STARR, SON & FRANKLIN'S,

WOLFVILLE, N. S.

The Master of the Wine.

BY ROBERT RUCHANAN.

In a large wooden building not far from the seashore, a building attached as school-house to "Munster's Boarding Academy for Young Gentlemen," Hugh Trelawny, then scarcely ten years old, was moping alone. He had only arrived two days before from London, where he had parted from his father, a travelling lecturer in the cause of what was then known as the New Moral World. My mother had long been dead, and I had led a somewhat neglected life, sometimes accompanying my father on his wanderings, more often being left to the care, or rather, carelessness, of strangers. At last I had been sent to Southampton to complete a very perfunctory education.

It was afternoon, and a half holiday; my schoolfellows were playing close by. For myself, I was too languid to be very miserably, more often being left to the time I merely felt an outcast for the time being, and took no interest whatever in my new associations. As I sat thus, I must have fallen into a brown study, from which a slight sound startled me. Looking up, I met the flash of two brown eyes which were intently regarding me. "Are you the new boy?" said a clear voice. I nodded, and stared at my interrogator, a girl of about my own age, whose black eyebrows were knitted in a way very curious in so young a child as she seemed.

Her arms and neck were bare, and she was fondling a kitten, whose bright eyes and limbo movements seemed to have something in common with her own beauty. I noticed, too, that she wore earrings, and that they were very bright and glistening.

"What is your name?" she contin-ed, almost against my will, in the pleased yet timid glances of my eyes.

When she next spoke, her clear impetuous tone was greatly changed and softened, and a kinder light dwelt on her face.

"If you will come with me," she said, "I will show you the place."

"There is not much to see but the garden, and that I like well enough. Will you come?"

I rose awkwardly, as if at a word of command; and, taking my cap from the peg where it hung, swung it in my hand as I followed her to the door.

Ashamed, yet pleased, to be chaperoned by a girl, I wondered what my schoolfellows would think of it.

Close to the school-room were the playground, or rather the capacious piece of lawn dignified by that name.

My schoolfellows were playing cricket thereon. They paid no attention to me as I passed, but looked at my companion with a curious and not too friendly expression. She, for her part, passed along imperiously, without deigning to cast a single look in their direction; and I noticed that her dark brows were knitted with the former unpleasant expression. She said nothing, however, for some minutes.

Our first visit was to the top of a high knoll behind the house, whence we could see the surrounding country, and, some miles to the southwest, the distant sea, with a white frost of billows on the edge of liver-colored sands.

"It was a quiet, sunless day; but far away there were gleams of watery light on the white sails of ships passing by under full canvas."

The girl looked seaward at the passing sails with much the same peculiar expression she had worn on our first encounter.

How could I fathom her thoughts? I guessed she was thinking of her home, but I was wrong.

"Are you clever?" she asked, suddenly.

This was a question which I, as a modest boy, felt totally unprepared to answer. I looked at the ground, peeped at her, and laughed. Her expression did not change.

"I mean, do you know much," she continued, in explanation, "Have you learnt much before?"

I explained to her, as well as possible, that my acquirements were very slender indeed; and merely consisted of the stray crumbs of knowledge which I had been enabled to pick up at day schools in the various towns where my father had resided during my childhood. In point of fact, I was a thoroughly uneducated little boy, and had never been crammed with the solid papulum so much in vogue at our public schools. I could read and write, of course, and knew the arithmetic as far as the rule of three, and had got through the first four declensions in the Latin grammar; but all was a chaos, and I had no accomplishments.

"I did not explain all this to my interrogator; for I was too proud."

"If you are not clever, and know so little," observed the girl, thoughtfully, "take care of the other boys. Why don't you make friends with them? Why do you like to sit alone, and be so sullen? If there were girls here, I should make friends, I know. But boys are different; they have cruel ways, and they hate each other."

All this was said in a tone rather of reflection than of conversation; and she still kept her eyes on the distant ships, as if from some secret source far away the current of her thoughts was flowing.

"The boys hate me," she pursued, "because they think me proud. I am so proud, but I am quicker and cleverer than they are, and I come from a better place. I beat them in the class and at all things, except figures; and I have helped the biggest of them sometimes, when they were too stupid to understand."

All this was a revelation to me. Until that moment I had never supposed that my companion's place was among the common scholars. During my first two days in school she had been absent—a circumstance which she soon explained to me without any questioning.

"I have been away on a visit, and only returned this morning. I do not come to school every day, because I have headaches, and my father will only have me learn when I please.

Now let us go down and look at the garden. There are fruit-bushes there, and some of the fruit is ripe."

Still respectful and submissive, I followed, and we were soon wandering side by side in the quiet garden in the neighborhood of the school-house.

Ever and anon, as we walked, I heard the shouts and cries of my playmates; but they were wafted to me from some forsaken life.

A spell had been passed upon me, and I was in a dream. As I write, the dream surrounds me still. Years ebb backward, clouds part, the old horizons come nearer and nearer, and I am again wandering in the quiet shade of trees with the shining young face at my side. I can no longer recall looks and words. All becomes a tremor. I see the one face only, but the voice becomes inarticulate.

What I remember last is a sudden sound dissolving a spell. A bell rung loudly from the house, and my companion uttered an exclamation—

"That is the bell for tea," she exclaimed. "You had better go."

And she ran before me up the path. She was nearly out of sight among the garden bushes when, urged by curiosity, I took courage, and called after her.

"What is your name?" I cried.

She nodded back with a smile.

"Madeline," she replied. "Madeline Graham." With that she was gone. For a moment I stood bewildered, and then, with quite a new light in my eyes, I made the best of my way into the house, and joined the boys at the tea-table.

Although Mrs. Munster presided at the board, my new friend did not appear, and as I munched my bread and butter, I thought of her face with a kind of dreamy pleasure, delicious to recall even now.

CHAPTER II.

In my hasty sketch of school, I have made little or no mention of the schoolmaster and his wife. Indeed, so far as my present retrospection is concerned, they are nonexistent; and they form part of my story only in so much as they affected my relations with the leading actress in the life drama to which these chapters are the prelude.

Munster was a feeble-looking but talented little man, with a very high forehead, which he was constantly mopping with cold water, to subdue inordinate headaches; and Mrs. Munster was a kind creature, with an enormous respect for her lord, and quite a motherly interest in us boys, she having no children of her own.

The manner of these good people was kind towards all; but their treatment of Madeline Graham was blended with a sense of restraint almost bordering on fear. It was obvious that they had been instructed to treat her with more than ordinary solicitude, and it was equally obvious that they were liberally paid for so doing.

When she broke from all restraints, as was the case occasionally, their concern for her personal welfare was not unmingled with a fear lest open rupture might rob them of the installments derived from their wealthiest pupil.

Madeline, on her part, was perfectly conscious of this; but, in justice, it must be said that she seldom took undue advantage of her position.

The mere I saw of Madeline Graham, the mere I observed her manners and general bearing, the mere the thought of her possessed me, and blended with my quietest dreams.

After that first interview, she held somewhat aloof for many days, but her eyes were constantly watching me in school and at meals, though without any approach to further familiarity. She seemed desirous of keeping me at a distance, for reasons which I could not possibly penetrate.

Gradually, however, we came together again.

Madeline had not exaggerated when she boasted of excelling the other scholars in brightness and intelligence. Her memory was extraordinary, and tasks which taxed all the energies of boyhood were easily mastered by her quick and restless brain.

She was taught with the rest of us in the open school, and was generally at the head of her class.

It so happened that I myself, although in many things dull and indifferent, was also gifted with a memory of uncommon tenacity. In all tasks which demanded the exercise of this function I took a foremost place.

Madeline was my most formidable rival, and we began, quietly at first, but afterwards with energy, to fight for the mastery.

The competition, instead of severing, brought us closer to each other.

Madeline respected the spirit which sometimes subdued her, and I for my part, loved her the better for the humanizing touches of passion which my victory frequently awakened.

We had been friends six months, the quiet road of school life had become familiar and pleasant to me, when, one day at breakfast, I noticed that Munster wore a very troubled expression, as he broke open the largest of a number of letters lying before him. The envelope was of peculiar yellow paper, and the post-mark looked foreign.

Madeline, who sat close by, turned white and eager, and her great eyes fixed themselves on the strange missive.

Within the letter to Munster was a smaller one, which he handed to Madeline silently.

With impetuous eagerness, she opened and read it. It was very short. As she glanced over it, her bosom rose, and fell, her eyes brightened and filled with tears.

To hide her trouble, she rose and left the room.

Meanwhile, Munster evinced similar surprise and consternation. He bit his lips as he read his letter, and passed his hand nervously through his hair. Then, with a significant look, he passed the letter to his wife, who, reading it, in her turn became similarly troubled.

As he passed the letter to her, something dropped rustling to the floor, and Munster, looking rather red, stooped and picked it up. It was a curiously printed paper, and looked like the note of some foreign bank.

Breakfast was finished—school began—but Madeline did not appear. Munster still looked fidgety and uneasy.

As for myself, I was torn by sensations to which my little heart had been hitherto a stranger. I felt on the brink of a precipice, down which all that I held dear was disappearing. I could not see, I could not say my tasks, I could not think. What was going to happen? I asked myself wildly again and again.

At two o'clock, when we were summoned to dinner, no sight of Madeline. But by this time some hint of the truth was forcing itself upon me.

A whisper had passed round the school—"Madeline Graham is going away."

Going away? Whither? To that far distant, that mysterious land whence she had come, and whither I might never follow her? Going away for ever! Passing westward, and taking with her all that made my young life beautiful and happy. Could this be?

I shall never forget the agony of that day. I have had blows since, but none harder, I have felt desolation since, but none deeper.

After school, I hung round the house, haunted every spot where she might be expected to appear. I yearned to hear the truth from her own lips. I peered to and fro like a criminal awaiting his sentence. I could not bear the sight of the other boys, but kept to the secret places, moody and distracted.

WOLFVILLE, N. S., AUGUST 18, 1899.

The prospects for the farmers of this county have not looked so bright for a long time as they do at present. With a fine season and the promise of abundant crops and remunerative prices our farmer friends have every reason for feeling elated over the future.

The following communication was received from a respected clergyman in a neighboring county. We take the liberty of publishing it in full, and thank our correspondent for his support and co-operation.

DEAR EDITOR:—Your name is not known to me, but as a reader of Forward I noted in its last issue extracts from 300 Wolfville ACADIAN expressing sentiments which I want most heartily to endorse.

AFTERNOON SESSION. 2.00 Opening Exercises. 2.30 Paper: "Temperance in the S. School."—Rev. W. Gaetz.

7.30 Opening Exercises. 7.40 Minutes of Afternoon Session. 7.45 Address: "The Sabbath School and the Home."—Rev. J. Hawley.

The following clipped from a communication to this week's Hants Journal will be read with interest by many here: Several years ago, S. P. Benjamin, of Wolfville, built a sluice reaching from Glenwood Mills to the Forks Bridge, a distance of over four miles, in which float the boards, deals and scantling to the wharf.

An Interesting Wedding. An event occurred at Truro on Wednesday of this week in which Wolfville people are especially interested. We refer to the marriage of Mr. R. W. Ford, principal of the Wolfville public schools, and Miss Sarah Faulkner Jamieson.

ANOTHER PIANO STORY

Of something the same character as the one we published last week.

The day following the last issue of our last week's advertisement in the Chronicle, we had a visit from a most respectable gentleman who lives in the north end of the city.

"In my case the agent forced his piano into the house while I was away from home. Then he sent around a friend who could play brilliantly, and between the two of them they did the trick. He said the piano was worth $800, but I finally bought it for $750. Afterwards I learned of a man who had bought a similar one for $450."

Southern California Letter. "I will even make a way in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert."

No more striking verification of these quotations could possibly be given than the things we have seen in San Bernardino and Los Angeles counties in the last ten days.

Success on a Farm.

Success has a different significance to different minds. To one it represents a large account at the bank, to a second a comfortable estate, to a third a high place in society, to a fourth a title or an office, and to a fifth the trumpet-voice of fame. By his own side of it is identified in some way with money-getting. Now, while many truly successful men have been wealthy and while money as a means to an end is a splendid goal, yet simply as an end it is a serious evil, and while it is commendable in a young man to resolve upon earning a competence he ought to keep ever in his mind the fact that it is possible for one to attain the highest degree of success and yet live and die in poverty, and sometimes what the world calls failure is in reality the true success.

Can a young man succeed in farming? The first point to be considered is, does he like it. For no one can succeed in a business for which he has a positive aversion. A man out of place may manage to get a living, but he works mechanically, and he is constantly looking at his watch, and thinking of his salary. It matters not so much what your work is if it is honorable and you like it.

Farming is the destined occupation of all men at birth, and he who forsakes it for other pursuits must show substantial reasons for the departure to entitle him to encouragement. To the young man possessed of a fair amount of health, intelligence and strength and who has not an unmistakable inclination and aptitude for something else, an occupation offers so sure and easy a path to success as agriculture.

Daily exercise in the open air, constant contact with the soil, a wholesome diet, the peaceful surroundings make the farmer's life a pre-eminently healthy one, and surely health is one of the most important factors in success.

We often hear it said and that, too, by farmers, that farming will not pay. No business conducted as some farmers conduct theirs will pay, and it is the best evidence of the remunerative nature of agriculture that so many are able to get a living out of it. They would fail in any other calling. You are likely to get out of a business what you put into it, and for the amount of capital put into farming it will give a good return as any business. The young man of to-day ought not to feel that rural life will deny him from success or from the enjoyment and development of his social and intellectual faculties.

There would not be so much pleasure in the night's rest if it were not for the day's work. A child of four years should be fed principally on milk, well-cooked cereals, as oatmeal and wheat preparation, and whole wheat bread; a little carefully boiled beef might be added once a day. Cakes or pastry should never be given.

Many pastry and kitchen windows let in a great amount of sun's heat in spring and summer. Blinds keep out heat but create darkness within. Stretch a four foot width of wire poultry netting before and over the windows, and train woodbine over it. It will be ornamental and will let in light at the windows, while keeping out the heat.

If you are "out of spirits" try a glass of hot water with the juice of half a lemon squeezed into it, but no sugar, night and morning. The chances are that the daily headache, which medicine has failed to cure, will leave you, and your appetite improve. There is no other medicine for persons who are troubled with bilious and liver complaints than this simple remedy, which is far more efficacious than quinine or any other drug, while it is devoid of their injurious consequences. It excites the liver, stimulates the digestive organs and tones up the system generally. It is not unpleasant to take either; indeed, one soon gets to like it.

I, the undersigned, do hereby agree to refund the money on a twenty-five cent bottle of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, if, after using three-fourths of contents of bottle, they do not relieve Constipation and Headache. Also warrant that four bottles will permanently cure the most obstinate case of Constipation. Satisfaction or no pay when Williams' Pink Pills are used. GEORGE V. RAND, Druggist, Wolfville, N. S.

Jelly Making.

The whys and wherefores of jelly making are as easily mastered as those of any other method of preparing fruit, and yet clear and sparkling jelly is by no means common, and many a housewife whose perfect assurance makes casing, preserving and pickling easy work makes a bugbear of jelly making and from first to last is apprehensive that it will not "come," or if it does will be cloudy, dark colored or pungent. For this reason a writer in Good Housekeeping furnishes some information that will make the whole thing plain sailing from the beginning to the end.

The choice of fruit is the difficult part of the work. One may as well expect to gather figs of thistles" as to make firm and delicate flavored jelly of half grown or overripe fruit. Peaches, the substance which gives firmness to fruit and when freed by boiling yields jelly, is at its best in every respect when the fruit is perfectly ripe, but from that time it commences to deteriorate. As a choice between two evils, then, underripe fruit is preferable to overripe, but the jelly produced from the former will be neither as fine flavored nor colored as though the fruit were ripe. As a rule large berries and currants yield more juice than the smaller ones. In fact it is good economy to buy prime fruit of all kinds for jelly.

The prevalent belief that jelly must be made on a clear day is utter nonsense. At the same time many varieties of small fruit will absorb moisture, and if picked just after a heavy rain the juice will require longer boiling. As with canning so in all other methods of preparing fruit, neither tin vessels nor iron spoons must be used in any of the various operations. Granulated sugar is the purest, most delicate flavored and inexpensive.

Have two bags, one made of coarse linen cloth, the other of cheesecloth, with strong linen cord for suspending the former. None of the small fruits require any water in cooking if a quart of the fruit is first put in the preserving kettle, mashed and slowly cooked until the juices flow freely. Then draw the kettle to the back of the range; add the remainder of the fruit by degrees, stirring occasionally; draw to the front and cook gently but steadily until soft. Of the larger fruits, plums and peaches require little water, while raspberries, quinces and common apples should have enough to show through from the top after the mass has been shaken down.

While the fruit is cooking, soak the linen drip bag in hot water. As soon as the fruit is soft enough to break easily, wring the bag dry, hold over a deep earthen bowl or stoneware crock, put in the fruit, tie the top firmly and suspend, to hang free, in a warm place and away from drafts. As it cools, occasionally press against the sides of the bag with two wooden lites, but never squeeze with the hands if you would make first quality jelly. (A little inferior jelly for cooking purposes can afterward be made by squeezing and wringing, but the game is hardly worth the candle.)

Measure the juice, return to the fire and boil steadily for 20 minutes, skimming often. During this time have the sugar heating in the oven. When the juice is sufficiently cooked, turn in the sugar carefully. Stir gently until it is dissolved, but not longer, and as soon as the jelly boils draw the kettle to the back of the range. Have a hot, deep bowl and dipper in readiness and at once strain the jelly through the cheesecloth bag (previously wrung out of hot water) and fill the jelly glasses as it sets on the range.

Let the jelly stand uncovered several hours before sealing. Then cover the top with a thin layer of melted paraffin or with a paper soaked in wax pressed close to the jelly and a larger circle of oiled paper over the top of the glass. It will never keep perfectly in a damp place, and one both dry and cool is best.

Though you have reached the critical time of a hot summer as diseased and broken down in health that your case is considered incurable, we say, "Stick brothers and sisters, be of good cheer! Have courage yet!" Paine's Celery Compound is a great physician's prescription for the cure of chronic and complicated cases of disease that have baffled the skill of the ordinary physician.

We positively assert that nine out of every ten whom the doctors cannot help will gain health, vigor and new life by the use of Paine's Celery Compound. The work of Paine's Celery Compound in the homes of our country has been noted with wonder, admiration and joy by all classes of men and women. In thousands of cases it has saved life after all other means had failed.

The World's White-Ribbon Leader. Lady Henry Somerset, whose birthday is set apart in our White-Ribbon calendar as Epoch of Mission Day, has realized De Tocqueville's words that "Life is neither a pleasure nor a pain; it is a serious business to be entered upon with courage and in a spirit of self-sacrifice."

The industrial Farm Colony for imberiate women at Duxford, England, is one of the practical results of Lady Henry's planning. This enterprise was started in 1895. Lady Henry understands human nature from court to cottage. She believes in the solidarity of humanity, and like her friend and comrade below, who has gone "ahead only a little time," she believes that "only the golden rule of Christ can bring the golden age of men," and is faithfully using her great gifts of wealth and talent in hastening its coming.

The Manitoba Convention. The Manitoba W. C. T. U. convened for the Tenth Annual Convention in the city of Winnipeg, June 14th, 1899. The delegates were all held in St. Andrew's Presbyterian church—the largest and most commodious among the several Presbyterian churches here—the occasion with white ribbons and flags, flowers and banners.

The president, Mrs (Rev.) J. McClung, called the convention to order at 9.30 on the morning of the 14th. There were over sixty ladies present, besides the delegates and friends. The first afternoon session was largely occupied with the president's annual address, which touched upon several subjects of special interest and importance, and which has sprung up, amounting almost to a union of the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race; the Peace Conference at the Hague; the results of the Spanish-American war; the plea of the industrial women; the plebeian campaign of the past year, and the disappointment felt at the session of the Dominion government, and urged that the organization do everything possible to aid in sending to parliament men who would stand for prohibition.

The second evening public meeting was under the direction of the W. C. T. U. The convention was welcomed formally and in beautiful language by Mrs (Rev.) Jos. Hogg, and Mrs. Moore responded in the most excellent manner in which the delegates were all thoroughly enjoyed the hospitable manner in which they were entertained in the homes of Winnipeg, Central and Eastern Manitoba. The delegates were all supplied with the most delicious meals for three days. The workers separated, benighted in many ways by their intercourse with another during Thirteenth Labour W. C. T. U. Convention, and with a fixed determination to keep at the work, until finally the reward shall come in a prohibitory law for the province of the Dominion at last.

The Queen on Prohibition. Her Majesty the Queen, addressing some Bechuanas chiefs at Windsor, in 1895, said: "I am glad to see the chiefs, and to know that they love my rule. I confirm the settlement of their case which my minister has made. I approve of the provision excluding strong drink from their country. I feel strongly in this matter, and am glad to see that the chiefs have determined to keep so great a curse from the people."

Florence Nightingale recently passed her eightieth birthday. Though in feeble health, she is still able to pursue many of her old interests, as nursing, hospital authorities, and sanitary reformers all the world over, and especially in India, can bear witness.
