criminal addicts depends in the final analysis on the co-operation which prevails between the two senior levels of government.

The minister has said that a bill will be introduced this session, when we shall be given an opportunity of examining the details of this proposal. Consideration is to be given to an increase in the penalties proposed for illicit drug addiction. The house will recall that provision was made three years ago for an increase in such penalties. This further suggestion reflects what I think is a general conviction in this country that the penalty for illicit drug trafficking in Canada must be severe enough to discourage people from the practice, having regard to the grave social consequences which flow from such trafficking.

The minister has said nothing about offers which have already been made to the provinces in respect of treatment centres for non-criminal addicts. However, when this matter is discussed in detail and we have a specific bill in our hands, an opportunity will be given to outline the offer which was made some years ago to the province of British Columbia as a pilot case to provide for treatment of non-criminal addicts.

This is a matter of the greatest importance and the minister may be assured, I feel confident, that it will be viewed in that light by all members of the house.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): The statement which has just been made by the Minister of Justice is indeed most welcome, and as far as this group is concerned collectively, and as far as I am concerned individually, I have no hesitation in saying that this is a memorable day, made so because of a memorable statement. At long last a logical, reasonable and scientific approach is being made to the serious problem of drug addiction.

There is no doubt that many members of both federal and provincial legislatures, as well as many organizations and individuals outside those bodies, have taken a keen interest in this problem in an effort to obtain recognition by the government that drug addiction is not solely a criminal matter but that it is a matter of sickness, and should be regarded as such.

We are exceedingly pleased that in the statement of the minister emphasis has been placed on co-operation between the federal and provincial authorities, and on prevention as well as cure. A point of particular interest to me is that there will be a definite and comprehensive policy of rehabilitation, an area in which we have failed in the past.

We welcome the announcement of the minister and look forward with interest to the introduction of the legislation. We will deal with the subject in detail at that time. We assure the minister and the house that any step toward meeting the problem that has been a curse to the individual and to society will receive our whole-hearted support.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF MEETING WITH NEW U.S. ADMINISTRATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the first meeting between members of the Kennedy administration and members of the Canadian cabinet will take place tomorrow. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, accompanied by Mr. Ian McKinnon and Mr. Robert D. Howland, chairman and vice chairman respectively of the national energy board, and other deputies and officials will proceed to Washington for the purpose of meeting there tomorrow and of exchanging views with members of the new administration on oil marketing and other matters of mutual interest. The Canadian ambassador will participate in the talks as well.

I think this meeting represents a continuation of that relationship which was so characteristic of the Eisenhower administration with this government and its predecessor. It indicates that the co-operation of the past in the discussion of matters of mutual interest will be continued to the benefit of both our nations.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure hon. members are interested in the Prime Minister's announcement of the first meeting between the members of the Canadian government and members of the new United States administration. We all hope that the frank and constructive co-operation which has existed between governments of our two countries over so many years will be continued with the new administration, as the Prime Minister has pointed out.

I understand that this meeting is to be devoted to energy questions in particular and not to general matters, which perhaps accounts for the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will not be going to Washington. In any event, Mr. Speaker, we on this side hope that there will be useful results for both countries from this meeting and from subsequent meetings.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The announcement made by the Prime Minister speaks well for the Kennedy administration and for the dispatch with which that administration is prepared to consider problems of interest to both Canada and the United States. I hope the meeting will be successful, and that any future discussions with the Kennedy administration will have to do with defence and external affairs problems and, I must say, I hope very fervently that some arrangements may be arrived at in the field of the export of agricultural commodities.

The announcement of the Prime Minister is welcome. We hope that much will result from this meeting.

STATISTICS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DISTINCTIVE FLAG AND NATIONAL ANTHEM

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-60, to amend the Statistics Act (distinctive flag and national anthem).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize the governor in council to conduct a public opinion survey on the occasion of the next decennial census in Canada, concerning an entirely distinctive national flag and national anthem.

Since the census forms have to go back to press shortly, it would be a fine opportunity to include those two questions in order to learn the wishes of the Canadian people on this matter of great current interest.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REPORTED CLOSING OF THREE COLLIERIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it a fact that the government has accepted as final the dates of closure for three collieries in Cape Breton, and has reached an agreement with the company which rules out discussions with the unions and civic bodies on the future of those three collieries?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): That is a rather lengthy question and one that would require a very long and complicated reply. However, I shall examine the question in detail and when it is considered appropriate to give a full answer it will be given.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Since the first question seems to be too complicated for the Prime Minister's comprehension, may I ask him a more simple one. Did the officers of the united mine workers seek to arrange a meeting with the Prime Minister, and was such a meeting turned down by the Prime Minister or some other member of the government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The last question the hon. member propounded bears no relationship at all to the first, although it is couched in fewer words than ordinarily are used by the hon. gentleman to state a simple question. In so far as that question is concerned, I may say that there have been meetings from time to time and those meetings will continue when and if it is believed that anything beneficial will result therefrom.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that he has had such meetings with the unions, because my understanding is that is not the case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman's understanding is something for which I am not responsible.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this matter I should like to ask the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order; I am sorry, but I recognized the hon. member for Chicoutimi.

(Translation):

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CHICOUTIMI—WINTER WORKS ADVERTISEMENTS IN ENGLISH LANGUAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Vincent Brassard (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. Could he tell me who is responsible for the outdoor advertising of the winter works program and how is it that in a city like Chicoutimi where 99½ per cent of the people are French-speaking, all outdoor panels to promote winter employment are in English only? I wonder what would happen if such advertisements were displayed in French in Toronto?

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The hon. member gave me notice of his intention to ask this question. I should like to advise the hon. member that the outdoor panels relating to the "Do it now" winter employment campaign to which he refers are made available by the Department of Labour to the outdoor advertising association in both English and French. These panels are then supplied by the association as a public service to its member companies. The panels are available in both English and French, depending upon what the member company requests. We in the Department of Labour do not deal directly with the individual companies. My officials inform me that French panels are available on request.

ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED EVICTION NOTICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he is now in a position to deal with the question I brought up last week concerning housing difficulties in Elliot Lake.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for asking this question. In reply I would say that of the 1,399 National Housing Act home ownership loans approved in Elliot Lake, 1,119 were made by the approved lenders to the housing companies sponsored by the mines for sale to mine employees, and 280 were made to individual home owner applicants.

The mortgages relating to 264 N.H.A. houses are currently in default and the approved lenders have advised C.M.H.C. of their intention to claim on the mortgage insurance fund. Two hundred and forty of the houses with mortgages in default are owned by the housing companies sponsored by the mines and have been acquired as a result of buy-back agreements between the housing companies and the mine employees who have left Elliot Lake. These houses are vacant. The remaining 24 mortgages in default relate to houses owned by individual home owners. The majority of these home owners have voluntarily vacated and transferred their property to the lender. As far as I have been able to determine there is only one instance where the lender experienced difficulty in obtaining possession from the home owner.

REPORTED RETRAINING OF UNEMPLOYED WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In answer to a question regarding retraining programs for unemployed workers, asked on January 20, the hon. gentleman replied that facilities were being set up under schedule M of Bill No. C-49, not under the Canadian vocational training act. I am not able to find schedule M. Would the minister be kind enough to clarify the situation?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Schedule M is in the agreements which are made with the provinces.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the minister said it was in the new act.

Mr. Starr: The agreements are drawn up under the new act.

FINANCE

EFFECTIVE INTEREST RATES ON SMALL BUSINESS LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. As the official maximum interest rate was not stipulated in the statute setting up government guaranteed loans to small businesses, I wonder whether the minister has made inquiries to see what rates are now being actually charged under this statute, and whether they have proven to be uniform rates in all banks or whether he has found a variation, and if so what the range of that variation would be.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): This matter has been discussed with representatives of the banks. The rates that are being applied are, as I am informed, rates suitable to the creditworthiness of the particular applicants, less an allowance which I believe is taken as one half of one per cent of the interest rate on account of the federal government guarantee.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the minister know what the range in rates has proven to be?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The range in rates is between the prime rate of 5¾ per cent and 6 per cent, less one half of one per cent on account of the guarantee. According to my understanding, the effective rate thus ranges from 5¼ per cent to 5½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Plus the insurance?

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question. The minister does not have any information to the effect that the banks are following a procedure which would give them in fact a rate above 6 per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The banks have no power to charge a rate in excess of 6 per cent. That is the maximum established by the terms of the Bank Act. The prime rate is the rate, of course, established in favour of persons with the best credit rating. This rate at the present time is 5¾ per cent, as it has been for some months past.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

OTTAWA—REQUIREMENTS OF CONCESSIONAIRE RESPECTING BILINGUAL EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer)? Is the minister aware of the fact that a concessionary at the Ottawa railway station forbids his employees to speak French under penalty of losing their job? If he is not aware of that, could he inquire about it and, if he is, would he be kind enough to act as he did at Dorval?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did not know anything about what the hon. member has said, but I will inquire into it.

SPORTS

HOCKEY—MINOR HOCKEY WEEK IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that during this week the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association is sponsoring minor hockey week in Canada in which 200,000 Canadian youth will participate?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am aware of that fact, Mr. Speaker. I gave to that organization a message which I know would represent the views of all hon. members on what is being done by that organization generally and in particular by emphasizing the importance of junior hockey. The setting aside of a week for that purpose is most helpful to Canadians as a whole.

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—REFERENCE TO REPORTED REMARKS OF MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? According to yesterday's Le Devoir, the Minister of Transport made the following statement at a Conservative meeting in the constituency of Vaudreuil-Soulanges:

Quebec advocates of patronage would give the Soulanges canal to their friends.

A little later he went on to say:

...''A bunch of patronage friends''...

Would the Minister of Transport care to tell the house whether his remarks were faithfully reported by the paper, and if so, would he take the house into his confidence as to the details of such a dark scheme?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the minister answers the second part of the question, I should like to call to the attention of the hon. member who raises the question the fact that it is not in accordance with the practice to ask on orders of the day for verification of the truth of a newspaper report. A question about the substance of the matter reported is in order, and I raise no objection to that part.

(Translation):

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, those remarks have unfortunately been reported accurately by the newspaper. I was carried away by the enthusiasm in the hall. If I used terms which offended some of my colleagues, I wish to apologize.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, as a protection against the big bad wolves who would try to appropriate the minister's canal, would the minister examine the advisability of incorporating in any future sale of the Soulanges canal, a clause which would prevent such a dilapidation of crown property.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that the big bad wolves are any administrative responsibility of the minister. The question about a sale is purely hypothetical, and should not be asked.

THE CENSUS

On the orders of the day:

COMMUNICATIONS TO QUEBEC OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees). Would the minister tell this house whether a copy of the statement he made in the house yesterday concerning changes in some of the 1961 census questions has been sent to the government of the province of Quebec.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. I am quite sure that they have already read with much interest the announcement published in the papers.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED REFUSAL OF MEDICAL AID TO EMPLOYABLE UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to statements in the Vancouver press that in future the British Columbia government is going to refuse to supply medical aid to employable unemployed drawing welfare payments because of the refusal of the federal government to share the costs? If this is so, has the minister any comment to make and will consideration be given to the situation?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have not seen the article in question. I shall be glad to look into it and advise the hon. member.

GRAIN

LAKEHEAD—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED STORAGE SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, notice of which has been given. This question is caused by concern expressed at the lakehead over the very large storage space, over 18 million bushels, available in the elevators there and the fact that deliveries from the west by rail are very slow.

I wonder whether the department has any information which would substantiate or indicate that this situation is merely a temporary one, in view of the employment that is involved.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving notice of his intention to ask this question. As of January 23, 1961, 76 million bushels of grain were in store at the lakehead terminal, an increase of 7 million bushels since January 11. A total of 4,488 box cars are en route to the lakehead. When these cars arrive and are unloaded the stocks of grain will total approximately 83 million bushels.

The total rated capacity for grain at the lakehead is 94,500,000 bushels, but it is recognized that working space must be kept available. It is estimated that the active working capacity at the lakehead terminals is 83 million to 85 million bushels.

HOUSING

MONTREAL—REPORTED VACANCIES IN SUBSIDIZED PROJECT

Mr. C. E. Campeau (St. James): Mr. Speaker, referring to the Montreal Gazette of this morning, I see an article entitled, "Ex-Slum Dwellers Snub Dozois Bid, 248 Units Empty".

May I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) if he would inform the house whether or not these reports on the Jeanne Mance habitations in Montreal are correct?

(Text):

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I did read the article, and I am very happy to be able to say that these magnificent buildings, Habitation Jeanne Mance, in Montreal, have been a great experiment in subsidized housing. There are a total of 796 units, of which 524 units are already occupied, 174 finished units are vacant and 98 units are unfinished. We expect to have all units rented by May 1.

This project is administered entirely by the housing authority appointed by the city of Montreal, and it is true that many of the displaced persons have been placed elsewhere in satisfactory dwellings. That is quite often the way. These new projects are often slow in getting under way, as in Regent Park North, a similar enterprise in Toronto. However, we expect we will have a very happy experience in this greater Montreal experiment in subsidized housing.

TRADE

RUSSIA—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE OF WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Have there been any negotiations regarding the sale of wheat to the U.S.S.R., and if so what is the present position of those negotiations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, negotiations have been going on with representatives of the government of the U.S.S.R. I am hopeful that agreement will be arrived at in consequence of those negotiations for the sale of 150,000 tons of wheat.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister what has been the amount of deliveries to date under the 400,000 ton agreement made in 1959.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, of course the hon. gentleman realizes that I would not have that information. I will have it secured and made available.

NATURAL RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION TO CONFERENCE BY TREE FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Will provision be made on the agenda of the resources for tomorrow conference being held this year for member representatives of the Canadian tree farmers association to present a brief on behalf of the grass roots independent tree farmers?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his interest in this important conference. I can assure him that briefs will be welcomed from all provincial and national organizations interested in developing Canada's resources. We have not received a brief from this particular group as yet, but I can assure the hon. member that we will be very happy to hear from them.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the resources conference has solicited briefs from some 80 to 90 organizations, was any request sent to this organization to obtain their views in complete terms?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the co-ordinating committee of this conference is made up of a representative from each of the provincial governments. Through that channel invitations have been extended to all provincial groups to make their opinions heard.

COMMUNICATIONS

PACIFIC CABLE—INQUIRY AS TO DIVISION OF WORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him in view of the statement made in Montreal yesterday, I believe by the chairman of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation, that a cable will be constructed between Canada and Australia, whether he can inform the house how the work of construction will be divided among the participating countries, the United Kingdom, Canada and Australia, and how much of the work will be assigned to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not the exact figures, but I will make inquiries and let the hon. member know tomorrow.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

GRAND RAPIDS, MAN.—REPORTED NON-PAYMENT OF AGREED WAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration arising out of a Canadian Press report dated January 27—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Badanai: —concerning protests by Indians at Grand Rapids, Manitoba, to the effect that they are not receiving the wages promised by the Drake Construction Company of Winnipeg. Can the minister inform the house whether her department has made any attempt to protect the rights—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I understand the hon. member's question correctly it relates to the payment of wages by a construction company, which surely is not any part of the administrative responsibility of the department.

[Later:]

Mr. Badanai: I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the hon. lady received any representations from the Indians of Grand Rapids, Manitoba, regarding their wage difficulties with the construction company for which they work?

Mr. Speaker: A question about the receipt of a communication should, of course, be of sufficient importance to warrant its being asked. However, I think I might permit a reply to be made.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No representations have been made by the Indians to my department. I would point out to the hon. member that the group concerned in the incident to which he refers includes many metis and people not of Indian blood. In these circumstances the whole matter is being handled by the provincial department concerned. However, in an effort to protect those Indians who are to some extent the responsibility of my department, we have been in constant consultation with the authorities of the province of Manitoba.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. When are the estimates for the current fiscal year likely to be tabled?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—INQUIRY AS TO CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Could I ask the Minister of Justice whether he is in a position today, or whether he will be in a position in the immediate future, to advise the house when the amendments which were forecast in the speech from the throne relative to capital punishment are to be introduced, in view of the fact that a second 14-year old boy has been sentenced to hang?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, I am not in a position to give a definite answer to that question, but the situation to which the hon. member has referred is very much in our minds.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

TIMMINS, ONT.—REPORTED CARRYING OF MAIL BY STRIKEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General; I regret that I was unable to send the hon. gentleman notice. Has the minister received reports or complaints from Timmins, Ontario to the effect that mail contracts are being carried out by strikebreakers at rates as low as 65 cents an hour and, if so, does the minister contemplate taking any action?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I am not aware of having received any such complaints.

MONTREAL—REPORTED UNUSED VACANT SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Before I do so, may I express my joy at seeing his picture in this morning's newspaper. I looked yesterday but I could not find one, and I was worried because I thought the hon. gentleman was sick or something.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): My photograph was in two newspapers today. That makes up for yesterday.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Denis: Good for you. My question is this. Is the minister aware that in the Montreal post office almost 2,000 square feet were vacated and made available six months ago, since when the space has been used as a cloakroom. Will the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it that the hon. member's question relates to an event of six months ago. It does not seem to me of very great importance and I suggest that unless he has a question of urgency to ask—

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, this floor space is still available, and I want to know what is the purpose of retaining such a wide space without making proper use of it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can get his answer on the order paper.

THE BUDGET

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mrs. Jean Casselman (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, it is with much pleasure that I rise today to support wholeheartedly the budget presented before Christmas by our honoured and admired Minister of Finance.

In accordance with our system of government, those who receive the least support in the country find themselves obliged to find fault with the government. This obligation can impose quite an effort at times, and never has criticism been so confused and contradictory as it is at the present time. There are those who say the government has worked too slowly and those who say it is working too fast; there are those who say it is doing too little and those who say it is doing too much. I submit that the very confusion of the criticism is as great a compliment as the government could receive.

I have, naturally, known many members of the opposition for many years, and I like them personally. Since I have been sitting in this house as a member my respect has increased for those whose honesty of purpose keeps them so hard at work. But I have decreased respect for those who are irresponsible in placing upon this government a degree of responsibility which no thinking Canadian would want any government to accept, a degree of responsibility which was not accepted by the Liberals in 1938 when the unemployment figures were greater than they are at the present time—11.4 per cent—or again in 1939 when the percentage was 11.4, or in 1940 when it was 9.2 per cent. Other countries must look at us in amazement. They have their employment problems also, as all democracies do. I submit that it is bad enough to be making a political football of unemployment, but the lack of facts and realistic figures produced by the opposition sometimes makes me think the subject is being blown up into a political beachball.

This easy political approach is very understandable but none the more commendable for that. My learned and honourable friends in the opposition know full well the dangers of irresponsible and unrealistic criticism of any government—

Mr. Pearson: We ought to. We listened to it for long enough.

Mrs. Casselman: They should know better than anyone else in this house the basic impossibility of suggesting at the same time more and more government expenditure and less and less taxation. We are all very much aware in this house of the loss both to the country and to individual happiness which results from unemployment, but I submit that it is equally detrimental to Canada to try to lead more and more people to expect more and more solutions, more and more assistance from the government. If we are to continue with our free enterprise economy we cannot go on increasing government obligations indefinitely without increasing government restrictions and controls to say nothing of the taxation involved.

Anyone who has sat in this house for many years or who has analysed cause and effect has observed that some of our most insidious problems today have arisen from government succumbing to pressures and devising for their own immediate popularity solutions which have been detrimental to individual Canadian character, to pride of achievement, to ambition and to honesty itself.

I was interested in a press report of a statement made by my charming colleague from Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) when she said that her party should prefer to be right rather than popular. I should hope that anyone connected with politics would adhere to that principle.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) was reported during the Christmas recess to have suggested that if private enterprise could not cure unemployment he would approve of and agree with public ownership. I suggest that much of the question whether private enterprise can succeed depends on the individual Canadian's attitude. From anything I have seen, read or heard I do not think that socialization produces any more, if as much, efficiency. I want very much to see the challenges of competition remain for Canadians and the satisfaction of meeting these challenges by individual initiative and energy.

I commend the government for accepting its share of responsibility for employment. I commend it equally for not falling prey to all the slick, comfortable, socialized recommendations that have been made, and for placing upon individual Canadians their share of responsibility, too. I know there are many who welcome this attitude. We have all heard in this house and outside the importance of small businesses as a source of diversified employment. I commend the government for its action in raising from $25,000 to $35,000 the bracket subject to 21 per cent corporation tax. As mentioned by my colleague and political neighbour, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), in his sound and excellent speech last week, this becomes doubly important when added to Bill No. C-40 passed before Christmas respecting loans to small businesses. If the percentage of small businesses interested in this legislation in Grenville-Dundas is any criterion, it is going to be welcomed and much used.

The fact that tourist business is included in this provision is of great importance to my area. Last September we opened the new international Prescott-Ogdensburg bridge over which we hope to attract many United States tourists next summer. We welcome all assistance that will bring these visitors to our country, that will assist our small businesses to give them service and do business with them.

In Grenville-Dundas we have historic sites that are among the earliest in Canada. Next July the Ontario St. Lawrence parks commission will open upper Canada village, which is already being visited as a wonderful example of historic preservation. Canada has many facilities for tourists, and with the sound policy of this government and the welcome and courtesy of our individual Canadians we can act Canadian, sell Canadian, see Canadian, enjoy Canadian and change the $200 million deficit in the tourist industry to a $200 million surplus. Without setting up restrictions or subsidization this government has improved the situation for this great industry so infinite in its expansion possibilities.

By making borrowing abroad less attractive our Canadian dollar is reaching parity with the United States dollar. The benefits of this situation are well-known to the people of my district, and we will benefit greatly next tourist season. Even now we are feeling the benefit in our export selling across the border.

The people of Grenville-Dundas are representative of the best type of sane Canadian thinking based on social stability, and realize the interplay of cause and effect. We are indebted to Mr. McLaughlin, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, for recently reminding Canadians in clear and understandable language that the interest rate does not fluctuate by the winds of chance or by manipulation by goblins or fairies, but is the result of supply and demand. This was very obvious when the former government dipped into our money supply to an extent that is still being borne and will have to be borne for many years to come, and that contributed in no small measure to our present problems.

One does not have to be a particular student of economics to have observed with terror what happened in the past to the value of money in Germany and many other countries. We may not always find it to our advantage to live strictly within our income at any given moment, but let us recognize and not forget the effects of borrowing. Let us not become so accustomed to living on borrowed money that we become confused and blame other causes for the results it brings, or like spoiled children hope for a fairy godmother to make some wonderful arrangements that will change the hard realistic facts.

We are responsible for our own development, and if out of laziness and misunderstanding of the facts we allow others to take over more and more of it, we may expect that it will not be entirely to our benefit or our liking, and we will lose our identity as a nation. It is a hackneyed phrase but none the less true that he who pays the piper calls the tune. We show lack of faith in Canada if we express fear that Canada has not the strength to withdraw concessions to other countries when this is necessary for her own survival.

It is far from complimentary to our colleague in the western alliance, our friendly neighbour to the south, to suggest that she would have so little understanding of business that she would object to our concern for our own balance of foreign payments, our own future, a concern that she constantly has to deal with for her own economic health. Comments in large and respected United States newspapers show an understanding of our problems and an expectation that the time has come when Canada has to decrease her inducements to foreign investment. It was surely never intended that these inducements were irrevocable and should not be given critical appraisal, even when foreign capital owns about 70 per cent of our industries.

The financial critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), himself commended the Minister of Finance, as reported at page 1043 of Hansard of December 21, for proposals which will encourage further participation by Canadians in savings and investments in Canadian enterprise. I would hope that the government will give sympathetic consideration to further steps which will make investment by Canadians in Canadian stocks still more attractive. Deduction by Canadian corporations of their dividend payments from their taxable income—in other words removal of double taxation—is being widely discussed and recommended as one means, and it would seem to be a reasonable and flexible means.

There is one type of investment which interests me more than all others, however gold-plated they may be. Like all parents I should like to be able to provide a happy future for my children, but I see no sure way of doing this except through the highest possible development of their own indivdual potential so they may lead satisfying and productive lives. To do this I hope to instil in them the value of education, not in any one particular phase of education or education at any particular level, and not just schooling, but an acceptance of a continuance of the educational habit all their lives in the same manner that they accept habits of good health. I believe this is the greatest hope, not only for my children but for the whole world. Sympathy, respect for one another, understanding can only be increased by learning, and will be lost in ignorance.

We can learn from the communist countries, who do not waste time worrying about consumer goods or housing or clothing for so many millions of people, but reiterate over and over again how rich they are because of those millions of people. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in this country we must educate and raise to the highest levels of productivity our small number of 18 million if we are to expect to compete in world affairs.

The assistance given to vocational and technical training by this government is an excellent step in the right direction, but I should like to see more concentrated thinking toward economy and better organization of our educational facilities. I hear much criticism from new Canadians about the fact that we do not sort out soon enough the ambitions and the talents of our young people. Consequently they become discouraged and frustrated. The second criticism is automatic, that we do not expect the high standards that could be achieved and that are demanded in other countries. I believe that encouragement of excellence, challenge to pride and self-sufficiency are essentials of schooling if it is to be any basis for lifetime educational habits.

We constantly hear and read of the need for excellence in workmanship if we are to be an exporting nation. The products of our universities must aim at equal excellence in higher mathematics, science and engineering if we are to compete in the research so necessary for new ideas, new processes and new patterns of thought. I would recommend that the federal government give more encouragement to research, possibly by tax encouragement to companies according to their staff and expenditures in this regard. This would serve the double purpose of increasing our productivity and making it possible to keep our highly trained minds in Canada.

Time does not permit me to digress into the involved problems of the electronics industry, but the research already done by this industry is very great and they are on the threshold of the most advanced developments. In the interests of Grenville-Dundas, where we have a large electronics plant, I urge the government to consider most seriously the effects of unfair competition from low wage countries.

I do not believe this ambition for excellence, which demands all-out effort, will likely develop if the way is made too easy. Free education at all levels is an attractive idea, but I doubt whether it is very practical at the present time when municipalities and provinces are already staggered by the tax burden for educational puposes. There is the strong psychological stimulus to obtain returns from investment, and this increases if the investment is made directly and voluntarily by the student himself. I fear that our high standard of living tends to lead all of us to feel that a great deal is due us, and we forget that this high standard came about by somebody's effort and will not be maintained without continued individual effort.

I should like to see federal loan banks for education available to all, young and old Canadians, not particularly based on need or the highest excellence in scholastic achievement, but on the prime requirement of a desire to learn. A revolving fund should be kept replenished by those who benefit most in this generation for those of the next generation, and who would be the first to recognize the enormous cost of university buildings, laboratories and libraries, and the competition for the best brains in the world, teachers and professors. It seems to me that if we have industrial loans, farm loans and loans for small businesses, we should certainly have loans for the development of the greatest resource we possess. I think the government's investment in a bright, ambitious Canadian is just as safe as it is in any other loan, and personally I would much prefer to have a mortgage on a bright young Canadian than on any 100 acres of land. The benefits of education are not only in obtaining the best possible preparation for the demands of a rapidly changing world and in the self-confidence enjoyed by a trained and challenged mind, but in actual dollars and cents as well.

A United States survey last fall showed that a young person in the United States in 1960 could expect to earn about $200,000, more or less, in a lifetime, depending on education. The potential lifetime earnings of a grade school graduate were estimated at $139,000, of a high school graduate at about $243,000, and of a university graduate at about $343,000. We are grateful to the Minister of Finance for his tax relief to students and their parents in making university fees deductible from a student's earnings and in determining his qualifications as a dependant.

I hope that future budgets will show the results of continued study of education in all its facets. This is by no means a sudden or unexpected need in our society, but one that becomes more pressing with world competition and automation. I feel strongly that we should concentrate more on developing strength and pride in Canadians while they are young and ambitious. If we did this we would be called upon less to relieve suffering of various kinds later in their lives.

The encouraging and assisting of our young people to obtain more education will not only prepare them for the skilled jobs now available, but will immediately remove a considerable percentage from the numbers of the unemployed. Mr. Davidson Dunton, president of Carleton University, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of December 5, 1960, said:

> The present university enrolment is about 10 per cent of the 18-21 year old age group. It should be 25 to 40 per cent.

If Canadians are better educated it will facilitate the process of working together that is so essential for making use of our great opportunities. Excellent work was done by the Department of Trade and Commerce in setting up the recent trade conference, and it is being continued in the encouragement of our businessmen to export to the markets of the world. The budget provision to enlarge the tariff board to expedite its work and the reassessment of the interpretation of class and kind are excellent steps which the government has taken to encourage Canadian production.

These efforts at government level, good as they may be, can easily be killed by lack of co-operation between management and labour. No one can force or order people to co-operate. The only means of obtaining more co-operation is to increase learning and understanding of one another's problems, one another's aims and a combined determination to make Canada a good place in which to live. If any group has more allegiance to profits for themselves, or to leaders in other countries, or to other ideologies, then we must expect a lack of co-operation, we must expect that we will not be able to be competitive in world markets, and Mr. Khrushchev's threat to ruin us without firing a shot will come true.

I believe the government's policy of sending representative groups of Canadians to other countries to study their techniques and their progress and to act as temporary roving salesmen and ambassadors should continue, but I should like to see these groups include management and labour leaders as well, because the facts should be equally impressed upon both these groups who together are responsible for the success of our Canadian enterprises. I have faith in Canadian labour. I believe if this were done there would be more Canadian leadership of our labour groups. This could not be considered unduly nationalistic; it is ordinary good business.

This equal knowledge of our competition will give both management and labour the increased determination which our Minister of Trade and Commerce has been pointing out is needed, and will also give them confidence in one another's goals and in one another's aims. It seems to me too much time has been wasted in this country in suspicion of one another's aims and much too little time concentrating on the effort needed in international competition, upon which one third of Canada's population depends for a livelihood.

Recently there has been increasing stringency in the demands upon their workers by East Germany and other communist countries. In the race for improved quality and increased quantity the people who actually work on the product are in control. Industrial workers in Canada are individually just as good Canadians as the members of this house, and every effort should be made by management and government to explain our problems to those who can do so much to assist us in solving them. In our democratic system Canadian workmen have the power, and with it the responsibility, to see that their leaders put Canadian interests first. The government's responsibility is to see that the way for this is cleared of the confusion and frustration of of international demands which may not apply to our Canadian situation.

[Mrs. Casselman.]

Further to this effort to learn about and understand others' problems, I should like to see some consideration given to the possibility of all members of parliament taking an educational tour of Canada within six months of their election to this house. The potential impact would be enormous. Many members come to this house excellently qualified to represent their own districts but without any idea of the equally important problems of other districts. The process of co-operation and compromise so essential at the federal level would be greatly facilitated. This may not be a new idea, because it comes to me from the files of history. Many generations ago Plato pointed out that knowledge distinguishes the true statesman from the false, as knowledge distinguishes the physician from the quack, and that education is indispensable to a good state.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I should like to deal with three matters which I consider to be of capital importance.

Before doing so, however, I would ask the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Casselman) who has just spoken, to forgive me if I do not agree with her and do not support the views she expressed in the first part of her speech.

We, on this side of the house, were a bit envious because until quite recently we did not have in our ranks a member of the fair sex. We are proud now to have among us the member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) who impresses the house by her charm no less than by her ability. I am convinced that, after the next election, we shall have more than one woman member on this side of the house.

The first matter I wish to deal with was mentioned by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) in his statement. I read very carefully the statement made by the minister about the census, and the changes he intended to make in questions 8 and 10. I also carefully read the dominion statistician's letter that the minister put on the official record. This letter shows the intention of the dominion statistician, Mr. Duffett, to rephrase certain questions that will be asked in the next census, and in particular, question 10 which will henceforth refer to the ethnic origin.

At first sight, the explanation does seem entirely satisfactory and acceptable to us on this side of the house. However, I must add that, before taking a final stand and voicing our opinion on the matter, we shall necessarily have to wait until the dominion statistician has rephrased those quotations and until the revised form is issued.

Meanwhile, I congratulate the minister for his statement, which managed to pull him out of a bad spot. The problem was the government's own doing. The government created this crisis. The government, and the government alone, is responsible for the situation in which it finds itself. This action gave rise to a general outcry not only in the province of Quebec but everywhere in Canada.

It gave rise to a shower of protests. Today, in the face of these mass protests, the government has decided to back down, to give up, to retreat and to restore things as they were.

This crisis, Mr. Speaker, had harmful effects on national unity. In fact, the decision announced by the minister, quoting the director of the dominion bureau of statistics, should have been taken at the very start of the trouble.

Indeed, the census is first of all a scientific procedure designed to give us a true picture of the people of Canada, to reveal the true composition of the people of this country.

And precisely because of the scientific purpose of the census, it should be left in the hands of experts in this field, instead of being subjected to government interference.

The dominion bureau of statistics had decided on its own to proceed with a poll in June 1959. To that end, a form was prepared and submitted to the people in the towns of Brantford and Joliette. It contained the same words, the same question and the same suggested answer; in short, it was entirely similar to that of the 1951 census.

The poll taken in the two communities I just mentioned did not, however, contain the word "Canadian" as the first item on the list. Since the D.B.S. is administered by the same experts as in 1959, we are led to believe that the change made after 1959, with regard to that question, is the result of some intervention or direct interference on the part of the government.

Mr. Pigeon: Tell us about Mr. St. Laurent.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, you heard, as we did, on several occasions, the interjections of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon).

Mr. Dupuis: And those of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay).

Mr. Denis: This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that we hear the cawing of those crows. You have been tolerant with them. I believe that it is now time that those hon. members be requested to keep quiet. If they have something to say, let them rise in their proper turn.

Mr. Speaker: It is true that it is against the standing orders to make interjections when another hon. member is speaking, even on a point of order. I recognize the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. The hon. member for St. Denis used an unparliamentary expression, when he spoke of two hon. members in terms which he should apply to himself.

Mr. Dupuis: You feel the cap fits you.

Mr. Chevrier: As I said, the poll in both towns did not contain the word "Canadian". Consequently, it was after the 1959 poll, and before the 1961 forms first came out that a change took place which could only come from one source, the government.

In putting an end to such interference and deciding to refer the matter to experts in this field, the government is only trying to get out of a mess of its own creation. However that experiment will cost the Canadian taxpayers no less than some $100,000, as new forms will have to be printed.

I must commend the minister for recognizing his error and his willingness to rectify it. I know, he will hardly expect me to commend him for having, together with his predecessor, the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) made this serious error which could endanger Canadian unity by depriving it of cultural diversity which is its essential factor.

May I hope that the minister will profit by that lesson and that from now on he will resort to expert advice. As a matter of fact, this was not the first of his mistakes. I recall that on one occasion he refused to accept a decision of the air transport commission, thus courting unnecessary trouble in this house and throughout the country. If he had followed the recommendations of experts in the matter, the government and the Conservative party would not have been out on a limb, as they were until yesterday.

I therefore say that, in future, the government will have to accept expert advice and take into greater consideration the history and traditions of this country which, according to what the Leader of the Opposition said on many occasions, may be summed up in these three words: "Unity without uniformity."

Before concluding my remarks on this matter, I should like to reply to those that I shall not call parrots, for I do not want to be impolite, but to the backbenchers who have constantly mentioned the name of Mr. St. Laurent.

What did Mr. St. Laurent do? I shall tell those hon. members: in 1951, there was only one question on ethnic origin. It was question 17: What is your origin? There was a choice of 18 answers. The Canadian origin, which, incidentally, is not an origin but a nationality, did not appear at all in question 17 in 1951. Here are the facts as they happened. Mr. St. Laurent or the government of the day was asked what should be done should an individual say: I have no origin, I prefer to say I am a Canadian. Mr. St. Laurent simply answered: There is an open space at the end of question 17; you may write: "Canadian origin".

But neither the former government nor Mr. St. Laurent have ever given instructions, as did this government, to place at the top of the list the term "Canadian origin".

I now come—

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Before the hon. member goes on to another matter, may I ask him a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, Mr. Speaker, provided that I am allowed more than 30 minutes and that the time taken by this question be deducted of my allotted period.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, I cannot agree to the request of the hon. member, unless the house gives its unanimous assent. Otherwise, the time taken by the questions would have to be part of the hon. member's allotted period.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, you will have to ask your question at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Martineau: I believe the hon. member has been give the consent of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: In that case, I shall listen to the hon. member.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member tell the house whether, in his opinion, the question concerning ethnic origin, as expressed yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is better than the one that was used in the 1951 census form?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I do not know whether it is better or as good. The point is that the government, by its interference, has changed the nature of the question.

Mr. Martineau: My question was addressed to the hon. member, and I expect an explicit answer.

Mr. Chevrier: I say that the government, by its interference has changed the nature of the question and has tried to confuse the distinction between nationality and ethnic origin.

Mr. Martineau: The question is of a scientific nature and I would like a scientific reply.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member would be good enough to put off his question until I have finished my speech, I shall have no objection whatever to it.

I shall now pass on to another aspect of the discussion, namely some of the statements made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech.

Ever since the beginning of this session, the government has kept tooting its horn about what it has done, about the bold measures it claims to have taken to meet the situation. It has been doing it before the house met again in January, and since then.

There have been repeated references to this by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, and yet the changes made in the budget for the current fiscal year show very clearly the government's failure to act in that regard.

In fact, the so-called emergency program was adopted by the house before the supplementary budget was introduced, but it had no effect whatsoever on the budget itself. As proof of this, let me briefly analyse the figures given to us by the minister. On the expenditure side, he had to add $100 million to his estimates of March 1960. Was this increase in the estimates designed to help the unemployed, to meet the present state of emergency? Not at all, Mr. Speaker.

As the house knows, this increase in expenditures is due to the increased deficit of the C.N.R., of the agricultural stabilization board, and to the one dollar per acre payment to western wheat producers.

If, therefore, the minister gave us an accurate picture of the financial situation of the government, the so-called special program adopted before the Christmas recess, will not cost a cent to the government during the current fiscal year.

It is the same with revenue. The Minister of Finance had to reduce by $200 million his estimated revenue for the current financial year. But why?

This revision is due first to the current recession, and then to an erroneous forecast on the part of the Minister of Finance. He made a mistake in his forecast by estimating a $12,000,000 surplus whereas, in fact, as he himself admitted, there will be a deficit of close to $300,000,000.

This means that the government, which claims to have done so much to fight unemployment at this time, is not even considering spending a red penny of its budget to straighten out the present economic situation and fight unemployment. There have been no special tax reductions during this fiscal year. The Minister of Finance still refuses to turn to the most important means of easing the economic situation, which are monetary and fiscal policies.

What is, therefore the government's policy? It consists in offering loans. Indeed, the government is specializing in loans; easier loans will be offered individuals towards the purchase of a house or for home improvements, loans are being offered to businesses, and subsidies to provinces for the building of technical schools. Loans will even be offered to universities. Yet, the Conservatives had promised to stop federal aid to education.

The program of the government before this session can then be summed up in three words: loans, more loans, and again more loans.

Mr. Grafftey: You voted for them.

Mr. Tremblay: You voted for taxes, and taxes and taxes.

Mr. Chevrier: It is obvious that because of those interruptions, and especially because of the new provisions of the standing orders, I will not be able to say all I would like to in the 30 minutes at my disposal. I will therefore revert to another point of my speech.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, we had a very remarkable performance on television not long ago by the Prime Minister of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: The Prime Minister delivered himself of quite a colourful oration. Everything was splendid in Canada, so he said; unemployment was not a problem in our country; there is no emergency; there is no recession. He does not even admit the existence of the recession. In any event, nobody is exercised about the recession in Washington. Instead of getting from the Prime Minister of this country a frank and fair appraisal of the economic situation as we find it and the proposals which the government intends to bring down to deal with it, we are told that everything is in ship-shape condition.

I have here some of these statements whereby the Prime Minister tried to divert attention once again from the subject of unemployment by stating that we had the highest employment ever at the present time in our country. But before I come to that, we had at the beginning of this speech a recital of the tremendous development projects consequent upon the national development policy of the Conservative government from one end of the country to the other. Here is a recitation province by province, region by region of all these projects. I take, for instance, what was said about the province of Quebec, and listen to this:

> Well, there 300 miles of railway have been built by private enterprise.

That statement is not accurate. There is only one railway of 360 miles built by private enterprise in the province of Quebec, and that is the Quebec North Shore Railway. It is 360 miles long and was opened on July 31, 1954, long before this government ever came into office. Then we have this statement:

> A new Mattagami branch is projected by the C.N.R. And it's worth noting this, that the total new railway construction under way in Canada to promote resource development exceeds that of the rest of North America.

With regard to the new Mattagami railroad, the resolution is on the order paper; it has not even been discussed, but the Prime Minister is blowing about it already. Not one word, however, is said about the 300 or 400 miles of railway built in the province of Quebec by the former administration, the branch lines from Barraute to Kiask falls, from Kiask falls to Beattyville, from Beattyville to Cache lake, from Cache lake to Chibougamau and to St. Felicien, practically 400 miles long. Not one word is said about that. However, I do not blame the Prime Minister for not mentioning it. What I do blame him for is making statements in his speech across the country that are not only inaccurate but untrue. Here is another example:

> We're doing something for the ports of Montreal and Quebec and the harbours elsewhere in the province are being expanded to meet the demands of expansion.

The plans and specifications for the development of the port of Montreal were announced long before this government came into office. They were announced by my predecessor, Hon. Mr. Marler, and in part put into effect before this government ever took office. It boils down to the old story which the Minister of Transport expressed very well the other day: "They build them, but we open them." That is about what it amounts to.

Then I come to another statement of the Prime Minister. He had been talking about unemployment in Canada and then he moved on to talk about unemployment in the United States. He said:

> Indeed, unemployment in Canada has been less in comparative terms than in the United States.

That statement is also untrue, and I intend to dispute it. I have here a statement which I have prepared and which is taken from the Canadian Statistical Review of December, 1960, and the survey of current business, United States department of commerce, December 1960, which indicate that at no time in the 11 months under consideration has the unemployment situation in the United States been worse than in Canada. On the contrary, it is just the reverse.

I would now like to put on Hansard, with the permission of the house, a statement entitled "Unemployment as the percentage of the labour force, seasonally adjusted, 1960", comparing the conditions in Canada with those of the United States, taken from the Canadian Statistical Review, December 1960, page S-3, and the survey of current business, December 1960, page S-11. This survey will indicate that for the first 11 months of 1960—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. member requests leave from the house to have this table printed in Hansard at this point. Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table referred to is as follows:]

Unemployment as a % of labour force

January	6.1	5.2
February	6.5	4.8
March	6.6	5.4

†Survey of Current Business, December 1960, page S-11.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There could, of course, be no objection to the hon. member putting on record any statement taken from any official Canadian government source. But so far as he is attempting to draw a comparison with figures—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has no right to make a speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have a right to indicate whether consent may be given to the portion of those figures being put on the record which are not from Canadian government sources but from United States government sources. I think the house should know a great deal more about the basis of comparison because the statement made by the hon. member is not in accordance with statements which have come from the United States in the last 48 hours. As I say, I have no objection to the hon. gentleman putting on the record any figures from Canadian government sources.

Mr. Chevrier: Since the minister has no objection and since I have shown whence the figures come, I simply want to indicate that these figures show that for the first 11 months of 1960 unemployment as a percentage of the labour force, after allowing for seasonal factors, averaged less than 5 per cent in the United States and that during the comparable period Canada's unemployment averaged 7 per cent of the labour force.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Chevrier: At no time during 1960 did the United States have as much unemployment in terms of its labour force as did Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is he saying that he has Canadian government figures which show the average unemployment in the first 11 months of 1960 to be 7 per cent of the labour force of Canada? There are no government figures which show that difference.

Mr. Chevrier: The government figures are here, taken from the Canadian Statistical Review, and during a comparable period they indicate that for the first 11 months Canada's unemployment averaged 7 per cent of the labour force. That is clearly what these figures say; that is what they indicate. In December, 1960, 8.2 per cent of our labour force was unemployed, or 528,000 people. It is true employment has increased over the 12-month period by 1.3 per cent, but nevertheless unemployment in December, 1960 is 30 per cent higher than it was a year ago.

Then we pass on to some more of these extraordinary statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Toward the end of his speech he complained very bitterly about those who exaggerate the problems in this country, those who criticize in opposition without offering any effective solution. If those hon. members who are here now were in the house the other day when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) spoke and put on record in Hansard the speech made by the Minister of Finance himself when he was in opposition, I would ask them this question: How could anybody have made the kind of statement which the Minister of Finance made then when the unemployment situation in Canada was a fraction of what it is at the present time? Moreover, the language used by the Minister of Finance at that time was far worse than that used by anyone sitting on this side of the house.

I have not time in which to deal with this matter more extensively but I do want to add one word with reference to this phrase in which the Prime Minister says we exaggerate and criticize in opposition. The Prime Minister or those who sit on the other side of the house must not have been listening—I will not say they must have been asleep—when the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and myself and so many others made submissions to the government which the Minister of Labour said he was going to study—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his time has expired.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did Your Honour take the interruption into account?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I took into account the agreement of the house and I have given the hon. member an extra three minutes. However, if the house is prepared to give unanimous leave for the hon. member to continue—

Very well, I recognize the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order. I understand from the Chair that the figures which I asked permission to table have not been accepted; they have been returned to me. I was under the impression that those figures had been accepted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The house agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Chevrier: I understood that the house agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There must be a misunderstanding. I understood that there was not unanimous consent. I will ask again whether there is unanimous consent and if there is I have no objection to the figures being put on record.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, it is a common practice in this house to give a member of parliament the right to put on record in Hansard tables of this nature, particularly when they are taken from government sources.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: To my mind, it is not so much a question of practice. The idea is that no document may be printed in Hansard unless unanimous consent is given by the house. Unless the house is prepared to say that there was unanimous consent, the Chair must consider that there was not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a most fatuous statement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What I sought to convey was that there is no objection to the printing of this table or any table when it contains figures drawn from Canadian government sources but I understand that the hon. member was seeking to add to his submission a series of figures drawn from the United States, it may be from an official publication—I think he indicated it may even be an official publication of the United States government. What I wish to draw to the attention of the house at this time was that the basis of comparison is not included in the scope of the tables. If the hon. gentleman chooses to put on record figures drawn from these United States sources and he is prepared to stand behind them, however, I think that the house would agree to give consent to those figures being printed, but this is not an agreement that these are figures which are capable of comparison.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the only problem the Chair has to decide is whether the table can be printed, because the hon. member was, of course, allowed to recite the table and put it on record in Hansard, accepting the figures as coming from a reliable source as far as he was concerned. The question was whether there was unanimous consent to their being printed at that particular point in the hon. gentleman's speech. If the house is prepared to say there was such unanimous consent that will be right now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the house would not withhold unanimous consent to a request made by the hon. member, with the proviso I have mentioned about the basis of comparison.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is not whether there is a reservation as to the content of the table but whether there is a unanimous consent to having the table printed. That is the only point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sure that the house will give unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then I record that there was unanimous consent and that the table should be printed at the point mentioned by the hon. member for Laurier in the course of his speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not believe it is the practice in this house for such a request to be formally put. The house indicates its consent in a general way. That has been the practice. It is not necessary, I take it, for the Speaker to put the motion formally.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the Chair has made the point very clear. If the Chair is putting the question more formally now it is because there was doubt as to whether or not the matter was clear previously. The incident is closed.

(Translation):

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, for the last 30 minutes, we have heard the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) criticize the policy of the Conservative government. Before I get down to the gist of the matter, I should like to single out certain remarks made by the hon. member about the decennial census, and most particularly about the statement made in the house yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees).

I thank my excellent friend, the hon. member for Laurier for the kind words he had for the government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, concerning the attitude taken on that matter. Had he confined his remarks to the congratulations he addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I think his comments would have been much more appreciated than the rest of his speech, because the latter part of his remarks clearly reveals the Liberal opposition's spite against the government's attitude, such spite being provoked by the fact that the Liberal opposition, wishing to follow its well known tradition of dividing in order to better rule, was deadly intent on making a political football of that census question.

It is indeed unfortunate for the election purposes of our friends opposite that this political football should have exploded, but it is certainly preferable for national unity that our country should be led by a government which, because it is anxious to find the truth and to achieve the purpose of that census, should have decided to consult experts on the matter, so that the formula submitted to our people might be one based on scientific and accurate data. I repeat it is unfortunate that our friends opposite should have wished to arouse public opinion about that matter and tried to resort to it for election purposes, but it is certainly desirable for national unity in Canada that the matter should have been settled along the lines suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker, these last few days, I have listened carefully and with a certain amount of surprise to the statements made by our hon. friends of the opposition about the steps suggested by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in the supplementary budget he introduced in the house in December last. That budget was prepared by the minister after lengthy studies of the economic circumstances prevailing across the country, and after detailed and toilsome consultations with financiers, industrialists and leading businessmen across the nation, as well as after consultation with representatives of the professions and labour organizations. That budget, so carefully prepared was well received generally across the country, and the opinion of our fellow citizens was reflected in the many editorials we have read both in our daily newspapers and in our weeklies and which, for the most part, commended the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker, that budget was not easy to prepare, because it had to include short term provisions in order to maintain the present momentum of the Canadian economy. Long term provisions had also to be introduced, whose benefits will be felt in years to come.

On the other hand, care had to be taken not to indulge in those ultra-socialistic excesses recommended by the Liberal party in the platform it submitted to its followers at its recent rally, the result of which would be to destroy our economy.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear enough that this budget was studied carefully by the members of the opposition, and it is clear enough also that they approve it in great part, and for many reasons.

I should like to say first that the congress committee established to study measures to meet the unemployment situation existing among our mighty neighbours to the south, the American people, suggested to the U.S. authorities measures identical to those we have considered ourselves to help the unemployed of this country.

If those measures which we adopted without any prior consultation with our neighbours to the south meet their approval, it is a sufficiently clear indication that they are efficient to some degree and that they are considered as serious by people who know about such things.

Another thing makes us believe that our friends opposite are probably not too sincere when they criticize the measures contained in the budget. Several of those measures are part of the very program announced by the Liberals during their recent convention here in Ottawa. As a matter of fact, their measures are copied from the measures mentioned in the speech from the throne and in the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance.

You heard the Liberals during their convention talk about increased pensions to veterans and about a program of urban re-development. Their supporters promised tax reductions and accelerated depreciations in order to attract the industry in the underdeveloped sectors of the nation. Those are measures already mentioned in the speech from the throne and in the budget of the Minister of Finance, measures which were criticized by our friends opposite, but which they adopted yet with enthusiasm during their recent convention. It is not therefore inconsistent to say that the so-called dynamic and imaginative measures which were to change the concept of Canadian political thinking and which the Liberals announced with great publicity are copied from the suggestions put forward by the Conservative government and are simply a plagiary of the thinking of the leaders of this party.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberals, power thirsty and anxious to get votes at any price, have put forward many other measures during their convention, measures which on the one hand are ultra-socialist—in order to please the left wing of their party—and on the other hand, measures of an inflationary nature, and lastly economic measures which, if adopted, would increase the annual budget deficit of the nation to over $1 billion. However, there is one thing we must realize: it is impossible to over-increase expenditures while reducing revenues and expect anything but fantastic deficits.

Since I accuse the Liberals of having plagiarized measures put forward by the Conservative government, it must be said also that they have copied the program announced in this house by the right hon. Prime Minister when he said that a royal commission would be established to study the national health situation. In fact the very same Liberals outlined in high sounding words a health insurance plan which was only a repetition of the statement made in this house by the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this national defence policy announced by the Liberals during their recent convention. As you know, they long have accused this government of having a wrong defence policy. They accuse the government of not recognizing the basic principles which should govern the defence of our country. They had announced long ago that they had sensational ideas concerning defence, which were really to change the concept of public opinion on that question. We therefore all expected with interest some announcement with regard to such steps, and it was a matter of general surprise to find that the Liberal defence policy consisted in having no defence at all.

The speech of the hon. Leader of the Opposition was received with applause on one side and by an eloquent silence on the other. It was therefore in no way surprising that some American journalists did not hesitate to suggest a royal commission of psychiatrists to investigate the state of mind of Liberal leaders who could imagine such a dangerous defence policy. And it is indeed dangerous, because such a defence policy would leave our country completely defenceless against any potential attack by an enemy.

It is hardly surprising that other journalists should state that in the United States people did not believe that Canadians were foolish enough to pay serious attention to statements by people whose aim is to form the government of this country one day, more particularly as regards statements of defence policies and theories as fantastic as those advocated during the recent Liberal rally.

We must conclude from all that, that the recent Liberal convention was a resounding failure, and we believe that our hon. friends opposite will have to make a great effort if they want to regain the confidence of responsible citizens, who are very much disappointed by what happened during that rally which was to change and revolutionize everything.

Mr. Gerard Filion of Le Devoir gave a good summary of Canadian opinion on this matter in Saturday's issue, dated January 21, where he said:

> The Liberal party has just wound up an important meeting in Ottawa. It has brought up a program which, obviously, will serve as the theme for the general elections of 1962. We find in it some good, less good, and definitely bad things.

The good things, Mr. Speaker, are those which have been copied out of the Conservative program; the less good things are those—

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I apologize for interrupting my hon. friend. He said he was reading an article from Le Devoir and, unless I am mistaken, I think he is adding his own interpretation to that article. In my opinion, he should tell us whether he is reading the article textually or whether he is adding to it his own impressions.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, allow me to be more explicit.

Some hon. Members: Order. This is not a point of order.

Mr. Bourget: This is very important, for the minister may give us to understand that he is reading textually from Mr. Filion's article in Le Devoir. He should read separately the article first, and then add his own remarks.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, in reply to that interjection, I must admit the hon. member for Levis is right. I should have mentioned that Mr. Filion's article ended after the sentence: "We find in it some good, less good and definitely bad things", and that my interpretation began when I said that those good things are those which have been copied from the Conservative party's program; that the less good things are those ultra-socialistic suggestions recommending extravagant expenses; and that the bad things are those which clearly tend to the left, an unfortunate tendency of the present leaders of that party, which was once great but which now seems to have forgotten the principles of Laurier and other Liberal leaders who followed him.

And today, we find that our friends opposite have forgotten none of those mistakes which caused them to be swept out of office on June 10, 1957. And we find also that they have learned nothing. I think I am justified in saying that the Canadian people will not, for a long time, trust them once again as they did for 22 years.

Mr. Bourget: You seem to forget very easily the by-election in Labelle.

Mr. Pigeon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Levis is not entitled to speak from his seat.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I think it is five o'clock. May I resume my remarks at eight o'clock?

[Mr. Sevigny.]

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chown (for Mr. Woolliams) for the second reading of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that when this matter was up for debate initially a week ago, because of the time limit I had the opportunity to say just a few sentences. I should like to make a few other brief comments about the bill before us to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company.

When private bills such as this, which originate in the Senate, come before us we usually look to the debates in the other place and to the proceedings of the committees to which such bills are referred, for guidance as it were, or for information about the structure of the particular company, its objectives, its finances and all of the other details with which we would be concerned. Unfortunately, in this instance we are deprived of the opportunity of discovering what sort of discussion took place in the committee on transport and communication of the Senate because no verbatim report of the proceedings was kept there.

In reviewing the debate on second reading in the other place we find that the Hon. Senator Thorvaldson, who sponsored the bill and who moved the second reading of it, confined his introductory remarks to the reading of a press release issued by the petitioning company, and which was rather sparse in the information which it gave to the long range or short range effects which would flow from the incorporation of this company. I feel that the worst feature, perhaps, of this is the lack of a verbatim report of the Senate transport and communications committee. This fact does not give us a full opportunity to secure the information which members of that committee gleaned from the representatives who appeared before it.

I did undertake, as I am sure the hon. members did, to discover what I could by means of a telephone conversation with the committee branch of the other place. There were minutes kept of the proceedings, I give this as background information to indicate that this was not a bill about which there was unanimity and to which there was opposition in the committee of the other place. This fact should make it incumbent on us to search the bill and ascertain its effects even more assiduously than we might normally. There was a Mr. Gordon Blair, a local solicitor, who appeared for the petitioners and who, I am given to understand, carried most of the discussion in the committee of the other place. He was supported in his stand by Mr. Kenneth H. Burgess, who is vice president of Hudson Bay Oil and Gas and by Mr. Bannicke.

There were people who appeared before the committee of the other place opposing this particular bill, and those people were representatives of the Pembina company to which my friend from Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) made rather extensive references when he spoke on the bill a week ago. Appearing for the Pembina people were Mr. James Scott, who I understand is president of the company, Mr. Charles Crawford and Mr. A. Douglas Arnott. I believe the fact that there were representatives of other concerns who appeared before this committee opposing the passage of the bill should, even more than other circumstances, impress upon the members the necessity for looking carefully at this bill before we decide whether to give it second reading and refer it to our committee. The members of this committee could engage in an intimate discussion with the representatives of the Aurora company and others who may want to appear in order to determine the full effects which might flow from the establishment of this particular company.

In this regard, I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown), who introduced the bill and moved second reading on behalf of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), did a fairly commendable job of explaining, from his point of view, the purposes of the petitioners. We are indebted to a far greater degree, I believe, to the hon. member for Vancouver East and to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith), both of whom spoke on the bill a week ago and gave far more details of the intricacies of the corporate structures of these major companies who are interested in this matter. Beyond this, the house is not too well informed as to the full effects that would flow from the passage of this bill.

In this connection, I should like to refer briefly to a passage in the speech from the throne, without reading it. As you recall, Mr. Speaker, there was a very forthright reference to the fact that steps would be taken to encourage Canadian control of corporations in this country. The so-called baby budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) just prior to the Christmas recess also had this theme of Canadianism, as it were, interwoven throughout. One would assume that the ideal of Canada for Canadians was a part of government policy, and I think a commendable part. For many years we have been driven along the road toward foreign ownership and domination of our economy. However, the particular bill before us is not compatible with that ideal of Canadianism which we all agree should be developed in this nation.

Apart from the so-called Canada for Canadians theme which we are trying to promote, apart from the fact that Aurora is in fact dominated by United States interests, as was made quite clear by the hon. member for Vancouver East and by the hon. member for Winnipeg South when he introduced the bill, there is another facet of this particular bill which makes it somewhat reminiscent of that scandalous pipe line discussion we had a few years ago. I might say that my statement is the result of the scanty examination I have been able to give the bill, and without benefit of consultation with the individual petitioners because of the failure of the Senate to provide us with the information in a committee report. I should like to make a brief reference to Hansard in this regard and read some of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South which will illustrate what I mean. I am quoting from page 1127 of Hansard of January 17, where I find these words:

> The condensate would be delivered through the proposed federal company across the international boundary to an extension of Continental Pipe Line Company's system which would be built from Cut Bank, Montana.

I point out that the hon. member is referring to a specific by-product which is involved here, and about which I shall have something to say later on. This reference relates to the actual connections, and he goes on to say:

> The condensate would be delivered through Continental Pipe Line's system south to a connection with the Platte pipe line system in Wyoming and through this system and its many connections it would gain access to refining centres in the Rocky mountains and mid-continent areas of the United States which are at present not served by Canadian crude. In the early years of the project it is anticipated that the throughput would be of the order of 11,000 to 15,000 barrels per day.

I have had occasion to look at a map which I have here, and on which are shown some of the pipe lines in existence both here and in the United States, and I should like to make a particular reference to the system envisaged in this bill. I re-read the words found at page 1127 of Hansard:

> The condensate would be delivered through Continental Pipe Line's system south to a connection with the Platte pipe line system in Wyoming and through this system and its many connections it would gain access to refining centres—

And so on. I would point out that on looking at this map I find that the Platte pipe line system has a direct connection and that one of its chief functions is that of transporting these commodities or these materials to the Chicago market which is the same market sought by Pembina. Incidentally, I might say at this point that I understand that a plan or arrangement between Pembina and the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, who own another pipe line in the United States, has recently been consummated and accordingly these parties, or Pembina particularly, will be appearing before the Alberta conservation board on February 7 for a hearing in this regard.

From the intent of this company we find that what they are after is the Chicago market, the same market as that which is being sought and, if today's news is any indication, has been established or the same market that Pembina is also in the process of working towards. When we compare the 11,000 to 15,000 barrels of Aurora with the 70,000 to 75,000 barrels of Pembina, we wonder just what is going on and whether this is not another attempt on the part of our friends in the oil industry, those whom the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) before he became prime minister labelled as buccaneers, to destroy our Canadian participation by Canadian companies through milking the cream of the crop, as it were, and moving into the self-same market, namely the Chicago market in a quicker way, with less difficulty and not taking all the products.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South indicated, as did the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) and the hon. member for Vancouver East, that there are a number of by-products. They mentioned propane, butane, and sulphur which is intermingled with them in the condensate. The Pembina system, through their relationships with Standard Oil and their market, is geared to a comingled system, or one that will fully use and transport all of these by-products, namely the condensate, propane, butane and everything else and will use them all whereas Aurora's approach, as is evidenced by the information which I just read from Hansard given by the hon. member for Winnipeg South and others who have spoken in this debate, and sole concern at the moment is to deal only with the condensate and not with the others; to leave them out in the cold, as it were and to concentrate its activities in seeking for the cream and, as I said, because of their hook-up with the other system, transporting these to the Chicago market in the hope that by skimming off the cream they will end up with the lion's share of the market while the other company, operating decently and taking them all, will be left behind.

There is another bit of information which I understand—

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. member permit a question just before he leaves that point?

Mr. Howard: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Where does the hon. member get this figure of 70,000 barrels per day? I ask that question because it is at variance with the information I get as to the evidence before the Alberta board.

Mr. Howard: If my hon. friend will allow me to look for a moment in Hansard in order to pick it out from the information given I shall be glad to do so. It was placed on the record by the hon. member for Vancouver East. It was taken from a study by Stevenson and Kellogg, a management consultant firm. I am referring only to Hansard, not to the Stevenson and Kellogg report and I hope my hon. friend will realize that fact. I am reading from the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver East as reported on page 1129 of Hansard, where he quotes the Stevenson and Kellogg report at one point as follows:

—in western Canada there was a potential utilization of between 20,000 and 40,000 barrels of these liquid gas by-products per day, but that there would still be a surplus of some 70,000 barrels per day.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could clarify that matter a bit by another question. I think the hon. member will agree that the Stevenson and Kellogg report is one item of evidence before the Alberta board on an extremely controversial point where there is a wide variation in the evidence as to the amount available for export. There are two or three others.

Mr. Howard: Yes. As the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) has pointed out, it may well be a controversial point before the Alberta board. I am quite sure that you, Mr. Speaker, having a discerning eye, will be able to see the hon. member for Ottawa West if he rises and puts forward this information in a definite way rather than by way of query. I think perhaps that would be the better way in which to do it.

If I may say so, this discussion points up the difficult situation in which we find ourselves because of the failure of the Senate committee to keep proper records of what it was doing in this regard. Perhaps if it did so we would have this information from the mouths of company officials themselves and those who passed it. But as the situation stands, to a degree we are obliged to resort to a report by Stevenson and Kellogg, what a group of engineers in Canada said when they studied this question and so on. The members of this house are put in an extremely awkward position. This is the information that I have. I must accept it as factual unless it is shown to be otherwise because it is the only information we have available.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I wonder whether I might ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Howard: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I should like to ask if the hon. member would perhaps agree with me—and this is the point I attempted to make—that this is the advantage of having this matter in committee where this information can be produced and examined?

Mr. Howard: I would not agree with it at all because there are other factors than that involved. What the hon. member is asking us in effect to do is to buy a pig in a poke and to say, let us give it second reading—which is endorsation in principle—and then we will find out what it is all about. I am one of those strange types who believe in finding out what it is all about before we decide to do something. That is one of the reasons why it is necessary to discuss now on second reading what would lead us to this end.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): What about third reading?

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend asks, what about third reading? I am sure he knows full well, especially now that Your Honour is presiding for a while, that debate on third reading is more restricted and confined than that on second reading. This has been the ruling given on a number of occasions.

I would agree with the hon. member for Calgary South that perhaps what we should do is to check the Senate up and express the hope that it would keep proper records of what committees do, especially in connection with a controversial matter such as this one about which witnesses appeared before the transport and communications committee in favour of the bill and opposed it. Perhaps we would then be in a better position to assess the facts. But to be asked to give blanket endorsation to something in the hope that we shall find out more about it later on is putting the cart before the horse. We might as well be debating the divorce bills which were allowed to stand a while ago.

There is one other point which might be cleared up. Although the hon. member for Calgary South is now fairly well restricted from debating the issue, with his extensive knowledge in this field he may perhaps be able, by way of question, to clear up this matter. My understanding is this, and may I say that I am exhibiting my ignorance in this field when I say it. I understand that Aurora will be dealing only with condensate or what is known as condensate and as that is not classified as a gas, accordingly there is no need for it to appear before the Alberta conservation board. That is what I have been given to understand; I do not know whether it is factual information. However, there is on the record information to the effect that the company in fact has already appeared before the Alberta conservation board in any event. But that was one piece of information I was given, that it is not really necessary for them to do this because they are only dealing with one of the by-products rather than the whole range.

As I say, to a great extent we are devoid of factual information with regard to this matter. Private matters such as this, which have a great effect on the public and on the economy, should be seriously considered. I submit that these things should be considered before we give a bill second reading, and not discovered afterwards. Because we do not have this information available from its usual source—that is the Senate committee; and by that I am not in the least implying that the Senate is in any way inefficient in this regard, but we should have this information—I think we should preserve to the fullest extent possible our Canadian interest in this regard and have an opportunity to look further into this matter.

In order to ensure that everyone concerned has the fullest possible opportunity to look into the effects of this bill I think we should not give second reading to it without more detailed study and consideration, and I do not think the bill should be given second reading at this particular time.

In order that all of us may have the opportunity of investigating the full effects of this bill before we give it second reading, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman), that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, we have just witnessed a demonstration of some of the measures that may be used if the new party or the C.C.F. ever came to power, a new idea of closure. The last time this subject was debated hon. members of that group indicated that they wanted more information on the subject, that they needed certain particulars dealing with the export of the product concerned, yet today they move to close the debate so that it could not be re-opened in this house. Is that a proper procedure to adopt? Is that the way to obtain further information on the subject? Is it wise to attempt to banish this measure from the House of Commons? If that is the type of thing hon. gentlemen of that group would do if they were in power I certainly would not like it and I know that many other Canadians also would object.

This bill seeks to incorporate the Aurora Pipe Line Company which would then apply to the national energy board for permission to export condensates. Perhaps no hon. member is able to give all the details sought by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) but that hon. gentleman after saying that he wanted exact details now seeks to close the debate. If this measure is passed it can go to a committee where the hon. gentleman may ask questions on every particular to his heart's content.

Last Tuesday the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) set out quite clearly the percentage of Canadian ownership of the company and its exact makeup. Certainly that question should be answered in the minds of the hon. members of the C.C.F. group.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown) in his opening remarks in introducing this bill stated that the Aurora Pipe Line Company would export its product into an area where no Canadian crude oil or condensates are now going. He mentioned that Pembina Pipe Line Limited, a large company in western Canada owned by the Foothills Company of western Alberta actually planned to build a pipe line with a potential capacity of exporting 100,000 barrels a day and an estimated export of 70,000 to 75,000 barrels a day. Aurora Pipe Line Company wishes to build a line 41 miles long to the United States border. Running at full capacity the company feels it would be able to potentially export only 31,000 barrels a day with an estimated export of 11,000 barrels a day.

Those who are afraid that this pipe line is going to put everyone else out of business should closely examine the figures relating to total capacity. The export would be limited by the size of the pipe line of the company. In any case it seems to me that Pembina would go ahead and build their line and if Aurora thought it was feasible to build their line for an export of 11,000 barrels a day they would proceed to do so.

With the expanded exportation of natural gas greater amounts of condensates are becoming available. Soon or later we are going to have a surplus of this product in Alberta if we have not one already. Certainly two oil lines provide a greater area in which we can export these products to United States markets. I fail to see why there is so much objection to this on the part of some hon. gentlemen in this house.

The Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited have carried on in the past and will continue to carry on considerable exploration work in Alberta and elsewhere in western Canada. They have spent quite a bit of money in this respect. A great many Canadians are employed by this oil company and with the greater markets that would be available more Canadians would be employed in producing these by-products of natural gas. I see no objection to this and I hope other hon. members do not.

Some hon. members are bothered by the lack of full details. We have established a national energy board to look into the questions of Canadian ownership in these companies, the feasibility of the markets the companies wish to develop and explore and whether the product can be made readily available without injuring established pipe line companies and so forth. Certainly we should allow the energy board to do the job for which it was established.

Even after they have been approved by the Alberta conservation board they have to go before the energy board, and therefore all that this bill is doing is permitting this company to become incorporated. Certainly the more companies that are incorporated the greater chances we have of exporting more of a given product. That is the ultimate aim of every Alberta member here and I hope it is the aim of every hon. member.

We want to export more of these by-products that are becoming available with the export of natural gas because, if we do not export them, they will pile up, become surplus, and be of practically no value at all. Now that we have done away with this new form of closure, I urge all hon. members to support this measure and let it pass.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), many of us in this house are not authorities on every subject that comes before the house.

Mr. Peters: That is your misfortune. Don't blame the hon. member for Skeena for being so smart.

Mr. Brunsden: Regardless of whether the subject is unemployment, housing, industry, trade or finance, from the far corner of the house comes a long drawn out, argumentative, discussion as to what this government should do.

With respect to this particular bill, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I live, along with my friend from Acadia, in the heart of the oil country of Canada. I am a little older than the hon. member for Acadia, and I have seen the oil industry grow from infancy in southern Alberta. Never having had enough money to become interested financially I am not an authority on oil, but I do know that in Alberta, yes in every province of Canada, and in this house, we speak constantly of the need for wider markets for Canadian products. We are assured by our authorities in the oil industry—and there are one or two of them in this house—that we have ample supplies of gas and oil in our prairie region to take care of all the needs of Canada for many years to come.

We heard today something of the languishing coal industry in Canada. Coal no longer is a prime commodity, and with the tremendous development in nuclear research there could be a day in the future when gas and oil could be in a position somewhat comparable to coal today. If we have this valuable product available for a market, if we have a market available for the product, it seems to me to be only common sense to embrace now that market and increase and enhance our marketing position.

I am not concerned about the apparent dispute between supplying eastern Canada and parts of the United States. I believe our reserves will supply both. Certainly, so far as this bill is concerned, it should be adopted and work should proceed.

Here is an industry which each year attracts more and more men to it. In my own little town of Brooks I would say that 20 per cent of the enhanced population of the last few years directly or indirectly are engaged in this industry. These people draw wages; they buy food; they buy necessities, and every time you develop a new outlet for gas and oil you are improving the employment and trade position of western Canada.

But my friend from Skeena seems to be quite concerned about whether or not this company may run away with something. My hon. friend from Acadia mentioned the national energy board. We recall the discussion on that board in this house; we recall the establishment of that board. It might assist the hon. member for Skeena if I placed on Hansard clause 5 of Bill No. S-2, which reads:

> The company shall have all the powers, privileges and immunities conferred by, and be subject to all the limitations, liabilities and provisions of the National Energy Board Act, and any other general legislation relating to pipe lines enacted by parliament with respect to the transmission and transportation of oil and other liquid hydrocarbons.

The national energy board reports to parliament. There is the safeguard for the people of Canada with respect to the operation of this particular company after incorporation, and it seems to me that that should be sufficient for all of us.

May I call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Peters: I heard the hon. member call it six o'clock. If that is not the wish of his friends I should like to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not six o'clock. Unless there is unanimous consent to call it six o'clock, I cannot call it six o'clock. Do I understand the hon. member for Medicine Hat has finished his remarks?

Mr. Brunsden: No; I was deceived by the clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that I shall call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

THE BUDGET

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

[Mr. Brunsden.]

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, since the house resumed its sittings we have all heard the long concert of lamentations on the part of speakers from the official opposition concerning the state of the economy. We have heard speaker after speaker rise from his seat and blame the government for all the sins and omissions which may exist in our economy and for all the ills and troubles which may afflict this country. When we listen to these hon. members we have the impression that all that is happening has been caused by the government and that government actions alone are responsible for the conditions which afflict certain sectors of our economy. The fact that what is happening in our nation is provoked by a period of economic readjustment which prevails throughout the world and by the effects of automation which have deeply influenced the industries of our nation is ignored and, as I said before, the government is blamed for everything and the cause of all that is happening is not sought elsewhere. Yet the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) denies that this is so and as recently as January 20 he said, as found on page 1271 of Hansard:

> I know quite well... that in a mixed economy with the private sector quite rightly being the most important sector of the economy, the government alone cannot and should not be asked to ensure full employment. This depends on the work, energy and initiative of the citizens and on an association of all the economic elements in our society, whose co-operation with government and whose vigour and enterprise on their own are essential if we are going to have full employment in this country. There is no doubt about that. There has to be this kind of co-operation before the government can be blamed for the inadequacies of its policies.

In spite of this affirmation on the part of their leader, especially in spite of the fact, as I have said before, that the measures adopted by the government in order to reduce the unemployment that does exist in certain sectors of our economy are similar to the measures adopted by the committee of congress which advises United States leaders concerning the question of economic stimulation; in spite of the fact that the measures which we re-introduced in the speech from the throne and which are contained in the preliminary budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), and which were copied by the Liberals during their recent rally, you will nevertheless during the weeks and months to come see the Liberals rise one after the other, whether it be in this house or when they are making speeches throughout the nation or speaking over radio or television, and talk about unemployment and blame the present government for all that is happening in the nation.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, these last few weeks I said many times across the country and I want to repeat it again in this house that, in talking so often of winter unemployment, hardships and poverty, in misrepresenting the economic situation which after all is extremely advantageous to the great majority of our citizens, in repeating that this country is on the road to ruin, in fostering a climate of pessimism, our friends opposite, and the official Liberal opposition in particular, are creating more unemployment and hardship in this country.

In fact, we can already see in the various provinces of this country, industries setting aside expansion plans as a result of such gloomy speeches, because they are worried about the future.

In the business field, we heard about slowdowns and lay-offs because management is influenced by this atmosphere of gloom and doom which the Liberals both in this house and outside, have been spreading across the country.

An hon. Member: Quite true.

Mr. Sevigny: There may be people who would be willing to make certain necessary expenditures for their business or their family's welfare, but they are worried about the future and decide instead to cut down expenditures, thus depriving the nation of a buying power that could help reduce the number of unemployed.

The preaching of gloom and doom which is an integral part of our Liberal opponents' policy and which they threaten to continue is extremely harmful to the interests of the nation. If it goes on, the results may well be beyond repair.

Mr. Speaker, our friends in the Liberal opposition are waging an ideological war against the Canadian people. It is not a new war; it is based on psychological arguments that have already been used in this century, with disastrous and even fatal results, on several instances.

Thus, in exploiting the misery and distress which prevailed in their countries, Mussolini and Hitler managed to gain power and to impose upon the Italian and German peoples their dictatorial ideology. Finally—and that is a sad story that everyone knows—those two men put the world to fire and sword, and drove democracy as we know it to the brink of ruin.

Today, we see another ideology, that of the communists, spreading all over the world, through the exploitation of poverty, misery and unemployment. It is among those who suffer that communism is gaining ground.

Of course I am not accusing my friends opposite, whom I respect and like, and who have often contributed in the past to the development of our nation, of necessarily and wilfully playing into the hands of the communists. However, through their usual lack of foresight, and perhaps also because they are the victims of their desire to return to office, they have been behaving in such a way, with that policy of gloom which they are spreading across the country as to play into the hands of those communist adventurers who seek to get a foothold in this country and who, if successful, will certainly cause as much harm in this country as in every country where they have managed to spread their doctrine and gain control of the government.

Consequently, even if it is sensible to make some constructive criticism and to suggest methods which might help the workers in this country find jobs, I think it is a bad thing to speak constantly of unemployment and distress, as the members of the Liberal opposition are doing, because unemployment is aggravated by that very fact, and results in greater hardship.

In some quarters, it might be considered that such talk is efficient political manoeuvring. Unfortunately, the method is detrimental to national economy and certainly does not rouse in the Canadian people the respect which the Liberal opposition wants. And I am convinced that such practice will not succeed in earning for our friends opposite the people's trust which they seem to seek by every possible means.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to say a few words on a certain policy which was announced by our hon. friends from the Liberal party during their recent rally. I refer in this instance, to the resolutions which have been passed in the field of education. I really wonder if the Liberals honestly think they can convince the Canadian people that it is just and reasonable for the federal government to interfere in this field of education which is exclusively a provincial matter.

No wonder that following resolutions moved at that convention, we could read in the various newspapers of this country and more paricularly in Le Devoir of Thursday, January 12, 1961, an article from which I will quote two excerpts:

> The autonomists, if there were any among the delegates, must have received quite a jolt Tuesday night when the report of the Liberal convention committee on education was adopted. The party advances more and more deliberately and deeply on the road of federal interference in the field of education and of assistance to education. It must be said that it is rather surprising and painful to see that the resolutions contained in the report have been adopted without a single voice being raised among the 2,000 delegates to point out the danger of the policy stated in that document. In fact, the vote on the report followed three long speeches, one of which was made by Mr. Lionel Chevrier; the other interventions were also favourable.

For a man concerned about provincial autonomy and the spirit or even the letter of the constitution, as interpreted by the most competent courts, it is extremely difficult to approve, even on grounds of national emergency, the principles of the Liberal convention resolution. To recognize the principles of this report is like putting dynamite in our constitutional structure and setting fire to the fuse at the same time to make it explode. The Liberal party declared itself in favour of a mass offensive against provincial exclusiveness in the field of education. No other conclusion can be drawn.

This article which I just read and which was written by Mr. Clement Brown, indicates clearly the state of mind of all those who followed the activities of the Liberal party during its recent convention and who, like us, are shocked at this centralizing attitude on the part of the Liberals. They should have learned something from the experience of these recent years but it seems that far from learning anything—as I said previously in my speech—they did not forget aything and did not learn anything either.

It is evident that this centralizing philosophy of our opponents is in direct opposition to our own policy which insists on the respect of provincial rights and on the safeguard of the confederation agreement.

It was rather hard, Mr. Speaker, to find a solution to that problem of assistance to our universities. Are we going to start once again another similar debate? Are we going to let a Liberal group infringe upon the rights of the provinces in the field of education and restrict their rights in the field of primary education, which after all is what the Liberals suggested in the resolutions adopted at their recent convention.

Mr. Speaker, I think that my time has expired and I resume my seat.

(Text):

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my remarks by quoting the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his speech when he presented his baby budget to this house last December as reported at page 1015 of Hansard:

The government has its sphere of responsibility; the citizen has his.

No words could have greater truth; no words could possibly be less disputed by any party in this house. To begin in a rather philosophical mood, may I say that this is the problem that is facing every government in every part of the world. Every government has to face the problem of freedom and efficiency. Freedom without efficiency may well create anarchy and chaos. It may mean freedom to be unemployed; it may mean freedom to be without education or opportunities; proper housing and so on. On the other hand, efficiency without freedom may mean that a man has lost his most precious possessions, namely that of initiative and that of personal opinion. Hence every government seeks to find a place between and a balance.

I would suggest to this house humbly tonight that we on the North American continent have not had to find this balance and that we have not had to face the stark reality of thinking dynamically about government since the second world war. This is the situation largely because prosperity has been handed to us on a silver platter. We have been able to have freedom and not to worry too much about efficiency simply because after the second world war the world sought our products. We were in a position of advantage, and not until the last few years has this position been in any way endangered.

The United States of America has had a similar advantage. Hence I would suggest tonight that this continuous concern about whether the United States unemployment is higher than that of Canada really has little relevancy. I would suggest tonight that neither of these nations is in a position to add much in connection with this problem of deciding what kind of government activity Canada needs.

A United Nations survey declared a short time ago that Canada and the United States are the only two nations in the world with a high economy which are unable to solve the problem of unemployment. I think this is a significant statement which makes somewhat unreal the great deal of concern we have had expressed over the last couple of days in connection with comparisons with the United States. It appears that we are both in the same boat and that neither country has come to grips with this problem. I believe it is we who are out of step with other nations in the world that have found solutions to unemployment because, since the second world war, we have not been driven to thinking and re-thinking our position, we have not sought these same solutions.

Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) spoke truly when he said that the government has its sphere of responsibilities.

I would ask tonight whether we have stopped thinking dynamically about the possibilities and the flexibilities of our democratic system in dealing with our economy in the twentieth century? Have we indeed reverted to the 1930's belief that government cannot really do very much? If we accept as a slogan, at least on the government side, that prosperity is just around the corner, that all we have to do is to bolster confidence in the status quo, "Prosperity is just around the corner" might be called the slogan of the Hoover administration and perhaps the epitaph of the present administration.

We have been told that full employment is some kind of Elysian field, that Canadians are to be deprived from entering into it at least on this side of the grave, and Canadians have no right to expect that the government can provide full employment. Let us look a little bit further than the North American continent. Let us look at Norway, where in the 1930's there was 38.9 per cent of the working force idle, but today Norway accepts full employment as the basis of its economic system. It is quite clear that it is the duty of the state to ensure that full employment be obtained.

If you want to search in other directions, look at the commonwealth countries. In New Zealand—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Look at Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pitman: Look at the full employment in New Zealand since 1957. There full employment is looked upon as the basis of national economy.

In Canada we expect to be erecting a model of democracy. Indeed our system of unemployment insurance gave us to believe that we did have some security in the area of employment. But instead of providing insurance for the unemployed we should have put more imagination into providing full employment. Unemployment insurance, indeed, only works properly in Canada under a full employment system. So today we have the irony that whereas other nations see their gross national product going up 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 or even 10 per cent, ours is lagging at 2 per cent. Indeed when related to the population growth it is going down and has not increased during the last three years.

While other nations expand and grow, Canada has paid out $415 million in unemployment relief; we are paying out millions of dollars in local welfare; we are losing millions of dollars in revenue in unpaid income taxes; we are losing millions of dollars in revenue in unpaid municipal taxes, and we are losing billions of dollars in productivity. What does all this capital produce? It produces nothing. It simply allows men to subsist rather than serve the community.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Pitman: I certainly would.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Has the hon. member figured out what Saskatchewan has lost in terms of at least the population that has left that province because of the socialist-type government's failure to create jobs in that province?

Mr. Pitman: Yes, I read the article in the Globe and Mail this morning.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am not referring to the article in the Globe and Mail. I asked you a question.

Mr. Pitman: I think if the hon. member would look at the situation in Saskatchewan he might well find the reasons for this change.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I was born and raised in Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: We can't help it.

Mr. Pitman: Indeed, I think the economy has done very well in certain of its sectors.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): And half of the citizens of Alberta were born and raised in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pitman: The government has indicated that today there are more people at work than ever before. I suggest, rather, that there are more people in mental hospitals and more in jails as well.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): They have to go to Alberta to find work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. members that they cannot interrupt the member who has the floor unless they have obtained prior permission to do so.

Mr. Pitman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the government will not wish to take the responsibility for this. But what we are really saying is that there are simply more people who need employment. Many of us on this side of the house looked to the Minister of Finance to reverse this trend. We looked to the ministry as a whole over the last three months to come forth with solutions. In many cases I think they have made an attempt to reverse this situation. I speak particularly of the legislation with regard to loans to small businesses.

Here indeed something has been done which has benefited certainly the Peterborough area. I am hoping that when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) brings down his legislation it will deal dynamically with that sector of our economy as well, because perhaps one of the things we have forgotten is that farm income has been going down over the last ten years. Farms which once supported three or four young men now only support one, especially when a farm area is near an urban area, which means that three or four young men end up by going into the city, becoming part of the labour force there and eventually are laid off and find themselves in the line-up in front of the unemployment office. I think the legislation which was put through with regard to vocational training will have a long term effect; but surely we need to do something which will deal with this problem immediately.

When we look at this budget there are things which are indeed good; for example, the tax relief for university students. However, we have also looked for something which will put more money into the hands of the people of Canada for purchasing, not money that will lay idle but will be put immediately into the hands of the people of Canada and used in this respect.

We on this side of the house must express certain disappointments in respect to the budget. As a recommendation from this group we would suggest that we in Canada need to take a new look at fiscal and monetary policies. The minister has indicated that flexibility is the order of the day, and indeed it is. This government has dealt successfully with the threat of inflation, but unfortunately it is still carrying on the war against inflation when the enemy has gone and the battlefield is empty. We now have a recession, and the policies which successfully dealt with inflation are not policies which will deal with a recession.

The minister had hoped for a surplus, and found a deficit, much to the joy of the Liberal party. But I think this is essentially irrelevant. The point is that neither the hoped for surplus or the small deficit will do the job which Canada needs to be done today. We need an interim policy of deficit financing on a scale which has up until now been unheard of. I realize the Liberals have also suggested this, and perhaps this is where the new and the old meet.

It is strange that we expect individuals to plan their financial affairs and yet we regard governments as beyond the pale. If a man with a salary of $5,000 a year spent the whole $5,000 by October and then issued bad cheques for the rest of the year, he would find himself in jail. Yet we believe that governments can go on in this fashion and no real harm will take place. Why are we so convinced that individual planning is good but corporate planning is wrong? Why do we have so much faith that the businessmen of this country are able to solve the problem of unemployment for us? They are so much concerned with trying to keep their business activities solvent that we can scarcely expect them to solve the problem of unemployment as well.

We live in an age when statistics are available and where expert advice is present, and yet we simply cannot use it to organize and plan our economy in a way which would give Canada the kind of economic organization she deserves. The Minister of Finance mentioned that the boys and girls of the 1940's were crowding the schools and now they have arrived on the labour market. But we knew that 15 years ago. We also know that recessions are a recurring thing and yet we are seemingly not doing very much about it on this side of the Atlantic. I think deficit financing on a short term basis can be good. I think it is the only way we can encourage the growth of our economy at this time. This can be done by putting men back to work and increasing the productivity of our nation. There is no danger of inflation so long as this recession continues.

What can be done with the capital which would be so created? Surely what we need in this country is an expansion of our public authority. We are paying out billions of dollars to remedy the situation, and yet nothing has been done about it. There are hospitals to be built; there are roads to be constructed; there are health centres, recreation centres to be constructed. Schools need classrooms. We know that within ten years, according to the statistics, we will need ten new universities. We realize that people coming out of high schools will soon be going into universities. We need low rental housing in this country. Yet we are paying to have men remain idle while there is so much to be done.

Surely these are things which we could be doing at this time. It has been proved that if works are begun and continued the whole process "snowballs" and the public sector benefits as well.

Our construction industry is operating at only 60 per cent efficiency. It provides 20 per cent of our gross product. A winter works program is not enough. Capital must be injected over a long period of time if the "snowballing" effect is to take place and the whole economy is to be strengthened.

I am inclined to suggest that even in such an area as athletics something could be done. Last year a great deal of regret was expressed because our athletes did so badly in the Olympic games. We see that according to the speech from the throne that the government intends to bring in, by legislation or otherwise, measures to encourage the youth of Canada to take part in amateur athletics. But, surely, the major problem in this regard is that there are no adequate facilities. Olympic failures are unimportant except inasmuch as they reflect on the bodily health and development of the whole nation. It does not matter very much, for example, that Australian swimmers won most of the gold medals. The point is that many thousands of Australian swimmers had opportunities to train and prepare themselves. It does not matter that the U.S.S.R. won all the gold medals in the gymnastic field. The point is that 70,000 Russian gymnasts had been trained in this program and provided the pool from which the final team could be drawn.

How can Canada take a successful part in athletics with the facilities we have? There is not one single regulation track in my constituency. There is only one regulation swimming pool in the whole of Ontario. I would suggest that sending people to the Olympics on this basis is an exercise in futility. Here is an area where something could be done. Other countries have done it, and we could do much to improve the health, welfare, education and culture of the Canadian people. By expanding the public authority we could create and strengthen the private sector and provide capital for investment which in turn would strengthen the private part of our economy.

I think we would do well to look to other countries, not because we in Canada have not the same ability to solve our problems but because, perhaps, we have not been obliged to take such action in the past. In Sweden government projects are all planned to be carried out in the off season. Special funds are allocated to be released as soon as unemployment figures reach a certain point. Government orders are stepped up at certain periods and tax laws are designed to encourage industry to build up investment funds rather than to overexpand, and release funds when a recession begins.

Here in Canada we have a problem involving the mobility of workers. Many men refuse to leave their own communities because they are liable to lose welfare benefits and, perhaps, because there is a possibility that when they reach the new areas the jobs will have disappeared. In Sweden the government undertakes to move workers to areas where jobs exist. The cost of such movement is paid and, if necessary, prefabricated houses are erected to accommodate the men and their families when they arrive.

In Norway there is provision for dynamic public works schemes. Long term loans for housing are available at the low interest rate of 3 per cent and control is exercised over unreasonable prices and profits. In Britain they stop industries from settling in congested areas of low unemployment and induce them to settle in areas where unemployment is prevalent. I realize that the Minister of Finance has looked into this aspect of the question and promised double depreciation in respect to capital expenditure in the first year, applied to the first three years, in the case of industries settling in chronically depressed areas.

Three years ago Peterborough was named a model city in this nation. Especially it is regarded as a tourist paradise with its beautiful lakes and rivers and glorious countryside. But it was also noted for its economic health and growth. Today it is still a tourist paradise but, I am sorry to say, it may now perhaps be counted, in the terminology of the minister, as a depressed area. I find it very hard to speak of this constituency as a depressed area. I think it is deplorable that in a country with all the advantages we have there should be depressed areas. On the other hand I wonder just how it would be decided what are the depressed areas of this Canada of ours. Would it be based on unemployment figures such as four or five thousand unemployed in this city of 40,000 and its surrounding area? Would it be based on general welfare figures which are up by 400 per cent compared with the same month of last year? I hope some reasonable and fair method of determining what are to be called depressed areas may be adopted and that no cynical method based on political advantage will be introduced.

We have been thinking a great deal about this problem of unemployment in our constituency. It has been a matter of great concern, because the affairs of the country have, in a sense, been concentrated in Peterborough. As a result there has been a great deal of talk and writing. Those concerned with the industries of the community were asked exactly what is wrong, in their opinion, not with the Peterborough area alone but with the economy as a whole. As a result, the Peterborough Examiner ran a series of articles, and I should like in particular to quote one editorial which had this to say:

> There is no political magic. A fundamental, radical, drastic reorganization of the economy is the prospect which, I think, faces us. There will be many to disagree. A plan for industrial expansion, tax reassessment, a drastic reduction of waste, a reduction in the cost, and undoubtedly the standard of living, a radical re-examination of political economy; these things are either needed or in the offing. If disarmament should come about they will be urgent.

These are some of the questions I will leave with both the minister and this government to think over. What would happen if suddenly disarmament were to come about. Are we going to approach the subject of disarmament with our tongues in our cheeks, our minds made up that it will not take place? What would happen to our economy if it did?

Second, what is going to happen when Canadian trade has to compete more openly and more often with what low-wage countries have to offer? The gap is widening, between the "haves" and the "have nots" and it is serious. The people of these countries know what the situation is; they are no longer ignorant of our wealth as they were some 20 years ago when tariff barriers were regarded as a solution. We live in a world where two people out of every three go to bed every night hungry. Will we raise tariffs and make the situation worse? How are we going to compete with these low-wage countries? Would it be by greater efficiency and automation which will, at the beginning at least, create still more unemployment, though it will cut down cost of production?

These questions will have to be answered in the near future. What will happen when the U.S.S.R. and communist China decide to disrupt world trade by entering world markets? Will the economic organization of the Canadian nation be able to deal with that situation? These are reasons why I think, we need, tonight to think and re-think far more about the very basis of our economy. Can we any longer afford an economy where waste and obsolescence are the order of the day? Such far-reaching questions as these will come before the people very soon. I sincerely hope the government of the day will have answers to them.

Mr. Speakman: Would the hon. member permit a question. Has the hon. member made a comparison between Canada and some of the Scandinavian countries, countries of very small area and heavily concentrated population? Would he not be fair enough to carry his comparisons further and compare them with Canada geographically, on the basis of per capita income, population and so on?

An hon. Member: And standard of living.

Mr. Pitman: I do not think that question is too relevant to what we are considering at the moment, this matter of relative populations and so on, but I suggest it is perhaps only a matter of degree and that the answers would not make any great difference.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I want to congratulate the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) and tell him that he is a very eloquent speaker and also that in time, with experience in the house such as many of us, including myself, still need, he will find that these problems are not solved as simply as he would indicate. I want to congratulate him anyway. I should like to have an hour or so to spend with the hon. gentleman during which time we could compare the record of this government during its three years in office with that of the preceding government. We have loaned 16 times as much money to build housing. Since we came into office more than 500,000 new homes have been built in Canada including a great many low rental housing developments. It is my earnest hope that the present hon. member for Peterborough will some day attain the distinction, charm, warmth and kindness of his very distinguished predecessor the late Mr. Gordon Fraser in this house.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) made a speech in connection with this baby budget during which he made many references to the copious resolutions passed at the Liberal rally. May I briefly, dispassionately and in a kindly way make reference to some of those resolutions and draw a comparison between the words used at the rally and the actions of the preceding government.

Turning first to the question of foreign trade—and all of these subjects are applicable to the baby budget—the Liberal rally pledged:

> —the exploration of the possibilities of Canadian participation in regional trade blocs—

They pledged to expand Canada's foreign trade, and yet for eight years under the Liberal administration that government failed to take any steps to implement its obligations in this respect under the North Atlantic treaty of 1949. When the opposition of that day entreated the Liberal government to take some action the present Leader of the Opposition who was then secretary of state for external affairs admitted that he had had a considerable amount to do with introducing into the North Atlantic treaty article II which became known as the Canada clause, the effect of which was to urge the creation of an organization for European economic co-operation and development. When the hon. gentleman was challenged about that in the house he said, as reported at page 1657 of Hansard of 1952 that this was not practicable, remonstrating that:

> —in attempting to reduce the barriers to trade, we have to be careful not to introduce arrangements which would cut across arrangements already made between members of larger organizations—such as the United Nations and GATT. The result has been, of course, that the European allies have now formed trade blocs among themselves and we are endeavouring as best we can to re-establish ourselves in our second largest export market and get our foot in the door through the organization for European economic co-operation and development.

In connection with the Bank of Canada that eloquent ghost writer for the Liberal party who writes so many speeches for so many of the frontbenchers, Mr. Maurice Lamontagne, who was chairman of the rally's committee on this subject, submitted a resolution asserting in part that:

—a new Liberal government would reassert control over Bank of Canada policy and shift it sharply away from credit restraint. This would mean more easily available loans and lower interest rates.

All during the regime of the Liberals they maintained a hands-off policy with respect to the Bank of Canada. They maintained that they had no control over the monetary policies of the Bank of Canada. Referring in parliament to the tight credit situation that existed in 1956 no less distinguished a member of the former government than the Hon. Mr. Harris, the then minister of finance, as reported at page 2216 of Hansard of that year, when discussing tight money and higher interest rates, suggested that these undesirable conditions could have been avoided, admitting that:

—it is true that the Bank of Canada could have further increased the supply of money and credit.

In other words at that time the hon. gentleman blamed the tight money situation on the Bank of Canada and admitted that the government of the day was powerless to control it. Yet the ghost writer of the Liberal party at the recent rally suggested that the government should re-assert control over the Bank of Canada, an agency that the Liberals always failed to control.

The resolution in connection with the exchange value of the dollar was highly eloquent. As a step to create more employment, the rally approved proposals to reduce the high exchange value of the Canadian dollar. This indicates that that part of the resolution must have been written a month ahead of the convention, no doubt by Mr. Lamontagne, because it is completely out of date and was completely out of date when the rally took place. The Conservative government, due to the brilliant baby budget introduced by the Minister of Finance, had at that time already reduced the Canadian dollar almost to par.

In his 1957 budget speech the Liberal Hon. Walter Harris boasted of the 4 per cent rise in the exchange value of our dollar during the previous 12 months and sought praise for this rise as a factor minimizing price increases in Canada. The hon. gentleman said on that occasion as reported at page 2216 of Hansard:

I should add that Canadian prices would have risen by more than they did had it not been for the 4 per cent rise in the external value of the dollar.

In those days hon. gentlemen opposite boasted about increasing the exchange value of our dollar and yet in the recent resolutions they seek to reduce it to par even though the resolution appears to have been written a month before the rally was held because a reduction had already occurred.

In connection with Canadian ownership in Canada of Canadian companies the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has done a thorough job in imposing the 15 per cent withholding tax. The rally resolved that action be taken to encourage Canadian participation in ownership of Canadian enterprises and to extend the principle that the boards of Canadian companies should comprise a majority of Canadian directors. That, too, must have been written a month before the rally took place because that is exactly what our Minister of Finance did in the interim. May I recall to the Liberals who, after having been thrown from office, have had a change of heart because they did not think that way even in 1957 when, as reported at page 2214 of Hansard of that year, the then Liberal minister of finance, the Hon. Walter Harris said:

—the most striking feature of 1956 was the extraordinary increase in capital investment. 1956 was the greatest year of capital expansion in our recent history. A good deal of this investment program was financed from outside Canada.

The hon. gentleman was boasting about it at that time but now hon. gentlemen opposite would do away with this. The hon. gentleman also went on to say:

The net inflow of capital into Canada was $1.4 billion.

That year's inflow represents about one twelfth of Canada's foreign debt at the present time. There was no aid to Canadians at that time but there was 100 per cent aid to the people of the United States including the putting up of $100 million by way of a loan to foreigners to help them build the trans-Canada pipe line.

Just to show both faces of hon. gentlemen opposite, let me refer to what was said at the Liberal rally with respect to the question of unemployment insurance. The subcommittee on unemployment advocated the payment of higher unemployment benefits, including supplementary payments which would raise the benefits to two thirds of the previous earnings of any unemployed person undertaking a vocational training course to equip him for another job.

My hon. friends opposite went so far as to recommend that this assistance should be increased but they left it to the Conservative government to do so. Although the hon. gentlemen opposite recommend that these payments should be increased at this time I recall that not so long ago the hon. member for

Essex East (Mr. Martin) challenged the government by saying that the unemployment insurance fund was going to soon run dry and dared the government to attempt to replenish the fund by requiring:

—employers and employees to pay increased contributions on top of the 30 per cent increase put into effect last year.

In other words, my hon. friends advocate one thing and yet in the past they have always done another.

Turning to the question of industrial research I wish to pay a tribute to the Conservative hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). Year in and year out that hon. gentleman has insisted in parliament that a great deal of the industrial research done by United States companies should be undertaken in Canada giving employment to Canadians, especially that undertaken by the subsidiaries of these foreign corporations. In vain the hon. member urged the former Liberal government to establish a committee to explore ways of encouraging more industrial research in Canada. The former Liberal minister of trade and commerce, Mr. Howe, brusquely rejected this proposal year after year and urged the voters in the constituency of Lambton West, on the occasion of a visit to that area, to "get that man Murphy off my back". At present, however, the Liberal rally has adopted a resolution urging that which the hon. member for Lambton West has been advocating for ten years.

Another inconsistency relates to the question of national defence. I might respectfully suggest here that the Liberal rally hit the international headlines through the support of our Nobel prize winner, the Leader of the Opposition, of a declaration made at the rally. The hon. gentleman gave his support to the rally's declaration in favour of a creative peace for Canada by withdrawing our forces from the active defence of North America and limiting our contribution to NORAD to air detection, identification and warning; in other words, to reduce Canada's role to that of bird watcher for the United States. But the same Leader of the Opposition told us in his comments in the 1957 debates—and I quote from page 1062 of Hansard, volume II—that the establishment of NORAD was:

—considered and, I think, approved by the officers of the Department of National Defence and perhaps by the minister of national defence.

This was while the former Liberal government was still in office. Thus, the decision of this rally, supported by the Leader of the Opposition, is a volte-face from their attitude on the previous occasion.

I will not go into the question of a national flag—that was discussed at great length yesterday—except to quote from the book by John Wesley Pickersgill that the question of a national flag was decided by an order in council supported by Mackenzie King on March 20, 1944, when an order in council was passed establishing the Canadian ensign as the national flag of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was on September 5, 1945.

Mr. Walker: On September 5, 1945, yes. I guess it was in the entry in the diary of March 20, 1944, when Mackenzie King said:

Before waking, I was dreaming of the union jack. Felt that it could be proclaimed the national flag of the United Kingdom, that the dominions could each have its own distinctive flag as well, with a union jack in the corner to show historical evolution and present association with the United Kingdom.

As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said:

At caucus a week later, Mackenzie King advised that Canada take the Canadian ensign and accept it at once as her national flag.

And, as he just said, on September 5, 1945 that order in council was passed and the French-Canadian secretary of state, the Hon. Roch Pinard, at page 3216 of Hansard of 1955, told the House of Commons:

The red ensign, as recently explained by the prime minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was adopted as a distinctive Canadian flag by order in council on September 5, 1945.

I should like to talk about health insurance also. The Liberal convention, not just this last time but away back in 1919, had as its most distinctive role at that time the advocacy of a national health scheme. Twenty five years later the public were still fooled on that subject. I quote from the "Mackenzie King Record" by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate at page 635, where he said:

The cabinet had never made a definite decision.

But the cabinet then agreed that Mackenzie King should look into the matter. He consulted the deputy minister of finance, and then he confided to his diary that at a time when Canada, with the rest of the world was having unprecedented prosperity:

Frankly, I did not think the treasury could stand it.

Still, years later—

Mr. Pickersgill: In the midst of war.

Mr. Walker: —when the treasury built up big annual surpluses the Liberal government took no action, when it was in a position to do so. But now, with a deficit of $300 million, brought about in an effort to solve unemployment, we have the Liberal rally in the face of that advocating at this time the introduction of a national health scheme, regardless of the cost. They do not want any royal commission; they want to investigate nothing; they want to get this thing under way at the present time.

I could go on and deal with old age pensions. The Liberal rally approved an increase in those pensions, and yet one of the last things Walter Harris did in March, 1957, and I quote from page 2222 of Hansard, was this, he expressed the Liberal government's approval of the addition of a mere $6 to the then monthly payment of $40 by saying:

> We are happy to be able to improve old age security payments.

Hon. members know what happened.

To dispose of Canadian agricultural surpluses the rally recommended that support be given to the establishment of a world food bank. At the NATO council meeting in Paris on December 16, 1957 the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made that suggestion. That is more than three years ago, and he reiterated it just a few months ago in probably the greatest speech ever made at the United Nations in reply to Mr. Khrushchev.

The Liberal rally adopted a resolution to cut personal income taxes "during the present unemployment emergency" and to increase immediately the spending money available. Now to cut it even slightly would result in a reduction of $500 million in government revenue. They advocated the cutting of the income tax and at the same time they adopted resolutions having to do with health insurance, increased pensions, increased vocational training and an increased public works program as well as increased urban redevelopment. They advocated measures and policies which, if inaugurated, would cost the Canadian taxpayers anywhere from $1 billion to $1.5 billion. It is almost impossible to work it out.

An hon. Member: A year.

Mr. Walker: Quite right, a year. I appreciate that addition; it is a very helpful one.

The main thing is that they are going to cut down our income tax. What is the total income tax collection in Canada in one year? It is approximately $1.6 billion, and yet they are going to add $1.5 billion to federal expenditures. In other words, what they have suggested is that the net additional costs of the proposals put forward at the rally would call for higher taxation equivalent to double the present income tax. What do you think of that, Mr. Speaker? Do we wish our income tax doubled? Emerson wrote—I do not necessarily agree with him:

> Who dares think one thing and another tell, my heart detests him like the gates of hell.

I do not apply this to the Liberals at all, but I am respectfully suggesting—and it is very seldom that I am as respectful as I am tonight—that never in Canadian history was there a more shameless vote-catching exhibition than that in which the Leader of the Opposition indulged. I might expect it from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. This Liberal rally was in reality a study in vote-catching.

I should like to touch on the question of unemployment. Nobody can overestimate the seriousness of this problem. I know it, and we all know it. I worry about it. We all hate to see people unhappy, particularly wives and children. We hate to see the demoralizing effect of unemployment on the poor unfortunate person who is unemployed. Let me say quite frankly, this situation is going to be worse before it is better. The hon. member for Peterborough will appreciate this as well. What I say is that it is no consolation for us to point out that under Liberal regimes in the past we have had very high unemployment figures. This is only playing politics on either side of the house. We know it is a serious problem and we know we must do our best to solve it. Also, it is no consolation to say that the figures in the United States are enormously high at the present time. That is no consolation. But perhaps the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) will not mind my pointing out to him that some of the figures that he slipped in this afternoon—and I did not see them until afterwards—were figures for only the first 11 months of the year. He forgot to tell us that. Perhaps he does not read the Globe and Mail. I have here an Associated Press dispatch from Washington which appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 23 and which reads in part as follows:

> Labour Secretary Arthur Goldberg estimated the current number of unemployed at 5,500,000—

Not 4.5 million as has been bruited about.

> —up one million from the reported mid-December total.

The total number of United States unemployed is 5.5 million. The labour force of the United States is 70.5 million and with 5.5 million unemployed in that country the percentage of unemployed is 7.8. Comparisons are difficult, Mr. Speaker. In the United States their armed forces have drained off the labour market 2½ million young men. We have 120,000 in our armed forces. So you can see how difficult it is to compare these figures. Suppose even a part of the 2½ million who are in the armed forces of the United States were on the labour market at the present time. What a tremendous change that would make in the percentage figures.

Again, is it fair to compare our figures of 528,000 at this season of the year in Canada, the land of the north, where seasonal unemployment has always been one of the greatest bugbears right across Canada except on the west coast? We are greatly affected by seasonal unemployment whereas in the United States, with all their other unemployment, they do not have to contend in the same way with seasonal unemployment.

I am not criticizing. The hon. member for Laurier is putting his best foot forward. However, perhaps he could have helped us by bringing these figures up to date. Never mind. What can we do about the problem? Before we decide what we can do about it, what is the cause of it? We are not blaming it on the prior administration. We admit that when we took office in 1957 the government of Canada had been running down since the death of Mackenzie King but we are not stressing that at the moment.

We have an unemployment problem and on each side of the house it is admitted that it is caused largely as a result of the automation revolution by which machines have taken the place of manpower. In the pulp and paper business of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) one machine does the work which a short time ago was done by 200 men. Since 1947, 50 per cent of the farmers have left the land and yet the production of the farms is greater today than ever before. Machines are taking the place of manpower and great multitudes of men are unemployed for that reason. Farmers have come into the urban centres looking for jobs, and until that adjustment is made we are going to have the problem of unemployment.

The problem cannot be solved in a day. The hon. member for Essex East would have us solve it tomorrow but no less a person than their knight in shining white armour, Mr. Walter Gordon, is reported in this way in an article in the Ottawa Journal of January 20:

> He expressed the opinion that little could be done to relieve unemployment within a short period of time—

There is no question that he is right about that. What can we do about the problem of unemployment caused by the automation revolution? First and foremost, we must educate for jobs the unemployed, 40 per cent of whom have not got past eighth grade. The day of the unskilled labourer in this country, particularly in urban areas, is almost at an end. Do not let any child leave school unless he has some trade, some vocation, some profession or is able to do something in which he is an expert. Even the farmer has to be an expert at the present time. So this vast federal program of vocational training is the finest thing that has ever been done by any government to solve the age old problem of unemployment.

It is quite true that at the present time we would like to do something immediately. We cannot just leave this thing until everybody is educated for a new job and people are placed again in industry. We have to do something about it now. The $100 million winter works program in my Department of Public Works is an effort to do something in that regard. This magnificent municipal winter works program of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) is affording employment for hundreds of thousands of people and is a far greater success than was ever anticipated.

Then there is our new housing legislation. I am not boasting as its minister. I am simply giving facts. We are now allowing a new class of people to buy houses, people who have good, steady, but low incomes and are working hard and have never been able to get the down payment on a house. With the 95 per cent loan provision they can now buy a house and this is greatly increasing the demand for houses. Builders can build as many presold houses as they can get orders for. Here is a tremendous field if the Canadian people will accept the opportunity, because all we can do with these measures is to create the opportunity. Loans of $4,000 each guaranteed by the government can now be secured to improve a million and a half rental houses. If the owners of even one third of these houses would improve them during the winter months, just think of the great incentive that would be to employment, hundreds of thousands of jobs.

I could go on and mention the provisions of my department with respect to sewage disposal plants. Even the city of Toronto wants to take advantage of this and build a subway and class it as a sewage disposal plant. That subway sewage mix-up might happen some places but I would hate to suggest that could be said of my dear city of Toronto. Mighty incentives are being provided and we are getting immediate replies from right across Canada. We are going to create a lot of employment.

Then there is my department's provision respecting the construction of university residences. Each one that is built will create more employment. The government has also provided government guaranteed loans to small business. All we can do is to create opportunities. It is up to small business "to grasp the skirts of happy chance," as Tennyson once said, obtain their loans and start on the way to expanding their businesses. I had no ulterior motive when I said that.

The corporation tax is being reduced to 21 per cent on the first $35,000 of income. That is a great incentive to business to go ahead and expand and create employment. The productivity council is one of our long range measures by which Canada is going to vastly increase its production. I am trying to deal with all these things in the time allocated to me. There is the matter of getting our dollar down to par, an objective in which the brilliant Minister of Finance has succeeded so admirably. The trade conference convened by the ebullient Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) should have a great effect on the economy of Canada and by increasing our exports result in a phenomenal increase in employment.

But, Mr. Speaker, the government cannot do it all. Last year our gross national product was greater than ever before but 5,000 municipal governments, 10 provincial governments and one federal government only accounted for 15 per cent of that gross national product. In other words, the goods and services produced by all levels of government only amounted to 15 per cent of our gross national product or our wealth.

Who then must solve the problem of unemployment? It falls upon the other 85 per cent who are engaged in free enterprise. The government is not shirking its responsibility. The government wants to lead, to encourage, to assist in creating opportunities for this 85 per cent by the legislation which we have passed. The problem is a tremendous one and I entreat the support of all the Canadian people in solving it.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate all those who have participated in this debate. The various points of view advanced, even by way of disagreement, should be helpful to all concerned. A sufficient time has elapsed since the supplementary budget, sometimes referred to as the baby budget, was introduced on December 20 last to formulate an accurate assessment of the event, the advance notices of which were full of optimistic predictions.

These predictions, like many others involving pieces of government legislation, proved to have been mere wishful expectations which failed to materialize. The minister, in a discourse an hour and a half long, took the occasion to deliver a stern lecture on the vital need for management and labour to hold back on wage and price increases and, at the same time, to strive for increased production. Indeed, in his effort to impress the Canadian people, the minister managed to impress only himself with the legal verbiage with which he hoped to cover important omissions which I shall endeavour to enumerate during my allotted time in this debate. First, however, I should like to indicate my pleasure over the couple of measures the budget contains with which there is no quarrel on this side of the house.

We commend the introduction of the proposal to allow university tuition fees to be deductible for income tax purposes. We also welcome the decision to allow accelerated depreciation write-offs by firms which undertake to establish new manufacturing facilities for new products. However, in this connection, an idea advanced by Professor Stanley Surrey of Harvard University should have a great appeal and, personally, I think it would be a decided improvement on that proposal contained in the budget.

Briefly, the idea is this. Instead of giving business and corporations a faster write-off on plant and equipment, leave the depreciation deduction as it is and give business an investment credit that would cut a company's tax bill as its total investment expanded. Under this proposal a corporation or business would deduct from its tax bill a percentage of the amount by which its investment in new plant and equipment during the year exceeded its current depreciation deduction.

In that way, a company would benefit in direct proportion to the amount of increased plant and equipment that it creates. If this method were implemented the treasury would lose some revenue but would make it up and more by closing probable loopholes. This method could also mean the establishment of new industries.

I have tried hard to find a good reason to justify a reasonable degree of appreciation for this particular baby budget except to provide an opportunity for hon. members to speculate on the inscrutable working of the mind of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I was rather astonished to hear the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell), in his speech on the debate, as reported at page 1077 of Hansard say this:

> —seldom has a budget met such a universality of approval from objective critics.

If he had said "universality of disappointment", he would have been much closer to the facts.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Best), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) and others have tried hard to create a diversion by confining their speeches to lopsided opinions of the Liberal rally and prophesies of doom for the Liberal party, intended more or less to draw the attention of the house away from the shortcomings of the budget.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne), who suffers from the illusion that the majority of Canadian taxpayers paid less in taxes in 1959 than in 1956, would be well advised to scrutinize the figures again. They are as follows:

Tax Collections

	Fiscal Year 1956-57	1959-60	Percentage Changes
	(millions of dollars)
Personal income tax	$1,525.5	$1,751.6	+14.8%
Corporation income tax	1,335.6	1,234.2	— 7.7%
Net federal sales tax	717.1	732.7	+ 2.1%
Total	3,578.2	3,718.5	+ 4 %

The difference between the totals is $140 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. I must ask that the members on the right side of the house abate their conversation in order to allow the hon. member who has the floor to make his speech.

Mr. Badanai: The hon. member might very well ponder the question of who paid the additional $140 million in federal taxes in 1959. It certainly was not the corporations, for the figures reveal that they paid approximately $101.4 million less in taxes in 1959. The answer, of course, is that this additional tax burden fell on the individual Canadian taxpayer in the form of personal income tax and additional federal sales tax.

The justification for the pre-Christmas session, which was understood to have been called for the specific purpose of introducing measures which would alleviate unemployment, has not been realized by the contents of this budget. It has ignored the expected elimination of the 7½ per cent excise tax on automobiles, something which would have created a greater demand for Canadian-made cars and thus have increased the number of jobs in our car manufacturing plants. The minister failed to mention the automotive industry, notwithstanding the representations and consultations with manufacturers, labour unions and others. Evidently the minister is quite satisfied to leave the problem with Dr. Bladen, whose prescription will eventually reach the door of the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) where it will receive the usual consideration.

My opinion is that the elimination of the 7½ per cent excise tax would do more to revitalize the industry than would any other single government action and I shall be surprised if the one-man royal commission does not make the removal of the excise tax on motor cars one of its first recommendations. It was unfortunate that instead of waiting for the commission's report on its findings the government imposed an increase in the valuation placed on British and European cars imported into Canada, the effect of which was only to raise the price of these cars by approximately $300.

This action of revaluation can be looked upon as being embarrassing to the commission which the government set up for the very purpose of prescribing remedies. If the commission should recommend that valuations on imported cars be not increased, what is the government then going to do? Then we can well ask ourselves what was the purpose of appointing a royal commission.

I must confess that I share the disappointment of the entire automotive industry in the failure of the minister to remove the iniquitous 7½ per cent excise tax on passenger cars which, I may add, is being levied under false pretences. I think I am justified in saying this because it is a tax which was originally imposed as a luxury tax to discourage Canadians from buying at a time when there was a scarcity of steel and other materials which were needed first for the war effort and second, for the re-establishment of secondary industry in the post-war period. The time is long past when such reasons or excuses can be considered valid for the retention of this tax.

The minister had nothing to say about the premium on the Canadian dollar. It is true that it is now at near par with the United States dollar. However, a stabilization of the rate of exchange for the Canadian dollar should be considered now. It should have been done a long time ago.

The apparent advantage of the premium has actually been a problem which interfered with the stimulation of export trade. I directed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) in the house during the trade commissioners' conference in Ottawa. I asked whether the high priced Canadian dollar had been discussed. I was more than mildly surprised to receive a negative reply from the minister whose responsibility it is to promote exports.

I venture to say that the minister of the newly created Department of Forestry—to whom I wish to express my congratulations upon his appointment, and also my best wishes—will not find it difficult to agree that the premium on the Canadian dollar has been a definite detriment to the forest industries, which are substantial in the economy of our nation. Were it not for a healthy pulp and paper business northwestern Ontario would be economically insolvent. I need not remind the minister that practically one third of our annual total exports is represented by pulp and paper, lumber and other forset products.

In the gross national product forestry industries represent twice the combined output of all the metal mines in Canada. But we are failing to maintain our share in expanding world markets because foreign buyers have had to pay a substantial premium on our dollar, thus contributing to the deterioration of our export markets. As an example, the newsprint capacity in the United States has increased 140 per cent since 1952, while Canadian newsprint capacity has increased during the same period by only 44 per cent. This was due to our high priced dollar which has adversely affected every Canadian industry dependent on export for survival.

The effect of the booming Canadian dollar as compared with its counterpart in the United States upon the economic fortunes of the Canadian mining industry, including iron ore, copper, zinc and gold, has been only too apparent to the people engaged in mining. A Canadian dollar which was stable at its present level would in effect eliminate the necessity of subsidizing gold mines which are now being assisted by the emergency gold mining assistance legislation. In other words, even the government would benefit directly if it took the appropriate action.

Mr. A. T. Lambert, president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, speaking to the Toronto Rotary club recently, stated, as reported in the Montreal Gazette, that the fluctuating rate by which the value of the Canadian dollar went up and down in terms of other currencies according to market demand "seems to have long outlived its usefulness". He continued:

> We should now begin to restrict its fluctuations within progressively narrower limits, with the idea of re-establishing eventually a fixed rate at a realistic level which we must be prepared to defend.
> This would be the most important single step Canada could take towards re-establishing the competitiveness of its industry. If this involves some costs and risks, the benefits will more than justify them in the end.

One of the worst features of this budget is the implication of its narrow nationalism, which is designed to discourage United States capital to activate our undeveloped resources and industries. Had it not been for outside capital the great iron ore deposits of Steep Rock would still be under a lake, millions of trees would be rotting in our forests and fewer jobs would be available to our labour force.

Large capital investments are essential for the expansion of our economy and the growth of our nation. Canadian investments alone are not sufficient to sustain an economy at a pace launched by a Liberal government in the post-war period and which alone can bring back full employment and prosperity for all. In spite of what has been said to the contrary, we are still operating under a tight money policy which is tied to high interest rates, making things most difficult for industry in Canada and thus contributing directly to unemployment.

The recent legislative measures taken to help the employment situation, such as the extended winter works program or the vocational training program, while commendable are inadequate to meet the immediate problem.

The failure of the minister to provide for the establishment of a municipal loan fund is most regrettable. Such a fund would have made it easier for municipalities to finance all kinds of needed capital expenditures which would have created many more jobs. Some of the municipalities are unable to take advantage of the latest winter works program to the full extent simply because they find it difficult to sell their debentures at a reasonable rate of interest. The minister again ignored these difficulties which I pointed out in this house at every opportunity, and I shall continue to do so until this crucial need is met by the government.

For nearly three years this government has turned a blind eye to the continuous creeping cancer of unemployment, preferring to minimize the problem rather than tackle it energetically. In my own constituency, notwithstanding the zeal and hard work of the management of the Fort William unemployment office and that of the chairman and members of the lakehead employment advisory committee to the unemployment insurance commission, the situation remains grim. The latest figures show that 3,250 people are seeking employment. These figures reveal the story in its naked truth.

In my view the minister made an important omission in failing to give any encouragement to shipbuilding in Canada. On June 27 last, speaking on the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, I suggested that the Canadian government should take steps toward the re-establishment of a Canadian merchant marine. I pointed out that the eight ships sold to Cuba in 1958 was a mistake. As far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, a Canadian merchant marine has never existed and his present budget, like its predecessors, has ignored a potential avenue for the employment of thousands of Canadians in building ships in our shipyards and in manning them on the lakes and high seas.

The United States has a policy that domestic waterborne cargo is reserved exclusively to ships built, owned and registered in the United States, and the government absorbs the difference between the cost of building ships in United States' yards for foreign trade. The United Kingdom allows on all new ships an initial investment allowance of .40 per cent over and above the normal depreciation allowance of 12½ per cent. Grants are also made for new construction of some types of fishing vessels.

Australia allows a 25 per cent subsidy on all Australian built ships and the coastal trade is reserved to vessels whose wage rates and standards of accommodation are equal to those applicable to Australian ships. Italy has a policy of subsidy which she is now planning to increase in order to boost the shipping industry. This is an extension of aid to shipbuilding which was adopted in 1954 and which is meeting, according to reports, with most gratifying results.

Every trading nation of any importance has a merchant marine and a policy in aid of shipbuilding except Canada, and our heads should hang in shame when we read of landlocked Switzerland which has a merchant marine and is planning to expand. Since world war II she has acquired 27 cargo vessels which total about 200,000 tons, and the ships are manned by 848 crewmen.

Further evidence that the old crack about the Swiss navy is not true is the fact that Switzerland has ratified five convention agreements of the international labour organization on seafarers' working conditions.

World commerce is still being carried by seagoing ships. During the last war Winston Churchill was forever urging the United States, among other things, to lend ships. Canada at that time was already building vessels of all types at a great pace, and young Canadians from the cities and from the farms were becoming mariners overnight. Soon their voices were heard on the seven seas.

The budget did not mention the fact that Canada is the third trading nation of the world, that her natural resources and products are still being carried over the seas of the world, but that the familiar Canadian voices are no longer heard. Men speaking foreign tongues and ships flying foreign flags are carrying our wheat, our iron ore, our nickel, our wood products and oil. The list of flags going through the Suez canal in 1959 included such countries as Costa Rica, Honduras and South Korea. Where was the red ensign?

It is one of the uncomprehensible paradoxes of our time that notwithstanding Canada's enormous coastline, fronting on three oceans, we seem to be the least ship conscious people in the world. According to a report issued by the Canadian maritime commission on November 18, 16 major Canadian shipyards employed an average of 575 people in each, where they should have at least a couple of thousand.

[Mr. Badanai.]

We agree with the minister that Canadians should be urged to invest more in Canadian enterprises, but we cannot help but view with alarm the curbs on investments in Canada by Americans and others outside Canada. By all means give Canadians preference in these investments, but if there is shortage of Canadian investments to meet the requirement of our expected expansion, which is essential to provide jobs for an increasing labour force, then I would say; let outside capital come in to take up the slack without hindrance.

In addressing the bank's shareholders the president of the Bank of Montreal, Mr. Hart, on December 5 last, referring to the monetary policy in the light of current economic conditions, had this to say:

> Business activity in Canada during the year now coming to a close has, in many respects, failed to bear out the optimistic predictions voiced a year ago. Thus far, the "soaring sixties" have shown little inclination to soar.
> This country has attained its economic stature and living standards in no small measure by virtue of having abundant natural resources for which there are markets elsewhere, and which must be developed on a large scale and by large injections of capital, if they are to be developed at all. It is not unnatural that to some extent the necessary capital has been provided from outside our own borders by those who need the resources that are being developed. Moreover, Canada as a world trader must keep pace with the technological advances that are going on around her. I suggest that if we are to continue to develop our resources and keep abreast of innovation and modernization by our competitors, we shall do well not to be too fearful of prudent expansion and improvements, and of the financing that is entailed.

The thousands of Canadians who are unemployed cannot await the long term results of the minister's fiscal measures. They are going to take a gloomy view of the jump from a projected $12 million surplus to a $286 million deficit, without any immediate benefits which they can see.

It is generally conceded by a large number of well informed people that one of the major causes of unemployment and the general business slump is the government's policy of monetary restraints. The general reaction to the budget is that it was the worst speech imaginable to deal with the unemployment emergency which, after all, was the principal reason for the early start of the session and which, thus far, has been of little comfort to those who had reason to expect some help.

The suggestion that new tariff boosts may be expected is one which will not bring any cheer to the vast number of consumers. The announcement that it is proposed to increase the membership of the tariff board from five to seven can only be interpreted as foreshadowing tariff increases to come. It is the R. B. Bennett touch of the thirties over again, perhaps not as direct, but subtly moving toward higher tariffs. We can only pray that it will not lead toward similar disastrous effects for Canada as it did then, though, fortunately, a Liberal administration, five years later, came to the rescue and paved the way to a period of unprecedented prosperity.

The timing of this budget just shortly before Christmas gave hope to many that it would contain some tax cuts and, certainly, the removal of the sales tax on soft drinks. This is a commodity which is largely consumed by children and by people who do not indulge in alcoholic beverages. The industry is faced with increased overhead in the form of machinery and higher wages. At the same time bottling works are reluctant to increase the cost to the consumers. Elimination of the tax would not only encourage expansion of facilities but would provide employment for more people and lead to a greater consumption of sugar products, thus helping the sugar beet farmer. In other words, the benefits would spread over a wide area to the advantage of many people, to say nothing of the encouragement to consume non-alcoholic beverages and thus promote sober habits with beneficial results to all concerned.

This budget will not help much in the promotion of jobs for the 3,250 unemployed people in my constituency. The Canadian Car Company plant in Fort William is one of the most spacious and modern manufacturing establishments of its kind in Canada. It has facilities for the employment of several thousand workers, and during the second world war it employed up to 7,000. It has a record for building aircraft of all kinds and description. It has built buses, trailers and ships, and yet approximately only 400 people are now employed. This company's engineers, with the assistance of technicians from the Department of National Defence, have developed an amphibious vehicle known as the Bobcat, which incidentally, was demonstrated to the new Minister of National Defence only a month or so ago.

It is true that the budget did not mention aid under the Colombo plan, but I suggest that in any future Canadian contribution under this arrangement serious consideration should be given to the inclusion of a number of these vehicles. Vehicles of this type would prove of great help to underdeveloped countries, and in the event that the production of this vehicle is proceeded with I urge the government to award the contract to the Fort William plant of the Canadian Car Company.

With all the sincerity I can command I wish to express the hope that the suggestions which have been made, such as the removal of the excise tax on automobiles, the removal of the sales tax on soft drinks, measures to keep the dollar at a level not exceeding that of the United States dollar, a loosening up of the availability of money, the creation of a municipal loan fund and a move toward the re-establishment of a Canadian merchant marine will be recognized by the minister. I hope the hon. gentleman will give serious consideration to including them in the next regular budget which, presumably, will be introduced during the coming months of March or April.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am grateful, Mr. Speaker, for the warmth of my reception. I am not at all sure, however, that as I go along the feeling will be so good. It is difficult to believe that at this stage one has anything new to say but I do not feel that this budget needs to have much further said in its defence, especially after the blitz we have had from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) this evening.

Indeed, I had better begin my remarks with a confession. I am afraid I am going to give something in the nature of a sermon. It is said that every Presbyterian has at least one sermon in him. I have not yet preached my sermon so perhaps I shall do so this evening. If I fail to attract the attention of hon. members I shall have to resort to what Benjamin Disraeli said following his first speech during which he was given a very rough time. He said, "You have not listened to me now but the time will come when you will listen to me." At any rate, I have a text and my text comes from the inaugural address of the President of the United States. It is this:

> To those peoples in the huts and villages of half the globe struggling to break the bonds of mass misery, we pledge our best efforts to help them help themselves—
> —if the free society cannot help the many who are poor, it can never save the few who are rich.

I commend those last words to the house and ask that hon. gentlemen pay particular attention to the fact that the president in addition to his humanitarian feelings, which do him credit, had a hardboiled, realistic warning to sound, and I wish to indulge in both of those tonight.

I spoke on this a year ago but I cannot believe that I made a very profound impression. Indeed, I think I was regarded as a kind of egghead, possibly harmless but certainly not very interesting. I believe that to some extent public opinion has moved since then. At that time I quoted the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and I should like on this occasion to repeat their words which I quoted at that time. The Prime Minister said:

> Economic assistance to underdeveloped countries is a major and mandatory need if freedom is to be preserved in the world.

The Minister of Finance said:

> We are so dependent upon foreign trade and so closely linked in many ways with the fortunes of the United States and our other trading partners that we are bound to be affected, for good or ill, by the swings of economic activity originating outside our own borders.

The minister has repeated that in other words many times in the last year. For myself, I shall be satisfied if I can make a contribution, however small, to this question which I believe is urgent. I believe we disregard it at our peril as well as at violence to our better feelings.

We cannot leave everything to the government. The government has done well but public opinion has to do something. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) the other night in Toronto put this very question to the audience and found that only a few of them were really interested to the extent of being prepared to do anything about it. I deal with this question on the budget speech rather than in the external affairs debate because I wish to stress its economic aspects. I wish to stress its relationship to and influence upon unemployment.

I believe it can be said today, looking at the problem both from a humanitarian, political and business point of view, that we are justified in saying "the hour for dealing with this question has been long averted, has been long delayed; but it was always inevitable and it has come at last." I believe that with all my heart.

Hon. gentlemen opposite of the Liberal party have introduced a certain number of suggestions but their chief ideas seem to be financial devices of which the opposition are so fond. What I want to pin our attention to is what I believe to be the real need—this has been stressed by the Minister of Finance many times—for increased foreign trade.

I am tired of the words "emergency" and "depression". We all know how serious unemployment is. We on the government side of the house are as much affected by it as anyone—perhaps even more affected by it because of our responsibilities—and I think that bandying about the words "depression" and "emergency" will not get us anywhere. What I want to do is try to state in plain words what is the situation. Once we know what it is we will know where to go from here. For the sake of clarity I am going to read a short statement:

> The first fact to be understood is that unemployment though serious in some places, exists in the midst of national prosperity, not as high as the government predicted but still high in the nation as a whole.

And further, relating to the unemployment situation:

> It may require special measures and increased public expenditures out of taxes in some areas but above all it requires a readjustment of our economy to a changed situation, to new competition in the world market and to the buyers' resistance against high prices in the domestic market. It requires in short, a reduction in costs and prices to encourage the sale of goods at home and abroad.

I suggest without fear of contradiction that this is an apt description of the government's policy. It may interest hon. members to know that that is a quotation from the Winnipeg Free Press, a newspaper not notoriously partial to our party. It appeared in an August issue. It may be said, "Oh, but that was last August." I answer at once and say, "Yes, the statement appeared last August but the situation has not changed substantially since then."

I want to quote another witness, the president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, speaking at the annual meeting the other day. He deals in clear, crisp words with what I believe is the true situation.

After referring to aspects of international trade, particularly the common market in Europe, he goes on to say:

> These developments on the international scene accompanied as they have been by slower growth in the Canadian economy have forced us out of the complacent mood which characterized the post-war years. Instead of an insatiable demand for our natural and processed products abroad, we face competition from many other countries, and the European common market may possibly soon be self-sufficient in many commodities which Canada has traditionally sold to some of its members. This outlook might dispose some of us to be gloomy but in fact there is no more room for discouragement now than there was for excessive optimism a year ago.

Here are really plain, accurate, intelligible words from competent observers which I believe describe the true situation.

My comments on the budget will be very short. This remarkable infant is tough and resilient. You might call it a "tough baby". It needs little defence because it does not pretend to work magic. As the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has said:

> It is a sincere, honourable and intelligent grappling with a dislocation, part of which is seasonal, more of which is technological, all of which will respond only to a variety of treatments.

Aid to underdeveloped countries is an additional treatment which I wish to suggest.

Let us briefly examine the contributions made by hon. members of the opposition. We must not be too critical. Hon. members of the opposition are still not perfectly at home in their role as the opposition. They still at times have a feeling that they are or ought to be the government. After a few years more they will feel more at home and will perhaps function more efficiently.

The Leader of the Opposition with echoes of the Liberal jamboree still ringing in his ears made a speech full of financial devices but the hon. gentleman evaded the plain questions put to him by the Minister of Finance. We were asked to take seriously a statement to the effect that if the opposition had only been in power they would have taken precautions, they would never have been led astray by any wrong figures. We are asked to believe that they would have had what they described as a planned deficit. They, of course, they assert would not have been deceived by the upturn in 1959 running into 1960 but would have seen beneath the surface and would have had their plans all ready. But when the Minister of Finance asked the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) point blank what size deficit he favoured he got nothing but generalities in reply.

The Leader of the Opposition said it was not so much the size that counted but that the deficit should be planned in advance to correct recession. This sounds to me like high-flown, thin-spun theory and I much prefer to use the more pedestrian words of common sense. I recommend that the Leader of the Opposition and his followers study the words of the quotations I read from the Winnipeg Free Press and the president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce.

I come now to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). It is always interesting to listen to him. He was wearing a false face and using as his own the words of the minister of finance in 1955. The difference is that in 1955 the words were accurate. As far as I can discover at that time there were no plans made to deal with unemployment and, of course, the boom came along and bailed them out; whereas nobody can suggest—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman would not wish to be unfair. Perhaps I can ask him whether he does not recall that it was in the session of 1955 that the previous government established unemployment assistance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With a threshold which denied the benefit to nearly all of the provinces.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am always ready to accept a correction by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate but I would just point out that that was rather a skimpy little chicken compared with what we are doing.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not as much needed.

Mr. Macdonnell: I just mention briefly some of the things the Minister of Finance has been responsible for, such as aid to small businesses, stimulus to housing, double depreciation, and so on.

Now the thing that struck me, because I am always interested in the use of adjectives by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, was the adjectives he used with respect to the Minister of Finance, which I think were singularly inappropriate. In one place he referred to him as reckless. I have known the minister a long time and I can say "reckless" is singularly inappropriate. It was singularly inappropriate to use two other words. The only two other words that I can think of which are more inappropriate than the word "reckless" to use of the Minister of Finance are the two other words the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate used, that is "sly" and "furtive". How utterly inapplicable. The Minister of Finance is always ready to come out in the open. I repeat that the words "reckless", "sly" and "furtive" should not be taken seriously. I make bold to say—and I am not going to dwell too long on this—that the Minister of Finance has made a reputation not only for ability but for courage and common sense, which will survive all these irresponsible criticisms.

I come now to the question of foreign aid, which has been described as the greatest question of the second half of the twentieth century. I ask anyone whether he can laugh that off? Second, I want to represent it as the greatest opportunity to deal with the question of unemployment because, as the Minister of Finance has said so many times, what we have to do is to increase foreign trade. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) has made a real contribution by the conference that was held here when all the trade commissioners were called together. Unfortunately, as was pointed out again and again by people like Stevenson, Hoffman and others, the real solution is to get those people—I saw the figure given as 2,000 million the other day—who have almost no buying capacity, into the economic position where they can buy.

I have one illustration which is so small that I almost blush to mention, but nevertheless in principle it is as sound as a bell. It shows what can be done. I asked the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether they could give me an illustration from the Eskimos, and they gave me a most beautiful illustration of a tiny community of 200 or 300 people living on the dole. They were in receipt of nearly $20,000 a year. By instruction and better methods of fishing, within a year or two, they were in a position where they had a buying capacity. Instead of taking money out of the treasury they were able to look after themselves. Although it is a tiny illustration, it is absolutely sound in principle.

This problem faces us, as we look around the world, in huge, overwhelming dimensions. Our own exports, of course, are going strong in so far as our primary industries are concerned but our secondary industries need stimulus. Already much is being done to assist. We have long term credits and assistance by government aid, but more is needed to face the tough competition from Europe and from the communists. I suggest there is no reason to believe that we can significantly increase our foreign trade in the face of all the competition there is unless the total of foreign trade is increased and increased substantially. If the cake is to remain the same size, well, then, it is going to be too bad for us.

I should like to read a statement, not from theorists, not from politicians, but from the president of the Imperial Bank, and I would ask hon. members to listen to what he says. This is a serious statement, coming from a serious man whose business it is to lend money and get it back. He has to face the acid test of balance sheets, and this is just one of many statements from similar quarters that could be quoted. He says:

> We also need boldness and imagination in our approach to foreign aid.

I ask hon. members to think that over. I ask, can you laugh that off, boldness and imagination? I continue:

> For a nation of our productive potentialities and high living standards the aid we extend now to other countries is much too small.

This is a bank president speaking. I continue:

> A great increase in non-military foreign aid could be fully justified on moral grounds alone; our status as a nation would be enhanced by such a policy. Nor is it discreditable to any nation following such a policy that providing aid to others will, by maintaining demand, help it to avoid the economic waste of large scale unemployment.

There you have it. To help to raise the growth of the economies of other countries is of prime importance in bringing about that world of expanding trade which is of such importance to our economy and economic well-being.

I see it is just about ten o'clock, and I shall adjourn the debate in a moment. I just want to register one point because I believe there is widespread misunderstanding here. It is of great importance to know that foreign aid does not mean sending millions of dollars to underdeveloped countries. What it means is sending Canadian goods and services, natural products, manufactured products; in other words, it means employment of Canadians. Take the illustration of the Warsak dam in Pakistan where the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) took part in the inaugural ceremonies the other day. The sum of $36 million was spent there and 95 per cent of it represented Canadian employment. That is what we are talking about when we are talking about foreign aid.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I can get some enlightenment from the Minister of National Revenue as to the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will not proceed with this debate but we will take up legislation. We will call first item No. 10 on today's order paper in the name of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to a measure to authorize the minister to enter into an agreement with the provinces respecting certain matters concerning loans. When that is completed tomorrow afternoon we will proceed with item No. 6 on today's order paper, a measure to amend the Canadian National Railways Act, and item No. 12, another measure with respect to the Canadian National Railways. I think these matters will take up the most of Wednesday afternoon. Since I will not be here when the house closes on Wednesday afternoon, I will say that on Thursday we shall resume the debate on the budget and if it is concluded on Thursday before adjournment we shall take up item No. 14 on today's order paper, the motion to set up the committee on broadcasting. In any event, we will proceed with that on Friday and also the motion in the name of my colleague, the Minister of Transport with respect to the Canadian National Railways. When these two matters are concluded on Friday we shall revert to legislation to which I have referred.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 25, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN HAMILTON "SPECTATOR" OF JANUARY 19

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege involving an article in the Hamilton Spectator of January 19, 1961, written by a Mr. Bruce Phillips of the Southam news service. It deals with some comments of mine on the establishment of a joint Senate and House of Commons committee on Indian affairs. There is a picture of myself appearing with the article, under which is Mr. Phillips' name.

My question of privilege could be with regard to the attaching of Mr. Phillips' name to my picture, but with equal force Mr. Phillips could have a question of privilege arising out of the attaching of my picture to his name. Perhaps this question is irresoluble and should remain that way.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT REMOVING PROVISION RESPECTING COMPULSORY ENFRANCHISEMENT

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-61, to amend the Indian Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, this bill is for the purpose of removing from section 112 of the Indian Act the group of phrases which had imposed compulsion in the matter of enfranchisement of Indians. It is proposed to remove these particular phrases and leave only such as would provide machinery for the examination of applications which are received.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, ETC.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Labour, with the approval of the governor in council, to enter into agreements with provinces to provide for the sharing of costs incurred by the provinces in carrying out programs of vocational rehabilitation for disabled persons; to authorize the minister to undertake the co-ordination of federal activities in the field of vocational rehabilitation and to undertake research in respect to vocational rehabilitation; and for those purposes to provide for the establishment of a council to be called the national advisory council on the rehabilitation of disabled persons; and to provide further for the payment of the chairman's remuneration and of the travelling and other expenses of the members thereof and for such professional, technical, secretarial and other assistance as the council may require.

Motion agreed to.

STARRED QUESTIONS

RADIOACTIVE SAMPLING, BOW LAKE, ONT.

Question No. 51—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1959, has any sampling of radioactive material in Bow lake, Ontario, been conducted?
2. If so, what was the level of each radioactive material so found for each of the samples?
3. What was the source of these radioactive materials and have any steps been taken to have this practice discontinued or abated? If so, what steps?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The answer to part 1 of the question is yes. I would also refer the hon. member for Skeena to my reply to an earlier question about this matter, which can be found in Hansard of July 7, 1960 on page 5880.

In answer to parts 2 and 3, I might say that because these questions are part of an issue now before the mining court of Ontario it is considered inadvisable to publish the data involved before this case is decided.

RADIOACTIVE WASTE DUMPING LICENCES

Question No. 52—Mr. Howard:

1. Since Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has had authority to issue licences or permission for the dumping of radioactive wastes have any such licences or permission been granted?
2. If so, and for each such licence or permit, what is (a) the date of issue; (b) the name and address of the licencee; (c) the purpose; (d) the locale of disposal; (e) the current validity?

Mr. H. F. Jones (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): The atomic energy control board rather than Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is the licensing authority in these matters. The strict reply to the question as put, therefore, would be that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has never had authority to issue licences for permission for the dumping of radioactive wastes. In view of this reply, the second part of the question would not be applicable.

However, the board which has the authority to take such action has not issued any licences for the dumping of radioactive wastes. In connection with licences issued to persons authorizing them to obtain and use radioactive materials, the board may issue instructions regarding the disposal of such materials after use.

C.N.R. AMALGAMATION PLANS, FORT WILLIAM AND PORT ARTHUR

Question No. 59—Mr. Fisher:

1. Is the Canadian National Railways planning to amalgamate or rationalize in one place, any services or aspects of work, at either Fort William or Port Arthur, which are presently being carried out in each city?

2. If so, what services, at what time, in which place, at the cost of how many jobs, will be so changed?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): With respect to this question, the management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows. Effective January 1, 1961, under the new plan of organization in the Canadian National Railways the lakehead division and the Port Arthur division were replaced by a new administrative unit called the lakehead area with headquarters at Port Arthur. There were no staff reductions due to this consolidation, and there is nothing in immediate contemplation by way of service consolidations which would bring about staff reductions.

COMMEMORATIVE POSTAGE STAMP ISSUES

Question No. 63—Mr. Pigeon:

1. From 1936 to 1957, how many commemorative postage stamps have been issued by the Post Office Department to mark an event or a figure which is part of our national history or way of life?

2. What was the date of issue of each such stamp and the design thereof?

3. From 1957 to 1961, how many commemorative postage stamps have been issued by the Post Office Department to mark an event or a figure which is part of our national history or way of life?

4. What was the date of issue of each such stamp and the design thereof?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): The answer to part 1 of the question is 39. The answer to part 3 is 26. Answers to parts 2 and 4 of the question involve lengthy lists which it might be more convenient not to have read at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The minister is suggesting that the unread part of his answer be printed in Hansard with his oral reply. Is that agreeable to the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Jones.]

CAMPBELLTON-CROSS POINT BRIDGE, N.B.—TENDERS FOR FEDERAL SHARE

Question No. 64—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Have tenders been called for the federal share of the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge?
2. If so: (a) what was the name of each tenderer and the amount submitted? (b) to whom was the tender awarded?
3. Is it expected that the work will be completed for the amount tendered?
4. If not: (a) have any estimates been made of the extras to be paid to the contractor? (b) what amount has been paid to the contractor to date? (c) what amount remains to be paid when the work is completed?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Inasmuch as this is a long and complicated answer, might it be made an order for return, Mr. Speaker? Perhaps the hon. member for Gloucester would be satisfied if we took that course.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Caron: Perhaps the question might be allowed to stand in the absence of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: The matter is actually one for the house to decide, but let the question stand.

Question stands.

LETTER CARRIER SERVICE, URBAN CENTRES

Question No. 65—Mr. Argue:

1. What urban centres in each province with 3,000 points of call or less have been granted letter carrier delivery service since July 7, 1958?
2. On what date was each such service granted, and what are the number of points of call?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): This question also involves a somewhat lengthy list of post offices, and perhaps the answer might be printed in Hansard rather than being read at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the answer be printed in Hansard at this point, notwithstanding that it has not been read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—SETTLEMENT OF CONTRACTORS' CLAIMS

Question No. 66—Mr. Argue:

1. Have any contractors' claims against the St. Lawrence seaway authority been settled since February 1, 1958?
2. If so, what is the number, the estimated value, and the amount paid on each contract, the date of completion and the date of settlement, and the contractor's name?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this question should stand as an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Question No. 67—Mr. Argue:

1. Are there any vacancies on the board of directors of the St. Lawrence seaway authority?
2. If so, how many, what positions, how long has each been vacant?
3. Who are the present members and what are their duties?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to part 1, the answer is yes.

In reply to part 2, there is one vacancy, that of member, which position has been vacant since March 31, 1959.

In reply to part 3, the present members of the St. Lawrence seaway authority are R. J. Rankin, president, and Dr. Pierre Camu, member. Their duties are as follows. The president shall be the chief executive officer of the authority and shall preside at all meetings of the authority; he shall have the general and active direction and control of the business of the authority and of the general conduct of the affairs of the authority; he shall see that all orders and resolutions of the authority are carried into effect; he shall have general superintendence and direction of all other officers of the authority and shall see that their duties are properly performed.

During the incapacity or absence for any reason of the president, or vacancy in the office of the president, one of the other members designated by the governor in council may exercise and perform all the powers and functions of the president. Dr. Camu was so designated by P.C. 1960-1281 of September 20, 1960.

[Mr. Speaker.]

U.N. CONFERENCE, 1945—CANADIAN DELEGATION

Question No. 68—Mr. Cardin:

1. Were any members of the House of Commons, members of the Canadian delegation, either as official delegates or official observers at the founding conference of the United Nations at San Francisco in 1945?
2. If so, what are the names of any such members of the House of Commons?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 of the question is yes. In answer to part 2, those attending were Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, prime minister and secretary of state for external affairs; Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, minister of justice and attorney general of Canada; Gordon Graydon; M. J. Coldwell; Mrs. Cora T. Casselman.

In addition, the following persons now members of the House of Commons attended the conference: The present Prime Minister, John G. Diefenbaker, as advisor to the Progressive Conservative representative on the Canadian delegation; Lester B. Pearson, who was present as one of the senior advisors and alternate delegates to the delegation; J. W. Pickersgill, as a member of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King's secretariat.

UNPLACED APPLICANTS FOR JOBS

Question No. 69—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

What is the number of unplaced applications for jobs in September, October, November and December, 1960, and the latest available figures during January, 1961?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question, in tabulated form, is as follows:

Date	No. of Unplaced Applicants
September 15, 1960	346,176
October 13, 1960	357,677
November 17, 1960	452,715
December 15, 1960	640,226

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour or of his parliamentary secretary, who dealt with the answer to starred question No. 69. May I ask either of these hon. gentlemen if the answer could be completed by giving an answer to the request that we be given the latest available figures of unplaced applicants for any period during January 1961? I understand that these figures are given to the minister every week.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the figures that were asked for by the hon. member for Essex East were supplied up to the time they were available in the unemployment insurance commission offices. These figures are used for their own information in the administration of the unemployment insurance commission. Evidently these figures were not available to provide an answer when the question was put.

PERCENTAGE OF LABOUR FORCE UNEMPLOYED

Question No. 70—Mr. Chevrier:

In what years between 1945 and 1957 was the percentage of the Canadian labour force which was unemployed higher than in 1960?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is today on official business in Washington, may this question stand?

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

Starred Questions

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PAYMENTS TO FISHERMEN

Question No. 71—Mr. Carter:

Since fishermen became eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, how much has been paid out each year to fishermen (a) in Newfoundland; (b) in the maritime provinces; (c) on the Pacific coast; (d) engaged in inland fisheries?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in view of the detailed information contained in this answer may I ask that the answer be taken as read and incorporated in Hansard in tabulated form?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that the answer be taken as read and incorporated in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table referred to above is as follows:]

The amount of unemployment insurance benefit that has been paid in each fiscal year to fishermen is as follows:

	1957-58 $	1958-59 $	1959-60 $	1960-61 $ (April-Dec. only)
(a) Newfoundland	1,759,299.00	3,464,883.60	3,436,272.50	1,324,265.94
(b) Maritime provinces	2,138,492.00	4,174,734.00	4,583,592.00	1,337,510.00
(c) Pacific coast	856,606.00	1,619,505.00	1,957,398.00	563,450.00
(d) Engaged in inland fisheries	684,095.00	976,097.00	1,046,819.00	374,330.00

FREE PORT DEVELOPMENT, MORTIER BAY, NFLD.

Question No. 72—Mr. Carter:

1. Has the government at any time been made aware that a British company has shown interest in developing a free port or a transshipment port at Mortier Bay, Newfoundland?

2. Has the government received any representations from this company either directly from the parent company in Britain, its Canadian subsidiary or its agents?

3. If so, what has the government been requested to do, and what is being contemplated at the present time?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to both parts 1 and 2 is no; therefore part 3 is answered by the answer to parts 1 and 2.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' PROVIDENT FUND APPOINTMENTS

Question No. 73—Mr. Creaghan:

1. Has the governor in council appointed a secretary as provided for by section 10 of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees' Provident Fund Act?

2. If so, what is the name of the secretary, the date of his appointment and the salary paid to him out of the said fund?

3. Has the Minister of Transport appointed two chief officers from the Canadian National Railways, to serve along with the general manager as management members of the board of the said fund?

4. If so, what are their names, occupations and the date of their appointment?

5. Did the employees hold an election in 1960 to elect two members to the said board?

6. If so, what was the date of the said election and the names, addresses and occupations of the successful candidates?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 is Mr. J. L. Seaman, appointed November 1, 1960, at a salary of $1,710 per annum.

As to parts 3 and 4, the answer to part 3 is yes, and the information requested in part 4 is the following: G. H. Betz, regional comptroller, December, 1959; G. A. Blakney, employee relations officer, June, 1957.

With regard to part 5, the answer is yes.

As to part 6 the answer is as follows: January, 1960, Mr. J. C. A. Landry, despatcher, C.N.R., Montreal, and Mr. John McGee, conductor, Moncton, N.B., elected by acclamation.

Starred Questions

RENOUS NAVAL DEPOT, N.B.—CHANGE-OVER FROM COAL TO OIL

Question No. 74—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Is a change-over from coal to oil contemplated, in whole or in part, at the Renous naval ammunition depot, Renous, New Brunswick?
2. If so, will there be a reduction in personnel and to what extent?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): The answer to the first part of the question is yes; for reasons of economy a hand fired coal burner is being converted to an automatic oil fed unit in a building at the naval ammunition depot at Renous.

The answer to the second part is that this conversion will result in a reduction of four out of a total of 30 heating plant personnel at the depot.

UNEMPLOYED AS PERCENTAGE OF LABOUR FORCE, 1936-40

Question No. 75—Mr. Knowles:

What was the number of unemployed for each year, 1936 to 1940 inclusive, measured as an average percentage of the civilian labour force?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): For the reason I gave in reply to question No. 70, may this stand?

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

SECTION 96A(2), INDIAN ACT—PROCLAMATION

Question No. 76—Mr. Howard:

What is the present state of the investigation being conducted as a result of resolutions from the Indian bands of Kincolith, Canyon City, Gitlakdamix, Lakalzap, asking that section 96A (2) of the Indian Act be proclaimed to be in force?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): There has been no change in the status of the resolutions submitted by these Indian bands. The original resolutions, which were apparently initiated by the same person, did not contain sufficient information and had to be returned to the band councils concerned for redrafting. To date, corrected resolutions have been received from only one band, the Kincolith band, and that is receiving the attention of departmental officials.

UNEMPLOYED AS PERCENTAGE OF LABOUR FORCE

Question No. 77—Mr. Pickersgill:

What was the number of unemployed for each year, 1931 to 1935 inclusive, measured as an average percentage of the civilian labour force?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): For the reason I gave in reply to question 75, may this stand?

[Mr. Balcer.]

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answers given to certain starred questions I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the minister himself is now personally preparing the statistical answers on unemployment.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not personally preparing answers. The minister is in Washington for one day, and before the answer is presented to the house it is my duty to present it to my minister.

FEDERAL PRINTING DONE OUTSIDE CANADA

Question No. 78—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Is any printing done for the government outside Canada?
2. If so, what, in each case, is the nature of the printing and the reason for having it done outside the country?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): The answer to the second part of the question has been received only recently; it will not be ready until tomorrow afternoon. I would ask that the question stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

CANADIAN OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION—SURVEY GRANT

Question No. 79—Mr. Smith (Calgary South):

1. Were there any specific conditions attached to the proposed grant awarded to the Canadian Olympic association?
2. Has the government been informed of the scope of the intended survey? If so, what are the factors that will receive consideration?
3. What individual, or company, is undertaking the survey?
4. Where are their offices located, and what are their qualifications?
5. When is the report of the study likely to be made available?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The answer to the first part of the question is, it was stipulated that the sum of $10,000 represented the total liability of the crown with respect to the proposed investigation of possible sites in Canada for the 1968 winter Olympic games, if the cost of the investigation were to exceed that amount.

The answer to part 2 is, included in the survey will be the consideration of such factors as topography, climate, snow conditions, access and accommodation. The comparative values of possible sites for general recreational activities following completion of the games will also be considered.

The answer to part 3 is that the survey has been undertaken by the Foundation of Canada Engineering Corporation Limited, under the direction of its president, Mr. Per Hall.

The answer to part 4 is that the corporation's Montreal office is in charge of survey arrangements. I understand that its Calgary and Vancouver offices are also involved in the preliminary stages. This firm has carried out engineering studies of various kinds in the past, and its president has had considerable personal experience in the planning of facilities for winter sports.

Finally, the Canadian Olympic association advises that it hopes to have a complete survey report by the end of March or early April.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of his report to the house today. Would the minister consider requesting the Canadian Olympic association to ask the survey company to report on the estimated cost of bringing the alternative sites to Olympic standards, and also on the density of the population in the areas being considered?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government saw fit to give a grant to the Canadian Olympic association in an endeavour to assist them in arriving at the most suitable site in Canada in order to suggest to the international Olympic committee where the Olympic games might be held in 1968. I do not think we can go beyond that.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—SETTLEMENT OF CONTRACTORS' CLAIMS

Question No. 66—Mr. Argue:

1. Have any contractors' claims against the St. Lawrence seaway authority been settled since February 1, 1958?
2. If so, what is the number, the estimated value, and the amount paid on each contract, the date of completion and the date of settlement, and the contractor's name?

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—OUTSTANDING CONTRACTORS' CLAIMS

Question No. 77—Mr. Argue:

1. Have any contractors outstanding claims against the St. Lawrence seaway authority?
2. If so, what are their names, the number of the contract, the estimated value of each, amount paid, if any, and amount claimed, the date of completion of each contract?

WORK ORDERS, SESSIONAL PAPER NO. 170 A

Question No. 80—Mr. Argue:

1. What was the (a) estimated value; (b) actual cost, of each work order as itemized in sessional paper No. 170 A, dated January 14, 1960?
2. Were any of these work orders cost plus, and if so, which ones?
3. What is the actual amount of money outstanding on each work order as of January 1, 1961?
4. Were all these work orders included in the value of the main contract price?
5. If not, (a) which ones were so included; (b) which ones were extra work at extra payment?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FEED MILL PURCHASES OUTSIDE QUOTA SYSTEM

Motion No. 36—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, submissions, and other documents, exchanged between farm organizations and the federal government since January 1, 1960, in regard to feed mills being allowed to purchase grain outside the quota system.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): This motion is acceptable.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—DECISION OF COUNCIL RESPECTING DOCTORS AND DENTISTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the decision of the Northwest Territories council, as reported in the press, that it cannot afford the program aimed at recruiting badly needed doctors and dentists for the northland. If so, has he any comment to make on this decision?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the item in question, and I would not want to make any comment on the activities of a council with the responsibilities that this council has. However, I will have the question looked into and after communication with the council, if it is appropriate to do so, I will bring their answer to the attention of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

RED CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE OF WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house whether negotiations are going on with China for the sale of up to 32 million bushels of wheat? If so, what progress has been made in those negotiations?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all I can say at this time is that negotiations are in progress, and if any sales result an announcement will be made in due course.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister inform the house whether the cut of 1½ cents per bushel in the price of wheat at Vancouver had to do with these negotiations or was a cut made in the normal course of selling by the wheat board?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Periodically adjustments have to be made at the various ports to bring prices into line. I think this was a case in point.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a supplementary question. Has the minister inquired and can he inform the house whether the substantial sales made to China by Australia in recent weeks have been on a cash basis or under a credit arrangement between the two countries?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak with final authority in answer to that question, but I assume that as in the case of Canada, they were on a cash basis.

RUSSIA—STATEMENT ON WHEAT DELIVERIES UNDER AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked me the following question:

May I ask the Prime Minister what has been the amount of deliveries to date under the 400,000 ton agreement made in 1959.

I assume that the hon. member has reference to deliveries in the final year of the three year Canada-U.S.S.R. trade agreement concluded in 1956, under which the government of the U.S.S.R. undertook to purchase 400,000 tons of Canadian wheat annually. The answer to his question is 200,000 tons. These deliveries were made during the calendar year 1959.

PUBLICATIONS

ADDITIONAL OFFICES FOR SALE OF PRINTING BUREAU ISSUES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State. Could he inform the house whether the printing bureau intends setting up stores for the sale of federal publications in Montreal and in other large Canadian cities?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm for sending me notice of his question. Here is my answer:

Since the bookstore on Mackenzie street in Ottawa turned out to be a great success, the Queen's printer has decided to open other stores for the sale of federal publications. Arrangements were made for the rental of premises for that purpose in the city of Montreal and negotiations are about to come off. I must point out that in selling those publications, the stores will avoid entering into unfair or inadequate competition with other bookshops.

As for recruiting personnel for the Montreal store, the civil service commission will arrange a competition in due time in order to select three persons suitable for that type of work.

When the Montreal store is in operation, it will no doubt be advisable to set up others elsewhere, beginning with Toronto.

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Secretary of State a supplementary question. Has the Secretary of State any fear that this step will be an interference with provincial autonomy?

Mr. Dorion: I do not believe that question merits an answer.

COMBINES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED USE OF EGGS AS LOSS LEADER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Acting Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the use of eggs as loss leaders in Nelson and Trail is having a ruinous effect on the poultry industry, forcing some long established poultrymen out of business and also doing a great deal of damage to small retail business in the area, would the minister give consideration to recommending an investigation into these nefarious business activities in this area by the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. J. W. Browne (Acting Minister of Justice): I will take the question as notice and give an answer tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

PULPWOOD—INQUIRY AS TO SUPPORT PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of reports of speeches he has made to farm groups across the country. Has the minister reopened consideration of the policy matter arising out of farmers' and settlers' pulpwood marketing problems and the possibility of support prices for farm pulpwood?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in discussions with farm organizations in areas concerned with such matters as pulpwood this question has been considered.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INCLUSION OF FARM LABOURERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question arising out of the necessity of bringing the Canadian farm labourer under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Has the minister given serious consideration to this matter? If so, when can we expect this to be done?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister is prepared to declare government policy in answer to the question I will not prevent him from doing so. However, the question is one relating to the announcement of government policy, which is not ordinarily asked for on the orders of the day.

Mr. Argue: We should like to hear the answer.

[Later:]

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received any report from the committee that was set up to investigate whether farm labourers are eligible for unemployment insurance?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we have asked the unemployment insurance commission to give careful study to the possibility of bringing farm labourers under the act as an insured class. The unemployment insurance commission has been giving careful study to this problem, but because of the many difficulties involved in this inclusion they have not as yet reported to me or the government.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether consideration is being given to the voluntary inclusion, as opposed to the compulsory inclusion, of this class?

Mr. Starr: Both aspects are being considered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF LEGISLATION CONCERNING CANADIAN SHIPYARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) a question. Can the minister tell me whether, at such time as he introduces the bill regarding Canadian shipyards, he intends to submit this legislation to a committee of the house so that all concerned may air their views on the matter?

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether the government proposes to introduce this legislation before the Easter recess.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no decision has yet been reached with regard to referring the resolution to a committee of the house. As to the second part of the question, I trust that the bill aiming to help the shipbuilding industry in this country can be introduced in this house in the nearest possible future.

TELEVISION

REPORTED DELAY IN ACTION ON BROADCAST BOARD DECISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to address to the Minister of Transport a question of which I have given him notice. Can he indicate what are the reasons for the delay in taking action in connection with three decisions of the board of broadcast governors with respect to television applications respecting Sioux Lookout, Ontario, Saddle Mountain, British Columbia and Mount Sentinel, British Columbia, which admittedly involve the pick up of United States stations, inasmuch as these localities cannot pick up existing stations in Canada?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the only delay is that of my hon. friend in asking the question. I am able to advise the hon. member that yesterday the governor in council approved these applications for Sioux Lookout and the other two places mentioned, and that these broadcasting stations are in a position to operate at the present time.

Mr. Benidickson: May I make just a short explanation. I want to indicate that the decision was made by the board of broadcast governors on December 8. As the minister knows, I have made a number of inquiries. Otherwise I would not have asked the question. I did not know that the applications had been approved yesterday.

FISHERIES

B.C. SALMON—PROPOSED CONFERENCE TO RESTORE RUNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he has received and, if so, has accepted a reported invitation from the governor of Alaska to attend a proposed conference on February 15 to 17 to work out a program for restoring the depleted west coast salmon run.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I want to thank the hon. member for Vancouver East for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. A letter has been received from Governor Egan of Alaska proposing a conference of fishery biologists in the middle of February. The purpose of the proposed meeting is not too clear, and I am taking steps to get further details on the proposal.

GRAIN

FEED MILL AGREEMENTS WITH WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture or his parliamentary secretary. Can he tell us how many feed mills in western Canada in the wheat board area have now completed agreements with the Canadian wheat board in order to take deliveries over the quota?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has not given notice of his question, the minister may not be in a position to answer.

Mr. Nasserden: They have had notice.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister has the information.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I was hoping that my parliamentary secretary would handle this matter.

Mr. Speaker, as of today 167 feed mills have signed agreements with the Canadian wheat board. Board records show that there are an additional 49 feed mills which have operated at one time or another. It is known that some of these feed mills are no longer in operation, and others are confining their operations to selling prepared feeds which they do not manufacture. Canadian wheat board inspectors are checking with all feed mills within their territories in order to ascertain the operating feed mills which have not signed agreements with the board. Operating feed mills which do not sign agreements with the board are, of course, subject to delivery quota regulations.

Mr. Nasserden: I have a supplementary question. Will this trade be confined within provincial boundaries, and will the mills entering into these agreements be obliged to submit statements showing the deliveries or sales of grain and grain products?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Under the wheat board directive the feed mills will be obliged to show their books to the wheat board inspectors twice a year. Under the agreement their operations are confined to within provincial boundaries with, I believe, one exception, namely the town of Lloydminster, on the boundary between Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question. Has it been brought to the minister's attention that these feed mills are buying grain under this new policy at 40 cents to 50 cents a bushel below the board's final selling price for wheat?

Mr. Speakman: Utter nonsense.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): As usual, the hon. member for Assiniboia tries to disseminate information which is not backed up by proven facts. We are trying to collect information from these various feed mills as to the prices paid. There are advertisements in the papers by farmers offering grain for sale much below prices paid by the wheat board, but until we get all the facts on this situation there will be no such statement, which I think is wrong, as that given by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

I should like to point out to the house that the governments of the three prairie provinces, including the government of Saskatchewan, have come out in support of the policy that we have taken on for a year's trial, and that the farm organizations also are writing me and giving assurance that they are behind us in what we are trying to do.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask the minister whether it has been brought to his attention that a delegate body of the federated co-operatives has come out as being emphatically opposed to the government policy changing the former policy of their management.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question and answers both appear to be descending, shall I say, from the level of the factual to that of the argumentative, and I think I should not allow that second supplementary question.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): I should like to ask the minister whether he has received from bona fide grain producers in western Canada one complaint with respect to this policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member, equally with the hon. member for Assiniboia seems to be more interested in giving information than in obtaining it.

INQUIRY AS TO DIFFERENCE IN GRAIN PRICES PAID BY EASTERN FARMERS AND WESTERN MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware of the fact that prices paid by eastern farmers for grain are higher than those paid by western mills, and that, therefore, there is some discrimination detrimental to our eastern farmers?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is really an argumentative one. He has put forth a point of view under the guise of asking whether the minister is aware of something. It seems to me that is not in accordance with the proper practice on orders of the day.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT OF HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Under the authority of the minister, newspaper advertisements are appearing across the country urging Canadians to apply to Canadian banks now for loans for home improvements. I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on the response he has had to date in connection with this campaign. Also, can the minister assure the house that the banks are co-operating fully in this regard?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the co-operation of the banks rests within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. Our effort in this field is to promote and bring to the attention of the people of this country that they have the facilities of the banks available to obtain home improvements loans. By doing this we hope to bring about an activity in this field that will help to give employment to Canadians during this winter. It is difficult to ascertain or to get some idea as to the number of jobs that will be created. Our role in this matter is to promote this type of activity.

Mr. Garland: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder, in view of the absence of the Minister of Finance and in view of what the Minister of Labour has said, whether the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance would care to comment on the degree of co-operation the banks are giving in this regard.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything to be usefully added to what the Minister of Labour has said.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OTTAWA—CONSTRUCTION OF AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT HEADQUARTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the very interesting statement attributed to him, that the minister was not convinced that the 12-storey Department of Agriculture headquarters on the dominion experimental farm, built of glass, steel and aluminum, would have adequate air conditioning.

My question is this. Is the government going forward with the construction of this large building, since it has been the policy of the government, in the past at any rate, to reserve the experimental farm for its original purposes and not use any part of it for buildings of this type?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hate to once again remind the hon. member that he has a reputation for inaccuracy—

Mr. Argue: Answer the question.

Mr. Hamilton: —because the experimental farm has been used for purposes other than agriculture in the past.

This is what my position has been. First of all, with regard to any building I will authorize to be built for my department, I will consider the comfort of the people who will be working in such a building. That is No. 1. Second, I will consider the location of the building and whether it has been brought into conformity with the plans of the national capital commission. I will also consider the convenience and efficiency of the department in relation to other buildings housing government departments.

So the answer to the hon. member's question is that as soon as these various components of the problem can be brought down to the point of final decision, an announcement will be made.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—RENOVATION OF MEN'S WASHROOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. While we all appreciate his zeal and enthusiasm for the winter works program, may I ask him if it was absolutely necessary to have all the men's public washrooms in the centre block painted and varnished on the same day?

Mr. Argue: Especially a cold day.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I heard that the hon. member was running to and fro yesterday. I had not appreciated the cause until this moment. I now appreciate, however, that the plumbers and decorators were more anxious to maintain the decor of the parliament buildings than to consider the comfort of the members of parliament. I can assure the hon. member that this incident will not occur again.

CANADIAN INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT BY THE ASSOCIATE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) arising from a statement he made yesterday in this house, to the effect that industries in various provinces of this country are setting aside their expansion plans because they are worried about the future. Could the minister give the names of those industries and could he tell the house what the government intends to do to prevent industries from setting aside their expansion plans?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) I should say that the first definite information I got on that matter was given to me in private conversations and I respect the confidential nature of that information.

With your permission however, I would suggest, in answer to the hon. member, that he look around his own constituency and he will find that what I said yesterday is true.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, may I complete my question and ask the Associate Minister of National Defence if he has done anything to prevent this flight of industries?

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, I would suggest that he read in this regard the measures announced in the speech from the throne and that he study the supplementary budget; he will find that this government has done a lot through the budget to improve economic conditions in this country, a lot more than what could be achieved through the resolutions passed at the recent convention of the Liberal party.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In this budget mentioned by the minister, is there anything else than deficits?

Some hon. Members: Order.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: That information is open to all hon. members of the house.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

IMPOSITION OF DEATH PENALTY ON 14-YEAR OLD BOY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. C. Coates (Cumberland): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to indicate what action is to be taken regarding the death penalty recently imposed on a 14-year old youth?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member's question directed toward the exercise of the prerogative of mercy?

Mr. Coates: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is not in accordance with the practice of the house to accept questions directed to the government on that subject on the orders of the day or, indeed, at any time before the exercise of the prerogative.

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS RESPECTING MARGINAL LANDS, RURAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Agriculture to enter into agreements with provincial governments or agencies thereof for the undertaking jointly with those governments or agencies of projects for the alternative uses of lands that are marginal or of low productivity, projects for the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas, and projects for the development and conservation of the soil and water resources of Canada; for the payment to the provinces of contributions in respect of the cost of such projects undertaken by a province or agency thereof; to authorize the Minister of Agriculture to undertake programs of research and investigation in respect of these matters; to provide for the establishment of advisory committees and the appointment of their members, and to provide for other related and incidental matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, in moving the adoption of this resolution I do so with the full realization that it will constitute a major step forward in fulfilling our national agricultural program presented to the house on August 30, 1958, by the Prime Minister. At that time the Prime Minister stated that there was a need for a sound, comprehensive and co-ordinated program to attack specific problems and meet specific needs. He outlined a seven point program and I would like to put on record today what he said on the fifth point, which can be found on page 4347 of Hansard for August 30, 1958:

Fifth, as a means of meeting the small farm problem the government has under consideration ways and means of improving the level of living for farmers on small farms by means of better land use, encouraging the formation of economic family farm units, improving technical training, extending unemployment insurance benefits to certain classes of farm workers, and by extending the vocational and technical training agreement for the benefit of those who wish to enter new occupations.

This resolution before us today has as its main purpose the improvement of the economic position of those farmers whose land is presently classified as marginal or submarginal. However, it is not only the intention to lift up the economic status of the great number of farmers who live on these uneconomic units; the measure will also have the effect of simultaneously improving the position of farmers possessing more economic units.

Generally speaking, the objective of the national agricultural program is to give agriculture a reasonably fair share of the national income. We believe that this parity of income should not be attained by charity but by providing opportunities for the farmers to help themselves. The Prime Minister stated on August 30, 1958—and I am quoting his words—that our concept of a national policy is based on the belief that the national welfare demands positive action to meet the basic causes of distress and maladjustment in particular industries and regions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Where did he say that? On what page?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The quotation will be found on page 4345 of Hansard, and the speech extends to page 4348. I just wish to read that last line again:

Our concept of a national policy is based on the belief that the national welfare demands positive action to meet the basic causes of distress and maladjustment in particular industries and regions.

To point up the problem referred to by the Prime Minister I should like to place some figures before the house which outline the position in stark and dramatic terms. According to the economic classification of farms in the 1956 census, 21 per cent of Canadian farms produced less than $1,200 worth of produce annually. At that time, out of a total of 575,015 farms, there were 120,242 which fell into this category. I think the picture by provinces will be of interest to hon. members. I will name the provinces, then give the percentage of farms which produce less than $1,200 a year.

Province	Per cent of farms with annual production under $1,200
Newfoundland	78 per cent
Prince Edward Island	26 " "
Nova Scotia	61 " "
New Brunswick	59 " "
Quebec	28 " "
Ontario	19 " "
Manitoba	11 " "
Saskatchewan	4 " "
Alberta	9 " "
British Columbia	46 " "

The figure for Canada as a whole is 21 per cent. In the report of the royal commission on agriculture and rural life in Saskatchewan, hon. members will find farm income figures given on page 31 of volume 13, 1957, the year this report was published. Hon. members will find tables there which point out that the figures for 1950, as opposed to the figures for 1956, which I have just given, show that 26 per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan produced less than $1,200 per year. Using the same figures for Canada as a whole—using again the figures for 1950—the percentage figure was 38 per cent. Thirty eight per cent of the farmers of Canada had a gross cash income in 1950 of less than $1,200.

These figures which I have just quoted from 1950 do seem to be much worse than the figures quoted for 1956 in the report of the dominion bureau of statistics. The difference arises from the fact that they used different criteria. In 1956 the criteria used by the dominion bureau of statistics was the estimated annual production which, of course, would include the value of the goods produced on the farm. The 1950 figures, on the contrary, are based on the value of the goods sold, or in other words the gross cash income of the farms. The difference between 38 per cent in 1950 and 21 per cent in the 1956 figure produced by the dominion bureau of statistics is explained by the difference in criteria.

Recently a report was published under date of September 1, 1960 by the conservation council of Ontario. The report was to the government of that province. I should like to read to the committee one paragraph which I find in that report. At page 34 we find these words:

> It has been reported in an earlier section of this report that we have in Ontario 33 million acres of land south of the pre-Cambrian shield. About 20 million acres of this is being farmed but only 12 million acres can be considered good land. We have, then, a large acreage outside the 12 million acres which could be used for non-agricultural purposes without damaging significantly our ability to produce good and cheap food in the future.

I have read that section of the report to the committee because it leads up to their recommendation that this marginal land should be vacated where economic farming is impossible. I should like to emphasize that here in the banner province of Ontario, one of the great agricultural provinces of Canada, 40 per cent or 8 million acres of the land presently used for agriculture could be wisely turned to alternative uses.

The situation indicated by the figures I have given is not new in Canada. It goes back many years. Last session the special committee of the other place on land use in Canada studied the question of marginal and submarginal land use. Their recommendations, found at page 248 of the second report, are well worth reading. I should like to place these on the record for the information of those who study this debate:

> Whereas there is a need of elimination of problem areas in Canada where farm businesses are small, productivity low, and incomes inadequate for family requirements: The committee recommends,
> (1) (a) That further research be undertaken to define more clearly the nature of the problem in low income areas and to pinpoint their location.
> (b) That a federal-provincial rural development program be instituted to deal with areas of greatest need.
> (2) That in implementing such a program the provincial governments participate on a co-operative basis; such co-operation to include the principle that both provincial and local authorities assume major responsibility for the identification of problems and needs of local areas and the initiation, planning and development of appropriate action programs.
> (3) That the federal and provincial governments co-operate in assisting any such program with financial and technical assistance, said financial assistance to be provided through a cost-sharing agreement.
> (4) That the federal and provincial governments provide for a larger farm-management service and expansion of educational facilities with particular emphasis on leadership to ensure a prompt dissemination of the research results to those farmers who will be most benefited therefrom.
> (5) That there should be some form of co-ordination of federal departments of agriculture; northern affairs and national resources; health and welfare; labour; trade and commerce; fisheries; forestry; and citizenship and immigration with regard to activities under a rural development program.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the sixth recommendation?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In reply to the interjection of the hon. member for Essex East, in which he asked about the sixth recommendation, I should like to present this to the committee as an example of the profound interest taken by the hon. member in agriculture. There was a sixth recommendation, and this is what it says in the first sentence:

> (6) That the special committee of the Senate on land use be reconvened at next session of parliament—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right. The hon. gentleman does not want it to reconvene. Would the hon. member permit a question? Is it not a fact that my hon. friend does not want the committee to reconvene at this present session of parliament?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am presenting here what I hope will be one of the major steps in a co-ordinated national program in agriculture. I had hoped that the committee would look at this in a non-partisan way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just as the hon. member is doing now.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): For the hon. gentleman to suggest it is a fact that we do not want the special committee of the other place to deal with the question of land use in this session is so far from the truth that it is hardly worth mentioning. If the hon. member were to read on in the sixth recommendation he would find that the committee recommended that they reconvene this session to study such questions as water conservation, drainage, forestry, and so on. This is an extension of the valuable work the committee did last session. After having praised the committee as I believe I did by inference, having read their five major recommendations as the result of the work of last year, it is errant nonsense for anyone to suggest that I in particular do not want this committee to reconvene.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We shall see.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think, Mr. Chairman, it can be deduced from the terms of the resolution under discussion that the recommendations of the other house have received due consideration.

This resolution authorizes the government to enter into agreements with the provincial governments or agencies thereof for the undertaking, jointly, of three types of operations: (1) projects for the alternative use of land that are presently classified as marginal or of low productivity; (2) projects for the development of income and employment opportunities for rural agricultural areas, and (3) projects for the development and conservation of the water and soil resources of Canada.

In each of these types of projects there should be careful research by either or both the federal and provincial governments. There must be co-operation not only between the senior governments but also between the senior governments and the local people. One of the key points will be the widest possible participation not only by farmers but by every group in our rural communities. In sum total, agricultural rehabilitation and development must be a co-operative enterprise of government, groups and individuals. I suggest that this should also include the churches.

Many hon. members over the years have asked for an extension of the P.F.R.A. to all parts of Canada. I think it can be said that the third type of operation envisaged in this resolution meets that request.

The sixth point of our national agricultural program deals with conservation. As the committee knows, plans are now being completed for the holding of a "resources for tomorrow" conference in the city of Montreal in October of this year.

It may well be asked at this time what is the relationship between this resolution and our general policies and plans on conservation. Actually there is a very close relationship. There was a meeting of the federal and provincial ministers, who make up the policy subcommittee of the national steering committee of this conference, in Ottawa last December 12 and 13. At that time I explained to the provincial ministers that everything envisaged in this bill would be in harmony with the proposed purposes of the "resources for tomorrow" conference. It is my judgment, Mr. Chairman, that the "resources for tomorrow" conference may expand the terms of reference that we have in mind in this bill, but I seriously doubt whether it in any way will suggest any diminution of its purposes.

Having said these things about the background and purposes of the bill, I should like to go on and outline in general terms how it would operate. Broadly, the intent would be to assess, with the provinces, the agricultural areas which are in need of rehabilitation and to determine the type of assistance which would be most appropriate to achieve this end. Certainly the development of alternative economic uses for marginal agricultural lands will have a large part in the total program. I need mention only two instances of this. One is the encouragement of farm woodlots, of tree farming, of county forests, of reversion into crown lands, and so on, as an example of the thing to be done mostly in eastern Canada. The second example I can give is the conversion of marginal cropping land in western Canada to grass by means of the technique that we know so well out there, namely the community pasture technique. These are only some of the examples of alternative economic uses for land. Others deal with urban expansion, recreation, and so on.

Steps of this nature serve three purposes. They provide for better utilization of marginal agricultural land; they provide new sources of income for people in the area, and to the extent that they remove lands from agricultural cropping they will help to reduce surpluses which constitute a serious problem for agriculture.

In addition to developing alternative land uses, the legislation also envisages the development of new income opportunities for people in rural areas. Local industry, recreation and technical training are among the ways and means that will be considered. The development of this phase of the program envisages a large measure of local participation. It is proposed that the federal and provincial authorities would provide guidance to local groups in assessing their own circumstances and developing new sources of income. It is, of course, intended that all services and agencies of the departments of government in Canada which can contribute to this will be brought to bear in the total effort. It is also envisaged that the federal government, in co-operation with provincial governments, universities, educational institutions and individuals will carry out programs of research and investigation in the general field of rural development.

Finally, the legislation will authorize the Minister of Agriculture to enter into agreements with the provinces to carry out soil and water conservation projects for agricultural purposes. The importance of this, I think, is understood very well by all members who have farmers in their ridings.

I should like to make it clear that it is not the purpose of this legislation to reduce the number of farmers. Those who feel that the small farm problem can be resolved by arbitrarily uprooting people from their farms do not, in my view, understand the deep attachment of rural people to their home surroundings. This legislation is designed, rather, to help by various means to improve the income and standard of living of the small and more marginal family farms, and in that way help to improve the over-all position of agriculture.

In recent months I have discussed these broad proposals in very general terms with the provincial ministers of agriculture and the farm organizations, and have found them quite sympathetic to the principles which are involved. Pending the introduction of the bill in parliament I was not able to discuss the proposals in detail and I should like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that following first reading of the bill, it be laid over so I will have an opportunity to go to the provinces and the farm organizations and discuss it with them in more detail, with the idea that since it is going to require co-operative action with the provinces, and should have the full support of farm organizations, they should be able to comment before we proceed to the final stage.

As I said earlier, the problems that this bill is designed to come to grips with have been known for a long time. I personally heard them discussed over 30 years ago. I well remember hearing one leading figure of the province from which I come make the statement that some day some government would have the courage to tackle the problems of the marginal farmer. I am very pleased that the agriculture ministers of the various provinces—all the provinces—and the leaders of the farm organizations have indicated their support of the principles of this bill. I know that every member from a farm riding will have knowledge of areas within his riding, or groups of people within his riding, which could be helped and benefited by the type of agreement that we envisage in this program. I hope that during the discussion of the bill those members will bring forward their various ideas on how this bill can be used in their particular ridings so that we may get the ideas at the administrative level on what should be done.

I like to think that at long last the full resources of mind and energy of the best agricultural brains in Canada at all levels will be brought to bear on the problems of the small farmer to help the small farmer help himself, not only at the local level but right down to the individual farmer. Under this bill, the full scope and influence of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, the Farm Credit Act and the Crop Insurance Act can be utilized. I feel that these four acts working together in unison can become a comprehensive co-ordinated attack on the basic weaknesses of the agricultural economy.

Most of the preliminary preparation of this legislation, as is well known, has been under the capable guidance of my predecessor who is now the Minister of National Defence. My task will be the working out of the agreements with the provinces and providing the co-ordination among the various departments at Ottawa to help make this program a success. I want to be able to say that no longer is agriculture looking at its problems in a vacuum, but is now turning its eyes to the broader horizons of opportunity that exist for the use of the land, the water and air which are the natural assets of the farmer. I realize that I am not expressing new ideas, but I do feel very humble that the opportunity has fallen to me to put them into legislative form and at long last get at the task of helping the small farmer to his feet. Their problems have been a blemish on the record of our society for decades, and every member of the house, I hope, will share the satisfaction of making a contribution to such a forward step in the field of agricultural development.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, before the minister resumes his seat I wonder whether I might ask him a question which I think has a great deal to do with the application of this measure and the discussion that will take place subsequently. Can the minister give the committee some idea of the apportionment of cost as between the federal government and other authorities? Is the federal government planning to bear the bulk of the cost of this program, as has been done in connection with P.F.R.A., or is there to be a 20 per cent provision or something of that nature along the lines of crop insurance? Proportionately speaking, how much of the cost of this whole scheme is the federal government prepared to bear?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, in my discussions with the agriculture ministers from the various provinces this point was raised. I think the best way I can answer the question is to say that as ministers of agriculture we recognize that not only will there be different types of agreements with the various provinces in view of their different problems, but there will also be several types of agreements within each province to meet certain conditions. We also recognize as ministers that under each of these various types of agreements, varying proportions will be paid by the governments. We also recognize that some parts of this legislation will not cost either of the two senior governments a great deal except for advice and the energy to carry that advice to the local group.

The answer I will give is that with respect to some types of agreements I would suggest that the sharing will be on a 50-50 basis, whereas in other types of agreements it may be that the federal government will pay the larger share or contribute the whole cost and work out some self-liquidating device to meet that advance. In other types of agreements it may be that the provinces will bear the total cost or a great deal of the cost because the matter comes within their responsibility. In that event we will co-operate in any way that will help their activities.

In discussing the matter with me the provincial ministers expressed, as I say, great sympathy with the principles involved. Two ministers did raise the question that when it came down to agreements with their provinces they would want to see what the price tag was going to be. I think I have said enough to indicate that with regards to certain types of projects, having in mind the physical ones now, there will be a sharing based on the precedents of the past. With regard to other types involving new agreements, I certainly will have no way of knowing what the basis of sharing will be until we sit down and work out what we want to do and how best to achieve it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this is my first opportunity to congratulate the minister on his transfer from the department over which he presided before he came to the Department of Agriculture. I assure him that he will have all the co-operation he will merit. He may be sure that the proposals he makes to the house will be carefully scrutinized, as in the national interest they must be. But subject to these contingencies we extend to the minister our very warmest wishes with respect to the assignment that has been given him in the assumption of these new and heavy responsibilities.

There can, of course, be no criticism of the object of the resolution. However, while the resolution is far-reaching it is couched in very high sounding and vague language. It certainly is not specific, as the reply to the question asked a few moments ago indicated. If we had received from the minister a more detailed explanation of what the resolution seeks to do it would not warrant the criticism which I have thus far made of it. Certainly the minister sought to establish the idea that the philosophy behind this resolution is either one which he himself has conceived or which the government has established. Little reference was made to the work of the committee in the other place. No attention whatsoever was paid to the fact that the very important work launched by the committee of the other place was undertaken as the result of action by the government of Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent and in particular by that right hon. gentleman.

In the statement he has made the Minister of Agriculture also ignores the fact that there are other agencies, both provincial and federal, that have worked on this problem for some time. He has mentioned in passing the work under the P.F.R.A., an organization which has done a wonderful job, and undoubtedly if its scope were extended to take in the whole of the country it could accomplish many of the important activities outlined in the general words of the resolution.

The minister referred to the committee of the other place known as the conservation and land use committee, which made an extremely important and valuable start in compiling information as to actual conditions obtaining in the provinces with a view to recommendations on specific projects that might be undertaken. The minister has mentioned, of course, and quite properly and necessarily so, the co-operation with the provinces that is indispensable in a matter of this sort. However, that co-operation might easily be used by either level of government as an excuse for no action at all. We know of other instances in the history of this government, when projects have depended upon provincial co-operation, and the government has been able to hide behind the inaction of particular provinces to excuse its own inaction.

If the minister had been more specific in the reply he made to the hon. member for Assiniboia with regard to executive responsibility, with regard to the matter of financial responsibility and the distribution thereof, he would have given us some basis to determine when we may expect action from the government with regard to the long term aspects of this problem. The resolution before us, of course, is not designed to meet the current situation, according to my understanding of what the minister has said. It is long term in its implications. Indeed, if it were intended to have immediate effect we would have expected the minister to give assurances that no action would be taken by the government that would add to the great severity which prevails in the country at the present time in the matter of unemployment.

Since the beginning of the session we have been trying to persuade this administration to take effective steps to deal with certain emergency situations, including unemployment and the most serious problems that the industrial sector of the economy is facing. As most of us know, it is suffering from both short term and long term difficulties, which are reflected in the amount of unemployment and which are certainly not going to be overcome by the timid and confused programs presented by the government since the beginning of the session.

The agricultural sector of the Canadian economy also suffers from both short term and long term problems. The current crisis of Canadian agriculture is illustrated not so much by mounting unemployment, as in the industrial sector, but by declining farm income. I would hope that it was not the intention of the government, before the labours of the committee of the other place were completed, to introduce this measure for the purpose of conveying to the farmers of our country that their present plight was going to be dealt with effectively by this kind of measure. I would hope that the minister would not seek to use this device as a means of diverting our attention from the very serious plight that at this very time confronts the farmers of our country. We cannot forget that if we take this position we are encouraged to do so by the very propaganda of the government. We will not forget their recent statement in one of the résumés of their great achievements when they said this:

> Recognition on a scale unsurpassed in Canadian history has been given to the difficult problems of our farm communities. Realistic price supports have been introduced for the first time in our history. Federal aid to Canadian farmers has more than doubled.

This Conservative propaganda is designed as usual to distort the facts and to mislead.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The real test of any farm policy is not the amount of relief received by the farmers; it is to be found in the rate of increase in farm income. This is the only real test of success. When we apply that test, the failure of this government's farm policy appears in its true perspective.

During the last ten full years of the previous administration—that is between 1947 and 1956 inclusive—farm net income was on the average $1,459 million. In 1958, the first full year of the present government's administration, farm net income reached $1,417 million, or $42 million less than the ten-year average under the former Liberal administration. In 1959 farm net income was only $1,260 million, a figure which represents a drop of about 12 per cent in comparison with that of 1958.

I have not the figures of a farm net income for 1960, but the national accounts provide information on accrued net income of farm operators from farm production. Accrued net income gives some indication of farm net income. The estimate for the first nine months of 1960 showed a further decline of 2.9 per cent as compared with the same period in 1959. These are the most reliable figures available at the moment and they show, first, that in the three full years of Conservative administration farm net income has been consistently lower than the ten-year average under the previous administration. Second, since the first full year of Conservative administration farm income has been declining steadily and the drop may reach as much as 15 per cent.

Those facts give a picture which is far different from the picture given to us by the government. We remember the promises made by the government. Those promises are not going to be fulfilled by the legislation based on this resolution. We remember the promise made to eliminate the cost-price squeeze.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member has made a statement and I should like to ask this question, Mr. Chairman. Can he name one promise we made with regard to agriculture that has not been fulfilled or is not on the way toward being fulfilled?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is exactly what I am doing now. I said the cost-price squeeze promise has not been fulfilled. Hon. members opposite were going to eliminate the cost-price squeeze. Each farmer was going to know one year in advance the price he would get for his products.

Mr. Speakman: He does know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He does not. We were told that surpluses would be disposed of and that a fair share of the national income would be guaranteed to agriculture. Not one of these promises has been fulfilled after nearly four years of office of the present administration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is why the farmers of Canada are losing confidence in this government. I want to emphasize the fact that the measure introduced by the present resolution will not do anything to solve any of these problems. In its approach to these problems, as well as in its approach to the problem of unemployment, the government is failing completely to meet its immediate and important responsibilities. It asserts that it is trying to solve the problems of tomorrow but it ignores the urgency of today. The farmers and the industrial unemployed are suffering today. The rosy picture of things to come presented by the government is not going to reduce the present misery in any way. The government has failed completely to see the fundamental changes that have occurred in recent years in Canadian agriculture. Our agriculture is not an homogeneous industry where each unit faces the same problems. Basically agriculture today must be regarded to consist of two main sectors.

Mr. Smallwood: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When I am finished.

Mr. Smallwood: Right now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. The first one includes the actual or potential commercial farmers having a farm of economic size, with good arable land. This sector of Canadian agriculture does not need or want government relief. It needs primarily adequate market outlets, good credit facilities, a continuous flow of information from technical and economic research, efficient processing, distribution and marketing services and adequate protection against abnormal fluctuations in costs and prices. The main requirement, of course, is a growing market which can only be obtained by a prosperous industrial economy at home and expanding trade policies abroad. Those farmers are a great asset to our country and although they are facing serious difficulties today they are not receiving any encouragement from this government, or certainly not any consistent with the assurances which this administration has given them. On the contrary, the farmers about whom I have been speaking are the main victims—

Mr. Regnier: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —of the restrictive and protective trade policy of the government.

Mr. Regnier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I should like to ask the hon. member who has the floor from what report he is reading.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member for Essex East does not wish to be interrupted, he is not obliged to permit a question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The second sector of our agricultural economy is composed of those farmers located where the land and other resources are marginal or poorer for farming. In our agricultural economy this type of farmer has become the great victim of automation and technological change just as the unskilled worker has been losing his place in our industrial life.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Who wrote that speech?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): To these questions this government does address itself in this measure but in a way that is so vague as to suggest that the most that can be done is to give it support in principle.

The minister referred to the recommendations of the Senate committee. He read out five of them and I prodded him to read the sixth recommendation of the committee on July 13, 1960. Why did he not read out the recommendations of the same committee on July 8, 1959? The first recommendation provided as follows and I quote from page 488:

> That the soil survey being co-operatively carried out by the federal Department of Agriculture, the provincial departments of agriculture and the colleges of agriculture be speeded up and expanded not only in order to complete the soil mapping of the whole settled area of Canada, but also of the unsettled areas.

This policy brought in by this government, commendable as it is in principle, is two years late. Why did it not follow the statement or the magna carta of the Prime Minister, whose speech the hon. gentleman referred to and from which he quoted so extensively a few moments ago. Why did not the minister, who now asks for objective assessment of this resolution, refer to the statement made by the former prime minister of Canada who spoke in Toronto on November 20, 1956 on this very matter?

Mr. Speakman: And did nothing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member says he did nothing. May I say that he was the one who set up the committee which drafted the basis for this resolution? Mr. St. Laurent, who did so much for agriculture said this:

> I am convinced that some of the land in eastern Canada that hard working Canadians are trying to use as farms should go back to forest and water conservation uses and those attempting to live on them resettled in more rewarding surroundings. I therefore suggest that it should be the urgent business of all levels of government and private enterprise, individual and co-operative, to see to it that agricultural production keeps up with our increase in population and thus provides the farming population with a fair share of the national income.

That is what Mr. St. Laurent said in 1956. The result was the setting up of this committee in the other place, which has done such valuable work, first under the chairmanship of a former distinguished member of this house, the former member for Quebec East, and now under Senator Pearson.

The legislation as outlined by the minister today represents in every particular recommendations made by that committee, directly or indirectly. It is also based on the report of the Gordon commission. I refer to that report of December, 1956, at page 28, where the commission recommended certain things, inter alia. It was suggested that the federal government should co-operate in the same way with any other province where similar problems exist, provided they are assured of the co-operation of the provincial governments concerned. The report says:

> We suggest that if the people and the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are interested in co-operating in such a plan, the federal government should assist the governments of these three provinces—

Then I leave out certain words and quote again from the report of the Gordon commission:

> We suggest that in any such appraisal of the best land use in this area, particular attention be directed to increasing the forestry potential with a view to increasing the incomes of the people in this part of the country.

Then the report goes on to point out that what it recommends for these maritime provinces, the Atlantic area, would have equal application to the other provinces of Canada.

The minister has today made no references whatsoever to the valuable work of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. He has before him now, I take it, the model bill provided by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture for the consideration of the government.

I would like to know from the minister later on when he speaks whether the project that he has in mind is not either that identical bill or one that incorporates its provisions. At any rate, no one can deny that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has made a valuable contribution to this problem. But not one word was uttered by the minister today about that contribution or the representations made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

I have before me the brief of 1957 and the brief of 1959 of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture presented to the Senate committee on land use, studying the problem of the small farm unit. I have, likewise, a copy of the model bill. I ask the minister now, does he not think that he would have strengthened his position by referring to the viewpoints of other bodies, of the farm organizations? Does he not think that if he had given credit to Mr. St. Laurent and to the committee of the other place he would have strengthened his position?

He did not do these things because he is the arch-propagandist of the government and wanted to convey the impression in the country that this government, having given a new vision from which he was now departing, in the former department, was now about to create a newer vision still, one that was going to bring heaven and earth to the farmers of our country.

I say that whatever merit there is in this proposal—and there is, of course, fundamental merit in it, vague as the language is—that is because of the work of Mr. St. Laurent, of his government, of the committee and bodies like the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

The minister said nothing about particularizations emphasized by the federation. The federation pointed out that this kind of a project, to be effective, must cover certain areas of activity; it must cover research; it must cover community and industrial development; it must cover agricultural education and extension, vocational training, the reestablishment of economically disadvantageous farms and rural people, land and water conservation, and finally recreation and tourist development.

Are we to understand that because the minister did not include all of the recommendations, the legislation that he has in mind is not intended to be as far-reaching as that? If not, the minister will certainly run counter to the representations made by a body of the farmers of this country who have given careful consideration to this vital and important problem.

What does the minister say about the recommendations made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture with regard to taking direct measures to relieve the position of the very low income farmers who have a variety of reasons for little hope, unassisted, of escaping from their present depressed economic position?

What does he say about the proposal to help the diminishing number of farmers who remain in agriculture to use their land to the best possible advantage and increase their income earning potential? What does he say about the recommendations made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which are to be found in their brief of March 21, 1957, at page 2? What does the minister say about the various statements of the problem beginning at page 3 and extending right on to page 5, numbering seven?

What about the proposed solutions, those dealing with soil, land use and other economic and social surveys, and so on? What does the minister say about the proposal with regard to rehabilitation and re-establishment proposed by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture?

Not one word was said by the minister about the proposal for a special credit agency that must be integrated into a scheme such as this. These are matters which the minister—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I must rise on a point of personal privilege. The hon. member made a flat statement that I did not refer to the credit scheme and so on. If he had listened to my speech, I made that very clear.

An hon. Member: Your speech was written yesterday by somebody else.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, Mr. Chairman, you will observe that that is the kind of observation which the minister is entitled to make by way of argument, but it certainly is not a matter of privilege.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I have stated flatly my point of privilege as quietly and as courteously as I can, that the hon. member for Essex East has misinformed the house when he says I did not mention that matter. I told him very quietly and courteously that I did mention it. When I catch him in an untruth, he says it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that this is the second time the Minister of Agriculture has taken up my time with points of order that are not points of order and with questions of privilege that are not questions of privilege. However, I have no objection.

If some of the matters referred to in these two briefs were to be implied in the speech of the minister given a few moments ago, he will have an opportunity to clearly indicate them. All I am now saying is that the minister did not refer to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture at all. He made no reference to their briefs, and I am surely entitled to say that the minister has ignored their recommendations and in the plan he has in mind he seemingly has no intention of following their recommendations. I know the minister is impatient; he does not like these things being pointed out to him. But he is the author of his present difficulty, and I am not.

The situation, briefly, is this. The former government under Mr. St. Laurent recognized that something had to be done—

An hon. Member: Why didn't you do it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —over the long term to deal with agriculture. Toward that end he caused to be set up in the other place a study that has been made progressively up until this time. That study, according to the other place is not yet finished. It is a study that will in the long term address itself to at least 25 per cent of the farming population of our country, and in other particulars to all of the farmers of our country, in a manner designed to deal with the fundamental crisis that does face agriculture at the present time.

Any measure designed to meet that fundamental situation will receive the support of every member of this house. It will encourage the co-operation of government at all levels, provincial and municipal as well as federal, and all voluntary bodies.

The minister says he does not intend to proceed with this measure right away; that he does not intend to proceed until the provinces have had an opportunity of examining this legislation in detail. I say that having brought forward a proposal such as this, having taken these various steps, the minister must not now, on the occasion of his first presentation of agricultural policy to this house, regard this so-called achievement of his as in any way meeting or satisfying the promises made by the Prime Minister and other members of the government to the farmers of Canada in the elections of 1957 and 1958.

The farmers are now faced with a critical situation in terms of loss of income. The Minister of Agriculture himself acknowledged this when he pointed out the number of farmers in Saskatchewan whose income is less than $1,200 a year—the number of farms in Ontario, the largest province, from which income has fallen to below substandard levels. That is a statement of the situation in our country. The minister, together with the anxious members who sit behind him, must not think that by the introduction of this measure they are going to satisfy the farmers who today are concerned about their income position.

This, like the other legislation introduced by this government before Christmas, is designed in principle to meet the long term need. It overlooks, it evades the present situation. The legislation respecting vocational training, the legislation with regard to small business and the establishment of a productivity council—these were measures introduced by the government prior to Christmas—were all long term in their effects. But hon. gentlemen opposite sought in their design to give the impression to the Canadian people that the government had embarked on a vigorous campaign to alleviate unemployment conditions in our country.

Now, again today, this government by royal commission, this government of procrastination, ineptness and postponement, seeks to convey to the Canadian farmers as it did to the Canadian industrial worker, that it is going to meet their problems by introducing something which has all the earmarks of full acceptability but which is not designed, as the minister's own words indicate, to cope with the actual conditions confronting the Canadian farmer.

I again offer the hon. gentleman my congratulations on being named Minister of Agriculture. I had hoped he would have been able in the first instance to address himself immediately to the crisis currently confronting the farmers of Canada. Since he has not done that, he may be assured that this measure, to the extent that it will help in meeting the problems facing the farmers of Canada in the long term, will receive our full support. But as one who represents in this house many farmers I deplore and regret that once again we are going to be given, this time through the new Minister of Agriculture, a further demonstration of the government's utter incapacity to meet the problems facing the Canadian people.

Mr. Charlton: Would the hon. member for Essex East permit a question? Did the federal Department of Agriculture between the years 1935 and 1957, during which years the hon. member for Essex East was a member of the government, ever assist the soil survey work carried out for 30 years by the department of agriculture in Ontario?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member, who does me the favour of saying I was a member of the government for all that length of time, has been in this house for about as long as I have, and I should not need to have to remind him that no one has made a greater contribution to agriculture, ministerially, than the former minister of agriculture who had the responsibility, for example, of administering P.F.R.A. With regard to soil studies, would the hon. member deny that the federal government did assist the province of Ontario in studies of the very kind to which he is referring. Would he deny that the agricultural school at Ste. Anne de Bellevue—

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am answering the question. Would he deny that assistance was given—Mr. Chairman, you must restrict these primitives here who will not enable me to make a reply. I would also answer the question by saying that soil studies—the former government authorized studies to be made by the agricultural college at Ste. Anne de Bellevue for the purpose of finding out more about soil. Indeed, the federal government under Mr. St. Laurent and Mackenzie King made all sorts of grants to all sorts of bodies for this and for other studies.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I understood the hon. gentleman to say that P.F.R.A. was started by the former minister of agriculture and I should like to correct the record on that point—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not say that. I recognize that an earlier minister of agriculture, Mr. Weir, was among those responsible for its origin, along with Mr. Thompson and a Mr. Spence, a former member of parliament. But in any event the main administration, the real foundation for P.F.R.A. was the responsibility of the government of Mackenzie King and St. Laurent and the administration was carried out by Mr. James Gardiner.

Mr. Argue: I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture. Certainly all members of the house will support any program, no matter how long term its nature, which promises to bring some measure of stability to the agriculture industry. The whole question of conservation of land and water use, rural redevelopment and so on is something which has occupied the minds of former governments, all members of this house and all members of the other place for a long time, and we shall await with interest the development of any program directed towards this laudable objective.

The statement made by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon was very wordy. It contained a lot of fine phraseology, but I think it lacked any great substance and failed to throw any very clear light on what the government is, in fact, proposing to do.

The hon. member for Essex East made a very interesting statement to the committee. No doubt the fact that the Liberal party has such a large array of very competent and highly qualified research assistants has assisted the hon. gentleman.

I do not want in any way to detract from the hon. member for Essex East who shows in this chamber a great capacity to appear well-informed on subjects about which he has very little knowledge. I shall always remember and admire how on one occasion the hon. gentleman spoke eloquently for almost 30 minutes on the whole question of deficiency payments. I thought at the time how much better it would have been if the hon. gentleman had spent one or two minutes briefing himself with respect to the definition of deficiency payments.

I wish to welcome back to the chamber the Minister of Agriculture. He has been here only once or twice since parliament reconvened. He has become a rather transient or travelling minister. On most days during this session I have had prepared questions on agriculture to ask to the minister but he was not in the house because he had very important engagements to fulfil in various parts of this country.

The hon. member for Essex East has referred to the minister as the arch propagandist of the government. This government needs a salesman and the minister is doing his best to sell a very difficult product to the Canadian electorate, namely the record of the government.

I believe the minister is wise in not attempting to push through parliament the bill that will follow this resolution before consulting with the provincial governments. I think a great error was made on a former occasion with respect to the crop insurance bill when the government took a rather high-handed attitude and introduced the legislation, pushed it through and made a provision under which the great bulk of the cost of crop insurance would be borne by the provincial governments and insured farmers and little would be borne by this government.

I hope that in the negotiations that take place in working toward agreements under this proposed measure the government will be generous in its contribution, will give some leadership to the province and will embark upon programs that will assist in agricultural redevelopment and in the improvement of rural life.

The great question facing the farmers of this country is the matter of current income and markets for current products. The measure before the committee this afternoon is a long term one. I do not say that tree planting, tree farming and pulpwood farming do not have some part to play in the agricultural economy but in going about the nation talking to farmers the present minister has become known as the Christmas tree Minister of Agriculture.

When you tell the farmer that the answer to his problems under the latest proposal of the government is that he should plant trees and produce pulpwood he will say, "That is fine for my grandchildren, but what am I going to do to sell my current products at a reasonable price?"

The minister said the government had four agricultural policies. This will be the fourth measure placed on the statute books. The minister said these policies would provide solutions to the problems of agriculture. In the judgment of this group the first and foremost policy this government should adopt and which it has failed to provide is one that would establish parity prices for agricultural commodities.

The government's legislation on the statute books in relation to support prices for agricultural commodities has been in the main a cruel hoax. Following the passage of Bill No. 237, as it was then known, farmers across Canada felt that under that legislation the government would provide parity prices for agricultural commodities. The fact of the matter is, as the record shows, that under this government's price support policies, with deficiency payments and the establishment of averages, the farmer in the main has received lower prices for the chief products that have been supported than he received in the years immediately prior to this government taking office. Instead of receiving improved prices for hogs and eggs the farmer has received lower prices under the program adopted by this government. The first thing this government should do is to fulfil its election commitments establishing parity—not charity—prices, instead of the present policy the government follows which has provided neither parity nor charity as far as the average farmer is concerned.

The second essential thing in terms of agricultural policy which is not dealt with in this resolution is the need to provide markets for surplus agricultural commodities. There is a great challenge facing this government. It is not one of shutting down the small farm which this legislation must inevitably mean as well as the consolidation of farms. This legislation, of course, means that. The challenge is not that of pushing the small farm out of existence to provide an acceleration of economic units. The great challenge is to move the vast glut of surplus agriculture products to market. This is the challenge and the minister in this instance should raise his sights.

The government should be undertaking programs to get rid of our wheat, barley and butter.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Would the hon. member permit a question. I would like to ask the hon. member where he was when the Vancouver grain handlers strike was on for three weeks at which time we could have shipped another 10 million bushels of wheat?

Mr. Argue: According to the Canadian wheat board we did not lose any sales. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman. It is this government that was and is responsible. This is a work for the general advantage of Canada. This is the minister who sat with hands folded and did nothing. The minister and the government allowed the strike to go on without exerting authority.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Answer my question. Where were you?

Mr. Pickersgill: Where were you?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Was the hon. gentleman in the bulrushes?

Mr. Argue: The minister may reply later if he wishes. The hon. gentleman has a great facility for distracting attention and setting up a kind of sideshow.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is one.

Mr. Argue: The government has failed to deal with agricultural policies relating to support prices and markets for surplus commodities and in view of its abysmal failure in order to distract attention it has set up this sideshow which is nice entertainment. We are appreciative of it but it is only a sideshow in relation to the great problems facing the agricultural communities.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Every farmer wants to know where the hon. gentleman was.

Mr. Argue: The minister said he was going to raise his sights with respect to getting markets for Canadian wheat. When he did so he got his sights up to a mark 20 million bushels lower than the accomplishment of the former minister of trade and commerce. This inability of the Minister of Agriculture to dispose of the surplus agricultural commodities in the world today condemns the government's over-all agricultural policy.

The third proposal I suggest in this period of depressed markets is farm storage of surplus farm commodities, particularly grain. I suggest that in conjunction with such a policy there should be guaranteed to the grain producers of western Canada an annual quota of eight bushels per specified acre. If the government fails to obtain markets adequate for producers to fulfil this quota then they should be paid for grain held on the farm. With respect to the difference between the amount sold and that held on the farm they should be paid farm storage as well. That, Mr. Chairman, would be a great step forward in the development of an over-all agricultural policy.

I would suggest that in this resolution providing for the improvement of agriculture generally there should be a provision for national marketing boards to provide, at the producer's request, stability in the assembling, processing and marketing of agricultural products. The government should cease and desist from the policy of tearing down the stabilized marketing system for grain that has been built up by so many years of sacrifice and at such great cost in energy on the part of the people who were supporting it.

The government is wrong and in error in its policy of allowing feed mills of this country literally to steal grain from producers who are in distressed circumstances at prices lower than the Canadian wheat board—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair has been quite lenient with the hon. member. He has been wandering all over the general agricultural field, and I would ask the hon. member to stick more to the resolution than he has been doing.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the minister ranged very widely in his discussion. I think you will have to agree that he discussed the whole ambit of the government's agricultural policy. He did not stick to this one resolution. He talked about agricultural credit, he talked about the government's proposed support program, and so on. I am not going to deal at length with other things that I think should be in this program or to deal at length with comments on those other policies. I suggest that since the minister, in introducing this statement, discussed not only the provisions of this motion but other parts of the agricultural program, it is in order for hon. members on this side of the house to make comments, not as the minister did on the adequacy of the government's over-all program but rather on the inadequacy of the government's over-all program.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the hon. member proceeds, I should like to support what he has said on the point of order because it will arise in connection with other hon. members over here. I was listening to the hon. member for Assiniboia very carefully. What he was saying was that instead of doing what is recommened in the resolution, certain other things should be done first.

This resolution begins with "It is expedient". Now, surely, the main point that one is asking on this resolution is whether this is expedient or something else is expedient. It seems to me it would be an abridgment of our traditional rights to restrict the discussion as suggested. In any event, it would be an abridgment of our traditional rights to seek to limit us in the way in which the hon. member says the minister was not limited.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): May I speak on the point of order? I should like to support the stand taken by the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, for this reason. This is one of the major parts of the government's national agricultural program and can be discussed intelligently only if the whole program can be referred to and discussed in toto. I would suggest it would do great harm to the discussion of this bill at the resolution stage, and certainly at the second reading stage, if we limited the discussion to the narrow terms of this part of the national agricultural program.

The Deputy Chairman: May I say just one thing. Of course, under standing order 59(2) speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. The Chair does not make the rules; the Chair tries to interpret them and the Chair tends to be very lenient in so far as that is possible.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the Chair is very fair.

Mr. Argue: I think we are all in a very generous mood at the moment. While I agree very much with the Chairman, that the rule must be enforced, there is another well-known practice in this house and that is, if there is unanimous agreement, our own procedure is in our own hands. I think, however, on the point of order the minister is correct, that in dealing with such a large part of the government's agricultural policy it is very difficult not to make reference to other parts or, indeed, to make proposals as to additional projects which should be contained in the resolution.

I was pointing out, Mr. Chairman, that I thought there should be provision for national marketing. I want to make it the fifth suggestion. As part of the government's agricultural program a board of livestock commissioners should be established to provide for scientific grading standards to protect farmers' interests in the market. I think that such a board would receive the support of the agricultural community and could do a good deal to ensure that farmers were given fair grades for the products they sell and when given a fair grade get an appropriate price for that grade at that time.

As point six I suggest that if we are to provide for the stabilization of agriculture and for rural development in the world as we know it the government should have the support of this house in all of its efforts to have a workable international food pool established under the United Nations. This is another long term proposal, of course. A working international food pool is essential, not just from the standpoint of the co-ordination of the agricultural industry in exporting nations but it is necessary to the welfare of people in all parts of the world.

The seventh suggestion I have to make is that steps should be taken at an early date to provide that some of our surplus food should be made available by appropriate means to low income groups within our society. At a time when there is widespread unemployment there is naturally a growing demand that the government undertake measures to make surplus Canadian food more readily available to Canadians who have inadequate and low incomes.

At this point, I might say I hope that this government will no longer delay action in making available surplus food from Canada to help starving peoples wherever they may be, and I have special reference to starvation in the Congo at this time.

Point number eight that I have listed here, Mr. Chairman, is an improvement and an extension of the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which I think are part and parcel of any kind of a rural redevelopment program. I think the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which has been on the statute books for many years, is the kind of program that, if developed, will meet loss of income through crop failure much more adequately than the crop insurance scheme that is now on the statute books, a scheme that in the very nature of things will be available for many years to come only to a minority of agricultural producers, that minority being those producers who have few crop failures and therefore can afford to pay the lower rates of insurance.

The need for support for rural income, the need for the development of an agricultural program, is very great. I want to remind the Minister of Agriculture that in his statement about the program he is putting forward there was no reference to the need of assistance to farmers in the development of a system of adequate farm to market roads. The minister may throw up his hands and say: This has no part in a national government policy. I differ. I think it is time we had a national road policy in this country.

The United States have had one since 1912 whereby federal money and federal leadership are provided in establishing transcontinental highways and in constructing farm to market roads and roads over which school buses travel.

The cost of roads in rural Canada with its diminishing population is one of the heaviest burdens that exist for farmers today. Taxes for roads are high, and if the government wishes to do something that will assist the small farmer and will assist the development of rural areas I suggest that this is a provision that cannot be overlooked. I know that the minister has studied very carefully, and I congratulate him for it, the reports of the Saskatchewan royal commission on agriculture and rural life, and he knows from these reports that very great emphasis has been placed on the need of establishing an adequate road system for agricultural users.

There is another proposal I wish to make and it is one that has been made by members of this group for many years. There should be more adequate provision by the federal government for educational services in Canada. Roads and education represent two of the very high costs that rural people must pay and these costs increase for all rural people as population diminishes and more economic units are established.

The policy put forward in the resolution will help but by itself it is inadequate and in conjunction with other policies of the government will not, the main policy having already failed, meet the chief problems of agricultural income and agricultural markets. The minister is wise in saying that we should not be asked to proceed with second reading of the bill until the government has had a chance to negotiate with the provinces but I suggest that this leaves parliament in a rather invidious position. We are asked to support the resolution and give approval in principle to the introduction of a certain bill which will be given first reading. After we have gone that far the minister presumably will then begin a journey to various parts of the country to discuss a bill which has not been given second reading involving approval in principle by the House of Commons and which may be amended very materially in the normal course of events.

I think the government should have had more particular conversations with the provinces. I think the government should have discussed with the provinces not only its general policies but in greater detail the kind of recommendations it hoped to make to parliament and that the government should have then introduced and recommended a bill to the house which had been drafted after having had thorough and adequate discussions with the provinces.

I tell the Minister of Agriculture, and with this I conclude my remarks, that the government should do much better in this legislation than it has done in the crop insurance legislation, that under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act over the years very little of the cost has been placed on the shoulders of provincial governments or on the backs of the farmers. The main cost has been borne by the federal government. The proportionate amount of money spent by the federal government on this program and the willingness of the government to correct its policies with regard to agricultural supports and markets will in the main decide whether or not the future will see established a successful agricultural policy.

Mr. White: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to the question about procedure and I feel that if I read one phrase from the resolution it will make what I have to say quite in order. I refer to the words: "and projects for the development and conservation of the soil and water resources of Canada".

I want to congratulate the minister and the government upon the introduction of this resolution which can be very far-reaching as far as agriculture is concerned. I must say that I have had quite a number of inquiries regarding the ramifications of the resolution and the bill which will follow. These inquiries show a very deep appreciation of the work envisaged by the minister in this resolution, and so I take pleasure in congratulating him and the government upon its introduction.

What I want to say will have particular reference to western Ontario, old Ontario. I have just been reading some words of the Prime Minister as found on page 44 of Hansard for November 21. At that time he said:

> By 1990, unless something is done, Canada is going to run out of wholesome water.

That, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, is only 30 years away. It was my privilege recently to visit Australia and for those hon. members who have not had that opportunity may I say that we do not appreciate to the full the great water resources that we in this country enjoy. The vast interior of that continent is arid or semi-arid, many areas having a rainfall of only three inches or less per year and temperatures for a good part of the time ranging from the 90's to 120. The Australians appreciate water and are making great strides in conserving all that they have.

This applies also to Israel. I also had the opportunity of visiting that land and seeing the great efforts they are putting forth there to bring fresh water to the Negeb desert. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the problems of conservation of water, timber and soil in our country are great. Many years ago a sage, whose name I cannot recall at the moment said: "Show me an eroded soil and I will show you an eroded people".

The county from which I come, namely Middlesex, has less than 7 per cent of its land area in timber. Consequently water conservation has been and is a continuing and, in fact, a worsening problem. Neither has there been enough attention paid to nor have there been sufficient rewards for those farmers who have attempted to retain some bushland. Bush cover is basic to water conservation. Dams are spectacular—I have said this before—and they may be corrective to a degree but they are not fundamental.

While what I have to say is probably pertinent to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources it also applies to this resolution. There is pending an agreement between the federal government, the provincial government and the Thames valley authority at Fanshawe. This agreement providing for the rounding out and developing of the Thames valley authority conservation project will be signed on Saturday next. It will be signed by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and for the province of Ontario by Mr. John Robarts, the minister of education for the province of Ontario and also the member for London North.

This project which was commenced many years ago resulted in the Fanshawe dam as the first major step. The proposed work now being undertaken will attempt to round out this development scheme and will cost approximately $10 million. This has been welcome news to the area and I emphasize that fact. I also want to endorse the project wholeheartedly. I do not want any misunderstanding about this matter. I want it thoroughly and distinctly understood that I endorse the project. However, in so doing, may I say that there are some remarks I wish to make and some points I wish to bring to the attention of the two ministers.

However, before embarking on this Thames valley project, may I say that there are some local problems which deserve consideration at the federal, provincial, municipal and Thames valley authority level. The Canada Water Conservation Act envisages the wise use of natural resources. When the Fanshawe and Thames valley project began the federal government of that day contributed 37½ per cent to the cost but it was distinctly understood that federal money was not available for municipal water supply systems. However, the result has been that Fanshawe lake has become a city water reservoir. Flood control, while certainly a part of conservation, is not intended to be a flood control system for primarily one municipality. I refer you, Mr. Chairman, to an editorial in the London Free Press of July 30, 1956, which was some time ago. It states in part as follows:

A. M. Snider, chairman of the Ontario water resources commission, has warned the London public utilties that the city has no priority on water from Fanshawe lake—

However, in spite of these warnings and this knowledge there were incorporated in the Fanshawe dam facilities for the withdrawal of water that was impounded, and since that time up to 3½ million gallons per day have been taken out of Fanshawe lake and put into the area adjacent where the public utilities commission of the city of London have deep wells. In other words, they are using the area as a filtration system and they are removing, as I said, 3½ million gallons of water per day or 2,275 million gallons of water a year. I ask this question: What does the public utilities commission pay to the Thames valley authority for this water?

The story told at the time was that the increased flow of water by conservation methods would provide a greater flow of clean water down the Thames river through the city of London. However, what has actually happened is that the flow has not been increased to any great extent but the water was used, as I mentioned before, as a domestic supply, loaded with sewage in the process and dumped back into the river below the city to the detriment of everyone below.

The polluted Thames is a local disgrace. Local municipalities, local members of parliament and local M.L.A.'s believe that the solution to this problem is a pipe line from lake Huron or lake Erie. For over 50 years the city of London has depended on deep wells adjacent to the city for a municipal water supply. There are 57 wells, over 20 miles of pipe line and a filtration plant built during the past year at a cost of $993,000 or almost $1 million. Back in 1873, during the second session of the second legislature of the province of Ontario, there was passed a bill entitled "An act for the construction of water works for the city of London". Among the provisions of that act I want to bring this particular one to your attention:

5. It shall and may be lawful for the said commissioners, their agents, servants, and workmen, from time to time, and at such times hereafter as they shall see fit, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to enter into and upon the lands of any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, in the city of London, or within fifteen miles of the said city and to survey, set out, and ascertain such parts thereof as they may require for the purposes of the said water-works, and also to divert and appropriate any river, pond of water, spring or stream of water therein, as they shall judge suitable and proper—

That provision might have been all right in 1873 when there were a few thousands of people in the city of London. However, today we have a city with a population of 162,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is a fine city.

Mr. White: By conservative estimates it is expected that the population of London will be 300,000 in the next 20 years. In other words, the present method of securing water is not satisfactory. In other words, water is being stolen from the surrounding farms and it is just about time that this was discontinued.

In addition to this city of London bill, there are several other provincial bills that have set up the water resources commission and others, but they have not corrected the glaring injustice that has been heaped on the surrounding municipalities. There are untold examples I could quote. However, I am going to use this one of which I know from a personal experience. I refer to a well in which the water 50 years ago was within six feet of the top. Today it is 68 feet to the water level. Yet the public utilities commission would tell us that this procedure is not reducing the water table in western Ontario. I am using this example from the county of Middlesex, but the situation applies to practically all of old Ontario west of Toronto. I am not so well acquainted with the rest of the province.

The Ontario water resources commission admit that surface wells in western Ontario will fail in the not too distant future. They also admit that deep artesian wells now owned by farmers are destined to fail if continued and unrestricted exploitation continues. Therefore I think the time has arrived when some action should be taken on the part of the governments concerned, at all levels. Today more farmers in the area are short of water than ever before. Some are drawing water from ponds and lakes; some are buying water.

In addition to this, London's water supply is known as hard water, and some industries and householders are paying more for water softeners and water softening equipment than they are paying for the water they soften. Yet western Ontario is nearly surrounded by fresh, soft water. There is fresh water and there is soft water. There is lake Huron on the north, lake St. Clair, the river St. Clair and river Detroit on the west, and lake Erie to the south.

The London public utilities commission is now engaged in drilling for water within approximately 15 miles of lake Erie. In other words, they are pretty near out in the lake drilling for water now, but at the same time they are stealing water from surrounding municipalities. I doubt whether 15 per cent of the farm population in my area have deep wells.

The city of London is saying to these farmers, "If we dry your well, we will supply you with water". But supposing a few years hence the farmer drills a well and the water table has lowered to the point where he does not reach water? Are they going to supply it to him? No, definitely not. And if they do supply it to him, they will only supply it at a price.

We should take a look at the history of other lands once fertile, green and forested, which over the centuries have become denuded of trees, short of water, and semi-arid. They are the bible lands, Babylon, Greece, north Africa and the Mediterranean area. If we take a look to the south, to the United States, we see that there one farmer in every four is co-operating in the nation's conservation plans.

In Canada we have polluted lakes and rivers, and the hon. member for Lambton West has drawn this very graphically to the attention of the authorities from time to time. The royal commission on forestry reported in 1947 that in old Ontario over five million acres of waste land should be returned to forest.

According to Rand McNally's standard world atlas, Canada's land area is shown as being only 3 per cent arable, and then we talk rather glibly about our inexhaustible natural resources.

It is in this regard that I welcome, as I said before, the introduction today of this resolution by the minister. Following on what I have already stated, we have now arrived at a time when I believe we should protect the rights of minorities. I would respectfully refer to the other place. This was one of the duties assigned to the other place at the time of confederation.

Legislation that would define the rights to water resources is overdue. The Ontario water resources commission is so far, the only hope, as it is aware of this problem confronting all of old Ontario and is making far-reaching studies in this connection.

I apologize to the house for taking up a little time in dealing with what is in a way a local problem, but at the same time it affects all of old Ontario. I hope the necessary steps will be taken in the not too distant future to equitably distribute this great natural resource of ours, water.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) I want to congratulate the new Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) for his recent appointment as head of that department. I hope his period of office as such will be a fruitful, albeit a short one.

After three and a half years of Conservative administration, we have just heard the Minister of Agriculture, the second generation of ministers of agriculture in the third session of this 24th parliament under Conservative rule—establish a program which is supposed to save 38 per cent of our Canadian farms from bankruptcy.

After the report we just heard, we may wonder, as do the farmers in this country, whether the new minister has not come down to us from the far north, to give us a short-lived joy, as does a Santa Claus. But whether he comes from one point or another, we are pleased that he discovered the existence of a serious problem with regard to marginal and submarginal farms in this country.

I remember that the former minister of agriculture had also become aware of a serious farm problem, but, after having been at the head of his department for two years and a half, he said, as we may see in Hansard of February 23, 1960 on page 1352 when speaking of the technical evolution which was taking place in agriculture:

> This evolution has created entirely new conditions which require new thinking, new approaches and new policies if the new situations which have arisen as a result of this technological revolution are to be met successfully, or if there is to be any hope of meeting them successfully. We have recognized that this is the situation, and we have demonstrated it by the numerous new policies we have put into effect and which we think have a very good chance of solving the agricultural problems which have existed in this country now for many years past.

And he said:

> The numerous new policies . . . have a very good chance—

And I shall underline the word "chance", > —of solving the agricultural problems which have existed in this country.

At the time he was heading that department it seemed that our farm policy was based, not on principles, but on chance. He has taken his chance, but it was not auspicious, and the former minister later fell out of favour.

I intend to prove my statement and, to that end, I shall quote what the previous minister said at a conference in Calgary, as reported in the Calgary Herald of September 26, 1960:

(Text):

> The minister said the government will soon start a large scale rural development program to help the lower third of Canadian farmers. These farmers, he said, have an annual income of $1,000 or less and the government is now making a study of ways for them to increase their earning power.
>
> Such ways may involve encouraging them to develop the tourist industry in their area, to branch into forestry operation or work in small factories established with the continuing industrialization of the country.

(Translation):

So much for the achievements of the former minister. What can we expect from the second generation of ministers of agriculture? In an effort to salvage the prestige of his government, the new minister has recently made a tour of the country and delivered several stirring speeches. At the farmer's union convention in Guelph he said, for instance, the following, as reported in La Terre de Chez Nous of November 2, 1960.

> For goodness' sake, let us stop once and for all pitting eastern farmers against the western farmers, and city people against farm people.

Such was the minister's plea during this the first major speech he made after being nominated to the Department of Agriculture to succeed the new Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness).

And he went on to say:

> All of us must recognize that the basic problems of agriculture are an essential and vital matter for all areas of this country, without distinction. The solution to Canada's economic ills is "a deep and comprehensive attack on all fronts at the same time aimed at correcting their weaknesses at their very source."

A few days later, at a federal-provincial conference he made another statement outlining the major points of his program, a program he has put into concrete form by the resolution now under discussion.

I want to point out that at this federal-provincial conference, which was held here in Ottawa on November 9 and 10, 1960, 75 per cent of the subjects that were dealt with had to do with matters related to western agriculture. Eastern farmers' problems were pushed into the background. Yet, there are serious problems in the east; there are problems of family farms. There is the dairy problem. The Minister of Agriculture has not too much sympathy for eastern Canada, and we do not see him there very often.

Agreements Respecting Marginal Lands

At the meeting of the Ottawa valley milk producers, according to a report of the Journal of November 23, 1960, the minister said:

(Text):

Grow trees instead of cereals on marginal and submarginal land—

Just because you have been taught for generations and generations that the tree is the enemy of the farmer and have been taught to save the soil for cereals, it does not mean that is true.

(Translation):

I would not want to repeat what he said a moment ago about those 20 million acres of land in the province of Ontario, 8 million of which are submarginal.

Again about the problems out west, he added:

(Text):

Every million acres taken out of wheat production and put into other forms of production means 20 million bushels less wheat added to our surplus each year.

He said the market for forest products was practically assured because the demand for them was expected to rise by 140 per cent by 1975.

He reiterated the 20 year old suggestion that Ottawa valley farmers could save 10 cents a bushel on western oats if they bought the grain once a year and stored it themselves.

If 50 farmers got together and bought through their local dealer western oats in bulk, saving insurance, storage rates, the price at Ottawa could be 84.6 cents a bushel instead of the 95.2 cents now paid.

One farmer said he bought locally grown oats at 75 cents a bushel.

(Translation):

That goes to prove that the Minister of Agriculture is unfamiliar with the situation in eastern Canada.

His remarks left us wondering what he had in mind. Later on we heard he had said in Saskatoon, as reported in the Western Producer for December 8, 1960, when he again referred to the conversion of Ontario land for reforestation purposes:

(Text):

The minister said much of this land could be converted to woodlots and tree farms and the farmer would get a bigger return per acre than he was doing at present. Mr. Hamilton conceded that growing trees was a slow process but suggested plans were afoot to enable farmers to obtain a good living in the interim.

(Translation):

After making such statements, the Minister of Agriculture stated again, as I said earlier:

For goodness' sake, let us stop pitting eastern farmers against western farmers, and the city people against farm people.

Mr. Chairman, I must point out that eastern farmers have no grievance against western farmers, no more than city people have against farm people. This notion exists only in the minister's mind.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Whenever farm policies favourable to the western farmers have been implemented, their eastern counterparts have rejoiced.

Mr. Chairman, if we look closely at this resolution, we find that the government has merely sought to implement some recommendations advocated by the great Liberal party of the time, headed by the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent.

In fact, in 1957 Mr. St. Laurent asked a Senate committee to investigate the matter of land use. The duties of that committee were as follows:

To investigate and submit a report on land use in Canada and on the steps required to ensure the best possible use of our land for the benefit of this country and the Canadian economy and, especially, in order to increase our farm output and the income of those taking part in it.

That committee on land use has been sitting for four years. Today those recommendations are taking concrete form in the resolution now under discussion.

In principle, the resolution contains all the components of a policy designed to increase the income of marginal farms.

However, if only the practical aspect of the question is taken into account, it is to be feared that this legislation is a mere smokescreen to conceal the government's incompetence. Is not the agricultural stabilization act itself a smokescreen?

Does not the preamble of that act state that:

It is expedient to enact a measure for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy, thus to provide farmers with a fair share of the national income.

And what happened since? Whereas the farm produce index reached 245.5 in 1958, on the basis of 100 for the average of the years 1935-1939, it fell to 242.9 in 1959, and 235.2 in August 1960.

Now, if we look at the cost index for goods and services acquired by our farmers, we see that it rose from 259.9 in 1958 to 269.5 in 1959, and 279.6 in August 1960.

Yet, we have heard fine speeches stating that this legislation would restore to our farmers their deserved share of the national revenue.

It is to be feared that, after a three and a half years' experience under a Conservative rule, the expected results fall somewhat short of the enthusiasm expressed by the new minister.

There is, as a matter of fact, enough matter in the resolution to rouse more than enthusiasm. Credit must be given to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, for having submitted a brief to the Senate committee on land use on May 13, 1959.

The government should commend our farmers for the objective work they did in finding realistic solutions for their problems.

However, it is unfortunate that the former minister of agriculture should not have applied the recommendations which were made to him in the last two or three years.

We had to wait until Providence sent us a minister whose qualifications as a seer are greater than his farming experience.

The resolution we are now asked to approve is, to my mind, the second stage of a land improvement program.

I think that the first phase, before introducing such a project, should have consisted in setting up an advisory committee in each province which would, later, have been able to give counsel and advice and make recommendations adapted to local needs.

I did indeed advocate such legislation in this house on February 2, 1959, as we can see on page 578 of Hansard. I said this:

> There would be much to say concerning another item of the Liberal program which is indirectly related to the establishment of an agricultural expansion bank. I am referring to the setting up of an agricultural advisory council in each province, on which the federal and provincial authorities would be represented.

Anyway, this recommendation was made by the committee in 1959.

> This council would have to study the problems of agriculture within a province and make just and proper recommendations to the federal government.

I cannot agree with the central government enacting legislation for better land use to which the provinces would be required to contribute financially if they were not consulted. On the other hand, according to the experience of the United States in the field of assistance to marginal farms and before adopting such a program, we must define what constitutes a marginal family farm. What are the income possibilities of a family farm? What is the income potential of the members of the family both on and outside the farm? What are the available agricultural resources? What are the possible adjustments in farm operations or use to increase their revenues? To determine the costs of the program we need fairly accurate answers to all those questions. I believe that a provincial advisory committee on agriculture would have been able to inform the ministers pretty accurately if the government had created one at the right time.

In his speech, the minister did not refer to the costs of this program. He did not tell us what the provincial and federal governments' responsibilities would be. He did not say how those responsibilities would be apportioned. He did not assess the costs of this program to each government; he did not say how the farmers who will engage in retimbering will live before they get any income out of it.

A prominent agricultural expert has told me that farmers who want to retimber their lands should receive a reasonable amount for each retimbered acre until the trees are there.

Certain farmers who will retimber some five or ten acres will have to depend on an already inadequate income to provide for their families.

What will the government do to keep those families on the farm? We would have liked the minister to tell us more about that.

Mr. Chairman, the family farm is an essential part of Canadian economy. We depend on the farm to feed and clothe the ever-increasing population of this country.

Unfortunately, many farm owners lack adequate income to provide their family with a decent standard of living. Yet, it is recognized that when agriculture prospers, the whole nation benefits.

The Canadian farmer has a right to demand a standard of living equal to the level of the general economy to which he has contributed. With the policy of the Conservative government, we did not reach that goal.

Because of the cost-price squeeze, I do not feel that the present policy will improve the condition of the average farmer.

The resolution now before this house will have long term effects. Farmers will have to wait for a change of government before they can benefit from short term policies.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska permit me a question?

Mr. Boulanger: Yes, but beware of the answer.

Mr. Pigeon: Can the hon. member tell me what he thinks about the farm policy of the previous government which, when in power, used to serve U.S. potatoes in Hungarian refugee camps in British Columbia?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That question surely does not deserve an answer.

Mr. Pigeon: It is one that hurts, isn't it?

(Text):

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I regret I was not in my seat during the earlier part of this debate and therefore missed the opportunity of hearing what was said by the hon. member for Essex East. I always listen with interest to his speeches on agricultural matters. My interest originated some years ago when the hon. member spoke in my constituency during one of the election campaigns of 1957 or 1958. He made a speech which fortunately for me in connection with the next election still lingers in the memory of the people and the farmers of the Peace river country. I believe the text of his message was that the farmers in the last two or three years had never had it so good. I am sure the hon. member will forgive me if I say that his speech recalls to my mind Edwin Markham's poem "The Man With the Hoe". I frequently think of that poem when the hon. member speaks on agricultural matters. I understand I am taking some poetic licence, but the first few lines, as hon. members will recall, go something like this:

> Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans
> Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
> The emptiness of ages in his face,
> And on his back the burden of the world.

I always think that that well describes the hon. member when he speaks on agricultural matters.

This afternoon the hon. member for Assiniboia gave his views on this resolution. I think they consisted merely of a repetition of the threadbare, shop-worn clichés which for so many years he has been attempting to suggest contain the elements which are required by the agricultural industry for its betterment and improvement. For one who aspires to wear the toga of the leader of this new party he is far from giving us information on what are the true facts today.

It is recognized by responsible agricultural statesmen in both Canada and the United States that some of the measures which the hon. member has suggested may, it is true, have some slight or temporary palliative effects, but the true remedies lie much deeper than those. There are far more fundamental changes which require to be made and this, I think, is certainly accepted by this government in this measure which is a part of the pattern of change which has been emerging step by step and stage by stage, to indicate that the government has steadfastly in front of it the problems, and the solutions of those problems, of the small men of this country, the men who under the last government were the forgotten men.

This is a very important resolution, Mr. Chairman. When you read it and analyse it you find that it proposes measures which, if implemented by legislation, in due course, will have far-reaching, deep and fundamental effects. As I read the resolution I find it can be divided into a number of proposals. It authorizes the Minister of Agriculture:

> To enter into agreements with provincial governments or agencies thereof for the undertaking jointly with those governments or agencies of projects for the alternative uses of lands that are marginal or of low productivity,—

That has been dealt with to some extent, and I think it will be dealt with in this debate by other hon. members.

Second—and this is the area that I propose to deal with—the resolution goes on:

> —projects for the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas, and projects for the development and conservation of the soil and water resources of Canada;—

It is true that at this time there are areas of this country in which, because of impoverishment of the soil, because of the uneconomic size of the farm units, because of world markets and for other reasons the owners and occupants of farms are not achieving the standard of living which we feel they should have. I think we should not forget—and this is where the wisdom of this resolution comes in—that it is equally important to make provision to ensure that the areas which can provide for their owners a reasonable and adequate standard of living are not relegated to the lower brackets.

There is a tendency in any industry involving the development of natural resources for a certain pattern to emerge. If conditions are not good there is a tendency to intensify and concentrate on the production of wealth from natural resources, and the inevitable result is, as we have seen in many parts of the world, the development of a surplus of goods produced from those particular natural resources. Sometimes the natural resources become worn out or depleted, with a consequent lowering of the standards of living of the people engaged in the utilization of those natural resources. It is therefore most essential that we establish a flexible program to ensure stability, and an increase in the standard of living, and to provide for a more variable and sophisticated type of production to meet the ever changing requirements of the world markets and of the appetites of the people of the world. I feel confident that that is what can be envisaged in this particular part of the resolution to which I am going to direct my attention.

I am also particularly interested in the suggestion that some of these desired results will have to be brought about by means of joint arrangements, with provincial governments, because I live in a district to which this is particularly applicable. The Peace river country is divided among different spheres of jurisdiction, namely the two provinces of British Columbia and Alberta and the Northwest Territories and, of course, the federal government. Many of these territorial divisions were arbitrary, ill-advised and probably established at a time when the people who drew the maps had no conception of what was involved geographically or economically. Consequently our area has suffered not only because of its inaccessibility but because of this division of authority.

I read a news item the other day indicating that there had been some suggestion that a new province should be established in the Northwest Territories. To my way of thinking it would be far more satisfactory and desirable to carve out a new province partly in the province of Alberta, partly in the province of British Columbia and partly in the Northwest Territories but as a realist I know that will not happen. In the belief that we must take the machinery of government that we have and adapt and mould it to fit the times and to suit human requirements, I think that through the medium of this resolution there is a vehicle to achieve the result I have in mind.

We have a very excellent precedent for this sort of thing. In 1933 in the United States there was established what has become well known all over the world as the Tennessee valley authority, popularly known as T.V.A. I have had some interest in this matter for some time because I feel a comparison can be made between what was done there and what I believe should be accomplished in my area and which I am confident this resolution can achieve with the proper measure of co-operation.

In the short time before adjournment, Mr. Chairman, I am going to read two or three extracts from a book written by David E. Lilienthal, who was for many years the chairman of the Tennessee valley authority, in order to indicate that his thinking resulting from his experience can aptly be applied to conditions in our own country. In establishing this authority President Roosevelt sent a message to congress which I think by proper paraphrasing can be made comparable with the terms of this resolution and what has been said about the resolution by the minister. Speaking of the legislation which created the Tennessee valley authority, the president said as quoted in Mr. Lilienthal's book:

> —it enters the wide fields of flood control, soil erosion, afforestation, elimination from agricultural use of marginal lands, and distribution and diversification of industry. In short, this power development... leads logically to national planning for a complete river watershed involving many states and the future lives and welfare of millions. It touches and gives life to all forms of human concerns.

If you paraphrase by using the word "provinces" instead of "states", I think the words in this passage can be considered to have application to many parts of our country. The president suggested, as quoted by Mr. Lilienthal:

> —legislation to create a Tennessee valley authority—a corporation clothed with the power of government but possessed of the flexibility and initiative of a private enterprise. It should be charged with the broadest duty of planning for the proper use, conservation, and development of the natural resources of the Tennessee river drainage basin—

There are differences and we must adapt them to our conditions. The Tennessee valley authority, of course, was envisaged as a public authority for the development of power. We may well find that in the development of an area such as ours private power may be required, but this project with its integration of the resources of farm, forest, mines and river power is something which I think applies well in our case.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Batten: May I ask what the business of the house is to be for tomorrow and Friday?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I can only reiterate what the acting house leader said last night, that the budget debate will be resumed tomorrow and if that is completed we will continue with the motion to set up the committee on broadcasting. In any event, we will continue with that on Friday.

Mr. Batten: Is the minister in a position to give any indication now of what the business will be for the early part of next week?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, I cannot do that.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

POST OFFICE ADDITION, ROUYN, QUE.

Question No. 74—Mr. Argue:

1. Has an addition recently been made to the post office in Rouyn, P.Q.?
2. If so, who were, if any, the architectural consultants employed in the design of this addition?
3. What was the cost of the addition?
4. Have any criticisms been received relative to the design or esthetic appeal of the addition?
5. If so: (a) what is the nature of these criticisms? (b) who made them? (c) on what dates?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.
2. No consultants employed.
3. Contract amount: $175,400.
4. Yes.
5. (a) New building preferred rather than addition. (b) Municipal council, city of Rouyn. (c) May 24, 1960.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 26, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1961-62

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1962, was presented by Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

That the message of His Excellency, together with the estimates presented this day, be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. Benidickson: I note the hon. gentleman is not making a speech. This time the minister is abiding by the rules.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I might inform the hon. member that I am not making a speech but I have prepared a summary concerning the estimates for the information of the house and the press. Copies of the summary in English and in French will be available at my office to all hon. members who are interested.

Mr. Benidickson: Reverting to the former practice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, doing what we think is sound in the interests of understanding.

Mr. Benidickson: After criticism.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REPORTED REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of reports in the press to the effect that the Secretary General of the United Nations has requested additional forces from other countries to take the place of those being withdrawn from the Congo. My question is whether the Canadian government has been approached in this connection, and if so what has been the reaction of the government to that approach?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I too saw the reports, but the Canadian government has not been approached in this regard.

CONGO—REPORTED REQUEST FOR CONTRIBUTIONS OF FOOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of continuing reports of widespread starvation in the Congo. The report on the radio this morning indicated that 50,000 pounds of powdered milk were ready for shipment but there was no means to get it there. Can the minister tell the house what action the government is taking to move food supplies to the Congo?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that report is not accurate in so far as it refers to Canada. We are giving serious consideration to this question. At the moment I am not in a position to make any report. One difficulty is that the main food of the Congolese is rice; they do not use wheat at all. However, we are working on the problem.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since people are dying daily in the Congo, I do not think this question should be delayed any longer.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I have already told the hon. member we are attempting to do something in this regard, but it is not as easy a matter as the hon. member thinks.

CONGO—REPORTED BEATING OF MR. LUMUMBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On January 19 last I asked the minister a question concerning the reported beating of former Premier Lumumba of the Congo. Knowing of his concern with this problem, and that it is his usual custom to follow up such matters, I wonder whether the minister has any further information to report to the house.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This question was considered in the Congo advisory committee a day or two ago, of which committee Canada is a member, and our representative there made our protest on the treatment that had been meted out to Mr. Lumumba. Other members of the Congo advisory committee did the same thing. The Secretary General of the United Nations has written to President Kasavubu and also to Premier Tshombe of Katanga, protesting this maltreatment and dealing with the question of Mr. Lumumba being given a fair trial promptly.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

MANUFACTURE OF MAIL BOXES AND KEYS IN PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. According to this morning's Gazette four persons have been arrested having in their possession:

> Keys which police said could open almost every federal mail box in the city—and probably in the entire country.

The same newspaper also reports that:

> In Edmonton police made an arrest in the case and said investigations indicate keys to the mail boxes have been manufactured in the penitentiary at Kingston, where repairs are made to the government mail boxes, and that there may be at least one master key in circulation that could open all mail boxes in Canada.

The question is this. For what silly reason did the Postmaster General decide to entrust prisoners with the manufacturing and repairing of mail box locks and keys?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did I understand the hon. member to ask for what "silly" reason?

Mr. Denis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I admit I was wrong. However, I had that thought in mind.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the hon. member is prepared to withdraw that word he appears to have answered his own question.

Mr. Denis: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word "silly" and am prepared to let the people judge for themselves. Will the Postmaster General consider the advisability of having the locks of government mail boxes changed, by hiring this time honest people for the security of Canadians, as the underworld must now have copies of keys which could be used on existing mail box locks?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to be set on making a long speech rather than asking a question. Perhaps he would let the minister answer.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think I know what the hon. member has in mind even if he has some difficulty in expressing it. I am looking into this matter at the moment.

Mr. Chevrier: He does not speak English nearly as well as the minister does.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): C'est vrai, ça, c'est vrai. I am looking into the matter at the moment, and I shall comment further in a day or two. However, in the course of looking into it, Mr. Speaker, I did discover that mail boxes have been repaired at Kingston penitentiary certainly since about 1900, and I was interested to find out that in February, I think it was, or November, 1956, there had been a question of one of those keys having issued from Kingston penitentiary for illicit purposes.

Mr. McIlraith: And the minister never did anything about it in four years.

Mr. Denis: If the former government made a mistake, does the minister think this government should go on repeating the same mistake?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps in answering that question I might say that in November, 1957, one of my officials was in Kingston penitentiary—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: For how long?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —in a visiting capacity in order to look into this matter and take corrective measures.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has yet not found the key I think at least he has had ample opportunity.

[Later:]

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the disclosure, reported in today's press, that government keys and locks are being found in the possession of prisoners, can the minister give assurance to the house that keys and locks giving access to the royal Canadian mint are not being manufactured or repaired by prisoners?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps considering the hour of the question period some of the questions asked do not appear to be as serious as should be expected.

Mr. Denis: It is a question of urgency.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member's question related to the royal mint?

Mr. Denis: Yes. There are locks and keys which give access to the mint. If it is true that these locks and keys are repaired by prisoners, I think it is a question of urgency. The people of Canada should be assured that those keys are not in the possession of prisoners.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not disclose any new facts which indicate any alteration of policy in this respect.

TIMMINS, ONT.—REPORTED CARRYING OF MAIL BY STRIKEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last I directed a question to the Postmaster General and I believe his reply at the time was that the matter had not been brought to his attention. I wonder whether it has been by now, and whether he can inform the house whether any action is contemplated?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, subsequent to the hon. member's question I received a copy of the telegram, and an official of my department is in Timmins today looking into the matter.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT OF MAIN ESTIMATES THIS YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be observed that I have attempted to co-operate with the Minister of Finance and keep in order when the estimates are presented to the house. I might address a question to the minister at this time which I think is in order. The total of the statutory items and the amounts to be voted by this house last year amounted to $5,740 million. Will the minister just indicate what the total is for this year as compared with last year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is inquiring about information which is readily available to all hon. members by looking at the document which has been tabled, and which the house has directed to be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. Benidickson: Just on that point I would simply say, of course, that information has been made available to the representatives of the people through the press, but those of us who are sitting here performing our duties as members of parliament will not be able to leave the chamber for some time to obtain that information.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the hon. member raises that as a matter of privilege; if he does, perhaps it could be commented on.

[Later:]

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance another question. Would he indicate to his colleagues in the house whether he informed the press at an earlier hour that the proposed budgetary expenditures as contained in the main estimates tabled today total $6,123 million as compared with $4,526 million when his last Liberal predecessor presented estimates to the house?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is seeking to give information. The first part of his question appeared to be an inquiry, but the latter part was not appropriate.

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister going to indicate whether or not the figure of $6,123 million was given to the press?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking about a matter with which I have dealt twice now and I think he should accept the decision of the Chair. The hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member defer it until the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges has asked his question.

[Later:]

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise for your consideration a matter that I believe affects the privileges of all hon. members. It has to do with the tabling of the estimates earlier today and the disallowance of questions which may or may not have been in order in the form in which they were asked.

We have had the practice adopted by the minister of distributing information to the press earlier this day, and at the opening of the house we were not permitted to get that information although the very subject on which the information would have a bearing is the item of government business which will occupy the rest of the sitting today.

The point that I think is worthy of consideration is whether or not some other method should be provided by the minister for making available to the members of the House of Commons that information which was made available to the press earlier today, so that members might use it where it would be properly used, in the debate on this main item of government business which is to come before us today.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): This is about as lame a question of privilege as hon. members are likely to hear. It is said that prior to the tabling of these estimates in the house, I have made available to the members of the press certain information in relation to the estimates which I tabled this afternoon. That is quite true. I did so. I have done it before. It was done before I became Minister of Finance. It has been done for years to the knowledge of hon. members opposite, that is those who have any knowledge of what has been taking place.

I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that every adult member of the house, at any rate, is quite well aware of the fact that, for instance, at the time of the budget address copies of that address are made available to the press several hours before it is made available to the house, but under terms of the strictest secrecy. Those terms of secrecy have never been violated by the press. This is a sound practice. I did not introduce it. It was the practice before I became the Minister of Finance. I think it is a good practice, and unless the house expresses disapproval I intend to follow that practice. It is a practice in relation to many matters, Mr. Speaker, that copies of announcements may be made available to the press in advance on condition there is no release of the information until the information is tabled in the house. This practice is followed—

Mr. McIlraith: No complaint about that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —not infrequently in relation to important statements in regard to government policy or as to things that have happened. This, again, is a sound, salutary practice and is by no means new.

What happened this afternoon, what happened last year and the year before, was that those members of the press gallery who were interested were given access to a copy of the estimates and to the summary to which I have referred which was prepared for their use. They were given that information under terms of the strictest secrecy, and they were not permitted to release any of the information until I had tabled the estimates in the house.

Back of this seems to be a suggestion that there is some feeling on the part of hon. members opposite that the press gallery should not be entrusted with this information.

Mr. McIlraith: No. That is a misrepresentation of what I said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I say quite firmly that I have no qualms whatever about making this kind of information available to the members of the press gallery on the terms which I have mentioned and which fully reserve the rights and privileges of all members of this house. The members of the press gallery have shown themselves to be men of impeccable honour in this regard, and I do not see any reason why they should not be trusted as in the past.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has of course followed his usual course of drawing extravagant, unwarranted and irrelevant deductions from what we on this side have said.

Mr. Hees: Question.

Mr. Fulton: Is it a question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition has the floor. I have given the floor to the Leader of the Opposition to speak on this alleged question of privilege which has been raised. The Leader of the Opposition has been given the opportunity to deal with it before I come to a conclusion.

Mr. Pearson: No one on this side is questioning the propriety or the right of the minister if he sees fit, in confidence, to give the press advance information on this particular matter. I ask the minister, however, whether he does not think, as was the case in the past—and by "past" I mean before 1957, when different methods were introduced—it would have been appropriate to have shown equal courtesy to leaders of the opposition parties by giving them advance notice, in confidence, so that members of the opposition parties could have had that information available when they were debating the budget on the last afternoon of the budget debate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is not a matter that affects the budget. What we are discussing this afternoon in the order that has been announced is a budget that has relationship to the balance of ways and means for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961. The estimates which I tabled this afternoon are the estimates for the financial year commencing April 1, 1961.

Mr. Pearson: There is no relation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think there is another observation that may very properly be made in reply to the Leader of the Opposition. On two previous occasions I have made statements in the house at the time of tabling the estimates, pointing out the highlights in those estimates, thinking that this might be of interest and perhaps of assistance to hon. members of the house in reviewing the estimates when a copy came into their hands. But this attempt to give information to the house was met, on the part of the official opposition, with a storm of protest on all those occasions.

Mr. Pearson: Political propaganda.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Therefore I have sought today to economize the time of the house, not by making comment on the estimates but by acquainting hon. members with the fact that if they are interested in having the assistance of a summary statement in this respect, copies will be available at my office in English and French.

Mr. Pearson: Thank you very much.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are available there. Hon. members opposite seem to think they should have had advance information on this subject and be given advance copies.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure you that the Leader of the Opposition received a copy of these estimates just as soon as the Prime Minister did. I brought into this house this afternoon all the copies I could carry. I brought in the usual six copies of estimates. Whether they be main estimates or supplementary estimates, that is the practice. When you receive the message of His Excellency and read it, it is then that the six copies are distributed. One goes to the Prime Minister, one to the Leader of the Opposition, one to the leader of the C.C.F., two to the table and I am permitted to have one. Then copies are immediately available at the distribution office.

You may be aware, Mr. Speaker—and if you are not, I can tell you right now—that when the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River rose to ask his question about amounts, asking me about something that was in the estimates, a copy of the estimates was already in the possession of the Leader of the Opposition just three seats from him. If there is any liaison at all between them, he had that information right at his elbow.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, on the matter of privilege may I make a remark or two. Everybody recognized the events this afternoon, but I want to draw attention to the fact that on a similar occasion last year the Minister of Finance took some pride in indicating to the house that he had advised the financial critic of the opposition, which he thought was a courtesy, that on a certain day, that day, he was going to present the estimates to the House of Commons.

I ask the Minister of Finance, did he do that this day when he claims he has been so generous in his treatment of his colleagues in this respect? I think it was observed by all members of the house that this particularly long document was received by me, not through courtesy of the Minister of Finance, at 2.30 or any other hour, but only by reason of the fact that I knew that perhaps at 2.30 it became a public document, and I took my own pains to obtain it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benidickson: But it is a document of intricate detail which I personally had to obtain. I do not want to put the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) on the spot, but I would certainly assert that, knowing the predecessors of the present Minister of Finance, these difficulties would not have arisen if anybody had asked, as I asked at 2.30 sharp of the Minister of Finance in this house before you opened the proceedings, if he could have a document such as I obtained subsequently from friends outside the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: —a public document, after 2.30, from friends outside the house. May I make it clear that none of those friends were employees of the government of Canada. They were members of the press. It is now three o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member for Ottawa West, who raised the point, wish to say anything further before I rule on it?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that the part of the remarks of the Minister of Finance having to do with the press have no relevance to the point raised by me. The point I was raising was that the document was not made available to members of the House of Commons who would be expected to deal with related matters in the budget debate later today. He confirmed that in a later statement, when he said that if we would go to his office he would now, as minister, make available to us copies of the document.

An hon. Member: That is not what he said.

Mr. Pearson: That is what he said.

Mr. McIlraith: I understood the minister to say he was making it available to any member who went to his office. That is my understanding of his remarks.

Mr. Benidickson: "Come and beg for it".

Mr. McIlraith: I think he would be quick enough to correct me if I am wrong about that. My point of privilege is this. I know the Minister of National Defence is not understanding this, but perhaps I may continue to state it. The point is this, that it is not the obligation of any member of the House of Commons to have to go as a puppet to any minister of the crown to obtain public information that should be of record. The document should have been available.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West has raised as a matter of privilege an alleged breach arising out of facts which are known to the house and which I need not repeat. This matter has been discussed; I have invited discussion on both sides because it is an interesting point.

The house is always jealous of its right to hear information and to have information from the government first and before others, and conceivably a matter of privilege might arise in circumstances where information had been withheld from the house.

Main estimates are tabled and a motion, which is not debatable, is made to refer them to a committee concurrently with the tabling of the estimates. The Minister of Finance has given in confidence, as I understand it, to the press a summary or statement of the contents of the estimates for release only at the time the estimates are tabled.

If there is any matter of privilege it is whether the Minister of Finance had any right or is offending the privileges of the house in giving the press that information in confidence, in summary form, in advance.

In the absence of any clear precedent and in the absence of any motion I think the matter might rest there. I do not find a prima facie right on the part of the house to insist that the government, when it tables the full information, shall not give a summary of it to the press; and, as I have said, there is no motion in this respect. If the hon. member wishes to present a motion I will give further thought to it; because it is important, as are all matters of privilege affecting the rights of members of the House of Commons. But I think it has been sufficiently discussed and might be left at that point, if hon. members agree.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I say one thing, because otherwise there is likely to be a misapprehension remaining on the record regarding what was said by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I might say that on making inquiry I am informed that the practice which has been observed today is the practice that existed before I became Minister of Finance and which has been followed in the past. It was never the practice to give advance notice of these estimates or statements to the Leader of the Opposition or to anyone on the opposition side. That is not and has never been the practice. I have simply done in all respects today what has been done by my predecessors, both in making a copy of the estimates and a summary available to the press gallery in secrecy and in confidence, and in making the estimates available to hon. members when I did.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Minister of Finance if he is aware of the fact that the figures for expenditures shown in the estimates appeared in the local press, which went on the street before 2.30 this afternoon, with the total amount in print before the estimates were tabled in the House of Commons?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I am not aware of that, and I would want a good deal more corroboration of that statement before I would be prepared to assume that there has been any breach of secrecy in this respect. The release time which was given to the press gallery was the moment of my tabling these estimates in the house, and I would be very reluctant to believe for one minute that this information was given out by any member of the press gallery in any public form before I tabled it here this afternoon.

The Leader of the Opposition has sent me a copy of the Ottawa Citizen, which is the same newspaper that had an advance copy of a speech made in the house last session by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). I may say that this statement appearing in the Ottawa Citizen does not bear out at all what the Leader of the Opposition has just claimed in respect of it. It is headed by the following words: "Fleming Presents Estimates for '61", and continues:

> Record estimates for the 1961-62 fiscal year to begin April 1 were presented to the commons today by finance minister Fleming.
> Government spending in the current fiscal year, ending March 31—

That is not the present estimates; that is not the year in respect to which I tabled the estimates this afternoon.

> —is already estimated at nearly $6 billions, and indications in today's main estimates for the next fiscal year point to an even higher figure.

As hon. members will note, it does not give the figure. This article is obviously conjecture in which anyone could have indulged, in advance of the release of the actual figures. Therefore I say this, Mr. Speaker. Not only has the Leader of the Opposition drawn a red herring here this afternoon, but these aspersions which he has cast on the Ottawa Citizen and its representative in the press gallery are contemptible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We were dealing with the business which arises on the calling of orders of the day. The Leader of the Opposition asked a question, and the Minister of Finance has given his reply. Was the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River rising to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was about to ask the Minister of Finance, who has before him the Ottawa publication—

Some hon. Members: The Citizen.

Mr. Benidickson: —at this hour of 2.45—3.15, I guess it is—whether or not the article does disclose the fact that the estimates involve an increase of $383 million as compared with last year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The article is short, and I think, now that this question has been raised in serious form, that the whole of it should be on the record. It is headed: "Fleming Present Estimates for '61" and it says:

> Record estimates for the 1961-62 fiscal year to begin April 1 were presented to the commons today by finance minister Fleming.
> Government spending in the current fiscal year, ending March 31, is already estimated at nearly $6 billions and indications in today's main estimates for the next fiscal year point to an even higher figure.
> The commons awaited the estimates with a great deal of interest to see if they indicate how Prime Minister Diefenbaker is going to make good on his "you ain't seen nothing yet" promise of last fall.
> Main estimates tabled for the current fiscal year were $5,740,168,920, but these have been brought by supplementaries to over $5.9 billion. More supplementaries are likely.
> There is likely to be a cut in estimates for defence, but whether this will be sufficient to overtake the increased spending on other accounts is doubtful.
> In any case, the main estimates tabled today for the next fiscal year are certain to have many millions more added through supplementaries before the year ends.

That is the entire article. It does not contain any statement of fact in relation to the contents of the main estimates for 1961-62 which I tabled this afternoon, and I think the Leader of the Opposition owes an apology to the members of the press gallery for his insinuation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion that there should be an apology seems to me to be unwarranted. There was no reflection on the conduct of the minister except in so far as it was implied in the question of the privilege of the house which was raised earlier. As far as any statement affecting the press is concerned, this is not a matter where one hon. member has the right to ask another to make an apology.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was not suggesting that the Leader of the Opposition necessarily owes an apology to the house if he does not choose to make one, but I think he owes an apology to the press gallery.

Mr. Speaker: That is what I understood the Minister of Finance to say, and to my mind it would not be proper to suggest in answer to a question that the Leader of the Opposition should apologize to anybody other than a member.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Minister of Finance a question? Does the minister consider that the words "record estimates... were presented to the commons today" to be a statement or a conjecture?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was known, I think by all that these estimates were to be tabled this afternoon. The members of the press gallery, knowing that the government carries out its engagements, in my opinion were not doing anything unusual in saying that the estimates were tabled in this house this afternoon.

Beyond that, the article, in so far as it purports to say anything about the 1961-62 estimates, is purely conjectural and nothing else. The Leader of the Opposition at one period in his life was clear enough mentally to see these things.

EDIBLE OILS—INQUIRY AS TO TARIFF BOARD HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of the announcement the minister made in the baby budget to the effect that the government is going to direct the tariff board to examine the low tariff on edible oilseed and vegetable oils.

Have instructions gone out to this effect and, if so, will hearings be held by the tariff board? Are these to be public hearings open to anybody interested in this matter, or will attendance be by invitation only?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the statement I made in the house on December 20 in introducing the budget I did direct a reference to the tariff board. The reference was directed by a letter to the chairman of the board dated January 3. The board in accordance with its usual practice has, under date of January 11, given notice of these hearings and has sent the notice to all persons of whom the board has any knowledge who might be interested in the hearings. If there are any other persons or organizations who might be interested the board would be only too pleased to be made aware of them, because in such matters the desire of the board is that the notice of the reference be brought to the attention of everyone who may be interested in the hearings.

I have before me a copy of the notice signed by the secretary of the board, dated January 11. The notice quotes my letter to the chairman directing the reference to the board and states:

> In a later notice the board will announce dates and places for public sittings to be held for the purpose of receiving representations from interested parties and dates for the filing of proposals and submissions.

No written submissions should be made to the board until dates of public sittings are announced and directions are given on the filing of proposals and briefs.

In the meantime, all who may desire to receive further announcements regarding reference No. 131—

That is the present reference. I continue:

—and who are not already on the board's mailing list should communicate with the undersigned.

I hope that course will be followed by all interested persons and organizations.

As to the date of the public hearings, I cannot be at all specific in that regard. The board already has a substantial volume of work on hand, but if parliament is willing to pass the measure of which notice now stands on the order paper—the bill to amend the Tariff Board Act to enlarge the board so that it may begin to sit in two panels simultaneously instead of one—this will be of very great assistance to the board in expediting the commencement of the hearings on reference No. 131.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CANADA-U.S.—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED AIRPLANE EXCHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has his attention been called to a statement in the press to the effect that the Canadian government plans to push through a proposal whereby the United States will purchase 32 CL-44 transport planes from Canadair Limited in exchange for the Canadian purchase of 66 United States Voodoo jet interceptors for the R.C.A.F.? Has he any comment to make on that statement?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen this particular press report, and I have no comment on it.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: Now that the Minister of National Defence has had an opportunity to look at the press release which I referred to in my earlier question, I wonder whether he would care to comment on the statement of the proposed exchange of the CL-44 and the Voodoo jet interceptor?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is well aware of the fact that it has never been the practice in this house to comment on speculative articles in the press.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Have the officers of the Minister of Defence Production been in contact with the United States authorities relating to an exchange between Canada and the United States of the Canadair CL-44 transport plane on the one hand and the Voodoo interceptor on the other?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Not recently, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

IMPORTATION OF FRUIT AND VEGETABLES FROM CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of an article in today's Globe and Mail, in which the secretary of the fruit and vegetable growers' association of Ontario is reported to have said that the biggest club hanging over the market now is shipments starting to pour in from Cuba, and that the association feels that the Cuban goods are a government subsidized deal. Can the minister inform the house in what form the Cuban deal has been subsidized by the Canadian government?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, because of the talking which was going on in the house I had a great deal of difficulty in understanding the hon. member's question. Perhaps I might take it as notice and answer tomorrow.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON WASHINGTON DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether, following his conversations with the United States administration yesterday, he is able to make any report to the house on those conversations; and perhaps at the same time he might indicate, if he can, whether the government is prepared to announce a national oil policy for Canada.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, as the house knows, my colleague the Minister of Finance and I visited Washington and had a very full and useful discussion with four members of the new administration; the secretary of commerce, Mr. Hodges; the secretary of the treasury, Mr. Dillon; the secretary of the interior, Mr. Udall and the under secretary of state for commercial affairs, Mr. Ball. The discussion ranged over a variety of subjects, including oil and other matters of interest to both governments.

The Minister of Finance and I were both much impressed by the very high calibre of the members of the new administration, and came away convinced that the very warm and friendly personal relationship that had been built up during the past three and a half years with the previous administration will be maintained, which will be beneficial, of course, to both governments.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has a supplementary statement to make in addition to that made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Only this, Mr. Speaker; that the visit to which my colleague has referred afforded an opportunity to raise the question as to when the next meeting of the continuing Canada-United States joint committee on trade and economic matters might be held. The last meeting was held in Washington in 1960, and we extended an invitation to the members of the United States administration to meet with us at an early date. They received the suggestion very cordially, and we expect to have arrangements made soon for the holding of the next meeting of the committee.

[Later:]

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I asked a two-part question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I wonder whether he would be good enough to indicate whether the government is yet in a position to announce a policy for the marketing of oil in Canada, and whether this will be done before the end of the month.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I expect to be able to announce something in this regard to the house in the not distant future.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED CHANGE OF ROUTE—CHANGE IN LAY-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works.

I regret not having sent notice of this question to the minister but I am sure, because he knows his department quite well, that he will be able to answer it just the same.

Could the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) inform us of the contents of the telegram he sent to the minister of highways in Quebec concerning the change in lay-out of the trans-Canada highway through Vaudreuil, as announced in the newspapers this morning?

(Text):

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I have not read any such article, Mr. Speaker, but I shall be glad to accept the question as notice.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourbonnais: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister able to confirm that the proposal now made by the province would mean a saving of $500,000 for his department?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. member's question to be more a matter of information, and scarcely supplementary.

FEASIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF A TUNNEL INSTEAD OF A BRIDGE IN EASTERN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question which, I think, is more sensible than the one asked by the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis).

We read in this morning's newspaper Le Devoir that the trans-Canada highway project calls for the building of a bridge east of the Jacques Cartier bridge, in Montreal. Could the minister tells us whether a final agreement has been reached on this between the federal and provincial governments?

If not, could he consider the suggestion previously made in this house to build a tunnel instead of a bridge at the chosen location?

(Text):

Mr. Walker: I have not read Le Devoir. I shall be very happy to look into the matter suggested by the hon. member.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

YUKON—MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION OF "S.S. KENO"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a perfectly straightforward question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the sternwheel steamer Keno now at Whitehorse in the Yukon been designated as a national historic monument by the historic sites and monuments board, and, if so, is the board accepting full financial responsibility for its preservation and maintenance?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): It is true that on the advice of the historic sites and monuments board the S.S. Keno, now at Dawson city, has been declared to be a national historic site. Negotiations are under way with the municipality at Dawson for the maintenance of the Keno and its operation as an historic museum.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT OF PILOTS LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask whether T.C.A. has made any provisions to find employment for the 104 pilots the company plans to lay off this year because of the change-over to its new jet services, and how many of them will find employment.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on December 14 last I explained to the house how T.C.A. was going about the laying off of these pilots. As the hon. member said, the lay-off has been brought about because of the switching over from one type of plane to another.

Management of T.C.A., the Department of Transport and I personally are extremely sorry at the laying off of these excellent pilots, who have rendered such great service to aviation in Canada. However, as I explained at the time, T.C.A. has established a laying off procedure so as to ease as much as possible the displacement that will occur following the lay-off. Also, every effort and energy is being expended by the management of T.C.A. to find employment for these pilots. At the present time I do not have figures as to how many have found jobs, but I saw in this morning's paper that some other air lines have been hiring a few of these pilots. I know that it is unfortunate that these pilots have to go outside the country to find employment, but on the other hand it shows that Canada at the present time has the best trained and most competent pilots in the world.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and inquire whether any consideration has been given by T.C.A. to using a crew of three pilots in their jet service, as I am informed foreign air lines are doing?

Mr. Balcer: I could not say exactly, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure that solution must have been explored. In any event I will check with management and report back to the house.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—DECISION OF COUNCIL RESPECTING DOCTORS AND DENTISTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition directed a question to the Prime Minister in which he asked whether the Prime Minister's attention had been called to the decision of the Northwest Territories council, as reported in the press, that it cannot afford the program aimed at recruiting badly needed doctors and dentists for the northland. The hon. member asked for any comment on the decision, and in view of the fact that the council reports through the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources I thought I might be allowed to answer.

May I preface my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by stressing that within its spheres of jurisdiction, which are substantially those of a province except for the administration of resources, the administration of the Northwest Territories operates autonomously. The decisions of the council are those of the council and relate to essentially provincial functions. They are not the responsibility of any department of the federal government.

I have consulted the commissioner of the Northwest Territories, and I am advised that the council had before it for consideration, at the session that has just concluded, a plan designed to provide increased public health services in the Great Slave lake region of the territories, and to establish arrangements that would make practice there attractive to doctors and dentists, whom it is now extremely difficult to secure. The plan would have cost the territories $129,000 per year over and above present health expenditures, plus an unknowable amount of added cost for increased health treatment. The council is already budgeting, I am advised, for expenditures of $1,242,600 for health services in 1961-62, and faces a total budgetary deficit of $1,273,398.

In all the circumstances the council decided that it could not, at the current session, adopt the health plan. It did, however, pass a resolution that may be of interest to the house, and if it were the wish of the house I could read the operative part of the resolution:

(a) That it would be desirable, in the interests of the health of children and of people in the territories who are not at present covered by federal health services, to be able to introduce, at as early a date as possible, a plan based on the Great Slave lake health plan with the intention of extending it to cover, as soon as practicable, the entire Mackenzie valley and Mackenzie delta areas;

(b) That it would be reasonable and acceptable to have some part of the cost of such a service found from the revenues raised within the territories but that it would not be financially practical, in view of the other needs and the circumstances of the territories to raise more than a minor part of the cost in this way; and

(c) That the officers of the territorial administration should do their utmost in the negotiations for the federal-territorial financial agreement for the period beginning April 1, 1962, to urge upon the federal authorities the importance of making provision through an increased grant for adequate health services along the lines referred to.

The financial arrangements between the federal government and the territories involve grants on a five-year basis somewhat along the lines of federal-provincial agreements, but adjusted to the special needs of the territories. Discussions concerning the basis for grants for the period beginning April 1, 1962, are now under way. The problem raised by the council of the Northwest Territories in the financing of adequate health services will be considered in connection with those negotiations.

Lest there be any misunderstanding, may I add, Mr. Speaker, that the council of the Northwest Territories does not have to meet the health costs of Indians and Eskimos in the north. This is a federal responsibility, and so also is the hospital insurance program initiated last year which covers all residents of the territories.

TRANSPORT

P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister in a position to give a progress report on the proposed Prince Edward Island causeway?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bourget: A supplementary question. Does the minister intend to give such a report before his estimates are brought down for discussion?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I will, Mr. Speaker.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

RENOUS BASE, N.B.—CHANGE IN HEATING PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. In view of the answer given yesterday by the minister regarding the conversion from coal to oil at the Renous naval base heating plant in New Brunswick, can the minister inform the house why this was done and has he any further information on the subject?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria may I say that the economy realized by the change which I announced in this house yesterday is of the order of $13,000. The amount of coal used under the former system was of the order of only 45 tons. This substantial economy indicates that the change is appropriate.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question. I can appreciate what the minister says, but if the change-over has not taken place will he give consideration to investigating whether it may be possible to instal an automatic coal burner?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there are more detailed questions to be asked I think they might be taken up at the appropriate time, when the estimates are before the house.

HOUSING

STATEMENT OF YEAR END FIGURES ON HOUSING STARTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Nipissing on January 18. Our final figures on housing for 1960 show that housing starts in all areas were 108,858, of which 76,687 were in centres of population of 5,000 or more. The completions for the year 1960 number 123,757, and houses under construction at year end were 65,773.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Since this figure of 108,000 is now available—

Mr. Walker: No; 108,858.

Mr. Garland: Since these figures represent the lowest number of starts since 1953, will the minister say whether the government has given any consideration to an early lowering of the National Housing Act interest rate?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the government has given consideration to a great many things in the matter of housing. It has instituted a tremendous program which the hon. member knows about, and all other questions that have not yet been dealt with are constantly under consideration by the government.

COMMUNICATIONS

PACIFIC CABLE—STATEMENT ON DIVISION OF WORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): On Tuesday last the hon. member for Laurier inquired regarding the cable to be constructed between Canada and Australia, and how the work would be divided among the participating countries.

I am advised that the construction of the cable will be carried out in the United Kingdom; but subject to prices, quality and delivery all being satisfactory, Canada and Australia will, so far as they are able, supply all materials for the cable production in proportions to be agreed between them, taking into account that ideally those proportions should approximate to 50-50 in terms of value. It is expected that Canadian suppliers will be able to meet these requirements in most cases.

It might be added that the cost of material approximately equals the construction cost.

SPORTS

CANADIAN OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION—SURVEY GRANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard asked me a question concerning the proposed grant to the Canadian Olympic association in order to assist them in determining the best Canadian site for the 1968 winter Olympic games.

Having somewhat misunderstood his question, perhaps I should say a word in clarification. Such matters as he mentioned, relating to cost and population factors for each of the possible sites, will undoubtedly be considered by the Canadian Olympic association before it decides which site would give Canada the best chance of being selected as the host country for this event. This information had been communicated to me earlier.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—SURVEY FOR SECOND SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Could the minister say when his department might be able to undertake the much needed survey to create a suitable second harbour at Vancouver?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, because of numerous requests for a supplementary harbour for shallow draft vessels at Vancouver, the Department of Public Works is undertaking a boring and sounding survey to determine the feasibility of dredging Vancouver False Creek and, as a matter of fact, the survey was started on January 19.

[Mr. Balcer.]

INDUSTRY

PICTOU, N.S.—REQUEST FOR REFIT WORK FOR SHIPYARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question is based upon a letter received from unemployed shipyard workers at Pictou, Nova Scotia. In view of the unemployment situation in the town of Pictou, has the Minister of Transport had any requests for refit work at the shipyards there and, if so, what reply has he made and what action has been taken?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the situation at Pictou and we have been working very hard to try to provide work in this shipyard. I am very pleased to say that no later than yesterday treasury board approved the letting of a contract for over $200,000 to the Ferguson shipyard at Pictou.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO ABSENCE OF NATIONAL REVENUE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of National Revenue if during his absence from the house yesterday he succeeded in unmasking Sir John A. Macdonald?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): A reply to that question is not necessary, Mr. Speaker.

THE BUDGET

SUPPLEMENTARY FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have 13 minutes and perhaps a few seconds in which to try to drive home the argument which I began on Tuesday night, that increased aid to underdeveloped countries is an essential element in the battle against unemployment. First I want to say a word about the humanitarian argument although I wish to deal mainly with the economic argument. I think it is a self-evident proposition that if we had before our eyes the starvation, misery and so on of the underdeveloped countries we could not take it.

I support this proposition with a small incident from the first world war. In November, 1918, there was a Canadian battery which had advanced into Germany and which was still living more or less under service conditions, with the men getting their rations out-of-doors. A friend of mine who was an officer in the battery told me about this incident, and he made the remark that the men were, of course, short of food. I said, "Did the rations not come up?" He said, "Sure the rations came up, but the blockade was still on and when the men were eating their rations out-of-doors each of them had a group of hungry German children around him". He said, "The Canadian soldiers couldn't take that, of course, and the result was that the children got the food". I suggest that perhaps this is the kind of thing we can all understand.

I want to say a word also about the question of economic independence and political independence. The free nations have assisted the underdeveloped countries along the path to political independence in wholesale fashion, but help is still needed for them to obtain economic independence and there is great danger that if economic independence does not come about, political independence will perish too. I quote from a statement used by Chester Bowles, who is now in a key position in the United States. He is referring to what an Indian statesman said to him about four or five years ago. These are the words:

Our ability—

The ability of India.

—through democracy to surpass, or at least equal, China's development under a dictatorship will determine our ability to survive as a free nation, and if we fail, Asia goes too.

Chester Bowles goes on to say:

He was right, for on the Asian stage, where half the human race is seeking a quick solution to the problem of economic development with Africa and South America looking on, communist China already serves as the contrast and, in a grim sense, as the criterion for economic progress in India.

I come now to the economic argument. I think one may say there is agreement on all sides that increased trade, that is increase of international trade, is the final solution to unemployment, and that the greatest opportunity for increased trade lies in increased buying power in underdeveloped countries. I think there is no reason to believe that in the face of European, American, Japanese and communist competition we should expect to get a larger share of the present cake, so to speak; that is, of the present amount of international trade. Trade has got to be increased. Aid means trade, and one thing I want to underline is that aid means Canadian employment.

I gave an illustration the other night of the Colombo plan, where of a $36 million gift proceeding from Canada 95 per cent was represented by Canadian employment. That is what we mean when we talk about aid. I also quoted the president of the Imperial bank who called for "boldness and imagination in our approach to foreign aid". I quote another high authority in the business world:

We need the export stimulus of foreign aid in the short run and the good will and the markets it will mean in the underdeveloped countries as they grow and prosper in the long run.

There are favourable signs of increased assistance from the United States. There is the two edged remark I quoted the other night from the new president:

If the free society cannot help the many who are poor, it can never save the few who are rich.

I repeat that I think there is no reason to believe that we can fully deal with unemployment unless we can substantially increase the amount of international trade, and the obvious way to do that is to bring up the level of the underdeveloped countries.

In this connection I want to take the example of India. India is in some ways very discouraging; I know that. Nevertheless, we have the opinion of that internationally famous economist and world traveller, Barbara Ward. She says that in relation to the whole Atlantic world India stands caught in something of the same position as Western Europe in 1947. She explains that the European nations had done a great deal to restore their own position, but were absolutely at a standstill because of the need of foreign exchange. This was supplied by the Marshall plan. Barbara Ward goes on:

India stands caught in something of the same contradiction. Years of effort have set its economy in motion as never before, but for further expansions the essential component of foreign exchange is simply not available.

She says further, speaking of the attitude of the west:

—the kind of sustained decision underlying the Marshall plan—the decision to see the effort through to success—has yet to be made.

Now, the question will be asked, is the western world not doing enough? The answer is no. Mr. Hoffman, that great international servant, says that the result in the 1950's was disappointing. There was only a gain of $15 to $20 in per capita income in the one hundred less developed countries. The average increase in the western nations during the period, 1950 to 1957, was approximately $300, as against that small amount of $15 to $20 in the underdeveloped countries. In the United States it was $530. Speaking of this, Hoffman says that it is quite all right for the rich to get richer but disturbing and distressing to have the desperately poor people remain desperately poor.

I want to give one further figure here. The average per capita income in Canada in 1959 was $1,507, as compared with $110 in the underdeveloped countries in 1950, rising to $125 or $130 in 1959.

The question is, can we afford to do more? What is our present contribution measured in what we might call topical terms? Mr. Keenleyside, a former United Nations official and now president of the B.C. power commission said, jocularly but accurately:

> The cost of the Canadian contribution to the Colombo plan is less than half the cost of cosmetics purchased annually by Canadian women.

The easy way out of this situation, and it is being put forward by many people, is to find the money by reducing defence expenditures. This is a very attractive solution. I wish I could put that forward as my solution, but I am not prepared to base my suggestion on that. As we know from the experience of Mr. Gaitskell, the leader of the Labour party in England, the responsibility of laying ourselves open to the communists is something serious men will have to consider very seriously. I have to fall back, therefore, on familiar words.

> This ought ye to have done, but not to have left the other undone.

In other words, I believe we have to do both. If this argument of mine is sound—and it is an argument that has been advanced by abler, wiser and more experienced men than myself—then we have to do both. The excuse is often advanced that we are a small country. We are not so small as all that. Moreover we are not in the habit of saying we are small. We often say that we are very big. We often say we are the third or fourth trading nation, and that is true. In addition to this, our example would be very effective in the United States. We have reason to believe the United States is going to do a great deal more about this problem. Further action by us would have a significant effect there.

No one will deny the validity of these three arguments. I am sure no one will dispute the humanitarian argument, the political argument or the economic argument. In so far as the political argument is concerned, I want to read a short sentence which I forgot. I have here an article by Malcolm Macdonald recently back from India, where he spent years as Britain's representative, speaking of India and other Asian nations whom he described as non-aligned. The article reads in part as follows:

> It is vital to the interests of the free world that these nations should not slip over to the communist side. The issue is in the balance; it is at present uncertain whether the non-aligned Asians will move closer to the western camp or go communist or remain strictly non-aligned. If the west does not show adequate sympathy and give sufficient help to them, they will drift into the communists' arms, which are outstretched to give them a comradely, if suffocating, hug.
> In either case the balance of political power in the world may be vitally affected.

The question remains, then, not whether we accept these arguments but whether we take them seriously, whether we are prepared to do anything about them. It may be that there is a different spirit abroad. It may be that we will develop some of the boldness and imagination for which the president of the Imperial bank calls. It may be that we shall take seriously what the Prime Minister said:

> Economic assistance to underdeveloped countries is a major and mandatory need if freedom is to be preserved in the world.

If my argument is right, and I am following those who have thought so much about this problem, I would go on to say, do not let us miss the bus. People say, can we afford it? I use the argument which was used when we were considering a loan of a billion dollars to Britain in 1946. The argument was made then that the question is not whether we can afford to do it. The question is whether we can afford not to do it. This argument was accepted then and was triumphantly successful.

I would close by saying that we cannot leave everything to the government. Public opinion has to support the government. The other night the Secretary of State for External Affairs at a meeting in Toronto found slight evidence of support in public opinion on this question. I venture to say to those who create public opinion, the churches, the universities, the labour unions, chambers of commerce, farmers' organizations, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association: think on these things and reach your conclusions, then act accordingly. You cannot leave everything to the government. I close with the words once used by Lord Lothian, whom Churchill called the greatest ambassador to the United States, and who once said in a speech in the United States:

> Under a democracy, the responsibility comes squarely down on the shoulders of every one of us.

I say, therefore, to the Canadian people, accept that judgment and act accordingly.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In the last day of the debate on the budget, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be fair to say that much of the criticism that has been levelled against the budget by the Liberal opposition has been confirmed by the criticisms made by corporations, individuals and institutions all over the country. Only the other day there came across my desk a newsletter containing the views of a well known investment company in Montreal, the Jones Heward & Company. It is headed, "The Outlook for the Canadian Economy", and is dated January 12, 1961. On page 2 there is the following reference to the so-called baby budget:

> It is curious that the December budget was almost void of measures to combat unemployment which could reach 12 per cent of the working force in the winter months of 1961. In this respect, this was "an emergency budget without emergency measures", and under the circumstances, difficult to rationalize.

Then on the third page of this interesting analysis of the economy of the nation, in the second paragraph, the report points out:

> The budget raised more questions than it answered. It had anything but a settling effect on the bond market, many foreign investors regard the measures as only the beginning of things to come, and residents are disappointed that no positive action was taken to support business and arrest unemployment. It makes any forecast of the spring budget uncertain at best.

As we know, many views have been expressed as to why in fact, in view of its contents, the Minister of Finance brought in any budget at all at this time. The budget will be noted, I think, not so much for what it says but for what it does not say; not so much for what it does but for what it fails to do.

I think one good example of the latter was the nature of the reply given to the hon. member for Laurier by the Minister of Finance when the former asked what were the depressed areas in the country that the government had in mind in connection with its proposal for a double depreciation allowance for industries settling in depressed areas as an aid to unemployment. The Minister of Finance said, that, of course, he could not give a reply to that kind of question until all matters having to do with the budget in this house had been dealt with.

I want to take issue with the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance, in the announcement he made—in the only announcement that had any direct bearing on conditions of unemployment in this country, namely that of a double depreciation allowance for industries settling in depressed areas, as an aid to unemployment—should have accompanied the announcement of that policy with the definition that the government would require and insist upon in regard to the phrase "depressed area".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At the end of my speech. I only have half an hour.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is attributing to me the use of an expression about depressed areas. I say that he will look in vain for any such expression in my budget speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a point of order. You have misquoted me.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman has a happy faculty of trying to make his own speech when somebody else has the floor, and that will not happen in this instance. I say that the Minister of Finance should have told the country and the house what were the depressed areas to which this announcement would apply, and what would be the requirements before an area could qualify as a depressed area. I say that because the only reference in the budget—by implication, not directly—to unemployment was this particular provision, as a means of assisting in the relocation of industry or in the encouragement of existing industry to stay in a depressed area.

This conceivably, depending on the details of the policy, could be of very great help in the alleviation of unemployment in a particular district. So the Minister of Finance now, before this day is over, should tell the house what are the depressed areas that the government has in mind, and what are the definitions of a depressed area that the government purposes to have applied to this particular policy. We should know, for instance, what percentage of the labour force has to be unemployed for an area to be considered depressed. There is no difficulty in the government giving us this information, if it has settled on the criteria; and if it has not, it would be most unusual for the government to make an announcement of policy without having carefully considered all the factors involved.

Someone points out that the Minister of Finance will not be speaking again. In that event I hope that the Prime Minister or someone else who will undoubtedly have a word to say will be authorized by the Minister of Finance—as the Minister of Trade and Commerce was authorized today to speak about the conference in Washington—so that we will know exactly how we are to judge this particular provision.

The minister has very good precedents before him. There is now before the 87th congress of the United States a bill to alleviate the problem of economically depressed areas. That bill represents the determination of the new administration, in office only a few days, to tackle a problem to which we have been urging this government to address itself for three years now. Then there is, of course, the practice in the United Kingdom. So I say to the Minister of Finance that before this debate is over we should know what are the depressed areas that the government has in mind. We should also know what will be the requirements in order for a particular community or area to constitute itself into a depressed area, to take advantage of this double depreciation provision.

The United States department of labour lists 99 areas in the category of "substantial and persistent labour surplus". What they have done there we can do here, and what they have done there quickly we should at long last, if we are going to do anything about this serious problem of unemployment, do at the earliest possible moment. This debate will terminate today, but all matters having to do with the budget will not be completed for possibly another month. Two months will have gone by during which municipalities and corporations could easily have made preparations to take advantage of what could be a very constructive way of dealing with this problem of unemployment.

The operative criteria in the United States for determining what is a depressed area is about 6 per cent of the labour force unemployed over a specific period of time. In Britain the criteria is between 4 per cent and 5 per cent. If we were to apply those criteria to this situation of course the whole of Canada would be a depressed area, because unemployment in our country now reveals the fact that 8.2 per cent of our labour force is unemployed.

Therefore I say to the Minister of Finance, if this government really wants to make a constructive contribution to the alleviation of unemployment let it address itself at once to the request that I make today. Otherwise we will be justified in saying to this government that it has announced a policy the value of which will be effective, if at all, only in the long term, just as the Vocational Training Act, just as the Productivity Council Act, just as the so-called small business act were all designed to deal with the long term, although the impression has been created and will continue to be created that they represent part of a vigorous campaign on the part of this administration to deal now, not tomorrow, with the problem of unemployment.

If the Minister of Finance wishes to give the house any indication of the government's concern for unemployment, let him not delay any longer in meeting this particular request. Let the government name the depressed areas. Let us have all the definitions required, so that municipalities and industries can take the necessary steps to collaborate with the government in providing relief against unemployment which continues to grow day by day, as the figures of the government itself reveal.

There is one other matter with which I wish to deal. It is one of those matters not referred to in the budget but which has a corollary relationship to the problem of unemployment, a problem which I think should have been mentioned in the budget. This has to do with the state of the unemployment insurance fund.

It will be recalled that the day before we adjourned for the Christmas recess I asked the Minister of Labour if he would table the report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission, following the meeting that was held by that body in October last. The Minister of Labour said the government had not yet studied the report, and until such time as it had studied the report it could not be tabled. We adjourned the following day at six o'clock, and we were informed by the newspapers and the radio at about seven o'clock that night that in a clandestine way the Minister of Labour, in the dying hours of the last day, had tabled the report which I had asked for the day before. He did not tell the house that he had tabled the report, and consequently it was not possible for speakers on this side, discussing the budget on the last day before adjournment to make any reference to this report. But the report is a significant document, and I am sure it will be read by every worker, every employer and every responsible Canadian, because it reveals the perilous condition which faces this trust fund. It is a trust fund; it is not a government account but a trust fund contributed to by the employers and employees of this country to the extent of 80 per cent, the contribution by the government of Canada on behalf of the Canadian taxpayer being only 20 per cent.

This device of the Minister of Labour, this slick trick in handling a report of great consequence in such a way as I have described, is not new. This is not the first time such a device has been used when information of this kind has been presented. The same practice was followed by the Minister of Labour in the dying days of the last session of parliament. A few days before parliament prorogued last August we asked for another special report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission. We were told that the government had not yet considered that report. Then in the dying hours of the last day of that session the Minister of Labour tabled the report in the same way by handing it to the Clerk of the House. Parliament was thus denied the opportunity of knowing its contents, and participating in debate based on its recommendations and commentary.

This clearly reveals one thing; that this government does not want a full disclosure made of the situation which presently confronts this fund. Why did the Minister of Finance himself not make reference to the financial state of this fund? He has an obligation, a duty as Minister of Finance to make a review of the financial situation in the country in all its aspects, particularly at this time; because we are told in the speech from the throne that the government intends to bring in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to deal, among other things, with the financial state of the fund.

If I may make any suggestion to the Minister of Finance, may I say that I trust whatever he proposes to do will be done by way of replenishment of that fund from the consolidated revenue fund itself, for reasons I intend to indicate. In that event, unless no act is going to be done before the end of this fiscal year, there can be no justification whatever for the Minister of Finance not having referred to the state of the unemployment insurance fund in his budget speech.

It is interesting to note that the Minister of Finance said in his budget address that instead of a promised surplus of $12 million there is now to be a deficit of $285 million. I am going to suggest to the minister that the deficit next year, if he does what he should do about the unemployment insurance fund, will be not less than $425 million. If the recommendations of the advisory committee are followed, at least $137 million has got to be transferred from the consolidated revenue fund in order to give the government the opportunity of living up to its contractual obligations to the unemployed workers who are beneficiaries of the unemployment insurance fund.

This special report tells us some very significant facts, and since the Minister of Labour has not told us about them, and since the Minister of Finance has not discussed them in his budget speech, it falls upon us in the Liberal opposition to comply with an obligation which clearly under our form of government belongs to the Minister of Finance and his colleague. The report points out that as of September, 1960, there was $319.5 million in the fund. This figure represents the book value of securities held. The advisory committee recommends that this amount be reduced by 8 per cent in order to allow for the loss on the sale of securities between October, 1958 and September 6, 1960. The report points out that the fund has had to absorb a loss on the sale of securities of close to $28 million. I point out again that this is money which belongs to the workers and the employers of this country, not to the people of Canada as a whole; and I make the statement now—one which should have been made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech—that since this government came into office there has been an actual loss to the unemployment insurance fund of some $50 million, a loss to those two segments of the population who are the main contributors to the fund.

We are entitled to ask the Minister of Finance how this fund is to be replenished. Has the government arrived at a policy? We were told last session by the Minister of Labour that the unemployment insurance commission had made recommendations, that these recommendations were made last spring. If that is so, why did the government not bring in legislation before Christmas so that a committee of this house could be convened to examine the bill in order to determine whether the provisions recommended were satisfactory? Such a committee could not only have examined the financial situation and the proposed amendments to the act; it could also have considered the means by which so much financial loss might be repaired and the other proposals which no doubt would have been made. I venture the suggestion, that because of the way in which the business of the house is conducted by this government we shall reach the perilous period of the end of May with precious little, if anything, done about these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Possibly nothing at all will have been done about means to replenish the fund.

The fund, to remain in existence, must be replenished according to the advisory committee, from the consolidated revenue fund in the amount of $131 million. But this minimal amount will only reimbure the fund for the direct losses it has incurred through the forced sale of securities and in paying abnormal seasonal benefits and payments to fishermen. So we should like to know from the Minister of Finance the answer to this question. How are payments being financed at the present time? Are they being financed through the sale of securities and, if so, what losses are being realized? Are they being financed by the government, and what effect will this have for, say, the months of November, December and January? Am I right in assuming that the unemployment insurance commission has not been selling its securities in recent days.

These are important questions, questions which the Minister of Finance cannot dodge and must not be allowed to dodge during the course of this very day if he is to be fair to the workers of our country, who are greatly concerned about the opportunity that will be available to them after May or after June next if they are to take advantage of contractual rights which they possess for maintenance assistance under the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The whole story of this fund during the period this government has been in office reflects the inept way in which the government has conducted its affairs. We know that in December, 1956 the fund amounted to $921 million. We know also that in May, 1960 it stood at $296 million. Here is what the advisory committee had to say in the report clandestinely laid on the table just before Christmas without the house knowing anything about it:

> It is not safe to estimate that the fund will have a balance greater than $140 million to $150 million at the end of March 1961, and should unemployment be higher than last winter the fund may well be lower than the figures mentioned.

The report further states, and I ask the Minister of Finance to bear these words in mind:

> By the end of May 1961 the fund will possibly be as low as $85 million and certainly at a most unsafe level.

This government has no apprehension about this matter at all. I say that by the end of June, unless the government acts, there will be nothing whatever left in the fund. That is obvious when you consider that the fund stood at over $900 million in 1956 and that it now faces the possibility, according to the report, of being practically depleted at the end of May. Surely one is justified in saying that this government shows a reckless regard for the implicit trust laid upon it to protect the integrity of this fund and the workers of Canada.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues brag about the magnitude of the drain on the fund. For instance, when speaking over television on September 21, 1960 the Prime Minister said:

> —we have taken action to implement that statement by providing new jobs and by making possible the largest increase in social justice payments to individuals, including unemployment benefits, in any comparable period in the history of this nation.

I ask the Prime Minister what these unemployment insurance payments have to do with his new concept of social justice and the present government of Canada. I repeat that the money paid out of the fund is not money that belongs to the government of Canada. It is money it holds in trust for two groups, who are the main contributors. To take credit for this as a new demonstration of its interest in social justice reveals the character of this government and its real concern for the plight of the unemployed.

The Prime Minister in that statement gives us an opportunity to evaluate the tremendous drain on the fund. It is a significant fact that from the time this fund was first created until the former government went out of office, in a period extending over 17 years and ending March 31, 1957, benefit payments under unemployment insurance amounted to $1,458,288,979.24. In three years and eight months, since March 31, 1957 up until the present time, the period during which this government has been in office, benefit payments totalled $1,519,224,628.05, under $100 million more in three years than was paid out in the previous 17-year period. Nevertheless the Prime Minister had the audacity to say on television the other day that the present level of unemployment is not as great as it was during periods of Liberal government. This is an important matter. I call on the Minister of Finance to deal with this matter today if he speaks, or if he does not I ask him to delegate that matter to someone else. I ask him to bring in the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act as quickly as possible.

The minister has a responsibility in this matter along with the Minister of Labour. He cannot leave that responsibility to the Minister of Labour alone because it will be his responsibility to replenish the fund, to recommend the policy that will be adopted; and if this matter is not brought before the house at the earliest possible moment, if we wait until May, the government will be denying the workers of Canada and the employer groups a right that is theirs.

I warn the minister now that if he hopes to replenish this fund by the method he employed a year ago he will incur the wrath of the Canadian people and will receive an indictment all over this country. If he proposes to replenish the fund by increasing the contributions of the employers and workers as he did in 1959 he will be placing himself in jeopardy as far as the Canadian people are concerned.

The minister is now in that very insecure position. We have a right to request that this matter be brought before parliament at the earliest opportunity. The Minister of Finance should have seen fit to do so in December. The fact that he did not do so only shows this government's complete disregard for the serious problem of unemployment that now faces us.

We have criticized the government for its policy on unemployment. We have been accused by one hon. member in this house of employing Hitlerite tactics because we dared to expose the nature of the problem. I regret that the Associate Minister of National Defence should have used the words he did when speaking of the Liberals as Hitlerites and communists, because they were raising the problem of unemployment. I know that that hon. gentleman has repeatedly, in private at least, dissociated himself from the former leader of the Union Nationale, Mr. Duplessis, but I am surprised to see him now using the same tactics and indulging in the same irresponsible accusations and slanders that were used a few years ago by those with whom he said he did not associate. The hon. gentleman did not add to his stature in this house in making those statements.

Instead, those who are playing into the hands of the communists and Hitlerites are members of a government now charged with the responsibility of doing something about this problem, and who will not listen to the concrete suggestions put forward by a group who feel it is their duty to point out the nature of this situation, and at the same time to recommend constructive approaches for the solution of the problem. That is what we in the Liberal party have done. We are not ashamed of having exposed this problem. We are proud of the constructive suggestions we have made, and we ask the government to take note and follow our example.

(Translation):

Mr. M. Deschambault (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I must, in the first place, congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for the masterly account he has given the house of the present economic situation.

However, may I say that I regret that no greater changes were made in the way of higher tariff in favour of some industries which I feel have a great effect on our national economy.

Let me refer, in the first place to the rubber footwear industry. As a result of absolutely unfair competition on the part of many European manufacturers and especially on the part of Japanese manufacturers, this industry is on its way out.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if we allow Japan to carry on its competition against our own footwear industries, those industries are bound to disappear in the very near future.

In support of those statements, let me quote briefly from a speech delivered in my constituency late last year by Mr. Paul Smith, vice president of the Dominion Rubber Company Limited to the chambers of commerce of St. Jerome, Acton-Vale, Granby and other municipalities.

Needless to say, the alarm sounded by Mr. Smith on that occasion proved practically justified all along the line, and I am very sorry to announce in this house that the Dominion Rubber Company, the main industry of the city of St. Jerome and even of my constituency, had to lay off several hundred employees, then shut down completely by the end of the year.

So that the minister and all hon. members may realize the serious predicament of those industries, may I quote a few figures mentioned by Mr. Smith at that meeting.

May I add that our exports of those products were the first to suffer from foreign competition, and that those conditions began in 1949 and have constantly deteriorated since. May I be allowed at this point, to quote a paragraph from Mr. Smith's speech:

> The following year, i.e. 1950, definitely marked the collapse of our export trade, one which had been established some hundred years. In 1937, for instance, we exported seven million pairs of rubber footwear. Now that volume was practically non-existent in 1950. That year, Canada had to be content to export 384,000 pairs of rubber footwear, most of them of a more specialized type in which foreign manufacturers were not interested, and since then, this very small volume keeps decreasing.

There is, therefore, no doubt that our export market for rubber footwear has almost completely disappeared, perhaps forever.

Apart from that very substantial loss, our Canadian industry had to face a still greater and more acute danger, the arrival on the Canadian market of articles mainly of Japanese origin, at a retail price which was sometimes only a third of our production cost. Competition therefore became quite impossible for our people.

What did we do to help those industries? Again, Mr. Speaker, I shall borrow a paragraph from Mr. Smith's speech, and I quote:

> Since 1955, representatives of that industry have been constantly engaged in discussing the matter with the federal authorities. First of all, there was a special inquiry by a joint committee of representatives from the industry concerned, the union and the government. The following year, the tariff board held a series of investigations and public hearings. A few months later, the board admitted in its report that the industry was, in fact, in a bad way, but no recommendation was made for the government to intervene. Later, there were meetings with cabinet ministers and government officials, and the tariff board launched another inquiry, this time being instructed by the government to submit recommendations as to what could be done for the industry. Again there was a report. Again the report conceded that the industry was in serious trouble but again the board made no recommendation regarding steps that should be taken, this time because the board seemed to think that any steps advocated to give efficient help to our industry would be of such extraordinary nature that they would exceed its jurisdiction.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention the names of a few rubber footwear manufacturers that gave up the fight, feeling completely out of the running with foreign imports.

In 1950, the Gutta Percha Rubber Ltd. was the first to go under. A little later, in 1951, it was the turn of the Cambridge Company. Two or three years after that date, the B. F. Goodrich of Canada Ltd. closed down its rubber shoe plant; then came the Superior Rubber Co. Ltd., a crown corporation set up by the Newfoundland government, which also had to quit in 1956. And quite recently again, Mr. Speaker, it was the turn of the British Rubber Co., of St. Laurent and Lachine, to stop operations and amalgamate with the Miner Rubber Co., of Granby, in order to be better able to stand up to competition.

I should add, Mr. Speaker, that a few companies kept operating but at great sacrifice and considerable loss. In particular, they had to dismiss many of their workers, which only increased the unemployment problem. So that you may realize the vastness of the problem, I would like to quote more figures. In 1950, the Canadian rubber industry sold 15 million pairs of canvas shoes and waterproof footwear in Canada. That same year, that is in 1950, we imported 280,000 pairs. In 1959, the import figures showed a total of 8 million pairs, as compared to 280 thousand pairs in 1950.

Of course, during this period sales in the Canadian footwear industry suffered a severe slump. Sales figures decreased from 15 million pairs in 1950 to 10 million pairs in 1959, that is one third of its total sales.

In 1950, imports were negligible but in 1959, imports of canvas shoes captured 70 per cent of the entire Canadian market, while that of rubber footwear accounted for 30 per cent of our market. This figure of 30 per cent represents a rapid gain of 11 per cent for 1958 and 1959 alone.

A major cause of concern is the fact that the breaking point for Canadian manufacturers is precisely between 30 per cent and 45 per cent. In other words our modern plants will no longer be able to meet their obligations unless we act promptly and efficiently on behalf of our manufacturers.

I would not want to deal at length with the textile industry, although that industry too has suffered heavy losses because of imports. The precarious situation of those Canadian plants has often been discussed in this house. However, may I point out that the Regent Knitting Mills Ltd., in my district, in St. Jerome, has been forced to discharge more than one third of its employees.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard), and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) have repeatedly told the house of the difficulties facing Canadian textile plants, especially in the province of Quebec.

I know that the government has taken certain steps to help this type of industry, but I must remind the Minister of Finance that the situation of the textile industry is still very precarious. I have it on good authority that for several years many owners of this type of industries have registered substantial annual deficits.

(Text):

I should like to comment on one of the branches of our industry which is also in need of our help, namely the hardwood plywood industry of Canada, which is faced with a similar problem. Here again I should like to give some figures which will throw some light on the situation and give information to hon. members.

I should like to emphasize the seriousness of the present situation. Statistics on imports and home production supply a clear picture of the imports of foreign plywood. We see that imports of Japanese plywood, which were under one million square feet in 1950, reached 50 million square feet in 1959. We can obtain an even better view of the situation if we realize that imports of hardwood plywood in the United States, which amounted to only 10 million square feet in 1951, had climbed up to 810 million square feet in 1959. I might add that these figures will be higher in 1960 compared with the few months of 1959 for which statistics are available. Such abnormal imports have already forced three plants to close their doors, and consequently have caused a loss of labour affecting many hundreds, if not thousands, of people.

Production of hardwood plywood in Canada is vital to our economy as this is a basic industry and I should like to think that all phases of the production of this material from the beginning to the end take place in Canada and are carried out by Canadians with Canadian materials. Everyone is aware, of course, that we are selling to Japan and other foreign countries more dollar value than we are buying from them. Let me point out that when we import from Japan, for instance, a country where the basic salary equals approximately one sixth of that in our country, we are thus importing six times more man-hours from that country than we are exporting. This means that for every single man-hour we export to Japan at the rate of a Canadian worker's salary, we are importing six man-hours from Japan in the form of the Japanese counterpart.

I could go on referring to more and more industries that are certainly facing the same problem, but no doubt the minister must know about them and intends to take drastic measures to protect our industries. But we must keep in mind that these measures must be taken now or very soon; otherwise we might find ourselves faced with the complete impossibility of coping with our industrial problems.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the government also deserves credit for the legislation just adopted concerning loans to small businesses. I found with pleasure that those loans were available to the tourist industry which, according to me. ranks among the most important ones in Canada, and is, without any doubt, the most important one in my constituency.

I shall not elaborate this point as I propose to deal with it again on some future occasion.

Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I merely wish to add that Canadian industries are not at all asking for undue restrictions on imports from abroad, far from it. All they want is a measure of protection and a fair share of sales in our country.

There should be quotas on certain of the goods we import, and those quotas should not exceed a fair percentage, so as to allow a reasonable amount of imports.

Our manufacturers are prepared to take their responsibilities, to increase the quality of their goods, to step up production, to cut down their costs and to face all difficulties that might turn up. In short, they are prepared to face the present problems. What they ask for, however, is a minimum of business security, trusting in their skill and ability to face other dangers that might come up.

I have so much confidence in this government, in the know-how of our industrialists and businessmen that I know that if we can give them the least encouragement, that is all they will need to get over their present difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say how grateful I am over the decision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) to change question No. 10 on the next census form.

The official opposition said that the government had to back track, and back down before the protests of certain ethnic groups in Canada. The members of the opposition are the only ones who think so. Newspapers throughout Canada, and particularly in the province of Quebec, far from looking upon this decision as a retreat, express great satisfaction about the changes made. I sincerely believe that the change in question No. 10 will do justice to all ethnic groups in this great country of ours.

I need not add that the Liberals who intended to make use of that anomaly in the census form for purely political purposes now feel crestfallen about it, and our opponents' old slogan "divide and rule" is now outdated and inapplicable.

The Conservative government has changed question 10 and, in so doing, strengthened national unity across Canada. All groups or organizations interested in the various cultural movements in our country are grateful to the Prime Minister and his government for having come up with a happy solution to this delicate problem.

I must add that the political football which our opponents intended to use against us is punctured. The only program they now have to offer the people of Canada are the contradictory resolutions adopted at the recent Liberal convention in Ottawa. After our fellow citizens have studied those resolutions and that program, I am sure they will be in a position to see the difference between the two large Canadian parties and that they will continue to give to the Prime Minister and this government the support and trust they deserve.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had the opportunity of expressing my appreciation to the Speaker for his courtesy in welcoming me in this house, in November last. Therefore, at the beginning of my remarks, I should like to extend to him my most sincere thanks. I should like also to underline the ability and impartiatity which he has shown in the fulfilment of his presidential functions.

Since the debate on the speech from the throne has been cut down, at the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), who wanted the government to introduce as soon as possible all legislation which might improve the present unemployment situation, I take this first opportunity which is offered me to make a few remarks.

I should like to thank the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) for the kind words he had for me, in seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I congratulate the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) for her resounding victory of October 31 last, when she doubled the majority obtained by her predecessor in 1958. I wish her a long and fruitful political career.

My congratulations also to the hon. members for Royal and Peterborough (Messrs. Flemming and Pitman) who were elected at the same time as I, on October 31 last.

Mr. Speaker, among those members who preceded me as representatives of the constituency of Labelle in this house, there is one name which comes to my mind, and it is that of Henri Bourassa, who sat here as a Liberal from 1896 to 1906 and from 1925 to 1935 as an independent.

Imagine my surprise when I read in the newspapers, during the by-election in Labelle, that Conservative speakers had made wide use of his name in their speeches. As if Mr. Bourassa had been one of their partisans.

I wonder what Mr. Bourassa would have said today about the census questionnaire. Surely, like me, he would have been among those who opposed question No. 10. He surely would have opposed it, like the electors of my constituency, like the members of the legislative assembly of Quebec who voted unanimously against it, like the Montreal municipal administration, like the association of French language educators, like the St. Jean Baptiste societies, like the chambers of commerce, like the Franco-Ontarian farmers' union, like the school boards, and so forth, who have asked this government to take the necessary steps to have removed from the questionnaire, in section 10, the words "Canadian" and "American," with reference to ethnic origin.

As you see, Mr. Speaker, the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) was wrong in claiming that the protests about the census were a balloon inflated by the Liberals. I would even go so far as to say that most groups that protested are independent, or possibly even supported this government in 1958.

Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday one hon. member opposite stated that this government had achieved wonders, and that he had great confidence in the future of this country. I share his optimism with regard to the future of Canada, but if we consider the results of the four last by-elections, I can assure you that the people of Canada have lost confidence in this government. Never in the history of this country has any government so rapidly lost the confidence of the people than has the present government. In proof of this I would refer you to the recent report of the Canadian institute of public opinion.

Mr. Speaker, in 1957 this government had more members elected than had any previous government. In 1958, it got 54 per cent of the popular vote. Now, the latest survey made by the institute shows that in less than three years such confidence has been reduced by 15 per cent.

In that short period of time the government managed to break all records in the field of deficits, unemployment, unfulfilled promises and it will soon break another record, that of unpopularity.

Mr. Speaker, during my election campaign of last October 31, six ministers of the crown and a great number of members supporting the present government came into my constituency to campaign in favour of the Conservative candidate. Among them were the Associate Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer), the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley), the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion), the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton). Other Conservative members also invaded the Labelle riding to extol the so-called achievements of the Conservative government and to make more promises, such as the construction of a television tower or satellite station at Mont Laurier.

In the early stage of the campaign, our opponents asserted that the work would start before election day, but since it had not started late in the campaign, they changed their minds and said it would be undertaken in the fall of 1960. A Mont Laurier newspaper which supported the Conservative candidate, went so far as to say how high the proposed tower would be.

In reply to a question of mine, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) stated in this house on January 18 that he was not even sure that a tower or satellite station would be built in 1961.

I hope that the minister will see that those promises made and not kept in 1960 will be carried out at least in 1961.

The people of Labelle, as well as throughout Canada, no longer believe the promises of the Conservatives. That is why the Conservatives suffered an overwhelming defeat in my riding.

In order to justify that defeat, the Conservatives made use of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and made him suggest that it was due to the intervention of the Quebec Liberal party. That is false.

Mr. Denis: But Mr. Jean Marie Beriault was there, indeed.

Mr. Clermont: Our friends opposite are trying to blame their bad administration on the Liberals, accusing them of leaving behind a sorry legacy.

They knew in 1957 and 1958, just as they do today that they would necessarily inherit this famous legacy they so often speak about if they ever acceded to power.

They should have then told the population that because of that legacy they would not be able to administer the affairs of the country as well as they would have liked to. They would have been more honest with the people if they had done so. But instead they said: "Everything is going wrong; vote for us and all will be right. No one will suffer".

Three years later the number of unemployed has doubled. What is their answer: "Blame it on the legacy".

Bankruptcies are increasing. Blame the legacy. The cost of living is rising. The legacy, again. Plants are folding up or are cutting down production. Once more, it is the legacy.

What have they done with this legacy? They have increased or doubled the liabilities and wasted the assets.

The Liberals had left them as a liability 197,000 unemployed. They have almost trebled this liability.

The Liberals had left them heirs to $900,000,000 of assets in the unemployment insurance fund. By next May, they will have reduced those assets to less than $100 million.

The Liberals had left them millions accumulated in successive annual surpluses. They succeeded in converting those assets into tremendous deficits.

Was the cost of living relatively high before? They have substantially increased this liability.

Interest rates which were normal under the Liberals have become prohibitive in the last three years.

Such uneasiness as existed in certain industries like the textiles, footwear and other industries has considerably increased.

The national debt is larger, and so are naturally, the interests we have to pay.

In this supplementary or baby budget, which is being discussed today, I find nothing which might, in the immediate future, help the farming, lumbering and tourist industries which are of special interest to the people of my riding; and I am sure that, in the other areas of the country, the budget was not found more satisfactory.

In proof of this, since I am not asking any one to take my word for it—I will quote newspaper opinions.

Contrary to the claims of the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), as evidenced in Hansard for January 24, 1961, page 1362, I quote:

> That budget, so carefully prepared was well received generally across the country, and the opinion of our fellow citizens was reflected in the many editorials we have read both in our daily newspapers and our weeklies and which, for the most part, commended the Minister of Finance.

English language newspapers reply:

(Text):

The Calgary Herald, December 21, 1960, states:

> Its effects are to be long term, not immediate.

The Montreal Star, December 21, 1960, says:

> To the average person's reaction a disappointment—so was corporation.

The Globe and Mail of December 22, 1960, stated:

> —budget which itself is widely described as disappointing—

The Toronto Star of December 21, 1960, contains the following:

> Budget ignores unemployed.

The Windsor Star, December 21, 1960, page 2, reads:

To the ordinary individual it was just another Tuesday evening, as far as the baby budget of the Hon. Mr. Fleming was concerned.

(Translation):

I see in La Presse for December 22, 1960, an editorial entitled:

A stopgap budget.

This article reads as follows:

Mr. Fleming's biggest mistake is his failure to believe, last spring, in spite of warnings from all parts, that the unemployment situation was serious. If, at that moment he had taken the steps he is now announcing, the situation today would perhaps be better instead of worse.

(Text):

The following extracts appeared in newspapers across Canada, a résumé of which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune, December 22, 1960.

The Ottawa Citizen states:

Canada's unemployed must be prepared to dig in for a long, tough winter.

The Vancouver Sun says:

Of immediate stimulation to the economy there is practically nothing.

Then the Victoria Times has this to say:

In his latest budget, Mr. Fleming attempts to cure three years of financial miscalculation.

The Toronto Star states:

Donald Fleming's supplementary budget may win a niche in history as the one which began to Canadianize our economy. But it does almost nothing about a more urgent matter—getting nearly 500,000 unemployed back to work.

The Toronto Globe and Mail says:

The essential problem of the Canadian economy remains—high prices caused by high costs, which are caused in large part by high taxes.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I could quote about ten other non-partisan opinions, all condemning the budget.

In conclusion, may I add that this budget offers so little in the way of new ideas, does so little to remedy the present crisis, that our hon. friends opposite have said almost nothing about it. They have wasted the time at their disposal on remarks about the Liberal rally which was so successful that it made them forget their baby budget.

That budget gives a true picture of the government with all its confusion and contradictions. It has, incidentally, contradicted the previous one, and it will probably be contradicted by the next.

(Text):

Mr. H. E. Monteith (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few humble remarks in connection with the budget. I also wish to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for the excellent provisions he has included in the budget. I will not go into detail as to the many acts which have been passed in this house to alleviate a situation which was well in the making before this government came into power. I shall only mention two acts which have been passed during this session which I believe will be of great interest to my constituents as well as to the nation at large.

We are living today in one of the wealthiest countries in the world and our big problem is how we are going to spread this wealth? We must all realize that this country is going through a great transition, from manual labour to automation, from one industry to another and from one district to another. Old industries are disappearing and new ones are cropping up. Old skills are losing ground while new skills are in great demand. While governments at all levels are doing much to ease the situation caused by these great changes which are taking place, I do believe that a great responsibility lies with the Canadian individual. When our ancestors settled in this country they had no social security, they had no unemployment insurance, no family allowances and no old age pensions. They had to create, build and plan for their own security.

The government through legislation, the scientist through research and the industrialist through venture are all putting opportunities before us every day. It is up to the individual to prepare himself for the challenge of this rapidly changing country. I personally believe that this government, through Bill No. C-49, an act respecting technical and vocational training, is putting before the Canadian youth an opportunity to avail itself of skills and trades which will fit them into the prevailing industries.

Also our older citizens who are unfortunate to be unemployed through changing times may now, while receiving their unemployment benefits, improve their present crafts or acquire others more in keeping with the requirements of the new industries. This act alone will do much for the present and future of Canada.

There is another bill which I should like to mention, an act respecting loans to small businesses. The small businessman who has invested his all in an enterprise now has the opportunity to expand and realize his ambitions. The small businessman has been the forgotten man for too many years. He was left on his own to sink or swim. Who knows but that this will be the beginning of many new and large industries.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this is the concluding day of the debate on the baby budget and I think it can be said that the main question members can ask in this debate is: Why all the fanfare; why all the build-up for a budget of so little substance and of so little significance to the Canadian nation?

In presenting his statement to the house the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) seemed almost totally unaware of the great national emergency that exists in the country at this time. He said at one time, against this background: How is Canada faring? On the whole it is faring well.

One of the first requirements of a government that would deal with an emergency is its ability to comprehend that an emergency in fact exists. Surely there should be no need for members of the opposition to bring forward evidence at this time that our country faces a grave national crisis, that our gross national product has remained almost stationary, that our country is failing to advance, that we are failing to meet the challenge from abroad, in an economic sense. The government has sat idly by while hundreds of thousands of Canadians face insecurity and inadequate incomes.

The recent figures show very widespread unemployment in the country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) goes on television, and does he acknowledge the existence of this great emergency? Not at all. He says that in certain years under a former administration the statistics were even worse than they now are, and he apparently takes comfort from the fact that we are not yet quite as bad as we were in the 1930's.

The Minister of Finance, I noticed, in trying to alibi the unemployment situation, referred to immigration at one point. At another point he said that one of the main reasons why we have great difficulty in providing jobs is because there were so many babies born during the war years.

I am ashamed of a minister and a government that puts forward the excuse that there are too many Canadians coming of working age and the government is unable to do anything about providing work for our larger number of citizens. This is the lamest excuse that any government could possibly put forward as a reason why it is unable to deal with the situation today. The government says it arose back in the war years, there were too many babies in the early 1940's. There were too many for the Conservative party in 1961 to do anything about providing jobs and job opportunities for the people of this country.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is a fantastic distortion.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has made a speech, and the Prime Minister is here. The Prime Minister is to come on later. Somebody had better pull this government out of the hole it is in; somebody had better rescue the government in this debate. I am inclined to regard the Prime Minister would be as good as anyone in this endeavour, but even the right hon. gentleman will have the greatest difficulty rescuing the government from the facts of this great national emergency.

One of the reasons why the government is experiencing such difficulty now is that it believes wholeheartedly in the private enterprise system. This means allowing business to make the decisions while the government sits out in an irresponsible role. The fact of the matter is that the government has to play a role of leadership. The fact of the matter is that the government should bring forward at this time, in our judgment, a great national plan to deal with the many urgent requirements of the Canadian nation, requirements which if steps are taken to fulfil them would provide jobs for all Canadians.

There are many things which need to be done and which should be done at this time. Canadians need more homes. There should be a vast program of home building, a vast program of slum clearance instead of the halting, limping program adopted by the government which meant fewer starts instead of more starts in housing last year. Canadians need more schools and they need more hospitals. I think our citizens could use more automobiles. I think they could use all the automobiles that our factories could produce if they had jobs and incomes with which to buy those products. Go to any urban community in Canada and, I suggest, hon. members will find a community which needs more schools and more hospitals.

We need a vast system of modern roads in Canada and I suggest here is a place where the government should be playing a leading role at this time. As long ago as 1912 the United States initiated a great road building program which included transcontinental highways, interstate highways, main state highways and farm to market roads as well as roads over which school buses operate. Instead of having a vision in the field of road building, this government has carried on the one road policy of the former administration. The government has decided that nothing more is to be done until the trans-Canada highway is completed. I venture to suggest that Canada will celebrate its one hundredth anniversary without having so much as a single trans-Canada highway completed to adequate standards from one end of this country to the other.

Certainly, this forecast will prove justified unless we have a greatly changed policy in relation to highways and road building. Now is the time when the government should say to the provinces: we are prepared to put federal money into a vast road network across this country which would include the trans-Canada highway, which would include roads running north and south, which would include farm to market and other important roads. Why does not the government go forward with a great plan of this kind to develop the Canadian nation and provide jobs for all our citizens?

Instead, the present administration has done a number of things which have been very worth while. We were glad to support them, but the things which have been done are patches; they are helpful, but they are just patches and patches will not be sufficient to arrest the upward trend in unemployment in our nation. I suggest the government should now deal with this national emergency as it was dealt with, in a monetary and financial sense, during the war.

I suggest that the government at this time would be fully justified in providing for an expansion of the money supply. The government should take steps at this time to bring interest rates down. Instead of the province of Newfoundland, as I saw in the paper a couple of days ago, putting forward a bond issue at an actual rate of 6.13 per cent, it should be made possible, through government action in this field, for such bond issues to be put out at a rate of less than 4 per cent. If a policy of lower interest rates were adopted in this country it would allow the provinces to go forward with a great program of expansion within their borders; it would enable municipalities to undertake necessary works programs which have been too long delayed. But as long as this government follows a policy of high interest rates and tight money national growth, national development will be choked.

The Minister of Finance sat on this side of the house for many years as the strongest critic of the high interest, tight money policy followed by the government in those days. Since he became Minister of Finance there has been a complete change; he has turned from an advocacy of low interest rates to a policy of the highest interest rates this country has seen for generations. I suggest that this has been a mistaken policy and that the mistake should now be corrected.

The money which is necessary in order to provide for a great program of national development could be obtained. It could be obtained by an increase in the money supply. It could be obtained by asking Canadians to invest in their country, to invest in government securities and put up some of the funds necessary for a great program of national expansion. As far as possible, however, the government should follow a pay as you go policy in respect of an expansion program of this kind. I am saying that there has to be a measure of borrowing and an increase in the money supply, but full employment should be reached as quickly as possible and at that time, if not somewhat before, it should be a pay as you go policy.

I see the parliamentary secretary looking at me critically. If the hon. member would refer to some of the budget speeches which were made in the early part of the war I think he would see there an indication of the measures which a government should take in order to bring about full employment and a full production economy. I have in my hand the budget speech made by Mr. J. L. Ilsley on April 29, 1941, and I should like to quote two short paragraphs as follows:

> In planning these policies, the government set for itself two objectives:
> First, to bring the country as rapidly as possible to the full use of its resources and man-power. For this, financial policy could not be the sole nor even the chief instrument, but it was necessary that it should help and not hinder, that it should keep step with the work of industrial and military organization.

We do not want to have full use made of our economy for war, but we want a full production economy for peace in order to meet the needs of the Canadian people. I think if this nation could go forward with a full employment economy of the kind we were able to achieve during the war at a time when we had such a tremendous drain on our man-power we, the same nation, would today be able to deal in a sensible way with the problem of half a million unemployed at the present time.

An hon. Member: We are.

Mr. Argue: Somebody says: "We are." Every time they say "we are" the numbers on the unemployed rolls of this country increase. The quotation continues:

> The government's second objective was to follow, as far as may be practicable, a pay as you go policy. This is derived not from any dogma of financial orthodoxy, whatever that may be, but from the known and proved inequities and the disorganizing and shattering effects of inflationary rises in prices and incomes.

Neither this nor any other government will be able to solve the present economic crisis unless it is prepared to take this kind of active leadership in our national economy. During the war it was necessary to bring about certain foreign exchange control. The government has tried to influence the value of the Canadian dollar. Greater emphasis is needed in the direction of reducing the value of the Canadian dollar and consequently increasing the prices of Canadian exports. All these things may lead to increased pressures. In an economy such as we have with an increasing control by large corporations this government should be prepared to take whatever steps are necessary to regulate the prices of the chief commodities produced here that are now controlled by monopolies or semi-monopolies.

This broad attack by the government is in my judgment necessary for the functioning of democracy, to restore our economic health and to restore the self-respect of the Canadian nation among the community of nations of the world. In doing these things I do not suggest we should place all our emphasis on material matters. This government should consider some of the things that are of great cultural value. It should consider the creation of a ministry of culture and national objectives, a department which could give advice and leadership in the development of the arts and sciences, making it possible for Canadians to enjoy the benefit of this kind of cultural endeavour.

I have been endeavouring to put forward some of the things I feel the government should be doing at this time. Today the main estimates for this year were presented in this house. These show that the vision is a thing of the past, that the government has forgotten its many promises to the Canadian nation.

There is no indication in the suggested expenditures in the main estimates of any vast attack on unemployment or any of the programs necessary to bring about full employment to increase incomes in our country. That is not to say there are not significant figures. The high charge of public debt which was $680 million for the year 1959-60 and was up to $774 million for the year 1960-61 is down just $1 million in the estimates for the current year. This is an indication of the cost to the country of this government's high interest policy.

The measures I have suggested are in the opinion of this group necessary to deal with the economic crisis facing the Canadian nation today. These measures are not provided in the budget that is under discussion. However, there are certain things in the budget which should cause Canadians a great deal of concern. I have been disturbed by the proposals in the budget to increase the efficiency and speed with which the tariff board can deal with tariff questions, by the suggested changes in the Tariff Board Act which would give to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) arbitrary power and by the changed basis on which certain tariffs are levied.

Canadians have an ingrained suspicion that a Tory government is a high tariff government. This is more than an ingrained suspicion because contained in this budget are proposals of this government to bring about the greatest orgy of tariff increases that this country has seen. In addition changes are proposed to give to the Minister of National Revenue arbitrary and far-reaching powers which should never be placed in the hands of a minister.

The Minister of Finance has made no bones about the need for the tariff board to expedite decisions in applications for tariff changes. The minister has gone so far in his proposals as to suggest the appointment of additional members so for all practical purposes the board will be split in two and sit in the form of two panels and instead of having one tariff board we will have two. The boards will be able to sit simultaneously and increase tariffs twice as rapidly as could one tariff board.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the hon. gentleman not wish the board to hear the application with respect to vegetable oils?

Mr. Argue: The hon. member who interrupts may make his own position clear at a later time. I am presently making clear the position of this group. In the Customs Tariff resolution the following is set out:

(a) in the case of goods other than goods custom-made to specifications, goods of approximately the same class or kind are made or produced in Canada;—

It further sets out:

(b) in the case of goods custom-made to specifications adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time.

The following is then set out:

(3) The decision of the minister shall be final with respect to the following matters:

(a) the normal Canadian consumption of the goods described in subsection (2), and

(b) whether goods are custom-made to specifications, and whether adequate facilities exist in Canada for the economic production of such goods within a reasonable period of time.

The minister will decide whether in his opinion 10 per cent of certain goods consumed in this country are produced in Canada, whether they are of a class or kind approximately the same class or kind as certain imports and whether adequate facilities for the economic production of such goods exist in Canada within a reasonable period of time.

We need to have not only a planned economy within our country with effective production and distribution at home but we also need planning in export markets and in international trade. No one suggests that this country should allow foreign countries to dump their goods here to displace Canadian workers who have been operating for many years in Canadian industry but we suggest that the way to bring about an expansion and control of international trade is through export and import boards, through long term mutual agreements and not by the archaic method of increasing tariffs which will have the result of increasing production costs in Canada and instead of contributing to greater employment will bring about a larger measure of unemployment.

We need planning in our nation. We think enough jobs should be made available so that all our people will have an opportunity to work. In the days ahead as automation increases and production methods improve the Canadian work week should be materially reduced. Premier Khrushchev has made the boast that in his country the 30-hour work week will be a reality within a short time. As a nation we cannot achieve such a shorter work week unless in our judgment we have the necessary amount of planning to deal with all aspects of our economy, full production, full employment and a control of international trade.

This budget is an indication of the abject failure of this government to deal with the present national emergency. It suggests a failure by the government to bring forward an adequate national plan to provide full employment, full production and a reasonable distribution of our goods. I suggest to the minister, and I warn him, that he has taken the wrong course in embarking upon an outmoded high tariff policy that will spell ruin to the Canadian nation, to Canadian industries and to the Conservative party.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Utter rot.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I should like to ask the hon. member a question. As leader of the C.C.F. party in this house, is he for free trade?

Mr. Argue: I should like to see the day when outmoded tariffs are abolished in their entirety and we have planned trade instead of tariffs. That should be our objective. I think we need planning in our trade and the planning should be along the lines I have suggested, which will result in a gradual reduction of tariffs instead of this blind reliance on tariffs that will lead to greater not less unemployment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Good-bye to the labour votes for the new party.

Mr. Argue: I would suggest to the hon. member that we are waiting for the official reply of this government to the offer of Britain for a free trade area, and I tell my hon. friend also that we are going to be required as a nation to associate ourselves with a larger trading area, which will mean a reduction of tariffs and an increased market for Canadian factories. The Tory party is following the assumption that 18 million people provide an adequate market for major Canadian industries. This is a fallacy. This government has failed the nation by failing to bring about a very major change in its trading policy.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has provided a stimulus for the Canadian economy, one which I hope every advantage will be taken of in the Atlantic provinces. During the last few weeks I had been hopeful that another stimulus would be provided by the recent convention held by the Liberal party in Ottawa. Having noticed the importance they placed on the Atlantic provinces and the situation as it is there today I was hopeful that they would at least pass a few resolutions in this regard. However, Mr. Speaker, that did not take place. Once again the apparent disregard of the Atlantic area came to the forefront, as it has many times in the past. They apparently ran out of time. But they did not run out of time before one delegation from the Atlantic provinces packed it up in digust.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that possibly they could have made some time available for themselves at least in one category, on which they spent much time. I refer to the resolutions on education. In this particular field they saw fit to have a resolution concerning loans, and another one on scholarships and bursaries. Lo and behold, they came through with one for free education at all levels. I would suggest that possibly they could have avoided the first two, since they were going to provide free education at all levels, and spend a little time on problems of the Atlantic provinces on which they placed so much importance.

I am very sorry to see that champion of labour from Essex East is not in his seat, nor is his colleague from Bonavista-Twillingate because some of the remarks I have to make at this time will be made for their benefit.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) rose in his place the other day and asked a question with regard to the coal situation in Cape Breton. Does he think for a moment that because he rises in his place and asks a question on the situation in Cape Breton he is going to be able to come into that province and set himself up as a champion of the coal miner? Hardly, when one considers the view of the Liberal party during the time of their administration and what happened to the coal industry then.

If action had been taken at that time the crisis with which we are faced today would never have come about.

I recall quite vividly the remarks made by the former prime minister in his speech in Fredericton. This is a quotation that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) takes exception to whenever it is used. At that time the former prime minister suggested that we leave the coal in the ground for future generations in order that they would be in a position to manufacture synthetic products. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate takes strong exception to the use of this quotation; but I have often reminded him that because of the exception he has taken to this quotation a front-page editorial was written in the Fredericton Gleaner. The hon. member keeps questioning whether this editorial was ever written. I hope he reads Hansard tomorrow because for his benefit I say that this editorial which called upon him to make an apology for his denial was printed on January 23, 1958. Of course, we do not agree with all editorials, but this one, which strongly suggests that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has been untruthful in his statement is one with which I have to fully agree.

I often wonder, Mr. Speaker, just what the position of the hon. member for Essex East would be if he were on the government side of the house today and were faced with the questions which he himself likes to direct to the front benches. In all likelihood, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) reminded him not too long ago, he would be catching a train. During a discussion on unemployment he did not have the patience to sit and listen to it because, as he said, he had to catch a train.

There is also not much doubt that the members of the C.C.F. party were delighted at receiving within the last few days comments clipped from the Cape Breton paper which severely criticized me. I might say that those comments have been forwarded to members of the opposition without any accompanying note, letter or signature, just the clipping taken from the paper, which severely criticized me for remarks I made with respect to the actions of the union executive in regard to the mines situation. I do not hesitate to repeat at this time—and I will do it at every opportunity—the remarks that I made at Sydney, Nova Scotia, in answer to a question from the floor, which was to the effect that 800 miners at the Caledonia colliery were not getting the support from the executive officers which they could rightfully expect. This is a statement which I make no apologies for and one which I can substantiate by remarks and conversations held with miners themselves involved in this particular closure. I also remarked on the question of fewer contented rather than a larger number of discontented miners, a policy advocated and practised by J. L. Lewis.

I also find it hard to understand the representations that the C.C.F. would like to make on behalf of the miners, and this applies also to the hon. member for Essex East. Not too long ago I took it upon myself to correspond with members from Quebec and Ontario. As an indication of the degree of sincerity behind the effort of the hon. member for Essex East to help the miners I might point out that he did not take the trouble to reply to my letter. I might also say that not one C.C.F. member replied to my letter. Not one of the C.C.F. members to whom I directed the letter took it on himself to reply with respect to this very vital problem facing the Nova Scotia miners.

I noted that at the Liberal rally the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate seemed to think he had the answer for the coal problem. His idea was to provide free power for ten years and this was going to solve the problem of the mines. He also implied that we should not be reaching into the captive market of Quebec and Ontario and that our efforts should be directed toward secondary industries in the Atlantic provinces. Does the hon. member believe for a moment that our coal supply is so short that we are only able to supply secondary industries that might be established in the maritimes and are not able to supply Quebec and Ontario at least partially? It is no surprise to me to find that when this proposal was put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and suported by the former member for Inverness-Richmond and also by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) their feet were cut from under them by none other than Walter Gordon, the author of the Gordon commission report and, as far as the maritime provinces are concerned, in just mentioning his name I cover a multitude of sins.

There is an answer, Mr. Speaker, to the problem of the Cape Breton coal miners and I indicated that answer in the letters I circulated to members from Quebec and Ontario. Members from Ontario will excuse my reference to their province. I will explain why I am doing so later. If 10 per cent of the market in Ontario now supplied by United States production was supplied by our coal this would solve the problem in Cape Breton. In the correspondence I have received from members of parliament and from provincial representatives in Ontario and Quebec it is pointed out that this market would be available to Cape Breton coal if and when it was competitive. Far be it from me to stand here and suggest that we could make Cape Breton coal competitive with United States production. I do not see that this is possible but I do say that the answer lies in Ontario because 10 per cent of that market is all that we need. If the entire market were at our disposal we could not produce the necessary amount of coal but just 10 per cent of the market now supplied by imported coal would provide us with what we need to keep three mines in Cape Breton operating and the result would be that 2,500 men now faced with dismissal from their employment would be able to continue working.

I place emphasis on the province of Ontario simply because Nova Scotia provides Ontario with a considerable market for her products. I might elaborate by reference to the car industry. In Nova Scotia people pay anywhere from $150 to $300 more for the same model car as people in Ontario pay. This is a tremendous difference, and the same thing is also true with regard to many other kinds of manufactured goods for which Ontario finds a considerable market in Nova Scotia.

The same situation applies to Quebec to a lesser degree but as the automotive industry operates primarily in Ontario, Nova Scotia provides a greater market for Ontario than for Quebec. If Ontario industries were to take it upon themselves to purchase Nova Scotia coal even at a price two or three dollars a ton higher than the United States product and passed on the extra cost to the consumers it would only mean two or three milion dollars more on a million tons and, when passed on to the consumers in Ontario I am quite sure it would mean less than $1 per year to each consumer. This is not a great price to ask when you consider the fact that, as I said, Nova Scotians are paying from $150 to $300 more for cars manufactured in Ontario and are also paying more for other goods produced in Ontario.

Any comparison between the situation in Nova Scotia and that in other coal producing countries such as Belgium, France, England, Germany and so on is not a true comparison. It has been said that coal is obsolete. In making that reference I am referring to a statement made by the potential leader—I understand that all that is necessary to make him so is a snap of the finger—of the new party. Mr. Douglas made that remark at a recent seminar in Montreal. Mr. Douglas is the potential leader of the party in which a lot of miners in Nova Scotia hope to place their faith. So far as union activities in Cape Breton are concerned it would appear that the stepping stone to union office has always been the C.C.F. party, and this is one reason why throughout the years I have often found it necessary to take exception with some of their representations. Yet here we have a bunch of Cape Breton miners who hope to place their faith in a man who has referred to coal as being obsolete.

As I was saying, it is not a true comparison to compare the situation in the Cape Breton coal fields with that in any other coal producing nation because these other nations are all exporting nations while in Canada the coal miners are engaged in the production of a product that cannot supply the Canadian demand. We could not supply our own domestic requirements if called upon to do so.

The situation we are faced with today is that Canadian miners are going to be sidetracked or whatever you wish to call it when the company sees fit to close collieries while at the same time this nation is importing far more coal than we produce. This is one reason why the situation in Canada cannot be compared with that in other coal producing countries which are faced with problems of an entirely different nature.

We in Nova Scotia are faced with the problem today that as a coal producing province we cannot market our production in our own country, and to me that does not add up to Canadian people supporting in every way goods produced in Canada. Probably I should not say it but it is true that if Nova Scotians and the people of the Atlantic provinces generally had the opportunity to deal with their American neighbours and were free to buy from them the lucrative market that we provide for Ontario cars would possibly not be available. We have a situation where we do not have the protection for the coal industry that we might desire. I am not suggesting for a moment that there should be anything in the way of a duty or quota placed on United States coal because this would be unfair.

If we were in a position to service the Ontario market fully we might have an argument for calling for further duties or controls over United States imports. This we cannot do, so all we are asking is that 10 per cent of the market in Ontario and Quebec be made available to the Nova Scotia miners in order that they may maintain their employment. As I pointed out, even if this 10 per cent were sold to the consumer at $2 or $3 more, it would not mean much to the individual. I am quite sure that Canadians across this country would be willing to accept something of this nature if, in turn, the miners would be provided with employment.

In closing these remarks, I must say that I have to take exception to the attitude of Dosco. I feel their attitude is not the answer. I do not believe the effort has been put forward that should have been put forward to sell this coal. I believe Dosco has been lax in its sales promotion and its investigation of possible markets. I am not in a position now to mention some confidential information I have received which would have a bearing upon this problem. However, I believe there is every reason why the Cape Breton mines should be kept operating. In fact, the information I have even goes so far as to indicate the possibility of reopening closed mines and the further possibility of new openings. I do not believe that by mentioning this I have betrayed any confidence.

As I say, this confidential information would indicate that a large market for coal is about to open in the near future. However, the immediate answer would seem to be making a percentage of the Ontario and Quebec markets available. I believe that if it could be brought to the attention of the people of these provinces that with a slight expenditure they could help the Cape Breton miners they would be agreeable.

I do take exception to the fact also that Dosco has adopted the attitude that they do not want further federal aid to keep the mines operating. We all realize that the assistance given by the federal government in the last three or four years has been tremendous, in fact far beyond anything done by the Liberal opposition who today, in order to try to promote the idea they are supporters of the miners, pose what they consider to be embarrassing questions. I cannot understand the attitude of Dosco because they are already leaning on the federal government in so far as many of their operations are concerned. They are receiving considerable assistance in connection with steel. They receive considerable assistance, too, in connection with their shipyards. Dosco has maintained they lost $2 million last year and, because of this, the mines have to be closed.

During the last coal conference I put forward the idea that the coal from the Caledonia colliery, the one which is to be closed on May 30, could be treated as separate commodity and sold at 57 cents a ton cheaper. This would be an incentive to the buyers in Nova Scotia and eastern Ontario to purchase this coal. These consumers have put forward the idea that they would take coal of a lesser quality providing the conditions were right. When they speak of "lesser quality" of conditions it adds up to one thing only, and that is price. If it is possible to keep No. 4 colliery operation by setting up this coal as a separate commodity and selling it at 57 cents a ton cheaper I believe this would provide an incentive to the consumer and also further the development of the west side of this colliery. This side of the colliery will provide quality coal to which they will have no objection.

In making his representations on behalf of this company, Mr. Fairley maintained there had never been any excessive development work on the west side. The miners in that colliery inform me that the development of the west side has reached a stage where it is 85 per cent completed, and with very little effort they could be into this very good coal. The mine could be operated on a single shift basis. I appeal to Ontario and Quebec for this help, and I think it is not too late yet to bring about some solution to the problem. While Mr. Fairley indicates there has been no development work going on in this colliery the Cape Breton Post carried a release from Dosco which seemed to be an ultimatum—perhaps that is too strong a word—a directive to the management of this colliery to complete this development work within nine months.

I am in a unique position because the leaders of the union at home do not see eye to eye with me politically. At times they take advantage of this situation to provoke political discussion and get political propaganda directed against me. As I say, my position is unique because I must do everything I can, to the best of my ability, on behalf of these miners. At the same time I am faced with the problem of denying some of the company's claims when they are advocating closure. In addition, I have to appear with the representatives of the company and the union when they appeal to the government for further aid.

I am placed in an even more embarrassing position when one leader of the union, namely the vice president, Steve Dolhanty—I do not want any mistakes about the spelling this time—praises the government at every opportunity when federal or provincial members are present. In fact, in answer to a criticism of me in a newspaper following a statement I had made he said he hoped I was not voicing government policy because the union got along very well with both federal and provincial governments. "They have been very good to us." Yet this very man when he appears before a local union will take it upon himself to tear apart the provincial government and the federal government. He will make statements to the effect that the million dollar hand-outs by the federal government are no answer to the problem. On the other hand, this very man will come to Ottawa, appear before the government and ask for this very thing in order to continue mine operations. What is my position? Do these supporters of the C.C.F. party think for one moment I am going to stand by—

An hon. Member: That is two-faced.

Mr. MacInnis: —and allow this type of sniping to continue? Somebody mentions "two-faced". Well, in another assembly I would use much stronger words. I have used much stronger words in referring to this same man. I do not intend at any time to stand back and watch this type of thing continue while I, along with other representatives from Nova Scotia, am doing everything possible to promote the welfare of the miners in Nova Scotia. At the same time I appear with these people to make such representations to the government as they care to make. This man goes home and tells the people, through the press or at meetings, that the millions of dollars handed out by the federal government are not the answer, yet that is the very thing federal representatives from Nova Scotia, provincial members and executives of the union have requested from this government and the very thing this government has provided.

I should like to ask the hon. member for Essex East and other interested members to go before their constituents and inform them that for less than a dollar a year each they can save the miners in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker: Before I leave the chair, may I ask the hon. member if he has completed his remarks?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, as the first member from New Brunswick to speak from this side of the house in the budget debate I should like to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Flemming) on his appointment to the cabinet and election to this house. The people of New Brunswick will expect him here in Ottawa to put forward with the same vigour the claims of the maritime provinces about which he spoke so frequently in his previous position.

It is with a certain amount of amazement that I have noticed in the course of this debate the great interest that all members on the government side of the house have expressed in the Liberal rally which took place here in Ottawa a few days ago. In his contribution to this matter before the supper hour the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis), like the rest of the government members who spoke on this matter, seemed to be obsessed with the success of that rally.

Obviously the hon. member could not have been reading the extensive reports on that rally given by the Halifax Chronicle-Herald during that time, or he would have found out for himself that the Atlantic provinces did receive a great deal of attention during the rally. He would have seen that we had a special committee on that special subject and that recommendations were made at that time in reference to highways, capital grants, the coal situation and the Chignecto canal.

If all those recommendations had been acted upon by the present government before this time we would now be in a happier situation in the maritimes and the people would not be as short of work as they are. Of course, we on this side of the house are very grateful for this publicity given to a very successful rally which at the time was hailed by every medium of publicity in the country. This conduct on the part of government members is but a sequence to a previous attempt made to dampen the interest aroused by that event. Indeed, we had all noticed with what a flourish a host of cabinet ministers scattered all over the country and strived to divert the attention of the Canadian people during the days that rally was held.

There is one evident conclusion to be drawn from these aroused feelings of the government members and ministers. If only they would show the same eagerness and spend the same amount of time trying to find a solution to the many pressing problems which now exist in the country, such as the grave unemployment problem, for instance, as they did trying to belittle that rally, they might well avoid some of the wrath which is mounting against this government at the present time.

The debate which is now under way deals with the supplementary budget presented to the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on December 20 last. Some of the measures contained in this budget have been described as good in as much as they are designed to solve the alarming unemployment situation which now exists. But these good measures are all long term measures and are in no way designed to bring any immediate relief to this problem. This leaves one to wonder, therefore, what are the immediate views of the government on this matter of general unemployment.

Of course we know that the government dislikes to be reminded that such a situation exists. Ever since they assumed office, at which time unemployment started to increase, until the present time government members have steadfastly maintained that there was hardly any unemployment at all in the country. When we remind them of the seriousness of the situation we are charged with what has now become a commonplace phrase, of being prophets of doom and gloom, though everything we have said is mild and factual, unlike the extravagant statements made by the present Minister of Finance in 1955 when only half as many Canadians were unemployed and when that unemployment was purely seasonal.

But recently there has been some sort of a new turn in the views of the leaders of the government with respect to this matter. Until recent date we were told there was no unemployment problem, that it was just an economic pause, and that the existence of a severe crisis was just a figment of the imagination of the opposition members. However, in a national telecast last week the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) finally admitted that there really existed an economic recession, but then he hastened to add that this recession was still due to the mismanagement of the Liberals prior to the advent of the present government in 1957.

If it has taken the government over three years to discover that there really was a serious problem, of course we should not reasonably expect that a solution will be found too readily. Haste, decision and readiness we know are not characteristics of the present government; so let us be patient, for we have the assurance from the Prime Minister himself that as long as he is Prime Minister of this country no one will suffer from unemployment.

In the meantime, in spite of these solemn assurances unemployment is mounting and people are suffering. In my own province of New Brunswick we are faced with a number of unemployed proportionally at least twice as high as in the province of Ontario. It is estimated that in some sections of the province at least 20 per cent of our labour force is unemployed at the present time, while our average per capita income is only two thirds of the national average and not much more than half of that of the wealthier provinces.

Small wonder if our people are leaving by the thousands every year in quest of employment in another land, a startling paradox in our immigration policy. But these are all matters which we must not mention lest we be accused of being unpatriotic to our country, of rendering a disservice to our country, of selling our country short, yes, of being prophets of doom and gloom. What a sham performance by a government wishing to conceal its own inefficiency and its complete bankruptcy of ideas.

Personally, I feel that I have received a mandate from the people I represent in this house. This mandate calls for me to voice fearlessly at all times the needs and requirements of these people. This I have always endeavoured to do in the past, and will always endeavour to do as long as I am entrusted with that responsibility. No amount of chiding on the part of the government will ever silence me or ever induce me to retreat from what I believe it is my duty to perform.

I state now that there exist in the riding I represent, as well as in other parts of New Brunswick, certain conditions which are intolerable in a country as full of resources as ours; and I further state that such conditions are an indictment of the government which allows them to continue. The people of my county and of my province deserve better, as a birthright, than the privilege, for a large number of them, of taking the road of expatriation as soon as they attain working age. I was told that last year over 50 people from one parish of some 200 families alone reluctantly had to leave for the United States of America to seek work. This is the pattern in every other parish of my county as well as in many other parts of the province.

I emphasize that this is an intolerable situation and I entreat the government to pay heed to it before it assumes still more serious proportions. The only thing I am asking for these people is an opportunity for them to get work and earn an honest living in the country in which they were born, in which they live, and, what is much more important, in which they wish to remain. They have an inherent right as good honest God-fearing citizens to ask that of the government of their country.

With respect to the economic problems in the province of New Brunswick I should like at this time to make some remarks in line with the recommendations and observations made by the premier of the province, the Hon. Louis Robichaud, at the dominion-provincial conference in July last. After reminding the conference that the province of New Brunswick was one of the original partners in the Canadian confederation, Premier Robichaud stated that when we united with Nova Scotia and the then province of Canada to form a new dominion in 1867 we did so with great expectations. Indeed, when we agreed to the confederation pact in 1867 we earnestly expected that at all times through the years of the development of this new country our economic growth would at least keep abreast of the growth of the other partner provinces.

This expectation, unfortunately, did not materialize and the maritime provinces as a whole are lagging far behind most of the other provinces in economic growth and economic expansion. This situation, we submit, is not conducive to national unity, and to national welfare. In his opening remarks at the federal-provincial conference of November 1957, the Prime Minister said the following:

> We believe that this federation cannot thrive in a climate of glaring disparities in levels and standards of service and development as between the several provinces from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

This is a common belief everywhere in the Atlantic provinces. We also submit that the lack of economic and industrial development compared with the rest of the country is responsible, in the Atlantic provinces, for an unduly large proportion of our people engaging in marginal or submarginal activities. We believe that if the standard of living of our people is to be raised to the national standard the government of Canada must co-operate with the provincial governments of the Atlantic provinces in creating a climate which will provide an incentive for the growth of manufacturing industry.

In what way can the federal government co-operate with the government of New Brunswick and other Atlantic provinces to bring about these desirable incentives for the development of these provinces? First of all, we must stress the importance of having a more flexible monetary policy for our provinces. We have heard a lot about this matter in the course of the last two federal elections. It was then called the tight money policy. It formed a part of the famous Atlantic resolutions about which we heard so much at that time and about which we have heard so little since. Well, tight money is still with us in New Brunswick and in the other Atlantic provinces, and its paralysing effects are painfully borne by the provincial and municipal governments and by all areas of industrial activity. Special policies should be enacted which would render possible borrowing on easier terms and at lower rates by all these corporate bodies and by all levels of governments if we want to attain the objective of an expanding economy in the Atlantic provinces.

Besides the ability to borrow at lower rates we also need incentives in the form of tax concessions to promote the industrial development of our provinces. A capital project development fund, such as recommended by the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, is also pertinent to our economic and industrial growth. This commission recommended that the federal government agree to contribute a substantial sum for capital projects in the Atlantic area to be spread over a relatively short period of years. The purpose would be to cover the costs of necessary capital investments some or all of which would normally be the responsibility of the provincial government.

In the field of transportation, we in the Atlantic region continue to stress the necessity of the Chignecto canal project as a national extension of the St. Lawrence seaway. Without it the impact of the seaway on the maritime region may well be adverse. Now that the federal government has the benefit of the views of the new Minister of Forestry, who always was such a strong promoter of this project, perhaps we can look with greater confidence to its early commencement.

Adequate federal-provincial fiscal arrangements are also vital to the welfare of New Brunswick's economy. A few statistics for the enlightenment of the subject might well be useful at this time. From 1950 to 1959 provincial government costs in New Brunswick showed an increase of $39 million while receipts from the federal government rose by only $20 million. The difference was met by the New Brunswick taxpayer. In the same period of ten years municipal expenditures, excluding school board expenditures, rose from $17 million to $38.6 million, another increase of more than $21 million added to the tax burden. I have stated that the costs of construction, maintenance and operation of our schools were not included in the above figures. These costs, of course, also increase the tax burden.

In the light of the number of people we have in New Brunswick with a population in the vicinity of 600,000 who are called upon to bear a tax burden of such abnormal proportions, the above figures are nothing less than staggering particularly when we know that New Brunswick's per capita personal income is $967 compared with a per capita personal income of $1,767 in Ontario. Having regard to the burden of provincial and municipal taxation in New Brunswick, neither the province nor the municipalities are in a position to increase taxation to meet the growing requirements of our people.

We submit that the government of Canada must face this fact in the light of a situation in which the brunt of increased governmental expenditures is falling on the provinces and municipalities. It should be pointed out that to the degree that the province of New Brunswick receives a larger share under the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangement the municipalities will benefit in that they receive approximately one sixth of the provincial revenues from this source.

For these and the other reasons I have mentioned I submit with respect that the federal government should lend adequate assistance to permit resolving the many serious economic problems besetting the people of the province of New Brunswick. We in New Brunswick do not like our position of poorer citizens of the nation. We demand the opportunity to raise ourselves in self-respect to the levels and standards of common national acceptance.

May I conclude with a piece of friendly advice inspired by the reminiscence of an event which happened in New Brunswick on June 27 last. On that day the fate of the provincial government was staked on the faith of its close and friendly relationship with the present federal government. The rest is history. Unless this federal government is ready to deal with the plight of the Atlantic provinces at the present time the grave forebodings now hovering over the blue Atlantic skies are threatening to engulf its existence with the woes of devastation and oblivion, come the day of the great reckoning.

Mr. W. F. Matthews (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, some of the hon. members of the opposition tonight must have a hangover from the recent convention. When I came into the chamber I noticed three of them sitting in the treasury benches.

Mr. Pickersgill: How many cabinet ministers did you see there?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): One sure thing is that hon. gentlemen opposite will never be on this side under any other circumstances.

Mr. Matthews: I suppose those hon. gentlemen were sitting there dreaming out loud. It reminded me of the story I read in school years ago when I was a boy about the dog running across the bridge carrying in its mouth a small bone which it could handle. The dog made the mistake of examining his reflection in the water where he saw another dog with an even bigger bone.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Matthews: The dog jumped in to try to get the larger bone and consequently lost the bone he had been able to handle. No doubt that is what those three hon. gentlemen were dreaming about as they were sitting in the treasury benches.

I am pleased at having this opportunity to rise in this house to speak in the budget debate. I should first like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for the wonderful job he is doing for Canada. His great ability has been singularly evident to all since he accepted this difficult and important office. The work of this government has appealed to the majority of Canadians. It seems to me that businessmen everywhere are grateful because this government is doing something that should have been done years ago for the good of all Canadians.

Without doubt we have had some fine contributions from hon. members in this debate. Some hon. members read their speeches in full, some refer to notes and still others refer to newspaper clippings. I am reminded of the remark made by Will Rogers many years ago. He said, "All that I know is what I read in the newspapers." I do not believe this was true of Mr. Rogers but it certainly appears to be true of some hon. members of the opposition.

Some hon. members opposite made up their minds some time back that they would not like this budget. No matter what they may think about it, they certainly made up their minds that they would not say anything good about it. That appears to be what has taken place.

I see good in the budget, just as I see good in the future of all Canadians. Whenever I hear anyone knocking a program or a sincere effort to do a good job I personally like to check and search for the truth. The truth is that this baby budget has been well received by most of the people of Canada. With the exception of some hon. members of the opposition to whom I have listened I have not personally heard one person say that he did not like it. It has given new hope to many businessmen in Canada. With respect to hon. members of the opposition who criticize the budget I can only say that they have an axe to grind.

Certainly prospects look good for Canada in 1961. We are very sure in my constituency that 1961 will be a very good year and 1962 even better. However we have to make sure that all Canadians are properly informed of the facts and I am sure that will be done by this government. Every effort is being made at the present time to give the Canadian people the real truth about what is going on in their parliament. I am very glad to note that there is a much more cheerful attitude among Canadians at this time. I believe that the work the Conservative government is doing is in large part responsible for that change. This bears out the fact that conditions are not as bad as some very poor painters have been trying to paint them for some time now.

During its long term of office the Liberal party failed the people of Canada by not building for the future. They were so busy building up a large surplus—no one will ever know why—that they caused a slump in Canada, the slump through which we have just passed. They now have the nerve to ask where this surplus has gone. Everyone knows where it has gone; at least every right-thinking person knows.

There is apparently no cure for unemployment. Even the Liberal party could not cure it in the 20-odd years in which they were in power nor did they make any attempt to prevent it. Now is the time for the government to make a full study of the subject and educate Canadians concerning how to train young people starting out on their first jobs.

I ask that this government also review the amounts that are paid to our senior citizens and to carefully check and revise war veterans pensions. The Canadian Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act should be revised to make possible payments comparable with the increased cost of living. All hon. members know that all the people affected by this legislation are entitled to every consideration. When one checks the records and sees how very little the previous government did for our senior citizens and veterans during the 20-odd years of their stewardship when the government had the large surplus about which hon. members of the opposition now brag one wonders how hon. gentlemen opposite could have the nerve to ever ask these people for their support.

I was surprised when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) spoke on the budget to hear him make the statement that half a million people in this country have no means to live on at all except unemployment insurance. That statement is not true; it is very misleading and I was disappointed that the Leader of the Opposition would ever make such an untrue statement. It must have been made to confuse and discourage the people of Canada.

A manager of an unemployment office in the west to whom I was talking a few weeks ago told me that of the people listed in his office as unemployed about 1,000 were not unemployed and certainly should not be classed as unemployed, and yet these are figures that the members of the opposition are using. Some of them were listed for better jobs, some were people who could not work, some were loggers who were off for Christmas, some were fishermen who were off because their fishing season had closed down. The statement of the Leader of the Opposition that the unemployed have nothing to live on except unemployment insurance is not a statement that a thinking man would make. I would say right now I am sure the Leader of the Opposition, when he considers the matter, will acknowledge that it is a poor statement to make.

Some of the half million are wives whose husbands are earning good wages, and yet this man rises in his place in the House of Commons and says that the only thing the unemployed have to live on is their unemployment insurance. Some of the men are from the forest industry which closes down for Christmas, loggers who have worked most of the year, and the loggers in British Columbia make very good money. They are good workmen; they are worthy of their hire; some of them are on piecework. They are all really good workers. It is quite surprising the amount of money they can make during the season, and yet the Leader of the Opposition says that they have nothing to live on except their unemployment insurance. Some of the commercial fishermen are businessmen with boats worth thousands of dollars, and yet the Leader of the Opposition says they have nothing to live on except unemployment insurance.

This statement of the Leader of the Opposition serves only to discourage the people of Canada. We can well imagine the effect that this program of regain power by fear has on the unemployed. Some unemployed Canadians with families to support regain new strength and faith to try again. He rises in the morning, determined to go and seek employment. At breakfast time he hears the radio blast forth the dire predictions of the Leader of the Opposition. He sees the sombre face of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) glaring at him from the page of his newspaper, and then reads the message of gloom about the number of people out of work that the hon. member has uttered at some meeting the night before, numbers that have been stretched. I think the people of Canada have had enough of this type of politics.

This is 1961. Let us start an up-to-date, cheerful and helpful approach to the problems of our country. The opposition have time and again tried to make Canada's unemployed into a weapon to defeat the government. It is a shame that any group should use such a subject to harm Canada's wonderful future.

We have weather reports in our newspapers and on our radio and television every day.

These reports are as true a picture as the weather department can make them. They never tell us that there is a storm if there is no storm. To make sure that the opposition does not use the unemployed numbers game, which is just as dishonest as the numbers racket used by the Chicago gangsters, I would suggest that a weather chart type of report be set up for the unemployed. This chart would show how many are out of work because of seasonal shutdowns, how many are out of work because they are not able to hold a job, how many are working but are just listed for employment in a better position.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the Liberal opposition for the amusing aspect of the four-ring circus held recently. Most of the things that came out of that effort came strictly under the heading of comedy, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) should collect amusement tax on it. Even over television it was apparent that it was a four-ring circus. One ring was at the Chateau; one ring was at the Coliseum and the other two rings circled the eyes of the Leader of the Opposition when the other mike would not work.

All hon. members will recall the good old days of the circus. They will remember the circus barkers who were always a drawing card with their exaggerated appraisals of the junk they tried to sell, but sold only to the unwary. We all remember those barkers and how they operated. Hon. members will recall how they dressed. They had a hard hat or christy stiff. They worked in their shirt sleeves; they wore arm bands with bow ties to match. I can even remember the pitch they made. Step up, ladies and gentlemen; I have something that should be in every home; it will cost you only 50 cents, folks, half a dollar. Watch carefully; I will show you how this handy can opener works. It works on square cans as well as on the round ones. Do you know what I am going to do? I am going to give the first ten purchasers a roll of bandages and a bottle of iodine absolutely free with each and every can opener; a free bonus for you, folks. You say you are not satisfied; you say you want more for your money? Step up closer, folks, I have hardly started. Do you know what I am going to do? I am going to throw in one of those combination fly swatter and potato masher, all for 50 cents, folks.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the handsome ringmaster makes his announcement: Now, ladies and gentlemen, cast your eyes to the centre of the ring and you will see one of the wonders of the age, you will see the India rubber man of Essex East. Toss in a one and he will stretch it to ten. Toss in a 20 and he will stretch it to 90. Toss him 1,000 and he will stretch it to 2,000. Give him an inch, and he will stretch it a mile. You have found this out, Mr. Speaker, on numerous occasions.

The spotlight is now on the Bonavista magician, who will give a stellar and spectacular act of magic. He will draw an egg out of a hat. We do not say what kind of egg; it may be good, it may be bad, it may be only part bad; it may be a round egg, it may be a square egg; but, ladies and gentlemen, it will be an egg. There you are ladies and gentlemen, the trick has been done. Right before your very eyes, the Bonavista magician has removed his hat.

The barker of the Liberal party now talks like the circus barkers of old, Mr. Speaker. Ladies and gentlemen we will give you absolutely free, at no cost, folks, free health care, free education at all levels, higher old age pensions, reduced taxes, lower tariffs at no cost to you, with the taxpayer's money. At the circus, Mr. Speaker, you pay your money and you take your chance. With the Liberal government you certainly pay your money and you certainly take your chance.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I would not like to follow the example of the hon. member who has just sat down, because I believe that, as a member of parliament we should show more responsibility when speaking in this house. I do not know whether I understood his words very well, but I seemed to hear him speak of "yappers". Now, if there has been any "yapping" done it has been done by the ministers or by certain Conservative members themselves, at the time of the rally which took place on the ninth, tenth and eleventh of January last, when they roamed about the country trying to steal the publicity in the press from us by repeating the same speeches over and over again.

Mr. Chevrier: And the same nonsense.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, in rising tonight to take part in this discussion, I do not propose to deal with the various measures suggested last month by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his budget speech, or rather I should say with the absence of measures which characterized that speech.

I believe that the various Liberal members who took part in this debate have clearly and effectively pointed out the weak points in the present administration.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity of tonight's discussion to draw the attention of the government, and particularly that of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer), to two questions. I am sorry that the Minister of Transport should be absent at this time, because the matters I want to deal with come under his department.

The first question is of primary significance for some districts in the province of Quebec and also for a number of C.N.R. employees.

I know that the government—and more particularly the Minister of Transport—is aware that a policy of administrative readjustment was announced last summer by the president of the Canadian National Railways. The object was the decentralization of authority and the introduction of more modern methods of administration.

It is well known that the national railway network is now divided into five regions, i.e. the Atlantic region, the St. Lawrence region, the great lakes region, the western region and the mountain region.

As a result of that innovation, the Atlantic region extends westward as far as Riviere du Loup, on the former Intercolonial Railway route, and up to Charny, in the riding of Levis on the route of the former transcontinental railway. That region with a main office in Moncton, New Brunswick, also includes the whole Newfoundland network. Divisional offices are located at St. John, Newfoundland, at Campbellton and at Moncton.

Since those changes were announced and even before representations were made to the management of the national railways by various municipal councils and public bodies, more particularly those located in the part of the province of Quebec which is now included in the new region.

Mr. Speaker, I myself, on various occasions, had the privilege of discussing the matter verbally, and even subsequently in writing, with the relevant authorities, and, to my mind, the representations made by those public bodies and others concerned were based on fairness and common sense.

The government will admit, as I do, that there is a greater chance of reaching a maximum of efficiency if the officials of the C.N.R. come to terms with people who have the same traditions, are ruled by the same laws and speak the same language. As things now stand, one can easily realize the difficulties that confront the various ethnic groups of this area, and I want to state now that I would not blame or criticize in any way the officials or the employees of that region, because I am sure they try to give the best possible services to the customers and to the population of their district.

[Mr. Bourget.]

However, it can logically be claimed that there is a risk that the part of the province of Quebec which is situated in that region, may not be served adequately in the matter of industrial development. Since the management is located in another province, it can be reasonably expected that disputes will arise which, in the final analysis, will not serve the best economic interests of our railways and of the regions concerned.

In fact, how can we hope that the rural population of the area I just referred to will quickly settle the many problems of its own jurisdiction, such as the matters of drainage, of railway crossings, culverts and so on?

As recently as two months ago, I personally had the opportunity of ascertaining that fact. The Quebec department of highways having decided to widen a road in a certain parish of my constituency, the C.N.R. consequently had to widen their right of way at the point where their two lines crossed that road. One of those railway lines was under the supervision of the Quebec division and the other under that of the Edmundston division, Atlantic region. The work on the line under the Quebec district was performed quickly and at little cost, while it took much longer, many phone calls and much correspondence to have the work done on the line under the Edmundston division, and this at higher cost.

This is an example, among many others, of a situation which certainly did not improve the relations that must exist between our population and the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Speaker, I might add that there are also difficulties and disadvantages for the employees who have to go to work far from their homes. I know that, because of their duties, English-speaking employees as well as French-speaking ones, are regularly called to work in regions where the language spoken is different from their own. I need not add that this situation quite often causes regrettable problems.

At the beginning of my remarks I said that the system is now divided in five regions instead of the former three. Of all those new regions, the only one which apparently has been enlarged those last few years is the Atlantic region, as a result of the addition, in 1949, of the Newfoundland system and, today, of the Armagh division which formerly was in the central region.

For all those reasons, I believe that the western dividing line of the Atlantic region should be changed so that this area of the province of Quebec, which now is in that region, may be made a part of the new St. Lawrence region by keeping its divisional office in Levis, and, if necessary, establishing another office in Riviere du Loup, Rimouski or Mont-Joli.

So, I ask the Minister of Transport—once again I am sorry not to see him here—to make direct representations to the management of the Canadian National Railways to have those changes made, and I can assure him even now that he has the unanimous support of all the people concerned.

I would also like to raise, Mr. Speaker,—

(Text):

Mr. Creaghan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question before leaving this point.

Mr. Bourget: Certainly.

Mr. Creaghan: I am sure the hon. member is well aware of the fact that Moncton is, and has been, the Atlantic regional office and, since the days of the Intercolonial Railway, the rail centre of the east, and when you consider that fact and also that the north shore of New Brunswick and the east coast of New Brunswick is today populated by about 50 per cent French speaking people, you will realize that the railway management decision to establish the regional office in Moncton is a good one.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will have occasion to read my remarks. I do not know if he understood them because I was speaking in French. However, I hope he will read the reasons why this part of the province of Quebec, which is now part of the Atlantic region, should have been put into the new St. Lawrence region that has been created. I stated at the same time that we have no complaint to make about the administration given by the officers of this region. I just mentioned the fact it would certainly be easier if that part of Quebec comprising the area from Matapedia to Gaspe and from Riviere du Loup to Matapedia were part of the new St. Lawrence division.

My hon. friend knows, as I have stated previously, that the Atlantic region was extended in 1949 by the addition of the system located in Newfoundland. I would not say that I have discussed this with officials of the Canadian National, but I think the official of the Canadian National located in Moncton will tell my hon. friend that their region is now a little too large for effective administration.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring up another point which has to do with the C.N.R., more particularly with their employees. I very often have the opportunity to meet some of them, as several of them live in my own constituency. During those conversations, I found out that many of them—and I presume that this experience of mine is similar to that of several of my colleagues on both sides of this house, in various circumstances, because I readily believe that conditions are the same in my area as they are elsewhere—at any rate, as I was saying, I had the opportunity of talking with several of those employees and I found in my conversations with them that, at the present time, they are fearful and feel insecure on account of the many lay-offs taking place in recent years in the company. In fact, if my information is correct in this regard, I believe that in these last few years an average of 4,000 to 5,000 railway employees have been laid off each year. I feel that in such circumstances, we cannot expect the morale of those people to be high, when they see their colleagues with 20, 25 or even more years of service lose their jobs. They are afraid, and rightly so, that the same thing will happen to them sooner or later.

If I raise that matter, it is because, in my opinion, those employees form a separate category, in the sense that they have more difficulty than others in finding new jobs when they are laid off.

In fact, they fulfill the same functions for years, functions which, in general, are particular to the railways. So it is rather difficult for them to find jobs in other industries that could be in need of their services.

Furthermore, most of them having reached or passed 40 years of age, that is an additional handicap in the process of finding new jobs.

In my humble opinion, three main reasons seem to be at the basis of those lay-offs. The first one is the reorganization and centralization of services; the second is the result of new technical developments, the introduction of diesel engines and automation. The third one is due to the practice, which the Canadian National Railways has been following for the last few years, of having some works carried out by other companies.

As for the first reason, it seems to me that any reorganization should be done in accordance with a well considered plan, spread over a sufficiently long period, which would make it possible to foresee necessary lay-offs.

With those facts on hand, a special committee could be set up to find ways and means of re-educating the employees concerned, so that they may adapt themselves to other available jobs resulting from the changes that will have come about.

Now, let's consider the second reason. There is no doubt that the introduction of new developments and of automation has resulted in equal productivity with a smaller number of employees.

I wonder if, in that case, it would not be appropriate to set up a system whereby the employees would devote a few days each month to the taking of theoretical and practical courses, in order to improve their general culture and knowledge of their respective trades. The workers could thus become more efficient and insure at the same time an increased production.

Of course those workers should, in that case, get the same salary, plus the benefits I have just mentioned. Such a system would also improve the employment situation. Perhaps it will be felt that it would involve additional expenses. Even if that were the case, I am sure that it would bring about appreciable dividends in the long run and that it would help provide a highly qualified labour force.

About the third reason, I believe the Canadian National Railways should entrust to its own employees a good part of the works which are now entrusted to private enterprise, unless it is a case of specialized works.

Our national railways, in particular, now has engineers, architects, and employees, who have a vast experience in all fields of construction, and I have no doubt that they could carry out those works as well, and at a cost that would be as advantageous as private companies. In that way, the laying off of many employees could be avoided.

Without entering into further details, those are, Mr. Speaker, the few suggestions I wanted to make to the government, and particularly to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) in connection with the Canadian National Railways and its employees.

If the Minister of Transport feels they can be useful, I hope he will not hesitate to discuss them with the officials concerned.

[Mr. Bourget.]

Let me now briefly refer to another question of great importance for the areas where shipyards are situated.

As the representative of a constituency particularly interested in shipbuilding, I want to draw the government's attention once more to the conditions prevailing in that industry. It is generally recognized today that operations in this field have substantially decreased and, unless the government takes vigorous action, we might rightfully wonder if the industry will survive.

At Lauzon, we have two shipyards. One of them now has 746 employees, whereas there were 1300 at the same date last year, and almost 1250 in January 1959. I have been informed that, by the end of February this year, the present number of 746 will be down to 600. They are now working on two ore-carriers, one of which is due to be completed in four weeks and the other in 18 weeks. After that the shipyard will only have a tanker and an escort vessel to build for the government. As the work on the last two ships is not to be finished before 1962 or 1963, the company will be unable to employ all the labour normally working in the shipyard.

The situation is still worse in the other shipyards as there are now only about a hundred men working there. That number will gradually increase to 300, because of a repair contract. However, I am told that this repair work will have to be completed at the beginning of April, and that will cause an important decrease in the number of people employed by the shipyard, and the latter will be left with only a little ship 120 feet long to build for the government.

But, Mr, Speaker, the sad plight of our shipyards at home does not differ from that of other shipyards in this country. Apart, perhaps, from two or three shipyards, the situation is hardly more encouraging elsewhere, for the 16 or 17 which exist in Canada.

Last December, I had the opportunity of reading the brief sent to the leaders of the various political parties, by union officials who pointed out the urgency of helping that industry, and, who at the same time submitted interesting suggestions.

I also read letters from shipyard employees in British Columbia who complained of losing their jobs and deplored the fact that many qualified men were emigrating to the United States in order to find some work.

Some time ago I read an article dated August 1960 in the Vancouver Burrard News which was entitled "Challenges facing our industry", which reads as follows:

(Text):

No one even remotely connected with the shipbuilding industry in Canada could fail to note that it is going through very difficult times. Payrolls have been going progressively down and, at the moment, there is no clear indication that this will change. The full impact of the St. Lawrence seaway, with our coastal trade open to ships of the U.K. registry, is having its effect in eastern Canada and there are several yards on the great lakes with very precarious futures. As a matter of fact, shipyard mortality would have been earlier—and higher—had it not been for the naval program and government new construction of the past dozen years.

(Translation):

Now, here, Mr. Speaker, is an excerpt from an article by Mr. John Meyer, financial editor of the Montreal Gazette, dated September 9, 1960. I quote:

(Text):

There is no question that the industry needs assistance.

Speaking of the industry, he is speaking, of course, of the shipbuilding industry:

Employment is at a ten-year low at a time when contracts for seaway carriers are being placed abroad by Canadian operators. Quite apart from these considerations is the well established precedent of assistance given the industry by other maritimes nations. The Canadian industry, handicapped by high costs, should not be required to meet the second handicap unassisted by the benefits given its competitors by their governments.

(Translation):

As one may realize from reading those articles, they confirm exactly what I said a few moments ago, namely that this industry is now in an alarming situation.

No doubt the federal government can help by awarding contracts for the construction of the necessary ships for our navy and our various departments, but this assistance alone is inadequate. To insure the survival of this important industry and to prevent the lay-off of thousands of workers who will swell the already high figure of the unemployed, other measures than the existing ones will have to be taken.

Before I go ahead with the suggestion I want to make, I would like to call the government's attention to the fact that the northern area of our country is bound to experience a considerable development. Consequently, I think that right now, we should build or at least make plans for the construction of ships that will be needed for the transportation of the men, supplies and materials necessary to the development of our northern areas.

I am surprised and sorry to see that the government has not yet a program to put forward in that connection.

I said earlier that the government will have to take vigorous steps to insure the survival of our shipyards, since the assistance received by this industry is inadequate and much less than the assistance received by shipyards in other countries.

We all know also that shipbuilding is more expensive in Canada than in European countries. Consequently, ship owners prefer to have them built overseas. As an inducement to owners to have this work done in our Canadian shipyards, here are the suggestions I want to offer to the government.

Any company or individual who would like to have a ship built in Canada should make a down payment equal to 20 or 25 per cent of the total cost of the ship. The rest of the required money would be either loaned directly or guaranteed by the government and repayable in eight to ten years, at a reasonable rate of interest.

Under the existing act providing assistance to shipbuilding in Canada, the owner is entitled to 100 per cent depreciation over a period of three years. I believe that depreciation could be increased substantially—in Great Britain, for instance this depreciation is 140 per cent. Should this depreciation be substantially increased, the owner of the ship, or the person ordering it, could be forced to pay into a special fund a substantial part of his earnings from this form of tax depreciation. This special fund would be administered by the government and the owner could use it afterwards only for the replacement of his old ships, for their transformation or for the construction of new ones in Canadian shipyards.

This is the outline of the plan I submit, Mr. Speaker; I leave it to experts to put it in legislative form if it is considered an interesting plan.

I think that this proposal would encourage small and large owners to have their ships built here in Canada. At the same time, it would cost very little to the government since the government would have a chance to get that money back through sales tax and income tax. In this way, the government would also help create new jobs by increased activity in our shipyards.

Quite recently I read an article in the Financial Post of January 21, 1961, indicating that our shipyards might in the near future be awarded contracts for the construction of submarines to be used by the Royal Canadian Navy. Towards the end of that article, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) was mentioned as having stated that a study of the matter had been made by the navy especially with a view to finding out whether our shipyards were able to build those submarines.

Well, I hope the minister is now convinced that it is possible. Our shipyards now have all the facilities required as well as the experts and skilled labour to proceed with that kind of work. I am told that they are even able at the present time to build aircraft carriers.

Those are, Mr. Speaker, the remarks I wanted to make on such an important question not only for our shipyards and the workers concerned but also for the nation as a whole.

I have only half a minute left, Mr. Speaker, and to conclude my observations, I shall quote what the President of the United States, Mr. Kennedy, said during his presidential campaign concerning assistance to shipbuilding. He said:

(Text):

If the domestic merchant fleet, so strategic to the nation's economy and to its defence, is to be kept alive—and it must be—government must lend a hand. Steps must be taken to insure fair treatment of domestic shipping vis-à-vis other forms of transportation.

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): My first remarks are, of course, in all sincerity, an expression of congratulation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I say this in no perfunctory way, but recognizing the responsibility which the hon. gentleman has to carry, and not only in the presentation of this preliminary budget. The Minister of Finance, perhaps more than anyone else, is responsible for both the economic and the financial aspects of state affairs; he is an individual who not only in Canada but throughout the world is recognized as one of the great men in public life and as one belonging to the generation which was privileged to serve with him I shall be proud to say in the future that I was privileged to sit in this House of Commons with him.

I do not propose to spend very much time on laudatory remarks which might well be repetitious. I can say, though, with reference to the comments of my colleagues on the other side of the house, that since it is obvious this preliminary budget was developed some time ago to provide a stimulus to the economy it is not surprising they were not happy with it because I can recall the words of a commentator, Charles Templeton, a devoted defender of Liberal policy, he stated, that he hoped a depression would take place and that this would mean the return of a Liberal government. This, I suggest, is exactly the attitude taken by the Liberal party.

I intend to be extremely brief and to deal with only two main points, but it would be remiss of me, having expressed my view in support of the budget as a whole, if I did not say something of the concern expressed over one particular aspect of this budget and its impact on an area which affects the constituency which I represent and, indeed, the province from which I come. I would be unrealistic if I attempted to ignore it.

I am sure the minister and the government recognize that I am referring to certain provisions which might suggest a lessening of United States investment, or foreign investment coming into Canada to underwrite capital development, particularly in our extractive industries. I can fully appreciate the intention of the government and, in particular of the Minister of Finance, I can understand the desire that more Canadians should invest in Canadian undertakings and resources. That is a most commendable desire and one with which, I am sure, no one on this side of the house differs. With regard, then, to the impact of certain provisions which may affect borrowing from the United States and investment by United States investors, the eventual effect of the minister's decision, the long term view is, in his expectation, that it will prove of benefit to Canadians when weighed against the short term advantages, perhaps, of obtaining investment from the United States.

If we look at it in this light I think these long term advantages will be very real, but I suggest to the Minister of Finance that this action must be coupled with further incentives for Canadians to invest in the development of these resources, and this can be provided by amending certain of our taxation statutes so that Canadians will indeed be encouraged to invest in Canada. These statutes will be all too familiar to the hon. minister.

I could, of course, be more specific and take as an example the petroleum and natural gas industry with which I am most familiar. I suggest to the minister that when he brings down the main budget a provision should be inserted which, in so far as depletion allowance is concerned, would permit Canadian investors to have the opportunity to participate in the development of their resources as have their United States counterparts. If this is done, our concern that Canadians may not invest in Canada will be reduced if not eliminated. Such a provision would, I suggest, be a necessary counterpart to the one provided in this connection in the budget which the minister has introduced.

There are two other aspects of this question which are equally important, and I think the most significant of them is one which relates to a psychological impact on our economy. We have, of course, heard and read the reviews and reports of every bank president reporting to their shareholders of their respective banks. They have made two basic comments. The first is the need for an easier money policy, as they describe it; the narrowing of interest rates as between Canada and the United States, again to provide an incentive for Canadians to invest in Canada. I think a great many people in this house could agree with that.

What is even more significant, they have pointed out that the Canadian economy is progressing and moving ahead. But, they have stated, there could be a state of mind brought about among Canadians which would discourage them from investing in Canada if certain groups of people continue to talk this country into a recession. I suggest in all seriousness Canadians must be optimistic. They must, of course, be aware of the difficulties which face our economy; they must recognize the problems which affect every aspect of our industry and of our development. But we should not place in front of them, especially, those of us who have a responsibility to give some leadership in this field, purely imaginary problems and difficulties which will only discourage people from investing in a country which has such a great future.

I had the opportunity in the past month of talking to a number of investment brokers, security analysts and representatives of similar organizations in the United States, and I think that we have perhaps created in their minds an impression that this country is opposed to foreign investment. For that reason I was extremely happy that the minister and his parliamentary secretary have made it abundantly clear that under the terms of this supplementary budget investment capital is still going to be required in great quantities. Obviously, when the minister states that we in Canada are attempting to encourage Canadians to invest to a greater extent in our own country, he has made an assessment of what our investment requirements are likely to be, particularly with regard to our extractive industries such as gas, oil and coal and so on.

Looking at one sector of this industry alone, it is apparent that since the first year in which the government approved permission for the export of natural gas we have only just begun to acquire the quantity of capital we will need in the coming years. Obviously when you export a cubic foot of natural gas you must process it, and extensive capital is required for plant construction before this can be done. Then again the development of pipe line transmission facilities will also require more capital.

I think it is important, therefore, that each of us, regardless of political affiliations, should make it abundantly clear to the United States that we shall continue to need United States investment in Canada. We cannot have it on both sides of the plate at once. We cannot enjoy a high level of development and prosperity if we attempt to utilize only Canadian capital. We must continue to encourage the inflow of new capital if we are to enjoy those benefits from a high level of prosperity which for the most part we now enjoy. In this respect I should like to say what I have said to those with whom I have spoken in the United States, that I believe we—and I say "we" in the sense of Canadians as a whole—are too often prone to look upon ourselves as poor relations of the United States. We often find it difficult to realize the extent to which we have developed this nation and we continue to remain unconvinced by the impressive array of facts and figures that can be summoned to indicate the extent of our growth.

It seems to me that we Canadians still have an important selling job to do ourselves, not only in relation to the United States but in our many markets abroad. We have to make our people realize the advantages of investing still further in Canada. I think we should destroy any illusion to the contrary. I make this point as one who comes from an area that still requires a great deal of capital. We must still continue to encourage this investment at every opportunity and without regard to its nationality.

I say this coupled with one other thought. Quite recently our Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) took what was perhaps the most constructive action taken in many years by any former minister acting in that capacity, that of bringing to this country Canadian trade commissioners from around the world and saying to them through the deputy minister: Gentlemen remember that you are indeed salesmen and not diplomats. We must realize that Canada is in a situation in which we are experiencing a serious degree of competition. I refer to the development of the European common market, the inner six, the outer seven, the trade blocs of communist China and Russia, and the new impact of competition from the South American countries. Canadians will have to get out and sell themselves and their products as never before. Once again, in the same way in which I congratulated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) I congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce and say that we in this house and indeed people throughout Canada are happy that the same leadership is being provided in the field of commodity trade.

I said I intended to be brief but I should like to make one additional point perfectly clear before I resume my seat. My point is that the type of budget introduced, designed to give a stimulus to the economy, is basically sound. I should like to make clear to the Minister of Finance, nevertheless, that all of us wish to see more Canadians invest in this country. I believe this will come about if we provide to Canadians incentives in the form of opportunities to compete with their United States and foreign counterparts. If this incentive is provided I believe the program of the government contained in this budget will prove even more successful than we dreamed possible today.

In the area of Canada which I represent we are approaching what is perhaps one of the most interesting developments of all time. For example, we very shortly expect to hear the government make an announcement with respect to a national policy for the marketing of oil. We have already seen the impact of the export of surplus natural gas and its by-products. With the growing importance of this industry the western section of Canada is becoming something more than just an agricultural area. We require great confidence and great optimism about our future. I suggest we have no reason to look back but should look only forward to the future and the accomplishments that will be made possible under the policy supplemented as I have suggested, and which has been enunciated by the minister.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words concerning the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and deal briefly with the textile problem in Canada. Because of the difficulties facing that industry in this country, I want to use the last minutes at my disposal to repeat what the governor of the Bank of Canada said:

[Mr. Smith (Calgary South).]

The best way to check unemployment is to reduce imports in order to increase the production of those goods which are needed in our country.

That applies especially to the textile industry in Canada and more particularly in the province of Quebec. The number of people employed in the textile industry has decreased from 98,000 some ten years ago to 74,000 these last few years, or a decrease of 24,000. No doubt imports have something to do with the decrease in the number of those workers and yet that development occurred in a period when domestic consumption was on the increase.

Figures published recently in the periodical Textiles of January 1961 show that the share of our industries in our domestic market is now 47 per cent for various fabrics, from 48 per cent in 1959 and 66 per cent in 1950.

I could also give figures related to the production share of the Canadian market. For instance, since 1956 there has been a decrease from 75 to 70 per cent in the production of artificial or synthetic fibres. As far as cotton is concerned, while the production percentage was 51 per cent in 1956, it went down to 41 per cent in 1959.

As for woollens, production has decreased from 53.4 per cent in 1956 to 51.4 per cent in 1959.

Yet I remember that during election campaigns, especially that of 1957, when the Minister of Finance visited the constituencies of Sherbrooke and Drummond, he said: If you vote for the Conservative candidate, the question of textiles will be solved.

The Conservative government has now been in power for three and a half years and during that period we have seen a decrease in the number of employees and an increase in the volume of imports. Thus, last year we imported $45 million worth of textiles from Japan, an increase of $5 million a year since the Conservative party took over.

I should have liked to hear the hon. member for Sherbrooke on the question of textiles in this house. The hon. member for Sherbrooke—

Mr. Pigeon: May I ask a question of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska?

Mr. Boulanger: When I have finished, of course.

Mr. Grafftey: That is untrue. The hon. member for Sherbrooke often referred to that question.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sherbrooke talks more often about textiles outside the house than he does here.

Mr. Grafftey: That is not true.

Mr. Boulanger: Every week, we read in the local papers statements made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke to the effect that the Conservative government has done much for the textile industry.

An hon. Member: That is false.

Mr. Boulanger: While we know what the situation really is. The textile situation is worse in Canada than it has ever been.

Mr. Chevrier: Plants are closing down.

Mr. Boulanger: Plants have been closed down. Those of Cornwall have closed down two years ago. Some are being closed down all over Ontario, and those that do not close their doors move to the Dutch Indies. In fact, we have noted that two or three industries had moved last year.

What is the government doing?

Mr. Grafftey: Much, and you know it.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, what is the government doing to remedy this situation? There is much talk, but no action.

Mr. Chevrier: Much verbosity.

Mr. Boulanger: Yes, verbosity—

Mr. Martineau: That is like the Liberals.

Mr. Boulanger: —and articles in the papers. We will remember that at the next general election, and most particularly the people of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon: You are playing politics over the matter, like the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier).

Mr. Boulanger: While we have 528,000 unemployed in Canada, and the number of jobless is greater in the province of Quebec than in other provinces, textile goods are being imported—

Mr. Pigeon: That is probably due to Mr. Lesage.

Mr. Boulanger: Here is what the government should do. There are means of controlling imports of textile goods. There are means of stopping the export of our labour force to other countries; we even have special legislation to that effect, providing that the government may set up a price on imported goods which are being sold at a price lower than that of our domestic products.

We also have the anti-dumping legislation. But when is it going to be enforced? Two years ago, about 20 specialized inspectors were appointed to supervise imports, and most particularly those coming from the United States. Now a study of statistics reveals that imports from the United States are higher than ever.

Mr. Grafftey: That is not true.

Mr. Boulanger: What are those inspectors doing—

Mr. Grafftey: You are now at the other extreme.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) lives in an area where the textile industry is very important, and I wonder why he does not take the floor to talk about the matter, instead of interrupting others.

Mr. Grafftey: Do you want an answer to that?

Mr. Boulanger: Why does he not talk about it in his constituency?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, could I direct a question to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska—

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member does not state all the facts.

Mr. Pigeon: You are afraid, I presume?

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member allow a question?

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member who has the floor does not appear to be willing to permit the intervention. I would ask hon. members to let him continue.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, why don't they let me deal with matters of concern to the Canadian people in general and to the people of our region, the eastern townships, instead of showing fight. They are afraid to speak about the textile question. They have the right to do so as much as I have. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) should come to the defence of the textile industry since there are a great many textile factories in his riding.

He should tell us what is happening to that industry in St. Hyacinthe, when two or three factories closed down last year.

Mr. Ricard: Which ones?

Mr. Pigeon: Name them.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member is a joker.

Mr. Boulanger: I could refer the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to the speech I delivered last year in this house. He would find in it the names of the industries that have closed down in the province of Quebec. I mentioned about 20 of them.

Mr. Ricard: How many have resumed their activity since then? Four of them and you should say so.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member reminds me of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). He talks nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Boulanger: There is a great deal to be said on the subject of textiles. If I dealt with this matter for a few minutes, it was to awaken the suspicions of the members in whose ridings textile industries are found.

They will now have time to make ready to disprove the figures I gave tonight.

At that time, I shall take up again the subject of textiles at greater length.

In my region, the factories are reducing the number of their workers. The Dominion Textile had to close down for weeks, for want of orders. That happened mostly in Drummondville where the Dominion Textile specializes in the manufacture of fishing nets. This is because in the last few years, fishing nets have been imported from Japan and from other countries whereas those goods were manufactured in Canada three or four years ago.

The same applies to the material used in the manufacture of automobile tires. That material is now being imported.

As a result, workers find themselves out of a job. There are 528,000 of them in Canada and if the government does not take appropriate action, how many will there be in a month or two?

Those are the remarks I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker, in order that urgent steps be taken to put an end to imports in the field of textiles.

There is another matter I wish to bring to the attention of the house and this is agriculture. Today the farm people are discouraged on account of the legislation passed by this government.

It was said that the Conservative government would rescue agriculture, the family farm, the marginal farm.

What do we see? The Conservative party has left the farmer to his fate. He cannot sell the products of his farm at a price that would give him enough to ensure the subsistence of his family. As a result, farmers are leaving the farm.

Mr. Grafftey: Were you here yesterday?

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Boulanger: Now farmers are coming into the towns adding to the numbers of unemployed. They cannot find a job because they have no special skill nor the training required in industry.

What has the government done in this field to correct the situation?

Mr. Grafftey: Were you here or not yesterday?

Mr. Boulanger: I must say to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that I was here yesterday and that I spoke on agriculture while he was absent. He is not here to be seen when we are discussing things which concern his riding. The hon. member was not in the house then and he is not interested either in agricultural matters.

Mr. Pigeon: He was here.

Mr. Grafftey: I am always here, my good friend.

Mr. Boulanger: But when I spoke on agriculture—

Mr. Grafftey: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. Some one just said that I was absent, and that I did not speak in support of the farmers in this house. Quite to the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I have often stood up for the farmers in this house. The hon. member should read my speeches.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that it is not relevant to the debate to discuss the attendance of other members and related matters.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I have been provoked by insinuations to the effect that I was not in the house yesterday, when in fact I delivered a speech on agriculture. That is why I took exception to the statement of the member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Speaker, the subject of agriculture evokes the same reaction on the opposite side as the subject of textiles. However, both are subjects of particular concern to the two main groups of citizens in our area.

The government members remind me of a flock of homing pigeons. Every day, one or two ministers board a plane to India, Africa, England, or the United States. They travel so much that they have no time to consult each other. That is why their statements are so often at odds, and they have to reverse themselves.

I might add that some great speakers, often heard in this house, including the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm—

An hon. Member: What are you reading?

Mr. Boulanger: Let me say to the hon. member who has just interjected that this paper I am holding is a blank sheet.

Some hon. Members: You don't say.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 9.45 o'clock by two out of three clocks it is my duty, pursuant to section 6 of standing order 58 as provisionally amended, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on the motion before the house.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) which was agreed to on the following division:

Business of the House

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

The Chairman: House in committee of ways and means on a certain proposed resolution to amend the Income Tax Act. Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire from the house leader what the business will be for tomorrow and Monday.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the house will resume the debate on the motion standing in the name of the Minister of National Revenue with respect to setting up a committee to deal with broadcasting. On completion of that item, No. 14, we will take up item No. 9, the motion standing in the name of my colleague the Minister of Transport to set up a committee on railways, airlines and shipping. On completion of that item we will resume the debate on the motion standing in the name of my colleague the Minister of Agriculture with respect to the legislation introduced by him. On Monday there will be a motion for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

It being 10.07 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—
W. B. CROMBIE AND D. FORGAN

Question No. 79—Mr. Argue:

Question

1. Are a Mr. W. B. Crombie and Mr. D. Forgan employed with the St. Lawrence seaway authority as consulting engineers on claims?
2. If so, what are their salaries, and what claims has each (a) investigated; (b) settled, since January 20, 1958?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. No.
2. N.A.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WAR MEASURES ACT—REPORTED AMENDMENT THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he could confirm or deny a report in the press this morning to the effect that during this session the government is going to amend the War Measures Act.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not see that report. However, I did have an interview with the press with regard to the War Measures Act. The government feels—and it expressed its feeling in this regard at the time discussions were taking place relative to the bill of rights—that some committee of the house might well consider the War Measures Act and, having considered it, make recommendations as to what revisions or amendments could be made to that act to render it a measure from which injustice would not follow.

I pointed out that while the War Measures Act remained on the statute books between world war I and world war II, it was regarded by constitutional authorities as inoperative during those years. I also pointed out that following world war II, extraordinary powers were taken by the government through action by parliament under such measures as the transitional powers act and the Emergency Powers Act which had the consequence of infringing or impinging on the constitutional rights of the provinces, and that I felt the declaration of an emergency should not be used by the federal parliament to invade provincial jurisdiction as was the case following world war II.

I feel and I think the Leader of the Opposition will agree, that a full and complete review of the War Measures Act would be following a course in keeping with the desires of Canadians as a whole. In time of war the measure is necessary in the interests of maintaining security, but in the days of peace there cannot be too large a degree of justification for its maintenance in effect without giving parliament at least the opportunity, through a committee, of fully considering the representations that have been made from time to time with regard to this legislation.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. Is the Prime Minister not aware that there is now on the order paper in the name of a private member indication of intention to introduce amendments to the War Measures Act in accordance with notice given by the government last year of its intention so to do?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the government gave its answer last year. This is a matter which we believe should be considered by a committee, to the end that the best available consideration may be brought before that committee with regard to this legislation. It is not a matter for private members; it is a matter that affects not only parliament but also the constitutional rights of the provinces.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister care to comment on the reported deterioration of the situation in the Congo and the statement by the Secretary General of the United Nations that the threatened troop withdrawals could bring the big powers into the Congolese conflict?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the Secretary General of the United Nations believes that a serious situation would arise if there were a permanent weakening of the force through large withdrawals. I would say that his purpose is not so much to predict what the future may be in the Congo as to indicate that in his view the countries which withdraw from the force must take the responsibility for the consequences. It is true he has said:

> A severe weakening of the force may make it impossible for it to function effectively and would thus make necessary a proposal for the liquidation of the force and in consequence the entire U.N. operation in the Congo.

However, it would be going too far to suggest that the United Nations operations in the Congo are in imminent danger of collapse.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Will the minister say whether Canada has been canvassed for a larger contribution to this force or whether we have made any offer of further assistance from this country in that regard?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister pointed out yesterday, there has been no request for Canada to supply additional troops. I believe that requests have been made of other countries which are not now supplying troops.
