Poetry.

The Bliss of Country Quiet.

By Mrs. M. A. KIDDER.

"My dear," said wife one day to me,
"I think you're looking poorly;
You have no appetite I see,
And must be ailing, surely.
The children, too, are getting thin,
And need a change of diet;
So off we'll go, in a week or so,
And seek for country quiet.
Where the breezes blow and the flowers grow,
Now here, we'll go and try it,
For the poet sings of rural things—
Oh! the bliss of country quiet!"
We found a lovely, healthy spot—
That is, the paper read so—
"Was neither damp, nor cold, nor hot,
For all the neighbors said so.
It bordered on a charming lake,
And overlooked a valley;
So off we'll go, my children three,
Myself, and my wife Sally.
Where the breezes blow, etc.
I thought the price was rather high,
Which set me meditating
While jogging on in the cars
And at the station waiting;
But thoughtful wife, she says to me,
"We can't be always boarding,
So with our baggage we'll know the joys
For once of country boarding.
Where the breezes blow," etc.

IN THE MARRIAGE LIST.

By Kate Putnam.

It was a long, low, rough farmhouse, quiet and comfortable, save for the interminable clacking of hens, an occasional cackle from a lone necked goose, or the lowing of cattle from the cow yard close by, whither Dora West was wending her way, milk-pail in hand.
Now if there was one thing that Dora hated beyond expression, it was to milk, but it was a military necessity, as they were too poor to keep a servant, and her father had lost a hand. Dora was only seventeen, but her household accomplishments were almost beyond belief. Such fresh pots of butter! Balls of yellowest gold that might have been transmuted by King Midas's touch. All the shopkeepers in the place knew no surer recommendation of their butter than the simple statement that it was little Dora West's; and surely to few of the young could anything have made it more welcome.
She could wash, too, beautifully, and from in a manner to put to shame the work of many a city laundress, not a shiny patch here another there, but one even gloss all over the surface. Then in such matters as making bread and washing dishes, she had been skilled ever since she was a little girl of ten. And as for disposition—which ought properly to stand first, only country housekeepers are not apt to reckon it so—Dora West was blessed with one of the sweetest and most temperate tempers that ever kept a household anywhere else.
In addition to this she was extremely pretty, her naturally slender form developed and rounded by the performance of her daily duties—the very best sort of gymnastics when not taken in excess—her blue eyes clear and bright, her cheeks rosy with healthy blood, and hair the darkest, softest auburn, not worn in the water-fall style, but left to fall at its own sweet will in thick curls. No wonder that she was her father's darling, resembling as she did so strongly her dead mother, the wife whom he had idolized, and whose death had left him almost inconsolable.
Dora had many admirers; even since she was a little thing in short frocks, and out of them all she had chosen the poorest, Dennis Ford, a handsome, young fellow, who had gone to seek his fortune in California, where he hoped, by good luck and untiring industry, to gain enough to enable him, on his return, to buy a pretty little cottage whose ruling spirit should be a still prettier little wife, which domestic angel—strange to say—as pictured in Dennis's mind, had a wonderfully strong likeness to Dora West.
Now these two knew perfectly well that they loved each other, and although there was no regular engagement between them, there certainly was a tacit understanding—quite as binding as the fastest—and Dora, if the truth must be told, looked to the little cottage quite as often as did Dennis himself. In fact, in imagination she had even furnished the front room, and filled the little front yard with the prettiest flowers, and covered with woodbine and ivy the tiny porch in which she and Dennis would sit on summer evenings, just as they had done of old upon the bench under the old maple that shaded her father's door. Dora was often absent from everyday life, visiting the castle, or rather cottage in Spain, that far-away country wherein so many of us hold beautiful possessions, whose title-deeds are indisputably ours by right of discovery.

Will, we left Dora proceeding leisurely toward the performance of her nightly task of milking Blackie and Lenny, who now stood with great soft eyes watching the girl carrying back the brimming pail, slowly and carefully, lest the white froth should overrun the clean, bright sides, and spill upon the pretty calico dress which set off Dora's trim form to perfection.
Returning to the farm house by way of the lane, she met Willis Bradford, another of our hermitic lovers, though not professedly so, a tall, dark fellow, considered very handsome by the young ladies of Stanton, and none the less a favorite that, as Squire Bradford's only son, he had succeeded to his father's fine property of which—entre nous—he was getting rid as fast as possible, in his frequent visits to the city; for his habits were scarcely what could be termed "above reproach," although, as yet, the good people of the village knew nothing of the true state of the case.
Good evening, Dora, said the young man, earnestly, as if the meeting were entirely accidental, and one of his windows, from an intervening clump of trees, had not commanded a view of every movement of that familiar little figure. It's a lovely evening, isn't it?
Why, yes, she answered, laughing. I believe it is, but really I have been so busy all day that I've hardly had time to notice the weather.
It's Indian summer now, isn't it?
Yes, and the moon will rise in a clear sky, so that it will be almost as light as day, to-night. We ought to make the most of it. If I thought there was a chance of your going, I should drive around for you, this evening.
What do you say? Don't plead your eternal excuse of work, I beg.
But the work itself is almost eternal. In deed, Will, you haven't an idea of what I must do.
I know you'll work yourself to death unless some one interferes, said the young man, impatiently. And by the way, what a thoughtful fellow I am! There you are carrying that pail. It suits my hand better than yours, let me take it.
No, no; let it be, please, answered Dora, who was not a bit of a coquette. It's not as heavy as it looks, and I'm used to it, and I'm almost home now. Three good reasons, you see.
Well, if you will insist on making a martyr of yourself, I suppose any objections of mine would have no weight. I remember you at the district school as the prettiest little piece of obsequy that ever was furloughed for persistent disobedience. But about the ride? If the moonlight can't tempt you, perhaps I'll call your curiosity to my aid.
Nonsense! I haven't a bit. But what do you mean?
You say you haven't any, and the cloven foot peeps out the very next moment. Inconsistency!
Dora laughed.
Now just to show you that I really don't care about your secret, Will Bradford, I'll go to ride with you to-night, and not say one word about it to the whole evening.
I accept the challenge, said Bradford. This evening shall prove which of us is right about a woman's curiosity. Well, if I should invite my wife in, I suppose you would be too busy to entertain me, so I might as well take myself off.
Good by! said Dora, laughing, as she still lingered.
An revoir! answered Bradford, who had a college smattering of the languages, and a real use for a foreign phrase now and then, finding it a decided success with the Stanton young ladies, who preferred a jumble of half French or Italian to common plain English sense.
As the young man moved away, lifting his hat gracefully to her, Dora ran into the house, blushing and smiling a little. She was not a coquette, most certainly, but there was something very flattering in the attention of the richest and most polite young man in the village. He was very handsome, too, and then he knew so much!—for, with unsophisticated little Dora, the French and the Italian went a long way, simply because she did not usually understand them.
It is to be feared that many considerations, which have weight with more cultivated people, are based upon no better reasons. Perhaps, for Dora was only human, Mr. Bradford's devotion was not the less agreeable that it would have been welcomed by more than one Stanton amuseur, who, in point of birth and money, estimated herself far above the pretty daughter of Farmer West.
The evening proved as beautiful as it had promised, and Dora, who had few such means of pleasure at command, enjoyed the drive even more than she had expected. There were many good words, and on Bradford's part, some which verged on the sentimental, but for a long time nothing was said concerning the secret. Not that Dora had not been obliged, more than once, to bite into her rosy lips some question which was bent on being asked; but, as she was able to check it in time, her companion was none the wiser.

Just as her patience was giving out, it ceased to be tried. They were nearing home, when Bradford said, abruptly:
Well, I see you're bound to prove me wrong, but how much the effort must have cost you! Now confess it did.
Never mind that, she answered, laughing. I kept my promise, didn't I?
Ah! now you have betrayed yourself—What promise? I specified nothing.
Nor I, either, retorted said Dora, demurely. Deafened at my own weapons! I ought to have known that a man was so much for a woman at such work. Well, not to tantalize you any longer, here is my great secret, which you may think a very commonplace one, after all.
With that he took from his pocket a paper, which he leisurely proceeded to unfold.
Dora's quick eyes, following his movements, discovered that it was a California paper, and her heart began to beat and her color to come and go with some undetermined expectation.
I do look rather rough, I don't say, what with being sick and knocking about out there, but he gave her the paper, turned down in the middle of a column. The moonlight was almost as clear as day, and by its light she read Dennis Ford's name in the marriage list.

So good and had joined forces in this persuasion, and when their arguments were supported by the entreaties of a lover, who pleaded with all the fervor of which his nature was capable, it is no wonder that she yielded. Yet she made some faint resistance to Bradford's wishes, and the end of it all was that he was permitted to visit her as a lover, with the prospect, at some future time, of marriage.
This was no bad, as Willis Bradford felt, but he was resolved it should be better still with which intention he so worked upon her affection for her father, who lately was growing quite infirm, that before long she consented to marry him in six months. With this concession he was forced to content himself, and the days and weeks passed by, slowly, perhaps, but surely until the wedding-day was almost at hand.
All but one week of the stipulated time had elapsed, when Dora, sitting without the door in the soft spring twilight, heard a quick step just beside her, and started up only to be caught close in a pair of strong arms. At her cry of alarm the intruder released her, and by the faint evening light she saw that it was Dennis Ford!

Yes, Dennis? she stammered out, overcome by his sudden appearance.
Yes, Dennis, darling—did I frighten you?—I do look rather rough, I don't say, what with being sick and knocking about out there, but he gave her the paper, turned down in the middle of a column. The moonlight was almost as clear as day, and by its light she read Dennis Ford's name in the marriage list.

I was not aware that you had a cousin, Dennis. You certainly did know that I had a cousin Davis—a game easily mistaken for mine—and that he was engaged to a girl in California; but you were false and mean enough to take advantage of the mistake for your own dishonorable ends.
It is easy to talk, said Bradford, contemptuously, stung by these well-deserved accusations, but how are we to know the truth of all this? I suppose you are tired of your wife, and think you can come up and deceive us with a trumped-up story. But you'll find yourself a little out there, my fine fellow.
His tone and manner, offensive as he could make them, made Ford's blood boil. He sprang toward him, then drew back, saying:
I won't fight with Dora's husband.
Dora, who had been listening in a sort of stunned silence, now sprang up as Fred moved toward her, crying:
I believe you, I believe you, Dennis; do forgive me, and save me from him!
The young man's voice grew very tender and pitiful as he bent toward her.
My poor little Dora! how can I save you now? If you would only have trusted me!

But you don't understand, she murmured. I'm not his wife yet, and I want you to save me from it—for I don't love him, I never loved any one but you!
Before she had fairly finished speaking, he caught her up in his arms, carried her into the cottage and shut the door, leaving Willis Bradford alone in the dusk.
The latter, jealous and angry though he was, was too crafty to follow them at that moment. He saw that in such an event he would not have a chance, so he simply walked home with the determination to go over the next day and see Dora alone trusting to the power which he had acquired over her to gain her back when unstained by the presence of Dennis.

But in these calculations he was wrong. His influence with her indeed became very great, so great, in fact, that of her own strength she doubtless would have been able to stand against it; but her love for Dennis, now fully revived by his return, enabled her to resist all the pleadings, threats and suggestions with which he assailed her resolution. Buffeted at length he left her, with a muttered oath that went far toward revealing a phase of his character hitherto kept under careful restraint.

Did you bring your wife with you? she asked.
My wife? I came here to get her. And at that he caught her and began kissing her. She struggled in his arms.
O, let me go! she cried, frightened and trembling. You are married, and I am—
As she stopped, he let go his hold instantly, but forced her back into her seat.
I don't know what you mean, he said. I'm not married—are you?
She began to stammer out some words concerning him but he interrupted:
Tell me, are you married? are you married, Dora?
Then it's true?
Who is the man? I will have an answer! And when she saw around her waist he lifted her to her feet.
Take that for your answer, you villain! And, taken unawares, with the words he was whirled away to a distance.
Revering himself he sprang forward, bringing himself face to face with the new-comer. The May twilight was not too deep for recognition.
So it is you, Willis Bradford—seconded!

It certainly is I; but, my pleasant friend, you have the advantage of me. If I might not so bold, I would advise you to take yourself off without further trouble.
You have forgotten, have you, whose wife you stole away, while he was off hard at work, you've forgotten the lies you told, too, I suppose?
O! said Bradford, coolly pocketing the surprise of the shock; Dennis Ford is it?—Benedict, the married man! I trust that Mrs. Ford and yourself are well?

In the dim light he had not recognized him, but now he resolved to brave it out, feeling tolerably sure of Dora, and thinking a contemptuous manner the best weapon against Dennis.
Willis Bradford, said the latter, what you have told Dora, I don't know, but when you say I am married, to anybody, you know as well as I do you are lying.
That is a pretty word for a lady's ear, said Bradford, with a scornful laugh. However, that is no affair of mine; but I suppose even you, Mr. Ford, will admit that I am not to blame because Dora found your marriage in the papers?
Do you find it? And who found it for her? Who talked her into believing such a thing of me—she never would have believed it of herself—who but you?

Those who court disgrace are sure not to be fitted.
Spare the rod, and you'll have no fish for dinner.

We certainly did talk about it, said Bradford coolly.
And while you were talking you could not speak the truth, and tell her, what you knew well enough, that that notice meant my cousin not me?

It was not my cousin, said Bradford, who had been listening in a sort of stunned silence, now sprang up as Fred moved toward her, crying:
I believe you, I believe you, Dennis; do forgive me, and save me from him!

For a moment her head turned around, but she was a brave little thing, not to be crushed even by a shock. She looked at the first again, satisfying herself that it was really her lover's name which she saw there. The name of the girl she was not familiar with; she was a Californian, it seemed. So much being settled, she folded the paper and gave it back, without a word, to Willis Bradford.
Rather a tame surprise, it seems, said he. I expect it as much, for, if report speaks the truth, Miss Dora West knows more than she will tell about the state of a certain young man's heart, and is prepared to believe that he has let a second love console him for the refusal of the first. For my part, I have no doubt that report speaks the truth for once.—Of course I always believed that the love was wholly on one side, for I was convinced that Miss Dora had too high an appreciation of her worth and beauty to throw herself away on such a poor as Dennis Ford. Still I wanted the assurance that this was given me—laying his hand on the paper—before I dared to speak for myself.

And before poor little Dora could understand it at all, he was making love to her with an earnestness that almost frightened her. What could she do? If she had been a coquette, she could have substituted one lover for the other with equal grace and equanimity; as it was, all that was not unhappiness in her heart was bewilderment. Again let it be said that she was not a flirt, but she was a woman, and a proud one, too, under all the gentle exterior.
Her lover had been so desolate here, but a higher and wealthier one was begging for a single word of encouragement from her lips, and she could not at once put away the opportunity of revenge. In short, when a girl takes counsel of pique she parts company with wisdom, and Dora, out of her acting heart, gave the answer she was prepared to believe that the career and occasional incidents to his rough life, but which, looked at in this new light, was but a confirmation of her fears. And, after all, it might easily be that he considered himself in no way bound to her, as no actual engagement had ever existed between the two.

To be sure, there had been looks and words, which to her thoughts had justified her in the expectation of being his wife some day, but he might have regarded all this as a thing of far less importance, amusing himself with her, without any serious intentions. In fact, that he had done so evidently, and whether this inconstancy was through design or carelessness, her only course was to put him at once and forever out of her heart, which end he most surely accomplished by putting some one else there.
And here was one already begging for admittance: one who had loved her as long as the rose-bud, and, as proved, more truly; one who could give affection, ease, and the cultivation congenial to her tastes, but denied by circumstance, and not lost in her eyes, who could lift her father out of poverty that was growing harder still to his increasing

WESTERN EXTENSION.—A very diminutive meeting of the small stockholders of this much abused railway was convened in the Court House on Thursday the 20th inst., the Directors having it all entirely to themselves as directors like to have. The business of the meeting was considered, like your own correspondent and the Constable as "Special."

After some preliminary sparring in words, each speaker endeavoring to make a hit, the Secretary struck out with his right and left, and held and read out the report which reverberated throughout the building, but did not in any way endanger the stability of the roof. If not very effective, it was in effect as follows:—Gentlemen, And you will please act as such.—Don't you remember the last time we met? Since then some little progress has been made in the work, this, to the same extent, is satisfactory. We are happily still organized, or in more musical phraseology, "harmonized."

The Maine Company which had contracted with this Company to build the road, has, we regret to say, contracted to such an alarming extent, that we fear a final collapse is inevitable.

The amount of capital so deeply sunk, in apparent bad faith, or wild speculation, a national characteristic, is said to be seventy thousand dollars more or less, but we favor a belief in the latter, this precise proportionate amount expended in this province on actual work it is quite unnecessary to divulge.

The Directors, with their accustomed energy, most vividly displayed during the last summer, in their discovery that the number of men upon the road was not figuring up according to Cocker, and that the Maine Co., were not playing their cards according to Hoyle, gave them two months' notice as by contract empowered, to enable this Company to put an end to all such mollycoddling, (the term is used advisedly,) and resume their self-possession.

The directors however admit they were not quite enough for their Yankee neighbors; the Maine Co. got riled, and went at it again more vigorously, and "more thoughtful than before," and from that time to the present from two to three (hundred) men have been hard at work.

The Directors with more than their accustomed energy, have during the last year, as everybody knows who knows anything at all about it, put their own shoulders to the wheel, in order to push the heavy work along more vigorously, but they regret to say that they soon found themselves as deep in the mud as the Maine Co. were in the mire; this state of things not being at all satisfactory, they screwed their courage to the sticking place and wrote all sorts of letters to all sorts of gentlemen well known characters in New York, and other fashionable watering places, giving them invitations to come and make their fortunes at once.

This Company having received an offer from some of these calculating personages, who required only "five hundred thousand (dollars) more" after the manner of the national requirement during its cautious irruption.—(Expl. Having broken out all over) the directors, before knocking under, deliberately knocked at the door of the Executive Chamber, and made known to the Government their plain unvarnished tale, and after a correspondence as long as it was broad, the Government agreed to be still liberal, as long as they were in office under the old dominion, and take $300,000 stock, provided a similar amount was forthcoming from the other side, in addition to the munificent amount subscribed in St. John, which is not here stated, as all other amounts mentioned would only pale before it as mere drops in the bucket.

The Directors next met delegates, and delegates had interviews with directors, and various sums from $50,000 to $300,000 were incessantly talked about, mixed up with bonds and subsidies, securities and facilities, till language became confounding, and all ideas an interminable muddle.

The Directors once more express their profound regret that the work is not progressive, they have done their best, although it would only appear to be their feeblest, their stock being as yet on paper, they must confess they have not done all they could in this respect; on the other hand they have expended a great deal of their time, and disbursed a large amount of patience and perseverance, while it will be generally admitted, their coolness has been collected, and all too amidst the mighty shock of editorial matter, and the crash of public opinion.

In conclusion, martyrs-like, they cling to their old faith, believing that the work will be finished some day or other, if a reasonable speed can only be procured and maintained.

The Standard.

ST. ANDREWS, JUNE 26, 1867.

First of July a Holiday.

The Government have wisely proclaimed the First of July, Monday next, a holiday, and we trust that it will in future be adopted as the birth day of the Dominion, or B. N. A. Confederacy. We notice that in Canada and the other Provinces, the day is to be observed in a becoming manner. The Flag of the Empire is to be hoisted on all the public buildings, grand Reviews, fireworks and other imposing displays are to be made; and all loyal subjects of the British Government will rejoice to know, that the tie which has bound us to the Parent Country has been made fast, beyond the power of disunionists or annexationists to unloose. Let all join in celebrating our natal Dominion day.

The "Fredericton Reporter" of the 14th inst., in referring to the route of the Intercolonial, says:—"On the branch to Hart's Mills depends, perchance, the route of the Intercolonial. Settlement has followed the course of the river St. John and the fertile valleys of the Tobique. This is an accessible route, (what is?) presenting facilities for the very construction of the line. It shows an almost direct line from St. John to River du Loup through a settled country and through a fertile region. A frontier route via Woodstock, the St. Andrews line and Western Extension although it would involve the building of a lesser number of miles, is too circuitous!" and "would impose time and expense upon every train between St. John and River du Loup." Did anyone ever read such an illogical argument, the frontier route is here admitted to be "shorter than that advocated by the "Reporter," but yet forsooth, is too circuitous! Surely if it has the advantage of a lesser number of miles, it must be less circuitous than any other. Again it is asserted the less mileage would involve more time and expense in the running of the trains! This is a veritable anomaly to us, and we give it up as a paradoxical riddle. Nature has evidently done more than the "Reporter," in clearly defining the line, and we have no doubt that "commercial economy" will prescribe for the "lesser number of miles."

In our last week's issue we stated that—"It is generally understood that the southern and eastern sections of this county have resolved by their united voice, to send a member to the House of Commons, and they can do so if they only will it."

To this the "St. Croix Courier" takes exception,—thinks the Standard "might be better employed than in attempting to create sectional animosity." We do not plead guilty to the soft impeachment—in fact we are ready to show our fylf from the commencement to prove that not even in a single instance have we ever been so forgetful of the interests of the County, as to attempt "to create sectional animosity," and therefore have not thrown down a "gambrel." We repeat what we stated is correct, as our contemporary will learn very shortly. The day has happily passed by, when any one section of this County will have the power or the influence to dictate to the freholders who shall be elected as Representatives, as has heretofore been done at private caucuses, whether held in bank parlors or lumber lords stores. The people in each section of the County we presume, will unite on electing the man for Ottawa, whom they believe will represent the interests of the whole County and not one section of it. It was generally known in the eastern and southern Parishes, that a resident of some of them, was to be called out, and from what we learn this policy is being acted upon, and that an intelligent, independent, and honest union man has been selected. Surely there is nothing unfair in this.—For many years the upper sections of the County have nominated and by their united influence elected their nominees, they also had a large control in the affairs of the County; and is it to be stigmatized as "sectional animosity," and throwing down a political "gambrel" for the lower sections to unite now and if possible elect their nominee? We trust such expressions were inconsiderately used, for it is well known by people residing in St. Stephen and the upper Parishes, that we have ever dealt fairly with them, and the inhabitants of other Parishes, when there was no other public journal in the County than the Standard.

The Rev. Dr. Neely, Bishop of Maine, will preach in All Saints Church this evening, at 7 o'clock.

The Act appropriating a sum to establish another and necessary Chair, in our University—Professor of Logic, has excited quite a discussion among our contemporaries; and on one side, a gentleman's name has been freely and we regret to say, unhandsonly used, Wm. Elder, A. M., editor of the "Journal."

Although but recently connected with the Press, he has, to use a common phrase "made his mark" as a man of education and talent. We have had the pleasure of knowing Mr. Elder since he came to this country, and may state, that his testimonials from the Scotch and Irish colleges which he possesses, are a sufficient guarantee, that should he be offered the Professorship and accept it, the youth of our Province who are students at the University, will possess advantages hitherto not enjoyed by those who have passed through the University. We trust our friend will be appointed.

MARINE DISASTER.—The Schooner Rachel, McMillan master, left St. John on Monday the 17th for St. George, with a full cargo of Merchandise; at about 11 o'clock p. m. a dense fog set in with a light southerly wind; the vessel was heading for Bliss Island harbor and ran on the Grey Mare ledge, where she remained until low tide, and owing to the heavy cargo, parted in two and became a total wreck. The principal part of the cargo we learn, was saved in a damaged condition, vessel and cargo uninsured. The loss falls heavily on Capt. McMillan, who is an honest and industrious man.

His Honor the Master of the Rolls, Mrs. and Miss Parker, are staying at Clarke's Hotel. We are pleased to notice that Judge Parker is recovering from his late severe illness. Several other visitors from Canada and this Province have engaged apartments for the season, to enjoy the salubrious climate and sea bathing at St. Andrews.

New Potatoes raised on the farm of the Hon. John Robertson, near St. John in the open air, were shown on Monday last. This is a proof that the climate of New Brunswick is not so severe as has been represented. It is rare to see new potatoes before the 12th July.

The Fredericton "Reporter" noticing Colonel Anderson's letter in the "Globe"—regrets its being published! and is "satisfied no unnecessary expenditure was incurred during the past year, and that the Staff is not too largely increased." Well, regrets are useless; the Militia and Volunteers are satisfied that the large expenditure is made up in the enormous amounts unnecessarily expended on the Staff.

We would like to know what is meant by the Active Service of the Adjutant General allowance, $184.64, in the Auditor General's Report page 167, under head of Charlotte Militia, &c. Will the "Reporter" be good enough to state the date during the threatened invasion last year, when the Adjutant General was on the border, or that he was in any way connected with the voluminous correspondence which we know took place at that time. The Reporter is "surprised at the ex Adj. General's bringing these subjects before the public."

Why the Colonel's letter is quite clear on the matter; and his numerous military and private friends would have been much disappointed if he had not taken some notice of "these subjects." We trust Col. Anderson will not let the matter drop, but give the public the benefit of further revelations.

Since the above was written we are in receipt of the "Globe" of the 25th inst., in which another letter appears, from Col. Anderson, in reply to the "Reporter," which covers the whole ground. The Colonel promises another in reply to "One of the Public." It is to be hoped that Col. Anderson will thoroughly ventilate the present militia system.

We will be happy to hear again from our "Phunny Correspondent," on other matters.—He had better not lunch too early before writing.

NOTICE.
CROWN LAND OFFICE, 26th Feb. 1867.
IT is ordered in Council, That any person who has procured Land under the Labor Act, (or its Assigns) before the 1st day of January, 1861, but has not yet resided and improved, as prescribed by the Regulations, may apply to have the Sale cancelled and the Lot advertised for sale by Public Auction, subject to the payment of the value of existing improvements; and if such person or his assigns, be the purchaser, fifty per cent of the labor returned will be credited on the purchase.
It is further ordered, that all Sales before 1st January, 1861, to persons under the Labor Act, and not yet granted, shall be cancelled on the 1st day of November, 1868, and the Lots then become vacant, unless such persons do previously perform the necessary conditions of payment, improvement, and residence, or avail themselves of the privilege above offered.
The equitable interest of the parties (or their assigns) who may have made improvements or performed labour on any of the Lots to be sold or forfeited, will in all cases be fully protected against subsequent purchasers; but in no case shall such persons having made improvements on the Lands, or performed labour in part or in whole for such Lands, have any claim thereupon to the Government of this Province.
