I therefore ask the Prime Minister if during his meeting with President Carter these two treaties will be on the agenda for discussion, and will they be signed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, again this is a subject that President Carter and I discussed very explicitly at our last meeting and we instructed our negotiators to make progress or to report to us if progress was not being made, because we would want to intervene personally. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has reported to this House, very significant progress has been made, notably on the east coast.

There is no proposal that President Carter and I sign any agreement in Washington, but the announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs still holds and we are confident that the agreements will be signed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON TERRITORIAL BOUNDARIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. On February 13, in answer to a question put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning a possible claim by the United States to Canadian territorial waters, he undertook to provide me with information in this regard, which he has done in a letter addressed to me dated February 22. It confirms my worst fears by informing me that the United States has formally claimed continental shelf and fisheries jurisdiction in the Beaufort Sea up to an equidistant line which lies east of the 141st meridian, an area of approximately 6,000 square nautical miles.

● (1130)

In his visit to Washington, can the Prime Minister assure the House that he will take a firm stand on informing the President that under no circumstances will Canadian sovereignty be relinquished to any Canadian territorial waters, and that it will not be part of any treaty on fisheries that is signed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course Canada will not relinquish sovereignty over any of its waters. I can say that to the House and I can say that to the President.

The whole question is, where does Canada's sovereignty lie and where does the boundary lie? As the hon. member knows, or should know, this is the whole subject of negotiation. We have made claim over waters that the United States say is an infringement of their sovereignty. The President can tell me the same thing: you must not take our sovereign waters.

The whole matter is one of discussing and deciding where the line lies. That is the object of the negotiations and that will perhaps be the eventual object of arbitration.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since Canada has always operated under the sector theory, the 141st meridian, therefore, would be the established boundary of Canada's territorial waters.

Can the Prime Minister assure us that the Canadian government is taking that stance; that it is insisting upon the application of the sector theory, and that the 141st meridian is the established rigid boundary of Canada's territorial waters in that area of the country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the sector theory is the one which gives us the broadest scope of sovereignty. It is, of course, the one we are pushing for and prefer, but it is not the one which is accepted in international law or by the United States.

It would be very nice to go up to the North Pole and say that part of the North Pole is ours, but it would be another thing to get the rest of the world to admit that claim. The hon. member knows the difficulties when there are competing claims by different countries. You have to resolve those claims by negotiation, as we have been successful in doing on the east coast and as we hope to be successful in doing elsewhere. Failing that, we will use the other means at our disposal under international law.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question along the same lines. I hope the Prime Minister will add to his agenda the insistence, and not be intimidated by the 54-40 or "fight" notion which has been used in United States politics, on the importance of the A-B line when he is talking to the president.

Mr. Paproski: He does not know what the A-B line is.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know that the colleagues of the hon. member do not understand what the A-B line is. I just heard Mr. Paproski say that.

Mr. Paproski: Order. I said you did not know.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You probably do not know that A and B are the first two letters of the alphabet.

Mr. Trudeau: The alpha-beta line is the one which is under negotiation. Canada would like to have the present line respected, but it is being disputed by the United States. This is also one of the things they are putting forth for negotiation, just as we are putting forth for negotiation areas of water they claim as theirs and that we are claiming for ourselves.

NATIONAL UNITY

DISPOSITION OF LEGISLATION ON REFERENDA

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Bill C-9, the referendum bill, has been before committee for more than a month and many, many meetings have been held.

It is becoming apparent, to me at least, that the official opposition seems to be filibustering. Will the Prime Minister say if Bill C-9 remains a priority of his and the government's, and will he delay calling a general election until this House had dealt with the referendum bill?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can answer the first part of the question very readily. The government does attach very great importance to that piece of legislation. We have explained repeatedly that we feel it is an important piece of our arsenal if we are to be able to combat separatism in the United—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Way to go.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You and Billy Carter.

Mr. Hees: You are better than Jimmy.

An hon. Member: You are better than Billy.

Mr. Trudeau: Judging by the opposition questions this morning, they want me to talk with President Carter on just about everything. Maybe they want me to talk to him about the referendum legislation. I think he would certainly understand more than the opposition seem to, the importance to Canada of this particular piece of legislation. I want to assure the people of Canada and the opposition that it is of the utmost importance.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO SYDNEY STEEL PLANT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, the temptation is to put another question to the Prime Minister and ask if the Minister of Transport has changed his mind regarding a deep sea fleet, but I would rather put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Yesterday, the minister replied to some questions about Sydney Steel and indicated that the matter of assistance for the plant is under active consideration by the cabinet. Without asking the minister to divulge what form this assistance might take, could he indicate if the government is viewing assistance to Sydney Steel in a positive vein?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it may be a few days too early for me to respond in a complete way to that question, because I would be preventing a decision being reached by cabinet based on what they are assessing. I would ask the hon. gentleman to be patient for a few more days. We will come to a decision on that matter next week, I hope.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question. I wonder if I might ask the minister whether in this process, without inviting Premier Buchanan into the inner circles, the province of Nova Scotia is being kept fully advised of the decision-making process within cabinet.

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, Premier Buchanan has been kept aware of the progress achieved recently, but I cannot tell the hon. gentleman about all the small details that I have put in front of my colleagues.

ENERGY

PROBLEMS OF INDEPENDENT FUEL OIL DISTRIBUTORS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology. At the end of January, I believe, the minister had already received the representations of the Quebec division of the association of independent distributors of fuel oil expressing their considerable concern about the price increases and the difficulties in having their contracts honoured, as well as the possibility of their losing some contracts to the competition of the big companies. Since that time, has the minister reached a decision and can he tell us what his views are about the representations made to him?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, there are two problems with respect to the shortage of stove oil and furnace oil in Quebec. The first problem, and the No. 1 priority of the government, is to ensure consumers of stove oil and fuel oil that they will be looked after.

The government has made a number of efforts to ensure that federal arms, such as the Department of National Defence, for instance, have shipped stove oil from the special reserve in Newfoundland into the Quebec market.

Similarly, the Minister of Transport has made special efforts to get the air carriers of Canada to switch fuels temporarily so that more kerosene will be made available to consumers of stove oil in the province of Quebec. I believe that these methods, along with certain other reallocations on the part of eastern refiners to the Quebec market, have helped the situation.

The second problem the hon. member raises is the question of allocation and the position of the independents. We have made every effort to get the co-operation of the refiners to make a fair distribution. I am not satisfied as yet that that fair distribution has been obtained. We have advised the refiners that we have some evidence which indicates they are taking advantage of the situation. I can tell the hon. member that as a result of that evidence I have issued instructions to my department that I want an audit made and an investigation into certain practices in the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: I appreciate the reply of the minister very much. On a supplementary, last week, I believe, at a meeting of the 800 Quebec independent distributors, the association expressed its intention of asking the government to act through legislation, if the need should arise, to protect those independent distributors who represent thousands of employees. Is the minister aware of the recommendation of the association and under special circumstances would he be willing to introduce a bill to protect those independent distributors?

• (1140)

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with representatives of the independent retailers. We have discussed a number of methods. I referred to the audit and investigation which will be launched very shortly.

I also want to tell the hon. member that I have received representations that the differential with respect to middle distillates which has protected Canadian refineries, providing a degree of protection against imports, has had an adverse affect upon the ability of independent retailers to purchase advantageously. I received those representations from the industry and I have received representations from a large number of members of my party from the province of Quebec. As a result of those representations, Mr. Speaker, I have decided that the differential will be removed on middle distillates starting next week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FUNDING OF GARRISON DIVERSION UNIT

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Just this past week, Governor Link of North Dakota made representations to Congress for additional funding for the Garrison diversion unit. Could the Prime Minister assure this House that the question of Garrison will be on the agenda for discussion with President Carter in his visit to Washington next week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all these are welcome suggestions, but I wish the opposition would get together and let me know which of them—I think there are now ten suggestions for discussion, all of them very lengthy and important—they would like me to raise with President Carter. I will not be able to raise them all.

Mr. Stevens: You will be there for the photos.

Mr. Trudeau: But, indeed, if the Garrison diversion is more important to the Tories than the A-B line or the matter of—

An hon. Member: What about Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: They are all important, Mr. Speaker. We have constant meetings—

Mr. Stevens: You will remember the photographs.

Mr. Trudeau: I think there is some nervousness over there. Just because their leader is not here does not mean they will get his job. They will just have to take it easy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You will be leaving first.

An hon. Member: He will get your job.

Mr. Trudeau: He may try and get my job.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REPORT OF INSTITUTE OF POLICY ANALYSIS

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I have in front of me an article from the Toronto Star dated February 28, entitled "Would a Tory Win Help the Dollar?".

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Of course it would.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, he should put it directly.

An hon. Member: Naturally it would.

Mr. Chrétien: Are you nervous?

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): My question is whether the Minister of Finance and his officials agree with the conclusions expressed in the report—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): —of the Institute of Policy Analysis, of the University of Toronto, to the effect that had Tory policies been implemented—

An hon. Member: Come on.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Trudeau: You can't take it.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY RESPECTING LAY-OFFS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board, who seems to have some difficulty keeping his seat these days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I mentioned that before. He is up and down.

An hon. Member: Watch your seat.

Miss MacDonald: I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board a question regarding an answer he gave me the other day concerning lay-offs in the public service, particularly as they apply to women. I quote:

> These are the people who are the latest hirees and, naturally, if there is some restriction in the public service it is normal policy that the people most recently hired are the first laid off.

Having had an opportunity to look at the normal policy of the Treasury Board with regard to reductions in the work force, and to see that the reductions are determined by the reverse order of merit—

An hon. Member: Order.

Miss MacDonald: —I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether last hired, first fired is a new policy regarding reductions in the public service over-all, or does this apply only to women?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the principle used is one of merit. But as a generalization, if there are large numbers of people, one would find a much larger proportion among the last people hired that are being laid off. I suggest to the hon. member that this is consistent with the merit principle which I think she is driving at in her question.

STATUS OF WOMEN

LAY-OFFS IN PUBLIC SERVICE—POLICY AS IT APPLIES TO WOMEN

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister in charge of the Status of Women.

Seeing that the President of the Treasury Board is following the policy of last hired, first fired—which is clearly discriminatory against women, as he himself admits—or he may, indeed, be following the reverse order of merit policy, which he says is his department's policy, but in a way that clearly discriminates against women—as the figures released the other day prove—I ask the minister if the policy that is being followed by the President of the Treasury Board is one which has his endorsement regarding the treatment of women in the public service. Also, what is he going to do about it? Is this part of his action plan for women which he is supposed to be introducing?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member completely distorts the reply the minister gave here a few minutes ago. I shall reply by asking her whether, in line with her policy, she would like us to lay off the civil servants with the most seniority.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FUNDING OF RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. The minister's ad hoc advisory committee on research, which has representatives on it from government and from industry, has published estimates that in constant dollars university research and development must increase by 30 per cent a year, industrial research and development must increase by 27 per cent a year, and government research and development must increase by 10 per cent a year to reach the government's announced target of 1.5 per cent of the gross national product by 1983.

Since we are falling so far behind as a result of the cuts announced in the estimates, what steps is the minister taking to reach the goals announced on June 1 by the former minister?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I answered an almost identical question yesterday with regard to that matter. I made it quite clear that the government expects the private sector to play an important role as far as expenditures and performance of research and development in Canada are concerned, not just for the sake of research and development, important as that may be, but as part of the innovative and entrepreneurial process.

Toward that end, the Minister of Finance in the last budget increased the tax credits for research and development in Canada. We believe that if industry takes advantage of those tax credits and also the measures of a previous budget, it could increase expenditures and performance in research and development in Canada by roughly $150 million a year.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the second tier committee set up by the government, which has representation on it from both industry and labour, in analysing these proposed tax cuts predicted that they would not work, and recommended instead that the government adopt a policy of payback from profitable, subsidized research and the prevention of free transfers out of Canada of research and development benefits, is the minister giving consideration to those practical proposals made by the second tier committee?

• (1150)

Mr. Gillespie: These matters are ongoing efforts among the government, industry and the sector task forces. The hon. member may have read the government's response to the Overview Committee and he may have noted, with respect to the so-called payback mechanisms, that these are mechanisms which the government is already using in connection with some of its programs. They have not always been as successful as industry spokesmen thought they might be, in that they tend to generate a great deal of red tape.

We believe the incentive measures for which industry has been asking, and to which requests the government has responded, are more likely to generate increased research and development in Canadian industry.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATURAL RESOURCES—NEED FOR UNIMPEDED ACCESS ACROSS ALASKA-CANADA BORDER

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the fact that recent decisions by the United States government have apparently restricted access to more than half of the international boundary between British Columbia and Alaska, and recognizing that development of mineral and other resource industries in northern British Columbia and the Yukon demands unimpeded access through the Panhandle region, will the right hon. gentleman advise us what action has been initiated in response to a recent forceful appeal by the B.C. and Yukon Chamber of Mines requesting that the government investigate the serious consequences of these land withdrawals in the state of Alaska? Further, will the Prime Minister undertake to raise this urgent and important matter with President Carter during their tête-à-tête?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will be glad to take note of the question on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

ENERGY

PROPOSED CUTBACK IN IMPORTS—EFFECT OF IEA AGREEMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In 1974, Canada became one of the signatory countries to the International Energy Agency agreement. One of the clauses in that agreement provided that Canada would reduce its consumption of petroleum products if oil exports from certain sources fell below a certain figure.

Would the minister advise us how Canada proposes to cut back its imports by 5 per cent under that agreement as announced this morning?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The governing board of the International Energy Agency met in Paris yesterday and reached a decision to work collectively to reduce world oil demand by two million barrels a day, roughly 5 per cent of the consumption by International Energy Agency countries. The purpose of this decision was to move demand and supply into balance and reduce pressure on prices, particularly spot prices.

As to the methods to be used by these countries operating separately and in addition to obligations under the emergency oil sharing agreement, there are a variety of procedures. They include demand restraint where it would not impair economic activity, the substitution of other fuels for oil where that might work, and increases in indigenous production. The hon. member will recognize that the last named method is one which Canada has already used. By virtue of the swapping arrangements we have been able to manage our resources in such a way that there was reserve capacity, and that reserve has been moved to the east coast. So Canada is already performing in accordance with the undertakings which other countries have assumed.

INQUIRY WHETHER AGREEMENT REACHED WITH NEW BRUNSWICK ON ADDITIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Can the minister tell us if, after several months of negotiations, the federal government and the New Brunswick government have agreed to sign, in the near future, a subsidiary agreement for the underdeveloped areas?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, after many months of negotiations, we have surely made some considerable progress, but I am not in a position to say today that such an agreement will indeed be signed in the coming weeks. I certainly hope so, but there are still some points to be clarified. We will do all we can to sign this agreement as rapidly as possible in order that its implementation may begin in the next financial year.

LABOUR DISPUTES

ACTION TAKEN TO AVERT POSSIBLE STRIKE OF VANCOUVER DOCK WORKERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Minister of Labour. It is one of which I have given notice and it has to do with the continuing difficulties being experienced in grain transportation and export.

The acting minister will be aware that the dock workers in Vancouver have voted heavily in favour of strike action. I should like to know what action the minister is taking to avert this serious prospect of a strike which would so gravely affect western farmers and the economy generally.

Hon. Barney Danson (Acting Minister of Labour): I will have to take notice of the question, though perhaps it could be answered by the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): A notification of impasse has been received from the union, and while a strike vote has been taken the parties have not acquired the right of strike or lock-out. Further conciliation procedures are under consideration by the minister at this moment. He will be in the House on Monday, and if the hon. member wishes to put the question to him, he will be able to answer in more detail.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I will put my supplementary because I might not be recognized then. I am sure the minister will be aware of statements of total dissatisfaction by the Western Grain Elevator Association with proposed hours of work regulations covering western grain elevators.

Having regard to the position taken by the minister's predecessor in debate on amendments to the Canada Labour Code, has the department ruled out exempting country elevator managers from the hours of work provisions?

Mr. Dawson: I will take notice of the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: But I already gave you notice.

Having regard to recent reports of further loss of life in avalanches in British Columbia, is the hon. gentleman able to tell us the extent to which the Ministry of Transport is inquiring into the previous helicopter skiing accident in which seven skiers died?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as in all cases of accident or failure of certain aviation techniques or some bad practices in the field of aviation, the matter is dealt with by the Aviation Safety Investigation Division. POST OFFICE

OVERNIGHT INTERCITY COURIER SERVICE—ALLEGED SECRECY RESPECTING PROGRAM

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. It relates to the overnight intercity courier service launched recently by the Post Office in an attempt to recover business losses to private couriers of up to $100 million.

I should like to ask whether this service is designed to replace the now defunct assured delivery service. Would it require an expensive repainting of post boxes? Further, why has the government imposed secrecy on this program by forbidding officials to discuss it.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): It seems the hon. member is referring to our new service which is called Priority Post. It was devised to give to certain customers under contract a mail service comparable to that of any private enterprise competing with us at the moment. We could promote it, in a way, without publicity; the reason we have not publicized it is that we wanted to make sure that the operation was a success, that it was self-sufficient and that undertaking this new venture would not lead to a requirement for more money from taxpayers.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am amazed that this new service was not announced in the House of Commons in accordance with tradition around this place.

Is this new service an attempt by the Post Office to extend its monopoly by surreptitious means over the transfer of goods and the transmission of messages as proposed in the legislation to set up a Crown corporation?

Mr. Lamontagne: There is nothing secret about it. It is just a question of good management on the part of the Post Office. We are establishing a service to compete with people who are trying to take away part of our business. It is just a matter of good business sense.

REASON FOR DELAY IN UNLOADING MAIL AT GATEWAY PLANT—WITHHOLDING OF DELIVERIES BY BULK MAILERS IN TORONTO

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of his statement yesterday that 95 per cent to 97 per cent of the mail in Canada is delivered within one to two days, can the minister tell the House why at the Gateway postal plant in Mississauga, Ontario, within the last month more than 60 tractor-trailer loads of mail were held for over 48 hours without being unloaded?

Further, can he explain why officials of the Post Office have been requesting bulk mailers in Toronto to withhold deliveries to that same plant for periods of up to a week because they have been unable to process them?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the difficulties we have had at Mississauga. However, I can assure the hon. member that we are taking care of the Ontario area. The proof is that with the departure of our director-general, Mr. Hubling—which we regret—we have put all Ontario metro areas under the direct responsibility of the Deputy Postmaster General to see that no problems like this arise in the future.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

POWERS OF HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSIONER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It is a very serious question and I know the Prime Minister will treat it very seriously.

As a result of the actions of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Canadian Human Rights Commissioner has been reduced to nothing but a toothless tiger. They have attempted to emasculate the Human Rights Act which I know the Prime Minister wants. What is going on here? When we passed this legislation, I thought it would not be selective, but it seems that this government is attempting to make it selective. I ask the Prime Minister, in all seriousness for his views regarding this very important matter.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I discussed the matter a few days ago with the Minister of Justice. I have not discussed it with him since and I do not know what developments have taken place with regard to the position taken by the commissioner and the fact that some legislation and some actions are before the courts.

I knew that the issue was that the commission should wait to see what the courts were deciding in this particular case. I believe that would be the position of the hon. member, too. The law must prevail. This is a matter for the courts to decide, and I believe that was the situation a few days ago. I do not know what has come out of that court action since.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am extremely disappointed and very surprised at the Prime Minister's answer, because he too is going along with selectivity in the process. I find that to be very obnoxious. On the order paper now there is a bill which contains the following clause:

Nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the application of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

The Prime Minister knows that when I am serious, I am serious. I am not going to get smart with him. Would he see to it, in the last days of this parliament, that any legislation which is introduced will take account of the clause to which I have referred? Perhaps it is necessary that such a clause be included in all legislation. Failing that, we will have legislation which will be nothing but a sham and a fraud; we will have reduced the commissioner to the level of someone who has no power whatsoever.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in spite of the hon. member's plea to be taken seriously, I am afraid that the last part of his question shows that he is not very serious. This House debated that bill at great length. It was presented in utmost earnest by the government. We chose to head the commission with an honourable and respected member of the hon. member's party.

Mr. Alexander: But look at what you are doing to him.

Mr. Trudeau: The law is taking its course. Surely the hon. member is not asking the government to phone a judge to tell him to stand aside in this case.

Mr. Alexander: I am saying that there should be no exceptions, and the Prime Minister has not answered my question. That is a sham and a fraud.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JOHNSTON (WESTMOUNT)—DISALLOWANCE OF QUESTION DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The question I would like to raise relates to the question I attempted to pose during the question period to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). With respect, Mr. Speaker, there was a preamble, but I would point out that questions asked by hon. members opposite, such as the one immediately following mine asked by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), contained a much more substantial and provocative preamble than the one contained in my question.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to proceed with his question of privilege, I think he should be aware that fundamentally, to begin with, he was asking a hypothetical question. I am sure that from a cursory examination of the article to which he was referring he is aware that it postulates the victory of a certain political party in the future and presumes some conclusions. That therefore disqualifies his question. Whether or not his question suffered from any other defects or disabilities remains to be seen.

However, I gave him an opportunity to skip over his preamble and put his question. When he did, it seemed to me that the question he was putting was clearly hypothetical. Furthermore, he was asking for an opinion on that hypothesis, and I thought, therefore, that his question failed on those two counts. It had nothing to do with a provocative or political preamble.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. DICK—NOTICE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE TO BE RAISED

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, today being Friday, the House begins sitting at eleven o'clock rather than two o'clock, and Hansard was delivered today—at least to my office—at 10.10, so it was impossible to give one hour's notice. Yesterday on two occasions Your Honour stated that perhaps after reading what went on yesterday and looking at the precedents people might like to give notice today or at another date—as soon as possible—and I would like to indicate that I probably will be doing that at the first opportunity next week. Unfortunately, on Monday I have an engagement. I have to go to a hospital, but I will be here on Tuesday. I just could not give an hour's notice because of the time at which I received Hansard and because today's sitting began at eleven o'clock and not two o'clock.

MISS MACDONALD—PREAMBLE TO QUESTION ASKED DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, because my name was mentioned by the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) in his intervention, I would like to state that the preamble to my question referred to a direct quote from the words of a minister as recorded in Hansard for February 27 at page 3629, so it was a fairly substantial preamble.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) does not have to remind me that her preamble was fairly substantial. I remember it very well.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 59, I move that the Supplementary Estimates (B) 1978-79 tabled this day be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows. I have a three page list of committees which has been distributed, so may I dispense with reading it, and would the House take it as read?

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we have had an opportunity to review that list and it looks to us as if it were appropriate. If the minister can assure us that it is being done in the normal way, if he could confirm that, we would be happy to take it as read and would agree to it.

Mr. Cafik: I can confirm that it is done in the way it is being done, namely that it was distributed to all House leaders. I cannot say it is normal because it might deviate somewhat from the predecents.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the minister's request. Since his list has been circulated, it should be taken as having been included in the motion which he has just now read and will be printed in Hansard so that these estimates can be referred to the several committees named.

To the Standing Committee on Agriculture:
Agriculture votes 5b, 20b, 40b, 50b and 60b
To the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts:
Communications votes 10b and 15b

FOOD AID TO THIRD WORLD AND DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Question No. 145—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

What was Canada's contribution to food aid for third world and developing countries for 1976 and 1977 and (a) to which countries were contributions made (b) in each case (i) what food products were contributed (ii) at what dollar value (c) what was the (i) administrative costs (ii) distribution costs (iii) value of the food product?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is not possible to provide a complete breakdown regarding the commodities and their value as supplied by Canada in fiscal years 1975-76 and 1976-77. This is because on the multilateral side, CIDA makes a grant on an annual basis to the World Food Program for purchases of Canadian foodstuffs which are then distributed through the WFP's network in approximately 100 third world and developing countries. We do not know the distribution costs but we make a lump sum annual payment toward defraying those costs in general.

On the bilateral side, it is not possible to provide information regarding distribution costs as that is the responsibility of the recipient country. The foodstuff is bought and shipped (cost, insurance and freight) to the recipient country by CIDA, hence the figures below cover transportation costs also, generally in the range of 20 to 25 per cent of the total.

Finally, in fiscal year 1976-77 CIDA's principal procurement agent, the Department of Supply and Services, went to a cost-recovery method of operation. Hence there is a considerable increase in the indicated administrative cost for the second year shown.

STEVENSON AND KELLOGG—MIRABEL AIRPORT

Question No. 379—Mr. MacKay:

1. Did the Auditor-General order a report to be prepared by Stevenson and Kellogg on the real cost of Mirabel Airport and, if so, on what date was the report (a) commissioned (b) completed?

2. Did the report place the real cost of the Airport between 2 to 3 times as much as the amount to which the government has publicly admitted?

3. Does the government intend to make the report public and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, on what date?

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. No. The Auditor General did not commission such a study.

2. Not applicable—see 1.

3. Not applicable—see 1.

However, the Auditor General did conduct a review of planning capital acquisitions as part of his study of procedures in cost effectiveness. This study was led by Mr. Kenneth G. Belbeck, the president of Stevenson & Kellogg, who served with the office of the Auditor General under an executive interchange agreement. Part of the planning capital acquisitions review included the project management of airport construction in the Department of Transport. Two airports, Calgary and Malton, were examined. Observations arising from these examinations will be found on pages 506 and 509 of the 1978 annual report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons. During the latter part of the study, a similar examination of the Mirabel Airport was started. However, after beginning the preliminary work it was concluded that no additional issues would be discovered and accordingly, further work was discontinued due to time and resource constraints.

ATCO STRUCTURES

Question No. 445—Mr. Epp:

1. Was Atco Structures awarded the contract for the RCMP detachment buildings at Baker Lake, Rankin Inlet and Eskimo Point?

2. Did Atco comply with the bid-depository regulations as set out by the Department of Public Works governing the tender and, if not, for what reason was Atco awarded the contract?

3. Did the Edmonton office refer the decision to Ottawa as to who should be awarded the contract since the Department clearly indicated that it had received two bids only, namely Ohms Construction and Arc Enterprises 1976 Ltd?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. Atco Structures was awarded three contracts on October 13, 1978 for three separate projects for the RCMP detachment buildings at Baker Lake, Rankin Inlet and Eskimo Point.

2. Atco Structures did comply with P.W.C. bid depository regulations.

3. The Edmonton office did refer the matter to departmental officials at headquarters in Ottawa who confirmed the decision that Atco Structures Ltd., would be awarded the three contracts as they had submitted the lowest valid tenders for each of the three projects. Three tenders were received, for each of the three projects, from (i) Arc Enterprises 1976 Ltd., (ii) Atco Structures Ltd., (iii) Ohms Construction Ltd., however, the tenders submitted by Ohms were disqualified because they were not accompanied by the required bid security.

RED CHINESE NAVY

Question No. 712—Mr. Jones:

1. Has Canada considered the presence of an emerging Red Chinese Navy a threat to our Western front?

2. Does Canada have any defences on the Western Front in order to handle the possibility of an invasion?

3. Can Canada rely on the help of NATO in such an occurrence?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. No.

2. A military capability on the Pacific and in the western region is maintained and operates in conjunction with the U.S.A. under the auspices of the CANUS agreement.

3. An attack on any member of the alliance demands a response by and assistance of other members to counter such action.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH CENTRE—BIRTH CONTROL

Question No. 972—Mr. Woolliams:

1. Does the Internationl Development Research Centre provide research on birth control methods?

2. What is the full extent of the financial reimbursement for such research to the present time?

3. For what reason do such expenditures not appear in the Centre's annual report?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. IDRC does not itself conduct research on birth control methods. It does, however, provide funds to other institutions for such research.

2. From 1971 to the end of 1978, $10,322,621.61 was committed by the centre to research projects in the following areas:

(a) development of new and improved contraceptive methods;

(b) short-time clinical trials to assess safety and acceptance of different contraceptive methods;

(c) long-term assessment of safety of contraceptive methods in different populations;

(d) small grants to researchers in the field of human reproduction following their return to developing country institutions after a period of specialized training outside their own countries; and,

(e) studies on family planning program administration, improved contraceptive distribution systems, and the use of different personnel for the delivery of family planning services.

3. Such expenditures do appear in the centre's annual reports.

EXAMINATION OF RESPIRATORY VIRAL DISEASE

Question No. 998—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence contract with the University of Alberta to conduct an examination of a respiratory viral disease at CFBs Comox and Alert for the sum of $33,537 and, if so (a) on what date will the examination be completed (b) will a report of such an examination be available to Members of Parliament?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes.

(a) 31 July, 1979.

(b) Yes.

PROTOTYPE SYSTEM FOR MOUNTAIN TERRAIN SUBSIDENCE

Question No. 1,020—Mr. Huntington:

1. What are the names of the companies, their addresses and the amounts of each bid on Department of Supply and Services File No. 18, SQ 23440-8-9016, "Design and/or adapt a prototype Measurement/Monitoring/Telemetry system for mountain terrain subsidence"?

2. Has a preliminary report been published and, if not, for what reason?

3. Has the contract been awarded and, if so, to whom?

4. Were there any technical changes in the parameters of the contract on a negotiated contract basis and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Contract negotiations are currently in progress and it is departmental policy to maintain proposals confidential until award of contract, at which time, all the proposers will be advised of the result.

2. No, the contract has not been let.

3. No.

4. No technical changes are contemplated affecting the requirements of the request for proposal.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-43, to amend the Judges Act, to amend an act to amend the Judges Act and to amend certain other acts in respect of the reconstitution in the courts of New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank the opposition parties for their co-operation in the consideration of this bill, Bill C-43. I hope that once we have heard from all parties on this bill we will get agreement to pass this bill through the three stages today in the House.

In effect, this bill, while urgent and extremely useful for a few provinces in particular, is one that should not give rise to long debates or arguments and differences of view on what it tries to achieve. The bill tries to accomplish two purposes. First, it would give effect to a restructuring of the courts systems in the provinces of New Brunswick and Alberta and a proposed restructuring in the province of Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Danson.]

Second, the bill would replenish the pool of judicial salaries provided for appointments to provincial superior, county and district courts over and above fixed complements.

The restructuring of the courts systems in the three provinces I have mentioned requires amendments to the Judges Act and a number of other statutes so that the restructuring can be given full effect. As is well known by hon. members, the provinces have full jurisdiction to determine what courts they will have. Alberta and New Brunswick have already exercised their jurisdiction in this respect and Saskatchewan is in the process of doing so.

If the House were to agree to proceed to the committee stage, I have an amendment to clause 12 which I will move at that time. I understand that that proposed amendment has been circulated to the opposition parties and they have it in their hands at present. It would be made as a result of a request made by the attorney general of New Brunswick, a request which I have just received today. The amendment would provide that the provisions relating to New Brunswick will come into force on proclamation, as opposed to July 1, 1979, as presently provided. The original provision in the bill for New Brunswick was that it should come into force in that province on July 1, 1979, but the attorney general of that province has just written me saying that they did not think they would be able to put it into effect on July 1 and would like it to be delayed and put into force on proclamation. Their expectation is that their legislation would be in operation on September 1.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question at this point? He said that in committee he would move an amendment to clause 12. There is no clause 12 in the reprint of the bill, although there was one in the previous printing. I assume he proposes to move an amendment to clause 11.

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, I quite agree, Mr. Speaker; the amendment is to clause 11.

As I said, the government of New Brunswick intends to pass legislation changing the effective date of the merger of the courts from July 1 to September 1, and this amendment is made at their request to facilitate their change in plans.

The second purpose of the bill is the restoration to full strength of the pool of additional judges, provisions first enacted by parliament in 1973. It is basically a housekeeping matter necessitated by the fact that 17 judicial appointments have been made and charged, so to speak, to the pool since it was last replenished by parliament in 1976. The proposal is to have the Judges Act itself indicate clearly the number of judges comprising each court and therefore the exact number of salaries approved by parliament, and at the same time bring the pool up to its full complement of 34 judicial salaries, plus another 15 for unified family courts, so that further appointments that are required can be made without the immediate necessity of amending the Judges Act.

In closing, I would again like to thank the opposition parties for their agreement to, and support of, this measure.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde). We have had several bills. That is not due to his error because like everyone else he has to rely on other people, and I will not make anything of that. But finally we have received the right version.

I can incorporate in my remarks what the minister has said about that bill, that is that the main purpose of the bill is to amalgamate the district courts of Saskatchewan, Alberta and New Brunswick with the high trial court, which in Alberta would mean the amalgamation of the district court of Alberta with the Supreme Court trial division, which henceforth will be known as the Queen's Bench, and in Saskatchewan it would amalgamate the district court of Saskatchewan with their Queen's Bench, which is their trial court. The same goes for New Brunswick. In the course of amalgamation, the district courts will disappear.

I want to emphasize that district court judges receive less remuneration than high court trial judges of the provinces. The question of salary is mentioned in the bill; it brings the salaries of district court judges up to the level of the new positions they will hold because of the amalgamation of the two courts. There is no suggestion in the bill that the salaries of judges are being increased. When the district court judges move into their new positions and are faced with the new responsibilities of the high court trial divisions of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and New Brunswick, then of course they would receive fair remuneration as set by law and parliament.

I should like to digress somewhat, or as they say in the army, "As you were".

Mr. Baldwin: At ease!

Mr. Woolliams: Right on. As was pointed out by the Minister of Justice, parliament previously set up a pool of salaries in reference to new appointments. Rather than coming to parliament each time a new appointment is necessary, particularly when parliament is busy dealing with complex matters, the pool of salaries is available. For example, if a provincial attorney general hears from the trial division chief justice and the Court of Appeal chief justice of his province that extra judges are needed to carry the workload, an appointment is made and a salary is paid out of that pool equivalent to the salary paid to judges as set out by parliament in the last bill before it. Of course, we endorse that pool.

If I might again digress for a few moments, I should like to indicate that we are dealing with an institution when we are dealing with the judiciary which sometimes receives criticism because of its independence. Judges must have a degree of independence because they are separate and apart, under our democratic system, from the legislative processes of parliament. Often they are criticized because of the degree of independence and the positions they take in administering justice. To put it in layman's language, they are criticized because of the roles they play in trying civil matters and indeed very difficult criminal matters. Of course, they are not able to answer such criticism.

I know I speak for the Minister of Justice when I indicate in a non-partisan manner that on the whole Canada has a very fine judiciary. Of course, I am not speaking for everyone and, as I say, I am not speaking in a partisan manner. I am speaking from the point of view of all parties working together and the liaison existing among the various provincial bar associations and the Canadian Bar Association. In the last 10 or 15 years, the judiciary has been able to obtain people from various law firms or those who were deans of colleges. The judiciary has attracted a calibre of men who have the capacity to make decisions and administer justice. Canadians feel that this calibre of men is necessary.

I should like to take a moment to pay tribute to a man in my own province who has retired as chief justice of the province of Alberta. I am referring to Chief Justice J. Valentine Milvain who was appointed to the Supreme Court trial division of Alberta by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). After serving some time on that bench with distinction, Mr. Milvain was appointed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government to chief justice of the province of Alberta. In drawing that analogy and in paying this gentleman a great compliment, I have shown that we have endeavoured to move along the road away from the narrow, partisan belief that only people of certain political stripes, if that certain political party is in power, get the nod and receive an appointment to the bench. We have not gone as far as we can in that direction, but it is a step in the right direction.

I might say that I knew Chief Justice Valentine Milvain when he was practising as a lawyer and before he went on the bench. He was always very courteous. After he received his appointment, he was always very discreet, polite, knowledgeable, learned and was quite a humanist. Above all, he had a sense of humour. For example, when a most difficult trial was taking place before him with questions being put and answers being given, as we have witnessed from time to time during oral question period, sometimes the atmosphere became somewhat inflammatory. He was a judge with a sense of humour and he would bring the lawyers either for the defence or the Crown, or for the plaintiff or the defendant, back to the degree of reasonable sanity which is necessary in the administration of justice. I know I speak for members of the House when I wish Chief Justice Val Milvain well in his retirement. I can say that Alberta is sorry to see this man being forced into retirement because of his age. I only mention this in passing because I feel the gentleman is symbolic of the types of people who are being attracted to the judiciary.

Traditionally bills respecting salary increases are brought before parliament for approval. Judges are not overpaid by any means. Many of them give up law practices in which they would make twice as much money as they make on the bench. I could name many such judges but I will not. We must exercise care to see that these men and women receive the necessary compensation to exercise the degree of independence and the degree of integrity demanded of them. Not only must they remain aloof in their jobs; they must keep their powers separate and apart from the other processes of democracy.

Also they must keep their economic affairs separate and apart because of their position. Most of them are not able to make investments in corporations A and B because corporations A and B come before them tomorrow in a law suit. In analysing the compensation paid to judges, we must take a hard look at the position they hold in society. Because they are judges, they are judging people and corporations. They are judging morals and the law, which flow from the morals set by the Criminal Code. They must remain aloof from any outside influence which would suggest any indiscretion on their part in making decisions. On the whole, I think I can safely say, after looking over the judiciary, that that has been accomplished.

I should like to say a few words in reference to the amalgamation of the courts. In my early years I had the privilege of practising in the province of Saskatchewan, and later I went to the province of Alberta. When it came to the high court, one was called the Queen's Bench and the other was called the Supreme Court trial court. Although they were named differently, they were almost identical.

This bill is not being produced today because the government decided to amalgamate the courts and the Minister of Justice accepted that direction, but rather because the federal government has received a mandate or a direction from the provincial governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick.

In our busy society of today, with an increase in population and because of the heavy court backlog in some provinces, it has become necessary to increase the number of judges. It was felt that in some districts the district court judges had the capacity to do more work and to take on more responsibility. The district courts in Saskatchewan and Alberta have pretty well the same jurisdiction. They deal with mechanics' lien act cases and with matters involving amounts up to $2,500, although that has fluctuated up to $3,500 in one province. Under the Criminal Code these courts deal with speedy trials when an accused elects to do without a jury. Sometimes they involve pleas of guilty or the hearing of a few witnesses. In these cases the accused elect to have a speedy trial and go before the district court judge. This relieves the pressure of a large number of trials in the high court.

District courts also deal with an important part of criminal law, trials de novo, and I want to say something about this. Under the code offences which are not indictable, generally not serious offences, are summary conviction offences and are tried by the provincial court judges. They used to be called magistrates in police courts, but they changed the name because it was felt the judges were too close to the police. I do not know whether by changing the name they altered the atmosphere, but one thing I do know is that they now call them provincial judges and they deal with summary conviction cases.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

If a person found guilty in such a court feels aggrieved, or on the other hand if the Crown thinks an individual was wrongly acquitted, the case can then go before a district judge by way of a trial de novo. Up until two years ago that meant a district court judge would re-try the case by hearing witnesses for the Crown and for the defence, and most of the time they were the same witnesses. Two years ago that was changed so that the district court judge could use discretion as to whether there would be a full trial or just a review of the matter through the record.

I pointed out at the time the amendment was made that every district court judge enjoying that discretion would almost always elect to proceed by way of a review of the record because it is much easier and much simpler. As the Minister of Justice and other lawyers present who have had this experience are aware, there is no appeal from a wrong finding of fact, only an appeal on a question of law. In most cases of summary conviction offences there is very little law involved so appeals are not very successful under this new method. I opposed this at the time and I still oppose it because, while there has been an improvement in the last few years, during the period when these courts were known as police courts the Crown was always very close to the police and it was very difficult to obtain what would appear to be—and sometimes it was more than that—an impartial trial. Once you got the case out of that atmosphere and into the district court, you got a more fair and better trial.

I would presume that when the two courts are united the same situation will occur. There will no longer be a trial de novo as such but rather a review of the evidence. As there is no appeal possible on the law it will make a sham of the right of appeal in this regard.

I am concerned about another thing, and this is not by way of criticizing the minister or his bill. This is a matter really involving the provinces. I refer to the question of estates. In the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan the district courts administer estates in the right to grant probate. Just to put it simply, and application for probate is generally made by a solicitor, setting out the assets with affidavits of witnesses proving the will and so on. This is laid before the judge and there is no application as such. These documents are looked at and examined in an administrative fashion. If there does not appear to be any mathematical error or question about the full disclosure of children, or something of that nature, probate is automatically granted. This surrogate court work really falls within the jurisdiction of provinces rather than the federal government.

For a number of years district court judges have received extra salaries from the provinces over and above what they were paid by the federal government for doing this surrogate court work. I do not know what the Supreme Court trial judges who took on that job before amalgamation are going to say about becoming local administrators of estates.

Let me make a suggestion to the Minister of Justice through you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps he could pass this on when he is writing the attorneys general of those provinces. This work could be given to somebody who is on the provincial staffs taking these applications in the courts, such as a master in chambers, or something like that. I cannot believe that with the extensive work now being done by the high court trial judges in Saskatchewan, Alberta and New Brunswick—and I understand Ontario is to be phased in—they should be involved in this administrative work. This administration work does take some time, but it does not require the services of anyone other than an efficient clerk. In fact, let me make a confession on behalf of lawyers. I would say that 90 per cent of estates that go through a law firm are handled by experienced secretaries. The lawyer looks at the work to make sure it is all right, puts on his signature and it goes to the court house. I would not like to go that far in respect of mortgages, but I have been lucky to have had the same secretary for almost as long as I have practised and I think she knows more than a lot of lawyers. She does an excellent job. I am sure that if I did it I would probably make a mathematical error. The point I am making is that this is straight administrative work. I suggest that is one matter that could be removed from the jurisdiction of the high courts. Of course, that is up to the provinces.

Having said that, let me end on this note. On behalf of my party I have agreed that this bill should be the subject of a short debate on second reading, which is now taking place, and then referred to the committee of the whole House. There is apparently no contention, so it possibly could be given third reading today. I hope my learned counsel to the left will go along with that in his usual good humour. If the bill is referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, along with the referendum bill and the estimates, I do not think it will see the light of day before we have a new government; therefore, I suggest it should go to the committee of the whole. There should be no discussion and it ought to go through in a few minutes.

I am willing now to sit down and listen to the leading counsel in the House, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have had some delightful and some embarrassing introductions in my day, but I do not know what I can say in reply, to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), except that I am happy to participate for a few minutes in the debate on Bill C-43.

The motion you put at the beginning of this debate, Mr. Speaker, called for the reference of this bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I am happy to indicate to you that we are prepared to go along with the request of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) and the agreement expressed by the hon. member for Calgary North. I agree that when it comes time to give second reading to this bill the motion should be amended so that the bill will go to a committee of the whole House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), but the minister did not give an indication that he was ready to proceed. If he is we will modify the motion, with the consent of the House, and go in to committee of the whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I believe you will find, Mr. Speaker, that although the Minister of Justice did not say that when he presented the motion, he did say it in the course of his remarks. I think you will find that there is agreement. We join in that agreement, partly for the reason just given by the hon. member for Calgary North, namely that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is overloaded with work, and partly because the matters contained in Bill C-43 are routine. They are quite straight forward and I see no reason why we cannot deal with them today in committee of the whole.

I hope that the government House leader will be made aware of our co-operation in this respect and that the favour will be returned on occasion. After all, there are some pieces of legislation which we on this side of the House would like to put through quickly. For example, in the field of veterans affairs, just as we are ready today to put this bill through all stages, we would hope that the government would give us a chance to put some veterans legislation through all stages before this session comes to an end.

As the two previous speakers have pointed out, there are two main provisions in this bill. On the one hand it increases the number of judges which can be appointed to the courts at various levels to cope with the workload facing our courts; on the other hand it provides for the amalgamation of certain courts in Alberta, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick. I think it is relevant to note, particularly in the latter case, that we are simply responding to requests from the various provinces which are affected, and that it is appropriate for us to see that this legislation does not get bogged down.

My friend from Calgary North said some nice things about the judiciary. I do not intend to expand on the subject at length, but I am happy to confirm what he said. In fact, I can say that in my experience in this House I have seen some very partisan members of parliament get appointed to the bench, and I have always been amazed at the metamorphosis that takes place, almost overnight, once they get into the responsible position of being on the bench. They seem quickly to develop a capacity for fairness and impartiality, and I hope that it will continue that way. I join with my friend in the tribute which he paid to our Canadian judiciary.

My hon. friend also had something to say about the salaries of judges, although there is no provision in this bill to increase those salaries. That brings me to something which I would like to say about the explanatory notes in the bill as it is now before us. The hon. member for Calgary North made the point with regard to the salaries of judges that many lawyers could make more money staying in their law practices than they can by taking a position on the bench. That, of course, is their decision. I believe that many of them welcome the chance to be appointed to the bench because of the contribution which they can make and because of the prestige of the position. In other words, the salary is not everything.

Mr. Paproski: It is like members of parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right; the salary is not everything in either case. Since at the present time restraint is being preached, especially to the little people, I think that it would have been a gross error for the government to ask us to include salary increases for the judges in passing this bill. As a matter of fact, if that had happened there would not be consent to put it through all stages at this time.

I hope I am not saying anything out of order or talking out of school when I say that this matter has been discussed. Indeed, there is evidence of it in the two printings of this bill. We have Bill C-43 which was given first reading on February 22, 1979, and then a few days later we were given a reprint of Bill C-43. The reprinted copy left out the clause which provided for a salary increase in addition to what had been provided in certain other clauses.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am the last one who would want to raise a point of order with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but since he is embarking on this question of the two printings of the bill, I would like to inform the House—although, more properly, it should probably come from the Chair—that the bill to which the Speaker gave first reading in this House is the bill that is before us today.

I understand that when the bill was sent to printing an error was made. The printer used the wrong plates and, as a result, a bill was distributed which was not the bill to which the speaker actually gave first reading. In that sense, the bill with the salary clause, which the hon. member has in his hands, never existed before the House as such. It is a non-existent bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am quite happy to accept that explanation, Mr. Speaker. I was not raising a point of order or alleging that a non-existent bill is before the House. I accept the fact that the bill before us is the one which has "reprint" at the top.

The point I was trying to make is that obviously there had been some consideration in this regard. After all, this non-existent bill does exist, if I may speak in existential rather than legal terms. I am glad that any suggestion of salary increase has disappeared from the various printings of the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: You can always send your salary back, Stanley. I have told you that for years. I will take care of the legal ramifications.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By the time I got through dealing with my friend, there would not be much money left to worry about.

Mr. Woolliams: That would relieve your anxiety.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): It would also relieve his pocket book!

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have found other and better ways to relieve that anxiety. I am glad that we are passing today the bill and not the explanatory notes. The Minister of Justice points out that it was the corrected form which was handed in for first reading, but if one goes through the bill and reads the explanatory notes, it is obvious that they were written with something else in mind, and when the bill got changed these explanatory notes were not changed.

As a matter of fact, this bothered me at the House leaders' meeting this morning when the question of going into committee of the whole on this bill was raised, because I was aware of the confusion created by the explanatory notes, and I therefore felt that the bill ought to go to the standing committee. Since then, after getting advice from certain learned counsel, I have examined the bill very carefully, and although, as I say, the explanatory notes lead to much confusion and make one wonder what is being explained, I do not find any trouble with the actual wording of the 11 clauses in the bill itself. Accordingly, we are prepared not only to give the bill second reading, but to agree that it be referred to a committee of the whole House.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I see that there are a few minutes left before one o'clock. There are some things that I would like to say about the bill, most of which will be acceptable, but I may have one or two things to say which may not be quite so acceptable. Generally, I favour the bill for a number of reasons.

Approximately 25 years ago I was a bencher of the Law Society of Alberta. This particular issue involving the joinder of the two courts is a matter in which I was involved and on which I spoke at several meetings of the Alberta Bar Association. I think the judgment of the government with regard to carrying forward the submissions made by the government of Alberta is very wise. I believe I have also spoken on this matter in this House.

As a member of the bar who practised for a great many years in rural areas, I know there was often a feeling among many people that an inferior type of justice was dispensed at the district court level. I know that many members of the district court, which has become the court of Queen's Bench in Alberta, were fine people, and I subscribe to the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) as to the quality of the bench. There was one judge whom we used to call "the judge of necessity," because there is an ancient maxim that necessity knows no law. He was one of the exceptions, however.

There was a feeling among many people that there was a choice between going to district court or to Supreme Court, but actually this is dictated by the amount of the claim in a suit for damages.

Because of the inequality that exists in the justice dispensed by the different courts, I think the move to amend the act is commendable and should have been done long ago. I am happy to lend my support to the bill, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to subscribe as well to the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North about former Chief Justice Milvain, who is a very old friend of mine. We served together as benchers. He has followed a great tradition in the province of Alberta.

When I come to write my memoirs I will include the fact that the late Prime Minister Pearson did me the honour of inviting me to go to the bench. I declined because at the time I thought I had a more useful role to perform here, although I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) smilingly queries that.

I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that there are a number of statutes under which the federal government has the right to initiate proceedings, one being the Official Secrets Act. One of the shocking things about it, however, is the matter of selection of judges to try a case.

In the recent Treu case there was a very serious, formidable charge and the minister of justice of the day, on the advice of his officials—I absolve the present Minister of Justice entirely as he was not involved—saw fit to direct that the party be tried before a provincial judge. I have nothing against the quality of provincial judges, Mr. Speaker, but I am given to understand that the judge in question had just recently been appointed. The charge was laid on the instructions of the minister of justice who, as attorney general, exercises a judicial function under the Official Secrets Act. When the question whether a charge should be laid arises, then in theory the minister of justice is no longer a politician but has to exercise a judicial function.

Because of the formidable character of this act, because of the severe penalties involved, because of the type of procedure that might well be involved in carrying on proceedings, no charge can be made until the minister of justice has an opportunity to survey the facts and decide, on the advice of senior officials and security people, whether a charge should be laid and, if so, what kind of charge. The charge can be laid as an indictable offence with the potential of a very severe penalty, or as a summary offence with the potential of a fine.

In the case in question, the minister of justice, no doubt on the advice of his officials, saw fit to instruct that the charge be laid as an indictable offence to be heard before a provincial court judge who, it happened, had limited experience. I do not question the capacity of the judge; I understand he had been a Crown prosecutor shortly before his appointment. My view is that a minister of justice, theoretically standing apart from his colleagues in the political sense and making that kind of decision, should exercise a great deal more care than did the then minister of justice in the case of Peter Treu.

The minister has said that a group of departmental officials is reviewing this act. I hope they will keep in mind that most judges in this country and in the United Kingdom who have had occasion to try cases involving the Official Secrets Act have not only tried the people appearing before them but have tried the act and found it guilty. Most have held that the act requires very severe changes to be made to it.

I hope that the minister, in the time that elapses before this parliament comes to a conclusion, or whoever may follow him as minister of justice, will take it as a prior order of business that not only should there be an examination of the act by departmental officials, but also by a committee of parliament. The act does not deserve to survive in its present form. This is tremendously important, Mr. Speaker.

I am one of the few people outside those involved in the Treu case who know the facts. I was co-counsel for Dr. Treu and had access to information. I looked at the evidence and I thoroughly agree with the fine judgment of the three judges of the Quebec Court of Appeal. I think anyone who reads the reasons for judgment carefully will agree that there are grave dangers in allowing that act to be used, for charges to be laid under the conditions which existed in the case of Dr. Treu, and for his being charged before a provincial judge.

I am fully convinced that once there had been a fruitless investigation leading to the expenditure of several hundreds of thousands of dollars, Dr. Treu stood as a symbol of the stupidity and bumbling involved. I do not suggest this occurred at the ministerial level. I do not believe that the former minister is that kind of man. But a decision was made at some place to see that this man was put out of the way for a while. That is the grave danger which exists and it points out the necessity for the government to be careful in the appointments that are made and in the way its powers are used to initiate proceedings involving statutes such as the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is it agreed that I seek consent to change the motion for second reading so that by unanimous consent the bill may be referred to committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Does the House wish that I call it one o'clock and proceed with second reading when we come back at two o'clock? Otherwise I could go into committee.

• (1300)

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, with unanimous consent, referred to committee of the whole.

The Chairman: The House now in committee of the whole to consider Bill C-43, to amend the Judges Act, to amend an act to amend the Judges Act and to amend certain other acts in respect of the reconstitution of the courts in New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Shall clause 1 carry?

An hon. Member: One o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock, the committee took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

On clause 1—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, what I am about to say I could have said on the second reading debate before lunch, but I wanted to add to the assurance given to the Minister of Justice that it was our intention to deal with this bill expeditiously and thought I would add to that assurance by speaking first on the consideration of clause 1.

One might wonder why a lawyer from Ontario who is a member of the House of Commons would speak with regard to the amalgamation of federal trial courts in the provinces of Alberta, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan. However, the subject matter is really important. The bill is important because of the provinces involved, but it is equally important and applicable to my own province of Ontario—and I will deal further with that aspect in a few moments.

My hon. friend from Peace River said something modestly or else my hearing was modest; if he did not say it, it should have been said. That is that the proposal set out in this piece of legislation was put forward by him when he was a bencher of the Law Society of Alberta some 25 years ago because it has been the quest of those interested in judicial matters to bring some order into and continue the development of order in the legal system.

What this bill really provides is that the trial division of what I would call the high court in the province of Ontario, the trial division in those three provinces, would be amalgamated with the district court, not necessarily by an increase in the number of judges, though there would certainly be an increase paid generally for judges' salaries. I think the objective is worth while and I commend the minister for bringing this measure forward.

I said this was important to me, to the bench and to the bar in the province of Ontario and I want to explain that statement to the minister. We have in this province two levels of courts, three if you count the small claims court and four if you count the provincial court. But with federally appointed judges there are two levels of trial courts, the High Court of Justice trial division and the county and district courts. The history and evolution of our society, increasing the monetary jurisdiction and increasing the subject matter jurisdiction of the courts, have imposed upon the county and district courts of Ontario and upon the judges of those courts a tremendous burden by way of extra workload. Therefore, I hope that through the message of this bill the attorney general of Ontario will cause to be reviewed once again the proposals of the report of the Law Reform Commission of Ontario issued in 1973, a really monumental work with respect to the administration of justice within the province.

A proposal was presented to that very distinguished commission by the County and District Court Judges Association. The proposal was considered by the commission. It asked for precisely the same kind of thing which is now granted by this bill to the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick. In its proposal the County and District Court Judges Association laid out what a judicial system is supposed to do in society. I am reading from page 92 of the report as follows:

> Modern society requires a judicial system which, without being exhaustive, possesses the following characteristics: (1) Reasonable expedition in the determination of litigants' disputes, (2) Economy for both the litigants and society, (3) Accessibility to all members of society irrespective of their means or station in life, (4) Volume-handling ability to accommodate the litigation explosion corresponding, not only with increased population, but also with increased accessibility and justiciability of new grievances, (5) Comprehensibility of the system to the public for whose needs it exists and (6) "Justice" of the decisions in the sense of confidence among all members and sectors of society in the competence of the decision-makers and quality of their decisions.

I think those are not bad criteria for anyone to consider in terms of what ought to motivate one when one is considering the construction of a judicial system. I point out that the judges were supported by the Ontario Sheriffs' and Court Registrars' Association, which is involved closely with the dispensation of justice and legal services to the citizens of the province of Ontario, in that that association advocated the union of the Supreme Court of Ontario trial division and the county and district courts of the province of Ontario into one superior court for the purposes of hearing trials, and I will deal with how that term specifically arose.

It is a matter of some misfortune and regret that while the government of Ontario adopted a large number of the administrative procedures which were laid out in that excellent, monumental and exhaustive report, for some reason which I cannot discern the government of Ontario chose not to adopt this plan with respect to the union of the courts. I do not say that in criticism. I know there was great pressure from the judges of the high court of the province of Ontario not to have this done, for reasons with which I respectfully dissent and disagree. However, it did not happen in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Woolliams: We are wiser in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member for Calgary North says they are wiser in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and that may very well be, I do not know. I would not want to admit that today. It is Friday afternoon and I will not argue very strenuously with the hon. member on that point.

Because finding candidates for the bench is important, I want to let the Minister of Justice know that there was a memorandum of dissent and explanation filed by a member of the Law Reform Commission who at one time was a member of this House. The Hon. Richard Albert Bell, P.C., Q.C., was a member of the House of Commons from 1957 until 1968 with one period of time out of the House while he returned to the practice of law. I willingly tell my friends in this House that that gentleman happens to be the senior partner of the law firm with which I am associated. I feel it would be inappropriate for me not to say that, having regard to the provisions of Bill C-6 which we might get to at some stage.

That dissenting view which, unfortunately, was not accepted, did involve the amalgamation of the trial division of the high court and the county and district courts, but it did something else too. The memorandum of dissent and explanation also advocated that for judicial purposes the province of Ontario should be divided up into a number of judicial districts so that judges would then be judges having the same jurisdiction. Mr. Bell proposed that they be called judges of the superior court and that they not have to move around to any great extent, which is quite important in terms of the life of a judge. The memorandum of dissent and explanation advocated within each of those districts a small hierarchy so that there could be a president or a chief judge within each of those districts.

That is important to the Minister of Justice because he is responsible for making recommendations, too, and joins his colleagues in cabinet in the decision-making process to decide who among the barristers in a particular province will join the federally appointed court of that province. I have talked to people who have been invited but who have declined, and some do, as the minister knows. One of the reasons they decline is that if one is to follow the law of the province—and there is some doubt as to whether all our high court judges do in terms of residence—one must uproot one's family and move to Toronto. That may be a very happy thing for the hon. member for Rosedale but it is sometimes unhappy for the families of judges. Judges must leave the communities in which they have taken an active part for many years and hive themselves off in Osgoode Hall.

If the judges involved are trial judges, they devote the rest of their lives to travelling in the province of Ontario. That is a very happy thing when one does it under happy circumstances. It is not always the best thing, however, when it has to be considered among a host of other things one might do. I think the adoption of this proposal would make the profession of judge one which would be easier to consider for highly qualified lawyers. That is one of the reasons it was regretted by me and by Mr. Bell that the commission did not see fit to adopt that proposal. It is very extensive and I commend its reading to the Minister of Justice.

There was one other important aspect. Despite the work of chief judges at all levels, but particularly at the levels about which we are talking, justice has been slow. Some of that slowness is to be blamed on the system, particularly on the perambulations of judges across the province of Ontario—and, I suspect, in other provinces as well—because of the necessity to accommodate the public and the legal profession. I would be the last to say that a great deal of the blame does not lie with the legal profession, which has not been as expeditious as it might.

I think it is important that we look at the formation of the court, its functions and its administration from the point of view not necessarily of the judges or their convenience or of lawyers or their convenience but, rather, from the point of view of the public and the convenience of the public. I commend that to the Minister of Justice.

I am aware of constitutional problems with regard to the administration of justice, but I cannot help but feel that with the prestige of the Minister of Justice there might be some way by which this matter could be reawakened.

A constituent of mine, a Mrs. Mary Herron—who was in this chamber just before two o'clock, as a matter of fact, as guest of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris—from the community of Glencairn in the new city of Kanata, and who happens to be a nurse at the Civic hospital, said something to me when we were discussing the subject matter of the bill before us today, something which I think is important. She said "slow justice is not justice". I think that is a good phrase for all of us to remember, and it falls on the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Attorney General of Canada to look at procedures by which not only administrations improve but justice within a province is improved.

I want to turn to one other aspect. I said that the high court judges of the province of Ontario were not happy with the proposal of district courts and in fact spoke against it at the commission hearings. They said they would be abandoning the collegiality of Osgoode Hall. There is a certain collegiality at Osgoode Hall which would be lost, they said.

I suppose there are ways that could be remedied for those high court judges. I am sure that opinion is one they honestly hold, but what has happened and what can happen—and this is something which I think one should always guard against—is that the system and the judges within the system can lose their sense of collegiality with the community. I suggest to you, sir, that moving the courts into the community to a greater extent and amalgamating the jurisdictions could accomplish great things.

While the Minister of Justice is in the committee I want to turn to one other matter which was raised by the hon. member for Peace River, and I will do it briefly. It is very important when we consider the position of the Minister of Justice that we realize he is also a judicial officer, as the hon. member for Peace River said. There is built into our system a potential conflict of interest. Not only can the person who occupies the position of minister of justice find himself in a conflict of interest position, but there can appear to be a conflict of interest.

As we develop certain other things, we will have to consider the breaking up of the responsibilities of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice is a member of the government who is responsible for the maintenance of the operation of his department. He could be a constitutional adviser to his colleagues and to the Prime Minister. He has line responsibilities to the government which are very important. Those responsibilities might not coincide with his quasi-judicial function as Attorney General of Canada, and it is important, I think, that we consider the direction in which we are going.

The joint committee on statutory instruments is now considering a way of examining the regulatory power of governments as it falls from each statute, so that when there is a reference from this House to a particular standing committee of the House, there is a parallel reference of the power to make orders in council and statutory instruments to the joint committee to be considered. If this occurs, we will be calling upon the advice of the Attorney General, a judicial officer or quasi-judicial officer who, as the hon. member for Peace River would say, should stand apart from his colleagues in government. Not that a minister of justice personally would not attempt to stand apart, but that the Minister of Justice, now dubbed Attorney General, would be seen to stand apart from the line functions of the government.

This question was raised the other day when we were considering the application of the human rights code which this parliament passed with respect to immigration. The Minister of Justice is a colleague of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and as his colleague he has responsibility for the joint decision of the government, and all ministers are in that bag, even though from time to time one or two of them attempt to get out of it. There can arise out of that a case which could put the Minister of Justice in a difficult situation—

The Chairman: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member; the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thank my colleagues. I will speak only for a minute or two more.

The other area into which we are moving is the law with respect to freedom of information upon which decisions will have to be made and advice given to the executive, not on the basis of membership in the government but perhaps on the basis of advice to the government from an independent quasi-judicial authority.

Finally, there is the matter which was raised by the hon. member for Calgary North which I think should be addressed, and that is the appointment of Her Majesty's judges. There has been a movement, which some see as a healthy movement, toward using consultation in areas outside the government. I consider it terribly unhealthy.

There are some in society who feel that perhaps the function of appointment, and therefore ultimately the responsibility for the appointment of Her Majesty's judges, should be undertaken by someone other than the Minister of Justice. I caution the minister that while it would be foolish for him not to consult the Canadian Bar Association and perhaps judges and the community, it would be equally foolish for him to give the impression in the excellent appointments that have been made—and, I am confident, will be made, regardless of what party forms the government—that the Minister of Justice be seen to have removed from himself or from the government of the day the ultimate responsibility for these appointments. Certainly he should consult, but not to such an extent that the appointment of Her Majesty's judges is seen to be taken away from the government of the day. I think it is one of the most important functions that a government performs.

I want to thank my colleagues in the House for indulging with me in the last two minutes or so and allowing me to complete those thoughts which I wanted to pass on today to the minister.

• (1430)

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief but I do think it is important to bring up a point which has always concerned me since I was elected to the House of Commons almost 11 years ago. Hon. members had the opportunity of considering that matter during the last session when we studied and passed Bill C-42 amending the Criminal Code and introduced a new section dealing with the language of the accused. Its purpose was, of course, to make our courts more humane, to ensure that, to the greatest possible extent at this juncture in Canadian history, the chosen official language of the accused is respected. So, the House proceeded to adopt those amendments thanks to which the accused, whether Francophone or Anglophone in Canada, no matter where he lives, now has a better chance of being heard and judged in the official language of his choice. However, I have always wondered why in an effort towards reform such as this, we did not go directly to the root of the problem.

I note that the bill before us today, Bill C-43, does not make any mention of being able to carry out a judge's duties in either of the two official languages of this country. Yet the hon. member who spoke before me quoted abundantly from a survey made in the province of Ontario and he said among other things that access of all members of society was an important factor in the delivery of legal services in this country.

So I am not trying to delay this bill unduly by raising this question. I represent in the parliament of Canada a group which is constantly concerned that justice be dealt fully for all Canadian citizens regardless of where they live in Canada. I am still curious and I would like to get an answer—how is it that in this proposed reform no mention is made of the languages of judges? I am not saying that judges in Canada, regardless of the province in which they reside, should be bilingual to qualify. Far from it, Mr. Chairman, that is not what I am trying to get in a Canada which wants to remain united.

I believe the judiciary, starting with the judges themselves, should have at least that capacity. Individually, perhaps not, but generally I believe this country should guarantee that kind of representation. I note in the proposed constitutional reform, if one also refers to the constitution as it stands now, that it says a certain number of judges should originate from Quebec and other provinces. There is no question of language there as far as I know. I am not as learned as many members of this House who have a legal background, nevertheless I am talking for the man on the street, if I may put it that way. I am talking for the official language minorities, particularly French language minorities which always feel that their rights are being shortchanged. And in spite of the good will shown when Bill C-42 was considered, I believe progress is excessively slow in the provision of that fundamental justice in the delivery of legal services to all Canadians. Mr. Chairman, since I address myself to this particular aspect of the bill, the minister could perhaps take this opportunity to tell us what progress has been made since the passage last year of Bill C-42 concerning the language used by the accused with a view to ensuring greater justice throughout the country in the provision of French language services to the accused, or English language services if they live in Quebec of course.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a few words in reply to the hon. member concerning the matter he has just raised.

First of all, I do not believe that the Judges Act as such would be the proper instrument to attack these problems. Other means have been found. As the hon. member stated, certain amendments have already been made to the Criminal Code to encourage the provinces to provide trials in one or the other of the official languages according to the choice of the accused as concerns criminal matters. Moreover, the hon. member is probably aware that during our constitutional discussions with the provinces concerning a human rights charter which would include linguistic rights, it was specifically provided that the provinces would be invited in this charter to guarantee to all their citizens the right to be heard in either official language, even in matters other than of a criminal nature. I am speaking about civil cases which come within provincial jurisdiction. I would also like to emphasize that enormous progress has been made concerning the ability of judges to speak and understand both official languages of Canada at the present time.

My department has financed a linguistic training program for judges which has been very useful. At the present time we can say, for instance, that on the whole the Supreme Court of Canada can operate very well in both official languages, that the Federal Court of Canada can also operate in both official languages, and I would like to mention simply the new chief justice of the provincial court, namely the Supreme Court of Alberta, Mr. Justice Sinclair, who, thanks to these courses, can now speak perfectly in both languages and can express himself in a French which many French-speaking Canadians would envy.

Tremendous progress has been made, first by judges individually, second through amendments to the Criminal Code and, third, through the discussions taking place with the provinces concerning a linguistic rights charter. Finally, as concerns the appointment or the selection of judges, obviously the first criterion must be their juridical competence. Of course, if we need a judge for northern New Brunswick, we will try to appoint someone who is fluent in both official languages. The same situation prevails in some areas of Ontario and in the province of Quebec, of course, it is required by the constitution. The constitution does not require that every judge speak both languages but in Quebec you can be tried in the official language of your choice.

Now then, as concerns the specific question raised by the hon. member about the amendment made to the Criminal Code last year, there are continuous consultations with the provinces involved, particularly the province of Ontario, the province of New Brunswick, the province of Quebec, where it exists already, and I must say that remarkable progress has been made in Ontario in the last year. I cannot tell the hon. member exactly when those provinces will pass the proposed amendment. Recently we have had some administrative difficulties, perfectly understandable, having the staff required for the training courses at a given place, or a given date, so that the system may really work.

I can say without hesitation that the provinces which have sizeable official language minorities have made a lot of efforts and progress in that area since last year, and that the provincial ministers of justice concerned gave me full co-operation on this. I think that the will of parliament in that regard was very clearly expressed last year and that the attorneys general and the provincial ministers of justice gave us continuous co-operation in order to offer to their citizens the services which are provided for in that piece of legislation. So I think we can make substantial progress and that the provinces indicated very clearly and strongly their intention to continue in that direction and their wish to have those amendments to the Criminal Code proclaimed as soon as they will be in a position to offer all the services to their citizens. So we are really making considerable progress in that direction at the present time.

Clauses 1 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Lalonde: I should like to move an amendment, seconded by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen):

That Bill C-43, an act to amend the Judges Act, to amend an act to amend the Judges Act and to amend certain other acts in respect of the reconstitution of the courts in New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan, be amended in clause 11:

(a) by striking out line 2 on page 5 and substituting the following:

"subsections (2), (3) and (4), this Act shall come"

(b) by adding the following immediately after line 4 on page 6:

New Brunswick

"(4) Section 3 and subsections 7(2) and 8(1), and section 10 in so far as it relates to the Province of New Brunswick, shall come into force on a day, not earlier than July 1, 1979, to be fixed by proclamation."

Mr. Woolliams: We agree.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree but we would like to see it.

Amendment (Mr. Lalonde) agreed to.

Clause 11 as amended agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed now to third reading of the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carried on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-29, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to continue the debate on Bill C-29, from where we left off yesterday, at which time I was addressing certain remarks on the value, merit, or demerit if you like, of mortgage interest deductibility schemes and schemes to provide deduction for real estate taxes in terms of stimulating the housing industry in this country.

I had pointed out that a number of us, a bipartisan parliamentary group, had conducted a fairly in-depth analysis of the experience of our neighbours in the United States in this particular area. I should like very briefly to reiterate that no positive decision to introduce mortgage interest deductibility or real estate tax deductibility as a policy matter has ever been adopted in the United States. It is part, if you like, of the basic structure of the U.S. revenue system, having existed since 1913 and extending not only to real estate taxes but to other local taxes, and extending not only to mortgage interest but to all interest. Therefore, I think it is important for us to recognize, when comparing our situation in Canada to that of our U.S. neighbours, that no option has ever existed in recent years for the United States to introduce such a scheme. The only option has been, of course, to withdraw such a scheme.

We were advised by all observers in the United States that the elimination of this particular provision of the law would be impossible, for a number of reasons which are quite obvious. First of all, many people who have purchased homes are, of course, dependent upon mortgage financing and upon the deductibility of interest associated with those mortgages. Basically they are in the position where the withdrawal of that benefit at this point could have severe personal economic consequences, not to speak, of course, of the very serious political difficulties of withdrawing a plan which is supported by a large number of home owners in the United States.

It was our experience, and I believe this was mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) in the course of a number of her comments both inside and outside the House, that privately many individuals whom she had encountered supported mortgage interest deductibility because they personally found it beneficial. I can assure the House that the same would be true in this country. I can think of nothing more attractive for many Canadian home owners, myself included, than to have the benefit of being able to deduct the interest which we pay on our mortgages and the real estate taxes we pay to our municipalities. That would be the personal preference, I am sure, of a wide cross-section of Canadians, and maybe of many members of this House.

When it comes to an issue of this importance, I suggest that the public interest must be placed ahead of our own personal interests here as individuals and as parliamentarians. We must look at this kind of plan in terms of what it can provide to Canadians in meeting certain fiscal, social and economic objectives.

What are those objectives? I analyse the objectives of any scheme of this kind as falling essentially into three categories. One, of course, is the social objective which has been put forward, namely, that of stimulating home ownership. As I indicated in the course of my remarks last night, we could probably find unanimity on that objective as being a desirable one for Canadians. It would also be a social objective to assist people to improve their housing accommodation and perhaps obtain some relief from the care and costs of housing accommodation. Those I would put in the area of social objectives which I believe are really germane to this debate on Bill C-29.

The fiscal objectives of any plan should be to provide a more efficient, effective and, above all, equitable tax structure. When I think of equity in terms of the tax structure—and I am sure that members of the opposition will agree with me—I think of creating as much neutrality in the tax system as possible. That is, people in the same financial circumstances should bear the same amount of tax.

Finally, there is an over-all economic objective which has been put forward in support of this kind of scheme, namely that it would provide some stimulus to the economy by increasing home construction, home purchasing and concomitant consumer spending on furnishings, home improvements and so on. Those seem to be the principal objectives of any scheme of this kind.

Surely, we must look at this question of mortgage interest deductibility and real estate tax deductibility in terms of how well it achieves those objectives, on the assumption that we accept those objectives, as opposed to other techniques designed to achieve the same purposes.

One of the most significant objectives, in my opinion, of Bill C-29 is the providing of more and better housing accommodation and more ownership for Canadians. It is apparent that mortgage interest deductibility and real estate deductibility favour home owners. I am not arguing at this stage whether that is good or bad; I am simply saying that that is the result of this kind of program. By its very nature it provides more discretionary disposable income to those Canadians who find themselves in the higher income tax brackets. When we look at home ownership we find that more homes are owned by people in higher income tax brackets than people in lower income tax brackets. Obviously, it does much less to encourage the acquisition of homes by those persons who find themselves at the lower end of the income scale—

Mr. Clarke: Tell that to the tenants.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): —such as young couples and others who are seeking to obtain housing. My hon. friend the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) has referred to tenants, and the bill does nothing whatever for that category. Essentially, the deductions that are suggested would tend to widen the gap in terms of housing accommodation between the upper income groups and the lower income groups. My value judgment on that situation is that it is bad.

It may be—and I will return to this later—that many home owners in this country feel that they are prejudiced by high rates of taxation and that they should be provided with some form of relief. They may very well be prejudiced by high rates of taxation, and it is unquestionably true that this measure would provide those people with some form of relief. The question is, however, should that be an objective of a mortgage interest deductibility program as opposed to seeking to provide additional housing to a particular group who require housing in this country?

As has been mentioned by other members who have addressed this subject, any plan of this kind has far-reaching implications which can only be measured after rather sophisticated econometric and other studies have been conducted. For example, it was mentioned by one speaker that this kind of program of mortgage interest deductibility and real estate tax deductibility, appealing as it does to middle and upper income groups, might tend to attract those people into some of the city cores who would renovate the housing in that area—as I understand has been the case in certain areas of the United States—to the detriment of the core's existing tenant population, which is largely composed of people from lower income groups. Surely that cannot be regarded as a desirable social consequence of this kind of program.

Moving from the social objectives to the fiscal objectives, which I defined as seeking to provide more equity and more tax neutrality, it is obvious that this kind of program does not favour tax neutrality because it creates a benefit to home owners but not to existing tenants. It does not create the same benefits to people who find themselves in essentially the same financial circumstances. Therefore, it offends the principle of tax neutrality.

As I mentioned last night, there would obviously be, as we were advised by observers in the United States, a shift of local taxation into the real estate tax sector because, clearly, if a real property owner can obtain a tax deduction in that particular area but not in terms of other local taxes, then the municipalities or other local governments would be encouraged to increase the taxes in that particular area. Also, the economic objectives cannot be met through this particular plan as well as they could be met through other kinds of plans. Specifically, because the creation of additional disposable discretionary income finds its way to the higher income groups, there is less likelihood that it will find its way back to the economic stream as quickly as it would if it favoured lower income groups and people at the lower end of the scale, who basically are more consumer oriented, as statistics have shown us.

Perhaps more significant—and I would like all members of the House to focus on this—is the fact that, as our U.S. neighbours have told us, once this scheme is incorporated into our system, for the reasons I have already outlined it is impossible to remove it. Therefore, as I have indicated, it cannot be regarded as an economic tool. An economic tool is something which can be applied in a counter-cyclical fashion to stimulate the economy when stimulus is required and to cool off the economy when it should be cooled off. Yet here we run the risk of incorporating something structurally into our system which will be there for all time once it is introduced. Therefore, as an economic tool it is simply not viable.

I have a certain kinship with the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) who preceded me in the debate on this bill. I believe, though I stand to be corrected, that at one time he was opposed to the concept of mortgage interest deductibility, but last night he effectively supported the concept. My kinship with him is that I am almost a mirror image of the hon. member for Rosedale, in that at one time I suggested that mortgage interest deductibility be introduced as an alternative to the registered home ownership savings plan. Subsequently, upon further examination and taking into account only some of the issues which I have raised during the course of these comments, I determined that it would not accomplish these objectives. I then moved toward a tax credit plan and have effectively supported that idea since that time, provided it is economically feasible for the country to introduce any kind of scheme at this point. I say this with a certain amount of humility, recognizing that I have had a change of position based upon a further appreciation of the very serious consequences of the introduction of this kind of scheme. I say this not in any way to denigrate the position of the progressive conservative party who brought the spotlight to bear on this issue—for that they deserve credit—but I think it behooves them to re-examine this policy in light of the evidence we have and the studies which are now available, in order to determine whether it would be in the best interests of Canadians as a whole. Upon examination of the issue I am convinced that it is not. I would encourage them to review some of the material that we have prepared.

I regard this as a very serious problem which should be considered in a non-partisan way. I am prepared to make available to the opposition the analysis we have made so that there can be a better dialogue on the subject. If there are any benefits to be derived from the mortgage interest deductibility and real estate tax deductions, I should like to know what they are. If there are any, they should be considered. On the basis of the analysis that we have made, Mr. Speaker, there does not seem to be any merit to the scheme at all over other schemes, and in some ways there could be very negative aspects.

I have prepared a document for the national caucus which I would be quite happy to make available to my friends on the other side of the House. It summarizes the conclusions I arrived at on the basis of the discussions held at Washington at which the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra—who, I understand, will speak on this bill—the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott), and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) were present.

There is no doubt that when this policy was put forward by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) during the summer of 1978, it struck a responsive chord in certain sections of the community. I noticed it in my riding and I am sure other hon. members noticed it in theirs. I ask myself, if all these negative aspects are inherent in the plan, why did it strike such a responsive chord? Initially, I think it gives the appearance of stimulating the housing industry and encouraging home ownership. I was the victim of that illusion myself until I studied the matter in more detail. It is apparent now that it does not stimulate new housing nearly to the extent to which it stimulates, encourages, and benefits existing home owners. There are any number of other plans which would be more effective in creating new housing and bringing more people on to the housing market. If there is an objective inherent in this scheme, to provide tax relief to home owners, then there is no doubt that objective is accomplished by the suggestion that mortgage interest and real estate taxes should be deductible.

If we wish to provide tax relief to middle and upper income people, who suffer a severe tax burden under our present tax system, I believe, should we single out home owners? Why should we not consider our fiscal system as a whole and try to make it more fair and create more tax neutrality in all areas to which it applies? That is the objective I have been working toward for several years. It is one of the reasons why I sought to become a member of parliament, so that I could become involved in the area of fiscal reform which I believe to be so important.

It bothers me to think that we would consider introducing a provision of this kind which would further exacerbate the problems which I, and others involved in fiscal matters, have been attempting to eliminate. For example, home owners feel disadvantaged because their real estate taxes and mortgage interest payments are not deductible. If we take two Canadians, each of whom has an amount of available capital with which to buy the average priced house in Canada—which I understand is in the neighbourhood of $60,000—the question is whether the one who buys the home is better off than the one who receives interest income from his $60,000 which, assuming a 50 per cent bracket, at 10 per cent, nets $3,000 after tax. He then has that amount available for rental accommodation. I suggest that there are not too many Canadians who would prefer the position of the man with $3,000 after tax income available for living accommodation to that of the man who owns the $60,000 home, even with the costs which he has to support.

It may sound sophisticated, Mr. Speaker, but all economists have established that there is a real benefit to living in your own home. There is an imputed rental value to be attached to that benefit which, until 1963, was actually subject to taxation in the United Kingdom. We should not be horrified to learn that it has even been considered by other countries in the western world. There is a real benefit to be attached to home ownership by the mere fact of living in the house, which has never been taxed. I am hopeful and confident that it will never be taxed. Nevertheless, the home owner is in a much better situation than the renter in the same financial circumstances.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, we have the advantage in Canada that a capital gain on the principal residence is not taxable, irrespective of whether the vendor intends to buy another home. The United States has recently adopted a provision which exempts a once in a lifetime $100,000 gain. First of all, however, the home owner must be aged 55 or over and must have owned the house for at least seven years and lived in it for a certain period during those seven years. Our provisions are infinitely more attractive than those of the United States in this regard.

If we want to attain these objectives, Mr. Speaker, and provide that more people can own homes, we must look at programs which will be effective in bringing about that situation. The tax credit scheme is one because it treats people at the high end of the scale and people at the low end of the scale equally. If we were to establish a refundable tax credit, that would reach the lower economic levels of our society and provide them with money to enable them to have adequate housing.

It is important to recognize that these schemes are costly, Mr. Speaker. Fiscal responsibility requires that no scheme of this magnitude be introduced without the most thorough analysis of the economic consequences, both in terms of stimulation of the economy and in terms of increased government deficit.

There are better ways of providing home ownership, Mr. Speaker, and there are many better ways of bringing equity into the fiscal system. This scheme would basically create a further departure from the principle of tax neutrality which I find to be unacceptable. Accordingly, I think all members of the House should address themselves, over the next several years, to the question of how our fiscal system can be improved. There is no question that there are inequities in it. This program, however, would not improve the fiscal system but would merely worsen it.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as an instrument of economic stimulus this scheme would not be effective. It would favour people at the upper end of the bracket who, by and large, are not the consuming public, and it could never be eliminated from our system.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that this is not something I approach in a partisan way. At one point, as I said, I supported the idea. I think that together in this country we should seek the best possible means of providing home ownership to more Canadians. I beseech the Conservative opposition not to suggest that a mortgage interest deductibility plan and a real estate tax deductibility plan be foisted on the Canadian public, with all the serious long-term economic consequences it could have.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-29, the housing legislation we have been discussing in our spare time, when there is nothing else to do, because this is the way we have been doing it since the minister put the bill forward a number of days ago. This strengthens my opinion that the bill has been badly put together, it is incomplete and very difficult to understand. I have been wondering, if we passed the bill as it is, whether the regulations to be enacted would be so different we would not recognize the act anymore.

My feeling is we will have to be very careful in committee with this legislation, and the minister will have to be well prepared to give us the information needed, mainly on the criteria referred to in certain clauses of the bill. There is mention of standards and criteria in a number of places, but no explanation is given and we have no sure indication where those criteria might lead us. We have no clear idea who will establish those criteria or construction standards, the standards for establishing lending values. The experience with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is that they have numerous offices across Canada and it would seem there were just as many National Housing Acts as there are CMHC offices. If we are to compare for instance the way the act is implemented in the area served by the Val d'Or office with that of another office in the lower St. Lawrence or the Montreal area, we would think the act is different because there is so much difference.

I suggest there should be uniformity, even if flexibility must be maintained to meet the needs and weather conditions in various areas. Building in southern Ontario is quite different from building in northern Quebec. But when it comes to lending values and valuation, I feel that variations are too wide and it is hard to assess the basis used to determine valuation rates and lending values. Mr. Speaker, in his introduction the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has praised the National Housing Act. Obviously he dealt only with the bright side of the story. He surely was not going to, nor did I expect him to, openly criticize all the shortcomings in the act. Yet in his speech he told us over and over again that most Canadians enjoy good housing.

I have tried to grasp what the minister meant by that when he said that most Canadians have good housing. Did he mean that Canadians live in luxurious houses, that they live in very comfortable houses, houses in which they want to live or rather did the minister mean to say that Canadians live in expensive houses? This brings us to the issue of programs developed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, these loan programs which we have had for several years, one formerly called AHOP and now rebaptized GMP, and all these types of loans which have been promoted. Most of these loans were designed for moderate income people. When one studies what is happening in the case of these people, one will realize that they actually live in very expensive houses. It does not mean that they live in luxurious houses, far from it.

I have before me a brochure published by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which explains the new GMP program—the graduated mortgage payments program. We are given as an example a $35,000 loan at 10¾ per cent over 25 years. Under the old program which called for equal payments over 25 years, the reimbursement of such a mortgage would cost $99,300. Under the new graduated mortgage payments program this $35,000 mortgage at 10¾ per cent will in the end cost $108,864. I therefore conclude, Mr. Speaker, that most Canadians who have availed themselves of our housing legislation live in houses which are much too expensive in relation to the size of their income. When these houses are sold, it is natural that developers and builders do not mention it because they are under no obligation to do so but in the end when the buyer is through paying for his house, it will have cost him over $100,000 to get a house which is very little more than four walls, a roof and foundations. The house is far from luxurious, it is just good enough to live decently in, nothing more.

Developers and builders tell buyers: Thanks to payment facilities, thanks to easy loans, all you will have to pay is so much every month during so many years. A young couple who want to live in their home and who want to own a house do not realize the full extent of the commitment they are about to sign; they see only what they are going to pay, only the difference between what they will have to pay to own a house and what they are paying now as tenants. People are being lured with that difference but the truth and the reality are quite different. I do think that if every prospective owner sat down to count how much money he will have spent to buy his house over 25 or 30 years, many of them would think twice before buying and would not dare commit themselves that way. They might come up with another solution. That is exactly what is happening now, and many young couples prefer to deal with builders and developers rather than build their houses themselves and get a mortgage loan elsewhere in order to avoid lengthy and costly commitments they would have to make if they were to deal with CMHC.

This means, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that this housing program does not really meet the needs of Canadian people, the needs of the people this legislation is designed to help, because there are three main groups of people in Canada, those with a large income or with enough savings to do without lenders, banks, trust companies, insurance companies if they build a house. They are well off and have enough money to pay for their house when they buy it or have it built. The next group, perhaps the largest, is made up of people with low incomes who do not have enough savings to pay cash for their houses. Therefore, they have to borrow money, to deal with authorized lenders, with banks or credit unions, trust companies or insurance companies to obtain housing loans. Those are perhaps the most hard up.

The third group, Mr. Speaker, is probably made up of people who do not want or need to own a home because they are mobile, as it were. They live in a town or village for a few months, to work on a job and then they move on to another village. They are always on the move because of their jobs, or still they may be handicapped or disabled and do not think of or feel like buying a house.

Mr. Speaker, our housing legislation was designed to meet the needs of people in the largest group in making easier terms and easier loan facilities available to them so they can become home owners. But they were really tricked because by holding out to them these easier loans, they were forced to pay unduly high interest rates compared to their incomes.

At the present time, in my area at least, interest rates are about 10¾, 11 and 11¾ per cent. Mr. Speaker, when one agrees to repay a $35,000 mortgage over a 25- or 30-year period, we have to think twice about it because it is a commitment to pay very high interests over a very long period. The new program the minister is promoting so much may seem attractive to young couples who want to become homeowners because at first, for about ten years, the payments will be a little less since they are not paying any interest at that time. Interests will accrue and will be charged only from the seventh year. I think that once again, Mr. Speaker, they foisted the program upon the public rather like pressure salesmen. The government is quite good at submitting attractive programs, but in the end people who want to borrow to buy a house will have to pay about $10,000 more.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it would have been much better to lower the interest rates to help young couples buy a house. A few years ago, through a special program, interest rates were lowered to 8 per cent in certain cases while the current rates were about 9½ per cent or 10 per cent. This nearly was the same as subsidizing new homeowners.

I believe that if we want to be logical and help everyone make his dream of owning his own house come true in Canada, we must find the means to lower considerably the interest rates on mortgage loans. Otherwise, we shall never achieve this objective. We shall always be tenants in our own homes. We shall always have payments to make, because I can assure you that not many people will see the end of 25 year mortgages as there are not many houses built today which can last 25 or 30 years without costly repairs and maintenance jobs.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to underline this once again and ask the minister and the government to find the means to lower mortgage interest rates so that they do not exceed 6 per cent. This would be much more effective than any other suggestion made either by the Progressive Conservative party, the New Democratic Party or even the Liberal party. We can criticize any suggestion that is made, but if we do not take the means to enable low income people to find housing without putting too much pressure on their income and forcing them to seek out loan companies, I believe that we shall have failed in our duty and that we shall never succeed as well as we should in providing appropriate housing for everyone.

Mr. Speaker, we have all we need to build homes. We hardly have to import anything from other countries, as we produce our own building materials, such as structural materials and lumber, and we have a great many sawmills producing high quality lumber, we have plants that produce all kinds of materials used in the construction and production of these houses. I cannot understand why the cost of homes remains so high. Obviously the cost of housing has gone up because of wages and all sorts of overhead that go into the cost of producing houses.

I have here a chart from the Quebec Provincial Home Builders Association which mentions nine different trades connected with home building. For each one of them, which include carpenters, bricklayers, cement finishers, roofers, and so on, the builder must pay, over and above wages, which in Quebec, for a carpenter for example, is $10.28 an hour, nine other items such as holidays, social security, the Office de la construction du Québec, unemployment insurance, Workmen's Compensation Board, Quebec Pension Plan, medicare, wage compensation fund and so forth, nine items, for a total of $2.76 which is added to the worker's salary.

There are also the administrative costs which the builder must assume and which are passed on to the customer. There is also a fair profit of 10 per cent, so that if a carpenter is paid $10.28 an hour, the customer is billed $17.93 an hour for his services. Therefore, it is not the carpenter alone who is expensive, but all those who are involved in a construction project. There are about ten other people who must get paid in addition to the carpenter. All these elements certainly contribute to the high cost of housing.

On top of that, Mr. Speaker, we have interest rates which are over 10 per cent. In fact, they are about 11¾ per cent just now. I suggest therefore that it is almost impossible and unthinkable for young Canadians to become the owners of their own houses, without restricting themselves on such items as food, lodging, medical care, education and so on. I suggest this bill needs improvements if we want the National Housing Act to meet the needs of Canadians and of those who require assistance to become home owners.

During committee meetings, I hope that all those who have a brief to submit, advice to give and recommendations to make to the minister will be heard, in order to improve this bill, so that the Housing Act may better meet the needs and fulfil the expectation of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate unexpectedly, and with a mixture of sadness and anger. I say that my participation today at second reading of Bill C-29 is unexpected, in the sense that the problem in my riding I am about to describe came to my attention as a surprising first assignment as a member of parliament immediately following my election in Hamilton-Wentworth last October 16. The sadness I feel this afternoon stems from a personal investigation of a CMHC horror story and a first-hand feeling of the helplessness and frustration experienced by many of my constituents. My anger mounts when I realize that the situation I am about to describe is not confined to one condominium development sliding into a ravine but to several other badly executed housing projects in Hamilton and, indeed, across the country.

The countless other horror stories which are coming to light in this debate may not be as spectacular as 100 Quigley Road in east end Hamilton, but the principal failure of the federal government's role in this near tragedy for my constituents is typical of the chaos which has enveloped CMHC because of inadequate inspections and the use of substandard building materials.

Like other hon. members on this side of the House, I want to go on record as saying that the bill before the House contains many good features, some of which are long overdue, but I also wish to register the concern of my colleagues on this side of the House that these National Housing Act amendments deserve, indeed, demand, close scrutiny in the standing committee, although I am beginning to wonder whether we members of the opposition will have much opportunity to carry out the kind of detailed examination needed. This has something to do with an election, and that is why I am taking this opportunity this afternoon to raise a particular concern of mine relating to this bill, namely, the program which will replace the Assisted Home Ownership Program. I want to get my experience and the very real worries of my constituents on the record now so that the government will be in no doubt as to the official opposition's criticism and suggested remedies once we hit the campaign trail.

AHOP was, and is, a good idea. It is the government's execution of that idea which has created so many problems across the country. AHOP has succeeded in making affordable housing available to people who normally would not be able to afford to buy homes, even if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) calls owning one's own home a luxury. That is not our view, and notwithstanding the comments made by the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston), there are countless hundreds of thousands of Canadians in the middle and lower income brackets who are tenants and whose dream it is to own their own homes some day. My leader's mortgage interest deductibility proposal, as has been pointed out in this debate, is aimed at that vast and important constituency. People are responding to that constructive proposal, which offers them hope of achieving their dream.

And so did AHOP offer hope, but in the government's haste to cash in on the building boom of the mid-1970s and the desire of people to own condominiums, that hope has long since turned into financial and personal nightmares for too many Canadians who took this government and its program at their word. As some of my colleagues have pointed out, it is the same thing all over again: inadequate inspections, disgraceful construction and design, and the use of substandard building materials.

I will deal in a moment with the charge of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) that we on this side of the House are raising only isolated incidents.

Let me tell the House how I first came to learn of what I thought was just an isolated incident at 100 Quigley Road in Hamilton. The very first weekend following the October 16 by-election I received an urgent message through my Stoney Creek constituency office from Mr. and Mrs. Keith Parks. When I called back, they informed me that several units in their condominium development were slowly sliding into a 50 to 75-foot deep ravine. Apparently the units had been built too close to the edge of the ravine, and the developer had not packed down properly some 13 to 17 feet of fill. Furthermore, he used inferior chemically-treated fill. This resulted in soil erosion, then cracks and, finally, a fear on the part of several tenants that one more winter of weighty snow or an accompanying heavy spring run-off, and whole back yards, patios and family rooms could end up at the bottom of the Red Hill Ravine.

The physical threat to the tenants of 100 Quigley Road, not to mention all the little kiddies who were playing around the edge of that erosion, was frightening enough, but Mr. and Mrs. Parks had another incredible piece of news for me.

The condominium tenants were under a city of Hamilton court order to effect immediate repairs to the erosion. Construction was to begin not later than November 22, 1978, and it would cost $30,000. Failure to meet the deadline and complete these repairs would result in a $10,000 fine being levied against the condominium owners. In any event, I was told that the people at 100 Quigley Road were to be assessed an extra $200 per unit on their mortgages. Being hit with that news during the Christmas shopping season, needless to say, had these folks mighty upset.

The question to their new member of parliament was what could I do to convince Ottawa that none of this was the fault of the condominium owners, and was there a possibility of a $30,000 federal grant or loan until the repairs were carried out? The owners eventually settled on a loan. They were determined to pay it all back. My first reaction on hearing this story, frankly, was that of a television newsman: "What a visual story this will be!" Did anybody else know about 100 Quigley Road? No, said Mr. and Mrs. Parks, people were afraid to let the media know about their plight because the resulting publicity could damage the credibility of their housing project, but would I please come and talk with the unit owners and see the situation for myself?

I agreed to treat this first case as a member of parliament on the confidential basis that the public comes to expect from its elected representatives. However, there is one element in my journalistic background which I could not set aside. In a case like this I felt it vitally important to conduct a personal investigation into both sides of the story. This I have done in connection with this case. One hundred Quigley Road started as a rental townhouse project in 1974. Like so many other housing starts, this was during the boom of the mid-seventies, those halcyon days which the Canadian construction industry remembers now with misty eyes. At any rate, in 1975, 100 Quigley Road quickly changed to a condominium project called the Wentworth Condominium Corporation No. 20, registered in September, 1975, and including 150 units.

The financing was originally a blanket mortgage through CMHC. It was replaced with individual CMHC mortgages, and by the end of 1975 all the units were occupied. That is a point to which I will come back a little later.

It was during the spring of 1976 that a soil erosion problem became evident. The land fill behind several of the units on the north slope of the ravine began disappearing, and finally things began happening in the units themselves as they settled. By September of 1978 a crack had appeared in the ground within seven feet of units 62, 63 and 64, and the land started to slide. Cracks also appeared in the basement of the affected units. Second floor toilets leaked through the vestibule ceilings, and family rooms began to sag.

Consulting engineers were immediately retained to analyse the problem, and in the meantime Hamilton's building department issued a court order to make the north slope between units 54 to 62 more stable. I should point out that the units in question were built on the north and west slopes of that ravine. The north slope is the most precarious; the west slope could withstand this and perhaps next winter's snow, but inevitably several other units face a similar caving in. The consulting engineers' report made recommendations for shoring up the units, at a cost of $30,000 for the 150 unit owners. The north slope needing immediate repairs would cost $18,000, the west slope would require $12,000 worth of restoration.

That news hit the 100 Quigley Road condominium tenants on October 16, 1978. By this time, my newsman's sense, I must admit, was getting the better of me. I have kept 100 Quigley Road a private matter, but by now, several members of the Wentworth condominium board of directors and I felt that no useful purpose would be served by keeping this scandal quiet any longer. I decided to raise the matter in the House of Commons and let the media take it from there to the public. Frankly, what spurred me on was the Virginia Drive project raised by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). In December, during the question period, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs had roundly castigated my colleague for raising the matter, saying it was just an "isolated incident". The minister knew then, and he knows now very well, that Virgina Drive was anything but an isolated incident involving CMHC funded housing projects.

If Virginia Drive was an isolated incident, then why did one of his senior CMHC officials tell me that even if the corporation could lend the Quigley Road people the $30,000 to shore up the ravine, he refused on the grounds that:

It would open up the flood gates to similar requests across Canada.

The Minister of State for Urban Affairs, in his answer to my question one day in the House of Commons, said "yes", that was why he turned down a grant or loan to the people of 100 Quigley Road.

Hon. members on the government side will probably think that we in the opposition—and I, specifically in these remarks—have been embarking on a CMHC bashing exercise by raising the kind of situation I been have discussing. That is not the case, Mr. Speaker.

What really made me realize that we are on the right track to detail cases such as 100 Quigley Road in Hamilton and the Virginia Drive problem in St. John's, Newfoundland, and pursue the government for its sheer negligence in these situations, was a chance meeting I had during a brief vacation in January. By staggering coincidence, a young couple staying at our hotel in the Caribbean used to live in the city of Hamilton.

It was several days before I discovered that the fellow with whom I had had several casual conversations was an inspector with CMHC and in fact had worked on projects in and around the Red Hill Creek area of Hamilton, including 100 Quigley Road. He could not be certain that the units which were sliding into the ravine had been his exact responsibility, but he knew the CMHC personnel on site at the time. What he told me, on a not for attribution basis, confirmed my worst suspicions about why these, and who knows how many hundreds of other AHOP customers, have been going through incredible inconvenience in recent years. I should point out that the CMHC inspector in question now works in another part of Canada, but his memory is vivid on the corporation's role regarding 100 Quigley Road.

This inspector told me that an initial on site inspection of the location, the plans, and the construction of a CMHC approved projects, was always supposed to be followed up by supplementary visits. However, during this particular period in the mid-1970s, when there was a real construction boom and many hundreds of condominium projects were being thrown up, CMHC simply did not have the manpower available to carry out their supplementary inspections. My informant says that he cannot understand how he or his fellow inspectors could have missed the danger signals which were so apparent with the construction of these units at Quigley Road so close to the edge of the ravine. He is certain that a supplementary visit by a CMHC inspector, indeed two or three supplementary visits, would have discovered the slipshod methods being used in the land-fill procedure to shore up the rear of the units. But, he said, "obviously, somebody wasn't watching what was going on."

That, to me, is a pretty damning indictment of the lack of responsibility assumed by the federal government housing agency. My informant went on to explain that there were several other projects in the east Hamilton area going on at the same time and that I would probably discover similar, if not as spectacular, cases as 100 Quigley Road. He was reading my mind, because shortly thereafter I brought the Red Hill ravine problem to the attention of the Hamilton media when I, along with other Hamilton area political representatives, began receiving complaints and horror stories from nearby condominium projects, all of them initially financed and inspected under AHOP.

Let me introduce to you very briefly the case of Mr. Godwin Charles who lives in unit 26 No. 11 Glen Vista Drive, about half a mile away from 100 Quigley Road. Mr. Charles outlined a weird problem he was having in his kitchen and invited me to drop around and experience for myself what had become for Mr. Charles and his family an intolerable situation. It was on a clear, cold Saturday afternoon in late November that I visited unit 26, a fashionable, comfortable, indeed cosy looking split-level condominium unit on Glen Vista Drive. It was cosy looking, but anything but cosy feeling.

As you enter the front door and go down a small hallway, you come upon a very compact and comfortable looking living room. There is a half flight of stairs to another hallway on the mezzanine level which has a dining room and leads to several bedrooms. But at the top of the stairway is the kitchen, which is built over the garage, and looks out on to Glen Vista Drive. The kitchen is positively frigid, a good 20 degrees cooler than the rest of the house. I can hear hon. members interjecting and asking, "How cold was it?" It was so cold that liquids under the kitchen sink froze if left there for just a few hours, so cold that you could feel the wind blowing through electric light sockets. The Charles' cannot heat anything on their stove, even with the burners turned up full because of the blast of cold air that is coming down through the vent above the stove.

An hon. Member: That's really cool.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Ah, you say, that is because the kitchen is built over the garage, and any kitchens built directly over enclosed garages are likely to experience this drop in temperature, or the windows are not fitted properly and the cold is seeping into the kitchen that way, or maybe there is faulty insulation under the kitchen floor or in the walls facing the street. I was astounded to learn two things; neither of the obvious faults that come to mind was apparent in the case of Godwin Charles' kitchen; and that his unit was one of many up and down Glen Vista Drive experiencing the same insufferable inconvenience. Not only was it an insufferable inconvenience, but an expensive one. The cold air which fills the kitchen sweeps down the small staircase and makes the sitting room below quite uncomfortable. Only the bedrooms are liveable, but in the meantime the heating bills of the Charles' family and their neighbours on Glen Vista Drive have skyrocketed since this problem was first discovered more than a year ago.

Hon. members might be interested to know that I personally checked out each of the possible design faults which would result in the freezing kitchens. The covered garages immediately below the kitchens are warmer than the kitchens. There is plenty of insulation in the walls of the garage and in the ceiling immediately below the kitchens. Some of the unit owners have even taped clear vinyl coverings inside and outside the windows to cut down on the cold but without luck. Explanations have been offered that a kitchen located below a garage with a sloping roof inevitably causes temperature problems.

In any event, now it is up to the individual condominium unit owners, on top of the $42,000 price tag on each unit, to invest what they can or must to rectify this most unusual problem, which clearly is either a design fault by the builder, inferior insulation material, or both. As in the case of 100 Quigley Road, it is the buyer who gets caught between faulty design, materials and inspection on the one hand, and a passing of the buck between one level of government to another, and to another, when it comes to redressing these totally unexpected and highly unjustified inconveniences experienced by these home owners.

The entire AHOP program from the outset should have been labelled like cigarette packages which warn of danger to smokers' health. Every AHOP project should have been labelled, "Buyer beware." Had many of my constituents known the inconvenience and heartache they were about to experience when they took advantage of the federal government's generous offer to assist in their home buying, they would not be living in 100 Quigley Road or in No. 11 Glen Vista Drive today. Indeed, many of them no longer live there.

At Quigley Road 32 owners have defaulted on their mortgages. It is small wonder. The units at 100 Quigley Road were all purchased in 1975 on the AHOP program. A reduced mortgage was paid for the first five years. Mrs. Parks complains that she is paying $233 a month for her three-bedroom unit, and without AHOP she would have been paying $353 a month. That is fine, however, but by 1980 she will have to start paying the higher rate and will owe 120 per cent of the original value of the unit, or about $9,000 more. One must add to that prospect the escalating levy to each unit owner to effect repairs or maintenance because of poor quality workmanship inside the units and on the landscaping.

The value of the units at 100 Quigley Road will not exactly be bargain basement prices for house hunters. By 1980, when the payments suddenly increase and owners start to find that they owe 120 per cent on their homes, a tidal wave of defaults may start to occur. It is an awful prospect, and by 1981 perhaps 100 Quigley Road will be a ghost town. I wonder how many similar potential ghost towns, or how many hundreds of other 100 Quigley Roads there are across Canada. That is why I was so angry when the Minister of State for Urban Affairs had the unmitigated audacity to suggest the situations raised by the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) are isolated incidents and are not indicative of the government's excellent federal housing policy. One just has to ask the people of Quigley Road or Glen Vista Drive how isolated they feel right now.

Like the constituents I represent, I guess my real sense of frustration lies in the lack of responsiblity which the federal government feels it should take in situations like 100 Quigley Road. As a reporter I became sick and tired of buck passing between one level of government to the other. As a member of parliament, not just reporting on the plight of people caught in the bureaucratic web but representing them, I am even more exasperated at the failure of the federal government to live up to its responsibility. My people in Hamilton, and untold thousands of other people in hundreds of projects across the country, believed in the government's promise to make it easier for them to acquire their own homes. They were not told they would have to contend with city bylaws, provincial conservation authority regulations and, above all, improper inspection and negligence on the part of the federal government's housing authority.

I, and the minister, know that the entire blame for situations like 100 Quigley Road does not lie at the feet of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In this case the local contractor, Lucille Investments Limited, and the city of Hamilton building inspectors, share some responbility for the problem. According to city bylaws, two or three of those units should not have been built at all. Authorization was made on the basis of drawings and not by on-site inspection. In 1975 when the builder applied to make the units at Quigley Road into a condominium project, the provincial conservation authority reported that the project should be rejected because the homes had to be built not closer than 25 feet to the edge of the ravine.

The case I am making against CMHC basically is one of moral neglect of the owners, who originally were enticed by the corporation into buying these homes. As I have pointed out, the method of inspection by CMHC is spotty at best, and to repeat the words of my CMHC inspector friend, "Somebody was not watching what was going on."

Typical of the government's attitude is the following quote from a letter which the Minister of State for Urban Affairs recently sent to Mrs. June Collins, the director of the Quigley Road Condominium Corporation:

> Unfortunately, there is no authority under the National Housing Act which would permit Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make a grant to your corporation to cover the cost of the necessary remedial work. I regret that CMHC is unable to be of assistance in resolving the soil erosion problem.

The minister described the Quigley Road problems as being "unforeseen expenditures". Members of the House cannot imagine how much at a loss these condominium owners feel when they receive this kind of reply from a minister of the government. Perhaps if anyone is listening on the government side they will understand how infuriated I am that good and decent people, like those I have met at 100 Quigley Road, should find themselves in a physical and financial bind over which they had no control, in the first place, and for which they should not have responsibility now.

Surely the bottom line to this litany of personal tragedies and disasters recorded during this debate is some responsibility on the part of the government. Surely the minister has some compassion for what we on this side have shown are not isolated incidents but regular occurrences in the government's national housing agency. The minister must realize CMHC is in a mess, and that a full public accounting is needed before even more millions of taxpayers' dollars are wasted on this corporation. It is nothing short of a political tool of the government. I conclude by referring to the lead editorial in the February 3 edition of the Hamilton Spectator: "It's time to evaluate CMHC".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will add another chapter to this debate, one of sorrow and bungling. It demonstrates what the government has accomplished in the last ten years since it professed to be the champion of the just society in 1968.

I do not wish to take away from the thrust of the argument I will make, the argument of the poor people who comprise 20 per cent of our population. These people hoped the government would fulfil its promise respecting housing. I do not want to take away from the thrust of this argument, so may I call it four o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, and private bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO RESTORE CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina) moved that Bill C-219, to amend the Criminal Code (death sentence), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to my private member's bill, Bill C-219, I share with the House that the intent of this piece of legislation is to reinstate capital punishment for crimes of high treason or premeditated murder.

On July 14, 1976, this House abolished capital punishment under legislation known as Bill C-84. It is interesting when we review the vote on third reading to find that there were just six votes difference, an extremely thin margin. I spoke on third reading at that time and stated it was a sad day for participatory democracy because surveys indicated at that time, as they still indicate today, that 75 per cent to 80 per cent of the Canadian people wished to retain capital punishment for premeditated and planned murder. To this date I still fail to understand what makes individual members of parliament feel their conscience is so much wiser than the collective conscience of the Canadian people.

It was stated in this House by members of the government party that we were to free ourselves in Canada of that ordeal known as capital punishment, but that is not the case. The government has not given the House any indication of what its plans are regarding the introduction of amendments to the National Defence Act. I understand this act presently provides capital punishment for 36 offences, some of them as strange as an individual getting drunk while on watch. We do not have total abolition in Canada simply because this act has not been amended and there are these provisions contained in the National Defence Act. I would appreciate very much some guidance from government members as to what the government's intentions are in dealing with the National Defence Act itself. We find that we are discriminating against one segment of our society in the armed forces because of this provision for capital punishment still in the legislation.

Capital punishment is not an issue in respect of which party politics should become involved. It involves a decision that individual members in this chamber have to make within themselves, and vote accordingly. It is imperative that we truly have a free vote in this chamber, not only like the vote in 1976. It was supposedly free, but in reality it was not. We saw cabinet members en masse vote for abolition of capital punishment, but it was obvious to me when watching the voting on the other side that some disciplinary action, even though it was not overly obvious, had been taken in regard to some of the backbench members as well.

An hon. Member: Not true.

Mr. Elzinga: If we are to have a truly free vote in the House of Commons it should be conducted as it was in 1966 when four private members sponsored a bill at that time, without any obligation on the cabinet or any member to support a piece of government legislation, as was the case in respect of Bill C-84 in 1976. That is the commitment the leader of this party has given to the Canadian people, that we will have a truly free vote on this issue in the House of Commons by allowing a vote on a private member's bill, or a series of private members' bills on which each and every member of this House would have a free vote. Members will have no obligation to support government legislation because it will be a private member's bill and we will have freedom to vote for the reinstatement of capital punishment or the retention of abolition.

I also found it somewhat surprising to note the attitude of members opposite in dealing with the referendum legislation. They wish to go to the people on a question as to whether they wish to see our country separated. It is obvious to me there are very few people in this nation of ours who wish to see Canada separated. They want to hear the wishes of Canadians on an issue like this, but are not interested in hearing what Canadian people have to say on an issue like capital punishment.

As I said earlier, it is a sad day for participatory democracy when members opposite close their ears to a pressing issue such as capital punishment, a very emotional issue to the majority of Canadian people. I am truly puzzled how an abolitionist can feel that his own conscience is so much wiser than the collective conscience of the Canadian people.

The incidence of violent crime in the past ten years has increased dramatically. We cannot go back just to the period of 1976 when capital punishment was abolished in this House, because in essence it was abolished in 1965 by this government. No one has been hanged in Canada since that time. Abolition may not have been approved by legislative authority before 1976, but since 1965 this government has not carried out capital punishment for any capital crime.

The evidence is inconclusive as to whether capital punishment is in reality a deterrent. Any discussion of the merits or otherwise of capital punishment goes beyond the area of politics and each person makes up his own mind according to the dictates of his conscience and his judgment.

The abolitionists claim that capital punishment is not a deterrent to would-be murderers. In my opinion this is an empty argument and completely beside the point. There is no way to determine how many murders were not committed by those who wanted to commit the act, but did not, for fear of execution. The question should be, does the supreme crime demand the supreme penalty? In effect, do we place the highest possible value on the life of the victim?

The abolitionists say capital punishment has no deterrent effect. There are no facts to prove it one way or the other, but to say that the death penalty is no deterrent is to say that men do not fear death. I find that to be a rather incredible assertion. Fear of death, in my view, is an instinctive reaction. I would ask how many of us in this chamber do not value or fear for our lives? Life is regarded by man as a precious possession which he wishes to preserve more eagerly than anything else. He would, therefore, defend it to the utmost against every threat, including the threat of capital execution.

There must be a serious and real risk of execution for the death penalty to be an effective tool, because crime will not decrease until being a criminal becomes more dangerous than being a victim.

The abolitionists usually state as an argument in favour of abolition that a mistake can be made in carrying out capital punishment. Although this is a valid comment, it is not a valid argument in a debate on capital punishment, because what we are discussing now is what the price should be for an individual who commits premeditated or planned murder. We are not arguing or discussing the merits of our judicial system. If there are errors in that area they must be safeguarded against; but that statement is not a valid argument in this debate because, as I said, what we have to resolve here is what to do with an individual who has been found guilty of taking another individual's life intentionally.

The very individuals we ask to give us protection deserve protection themselves, and I speak mainly of our police officers and prison guards. If what is known as capital punishment today is not reinstated, our friends who do such a superb job of law enforcement will have no protection whatsoever. What will a criminal imprisoned for life have to lose if he kills a prison guard? In reality, he will gain his freedom if his bid for escape succeeds; if he does not, he loses nothing. If capital punishment is not reinstated the prisoner in reality has nothing to lose and a great deal to gain.

I believe in capital punishment for all premeditated or planned murder, which makes up approximately 1 per cent of the murders committed in Canada. I believe it is the prime duty of the government to offer citizens protection against violent crime, and in my view capital punishment is a necessary tool to ensure that protection. That is why I have introduced Bill C-219 to amend the Criminal Code to reinstate capital punishment for premeditated and planned murder.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate being recognized and having this opportunity to add a few words to this debate. I want to say at the outset that I very much respect the right of any member of this House to express a view contrary to mine on this very controversial issue, and I respect their sincerity for that view. I know that the hon. member opposite who has brought forward this private member's bill has done so with the serious concern that the reinstitution of the death penalty will indeed bring better protection for the public in Canada. I cannot agree with that, and for that reason I would like to add some comments.

Back in the so-called minority parliament of 1972 to 1974, this House debated and then brought into effect a limited capital punishment bill which reduced the categories of murder that would lead to the imposition of the death penalty to the categories of killers of policemen and prison guards on duty. At that time I put forward, along with the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), outside this House a proposal, which I had hoped the government would take up, of total abolition.

I believe that in fact there are many other victims of this most terrible of all crimes other than policemen and prison guards, who are less prepared and less aware of the risk within their lives and livelihoods of death. I speak, for instance, of assaults on children leading to death, kidnapping and death, and premeditated murder and death, although that can also be premeditated murder in the case of prison guards or policemen being killed.

At that time I brought the bill forward arguing, although I did not have the opportunity because of the system to bring it formally into the House, that what we needed was not the death penalty but more effective law, with very harsh penalties for a much broader segment of that most serious of all crimes, murder. The member for Saint-Denis and I proposed at that time substantially the same bill that the government later adopted when it abolished capital punishment in 1976. Had we acted earlier, however, we would have had for three more years what we have had since 1976.

As an abolitionist of long standing, I want to make it clear that I believe that we have a more effective law, stronger deterrence and better results for the Canadian public since the House abolished the capital punishment penalty in 1976. That law said that we would no longer have the death penalty on the books. If one measured all violent crimes on a yardstick, crimes of murder would be a very small proportion of that yardstick, and those crimes of murder which involve the killing of policemen and prison guards on duty would be a very, very small part of that measurement of murder out of the total violent crimes.

What we did was to change the law so that not only would the killers of policemen and prison guards on duty face the strictest of all possible penalties, short of society doing what it abhors most, the taking of human life. We said there would be 25 years before the consideration of parole—not released after 25 years, but 25 years before the consideration of parole, and then the possibility of parole.

In the original proposal made by the hon. member for Saint-Denis and I, we had not included the so-called "glimmer of hope" clause. The "glimmer of hope" clause which was in the law passed in 1976 says that after 15 years if one has had absolutely the highest kind of behaviour while in prison, that person will have a chance to go before a special board and have that term reduced to 15 years and then be eligible for parole. If that board of judges determines that this slim possibility can take place because of the prisoner's exemplary behaviour, the parole board can then consider parole. That parole board would have members on it from the constituency into which that convicted murderer would be released.

As an abolitionist, who first took up this cause back in the early 1960s when a journalist, and who covered the last hangings in Canada of two men called Turpin and Lucas, at the Don jail on, I believe, December 11, 1962, I think that society must have a principle beyond the emotions of any individual within that society. If we believe that we organize ourselves not only in order to care for each other and protect ourselves, but also to demonstrate to one another that we could each do better by recognizing each other, then surely a state that has reached that enlightened level should not endorse the taking of human life, which our criminal law books say is the most extreme of all crimes.

I must admit that facing the public as an elected politician both in 1972, 1973, and then again in 1976 on this issue, a public very concerned about increased rates of violent crime, I felt an obligation to offer them something that would not have society perform that most terrible of all acts and yet would give them some real assurance of an effective deterrent for this most terrible of all crimes. What we offered and what was passed as an alternative is a frightening imposition on any human being, no matter how terrible that human being is. To lock someone up for life, it has been argued in this House, is worse than having the state destroy them because, indeed, if you are incarcerated for life, what is human life? I only argue that we had an obligation to give the public some protection.

In the course of giving that very severe deterrent, 25 years before consideration of parole, with that "glimmer of hope" clause, we have in fact left ourselves as a parliament free to consider any revision or change in that, when parliament itself or those people who are concerned about the extremity of the penalty—and we all should be because that penalty is most extreme—can prove that that is not necessary and that we can protect ourselves and provide sufficient deterrent then, indeed, we can change the law from its present, very severe form.

The issue of deterrent is always the basic argument on the question of the death penalty. I had an opportunity to freshen my mind considerably on this subject a couple of days ago, along with a colleague of mine on this side of the House, a colleague from the other side of the House, a chaplain who in fact witnessed the last hangings at the Don jail, and a man for whom I have the greatest respect, the chief of police of metropolitan Toronto, Mr. Harold Adamson, when I taped a program for the Global Television Network. In the course of that debate—and I do not think that I am being unfair to my colleagues who attended, but they of course can review Hansard—I must say that when pressed it is impossible for either side to prove that the death penalty is or is not a deterrent. If anybody watches that program, and if I can plug it, it is running tomorrow night from nine o'clock to ten o'clock, they will find, and it was agreed, that it simply cannot be proved. Chief Adamson agreed with this position.

The hon. member opposite who preceded me said that people must have a fear of death and that nobody could tell him that it would not work. I believe that that is an emotional argument. The fact of the matter is that in 1889 Rhode Island abolished the death penalty, and Rhode Island has a lower murder rate than adjacent states which have had the death penalty for many more years. In California several years ago they took a referendum on the death penalty, the result of which indicated that people were overwhelmingly in favour of the death penalty, but in the months that followed, the murder rate in California soared. One would think that potential murderers, seeing that the death penalty is coming back, would fear that, but that is not the case. I am simply saying that the deterence argument is neither valid for me as an abolitionist nor for the retentionists. It cannot be proven. And if it cannot be proven, then surely we should not, as a state, be taking human life.

I also had an opportunity to discuss this matter at a national convention of my party about three years ago. I am proud to say that at that convention my party voted, albeit by a very narrow vote, for abolition of the death penalty, but at the same time said, "We want tougher laws to deal with the broad range of murder where in fact they could be paroled in six, seven or eight years, and now in fact face 25 years". At that particular session I described how, if I personally suffered the murder of someone close to me, such as my wife or a member of my family, that I could not imagine any other reaction within me than a desire either personally or to have the state not only erradicate that person but probably torture the individual and stretch him from limb to limb. But, again, we are human beings, and we have our own emotions and concerns. Therefore, I would not expect any other reaction from the most sensitive of human beings, and I do not claim to be that. What I am saying is that the state must represent a higher order than each of us as individuals could represent at a particular moment of duress or concern.

Over the years the issue of the death penalty has prompted many police officers and organizations of policemen to come forward and lobby politicians to reinstate the death penalty or, when it was in existence to make the death penalty more severe. I would like to refer to some comments I made in a speech on this subject in 1976, as they are reported in Hansard at page 13244.

I have the greatest respect for Canadian police forces, for the RCMP, and certainly for the police force in my own area of metropolitan Toronto, but in all fairness it should be pointed out that police officers and prison guards go into their work knowing the risks they face and they are trained to be prepared for those risks. I am arguing that the law as it is now constituted simply does not seem to be fair. If we investigate statistics of the average of fatalities on the job for 10,000 employees in Canada from 1964 to 1973, the highest on the job fatality rate is for miners. The second highest is for loggers, then fishermen, transport workers, labourers, and police officers rank sixth.

If we consider the jeopardy of these fine men and women police officers who protect us, if we can stand back from the emotion and look at the situation objectively, we must admit that the risk of losing life in their work is less than for many other people in our society.

I shall not go at great length, Mr. Speaker, because several other members want to discuss this problem. There are two other areas I should like to touch on, however. First is the record of the rate of murder in Canada in recent years. In 1974 the murder rate per 100,000 people was 2.4; in 1975, 2.8; 1976, 2.7; and in 1977, 2.7. The death penalty was abolished in 1976, but the murder rate remained the same the following year, and in 1976-77 it was marginally less than in 1975. In 1974, it was lower than in the following three years. Surely that suggests that the death penalty does not have a direct effect as a deterrent.

The second thing I wanted to deal with is the statistics which suggest that in recent years in Canada 86 to 90 per cent of violent crime is armed assault, and assault. Of the 86 per cent of violent crime, murder represents only a small percentage point. I suppose we can never really say "only", because taking human life by murder is extreme, and that is why I am an abolitionist.

[Mr. Fleming.]

The public, not having had the time or opportunity to look into this issue thoughtfully, and learning about violence in our society, believes that the death penalty is the fast answer to their fears about their well-being and the state of our society. I do not believe the general public even knew, when we had the death penalty, who could be hanged and for what crimes.

The old provision of the death penalty for the killers of police and prison guards on duty, was not a protection for them at all. Very few were murdered, but for some there was a great danger of assault. In 1976 a parallel bill was passed which strongly toughened the penalties for the lesser and more numerous crimes of assault.

It might help if we could take the Canadian public, group by group—and I am not being condescending but rather pointing out that it is our job to be thoughtful about an issue and do what we think is responsible and effective as I believe we did with the bill in 1976—and explained that the laws are tougher, and more convictions are being obtained for the broader range of violent crime.

I think I shall leave it at that, Mr. Speaker, except to argue that I will be saddened indeed if this issue is not discussed objectively in the coming election campaign. We have a responsibility, no matter what party we belong to, when affairs of government are so confusing and life has so much tension, to explain the issues to people, with intelligence and knowledge.

Sir Robert Mark, the former superintendent of Scotland Yard in Great Britain, said he was not terribly concerned about whether Great Britain executed people or not. He said he had a great deal of difficulty getting convictions because in this modern society, where there is real concern about taking human life, juries disagree. As a result, the accused is often incarcerated on a manslaughter charge or convicted of second degree murder with a sentence of six or seven years. He said that he would like to see the death penalty abolished and tough sentencing substituted so that they could get criminals off the streets.

With my reservations about the severity of penalties, that is the kind of broadly effective law that we have had for several years. It would be very sad indeed if this House were to change its position today, because there is wide misunderstanding on the issue and because the bill looks like a quick and easy answer to the concerns of the public.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to be able to enter this debate today. I missed the debate in 1976, but I took part in the 1973 debate on the side of abolition. I think the suggestion that there was not a free expression of opinion in those debates is not correct. It was insisted in our caucus that everyone should vote according to his or her conscience.

It is correct to say that the death penalty is not a deterrent. This has been amply demonstrated in many surveys. A large prison near Detroit has probably more murderers on death row than any other prison in the world, and it is obvious that none of them would be deterred from repeating the crime by threat of death. Speaking as a doctor, I believe that a murderer has a unique personality. That is not to say that all of the potential murderers are in jail—there may be some here in the House of Commons who would like to do murder once in a while!

We should realize that people who will commit murder are not deterred by the fear of their own death. Murder is an action they take on their way to a certain goal, or it is the goal itself and nothing is going to deter them from the deed. If we realize that, we should also realize that all our finer feelings of civilization are wasted when we consider the role of the murderer except to say that if we take life, no matter whether by hanging or in any other way, we are causing death. This is rather an antithesis to our ideas of civilization. We must apprehend the criminal who has committed murder and make sure he is not released into society again. I believe in recidivism. The idea that people who have committed murder can be prevented from doing it again is an entirely wrong premise. Murderers are unique in psychological type. When sent to prison they act like model Sunday school boys. Murderers have attained their goal, so why must they act in any other way? Given the same set of circumstances, when released from jail, the whole psychological mechanism will be set in motion again and the cycle will be repeated.

As far as collective conscience is concerned, a point entered by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga), one cannot depend on that. Socrates advocated new knowledge, and collective conscience had him drink the hemlock. Our own religion was against the collective conscience of that day. Tyranny has always put down collective conscience. We had such things as the inquisition, and following that the reformation. It seems to me that one cannot depend on the emotional ideas and decisions of a people of a certain time in the world's history as being collectively correct, no matter whether it is acceptable to the majority or not. In that sense majority does not mean a great deal.

In my opinion parole for a killer is wrong. I do not believe that a murderer, because he has acted as a fine individual in prison for ten or 15 years, ought to be let out. I would not think of letting him out. In my view the only solution is to keep him in prison until he is harmless. The 25-year idea of imprisonment is fairly good, but not perfect. One must realize that the death penalty is not a deterrent. After the criminal is in prison one must make sure that he is not released. If he acts well in prison and performs some kind of useful work, he might have some degree of personal satisfaction. For instance, a criminal might be satisfied that he can make amends for what he has done. It seems to me this would give him some hope for life and maybe for the next life. I do not believe that release from prison is the solution.

It is very important that we do not subscribe to capital punishment as revenge or as a deterrent. Instead, these people must be taken away from society. But let them try to carry on some kind of life in prison or by doing some work that is satisfying to them, during which time they might make some atonement.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will be short. I rise to support Bill C-29 introduced by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga).

I would like to say that the wishes of the Canadian people should be expressed in this House especially when such a large number of people are in favour of capital punishment. Polls that have been taken reflect this opinion vividly. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) said the public have not had time to look into this subject objectively. I do not believe it. I do not believe the public at large would buy that statement. This subject has been to the forefront during our lifetime. People have watched closely the progress of the various bills presented in this House over the years. They have followed this subject more closely than any other. They very well know what happens to people on parole and to people serving life sentences. They have seen these things and they know exactly what is going on.

The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) stated that the last vote on capital punishment in the House of Commons reflected a true cross-section of opinion. I wish it were the case that we could have a true vote in this House of Commons. I almost believed it would happen until I saw what went on in the last few days before the vote took place. I realize it is very difficult to obtain a true vote in this House when a bill is introduced. When it is a government bill it is put forward in the name of the government. We know immediately that there is cabinet solidarity. Cabinet solidarity showed up in the last vote taken on capital punishment.

In my opinion the only way one can have a free vote in this House is to have a vote on a private member's bill. Since it is not a government bill, cabinet solidarity is not needed and there are no pressures put on members, as has been the case in the past. Under the existing rules I realize we will not get far when it comes to having a vote on a private member's bill. The government will not let it go through. The government knows that all it must do is to sit for an hour and talk out a private member's bill so as to avoid having to do anything about it. Occasionally a private member's bill resolution goes through. I have had a resolution passed; it was so embarrassing to the government that they allowed it, but it was all more or less pre-arranged beforehand.

There should be some changes in the rules in order to give precedence and more weight to private members' bills. I am not just talking about a debate on capital punishment. A lot of good bills presented to this House by private members never get the full discussion or the precedence they deserve. I know it is embarrassing to government members to have to stand up and talk these private members' bills out, because very often they believe they are good and deserving of more emphasis than is given.

It would be much better, in my view, if some other rules could be devised to cover private members' hour. As things are, not many members take the trouble to attend because they know bills will be talked out in any event and that they will not be called upon to make a decision. I think it would be much better if we were to adopt a system as is followed in the United States where a private member's bill means something to its sponsor, to his constituents, and to the people.

The subject now under discussion is of importance to the people of Canada. My own experience is that since the last vote on capital punishment was taken in the House, public opinion has hardened on the issue. I would have thought that a decision having been made, people would have softened their attitude. But this has not happened. For instance, only a few weeks ago a radio station in my riding put out an editorial on capital punishment, fairly early in the morning. Then the phone lines were opened and listeners were invited to say whether or not they favoured capital punishment. The lines were open for about half an hour and the station received 110 calls in that time. This shows how important people feel the subject to be. Over 90 per cent of those calls was in favour of capital punishment. That has been my experience, too. Public opinion has hardened, and I believe it is time this subject was raised by way of a private member's bill. Maybe the government will allow the issue to be decided in this way once and for all.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few points. The hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) introducing this bill, said it would bring back the death sentence only in cases of treason and premeditated murder. However, the explanatory notes to the bill talk about its purpose being to impose the death sentence in all cases of murder.

Along with the hon. member who has just spoken, he made the point that the vote which took place in this House three years or so ago on the subject was not a free vote. I think it is about time all of us in this House, and anybody in this country who is left to doubt, ought to admit that this was a free vote. It was a free vote by all members of parliament standing up on their own initiative and voting yes and no as they felt fit, and as their consciences dictated. That point bothered me a little because I have heard comments of that kind before from Conservative members. They try to label the vote which took place as being other than a free vote.

Let me point this out to the hon. member for Pembina. My hon. friend from Bruce-Grey, who has since become a parliamentary secretary, voted at that time to retain the death penalty. I, who last year served with the minister of justice who succeeded the minister of justice who presented that bill, voted retentionist. But it did not prevent either of us from becoming parliamentary secretaries. My hon. friend from St. Catharines, who also serves as a parliamentary secretary, voted with us. Some of the other parliamentary secretaries voted for abolition. They voted as free men with free consciences, with no one in this party dictating to them or twisting their arms, or trying to put pressure on them in any way. Let us settle that question once and for all. We can go back, in our individual ways, and explain the stand we took to our electors if the matter comes up in the campaign. Let us not try to make a party political statement out of something which did not occur in this House.

Mr. Elzinga: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the last statement made by the hon. member has as much validity as his first statement with regard to my bill. It is obvious he has read only the first sentence and none of the clauses which define the offences in respect of which we hope to reinstate capital punishment, that is, high treason and premeditated murder. It is obvious the hon. gentleman is confused on that issue as well as on the issue of whether there was a free vote on that side of the House.

Mr. Young: I am not making statements and generalities, Mr. Speaker. I think I have proven my point. I have given examples, not only in my case but in the case of other members on this side. I might mention the hon. member for Skeena who is now a member of the cabinet who happened to vote in part the way I and some of my colleagues voted. I wonder where the members on that side of the House are this evening who voted abolitionist at that time and could be here in private members' hour today. Is this some kind of little game among members of the Conservative party? We know the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has consented to allow a private member to bring on a bill to reintroduce capital punishment, without making any hard and fast rules on it, but are there some members over there who want to speak according to their consciences?

Mr. Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): I can answer the hon. member's question very quickly by saying yes, if he would allow me time in which to do so.

Mr. Young: I would be very glad to leave the hon. member some time to speak on the bill this afternoon. I heard comments during this discussion to the effect that the will of the Canadian people was not allowed to be carried out as a result of the vote which took place. The hon. member for Pembina says that according to a Gallup poll between 80 and 85 per cent of the Canadian public felt that the death penalty should be enforced. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the figures are 80 per cent or 85 per cent in favour of the death penalty. I have done some research in my own constituency, and I would be inclined to say they run somewhere in the order of 65 per cent in favour and 35 per cent opposed, but even then there are uncertainties expressed when people are asked what they really mean.

I sent out a newsletter at the time, balancing the arguments for and against the death penalty, and I invited my constituents to write to me on the subject. Of some 35,000 polled households in my riding which received the newsletter I got back some 700 responses. I read each of those responses several times. I read them the day they came in, I read them during the course of the debate on capital punishment, on Bill C-84, the evening before I voted, and again before I voted in the morning. It was clear to me that even those who were very strong retentionists were saying that they did not really believe in capital punishment for all cases of murder, except in cases of premeditated murder.

People felt very strongly about the murder of policemen and prison guards on duty, and I shared some of those feelings. People in this country were telling me that they felt very strongly about others being killed through bombings, terrorism and hijacking. I lived in Europe a few years ago. I studied and travelled there. A couple of terrorist bombs exploded in a neighbourhood relatively close to where I was living. At one time windows in the little apartment in which I lived were shattered. I shared some of that concern. I do not want to get into explaining why or how I voted the way I did at the time, but those were some of the thoughts which were going through my mind.

We are asked this afternoon to consider Bill C-219, legislation to amend the Criminal Code with respect to the death sentence. The bill provides for mandatory death sentences in all cases of murder, and restricts the traditional authority of the governor in council to commute such sentences to cases where a jury or a majority of a jury makes a positive recommendation for clemency.

The bill also reintroduces some former provisions of the Criminal Code, such as postponements of executions of pregnant women until at least a few days after they have delivered their children, forbidding executions of those under 18 years of age, rights of appeal, methods of procedures for executions—which I note would be hanging—places of burial of executed persons, and so forth. It pains me somewhat to think that we would return to thoughts of executing a woman who had just given birth to a child and orphaning that child.

It may be said that this bill would turn the clock back to the situation which prevailed prior to 1960. It would turn the clock back to a situation which prevailed before the amendments which were brought in by the Hon. E. Davie Fulton, then minister of justice in a cabinet led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I think that was in 1961. Those amendments introduced a differentiation between premeditated murder and non-premeditated murder. We now have first degree and second degree classifications.

Today we are debating, for the fifth time in 13 years, the issue of capital punishment. What this bill would do would be to dismiss the decision taken by this House just about three years ago when I think almost half the members of the House individually participated freely in that debate, and when the House voted freely.

I know that one of my hon. colleagues opposite wants to speak. I will perhaps just summarize. All first and second degree murder cases, given the passage of this bill, would attract a mandatory sentence of death by hanging in the event of conviction, not only of those individuals found guilty of planned and deliberate murder, the murder of a police officer or prison guard or murder committed in the course of committing certain other crimes, but also those individuals convicted for spur of the moment crimes, crimes of passion, which have troubled many people, even the most ardent retentionists, for a long time.

One of the difficulties with this bill is the issue of leaving it to a jury to make a recommendation to the governor in council. The way it is drafted, this bill would require a judge to poll the jury on whether its members might make a recommendation for clemency or no recommendation. However, it does not give a jury any guidelines. It does not give any instructions to the judge for when he is instructing the jury. What would happen if jurors wish to remain silent? What would happen in the case of a 12-person jury in which four or five wish to recommend clemency and the other seven or eight are unable to make a recommendation? The bill says nothing about jurors wishing to remain silent.

I know from my practice of law over a limited period of time that when we had the death sentence for murder it was very difficult in many cases to get convictions, simply because juries were loath to think of the person on trial before them actually being disposed of by hanging. Juries could not face that in their minds, so they often convicted people of lesser crimes than first degree or premeditated murder.

I could go on and make a number of other comments. I have pushed the clock along somewhat more than I wished. I did want to leave my hon. colleague opposite some time in which to make comments, and I think I will stop at this point.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the generosity of the hon. member opposite, who has left me all of two minutes for what may well be the last speech I will have a chance to give in this chamber, which I will be leaving.

It was the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), which moved me to speak. He will be returned to this House, and he needs no assistance from me in the coming election campaign on this subject, but being a member of generous heart I am prepared to offer him a little assistance because I know he was serious when he spoke in favour of and demanded a free vote in parliament. That means freeing members from party discipline and freeing them to vote according to their conscience on the issue at hand.

I also listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga), who asked how a member such as myself could pit my conscience against public opinion on the cause to which he and the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary referred. It is quite easy, because there is another test of the common sense of the public and that, of course, is in the decisions of juries in jury trials. I keep track of these. A jury at Kamloops, British Columbia, reduced the charge against the murderer of Patrick Charles Danchuk. The charge was reduced to manslaughter, and the accused was sentenced to four years. That is a test of the common sense of the public.

It is a truer test than the amateurish polls which are taken from time to time, because when 12 good people and true get together they express the public opinion. I suspect, had we returned to capital punishment, the jury in that case would have acquitted, as the jury would have acquitted in the case of Maxwell, who was murdered in Kelowna. There was a reduced charge also, through plea bargaining, of the murderer of Sadie Jones Edward at Sicamous, British Columbia. One can follow these cases. That is the true test.

I hope this parliament will not ever return this nation to capital punishment. I admired the courage of one Lowell Green for suggesting in the Ottawa Journal that in the future, if there are to be executions, they be televised publicly. I see no reason why they should not. We have allowed the monster of television into this chamber, and I do not know how we can keep it out of anything else it might be interested in getting into, including the courts. If this chamber, the highest court of the land, is televised, then every other court of the land should be televised so that the public can watch the process of justice, particularly in cases of murder. Then I think we would have justification for the vote which was taken in this House.

One notes, of course, that the murder rate dropped after the decision to abolish capital punishment. I believe we saved some lives, and not just those of murderers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE SEAL HUNT

RIGHT OF SEALERS TO FREEDOM FROM HARASSMENT AND INTERFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

If the House gives the necessary consent to my motion, I forgo the right to debate and I will also forgo the right to present the very substantial arguments supporting my motion. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard):

That this House reaffirms the right of Canadian sealers to go about their legitimate pursuit under the strict supervision of the Government of Canada and the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies, free from harassment and interference.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by Mr. McGrath. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

AIR TRANSPORT

CALL FOR STATEMENT ON REPORTED DEFECTS IN COMMUNICATIONS PROCEDURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In June of 1976, Transport Canada's committee on air traffic services' operational interfaces with aeradio stations outlined serious defects in communications procedures relative to air traffic control centres and aeradio stations.

Since the committee described this situation as being clearly dangerous, and since the recommendations advanced by the committee have not been implemented, despite their strong expression of the urgent need for immediate action, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That a clear statement be made by the minister relative to this report, outlining the areas where recommendations have not been acted upon and the reasons for the minister's failure to act.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BELL CANADA PETITION RESPECTING SAUDI ARABIA CONTRACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I seek to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On March 2, Bell Canada submitted a petition asking the governor in council to overturn the decision of CRTC that revenue from the $1.1 billion Saudi Arabia contract be treated as part of Bell Canada's ordinary revenues for regulatory purposes.

In view of the fact that the CRTC is supposed to regulate Bell's telephone rates according to the level of profitability of Bell's operations and the kinds of contracts and undertakings entered into by Bell Canada and their effects on Bell's earnings, and since Bell Canada has chosen to enter into this contract directly, rather than through a subsidiary operation, thereby making Canadian telephone subscribers liable through increased rates for any loss which might be incurred as the result of the contract, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House recommend that the petition be denied.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REQUEST GOVERNMENT NOT USE INFORMATION ON INDIVIDUALS FOR WRONGFUL PURPOSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Since it is now obvious that computer snoopers can easily obtain confidential information from national and continental data bank with startling easiness, as evidenced in an article in the Globe and Mail of today entitled: "Computer Snooper Finds It's Easy Work" in which an expert finds it easy to use computers to intrude in the private life of people; and considering that the Canadian government is increasingly dependent on that kind of data to obtain information on its citizens, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle):

That the House take necessary steps in the shortest possible time so that individuals may provide in all security the information required by departments without any fear that such information may be used for unlawful purposes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FUNDING OF CANADIAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity concerning the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, answers given by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) to my recent order paper questions, and another matter related thereto.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the government explain immediately the discrepancy between the answer to order paper question No. 293 which shows the total public funds given to the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews during the past year as $767,000, whereas the financial statement of the organization shows total receipts of the organization from all sources, including government and private contributions, to be only $749,000, of which $646,000 apparently came from private contributions; that the government make known immediately whether it is prepared to investigate whether or not renovation funds and rental funds paid by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews for their new Toronto headquarters in any way came from government funds for premises located in Toronto in which a Liberal senator is reported to have a substantial interest—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Once again it seems to me the hon. member is working into the terms of his motion some facts in support of the proposition he wants to put forward. I think we must be very careful to confine the motion to a motion and leave the debate for later on, if it is accepted. The member seems to want to have it both ways; to put the motion and to put the arguments in support thereof within the terms of the motion itself.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, there is just one sentence left to the motion which I do not think is provocative:

—and, finally, whether certain directors of the council received bonuses of $2,500 from public funds.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS FOR OFFSHORE LABOUR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact the Canadian greenhouse industry relies heavily on the announced program of offshore labour and has required labourers thereunder since mid-February for planting, that labour for which contracts were tendered in January for mid-February arrival are due to arrive on Wednesday of this week, and that half of the same are being prevented from so doing by reason of delay in processing by Canadian medical staff, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas):

That this House instruct the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to waive immediately the requirement of medical examination on-site and instruct his officials to admit all of those Mexican labourers currently ready to travel on Wednesday with a view to processing the medicals in Canada, so as to assure no further delay in planting and caring for the spring greenhouse crops takes place.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GUIDELINES FOR NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who late Friday afternoon called a press conference which turned out to be his version of The Gong Show.

In announcing the formation of a National Commission on Inflation, the minister chose not to set any guidelines for the commission to follow respecting prices, wage increases or profit increases. Would he tell us what, in fact, are the guidelines the commission will be expected to follow? Or are we to assume that a price hike of, say, 50 per cent will not worry anyone on the commission?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): If the hon. member would read the commission's terms of reference, he would see that we want the commission to identify areas where there is danger there might be heavy pressure on inflation, thus endangering Canada's competitive advantage.

We do not expect the commission to look at all the settlements and price increases; we want them to identify the points at which there is pressure on the system. I have great confidence that the commission, under its chairman, Mr. Renouf, will be able to discuss such situations with the people involved and persuade them that in the best interests of the economy they ought not to proceed with increases which have been judged to be too great.

Mr. Stevens: The minister is no doubt aware that the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity came up with some interesting observations about the source of inflationary forces in Canada, including the fact that one-third of last year's inflation was due to the fall in the value of the dollar alone and that much of the rest was caused by the high interest structure due to government policy.

In the light of these observations, would the minister tell us why he chooses not to listen to that body but prefers to turn to a new body which will, presumably, be much quieter and less embarrassing to the government?

Mr. Chrétien: I do not want it to be quieter, Mr. Speaker. I have responded to the wishes of the House of Commons that it be given greater powers of inquiry. This was not easy to do because of the relationship of that body to the Economic Council. However, we have adopted the recommendations of a lot of people who are interested in the subject by giving this commission the power of inquiry. I hope this will be satisfactory to the public. Everyone will be obliged to give information to this commission.

Mr. Stevens: If the purpose of setting up the National Commission on Inflation is not to bury the issue of inflation at least for the election period, would the minister tell us why the government has named Harold Renouf as chairman, bearing in mind that he was brought to Ottawa to bury the AIB? Is it not a fact that you want him to bury any meaningful dialogue on inflation in this country?

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member wants to make politics out of everything.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Renouf came in at the peak of the board's activity. He ran the organization very smoothly for two years, in which he managed to gain the confidence of both business and labour. He is a very competent man, a very good administrator and he has a lot of credibility, something that is lacking in the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): We can all take a lesson in making politics from the Minister of Finance, because every time there is an election there is a new commission. We have had five of them since 1969, and in that period the rate of inflation has gone from 4.5 per cent to 9 per cent.

Will this new commission—this illegitimate son of the AIB—be reporting to the House, and hence to the public; or will it, as the minister suggests, be reporting only to cabinet where ministers may suppress its recommendations if they are not to their liking?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have directed the commission to report to the public when it deems appropriate to do so. It is within its terms of reference. Of course, once it has reported to the public, it will be free to report to cabinet but it is left up to its discretion to decide whether the abuses it might have found in the system ought to be made public or not. However, if after consultations and negotiations with the persons concerned, these people still refuse to work in the economic interest of this nation, I am convinced that the Renouf commission will release their names. At the same time, it will be able to make recommendations to the government and we shall study them but all its reports will be made public if it wishes.

● (1420)

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, apart altogether from getting another monitoring agency, which is the fifth such agency we have had, does the government have a strategy to hold down prices to complement the work of this commission? For example, in 1974 the government announced that they would be bringing in a strategy for food prices, a food strategy, and since that time food prices have risen by 50 per cent.

Is there any strategy within the government to complement this commission, especially to hold down food prices and restrain the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have discussed in this House many times the constraints we have to face with regard to food prices. There are many factors which come into play. There is the fact that we import a great portion of our food and that the price of that food is set at the international level.

I merely want to ensure that when there are price increases, the public is satisfied that there is no gouging by anybody. The commission will look into such matters and report on them. Of course, we must admit that there will always be some price increases in any market economy. We cannot impose controls on prices only and ignore other sectors of the economy. This is why we have decided not to reimpose controls and to expose all the facts to the public.

I hope that the hon. member will support such a move, because both parties on the other side were opposed to controls. We are not planning to impose controls. We want the market economy to operate normally, and this is why we are giving the public the instrument necessary to ensure that it will operate normally.

Mr. Clark: I think I have heard that before.

REASON NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION NOT EMPOWERED TO ROLL BACK PRICES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance with regard to setting up the National Commission on Inflation.

Since this is the fifth body which has been set up in less than ten years to cope with the problem of inflation, and since the NCI is to have terms of reference which are almost identical with those given to the first commission, the incomes policy commission headed by Mr. John Young, and since that commission was a total failure in so far as holding down the cost of living was concerned, will the minister tell the House why, in the name of fairness and equity, he has not given this proposed commission the power to roll back prices where they find that there are unconscionable profits or deliberate gouging of the Canadian consumer? How can the minister expect a commission to operate sucessfully when he has already tied its hands behind its back?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government imposed controls in the fall of 1975. When I became Minister of Finance in the fall of 1977, we decided to get out of controls. I am not proposing that we get back into them.

The other problem is that you cannot give an institution such as this the power of rollback under the Canadian Constitution unless it is considered an emergency situation, and the government at this time has concluded that we are not in such a position.

Since we got out of controls in April, 1978, I recognize that generally speaking in the Canadian economy, both labour and management have shown a great deal of responsibility, and I think that we can hope for the best in the future if all facts are put before the public. We have set up this commission for one reason, and that is because CSIP did not have the power of inquiry. They were not given the power of inquiry because the first ministers a year ago said that they did not want CSIP to have the power of inquiry. The government has concluded that the power of inquiry was needed by CSIP, but as we could not give this power to CSIP we created a new institution.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Mr. Renouf, chairman of the NCI, is quoted in the press as saying that this organization does not propose to require companies or unions to report quarterly on prices and profits, nor does it intend to have access to the confidential information in the possession of Statistics Canada.

Not talking about controls, but talking about gouging the Canadian housewife because of the fact that previous royal commissions have shown that the difference between the price the farmer receives and the price the customer pays in the store cannot be justified, I should like to ask the minister how he proposes that this commission or the government will find out who is gouging the public—whether it is the processor, the distributor, the wholesaler or the retailer—unless they get the information which Mr. Renouf says they are not going to require?

Is this body he is setting up not only to be toothless but also unable to see out of one eye and to be prevented from seeing out of the other one?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Renouf, as head of the AIB, had two inquiries in the last twelve months about profits of the food chains and has seen that the profit margin is nothing abnormal according to the present situation. He will keep monitoring that situation.

Mr. Renouf said that he does not expect to use his power of inquiry very often because he found when he was managing the AIB that the great majority of institutions were quite willing to give him the information he needed. He has the power, however, and I am sure he will use it in cases such as, for example, the president of Dow Chemical and others who have said they will not report to anybody. Everybody will be obliged to report to him, and those who do not will be forced to do so under the law.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary question. What does this board have the power to do about specific cases of gouging? I would point out to the minister two instances of this. The first is the steel industry, where the workers settled for an increase of between 6 per cent and 7 per cent while steel industry profits last year went up from $196 million to $296 million, an increase of 45.6 per cent. The other instance is the banking fraternity, where high interest rates have resulted in profits going up by 34 per cent, or nearly $1 billion, and already in 1979 profits have gone up by 36 per cent.

What power does the board have in that situation? If the minister does not think it has the power to do anything, what does he propose to do about calling in the steel industry and the banking fraternity and telling them they are the people who are pushing up the cost of living, and that they must do something about it? What is the government's policy, or is this board simply something to get them through the election because they intend to continue in their slothful state of apathy?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we stated in the fall of 1977 that we would return to a market economy, and I do indeed recall that at that time the NDP and the Progressive Conservative party wanted a return to a market economy. That is what we have at present. As for certain aspects of profits, it is normal that companies make profits in a market system, as capital is entitled to dividends, the same way as workers. The question is to ensure that there are no abuses and that is what the commission will do. As for bankers, hon. members will recall, Mr. Speaker, that a few weeks ago, for example, a bank announced that it would raise interest rates for Chargex cards. Following our representations, it reduced these rates. As for bank profits, there was a problem in our system, that we called income debentures, and in our November 16 budget, we eliminated this system by which banks could make profits we found excessive, and the House will be asked to ratify this through the estimates that are presently before the House.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

ALASKA HIGHWAY PIPELINE—POSSIBLE DATE OF CONSTRUCTION—DISCUSSIONS WITH PRESIDENT CARTER

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

During his very recent trip to Washington, the Prime Minister seems to have obtained from President Carter the assurance that the American government will soon undertake the construction of the Alaska gas pipeline. Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us whether, in addition to that promise, President Carter gave an idea of the date around which construction would start, and whether the American President asked something in exchange, such as shipments or exports of natural gas from Canada to the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it must be understood that President Carter and myself share the same point of view on the whole energy problem. Recent events in Iran have shown us all, I believe, that the problem of the security of supply, the problem of prices can constitute a serious threat unless we take defensive steps and creative measures for the future. It is in that context that President Carter assured me that the American administration would do everything in its power for that pipeline to go ahead, and reassured us that there were no ulterior motives on its part because the urgency of the problem had been demonstrated over there just as it was here through the desire of both governments, his and ours, to put in place legislation that would allow us to have a rationing system eventually. We hope we will not have to do so, but the legislation is necessary. It is now before a committee of the House and we trust we will have the co-operation of all parties to expedite passage of that bill.

As for the question of the hon. member on something in exchange, the answer is no. We, of course, discussed eventual exports, but no new project or new contract has been signed or is being planned between the United States and Canada. I took exactly the stand that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources upheld here in the House after the report of the National Energy Board was published.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—EFFECT ON AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister indicate whether it is his intention to extend the authority of the National Commission on Inflation to primary agricultural producers, and whether that authority will extend to provincial and national marketing agencies?

An hon. Member: What about Loto Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the authority is not restricted at all, but for cases which are under direct provincial government jurisdiction—for instance, settlement of price increases which come under the authority of provincial governments—the commissioner has been asked to get in touch with the provinces. I spoke twice with all the ministers of finance last week before making that arrangement. Most of them were very pleased and there was no objection from anyone. But in Quebec Mr. Parizeau wanted to consult his lawyer before replying to me. I think that is the only restriction that has been imposed on the commission. The problem of inflation concerns all Canadians in every jurisdiction.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. He has been kind enough to indicate that the authority does in fact extend a great deal to the provincial marketing systems. Would the minister care to indicate whether or not it extends to the national marketing systems?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said that no restrictions were placed on the commission's terms of reference empowering it to comment on all sectors of the Canadian economy. Its members may obviously comment on these sectors, but the commission cannot force marketing boards or other agencies to reduce their prices or salary increases. Under its terms of reference, the commission can only try to convince them to do so and, if unsuccessful, to so inform the general public.

LABOUR DISPUTES

POST OFFICE—REPORT OF MEDIATOR-ARBITRATOR

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. The mediator-arbitrator appointed by the House under the back-to-work legislation which terminated the postal strike was given 90 days to file the first report with the Minister of Labour. However, he has applied for, and received, two consecutive extensions to this deadline.

Why is the mediator-arbitrator applying for extensions, and are all parties to the dispute agreeing to the extensions? Furthermore, Canadians are interested in knowing the current status of the negotiations.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer is rather simple. The mediator-arbitrator was nominated by Bill C-8 through the Ministry of Labour. According to the law, he has the right to ask for extensions to his mandate if he needs time to study the facts and to meet the people necessary in order to complete his arbitration award.

I think the question should be asked of Judge Tremblay as to why an extension was asked for. Apparently the mediator-arbitrator needs time to clarify a few items and to meet some people from both sides, namely, representatives of the employers and employees. I hope he will get his report out as soon as possible. I have no other answer than that, sir.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, according to the president of the Letter Carriers Union, Mr. Robert McGarry, Post Office management has "multiplied like rabbits" in the last ten years, turning the Post Office into an inefficient mess. Given the fact that according to Mr. McGarry the number of managers has increased by 500 per cent since 1968, while the number of workers has only grown by 50 per cent in the same period, I would like the Postmaster General to explain this gross discrepancy, and how does he justify it? Is the presence of too many chiefs one of the points of discontent in the Post Office?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I did discuss with the Deputy Postmaster General the allegation made by Mr. McGarry, president of the Letter Carriers Union. This was done in a very positive and constructive way—not like the allegation which the hon. member just made. We are a little puzzled about the figures Mr. McGarry gave. I would like Mr. McGarry to substantiate his allegation of a 500 per cent increase.

REPORTED PROFITEERING BY WESTERN OIL COMPANIES—MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE THEREOF

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It was reported today that several Arab oil countries are concerned that western oil companies are profiting from unstable world oil markets. In fact, the term "ugly exploitation" was used. It was suggested they will be blacklisted if they persist, whatever that means. Does the energy minister know of anything in this regard? Does it affect Canada, and is he looking into the matter?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any profiteering of that kind. As I have indicated in the House, there is always the possibility that trading companies could be trying to cream off profits in a way that does not necessarily assist the Canadian national interest. Indeed, I have made it quite clear if that was the result of the Exxon diversion, the Petroleum Compensation Board would intervene, it would check the invoices and ensure that any such higher prices would not be passed through or be compensated for by the Petroleum Compensation Board.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADA'S COMMITMENT TO NATO

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if the subject of our broken financial commitment to NATO was discussed during his visit to Washington.

Last June, the Prime Minister promised NATO that Canada would increase its over-all defence budget by 3 per cent in real terms. Estimates now indicate a cut in real terms. Could the Prime Minister give an explanation to the House for this drastic shortfall?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter was not raised by President Carter. Obviously, he does not share the concern, real or feigned, of the hon. member.

As to the amount of the estimates, I do not have them at hand and I would have to defer to the Minister of National Defence to answer this question. I believe that over a five-year cycle we have budgeted for the undertakings that we gave of a certain rate of growth, particularly real growth, in capital expenditures but I do not have the figures at hand.

CONTRACT SIGNING DATE FOR NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence—on duty somewhere, I am sure—I would like to point out to the Prime Minister that the Minister of National Defence last May projected a contract signing date for the new fighter aircraft for the fall of 1978 which has now been postponed to late fall, 1979. Could the Prime Minister give an explanation to the House about a defence project that in less than a year has fallen behind more than a year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have information that the Minister of National Defence is touring the National Defence Medical Centre in Toronto.

An hon. Member: He is sick.

Mr. Trudeau: On the project the hon. member is referring to, I repeat that I do not have the estimates and the knowledge before me. It is quite clear that when I announced last summer that the government would be cutting some $2 billion from its projected expenditures, it did mean that many projects in many areas of the economy—and I do not see why National Defence would have to be an exception, provided we live up to our over-all commitments—and would be deferred. This is perhaps one which will take one year more than originally anticipated.

ENERGY

LOCATION IN ONTARIO OF HEXAFLUORIDE REFINERY FOR ELDORADO NUCLEAR

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I understand the environmental assessment review panel has reported that there are no environmental difficulties in building in Ontario, at either of three separate sites, a new hexafluoride refinery for Eldorado Nuclear. I wonder if the minister could indicate when a decision will be made respecting that location.

● (1440)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I expect it will be soon.

Mr. Lawrence: By "soon", does the minister mean in a matter of days, weeks, months, or after the election? Second, can the minister tell the House whether the decision will be his, or whether it will be a cabinet decision on the recommendation of the minister?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will be discussing this with my colleagues and in all probability it will be a decision of cabinet. I can tell the hon. member that I have received a good deal of interest with regard to this question from the hon. member for Algoma. He earlier came to me and asked exactly the same question, how soon could he expect an answer with respect to the particular refinery. Indeed, the hon. member for Sudbury has also expressed an interest in this question. I hope there might be an answer on this matter in the very near future.

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE ON PARTICIPATION OF WOMEN IN WORK FORCE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. The minister said in Toronto recently that the job shortage is partly a result of the increased participation of women in the work force over the past few years. In particular he said, "We expect this rapid increase will taper off in the future".

Since previous estimates by his department were so woefully wrong with regard to participation rates for women, necessitating a report to the first ministers' conference last November because of its previous wrong projections, a statement that the department had underestimated to some extent the future of females and hence the aggregate participation rate—causing, I might say, untold hardship for women through the cutback by his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration—can the minister now indicate on what he bases this projected decrease in the rate of entry of women into the work force? Is this a direction that his department is now promoting or supporting?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the rate of increase has been very high in the last few years. We do not object to it. We have said it is a fact we have to live with, that there are more women coming into the labour force than before. We welcome that. However, it is a problem for the total economy: we have to create an equivalent number of jobs to accommodate this increase.

The participation rate has increased very rapidly over the past four or five years. It is evident that at some time it will taper off. When you compare the spread in most of the developed nations, it is evident that ten years ago in Canada the participation rate of women in the labour force was lower than in the United States and in European countries. The gap between Canada and the United States is now virtually nil. It is evident from that the acceleration will stop very soon.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful that the minister is not opposed to women entering the work force. I am sure there will be a lot of comfort as a result of that statement.

Since the minister mentioned other countries, can he indicate whether in fact there will be any publication of new labour force growth projections by his department based on the recent report of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, which in its own survey indicated considerable growth both in the United States and in European countries with respect to increasing participation rates for women in the work force? If the minister has read those reports, can he advise if his department is going to publish new figures which would indicate a much more optimistic and realistic projection than the one the minister enunciated in Toronto?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will obviously be happy, when I report to the House on this matter, to make the necessary adjustments if my estimates are wrong. These studies are now being made throughout the world. I have read reports stating, for instance, that in certain European countries the participation rate of women in the labour force has decreased over the last three years. I am not in a position, therefore, to make a full report. I am following this situation as closely as possible, and I will be happy, at the first opportunity, to report back to the House, with the required adjustments if necessary.

[English]

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—POWER TO PREVENT EXCESSIVE PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I want to ask about a couple of specific price increases and what the commission will do about them.

Price increases have been brought to my attention by housewives who have been shopping. In the last six months, the price of raisins in this country has more than doubled. That is based on information that the wholesale price has gone up by 74 cents a pound and the retail price in Toronto by $1.64 a pound. Therefore, the rip-off is a 90 cents a pound increase in six months. What, specifically, can the National Commission on Inflation do about such an obvious rip-off as is now occurring with regard to raisins in this country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has concluded that it is a rip-off. There are many factors that do not show in a price increase. Most of the time the biggest part of the price increase is because the goods are imported and the price abroad has increased faster than in Canada. We want to make sure retailers in Canada do not abuse their position.

The AIB made a review of this during the summer, and another review last month. They concluded that, generally speaking, the mark-up by retailers in relation to their sales has not increased in the last while. If the hon. member has proof of a rip-off, he should give that to the commission, which will certainly investigate. The hon. member makes the sweeping statement that it is always a rip-off. I think the rip-off is probably very much in his own mind.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I am not talking about a general situation; I am talking about something specific. The wholesale price has gone up by 74 cents a pound and the retail price in Toronto has gone up by $1.64. The difference between the Canadian wholesale price and the retail price is 90 cents. That has occurred in the last six months. This is the Canadian dollar; it does not concern imports.

What will the new commission do about specific charges such as this? Why does the minister not give them the power, not for a general control on prices but to stop gouging of this sort where it finds that gouging has indeed occurred?

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is being completely unrealistic when he says they should have the power to roll back on one item only. He knows that when you have controls, you have to control the whole economy. You cannot impose controls for 24 hours on one product; that will not work.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON LANGUAGE RIGHTS BEFORE DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Leader of the Opposition has characterized the language policies of the government as being divisive, can the Prime Minister say whether an opportunity will be given to the House to express itself on the question of the constitutional entrenchment of language rights prior to dissolution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, once again we are faced with an answer which would depend on the date of dissolution. I repeat the undertaking that the House leader and myself gave about ten days ago, that it would be the desire of the government to refer, hopefully, to a joint committee of the other place and the House of Commons the report of the Official Languages Commissioner. We hope that a debate on that will permit members on both sides to indicate their particular party's policy on the language question which the hon. member quotes his former leader saying "as being divisive".

Mr. Schumacher: Does the Prime Minister have any intention of tabling a replacement of Bill C-60 before dissolution?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe I indicated at the press conference following the first ministers' conference in early February that if we were sitting long enough, we would want to do that. However, it might not be the entire contents of the former Bill C-60: it might be more specific in some areas. If there is such a bill, I can assure the hon. member that one element of it would be a bill of rights, including a bill of rights in the language area.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—ANTICIPATED NUMBER OF STAFF

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. When the AIB was implemented there was some concern on this side of the House as to the extent of the bureaucracy. In 1975 we were told that this bureaucracy would be approximately 200, in 1976 we found it had grown to 485, and in 1978 we were looking at the figure of at least 635.

We now have the National Commission on Inflation. What assurance can the minister give the House that we are not setting up yet another massive bureaucracy that will grow just like Topsy?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had discussions with Mr. Renouf and he does not intend to have a commission with more than 100 employees. Of course, at this time he will recruit his personnel from people available in the CSIP and people now employed by the AIB and due to complete their work in the next few weeks or months.

I think that the combined elimination of CSIP and AIB and creation of that new commission will result in fewer people monitoring inflation than there were at the beginning of the year.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, we have heard those words before. In 1975 only 200 were to be involved. We then arrived at the figure of 635. I assume the minister is now putting his seat on the line with regard to this figure of about 100.

I would now ask him this question: Are the personnel being taken from CSIP and AIB personnel? Is that the understanding? Is the minister now stating that he does not envisage more than 100 people working for the National Commission on Inflation?

● (1450)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the number of people working for the new commission will not exceed 100. The number of people working for CSIP at this time is, I think, 74. A few hundred people are working for the Anti-Inflation Board. The Anti-Inflation Board will finish its work within a matter of weeks. I explained earlier that if we now have 100 and a couple of hundred disappear, we are gaining.

Mr. Alexander: We don't want any more.

FINANCE

REDEMPTION OF CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. A total of $498 million in Canada Savings Bonds was redeemed as of February 21 this year, compared with $117 million at this time last year. Since Canadians are galloping to the banks to vote no confidence in this government through the sale of one-fifth of their bonds, is the minister making any plans to encourage them to hold on to the other four-fifths and, if so, what are they?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, people are totally free to do as they wish with their investments. We have several methods to get funds, and Canada Savings Bonds are one of them. Canadians have a lot of savings, and one of the indications that they do is that they must make a little money.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AIR SERVICES AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, if I can get his attention. In bilateral talks with Canadian officials later this month the United States will be seeking to deregulate across-the-border travel which, if proceeded with, will ultimately mean cheaper air fares for people travelling into and out of Canada.

Is it the government's intention to adhere to the 1974 air services agreement which allows one country to block the other's cross-border fare proposals; in other words, to stay away from any kind of deregulating process between the two countries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have been happy to deal with the question if the hon. member had given me notice. Having had no notice, I can only take note of the question on behalf of the minister, who is busy and will be in the House presently.

RESEARCH

AWARDING OF CONTRACT FOR RESEARCH TRAWLERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether we can expect an announcement in the near future regarding the awarding of an important contract for research trawlers. This matter is the subject of a great deal of anticipation in certain areas of Nova Scotia, particularly at the historic port of Pictou.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes, I think the government will soon be in a position to announce a decision in that regard, and I hope that the population of Nova Scotia will be pleased with it.

INDUSTRY

CANADIAN SUPPLY OF STEEL

Mr. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of State (Small Business).

On February 6 I raised a question in the House with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce about the severe shortage of steel in the country and what plans the government had to assure Canadian businesses that they could receive supplies. I received a reply from the minister, who said that the government was making every effort to ensure supplies to Canadian businesses. Just one week later, one of my constituents received a letter from the Minister of State (Small Business) which stated that it is unfortunate that Canadian mills find it impossible to increase output quickly and that in the meantime many steel users are turning to imports to supplement domestic supply.

Is it government policy now to encourage imports of steel for Canadian manufacturers, or does the government have a policy of trying to assure Canadian manufacturers adequate steel supplies as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course, I do not know what particular representations were made to the hon. member, nor from where; but the hon. member will recall that very few months ago we were receiving representations, from the west coast in particular, that we should keep Canadian steel out of British Columbia in order that we might import steel from overseas.

Mr. Friesen: We can't get any.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand, and that indicates how the economy is booming. The steel industry is now producing at full capacity. Just a few months ago there was an excess of steel in the markets of the world. Thank goodness the Canadian steel industry, its workers and investors have proved particularly efficient in ensuring that they could not only survive that period but also come through it with production at full capacity.

Hon. members opposite have flip-flopped completely, as usual, and are complaining that there is not enough steel. They were complaining about too much just a few months ago.

STEEL NEEDED FOR EXPORT OF MANUFACTURED GOODS TO UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ASSIST

Mr. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I find it incredible that the Minister of Finance is saying that because of the devalued dollar our finished goods export opportunities will increase, but that the government is taking no steps whatsoever to ensure that our manufacturers can get steel.

What steps is the government taking to ensure that small Canadian businesses can get the steel they need to export manufactured goods to the United States?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, for a year I have been advising Canadian businesses to make plans for the time when Canadian production capacity will be completely utilized. Had they made investments earlier in higher capacity, there would be more steel available now. The problem at this point is that the steel industry is still functioning at full capacity, and when we are faced with full capacity we run into shortages.

I will refer this matter to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and I hope Canadian producers will see that it would be in their best interests to keep their Canadian clients happy, because they are the industry's best clients.

FORESTRY

PRIVATIZATION OF FOREST PRODUCTS LABORATORIES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a follow-up question for the Minister of State (Environment), who is also responsible for forestry.

Is the minister in a position today to tell the House and forest scientific staff who are engaged in forest products laboratories in Vancouver and Ottawa to what extent his efforts to privatize these institutions have been successful, whether the lay-off notices which have been mailed out by his department and which are to be effective April 1 are still to be effective, and whether sufficient capital has been found to defray the cost of these services?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the move to privatize the two laboratories is going very well. I sent the hon. member a press release a few days ago, or perhaps last week, indicating that the interim board of directors has been very successful in its quest for funds. The board is very hopeful that all the employees now working for the laboratories will move over and work for the new organization. I have also been told by Mr. Bob Rogers that the board's quest for funds from various sources has been successful in the initial stages.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because of this press release that I have been concerned. Even though this group has had some meetings and has passed the hat—to use the minister's words—around the country, there has not been a firm commitment to these people that they will have jobs after April 1. The question is whether the minister will communicate to this constituency that they will be assured of a job after April 1, or of someone to sign their pay cheques after that date?

● (1500)

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the interim board of directors of Forintek, which is a new organization, has indicated very clearly to its employees that they have been offered jobs. As I said before, I hope the employees will see fit to become members of the new organization. I am very confident that this can be accomplished, as is the new board of directors, and that the privatization of these two labs will take place efficiently.

PUBLIC WORKS

MIRABEL AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION OF PERIPHERAL LANDS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works, but in his absence I should like to put it to the acting minister.

Since the minister announced outside the House on Friday the government's plan for a Public Works Lands Company to administer peripheral lands at Mirabel airport, would the minister do us the courtesy of explaining what the purpose of this company is, and why it requires the expenditure of over $8 million in the coming fiscal year? Will it possess any assets currently held by the Department of Public Works, and will it be hiring any employees who have been working for the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is an existing body within the Department of Public Works at present and it will be taking over the organization of the area within its own terms of reference. It is not a new body and therefore the existing employees will be operating it.

Mr. McKinley: It seems to me that this is a ploy on behalf of the government to cut down on the losses and not show them, losses that are being experienced in the operation of that white elephant.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, there was no change whatsoever in the budget—the same employees and the same budget.

An hon. Member: And still a white elephant.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROUSE—CORRECTION OF STATISTICS GIVEN DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has never been my policy intentionally to mislead the House. Since I asked my question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), I have learned that my figures were incorrect. I would appreciate the opportunity to put the proper figures on the record. As of February 28, total redemptions in 1979 of Canada Savings Bonds exceed $541 million, which is a rate of almost $12 million per banking day. Last year, only $133 million in bonds had been redeemed, over $3 million a day.

COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER REPORT

On the order: Government notices of motions:

March 2, 1979—The Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1978, tabled Tuesday, February 20, 1979 (Sessional Paper No. 304-1/301);

That 20 members of the House of Commons to be designated by the House at a later date be the members of the Special Joint Committee and that Standing Order 65(5) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable and to delegate to subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21, this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under Government Orders at the next sitting of the House.

(a) $367,270.

(b) Normal maintenance of ice surface and facilities.

4. Design of new skate/boat facility adjacent to the canal at Fifth Avenue in addition to general skating area between the Château Locks and Hartwell Locks and Dow's Lake.

(a) $358,000 including design fees for new skate/boat facility.

(b) Normal maintenance of ice surface and facilities and design of new skate/boat facility.

[Mr. Pinard.]

P.O.—LANGUAGE REQUIREMENTS

Question No. 811—Mr. Jones:

1. Are there language requirements for employees of Canadian Post Offices and if so, what are they? Is language training available to all employees of Canadian Post Offices?

2. If language training is not available, how is the criteria for language proficiency met (a) for currently-employed postal workers and (b) for any new employees?

3. Are supervisors in Canadian Post Offices required to hire a certain percentage of English to French employees, with those above mentioned languages as their first tongue?

4. Are posts within the Canadian Post Offices classified as bilingual and if, so, what are they? Are posts within the Canadian Post Offices classified as unilingual English and if so, what are they? Are posts within the Canadian Post Offices classified as unilingual French and if so, what are they?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. (a) Yes—there are language requirements and these are based on the functions and job description of positions. For each of the four skills (reading, writing, listening and speaking) the Public Service Commission recognizes three types of levels of proficiency which we have to follow to establish the language requirements required of incumbents to satisfactorily perform their duties.

	Type	Level(s)	Code
I	General	Superior	C
		Intermediate	B
		Minimum	A
II	Instrumental	Limited	R
III	Technical or professional	Particular	P

(b) Yes and the priorities are set forth by the Public Service Commission.

2. Not applicable.

3. No. Positions are staffed in accordance with the requirements of the job.

4. (a) Yes, there are positions in Canadian Post Offices identified as bilingual. Supervisory positions as well as positions serving the public mainly those of wicket clerks in areas where there is sufficient demand to warrant services in both official languages.

(b) and (c) Yes, based on the functions and duties to be performed there are positions identified as English essential or French essential only.

AIRCRAFT

Question No. 885—Mr. Howie:

1. What is the flying range of the F-16 and the F-18A Aircraft?

2. What military purpose will each aircraft perform and what aircraft will they replace?

3. What effect, if any, will the flying range of each aircraft have on the continued use of CFB Chatham in New Brunswick?

4. Is the government or the Department of National Defence considering contingency plans for the relocation of the Chatham Base for the final NFA selection and, if so, what alternate sites are being, or have been, considered?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The range of an aircraft is dependent on a large number of variables which must be precisely defined before any comparison can be made. However, in general terms, the combat radius of action of the F-16 and F-18A is as low as 300 nautical miles and up to more than 2,500 nautical miles for ferry purposes depending on air speed, altitude and configuration such as weapons load and external fuel tanks.

2. The new fighter aircraft will replace the CF-101s based in Canada and the CF-104s based in Europe. The various missions of the new fighter aircraft are air defence, defensive counter air, close air support, interdiction, offensive counter air and anti-maritime surface.

3. Not applicable.

4. DND is currently conducting studies to establish which deployment bases are best suited strategically for the new fighter aircraft.

DOMINION COAL BOARD

Question No. 919—Mr. Stevens:

1. For each fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits for the Dominion Coal Board?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the Corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the Corporation (c) investment by the government in the Corporation both before and after any write off?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1 and 2. The dominion coal board was dissolved by the Dominion Coal Board Dissolution Act which was proclaimed in force on May 1, 1970.

DND—FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Question No. 949—Mr. Leggatt:

1. What are the estimated ranges of the CF-16 and the CF18A, the two fighter aircraft on the DND shortlist?

2. Will their ranges be affected by their proposed roles, that is, will they have different ranges in North America as opposed to Europe and, if so, what will be the ranges?

3. Will new landing strips have to be constructed in the Canadian North in order to accommodate the aircraft?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. See answer to question No. 885 answered this day.

2. Yes. In the air-to-air role the range for both fighters in North America or Europe will be approximately 700 nautical miles. In the low level air-to-surface role in Europe the range will be approximately 300 nautical miles.

3. No.

U.S.S.R.—TRANSFER OF MONEYS TO SURVIVING RELATIVES

Question No. 1,188—Mr. Shymko:

For each year since 1968, what amount in estate moneys were transferred from (a) Canada to surviving relatives in the U.S.S.R. (b) the U.S.S.R. to surviving relatives in Canada?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): This is a provincial matter as the provinces alone have jurisdiction over the transferral of estate moneys.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-29, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, as is the case on every occasion when we discuss the topic of housing in the House, I take the opportunity to remind my friends and colleagues of some of the difficulties and problems experienced by a significant segment of our society in respect of the critical shortage of living space. It is left to me in this debate to articulate these problems, which affect about 20 per cent of our population, and particularly that part of our population which lives in rural areas and which is of native ancestry.

It appears to me that the more changes and amendments this government makes, the more things stay the same. Almost every day we are treated to fundamental changes in the orientation of government departments. The UIC and manpower problems have been reoriented from what they were in 1968 when the present government took over. Last week we had a reorganization bill before the House which reorganized the Department of the Environment, taking away from it the Department of Fisheries and establishing it as an autonomous agency. Today we heard the minister say that we have reorganized the food monitoring agency from what it was three or four years ago—twice during that time the government has developed a new awareness of this crucial problem—and now we are treated to yet another agency. In housing, the more improvements this government claims the worse things seem to get.

My colleagues have been treating the House to horror stories of government programs which have failed, of hardship and deprivation suffered by Canadians, not just those in the poorer income categories but also those in the middle income category, people who are stuck with AHOP housing and who thought at one time that they were entitled, as are most other Canadians, by virtue of owning their house, to having a cushion against inflation. These stories are on the record and they should be recommended reading not just to our colleagues in the House but to all Canadians.

I have listened carefully and attentively to the points the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) made in his opening remarks. He has not been present in the debate in the House since that time and he is not in the House today. I suppose he is out conducting another Gallup poll in respect of housing, because the statistics he laid before the House are mainly those that were given to him as a result of a Gallup poll.

The minister said that there is a new awareness in the government of the crucial problems facing us in respect of housing. He said, for instance, that the provisions in this bill address specifically our great national objectives, the first of which is probably the most important, namely, the considerable increase in the number of housing units which meet the needs of Canadians with lowest incomes. Further on in his speech he identified that need as being an immediate need for 30,000 housing units in one year. He said further:

> Our present housing programs, which are undertaken in conjunction with the provincial governments, hardly provide at the moment 19,000 units a year; it is not enough to meet the needs of the country. It is obvious that we must build each year a greater number of units for old and low income people.

I am almost compelled to accuse the minister of misleading the House. It was nonsense for the minister to say that 19,000 new housing units for low income Canadians have been built. Further, the minister indicated that during the last four years housing starts in Canada reached an average of nearly 250,000 units, and that that is not sufficient. He described in glowing terms the government's record in its past performance. One almost began to wonder, as the minister was speaking both inside and outside the House, what the reason is for another change in housing policy and another reorientation when things apparently were going so well.

It will be left to me to talk about rural and native housing. The program initiated in 1974 has been a total failure; there are no other words to describe it. In his speech the minister said that there were certain obstacles to the program and that he is confident these obstacles have been removed. Again that is nonsense. The minister is attempting to shift an even greater burden to the provinces. He is including the municipalities of the country in the housing scheme. The minister is creating more obstacles than he is removing. His commitment to 30,000 new housing units for low income Canadians in one year is nothing but a dream which exists in the minister's mind. It will never be fulfilled.

It is my intention to lay before the House the statistics regarding the government's real performance in the last five years. The intention is to shift a partial burden of the financing of low income housing schemes to the provinces in addition to a 2 per cent interest rate. There have been consultations with the provinces, but there is no evidence of clear commitments from the provinces or the municipalities that they have greater faith in the government's new orientation program than the last one.

Perhaps it can reasonably be asked why the government should play a role in this important area. Surely we on this side of the House do not have to demonstrate the need for government intervention in this area. Hon. members on all sides of the House agree that government has a very real role to play. Perhaps government members have been more skilful in articulating this need, even though nothing is being done about it. The concept of subsidized housing for low income Canadians cannot be argued. Housing is a very significant component of a social contract. Adequate and comfortable housing and the right to privacy are very significant components in the social evolution of our citizens. Of course, my party differs in its approach to the type of people who should achieve their right to proper and adequate living, those people with steady incomes and those with lower ones.

We have spoken about the deductibility of the interest portion of the monthly mortgage payment for tax purposes and a portion of the property tax which individuals pay. The government claims such a scheme does not work. There are many other schemes, all of which have been successful in other parts of the world, particularly in countries the government uses for comparison purposes in areas other than housing.

For instance, there is a scheme whereby individuals are encouraged to invest through a mortgage exchange corporation. That is something which should have been passed in the House years ago. It has been sitting on the shelf somewhere and has never been proclaimed. The mortgage exchange corporation would allow individuals and investors to invest in the housing field with the concession of not having to pay income tax on certain earnings from such investments. The scheme works well in the United States. It has kept the United States interest rates 4 per cent to 5 per cent below our own. Whatever scheme is used or decided upon, it must be one which functions. It must not be one which sees the minister getting up in the House every two years and proclaiming in glowing terms that the government finally has seen the light and that there is a commitment to do something about it, without tangible evidence that such a commitment can be fulfilled.

There is no difficulty in determining how people in the very poor categories should be helped. Surely the element exists in this country, as it does in others, which says: "Why should I help him? He has lived on welfare all his life. He is drawing unemployment insurance and is a burden on society. Why must I now build him a house?" One must ask what fault it is of the small child or younger Canadians who live in substandard dwellings because their parents have not learned to manage well. What fault is it of theirs? If we do not help them, and if we do not make a commitment to alleviate their problems, they will follow their parents' footsteps and the problem will be compounded many times over in the next decades.

After 11 years of its just society, the government claims a monopoly on social conscience. I should like to give hon. members of the House an assessment of the government's record in this important area. In order to identify the people of which I am speaking, I should like to give a few statistics as to the seriousness of the social deprivation 20 per cent of our fellow citizens face.

Approximately 20 per cent of the poor in our country, or the lowest 20 per cent of income earners, have seen their family incomes decline by 7 per cent since the just society was declared. I am not drawing these statistics out of the air; they come from the government's record. That 20 per cent at the lower end of the economic scale earns 4.4 per cent of the nation's income. Incidentally the upper 20 per cent, the highest 20 per cent of income earners, earns 42.2 per cent of the nation's income. Be it in industrial negotiations or be it in the government's commitments to its public servants and social contracts, its commitments always are based upon percentages. If a family lives on an income of $8,000 a year and if the increment is to be 5 per cent, the family can expect its income to increase by $400. If we talk about the persons who earn $40,000 annually, their increments, of course, would be five times higher, or $2,000 a year. Incidentally, there are many persons in Canada who earn $40,000, most of them being in the public service. Both these groups of people buy their bread, lettuce, meat and steaks from the same stores. Perhaps I should not refer to steaks because the first group of which I speak are not buying steaks. Both these groups are buying their essential commodities and services from the same stores but their incomes are 500 per cent apart.

The rich in the country have been getting richer; the poor have been getting poorer. The inner circle of the just society is getting smaller and smaller all the time. Also the living space of that important sector of society, that 20 per cent of low income Canadians, is getting smaller.

Let me demonstrate how serious this problem is. I draw attention to a press report in the Toronto Sun. I am sure hon. members will say immediately that it is a scandalous report, a scandalous paper. But let me put on record what it says in the Toronto Sun and set it against a press release I received in my office today from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner). I quote the Sun:

Edmonton, Alberta:

A doctor in the small town of High Level has suggested that bad housing conditions may be a contributing factor in the deaths of three Indian babies in the remote village of Assumption from an ailment similar to the so-called "Naples Dark Disease".

Dr. Doreen Mitchinson who makes weekly visits to the nursing station in Assumption, said housing conditions there are "far from ideal."

What an understatement that is!

The houses are mostly wooden and they can be very drafty with just a wood-burning stove to heat them.

"Sometimes there can be 10 to 13 people living in a one-room house with two or three babies under a year under the same roof. It predisposes the children to more illness."

There was not a great outcry when the electronic media exposed the story briefly one night but it drew my attention and I did some research in the press. The only mention I could find was in the Toronto Sun. It picked up this horror story comparing housing conditions in our country with the poorest slums in Italy. What an indictment! Some people were upset; some people were ashamed. The minister sent us a press release and I want to put a portion of it on record. He said:

There is no question that health problems such as respiratory disease are related to poor housing and overcrowding.

The communities where these deaths have occurred are all too symptomatic of reserve housing conditions in general, but particularly in remote areas.

Unfortunately, the Indian housing program, like virtually all other government programs, is under severe financial pressure. I do, however, intend to review the situation to see what further action may be possible within limited resources.

The only word I know to describe that situation is "incredible". The minister is quoting need for restraint at a time when we are confronted with a further 8.9 per cent increase in projected spending for the coming year, at a time when we see no attempt being made to curb spending in the non-productive sectors of the economy, at a time when we see no curbing of the government's appetite to continue with its frivolous dream. It is left to me, as I say, to make the case for 20 per cent of Canadian citizens, the category which includes natives and non-status Indians. The government's record in this regard is one of negligence—one is tempted to say, of criminal negligence.

It is not that the government is unaware of the problem. In 1968, as I have mentioned, great pronouncements were made concerning commitments to establish equity and bring these Canadians into the mainstream of the national life. Task forces were set up and voluminous reports were issued. The Hellyer report is one example. The Rheaume commission also travelled across the country examining this problem. Mountains of submissions were received from native councils and people interested in social affairs, all saying that something needed to be done, that something needed to be done immediately, that something needed to be done desperately, to establish a greater degree of equity in this regard.

Then, of course, the government had its own reports. I have one here, a voluminous document containing some 62 pages and entitled "Revised Draft Program and Discussion Papers with regard to Housing Policy for Indians on Reserves". It is written in the usual bureaucratic jargon. I don't know how many times this document has been revised; it was probably drawn up in the 1930s and revised every time a minister felt the need for it or felt himself under pressure to make a statement. I invite hon. members to put themselves into the position of an Indian on an outlying reserve who is given this document, a document within which is locked the secret of how he can achieve the kind of housing which 60 per cent of all Canadians take for granted and accept as a right, not just as a privilege. The whole of this document should really be put on record because it is a typical example of bureaucratic nonsense. Let me quote just a couple of paragraphs, however:

> The Band Councils, through a housing management authority to be established for each band, would prepare project submissions outlining the housing program requirements, type of houses, costs, funding mechanisms and proposed maintenance procedures.

What a bunch of nonsense! Imagine the reaction to all this of members of a remote band isolated from the mainstream of Canadian life. Most of those living on the reserves are without radio and television; they have no access to newspapers, and not many of the older people can read newspapers anyway.

Another paragraph in this document has to do with training for the housing management authority which it is proposed to establish. The department would generously assume the responsibility for training representatives from the housing management authority in the "proper utilization of federal funding programs, the development of labour training programs and encouraging adequate design standards and proper maintenance procedures." A planning cycle is outlined. Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker—a five-year planning cycle involving band councils submitting annual forecasts for three years as the basis for the preparation of three-year forecasts, two-year estimates and one-year budgets? Has this government ever shown any evidence of ability to forecast for even two months ahead with any accuracy? Yet these Indians are expected to forecast their needs for five years ahead. Here is another paragraph:

> In terms of tenure, it is suggested that the Band Councils, through the housing management authority, hold title of the housing obtained through the non-profit housing program and that this authority be charged with managing the housing on an ongoing basis and seeing to the collection of rents/loan repayments.

When we deal with Indian housing, we deal with a very serious problem which cannot be addressed by contemporary bureaucrats. What we are dealing with is a cultural gap between the manner in which we in the House and in the country see ourselves helping our constituents and the manner in which the native community in our country hopes to achieve equity. This paper deals only with the problems of status Indians on the reserves. There are a number of most peculiar components to the problem which have confounded the social engineers and the public bureaucrats in trying to solve it.

Native culture is not taught in our schools or learning institutions where, for example, Mr. Teron or our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) received their education. The schools do not teach students about the cultures of the native people in our country. There is also the problem of the concept of communal living which says it is not important to own your own home. Even if it were important, so long as the Ministry of Indian Affairs and Northern Development retains ownership of the house once it is built, how can we ask the Indian person to make payments on this house and investments for the future if it is not his in the first place? The house belongs to the ministry of Indian affairs or the governor in council.

In one sense this paper says that the band should have the right to own the house and property, but it also describes the needs of the individual with regard to ownership. What a contradiction! There is the whole problem of the high cost of servicing, utilities, insulation and building in the north and rural areas. We were told last year, and it is reiterated in this paper, that the subsidy of $10,000 which the department of Indian affairs offered to natives on reserves would be increased to $12,000 for status Indians who wished to build near urban areas, and to $18,000 for those who wished to build in remote areas. I am sure that anybody who has looked at the housing market over the last two or three years in this regard will not find it difficult to understand that this is just so much nonsense, and that with $18,000 one could not even cover the cost of putting the four walls up never mind the roof, furnace or water taps.

There are examples throughout the country of attempts to provide the most primitive shelter for people on Indian reserves as a result of trying to work within the constraints of these financial guidelines. The department of Indian affairs said last year with regard to the rural situation that, in addition to the $18,000, CMHC would be required to contribute another $28 million, Manpower to contribute another $48 million and other departments to contribute another $19 million over a five-year period to alleviate this crisis in the area of reserve housing. My friend and colleague, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes), will speak more specifically about reserve housing.

I would like to speak about the non-status situation and the rural situation which are as equally crucial and important. In 1971 the Prime Minister said that there is a clear commitment by the government to a scheme which would provide natives throughout the land, non-status Indians and, generally, people in rural areas with housing and that they should look at the right to own a home as an inalienable right in this country with the resources we have. I said earlier that the government has known of the problem. This is reflected in the Prime Minister's statement of 1971, but nothing has happened.

Another commitment was made—and I will not bother the House by going into the actual references in Hansard—in 1972.

Of course, it was in the early 1970s when the natives became organized and, out of sheer frustration, became militant. In an attempt to make their positions felt here in Ottawa they began to exercise some political muscle. Hon. members will recall that in September 1973 the message got across to the bureaucrats and the people in the policy planning group, and as a result a policy was actually developed. However, when it was shown to the Indians, hon. members will recall that one of the people who was charged with developing this policy and who had a clear mandate to negotiate with the native people was fired because he had discussed with them the intricacies of such a policy. This firing took place in spite of the fact that the minister had ordered the individual to make sure that whatever policy was advanced to the cabinet had the approval and acceptance of the native community.

In those years a whole new science developed within the bureaucracy. The conventional manner of giving these people a snow job did not work as well because they began to take the ministers at their word, and every time they or the Prime Minister or one of the senior bureaucrats made a new commitment, the native people expected it to be fulfilled. Of course, when that did not happen the native people became very concerned, outspoken and militant.

Then there was the new approach—which really is not new at all but which certainly came in handy at the time—of dividing and conquering, dividing the status native community from the non-status native community, the urban native community from the rural native community, and so on. Eventually, however, a decision had to be made, and it came in March, 1974, precisely five years ago when the policy for rural native housing was announced.

This year is the fifth anniversary of this policy, and it is in this climate that I have the opportunity to speak on this matter again. Let me put on the record the manner in which the policy is described in the manual under the heading "Rural and Native Housing":

> CMHCs rural and native housing policy, announced in March, 1974, attempts to marshall all of the resources of the NHA for the benefit of rural and native people and, specifically, within the next five years, to acquire or build 50,000 housing units for these people and to rehabilitate an equal number.

Over a five-year period there would be 100,000 new housing units. The manual goes on to say:

> The policy is to encourage the people concerned to plan, build and manage their own projects as much as possible, so that they will acquire not only housing but new skills and economic security as well. The resources of many other federal programs are channelled to rural and native people through an interdepartmental committee, of which CMHC is chairman. At the provincial level, federal-provincial rural and native housing committees perform a similar function.
> One innovative aspect of the policy is to allow rural and native people to buy their homes with monthly payments related to their incomes, on a scale similar to that used to calculate rents in public housing projects.

● (1540)

The natives had asked for 30,000 new homes but the minister, not to be outdone, said their needs were for 50,000. That can well be demonstrated by all the reports I have enumerated, such as the Hellyer report and the Rheaume report.

Let me deal briefly with the record of this policy to build 50,000 homes over a five-year period and to rehabilitate another 50,000. In 1975, after the first year, I asked the minister how many homes had been built. The minister had forgotten there was such a policy but he checked with his officials and two or three days later said 24 of the 50,000 homes had been built. They were all in my constituency. It was a project I demonstrated in my home town, because we have to start somewhere, Mr. Speaker. A year later I asked the question again. At that time, 300 houses had been built.

When I was preparing my remarks for today. I telephoned CMHC to see how the policy had performed. The information service did not know of its existence. Apparently the minister's office was alerted and a directive sent to the people in charge of it to give me whatever information I wanted. I was told that 31,144 houses had been built over the five-year period. That was a source of comfort to me, as I had not checked how it was going over the last few months.

I asked where the houses had been built. My province of British Columbia was mentioned and the province of Ontario. I asked how many new houses in total had been built and was told that the 50,000 houses were a combination of new and rehabilitated houses. I reminded them that the program was to build 50,000 new houses and rehabilitate the same number. I read the minister's press relase to them, I read the minister's speech in the House to them and an excerpt from the government's housing policy. It was admitted that all this was very true and they offered to give me the figures on the new houses actually built. In the five-year period 7,753 houses had been built and 23,391 rehabilitated.

I shall give the figures for each province in order to demonstrate the kind of response received for his frivolous dream from the provinces. In Newfoundland, 1,824 houses were built; in Nova Scotia, 549; Prince Edward Island, 45; New Brunswick, 450; and Ontario, 834. The program works well in Ontario and Newfoundland because there are groups organized by natives to provide a delivery system. In Manitoba, 1,266 houses were built and in Saskatchewan, 1,549 were built. In Alberta, the province with the housing problem described in the story in the Toronto Sun, 405 houses were built; and in British Columbia, 838. There was no requirement for the government to make any deal in the two territories. Surely we cannot abrogate our responsibilities for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Only 34 of the 50,000 houses were built in the Northwest Territories. In the Yukon it was zero; no new houses under this program for the Yukon.

I have omitted the province of Quebec, where the minister is the champion of federalism, the champion of all that is good and desirable in a just society.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will be relatively brief. I want to speak about two aspects of the bill, the one that relates to the more effective delivery of housing to Indian reserves, and the other that deals with the conservation of heritage buildings. They seem at first blush to be rather disparate elements, but one stems from my responsibility as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the other from my mandate in the parks program for heritage preservation. There are aspects of the bill which will be helpful in dealing with both areas and I should like to draw the attention of the House to those amendments which I think will help address the problem that has been under discussion.

If we look at the problems confronting the department in coming to grips with the very serious housing conditions on Indian reservations, I think we all share the view that a great deal has to be done. The hon. member who just preceded me, in a fashion which I think is rather characteristic of him, pointed out the problems, discussed some of the difficulties and dwelt on some of the shortcomings, but failed to mention some of the improvements we have made in respect of housing on the reserves in the last ten years. I do not think anyone who is anxious to be fair would deny there has been substantial progress. What has to be admitted is that there are still outstanding difficulties facing the department in trying to address the problem of Indian housing.

I think it is important to recognize that in the past ten years we have built approximately 10,800 houses on Indian reserves. In 1973-74, our rate of new house construction was approximately 2,000 per year, but as a result of a decision taken in cabinet in August, 1977, the rate was increased to about 2,400 new houses per year. At the same time, some existing 3,000 houses on Indian reserves are currently being renovated each year.

That is an improvement over what was being done. Although hon. members opposite tend to dissociate themselves from the past, they cannot avoid the reality that they were the government of this country between 1957 and 1963. They were not great years, Mr. Speaker, but the point is that they also had a chance to address the question of Indian housing. They also had a chance at that point to address the question of health services on reserves. I would ask any of them, particularly the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), to compare the rate of new housing in those years, the rate of new infrastructure in terms of water supply and health delivery services in those years, with what has been done in recent years. I agree with the hon. member that the task is still in front of us and, if anything, is becoming more difficult to cope with.

The housing needs analysis which was effective in December, 1977, indicated there is still a need over the next five years for approximately 22,500 new homes and the rehabilitation of some 30,000 existing homes on Indian reserves across Canada. There is no question that new construction and renovation is badly needed to reduce overcrowding, to replace substandard housing, and to provide for newly formed families. There is equally no question in my mind that the failure of governments, and—let us be realistic—the failure of this parliament, to find sufficient sums to meet this problem has contributed to the conditions which the hon. member I think rightly described. Maybe the tragedy he referred to of those Indian children will quicken the consciences of members in this House on all sides to recognize that there is more to be done in these areas affecting the Indian people.

I am dealing specifically with the status Indians. The hon. member went on to discuss the Metis and non-status Indians, and that is a question we can probably discuss in committee. The fact is there have been some achievements; there is no question about that. In recent years particularly there have been some solid achievements. The task is still there and it is an immense one. In my rough estimate, if we would try to catch up to that backlog, say over a period of five years, we are looking at an expenditure of something like $400 million. This is just to try to deal with the housing problem alone on the reserves. The present rate of expenditure is something like $195 million. There is a question of financing that is directly involved, but there is also a question of will and I think to the extent this chamber is engaged in a debate about this, there seems to be concern on both sides of the House that we address this question more forcibly. Hopefully when we get to committee we will be able to generate a little head of steam which in turn will lead to some money, increased appropriations, to deal with this very important problem.

Let me point out that Bill C-29 which is before us does help deal with the problem. I just want to go over the reason why. One of the main financing questions has been to supplement my department's $12,000 capital housing subsidy with programs from other federal departments. I want to tell the House today that after some discussions I think it is fair to say that we are in the final stages of developing a formula for using LEAP funds from CEIC, in a manner that coincides with the summer construction season. This has been a source of difficulty with the Indian people over the past two or three years. I think we are fairly close to an agreement that would allow these Canada Works funds to come in at the beginning of the season to maximize the construction period during the summer months.

Another important mechanism for financing Indian housing and for narrowing the gap between a decent house and what my department's housing subsidy can provide is through the provisions of the National Housing Act and its delivery agent, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There have been and still are difficulties in applying the NHA to the particular circumstances of Indian reserves. However, improvements are being made, in particular some of the amendments proposed in Bill C-29.

The most important feature of the proposed amendments to the Indian people is the non-profit housing program, which is designed to increase the supply of low rent housing. This program enables non-profit groups and co-op groups, in this case Indian chiefs and councils, to develop the most appropriate form of housing at minimum cost to low and moderate income families and individuals. It is obviously potentially quite useful in the reserve situation since the majority of Indian people are in low and moderate income groups.

Many bands have been reluctant to use CMHC loans because of the requirement to incorporate. They felt that such incorporation would affect their Indian status and put reserve land in jeopardy. Amendments to section 15(1) remove the major block to the utilization of CMHC programs in response to the particular concern of the Indian people which I have mentioned. As a result of amendments to section 15(1), Indians will be able to obtain all the benefits of non-profit housing without the necessity of having to legally incorporate as non-profit organizations.

How the non-profit housing program works is that it provides a mechanism for obtaining capital funds for bands to build houses and rent them to occupants wishing to supplement my department's $12,000 housing subsidy. The capital funds in this case come from CMHC, but not, until passage of this bill, from approved lenders, which is the important addition. These lenders normally require some form of mortgage for their funds. Following the passage of Bill C-29 the approved lenders will be able to make loans to Indians for housing on reserves without having to take mortgages on reserve property. My guarantee, as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, of repayment of the loan in case of default will be the security needed for such loans.

With respect to the non-profit housing program, there is already provision in the National Housing Act for interest reduction. Through an operating agreement with the chief and band council the interest rate on these loans can be as low as 1 per cent or 2 per cent. Thus, the payment schedule for the occupant to the band is only a modest amount. This bill should ease the problems that bands have in financing housing in this particular way.

Besides the non-profit housing improvements, the amendments also affect the application of RRAP, the residential rehabilitation assistance program. This program is designed to upgrade the existing housing stock in low income areas through a combination of low interest and forgivable loans.

Under a revised section 34.1 the amendments expand the scope of RRAP to cover all Indian reserves. Henceforth all Indian bands will qualify for assistance, irrespective of the location of the Indian reserves. Formerly, it was a requirement for participation in RRAP that Indian reserves be located in areas which provinces designated as high unemployment. As is frequently the case, Indian reserves with high rates of unemployment could be located in areas of otherwise high employment. With the passage of Bill C-29 this will no longer make such affected reserves ineligible for RRAP.

Indian leaders in Canada have been consistent in their representations as to how we must address the housing problem on reserves. They are saying that the authority and responsibility for delivering a housing program must be at the level of the Indian band council. Members here today will recall earlier remarks I have made in this House endorsing the concepts of Indian control and Indian self-determination. Our housing program direction is aimed very much along the line of this philosophy, although progress is often agonizingly slow.

The amendments concerning non-profit housing are designed to further the objective of placing housing responsibility at the band level. At the same time the department is setting up regional Indian housing councils to help monitor and supervise the implementation of the housing program.

Indian people also say to me that my department should be responsible for co-ordinating financing and programming sources for Indian bands or groups of bands. My participation in this debate and the provisions to tailor the NHA to reserve circumstances are a reflection of my commitment to respond to this co-ordinating responsibility.

Indian people are arguing that there should be a strong association between land tenure and the trust responsibility of the minister of Indian affairs. I believe in this context that Indian bands need to be able to develop mechanisms for granting tenure without jeopardizing the status of reserve lands. As I stated earlier, this bill will provide greater flexibility in this respect.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we all have an obligation to continue to work with the Indian people to try to solve the problem of Indian housing, and to work with the Indian people in a meaningful way, because in the final analysis they may be and probably are the best judges of how housing problems on the reserves should be handled. I happen to believe that the bill before us in that respect is a contribution to the objectives I and the Indian people have, and of course I welcome them.

I would like for a moment, if I may, to look at the bill in terms of my mandate as the minister responsible for Parks Canada, particularly the national program of historic conservation and commemoration. You may not know this, Mr. Speaker, but there are some one million buildings in Canada which were constructed prior to 1920. These buildings are a highly valuable resource in terms of capital investment, the labour and culture they represent, yet many of these are in a poor state of repair and are often threatened with demolition.

The loss of historic properties and the destruction of neighbourhoods and streetscapes is a continuing drain on our national built heritage. CMHC is being most helpful in encouraging recycling, renovation and heritage preservation in Canada. There is an emerging policy thrust in heritage, and my colleague referred to existing practices in a speech to HUDAC last week.

This bill should complement these CMHC practices in the following ways. First, provision is made in the bill for obtaining funds for non-residential heritage property conversions. This means that in addition to financing the renovation of existing rental properties, the financing will be extended to cover, for example, the conversion of old warehouses to apartments where heritage improvements are being undertaken.

Second, through the RRAP program the bill will help heritage renovators by increasing the attractiveness of heritage projects to private lenders. The bill provides for insurance of privately financed residential rehabilitation under RRAP. This provision replaces a direct loan program by CMHC. The advantage of it is that in future, when refinancing of mortgages is permitted by CMHC, heritage renovators will be able to refinance multiple mortgages to obtain a single mortgage at first mortgage rates.

Third, the bill facilitates non-profit housing co-operatives by relaxing the membership requirements from the stipulation of 80 per cent to 50 per cent of members or shareholders also being residents. In conjunction with the introduction of this bill, CMHC has been encouraging non-profit co-operatives to enter into the field of heritage restoration through the RRAP program. Thus financing will be made somewhat easier for persons wishing to recycle older buildings. Bill C-29 helps to meet the widespread concerns Canadians have for preserving our built heritage.

Other initiatives have been taken recently. The week before last, for instance, I set up a study group of senior officials from the Departments of Finance, Public Works, Secretary of State, CMHC, my own department and Heritage Canada to consider proposals and present within a month recommendations for government action to help save our built heritage. They will be focusing on tax policy, and in particular on possible ways to neutralize the tax incentives to demolish buildings. Tax laws affecting demolition are strongly believed to have unfortunate consequences for heritage conservation. This theme became very clear in the meeting the cabinet recently held in Toronto where we received a submission from Heritage Canada. That was the brunt of their presentation to cabinet.

This government feels that it is important to encourage the recycling of the built structures in this country. It is a matter of avoiding the irreparable mistake of wasting this important resource. It is clearly a waste of material, workmanship and energy to destroy buildings. The buildings we live in and work in are a vital and tangible part of our heritage.

Heritage preservation makes economic sense as well. It usually means renovation, and renovation is particularly labour intensive. Studies have tended to show more jobs created through investment in renovation than an equivalent amount in new construction.

At the beginning of this month I met with groups of professionals and businessmen and with representatives from municipal and provincial governments to discuss actions that the government and the private sector can take. There was strong support for the initiatives the government is now discussing. As a result, there is a concerted effort between the government and concerned elements of the private sector to consider ways to stimulate and provide incentives for investment in heritage structures. This group also stressed the importance of the role of CMHC. The bill under consideration at the present time is another measure to increase the participation of the private sector. The private sector is concerned about the adaptive re-use of buildings and is ready to act. This government is responding. This bill is an important part of that response and a demonstration that the government is determined to take action.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in rising to contribute to the debate on Bill C-29, I cannot recall how many times in the six and a half years that I have been here that we have been asked to contribute to a debate on the housing policies of this government.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

I recall the first time I spoke in a debate such as this in 1973. My advice to the government then to solve the housing problem in Canada was for the government to get out of the housing field. The minister of the day, Ron Basford, now a private citizen living in Vancouver, followed my advice to the extend that he got out. First he got out of the housing and urban affairs ministry. A few years later he got out of the justice ministry, and not too many weeks ago Mr. Basford got out of this parliament.

There are quite a few members opposite who should follow my advice and, along with the government, get out of the housing field. In fact, they should get out altogether. Maybe at the time of the next election the electors will take care of getting a few members opposite out of this parliament. They can follow the example of their former colleague, Mr. Basford, and take up private life wherever they happen to come from.

It is now the intention of this government to do something drastic with the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. Maybe the whole thing will be wound up. That would be good for the Government of Canada. It would also be good for the people of Canada.

Another time I contributed to a debate on the housing policy of this government was in 1975. I want to quote briefly from Hansard for January 27, 1975, page 2631, a speech I made at that time:

> I have mentioned the basic problem in speeches before today, namely, government interference in the housing industry. I have cited examples of high-cost government housing, the need for money in lieu of shelter so that the individual or family can be free to choose their home. I quote from an editorial which appeared last September in the Vancouver Province:
> "—our housing difficulties, particularly in the rental field, compose a classic case of problem creation by government.
> It continued:
> We did not begin to experience real rental shortages in this country until the federal government removed the tax incentives that channelled a lot of private money into rental accommodation."

They have not learned. They have not done anything to reintroduce this incentive on a permanent basis. As a result, there is continuing confusion in the housing field in Canada today. I want to read another short excerpt from that speech:

> Let me say just a word or two about what the minister himself said. He is credited with saying that the intent of his bill is aimed at increasing the supply and holding down the cost of housing in the low and medium price range both for home ownership and for rental. He says that if we are really going to meet the demand, we must draw much more heavily on private capital. Of course, the minister cannot draw on that private capital by himself but needs the co-operation of his government. The government, in the past two successive budgets, has indicated it is not able or willing to control the economic situation in Canada so that private capital will be attracted to those areas to which certain government ministers wish it attracted.

No action has been taken by the government to try to correct the situation which existed four years ago. Billions of dollars have been diverted to the United States. Expertise in the housing industry has gone to the United States. We see the sorry spectacle of Canadian expertise and Canadian capital providing housing for Americans. The government does not ask itself why that happens. It keeps coming up with more and more programs, which reminds me of the old saying that we certainly have too much government in Canada, but thank goodness we do not have as much as we are paying for. We need only look at the publications of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs to realize where we are.

I have with me two booklets, one put out by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and one by the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. The publication put out by CMHC is a list of its publications, and it runs to 11 pages. The companion booklet put out by the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs contains a list of its publications, and that booklet runs to over 25 pages. It is clear that we have too much government, but the government opposite just continues with its policies and seems to think everyone likes them.

I think we should look for a moment at where we are now, six years after I first made a speech about housing in this House. We have the very same problems we had six years ago. It is true that some programs have been introduced. The government has given us an alphabet soup of programs. We have CHIP, we had DIP, and we have NIP. We have AHOP, ARP and RRAP, not to mention GPM, the graduated payment mortgage, about which I will say a word a little later.

In the last six years we have seen a dramatic increase in the level of interest rates for mortgages. However, people who are in the market for mortgages can be somewhat thankful now that there is so much money in Canada looking for something in which to invest.

Mortgages are actually available now at rates lower than bank loan rates. Mortgages are available at under 12 per cent in some instances, whereas the prime rate for bank loans is now 12 per cent. Higher interest rates, of course, magnified what was already the largest single component in the cost of a house over the years, but higher interest rates are understandable, expected and, in fact, necessary in order to attract capital for any kind of investment. If we reflect on the rates of true return some decades ago, we can see that capital was invested for a return of somewhere in the neighbourhood of 3 per cent. In the past decade or so inflation rates have ranged from between 7 per cent and, I suppose, 11 per cent. One naturally has to have an adjustment in the rate of return on capital; otherwise there will not be any capital available at all.

The high interest rates we have now are a direct result of the policies of the government opposite. The government has a lack of ability or willingness—I do not care which—to control inflation, the great robber. Why does the government love inflation so? The government loves inflation so much it is married to it. I do now know if we can tell exactly why, but one reason might be that inflation gives the government an opportunity to steal from the taxpayers of Canada. Inflation allows the government to reduce the value of the debt it must pay in the future, and this, of course, is at the expense of those who can least afford it, those on fixed incomes.

We might wonder whether it is really true that the government relies on inflation or loves inflation, but let us examine two of its current housing programs and see how they require continuing inflation in order to succeed. One of these programs is the assisted rental program, ARP. After the government destroyed the incentive aspect of investment in rental housing it found, as it was told it would, that the supply of rental housing dried up. The government's solution was the assisted rental program. The purpose of that program is simply to reduce the economic rent for a rental property to what is called market rent. The government makes up the difference to the landlord. However, that money is not just given to the landlord. Even this government would not want to do that, so the money is lent to the landlord, albeit interest-free for the first ten years. Then the landlord must start repaying. If we do not have continuing inflation, the mounting debt created by the advances to the landlord in the early stages of the assisted rental program loan will bankrupt the landlord. I do not think the government wants all those landlords to go bankrupt.

I do not think the government realized what it was doing, but that clearly is the effect of the assisted rental program. It needs to be re-examined by the government and particularly by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) so that he can see the danger of these policies for the Canadian economy and for investors in Canada.

Let us consider the graduated payment mortgage, wherein payments by the home owner or purchaser for the first few years are at a lower than normal level. After a stated period, which is to be flexible—it might be three years, five years or more—the amount of the payments jumps up all of a sudden, presumably because the purchaser is in a better position to pay a larger payment later on. The problem this creates is that before the point at which the mortgage payments increase, the excess interest which is not covered by the initial payments has eaten into the home owner's equity in the property. Unless we have continuing inflation, home owners would then be in a loss position on the investment. If we do not have continuing inflation, we will have the situation we already have at some AHOP projects in which home owners simply have no equity. They treat what they have paid as rent and walk away, leaving communities in some cases to become ghost towns.

The other flaw in the graduated payment mortgage idea is that while the home owner may be in a better position and have a higher income five years down the road, all his other costs will have gone up too, and unless he is able to keep ahead of inflation by getting promotions and the like, he will not be any better able to pay higher mortgage payments then than he is now.

Having given a couple of examples of the government's apparent reliance upon continuing inflation, I want to say something about the effects of the inflation which the government has allowed to continue. We know that during this calendar year the national debt will rise above the $100 billion level. We are used to talking about billions, and perhaps $100 billion is a figure which some people can grasp. After all, it amounts to only two years' total expenditures of the Government of Canada. Let us put this into perspective. Let us divide that by the number of people. Let us get a per capita amount for that debt. That amount is about $4,300 per Canadian. Mr. Speaker, you and I may be able to handle our share, but what about the family man who has four dependants? If we multiply his per capita share by five, will he be able to come up with his $22,000 share of that national debt? The answer, of course, is that he will not, unless it can be stretched over a large number of years.

In the meantime we are now faced with interest on the national debt of some $8 billion. Translated into the terms of the current budget, that is about 15 per cent of the total expenditures of the government of Canada this year; 15 per cent of $52 billion is about $8 billion which we owe in interest on the national debt. That does not say anything about raising a little extra capital to pay it off. Somebody has to pay that off. If the present government is not willing to, perhaps they will be looking toward another government which will at least get things turned around and going in the right direction. We cannot spend ourselves out of debt, any more than could New York City or any other city or province, or any more than can any other household or individual. After all, Mr. Speaker, the government is simply operating essential services in the name of you and me; at least that was the original idea. For them to go on this profligate spending spree is abominable.

What are the facts of the situation? Where are we now? We hear a lot about problems in the housing field, the housing shortage, and so on. There is no housing shortage in Canada today. In fact, on the new housing market there are some 70,000 unlived in and unsold houses. Vancancy rates in rental properties in many areas are soaring. It is true that you will not find them in the densely populated cities because that is the popular place to live, but I can take you to many areas in British Columbia, and probably in many other parts of Canada, where vacancy rates in rental properties are soaring. One has only to look at the Ottawa Citizen, which I did this weekend, to find eight pages of houses for sale in Ottawa. How can they say there is a housing shortage? We say there is not. What there is in Canada today is a shortage of money. People who want to buy houses do not have the money to buy them; or, translated in another way, we can say that the problem in Canada today is that there is an inadequate supply of affordable housing.

I have to refer to my 1975 speech again because, when I was reviewing some notes for today, I found a gem of information there.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has anybody else found it?

Mr. Clarke: I think my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will like this because I am calling on the Canadian Organization of Public Housing Tenants for support. It turns out that they realized the problems which this government has presented to them and wrote the following in their official newsletter "The Raised Roof", the first page of which is headlined "the problem is not really housing". In their lead editorial they said:

The group has tried to show members of government, housing corporations and authorities that the problem in housing is not really housing, but the entire economic question, of which housing is merely one part.

Of course, those people know better than anybody in the House, that the sure answer to the housing problem is adequate money. Anybody who has enough money can go and find himself a house anywhere he wants to live. So it is a shortage of affordable housing. It may be that in place of all the expensive government programs we have today we may end up having to look at some kind of assistance. As I said four years ago, I have often maintained that the needy should be given a housing allowance to do with as they wish. Not everyone wants to live the same way and not everyone wants to live where the government says they should, in so-called public housing. I will be speaking about the experience of our friends in the United States and the problem they have had with the bureaucracy, with the administering of these programs and with the acceptance of them.

I suppose we can expect that kind of talk from a government which has a Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) who says a home is a luxury and that his government wants to tax luxuries. They have shown their inability to gauge the needs of the industry through their tax policies. I am sorry the Minister of Finance has left the chamber because he might be interested in making a few changes on this score.

An hon. Member: Here he is.

Mr. Clarke: The Minister of Finance has returned. He may want to consider some day the detrimental effect of some of his government policies on housing. I understand the ministers opposite seldom consult with each other, and on most days they do not even talk with each other, we are told. There is a situation in Canada today where the government says they are trying to encourage home ownership and encourage young people with young families to buy homes, and yet young people working together for their future are now taxed at the highest rate possible. There is no tax shelter they have been given to allow them to save their money to purchase a home.

Mr. Chrétien: There are some.

Mr. Clarke: The minister is going to say there is RHOSP. All I can say is that the RHOSP with its $1,000 a year to a maximum of $10,000 was an absolute joke. Furthermore, it was not an incentive to buy a house because the only way one could benefit from RHOSP was to save money, not to buy a home. What kind of way is that to stimulate the economy? The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and I told the Minister of Finance at that time that the RHOSP was a crazy plan because what it would do was allow the hon. member for Hamilton West, for example—

Mr. Chrétien: Balance budget.

Mr. Clarke: So balance budget is the name of this game now? The hon. member for Hamilton West would be allowed to collapse his registered home ownership savings plan and go out and buy furniture for his wife's house which she had already owned for 20 years. What kind of a plan to encourage economic activity or to encourage housing is it? In the meantime, through inflation and higher costs of all sorts we now find that older Canadians are being taxed right out of their homes. They cannot afford to stay in their old homestead where they have lived for 30 years or more and where they want to stay.

I have dealt with where we are now, with what the old problems were and what the problems are at present. Now perhaps we should take a look at the solution. I am happy to say that my leader has offered a solution. Some of the details of it are well known. Basically, it is an economic policy with housing overtones and with very definite social effects as well. It is recognized in North America generally, but in Canada as well, that home ownership is the dream of families. It is true that all families will not be able to have their dream; nevertheless, the government should not make it more difficult for Canadians to achieve their dream. So we on this side say that tax deductibility for mortgage interest and property taxes would aid Canadians who want to buy a home.

Mr. Chrétien: That is not what you were saying two years ago in your riding.

Mr. Clarke: What we have now is a situation where young people are not encouraged to buy their homes, which means a drain on the housing market because there is not the activity necessary to contribute to the over-all economic well-being of the country.

Why is the government opposed to our proposal? The obvious reason is that the government did not think of it first or, if they thought of it first, they did not get around to acting on it, which may be more the truth. The Minister of Finance says it is a program for the rich. It is obvious that the rich do not care about a program such as this. The rich already own their own homes. If they are rich, either they are without mortgages or they have assets of sufficient size that they are able to arrange to have their mortgage interest deductible.

It is a long standing rule in our Canadian tax laws that any expense laid out to earn income is deductible. If a taxpayer borrows money for the purpose of earning income, such as buying bonds, stocks, a revenue-producing building or registered retirement savings plans, the interest paid by the taxpayer is deductible. But if he borrows money to buy a house, it is not deductible. It is so mixed up that even if a taxpayer sells his home, takes back a mortgage from the purchaser, then purchases another home and assumes a larger mortgage therefor, the poor taxpayer must include the interest income in his income for tax purposes, but he is not allowed to deduct the interest which he is paying because of receiving this interest.

Under Canadian tax laws it is very important to follow the line carefully and not be confused. One must take the correct step at the correct time. Otherwise, the minister's henchmen come along and say: "That is not what we meant; you must pay". I know it can be done. I am a chartered accountant. I used to do some tax practice before I came here. Now I have so much to do here that I can hardly keep track of what is going on in the tax laws. But any Canadian taxpayer who has any amount of assets at all can deduct his home ownership interest under the present rules, with good tax advice.

The minister indicated that this is a program for the rich. If the rich can get around this and deduct their mortgage interest anyway, let us have a program for the poor. We should let the poor deduct their mortgage interest, too. Let us not restrict mortgage deductibility to the rich. In any event, the rich have their houses; they are not the ones we on this side worry about. The rich who own their houses are not about to remortgage them unless it is for business purposes. In any event, they can easily go to the bank with their clear title certificates and borrow money if the rates are more favourable. One can be sure they will. The plan which my leader has outlined carefully throughout the country has been extremely popular, and so it should be. Canadian taxpayers and residents realize there is something in it for everyone.

Mr. Chrétien: Increasing the deficit.

Mr. Clarke: It will help young and old home owners and renters. It will help the young who are either just forming households or those who are now renting and want to become home owners. It will mean they will have the benefit of lower monthly payments than otherwise. The old home owners, the ones being forced out of their homes by the government's economic policies because the size of their pensions and savings are shrinking, will be given the right to deduct their property taxes. It will provide them with a savings and help them to stay in their houses. There is no reason for the old folks to be forced out of their houses by some uncaring government. It will help young renters because it will be easier for them to make the transition from rental to home ownership. The older people who are renters because of choice and want to live in situations other than single family homes will receive a benefit and encouragement to move to condominium type residences or to convert their properties if it can be done. Condominium type residences would provide them with the rights of home ownership and would allow them to deduct their property taxes and interest like everyone else.

The hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Johnston) participated in this debate on March 1. I should like to refer to some of his comments because he and I were members of the task force from this House which went to Washington. There were five members of the task force. We went to Washington to receive information on the United States experience with this type of program. The hon. member for Westmount started his comments by saying the following:

Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate will be quite limited.

I agree with him. His intervention was limited in content, but it was not limited in time. As nearly as I can calculate, he ended his contribution approximately 30 seconds before Your Honour would have risen to interrupt him because his 40-minute time limit had expired.

The hon. member pointed out that this type of program should not be embodied into the tax system, that there should be different kinds of incentives to encourage people to purchase their own homes, something which could be put on one week and taken off another week. That is exactly the kind of tax policy which has destroyed the Canadian economy. No taxpayer has had the opportunity of a program being in place long enough to know whether he is coming or going when dealing with the government.

The hon. member referred to the severe consequences of withdrawing this program, if necessary for cyclical reasons. If the hon. member for Westmount were present in the chamber, I would ask him: "What about the old folks who are having their purchasing power withdrawn by the government's economic and inflationary policies?" Does the hon. member not think there is a severe consequence in withdrawing purchasing power year after year? Of course there is.

Also the hon. member for Westmount talked about using a tax credit instead of tax deductibility. We have come a long way since 1917 when we had our first income tax approximately 62 years ago, and people are finally accustomed to the idea of having something deductible from their incomes in arriving at taxable incomes. It is something which makes sense, and many things are deductible. Hon. members have only to look at their experience as politicians to realize how difficult it is for the average taxpayer to digest the tax credit concept. We have only to look at the difficulty in our constituencies of people understanding the effects of a tax credit when they give money to a political party. The hon. member for Westmount is a tax practitioner. For him to suggest something which would make the tax system more complicated rather than less complicated, I cannot understand.

Also the hon. member suggested that there should be tax cuts for all instead of tax deductibility for a few. Then we would have no way of telling whether the moneys left in the people's hands by way of tax cuts would be used to stimulate the economy which so badly needs stimulation.

As my leader has said on other occasions about his economic policies, we want Canadians to take their money out of their socks and put it into stocks. I am sure that putting money into housing would have the same multiplier effect as putting it into stocks. The point is: the money is active and doing something instead of being kept in a sock or in a low interest paying bank account to be lent out by someone else.

Also in his speech the hon. member referred to a few examples and compared our system to that of the United States. But unfortunately he omitted several credits from his examples and perhaps did not give the information he intended. It has been eight years since the last tax reform which the government assured would give equity and simplicity. I am sure there is not a single taxpayer who would say that we have achieved either simplicity or equity. The policy of my party would give some sense of equity to Canadian taxpayers and allow them to stimulate the Canadian economy by encouraging the housing industry with the purchase of homes.

[Mr. Clarke.]

Previously I mentioned the trip to Washington. I should like to make some comparisons between the system in effect in the United States and what we propose on this side. The system in the United States has been in effect for 66 years, ever since its tax law was introduced in 1913. All interest costs, including mortgage interest, have always been deductible, as are all state and municipal taxes. So they have an altogether different system. In the United States an individual is allowed to deduct $1,000 as a personal exemption. In Canada this year the amount is $2,400. In the United States they have to deal with 23 million tax returns which involve tax savings as a result of the government's taxation policy. Translated into percentages this means that 26 per cent of all U.S. tax returns filed bring some kind of benefit as a result of tax deductibility; the others are satisfied by the standard deduction which, in the case of a married couple, is $3,200 in addition to the personal exemption of $1,000.

We also found that fully 50 per cent of home owners in the United States have no mortgages of any kind on their houses. Of the remaining 50 per cent, 25 per cent have mortgages on their homes but the deduction does not give them any benefit over and above the standard deduction. Thus, only 25 per cent are taking advantage of the policy.

The plan has been criticized on the ground that it contains no benefit for tenants. I ask hon. members to think for a moment. If we can get some of these tenants out of the homes they are presently renting and encourage them to buy homes, we shall be increasing the supply of rental housing or reducing the demand upon it. To look at things in another way, the effect will be to reduce or hold steady the level of rent which has to be paid for these units. Thus we would have helped tenants who choose to stay on as well as those who wish to leave by making it easier to move out.

We have heard criticism on the ground that the people of the United States did not really want this program but that once it has been introduced it could not be removed because it was politically popular. Of course, it would be unpopular for the bureaucrats in the government to get rid of it because those who are benefiting from the program like it very much. Incidentally, we were astonished by the size of the bureaucracy required to run the very many housing programs which are in effect in the United States. It is enormous, and we cannot imagine anything like it in Canada. But the tax deductibility scheme in the U.S. is run through the Internal Revenue Service in accordance with a simple procedure which does not require any addition to the bureaucracy; not even 600 people, as in the case of the AIB, and not even 100, as in the case of the NCI.

So there is what is called a reduction in revenues to put money into the system where it belongs without requiring the creation of an extensive bureaucracy along the lines that almost all housing programs seem to require. One figure I have here shows that the government was spending $250 million on housing programs in a recent taxation year.

What happened in the United States was this. We found a situation reported to us in which poor people who needed housing assistance from the government were living in homes which were almost palaces in middle class neighbourhoods, whereas the middle class taxpayers who were paying for this subsidized housing could no longer afford to live in housing of a comparable quality. Is it any wonder, then, that the middle class is rising up and supporting a program which will allow them to live a little better, when they see people who are supported by their tax dollars living in a classier manner than they themselves can afford?

The policies we have put forward will be accepted by the Canadian people. The lack of action on the part of the government in planning the economy in such a way that ordinary people can still afford to buy houses and live in them afterwards is an example of poor performance that Canadians will not accept.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He may, however, continue by unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before us today is both useful and welcome. I am glad to note that the sources of funds available for housing in Canada will be broadened by this measure. I am happy, too, with the heritage preservation provisions to which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) referred earlier in the debate. They will allow for CMHC guarantees to be used in a more effective way to permit greater private financial participation in the preservation of both neighbourhoods and individual buildings.

In my view, it is of great importance that buildings to which special merit and associations are attached should be preserved. They enhance the quality of life in our cities, improve the atmosphere of the neighbourhoods in which they exist, provide a link with our past and are increasingly popular focal points for the renovation of our city cores. So this bill, with the possibility it offers for increased private financial participation in the work of renovation, is indeed welcome.

I am also pleased about the provisions which will allow greater access to funding under the National Housing Act on the part of Indian people. In the last few years we have seen situations where many Indian people refused to utilize the method of establishing corporations to take advantage of the non-profit sections of the act. As a result, the housing programs which are available to them are much more restricted than might have been the case.

In my own area of Caughnawaga there were over 1,200 men unemployed last year, most of whom were experts in the high steel industry. They were not able to take advantage of this large reservoir of unemployed skilled men to build the housing which was needed and which many people on this reserve could afford, simply because there was no means of tapping the funding available under the National Housing Act.

These changes are very useful, and I would urge the House to pass this bill soon so that this funding can be made available for native people on reserves across the country who are desperately in need of better housing and who up to now have been restricted in their ability to achieve this housing because of the limited funding available from the Indian affairs department itself.

One aspect of the situation regarding access to funds available through the National Housing Act for Indian reserves which I feel the government should consider at second reading as a possible amendment to this bill is with regard to opening up the provisions dealing with land banking or land assembly which existed under the National Housing Act previous to the announcement by the government that it was ending this program with the provinces. This section is still in the act, as I understand it. I feel strongly that this particular provision should be opened up to Indian reserves. The reason is that many Indian reserves, especially those close to cities are experiencing the phenomena of land and buildings being sold at fire sale prices because Indian land and buildings can only be sold to other Indians. For example, in an estate sale, or where one must sell land for one reason or another, there is a limited market for the sale of that land. Usually there are about half a dozen people or less on a given reserve who happen to be successful businessmen or who have amassed money in one way or another, and they end up acquiring huge amounts of land on a given reserve. These are Indian people who have done well.

It goes against the tradition of all the Indian groups across Canada to have what was originally considered communal land but for which usufructuary rights were recognized, now being concentrated in a very few hands, and often acquired at prices which are unfair to the people or the estates selling the land. A very slight amendment in this bill would allow the land banking provisions or the land assembly provisions of the act to take effect, and if this were the case it would be possible for a band council to acquire funding from National Housing Act sources such as CMHC and thereby acquire the land at reasonable prices. They could preserve that land for the use of either the community or for resale at a more equitable price to other Indian people. It is a very unhealthy situation which is developing in this regard, and I urge the minister of Indian affairs to give my suggestion serious consideration. I will be raising my proposal again when this bill is before committee following second reading.

One other item in this bill which I like is the reference to community services. Unfortunately, the provision is not operative until 1980, but it does offer the potential of flexibility which will allow communities to do many of the things which they themselves have found are working well with some of the existing programs, such as the neighbourhood improvement program. This is a program which the government has decided to terminate, and I regret that very much. This program has done some interesting things in several areas of Canada, including my own constituency of Laprairie in the village of LaPrairie. I would urge the minister to be most sympathetic in considering whether or not to allow this sort of program to continue under the new community services title.

Over the years I have heard a number of interventions by the opposition with regard to housing. There seems to be one theme which they constantly repeat. Perhaps the official opposition does not take the extreme position of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) that the government should get out of housing altogether.

Mr. Clarke: That's what the board people say.

Mr. Watson: Nevertheless, the position of the official opposition to a great extent has been, "let the private developers do it." What they are saying is that we should let the private developers make their profits, let them speculate and let them do what they did in Toronto and around Ottawa. House prices in Toronto are approximately $20,000 higher than they should be and probably $10,000 higher than they should be in Ottawa. These higher prices have resulted simply because governments—and this includes our own because we do have some responsibility in the Ottawa area—have allowed situations to develop where land was acquired almost entirely by a small group of developers. The end result of this monopolization of land ownership around cities such as Ottawa and Toronto is tremendously higher prices for housing than are necessary.

Mr. Clarke: You want more state control.

Mr. Watson: Since 1953 we have had on our statute books laws which permitted land assembly. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who was undoubtedly responsible for the land assembly effort in Saskatchewan, is well aware of the successful land assembly program in that province. There land prices have continued to be among the lower land prices in the country around cities, and this is largely due to that government taking advantage of the land assembly provisions when land was still inexpensive.

Had this very same thing been done around Toronto and Ottawa, these two cities would be facing an entirely different situation today. These people who urge the federal government to get out of housing and out of urban affairs, unfortunately, seem to be having some success because we seem to be taking their advice. But what does it mean to get out of urban affairs? It means higher prices for the average home owner over the long run. Home prices in Ottawa could have been controlled by a combination of land assembly, National Capital Commission policies, government hiring practices, government renting practices in its buildings—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

[Mr. Watson.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Labour Disputes—Action taken to avert possible strike of Vancouver dock workers; the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin)—Regional Economic Expansion—Inquiry whether agreement reached with New Brunswick on additional development; the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett)—Trade—GATT negotiations on non-tariff trade barriers.

● (1700)

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it seems there is unanimous consent that we proceed to notice of motion No. 17 and that the preceding notices of motions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that items Nos. 7, 9 and 16 stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

ADVISABILITY OF INTRODUCING BEEF IMPORT LEGISLATION

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing beef import legislation to establish reasonable quotas on the importation of fresh, chilled and frozen beef and veal, including provisions to relate imports counter cyclically to the domestic beef supply cycle, and to thereby assure consumers of more stable supplies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that this is the first debate on a motion or bill to come before the House on the subject of a Canadian beef import law. During the last session there was a private members' bill that did not reach the House and there are at least two more private members' bills on the order paper. Needless to say, this exercise is a labour of love that I am privileged and proud to be involved in on behalf of Canada's beef cattle industry.

I am proposing new legislation involving the importation of beef, such legislation to include the following aspects: it should apply universally to beef imports from all sources; import quotas should be established annually based on historical averages that relate to the traditional beef cycle as experienced in Canada and the United States; imports should be inversely related to anticipated domestic beef supplies, the quota formula should reflect a provision for counter-cyclical quota adjustments, and live cattle should not be included. I see no reason to incorporate a price limitation since quantity quota limitations that reflect our domestic supplies should assure consumers of more stable supplies of beef. There should be no need to increase the import tariff on beef. This is in recognition of the trade we have with the United States.

These are the essential component parts of my proposal and I will return to them in more detail later.

Hon. members may ask why we need a Canadian beef import law, why we should not just continue with the annual quotas set by the Export and Import Permits Act as was done in 1977, 1978 and for the current year 1979. There are a number of important reasons for this. Canada is the only country involved in meat importing that does not have such legislation at the present time. The United States has had a meat import law since 1964 and its application—or, more properly, the threat of its application—has been very effective. In its operation, the United States asks for voluntary limitations on beef exports by exporting countries to levels suggested by United States quotas.

I should like to deal in particular with 1976. With respect to beef imports and in particular offshore imports—that is, from New Zealand and Australia—that one year provides reasons enough for a Canadian beef import law. During that year we imported 183 million pounds of beef from Australia and New Zealand, an increase of 63.9 per cent over 1975. This represented the equivalent of 523,000 head of live cows or half the total cows slaughtered in Canada that year. The cow comparison is made because those offshore beef imports competed directly with our cow beef. If we had been short of domestic beef supplies in 1976 as we are now, our Canadian cattle industry might have tolerated this, but 1976 was also the year of our all-time high record beef production. By comparison, our cattle numbers today are about 18 per cent lower.

That year, 1976, was also the year of the infamous "six cents under" rule established by our government. This decreed that all offshore beef entering Canada had to be discounted at not less than six cents per pound under the same types of meat entering the United States. These price discounts were usually 20 to 30 cents per pound below the U.S. level for the same imported beef and of course established a Canadian ceiling on cow prices at what were generally considered disaster levels. Today, two years later, I am firmly convinced that the negative impact of these two items on our domestic industry was the major reason for delaying the turnaround in cattle prices by a full year.

Thanks to their import law United States offshore imports were 7.8 per cent of domestic production in the key year 1976, and only slightly above their historical average. In Canada the corresponding figure was 12.6 per cent.

Canada and the United States share the same North American cattle and beef markets, so it is essential that both countries' proportional share of these offshore beef imports be approximately the same.

The Canadian cattle industry has just come to the end of the contractual phase of its ten-year cattle cycle. The earliest opportunity to begin the national herd rebuilding will be next fall when more cows will be retained and increased numbers of heifer calves held back for breeding purposes.

More than anything else our industry is looking for indications of confidence and stability. The last thing we need is another year like 1976. That confidence and stability could be brought about with the help of a Canadian beef import law that would establish an atmosphere of predictable confidence which could only come with proper legislation instead of ad hoc, year by year, behind the scenes manoeuvring.

I mentioned the beef cycle earlier and perhaps some further comments would be appropriate. We hear more and more these days about taming the beef cycle. This is a noble and commendable objective but we should not hold our breath in expectation. If cattle producers and consumers were to learn more about it and understand why certain phases occur, I think everyone would be much better off.

The traditional cycle lasts about ten years and the numbers peak at the midpoint—for example, in 1955, 1965, 1975—and it is anticipated that the next number peak will be 1985. The beef supply—not the numbers—peaks about two years later. The expansionary phase will begin late this year in the current new cycle, with additional hold backs of cows and replacement heifers—mostly heifer calves. This in turn will still further reduce cattle numbers available for slaughter.

The 1965 peak was barely noticeable because of a world demand for beef, especially from new consumers, and increased per capita consumption on a global basis. That state of euphoria for cattlemen ended abruptly with the world energy crisis. Food dollars that had been buying the most expensive food of all, beef, had to be diverted to energy use. The result was a global oversupply of cattle and beef and the most rapid sell-down of cattle numbers in our history. That all took place within two years. It will require at least four years to rebuild and the process cannot be speeded up because of the simple biology of the cow.

The Canadian cattle industry is in the early stages of recovery from the worst crisis in its history. For the previous four years, prior to early 1978, lost equity in the industry has been estimated at $400 million.

The numbers sell-down has been greatly exaggerated by the need to continue selling at today's very high prices, and for one reason only—to satisfy our creditors, mostly bankers, who financed those four years of losses.

Only three other countries produce cattle and beef which can be exported to Canada in any significant numbers. These countries are Australia, New Zealand, and the United States. Mexico is involved in a minor way since Mexico exports some cattle and beef but only to the United States. South American cattle countries are not a factor because of our animal and human health requirements which exclude them from exporting to the United States and Canada. The beef cycles of those three countries are synchronized with our own. The 1979 calf crop, not yet born, will not appear on our dinner table for at least another two years. From a per capita consumption point of view Canadians consumed 112 pounds of beef in 1976, the year of our all-time high supplies, but 108 pounds in 1977 and 102 pounds last year. The 1979 estimate is about 95 pounds. This is two pounds higher than the previous 10-year average ending last year. I maintain there is no shortage of beef, but there is a lower supply than there was in 1976.

The base period in the proposed beef import law should coincide with this beef cycle in some manner. I suggest we should have a ten-year base period, say from 1965 to 1975 if numbers are to be the key, or from 1967 to 1977 if supply is to be the criterion. If a shorter half cycle is necessary to start the policy, then use a five-year cycle which is balanced on either side of the high or low points. There is already a probable exception to this historical cycle in that the new cycle now starting will last at least two years longer because of the extra time required to rebuild our breeding herds.

There are valid reasons for not including live cattle in my beef import proposal. First, simply because the United States law does not cover live cattle, our legislation should not try to be more protective than the U.S. law. That is an important point. We cannot expect to get more than the American law when we are trading back and forth. The Canadian-U.S. trade in live cattle and beef is a two-way trade, whereas oceanic beef imports are a one-way trade item. Canada and the U.S.A. are essentially net importers of beef. Canada traditionally exports feeder cattle and cows, mostly from the west to the United States. The U.S. in turn exports fat cattle and/or beef to central Canada. In both cases this only occurs when appropriate market price conditions prevail. Canadians should not forget that the United States is essentially the only market available to us for both import and export purposes for live cattle and beef. In this regard I am referring to our commercial beef cattle industry and not to the purebred side of the industry.

The timing of my motion today is most appropriate in that Senate Bill S-13 on the same subject is now before their Standing Committee on Agriculture. I sincerely commend the Senate for their efforts in this bill. I would say it is a logical development of their in depth study of Canada's beef cattle industry concluding with their report of October, 1977. This report is entitled "Recognizing the Realities—a Beef Import Policy for Canada" and was the result of their committee listening to cattlemen talk about their industry across Canada. In my opinion, this Senate study and report has quietly put to rest the 1976 MacKenzie commission of inquiry into the marketing of beef and veal.

In his opening remarks on Bill S-13, Senator Sparrow had this short quotation, with which I thoroughly agree. It reads:

> The hearings indicated that the most critical and pressing problem concerned the importation of beef into Canada, or, more precisely, the lack of effective rules pertaining to the importation of beef into Canada.

The hearings mentioned above were those of the Senate Agriculture Committee on its travels across Canada. Senator Sparrow went on to say:

> Uncontrolled imports, without a firm long-term goal, backed by legislation, has caused numerous negative results for the Canadian producer and consumer.

As I have already indicated, I cannot support the inclusion of live cattle in this Senate Bill, nor do I feel that their use of "signal price" is essential or necessary.

Since my proposals have many similar features to the American legislation, some brief comment on their beef law seems appropriate. Last year a serious effort was made to amend the United States Meat Import Act of 1964. The 1978 amendment was passed overwhelmingly by the 95th Congress. It passed the Senate by a voice vote and the congress by a vote of 289 to 66, but it was later vetoed by President Carter on November 11, 1978. The amendment's principal clause dealt with the protection of producers during the liquidation phase. That is the phase we have just come through. It proposed to do this by means of a counter-cyclical formula. Live cattle will continue to be excluded in the American bill. The loophole in the old act relating to what they referred to as "slightly processed beef" would be closed. The President's veto was based on proposals to limit the President's discretionary powers in the proposed amendment bill. President Carter's veto memorandum ended with this quote, and I think it is very significant:

> I am prepared to work with the Congress next year—

"Next year" in this case means 1979.

> —to pass a counter-cyclical meat import bill which will provide the stability and certainty the cattle industry requires, while preserving the President's existing discretionary authority, and setting an acceptable minimum access level for imports.

That says it all as to why the amended bill last year failed to get the President's support, but indicates he is prepared to support a new bill.

With respect to my own proposal, I suggest that that provision might be made for periods when our Canadian beef import law can be suspended from time to time when conditions exist. I would be prepared to see that incorporated into Canadian law.

In conclusion, the concept of a Canadian beef import law has received wide support from across the nation, from government departments, both federal and provincial, from almost all cattle producer organizations across Canada, with major and detailed research and specific suggestions that have been supplied for several years from the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, and I am reasonably certain I can expect some form of support from members in other political parties, including, I am sure, certain cabinet ministers.

We should all be aware of the joint policy statement issued by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) last March 30, 1978. They proposed an import quota policy for the next three years, that is, from the March 30 date. That release concluded with this statement:

> If, at any time, it is not giving satisfactory protection to the Canadian beef industry, we will introduce legislation to control imports.

The "it" referred to is the policy.

The Canadian cattle industry is about to begin the rebuilding of its entire breeding herd after surviving the most critical period of its 100-year history. It is vital that this industry has unshakeable confidence in the long term outlook for our cattle industry. This rebuilding will take years. Let us not forget what happened to the Canadian sheep and lamb industry when offshore imports took over. Canadians today eat only about 1.8 pounds per capita of lamb or mutton. We need a Canadian beef import law.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I know a number of members want to get involved. However, I wonder if I might be permitted to put one brief question to the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Because the time of the hon. member has expired, that can only be done with unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Medicine Hat has the most extensive and probably the most comprehensive knowledge on this subject in the House. However, he said one thing that raises a question for a farm boy from Hastings country. The hon. member mentioned the cyclical production of the various countries being synchronized. Is that a happy circumstance or something that is planned?

Mr. Hargrave: Very briefly, it is a fact of cow life. It has developed over hundreds of years. Every country is now in the same process that we are in, that is, involved in numbers that they can import or export. It is not that every country in the world that raises cattle has a problem like this created by the cycle, only Australia, New Zealand, the United States and Canada. They are the only countries with significant amounts of cattle and beef traded back and forth. Therefore, those are the only countries which have to live with this situation.

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) on putting forward this motion today. As he said, it is a very timely motion, one which the cattlemen, the producers and the consumers are vitally concerned with at this time in the beef cycle.

Many times in this House we have heard complaints about the price of beef being too high, rising too quickly and everybody is to blame. I am not sure that anyone is to blame for the prices. The price that the consumer in Canada pays for beef, veal and produce such as that has remained almost constant in the past 20 or 30 years compared to the buying power of the worker. In 1950, he spent about 2.5 per cent of his disposable income on beef. That is exactly what he spends today. It costs about 2.5 per cent of his wages for the beef that he buys to put on his table. The difference, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, is the amount the housewife is buying. In 1950, Canadians consumed approximately 50 pounds of beef products per capita. In 1979, it is estimated we will consume about 95 pounds per capita.

The increase in the amount of beef and beef products consumed has been rather remarkable over the past 20 years. It is also remarkable that the price of that beef still accounts for 2.5 per cent of the total income of the wage earner. There is no lack in the amount of beef. It is the demand for that beef that has risen substantially over the past 50 years.

I come from a large finished-beef producing area in western Ontario. I have the honour of representing one of the largest beef producing areas in eastern Canada. Stability of price, both for the finished product and input costs, has a resounding effect on the over-all economy of the area I represent.

It can be seen from my opening remarks that I am certainly in favour of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. In fact, I am the one the hon. member was referring to in his opening remarks. I have a bill respecting the importation of beef which I hope will be discussed during private members' hour, hopefully before we are out of here. I hope the hon. member will take part in that discussion as well.

Like the hon. member for Medicine Hat, my concern is not only with stable supplies but with stability of demand for the primary producer. This is borne out by the fact that I have a bill, which will give to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the power to impose import regulations when in his opinion the economic and national interest of Canada would require it.

It is all well and good to say that we have a form of import regulation. It is true, we do. As well, we must have some protection for the primary producer. We should have legislation in place that can be triggered if a situation such as that which took place in 1976 should occur or appear that it is going to occur.

As hon. members know, the primary producers of beef in Canada, from the cow-calf operator right through to the finished cattle operator, have in the past three or four years come through one of the most disastrous slumps in the history of the beef industry. Much of the reasoning and the effects of that has been outlined by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

In the industry they have what are known as cyclical hills and valleys, due in part to the producer's reliance, and I think rightly so, on the supply and demand position. That position can be greatly influenced, as it was in 1976, by a large influx of offshore or imported beef and veal into an already volatile domestic beef situation.

To the hon. member referred to the Senate bill. It was my pleasure today to talk with the secretary-manager of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. While he agrees in principle and in general with Senate Bill S-13, there are two aspects of that bill which give the Canadian Cattlemen's Association a very distinct feeling of uneasiness. One aspect is the bill's reference to live cattle. The other is the reference to the triggering mechanism in that bill which gives the cattle producers and their representatives a great deal of cause for concern. It is known as a trigger price or signal price which triggers the bringing into effect of the beef import law.

The cattlemen and their representatives feel that a trigger or signal price could be misconstrued by both the consumer and those in charge of it. It gives them great concern that the signal price could be set either too low or too high, and thereby give an improper effect to the legislation which the Senate has proposed. I hope that will be thoroughly discussed. I understand that representatives of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association will appear before the Senate committee on the fourteenth, if my memory serves me correctly. Both of those points will certainly be discussed at that time.

The importance of live cattle has been dealt with by the hon. member for Medicine Hat and really needs no further comment, except that I believe we have to take into account the fact that the cattle industry supplies the domestic Canadian market and, more important, the North American market, which the producer looks upon as having even greater importance in the future planning of the beef cycle than just the domestic market because of the flow of live cattle north and south, mostly from the western provinces into the American system, and their return as finished cattle here to us in the east. That is an historical situation which has grown up over many years of good trade patterns between ourselves and our neighbours to the south, which could be disastrously affected if the live cattle question in that Senate bill is not considered carefully.

We saw what happened back in 1973 or 1974 when an embargo against the movement of live cattle was brought in—I believe justly—by the Canadian government, and we saw the reaction of the United States government, which I thought was somewhat unfair. That reaction included tariffs and the prohibition on the movement not only of beef cattle but also of pork, chickens, turkeys, and almost everything else. The United States reaction was very quick and almost disastrous for the Canadian beef and meat industry.

The reason mentioned by the hon. member for Medicine Hat for not including in his motion or in the Senate bill—and I do not believe it would be included in mine—the live cattle trade, is of vital importance to the Canadian consumer and to the Canadian producer. My concern is that while the instrument in place at the present time—and I will talk about it in just a moment—gives protection to the producer and consumer in the short term, I believe it must be backed up with legislation which will produce the same type of production over the long run of the beef cycle.

Just what is in place now? The government took steps to establish reasonable quotas on the importation of fresh chilled and frozen beef and veal. Beef import quotas were applied in late 1976 and were in effect through 1977 and 1978. They are in effect in the current year. Quotas are administered under the existing Export and Import Permits Act. Furthermore, as announced in March of last year by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the government has an ongoing policy of import controls on beef and veal which will be in effect for a three-year period, at the end of which it will be evaluated, and alternative measures will be taken if necessary. In this regard I agree with the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I would like to see that over a ten-year period because the beef industry works on a ten-year cycle. This would afford the protection which is required and allow for the basic input which I do not think a three-year period does.

The current policy arose out of producer concerns in recent years, very justifiable ones, about the possible effects of beef imports at a time when low prices were causing serious difficulties in the industry. What that points out to me is that it was a reaction and not an action. I believe that now is the time to take a very conscious and clear look at the situation of our primary producers of beef products and to take action so that we do not always have to be reacting to situations which arise. The legislation put forward by the hon. member is that type of action in a time of comparative quiet, shall we say, when returns to the producer are at a level which balances with input costs. We have to remember—and not often enough is this put forward—that the primary producer of beef, or any agricultural product, is also one of the country's largest consumers. He consumes energy in large amounts. He consumes all the things the consumer in the city looks upon as being highly priced.

Many primary producers buy beef, pork, chickens or eggs from the same supermarkets from which city consumers buy. To say that they are not concerned about high prices is a complete fallacy. They are perhaps more concerned about high prices in supermarkets than consumers who receive weekly wages from Ford or any other industry in the country. Producers have to face high prices, just as inevitably as city consumers.

With respect to that I would like to point out to hon. members an article which recently appeared in, I believe, one of the Ottawa newspapers. This article brought to my attention the fact that we in Canada are not as badly off as some people would like us to believe when it comes to buying beef, eggs, or poultry. The article is entitled "Eat Up, Ottawa! Our Food Prices Are Low". This was not a Canadian survey. It was not one which anyone could say the government had rigged so that it would come out the way the government wanted. This survey is taken every month by the agricultural attachés in U.S. embassies in 15 countries around the world. It is important to know the results of this survey. I admit that we do pay a good deal for most of our manufactured goods, especially imports, but the U.S. government has produced statistics showing that Canada is a world leader in something other than shovelling snow.

The article to which I refer reads in part as follows:

When it comes to food, we're on top of the heap, despite domestic price hikes and the plummeting dollar's effect on the cost of fresh produce we import for six months of the year.

Figures released this week show that on Jan. 3, at the height of our import season, Ottawa stores charged 21 per cent less than their counterparts in Washington, D.C., for a shopping basket of 21 items.

That must say something about the producers in this country.

Agricultural attachés at U.S. embassies in 15 capital cities survey local grocery stores once a month to determine prices for such staples as meat, eggs, butter, milk, tomatoes, bread, rice and sugar.

The results of the January survey published in the U.S. Department of Agriculture bulletin, Foreign Agriculture, help put domestic price trends into perspective.

The bulletin also compares the number of hours an average industrial employee must work to earn enough money to buy a given amount of food, based on mid-1978 figures.

The February issue shows that although Canada had one of the highest increases in its consumer food price index in the 12 months ending in November, 1978, our January prices were 21 per cent below U.S. levels and substantially below Japanese and German figures.

The article cites the example of sirloin and refers to a kilogram of sirloin steak. If my mathematics have not gone completely out the window, a kilogram is 2.204 pounds. I will never get used to that. The article goes on:

Sirloin steak was selling for $5.62 (U.S.) per kilogram in Ottawa, $6.37 in Washington, $9.74 in London, $14 in Bonn and an unbelievable $41.20 in Tokyo.

The difference between Canadian and U.S. wage levels was almost enough to wipe out the advantages of our lower prices, but not quite. A U.S. citizen—I am speaking of the 21 items used in the survey—would have to work 8 hours 31 minutes to pay for the same shopping basket that a Canadian can afford by working 8 hours and 28 minutes. So the difference is 3 minutes on a full shopping basket.

What is of vital importance to the consumer—I hear people talking about the industry of the Japanese and the Germans and about everyone there being so much better off than we are—is that in Ottawa, for instance, a Canadian would work an hour and 2 minutes for those sirloin steaks, and in Tokyo a Japanese would work 8 hours and 11 minutes to pay for that one kilogram of sirloin steak. The question is the same right across those lists. With regard to boneless roast chuck, in Ottawa a Canadian would work 37 minutes for a kilogram of that meat, in the United States they would work about 35 minutes, and in Tokyo they would work 4 hours and 14 minutes for it. What this points out is that despite the gloom and doom of some people in Canada when it comes to the food price index, the fact is that the Canadian primary producers are providing this country with the finest food at the cheapest prices anywhere in the world.

What this motion is all about is providing the primary producer with an assurance that some of the valleys and pitfalls will be taken out of the cyclical endeavour and provide him with the knowledge that over a ten year period, or over the life of his input into the industry, there will be something on which he can count, should the need arise, to protect him from unfair competition—and I think in 1976 it certainly was unfair—from offshore beef imports.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to compliment the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) as one of the few members of the House who has real expertise—I say that with sincerity—and working knowledge in his area of interest in the House, that is, in the beef industry. When he speaks I pay a great deal of attention to what he says. He speaks from his heart, with a great deal of experience and knowledge in the area.

I want to say at the outset also that I support the general direction of his motion, but I have one difference with him which is a philosophical difference because I do not think what he is proposing will be adequate to solve many of the problems of the beef industry today. What I want to argue for is a national beef marketing board, something that is supported by a large number of people across the country. As the hon. member for Medicine Hat has already said on many occasions, I know also that there is a large number of people across the country who do not want a national beef marketing board. So this is a philosophical difference between the two of us.

Before I go into that subject, however, I want to underline a point made by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas), and that is that in general in this country we as Canadians are not paying an excessively large part of our disposable income for food. We pay about 15 per cent or 16 per cent for food. The Americans pay roughly the same amount of their disposable income for food, the Europeans pay close to 30 per cent, the Japanese more than that, and the people in India pay around 60 per cent. When we talk about food prices, we must put things into perspective. What we must watch now are companies, retailers and the like, taking excessive advantage of the consumer with excessive mark-ups. That is what we must watch in terms of food pricing.

Let me get back to this motion. As I said, I do not think it is quite adequate or that it goes quite far enough, because I believe we need a national beef marketing agency for two groups of people in our country, for the producer, in terms of making sure he has a stable price for his commodity, and for the consumer to ensure a stable price in the retail market for the commodity which the consumer is purchasing.

Let me offer one or two arguments in favour of what I am proposing. All we have to do is to take a look at the price increases in food across the board in this country. We find that price increases in products in which we have national marketing boards—we now have three and will soon have four in operation, the egg marketing board, industrial milk, and turkeys—have been lower than in products which do not have national marketing agencies to manage supplies and tailor supply to demand. One of the problems we have in beef is that we do not have such an agency, and because of that there are tremendous fluctuations in the price of beef which hurt both the farmer and the consumer.

I could go over some of the history of beef prices, which has already been done in the House. Beef prices started to drop below the floor level, so far as the producer was concerned, in 1974. They became worse in 1975, and even worse yet in 1976. They stayed at that level in 1977, and it was not until April, 1978, that the price of beef for the farmer started to go up. What happened was that when the farmer was selling his cattle and getting less than the cost of production, he started to sell the herds. This is a normal reaction. We all agree that that is what happened. When a farmer or a rancher does that, he cannot replenish his herd quickly, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat said. This takes a long time. A cow has a calf once a year, not like chickens which reproduce rapidly. When the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) goes to the supermarket to buy a chicken, he buys one that is only about 60 days old. You cannot do that with beef. You cannot turn the tap on and off at will or at whim.

The result was that when we had an oversupply, the price was low and people started to sell off their herds. Now we have an undersupply. One reason for the oversupply was that back in 1973 the Italians and the Irish—the Italians because of some problems they had with their economy because of the high price of oil and because of OPEC, and the Irish because they had cattle which they wanted to sell—persuaded the European Economic Market to import fewer cattle from abroad. They persuaded EEC to curtail imports, and those imports were primarily from Australia. As a result, the Australians had to get rid of their beef somewhere, so they sent it in abundance to Canada, and that helped to distort the Canadian market and hurt Canadian producers. It created many of the problems we have today with beef in our country.

How do we solve those problems? I think only a partial answer is found in what the hon. member for Medicine Hat has said in the House today. As I said, I have a philosophical difference with him. I do not think one can deal with the problem of EEC unless there is a national marketing board, because unless you have a national supply-management board or orderly marketing, GATT agreements tailor your supply or production. You are not allowed to do that, and you need some form of orderly marketing, such as we have in turkeys, eggs, industrial milk or broilers. In order to have that type of planning, we need a national marketing agency of one sort or another. I do not think the type of import laws the hon. member suggests are adequate. They are better than nothing and obviously a step in the right direction, but that is one reason why we should go further to create a national marketing agency.

Another reason is, as I said before, that it gives the producer a more stable price for his commodity, such as producers get for eggs, poultry and milk. It means also that when the consumer has the product in the supermarket, he is paying a more stable price, the mountains and valleys are taken out of the pricing mechanism and what you have is a planned economy, which is good for all.

Another reason why I am suggesting a national beef marketing agency is that we are not self-sufficient in beef and we will not be until we have a government policy which provides a guaranteed income for the producers. It should allow them to produce more of our own goods and commodities.

I have before me a group of statistics which I think the House will find interesting, and hopefully very shocking. They reveal a lot about Canadians which should be of concern to the House. The statistics come from the Senate. They were provided as background material for the consideration of Bill S-13, the Senate bill to control the importation of beef into Canada. These statistics are slightly different from the ones referred to by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, but some of the points are similar. The statistics refer to the net domestic production on a per capita basis in Canada. In other words, they refer to the net production of beef in the country. Also the statistics refer to the actual consumption of beef.

When one looks at these statistics, one will find that we are becoming less and less self-sufficient in the production of beef, according to the Senate. For example, from 1967 to 1974 the average net domestic production of beef in the country on a per capita basis was 85.9 pounds, and our consumption during that same time was 94 pounds per capita. It means that approximately 91 per cent of the beef consumed was produced in the country. We were 91 per cent self-sufficient. If one looks at the figures over the next few years, one will find the self-sufficiency starts to go down. The Senate had not completed the estimate or the accumulation of statistics for 1978, but it was indicated that we would be producing approximately 86.6 pounds of beef per capita and consuming approximately 101 pounds of beef per capita. That would make us 84 per cent self-sufficient. In 1979 the estimate is that consumers would consume approximately 93 pounds of beef per capita and that approximately 76.3 pounds of that would be Canadian beef. That means in 1979 we will be only 82 per cent self-sufficient. These are background statistics which were provided by the Senate researchers. They accompanied Bill S-13, which was introduced by Senator Sparrow a short time ago in the other place.

I have put those statistics on the record to show that we are becoming less and less self-sufficient in beef production. There is no excuse for that at all. We have the capacity to be an exporter of beef. We have a lot of land. We have a very small population. Farmers are in need of better incomes. We are in need of more jobs in the country. There is an unemployment problem. If more people were farming and producing cattle, there would be more people involved in packing, slaughtering, and the transportation of cattle. A better situation would be created all around. Of course there are the other economic factors of self-sufficiency as well, such as a better impact on the balance of payments, more economic activity and the like.

That is another reason why I feel there should be a national beef marketing plan for the orderly marketing of beef.

I should like to leave a few minutes for other hon. members to participate, so I will make my remaining points quickly. The heifer and cow herd in the country is being diminished. That is really a sad situation. We will have more problems in the future, and it is another reason why we require orderly marketing and more planning when it comes to the beef industry. The farmer is receiving less and less of the food dollar. A few years ago he received 60 per cent of the food dollar. Today he receives only 37 per cent of the food dollar. Anything we can do to help the farmer is indeed a move in the right direction.

My main point is that I think we require a national beef marketing agency for orderly marketing in beef, such as exists in the production of eggs, turkeys, and many other products at the provincial level. A similar agency should be introduced at the national level for beef. It would solve many of the problems of the producers and consumers. Also it would help Canada become ultimately self-sufficient in the production of beef. That would help every Canadian and the entire Canadian economy.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) in providing me with approximately five minutes to participate in the debate. I am sure a good number of other hon. members would have utilized their entire 25 or 30 minutes.

However, I should like to begin my comments by indicating that I welcome the opportunity of making a few brief comments in support of this notice of motion. I do so because I have a great deal of respect and admiration for the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave). In addition to this respect and admiration, I believe firmly the enactment of the Canadian beef import law proposed in this motion certainly is essential and paramount. I participate in this debate to renew my commitment and support, because the intent of this motion represents not only the views and the position of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, but moreover it represents the official position of my party. In fact it has been the official position of my party since September, 1976.

The beef industry is a Canadian industry and it is a large one. In 1973 it became a billion dollar industry. Because of the increased value of slaughter cattle and calves, this year the figure is expected to exceed the $2 billion mark. It should be noted and stressed that this doubling in sales values does not reflect the same pattern in relation to increased profits. Rather, it reflects the impact which inflation and rising costs have had on the beef industry. It reflects the disinterest and the failure of the government to provide the necessary leadership. It reflects the failure of the government to manage the Canadian economy with any degree of competence or success. It reflects the need for appropriate long-term goals, objectives, and programs which will interpret accurately the market signs. Also it reflects the need to provide equity and stability to Canadian beef producers.

A beef import law, accompanied by a deferred annual income annuity plan and some common sense provisions in the area of capital gains, which has been spoken about often by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), would provide much needed stability to the Canadian beef industry. It would ensure the preservation of family farm management and ownership. It would greatly reduce and hopefully eliminate the government's sporadic intervention into the market place. Also it would leave the government free to perform only those necessary and proper functions of inspection, grading and dealing with animal health. Financial support would be limited to emergency and disaster situations.

In the remaining minute, let me conclude by saying that the beef industry, like food prices, has been studied to death. This measure was recommended and justified by Canadian beef producers two years ago. As I have indicated, it has been the position of my party for over two years. I commend the hon. member for Medicine Hat for his interest and efforts respecting this motion. I challenge government members to utilize this opportunity to pass at least one major piece of legislation before they strike out. I say to the beef producers of the country, if the government chooses to procrastinate throughout the remaining weeks or days of its mandate, we in this party will enact this legislation shortly aftr the next election.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac).

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to respond very briefly to the challenge of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise). I think beef producers will have a message for him, but we will wait to hear it.

• (1800)

I have no difficulty at all agreeing with the principle put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. At the same time, I believe we would be deceiving ourselves if we though the passage of such a resolution would provide the panacea for which many beef producers are looking. Last fall, President Carter showed the great weakness of that measure by usurping it. But by the same token I thought he proved the need for it because the increase of one more pound—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.02 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-29, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was pointing out to the House the calamitous effect which the Conservative party's negative attitude toward the role of the government in housing could produce if it becomes government policy, as it did for a number of years during a Conservative government in Ontario. In Ottawa houses cost up to $10,000 more, and in Toronto up to $20,000 more, simply because the government of Ontario took a hands-off policy with regard to land assembly and land banking. I was in the process, at five o'clock, of explaining that even the federal government, because of what I consider was an over-sensitivity to provincial responsibilities in municipal affairs and an under-sensitivity to the national consequences of failing to use the many instruments available to control land speculation in the Ottawa area, has in effect fueled inflation in land costs and thus in housing costs.

The National Capital Commission's and the Public Works Department's land holdings in the Ottawa area, government hiring policy, and government rental policy or the absence of an aggressive pushing of land assembly programs in the province of Ontario, are all policies or a combination thereof which unquestionably could have substantially reduced housing prices in the Ottawa area. These higher than necessary housing prices, added fuel to public service wage demands, and the federal government's acquiescence to these demands unquestionably contributed much to the inflationary wage spiral that has affected the ability of Canadians to compete on world markets.

We have often heard that housing prices are largely the result of the some 100 approvals that are necessary before a house is sold. I would ask hon. members to reflect on this. If land assembly takes place surely most, not all, but most approvals would be eliminated because there would be a much more precise planning process. Many planning steps which are now necessary to approval would be eliminated, or would not amount to the kind of brake on housing development that the critics allege.

In the Ottawa area the federal government tried to do something about land prices and at the same time create a model city that would be a Canadian crucible for better planned urban environments, where public transit and various urban features like totally planned energy conservation, recreation and green spaces, and all the factors that contribute to the quality of life, would be imaginatively co-ordinated to show what could be done when the public interest comes first. In spite of the federal government acquiring 5,000 acres through the NCC and the provincial government of Ontario another 4,000 acres, the Conservative government of the province of Ontario, assisted by the sniping of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and more recently some sniping by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott), sabotaged the model city.

The developers who owned the undeveloped land immediately to the east of Ottawa where the Ontario government is approving housing for upward of 50,000 people, were considered more important than lower house costs and opportunities to show what could be done through planning imagination. Southwest city would have been a model for all Canadians. What a scandal, Mr. Speaker; what a tragedy that this opportunity was lost to all Canadians because the Conservative government of Ontario put the developers first and people second!

The worst mistake this government could make would be to follow the advice of the official opposition on housing policy, but unfortunately that seems to be what it has been doing recently. I refer specifically to this government's ill-advised and shortsighted termination of the Department of Urban Affairs. I will deal with that question later, Mr. Speaker.

I want to turn now to the suggestion made by the official opposition regarding mortgage interest deductibility. That proposition is as demagogic a suggestion as has been made in this House for a number of years. It is demagogic, because while it is patently unfair to everyone who rents rather than owns a house, and while it would cost the federal treasury up to $4 billion in decreased revenue—

Mr. Stevens: Prove that.

Mr. Watson: There are a lot of people who are better economists than the hon. member and myself, who have produced these figures.

Mr. Stevens: You cannot back them up.

Mr. Watson: I do not think the hon. member can, either. We are in about the same category as far as economics go—which does not say much for the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Stevens: Back up your statement.

Mr. Watson: The problem is that this particular proposition is very popular. I admit that politically it is very popular because it appeals to the selfishness in all of us.

The United States has had this measure in effect for 66 years. The group of members from both sides of the House who went down there to examine it, while they have taken public positions diametrically opposed to each other, heard one single story. I suspect they realized that the scheme does not make any sense, but it is popular. We all admit that.

An hon. Member: You had better.

Mr. Watson: If we are going to be responsible in government, surely we do not simply do what is popular.

[Translation]

As I said before, the proposal put forward by the Progressive Conservative party for allowing mortgage interest deductions would cost the treasury a considerable amount of money. If we are to pass such a measure, it seems to me certain social objectives should be tied in to such an initiative on our part. I can suggest, for instance, granting a tax credit to Canadians over 65 who live in their own homes. Obviously, it is better to encourage citizens of more than 65 years of age to live in their own homes than to build old folks' homes and send them to live there. That does not make any sense. It would be better, through some legislation or other, to encourage them to live in their own homes where they are happy; it would also be more advantageous for the state.

I am also convinced there are other deserving social goals that could be encouraged by the government instead of having the type of gifts promised by the official opposition. For instance, with respect to saving energy, all governments consider that objective valid these days, but unfortunately the steps taken in the last few years to encourage energy conservation are still inadequate. I have two or three suggestions to make, Mr. Speaker. By offering tax encouragements and using new systems of measurement in co-operation with the provincial authorities in the field of electricity, we could save considerable energy. I am thinking here of a meter system that would allow suppliers to set the price of the electricity used according to the various load periods.

Why are tax incentives not used to encourage the installation of these meters in private homes? I think they would cost $100 to $150. If the federal government and the provinces used their imagination and co-operated, they would encourage home owners to use electricity especially during off hours and thus save money. That would amount to tremendous savings. The money saved would easily be enough to pay for the construction of one or two major dams, one or two nuclear stations. If the government had some imagination, it would offer tax incentives in this area. I could say the same thing about the opposition which, instead of making rabble-rousing promises, to say the least, should propose things that make a bit of sense.

[English]

I have already mentioned that I am unhappy with one piece of advice which the government seems to have taken from the official opposition, and to me it is one of the more mindless recommendations that has ever been made by them. I am speaking of the termination of the Department of Urban Affairs. This is a genuine case—and I know this is an overworked saying—of throwing the baby out with the bath water. The government wanted to save some money, but it could have abolished many of the urban affairs programs which were costing money. I would have been unhappy had it done that, but not only did it do that, the ministry has been thrown out as well.

As far as I am concerned the Department of Urban Affairs has provided a number of important initiatives. I will mention them in a minute. But let me outline the number of international organizations that believe the area of urban affairs is important enough in which to be involved: the Council of Europe; the European Parliament; the World Bank; and the United Nations. Even the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, through the Atlantic council, has been involved with a number of urban affairs programs. And the federal Government of Canada is saying now that we should have nothing to do with urban affairs.

Mr. Stevens: What are you supporting them for?

Mr. Watson: That particular decision to terminate the Department of Urban Affairs did not come before parliament. Its termination has been done by order in council.

An hon. Member: By fiat.

Mr. Watson: I support the bill we are talking about tonight. This bill was introduced at the same time the announcement was made that urban affairs was terminated. That is why I am dealing with the question of urban affairs which I feel has the potential to influence, more than any other ministry, the kind of future Canadians will enjoy.

Mr. Stevens: Vote the ruffians out.

Mr. Watson: Let me give you some examples of what the Department of Urban Affairs has been able to do in many parts of Canada. It is responsible for the initiatives that have resulted, for example, in the port front renewal in Halifax; Montreal's harbour front renewal; Toronto's harbour front renewal; the bicycle path along the southshore in my own constituency which engenders a fair amount of interest. In Quebec City—

[Translation]

—the St. Louis Basin, the Guy Favreau complex was changed through the efforts of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. The plans would have resulted in the creation of a white elephant. Thanks to the influence of urban affairs, the Guy Favreau complex will now be a valid and acceptable project for Montrealers.

[English]

The Lachine Canal project is another project.

There are dozens of urban initiatives across Canada that have come about because the Department of Urban Affairs was there. Surely there should be a realization that there is a need for co-ordination between different government ministries and between different levels of government. This co-ordination should be directed toward assuring a better urban future, a better quality of life where the federal government plays a role, no matter whether it is in owning land, owning buildings, building new buildings in our cities, or whether it owns railways or wants to change railway lines. We passed the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act a few years ago which allows us not only to redevelop railway shunting yards in the middle of cities, but it also allows us to redevelop rail lines into cities for purposes of rapid transit. These laws are in the books, and we are neutering them, temporarily, I hope.

In my opinion, all of these very positive elements which the Department of Urban Affairs offered to Canadians while it was in existence, and the even greater potential it offers to Canadians in the manner it offers co-ordination between ministries and between levels of government, are so important that we are making a very serious error in removing a tool from our work kit that can influence our urban and suburban lives for a generation or two to come.

There are a number of other things I would like to mention. These are a number of pullbacks which seem to be the result of suggestions made by the opposition.

[Translation]

What shocks me most is that since World War II we have had the means to do better, but fearing too often to hurt provincial sensitivities, we have not dared insist on proper planning. We have not used our powers as moneylenders through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, for instance. We could have used this to force the municipalities and provinces to adopt better planning methods. Any hon. member present could give examples. Representing a suburban riding, I can give many examples to show that the need to rectify years of inadequate planning has given rise to demands costing millions of dollars. Had we dared use the powers our financial position gave us, we could have had an influence. If I may give you some advice, Mr. Minister, please do not be afraid to exert this influence, to insist on proper planning. It will cost you less in the long term. In fact, this is the same recommendation I can make for Urban Affairs.

It will cost ten times and perhaps 50 times as much to abolish Urban Affairs as to maintain it and—have adequate planning and co-ordination among the various other departments and government levels. The past often provides no encouragement. This co-ordination will be made without any incentive and we need a department like urban affairs to provide this incentive.

We must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that 80 per cent of Canadians live in the urban centres of Canada and that 6 million Canadians live in suburbs built since the Second World War. As I have just said, the quality of life in downtown areas and the suburbs suffers from a lack of long-term planning and co-ordination among departments and this lack of long-term planning and co-ordination has caused mistakes and deficiencies in municipal services. And even worse, the enormous cost of certain planning mistakes has a negative effect on the efficiency of the Canadian economy and the capacity of Canada to compete on world markets. I mentioned the example of the price of houses in Ottawa which could at least have been reduced from $5,000 to $10,000 a unit if sensible action had been taken several years ago. This mistake on the part of former governments and ourselves has had an effect on inflation in Canada because of its unfavourable effect on wage demands by public servants.

The influence of urban development on our national economy, national energy requirements and the quality of life in Canada means in my opinion that the federal government must play an active role and contribute to ensure that federal policies and agricultural operations are co-ordinated at the federal level and with the other government levels. Furthermore, in the context of long-term planning, this influence will ensure the effectiveness of financial data.

I am convinced of one thing, Mr. Speaker, and that is that the Canadian people will long regret the decision of this government to abolish urban affairs if we do not take the initiative right now and suggest to our colleagues that the Department of Public Works take on additional responsibilities and that it become the Department of Urban Affairs and Public Works. In my opinion, this would give this department the prestige, the capacity and the talent required to meet the needs of our suburbs and urban areas in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the government will consider this suggestion favourably.

I regret that I feel obliged to criticize so much the policies of the government, but when a government like ours, that is a liberal government with a small "l", accepts conservative recommendations with a small "c", I believe that we must reconsider our position.

[English]

I am disheartened by this acceptance of a recommendation from the official opposition. Urban Affairs was doing a great job for Canada. It has the potential of saving hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. This shortsighted step of terminating this ministry will end up costing us untold millions unless the government decides, upon reflection, to give the full power that Urban Affairs had to Public Works and allow that ministry the power to influence the co-ordination between levels of government and between ministries which is so necessary to help in improving the quality of life in the future.

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the speech of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) has been intriguing. I wonder if he would accept one question with a view to clarifying something.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Due to the fact the hon. member's time has expired, unanimous consent would be required in order for the hon. member to accept a question. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: I thank hon. members. My question is simply this. In view of his burning criticism of the government with respect to its actions touching on the urban affairs department, may we expect some overt sign of this opposition in the form of his voting against the government or even breaking with the government?

Mr. Watson: Seriously, Mr. Speaker, if there were a vote on the termination of Urban Affairs, I would not hesitate to vote against the government. I support this bill because there are a lot of good things in it. This bill has nothing to do with the termination of Urban Affairs which will, unfortunately, be terminated by an order in council without consultation with anyone.

Mr. Stevens: My further question is this. If we can arrange for a confidence vote on the question the hon. member is referring to, will he agree to vote against the government?

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I find that question amazing. My criticism of the government is that it has accepted the recommendation of this hon. member, the former mayor of Toronto and others on his side, who apparently have had it as a policy of the Conservative opposition for at least a year, if not more, to abolish Urban Affairs. My criticism is that we followed their advice.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to deal briefly with Bill C-29 which is before us. As I was listening to the previous speaker, I could not help thinking what nonsense we are subjected to in this House of Commons when he suggested that the minister should restore the Department of Urban Affairs to life.

I had thought that everybody knew that if the minister had eliminated his Department of Urban Affairs, it is because it was interfering too much with provincial issues. But that is the way Anglophones think. Another member of the House claimed that we should need this department to indicate to the municipalities how they should administer their own affairs. I am flabbergasted and I am afraid that with a parliament with such opinions, we are not about to understand one another.

Mr. Speaker, in all the projects the government has put forward over the years in the area of housing, we must admit it has not obtained the success it had hoped for. And after all the cutbacks that this government has been trying to make lately in all sectors, more specifically in the social affairs sector, now on the fever of an election the government in a supreme effort tries to make Canadians believe that it has finally found the answer. This bill is a lot a fuss for nothing. Indeed, what does the government risk with this bill? What does it risk through this proposal as a whole?

I read the first part of the bill. I was not here when the minister delivered the first part of his speech. But I put it aside at once because the minister was not dealing with the subject at all; obviously he was upset. He was upset by the vote that has been held and he lost his cool and used some pretty strong words. I shall not repeat them. Recently he wanted me to withdraw my words but I will not ask him to withdraw his. Next time, I suggest he behave in a more dignified manner even if he does not like the result of some votes. Indeed, I do not like to hear these kinds of remarks in the House.

But I found very interesting the second part of his speech with which I shall now deal. I was indeed saying: what is the government risking with this bill? It is risking backing mortgages and perhaps also having to pay out $5 or $10 a month for some tenants who will have trouble paying their rent with its proposal to grant 25 or 30 per cent to those who will spend more than 25 per cent of their income on rent. The real problem is that the federal government is operating in an area outside its jurisdiction, an area coming under provincial jurisdiction. I am still wondering why it is so stubborn as to remain in those areas when all the provinces are asking it to withdraw, to let them do as they wish and give them at the same time—

An hon. Member: To get out!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Yes, it should get out and at the same time give back the taxation right it has taken. At the present time they have no choice but to provide the money because they have the power of taxation which they borrowed and have been keeping for 38 years. There is the difficulty. There is the problem.

I heard the hon. member say a while ago: Well, the federal government should re-establish they had the nerve to create a Department of Urban Affairs, imagine, when it is a well known fact that urban affairs come under provincial jurisdiction! Well, besides the fact that this is outside its jurisdiction, the government does not know anything about that because it is too far removed from it. It does not, like the provinces, live close to the authorities which are responsible for those municipalities.

The government is anxious to be forgiven for its illegal interference with provincial jurisdiction, and then it hands out goodies to prevent the taxpayers from shouting out their contempt. Why is this government refusing to transfer the powers of taxation to the provinces so that they may administer their affairs within their own area of jurisdiction? You have never seen a province interfering with federal affairs. You have never seen that. They respect federal jurisdiction but why do we not do the same at the federal level? Why not uphold the Constitution and the meagre rights the provinces were given? For the past 10 years, there has been a steady and increasing encroachment upon provincial jurisdiction. No wonder war has broken out between the federal government and the provinces. That is no wonder. Every Canadian knows that urban affairs, housing, house rehabilitation, like commu-

After snatching direct taxation rights from the provinces in a hypocritical and fraudulent way, this government is taking the initiative because it has the money; it collects, it has every spending power, to ask the provinces to share equally. Those were the taxation rights of the provinces, but they are told: Participate. We are going to use your money to pay for that but put up half in any case. That is all very nice. But it holds on to their means of collecting the necessary taxes. Mr. Speaker, that is the problem and the major cause of all those family quarrels. Add to that the way of redistributing the revenues of direct taxation, either through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, project managers and all those who are appointed by the government to carry out projects—I was just talking to the minister this afternoon about that. I told him there were pretty bad things. I know the minister cannot control everything going on in those projects, rehabilitation projects, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation projects and others where you have to qualify and where qualifying means being a Liberal. Well, Mr. Speaker, that I will not forgive. I am not accusing the minister here because I know he is not aware of that but things are going on that are unforgivable.

I have seen projects granted to people who had no use for them at all and I have seen other people who would have needed them but failed to qualify because they were probably Conservatives or Social Crediters. I call things as I see them. That must be brought in the open. I am here to say what is going wrong—that also helps the minister, I am sure he is going to keep his eyes open. I told him: "When you select a man like that, I understand that he is on your side, but select three of them and form a committee to prevent discrimination like that". I think that this would immediately clear up the situation and provide everyone with a bit of justice.

In his remarks the minister told us that the current housing programs undertaken in co-operation with the provinces are supplying 19,000 housing units a year, which, again according to the minister, is not sufficient and I agree on that. I also agree on the non-profit housing program. The government expects to build 30,000 units, and the minister adds that the program will be the responsibility of the federal government, the provinces, the municipalities and private or public organizations which may be involved in housing. First, I wonder if the government did meet with the provinces, if it did meet with those who are concerned, with those who are really responsible, if it had discussions with them, because once again as ever it seems to have followed the usual rule, that is to set up the whole program and later submit it to the provinces and say: "Take it or don't take it. If you don't take it, you won't have it; if you do take it, you must follow our rules and do what we tell you to do."

Mr. Speaker, they will have to mend their ways if they are to face the electorate in our provinces, and especially in the province of Quebec, because I can tell them people know what the Liberals are all about. They will get a surprise, not us. The government forgets they use three tax collectors for federal taxes, for provincial taxes and for municipal taxes. This makes for three tax collectors preying on the same taxpayer. The same taxpayer that will be taxed three times is the worker. Always the worker.

Programs are put forward, Quebec and other provinces put them forward in their jurisdictions, but in the final analysis, the worker pays—one, two, three, go! Three taxes for one area or one project. We may not be fully aware of this, but the taxpayer knows. He sees that. I would even say that all those parallel bureaucracies, we will have to get rid of. Each level will have to remain in its own area. The federal government in its area, provinces in their areas, and then only can harmony set in.

The bottom line truth is that the government recognizes it has no more money. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has no more money either. So the government calls upon voluntary organizations, the private sector to hide its failure in housing. The minister suggests that low income people, single mothers, senior citizens will benefit from the program. Admittedly those groups will be able to find easy housing for some time just until the bureaucrats, the "taxers", decide otherwise. We know what goes on in low rental housing.

Senior citizens, as the minister suggested, will get 25 or 30 per cent to help pay their rents where they exceed 25 per cent of their monthly incomes. That is all right, Mr. Speaker, 25 per cent of monthly income, that looks like a nice grant. But what does that mean in actual figures? This is what I am interested in. What does that get us to? Let us take the case of two senior citizens, both getting the old age pension. A couple getting $600 per month in pensions and paying $200 in rent. If they pay a $200 rent on $600 per month, this means they will get nothing. No grant. He might as well not expect it, he will never get it! If his rent is $225 per month, he will get the enormous amount of $6.50 a month, as a tax credit to help him survive. That is the mouse brought forth by the elephant scheme of the minister. What about heating? The rent is taken in consideration. We talk about subsidizing the rent, but what about heating and the other maintenance costs? The new housing units accepted by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation all have electrical heating systems. I know people who had to pay over $800 for heating, last year, in houses accepted by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which were not properly insulated. The contractor probably had some friends working for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That happened before. But, there again, the tenant has to pay for all this. When you feel a draught while sitting by a window, you know there was no insulation.

And this was accepted by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which, like others lenders still charges 10 per cent, 10½ per cent, 11 per cent, 11½ per cent interest. What about tenants' taxes, Mr. Speaker? I think that the best tax credit should be used to reimburse the municipal taxes paid by tenants in order to avoid double taxation.

If the government reimbursed municipal taxes to tenants, and if we consider the situation of the single family dwelling owner, it is even worse, Mr. Speaker. For years now, we have been urging this government to allow the small home owners to deduct their school and municipal taxes from their income tax and to grant a tax credit to welfare recipients because some home owners are on welfare. Someone earlier was blaming the Progressive Conservative party for asking for a reduction of municipal taxes, but we have been blamed for that for the last 17 years. Yes, 17 years! I really wonder why the home owner is denied a tax credit for municipal and school taxes, for the interest paid on his mortgage interest when it is granted to multiple unit dwelling owners.

Let us suppose that I decide to built a 40-unit apartment building, I shall be allowed to deduct from my income tax the interest on my loan plus school and municipal taxes. But this tax relief is denied to the family head who builds a house, the rationale being that he builds for himself. But he does not, he builds for his wife and his children. If he were alone, he would not need a house, he could board somewhere. I think that someone should be entitled to deduct municipal and school taxes as do those who build apartment buildings, it should be him. I fail to understand the logic of this government when it says: "You must not go over that level for fear of becoming too strong and a threat to us. Such reasoning has to be prompted by a desire to squash the low income people. But it does not do them any harm to put up the financing for they are the ones who supply the campaign funds. I call this discrimination. Those who do not pay any income tax are to get a tax credit? Those on welfare already get an allowance for their rent. They should build themselves small inexpensive houses and use this allowance to make their payments. But for God's sake, let us give them a tax credit, and also to the tenants. By the way, the tenants get one from the school board now. This should be in the form of a tax credit which could be surrendered to the municipality since the municipality obviously needs adequate revenue.

In behaving the way it does, Mr. Speaker, the government acts as if it is only interested in making money, in having the poor help increase its own wealth and make the poor even poorer.

The minister says that the National Housing Act is amended to increase the construction of public housing by non-profit organizations. Once again, his objective is praiseworthy, I agree, I support his proposal, but how can that objective be reached? By paying once again for four houses to acquire one. If we apply to financial institutions, if we use means made available through the government, even the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is a government organization, will make you pay the price of four houses to get one. The minister would have a fine opportunity to follow the example of the people. Since non-profit corporations are involved, all voluntary workers who will be unpaid, that is the group that will build low-rental accommodations, could take advantage of interest-free funds. No, they will have to apply to the Bank of Canada exactly as if they were needy countries. There are also needy families and areas. We need not go to other countries to see people in need, Mr. Speaker, there are lots of them in Canada. I think that if the Bank of Canada can help others, it can also help the people of this country.

I will not insist on that lest someone starts talking about the floating dollar. Fortunately the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is not here with his floating dollar or rather his sinking dollar. We cannot bring the dollar back to the surface without upsetting the large financial institutions. The minister also extends the invitation to private investors but when I hear that I wonder whether the government is still willing to keep its word. Again, I blame the minister, but I should not blame him. I should blame the developers because I have evidence about people who took a risk in the private industry, who built 40 units because they had been promised benefits of $80 to $85 per unit and who received only $42 per unit once the work had been done.

So I suggest if we continue to invite private enterprise this way, private entrepreneurs will stay home. And I urge them to stay home as long as the government fails to keep its promise. It gave $89 to others and then only $42 to this one, why? Let us find out. But I talked to the minister about this and I hope he will be fair to him and give him the same amount he gave others, since he made the same effort; he even made more because he was forced to build in winter, which cost him around 10 to 15 per cent more. And when he woke up the next morning with only $42 instead of $89 in rebate, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, this does not encourage future owners at all.

Mr. Speaker, the minister also said he will encourage co-operatives. I do not know what he did for co-operatives, but when he said that, I was reading a press report from today, March 5, and I quote:

Mr. Ouellet wants to kill Quebec's housing co-operatives.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): That is not true.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The minister says it is not true, but I am not the one who said so. Frankly I wonder what happened because here is what we can read in that article:

In an interview with the Journal de Montréal, Mr. Jean-Guy Lague, the spokesman for Quebec housing co-operatives, stated "that the CMHCs new programs go directly against the basic principles of the present movement of housing co-operatives".

"If the minister had wanted to kill Quebec housing co-operatives, he could not have done any better," added Mr. Lague.

Mr. Watson: That is PQ propaganda.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Lague is not a PQ partisan. The hon. member is wrong, because whenever anything happens they yell PQ. You have unemployment, they blame the PQ. People are getting sick, they blame the PQ. You have smallpox and they blame the PQ. That is a sickness now. If you need a psychiatrist, you will be sent to Dr. Laurin . . .

Mr. Ouellet: Does the hon. member know Mr. Lague?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): He is not a PQ member.

Mr. Ouellet: Does the hon. member know him?

An hon. Member: He must be a Social Credit supporter.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I will not say anything because you will be influenced again. Nor I will say he is a Progressive Conservative because you will be influenced again. I continue the quotation:

The housing co-ops are not a new issue. Indeed for several months the Quebec housing co-ops representatives have been trying in vain to meet with Mr. Ouellet.

That is strange because we get to see him any time we want. Simply get him upset a little bit and there he is. I continue:

But the minister delays rendezvous for weeks and weeks. According to that spokesman, the autonomy of co-operatives is not respected when it comes to selecting members and criteria used to determine an equitable rent structure.

They also have rental problems, Mr. Speaker.

This new program gives a deadly blow to home rehabilitation by co-op members or working parties. The lower rehabilitation costs as a result of the work performed by co-op members do not reduce the rent but rather the CMHC subsidy.

I am getting close to the point, Mr. Speaker. It seems that when the co-op members volunteer to work on the project, the subsidy is reduced, as he explains, and I quote:

The lower rehabilitation costs as a result of the work performed by co-op members . . .

—voluntary work—

. . . do not reduce the rent but rather the CMHC subsidy. It is a program which favours new contruction, unsuitable for buyers of older homes in need of rehabilitation and more suitable to the needs of other provinces. Generally speaking, it is a discriminatory program towards Quebec. What Mr. Ouellet proposes to the Quebec co-operatives are actually "subsidies to the banks" . . .

In that respect, I fully agree with him because those who will benefit from that are precisely the banks, because they will make loans and will never lose a cent. It is the government which guarantees every cent of every mortgage dollar. Therefore, it is true that these are actually subsidies paid to banks. I go on with the quotation:

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

. . . it is to reinject co-operative housing into the main stream of the inflationary market, it is to base the development of co-operative housing on the incomes of certain groups of people. In view of the minister's contempt for their proposals, Quebec co-operatives are requesting another meeting with him to ascertain once and for all how these new federal programs will be implemented in regard to the specific features of Quebec housing co-operatives.

Another article refers to a major fight, and I will not have time to read it all because my time is almost expired, but I simply want to say to the minister that if there are falsehoods in the release, I hope he will schedule another meeting, because these people are complaining that they cannot meet with the minister.

Mr. Ouellet: I have met with them.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): In any event, I told them that if they cannot see him, they can come and see me, and that I know how to arrange a meeting.

Mr. Speaker, the minister asked me for suggestions this afternoon; the best thing I could suggest to him would be to reduce interest rates or, particularly for non-profit projects, to recover only administration costs. This we can do, if we only want to.

Should the government take these means to give satisfaction to senior citizens and low income earners once again, should elections be called, it would be presentable in the province. It must act fast however because the election is getting near and we would like it to be somewhat presentable. We are, for our part, doing our best always, and we will again do our best in the next election. Our organization is not such that we can make it known under all its aspects, but I hope they will act before the election is called.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ostiguy).

Mr. Friesen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I cannot be here for the rest of the week and my name is on the list. I apologize to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ostiguy)—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As far as the Chair is concerned there is, in principle, no list; every member has to rise to seek the floor and the Chair has already recognized the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I understand the hon. member's preoccupation. This debate may continue for some while—I do not know what may happen in the House. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe may not be long, and there is a possibility that the hon. member will get an opportunity to speak afterwards.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind my colleague opposite that I will only speak fifteen or twenty minutes. I think that he will have enough time to speak following my comments on the bill.

For several reasons, Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the amendments to the National Housing Act proposed in that bill. I heard my colleague opposite, the previous speaker, say that the bill would have bad implications and that it would be misunderstood by the people. This has surely been already pointed out, but I would like to remind him of some statistics recently provided during a Gallup poll which indicated that in 1963, 76 per cent of the people were satisfied and that today 86 per cent of the people are satisfied with the policies of the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation. In the province of Quebec, 95 per cent of the people are satisfied while 5 per cent are not.

I believe that these recently published figures show that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has done a lot for the building industry and the development of Canada. Indeed, I believe that it represents a logical way to deal with the whole area of housing problems. I am especially pleased to see that this bill has retained one of the most important measures ever implemented in Canada in this area, the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program better known as the RRAP.

I am also happy, Mr. Speaker, to see that the restrictions imposed upon this program have been abolished and that it will no longer be limited to certain designated areas. If this bill is passed, as I am sure that it will, Mr. Speaker, all Canadians will be able to benefit from the assistance granted under the RRAP. Under the terms of this program, the available funds will no doubt help to meet the most urgent needs of Canadians throughout the country. I am not surprised that the RRAP has been received so enthusiastically and spontaneously by Canadian as a whole.

I was told that since this program was established in 1973, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has helped in the rehabilitation of approximately 20,000 dwellings a year in Canada. I hope that this figure will increase as the program is expanded and municipal authorities become more familiar with it. Since my election on October 16, just four months ago, my constituency office in St. Hyacinthe has been visited by a great many people asking information about these programs. I could also tell the minister and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation authorities that there is perhaps a lack of information in rural municipalities, who are informed either through the county boards or by material and letters sent to the mayors or the secretaries of these municipalities. I believe that it would be a good thing to familiarize people with Bill C-29 now under consideration.

We must not forget however that housing rehabilitation is a long-term project. About 2 million Canadian dwellings were built before the end of the Second World War. Some of these dwellings are still solid enough while others are not worth being repaired. A basic renovation would do for many of them, perhaps half of them, and would extend their life for many years. What I mean, Mr. Speaker, is that a task of such a scope cannot be realized overnight, nor even within a year. The number of houses which can be renovated each year depends not only on the funds that the federal government will be able to allocate to these programs but on the attitude of the municipal organizations which will administer them and of course of the qualified and unionized labour which will be available and capable of making the necessary repairs and restoration works. Undoubtedly the number of renovated houses in Canada is rising each year. I am certain that the government of Canada will go on playing a leading role in this growing industry which is so important for our country. One recognizes more and more in Canada and everywhere in the world that the rehabilitation of dwellings is of capital import. If we think of the energy crisis, of oil and gas restrictions, we see that we must take all possible steps to look after those old houses which, when they were built, did not have any of the insulation which is available to us in the 1980s.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, people in increasing numbers consider that it is better to try and maintain their house and prolong its life expectancy than to take it apart and start from scratch. Renovation and preservation are both important factors of the federal government's conservation policy which calls for the proper administration and recycling of our non-renewable resources. To make a house last longer instead of starting from square one will result in major savings in terms of energy, material and money. And that is more and more what people are seeking both in Canada and elsewhere. In other words, Mr. Speaker, people are more concerned with providing adequate lodging than reaching set goals for housing starts every year.

Mr. Speaker, ever since the end of World War II and up to these past few years, we were mostly concerned with the production and construction of new housing. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was created in 1946 to help us catch up with the backlog accumulated during the depression and war years. But times change and so do the housing needs of Canadians. That factor, Mr. Speaker, associated with many others will mean that fewer new housing units will be needed each year. As we all know, we will probably need only about 20,000 housing starts a year around 1985, as compared with 30,000 today. The decrease in the population growth will also mean the population will be made up of a higher percentage of older persons.

At the same time, people are increasingly putting off getting married and having children, and children are leaving home at an earlier age. As a result of those trends, Mr. Speaker, families are growing smaller and couples without children are becoming more numerous. There will be a resulting exodus from the suburbs and big family houses to downtown areas where housing is older and in greater need of renovation. The increasing cost of gas and decreasing energy resources will in addition speed up this movement towards the city by pushing up the cost of daily commuting.

Mr. Speaker, all those demographic trends and economic projections, as well as changing social values, lead one to believe that rehabilitation will become increasingly important, at least until the end of the 20th century. I am very happy indeed that the government, by introducing these changes, recognizes the importance of renovation programs and the conservation of houses, and that it should have reaffirmed its intention of continuing to support those programs in concrete ways as it does through Bill C-29.

A few words now, Mr. Speaker, about non-profit corporations. I feel that through these assistance programs for co-operative housing projects and non-profit corporations, this bill underlines the needs of those for whom buying decent housing is a must. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that once the bill is passed and implemented, those programs will do much in achieving our objective for people of limited means. I am particularly happy with those programs which merge private capital with federal subsidies, and so achieve an efficient association of the resources of both the private and the public sectors. At this juncture, those financial arrangements are particularly important as government expenditures must be severely restricted for all programs it is setting up.

About those non-profit organizations, Mr. Speaker, I must say that in a riding like Saint-Hyacinthe with some 37 municipalities, already several municipal councils, several non-profit corporations have been formed and have come to ask me for information about those projects scheduled for 1979, having heard that under the new Bill C-29 they could have the benefit of a 100 per cent loan guarantee for non-profit corporations and have to pay only 2 per cent interest whatever the current rate of interest at the time the contract is signed. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that in a riding like Saint-Hyacinthe, at least five municipalities are already interested in that proposal, and I believe the publicity about this bill will have to be toned down for a while because we will surely not be able to have them all go ahead during 1979-80. I also say to the minister that projects will be welcome on the south shore of Montreal.

We also have in the town of Saint-Hyacinthe itself, Mr. Speaker, a 137-unit project under completion which should be opened in the month of March. The municipal authorities in Saint-Hyacinthe are asking us to apply for a new project because demand being so strong for retired people, this 137-unit project is already filled to capacity.

Mr. Speaker, I must say also that the housing policy set out in this bill is much wiser, fairer and much more efficient than certain irresponsible proposals put forward by members of the official opposition. I am thinking for example, Mr. Speaker, about the idea of making mortgage interest and municipal taxes deductible from taxable income. That proposal is in my opinion irresponsible because it is being introduced at a time when the government with the support and the approval of business is making big efforts to reduce spending and deficit. And members opposite chose precisely that time to put forward a measure that would cost hundreds of millions of dollars and would actually benefit only a very limited group of people who are far from being those most in need of help.

Out of the seven and a half million families in Canada, about three million rent either out of necessity or by choice. The tax deduction being proposed by certain members of the opposition will be of no use to that group in which you find most needy families. Approximately 2.5 million Canadians are home owners paying off mortgages. Among them are not only low income Canadians who were assisted in purchasing their homes but also the richest people in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I think the bill before us provides assistance to all Canadians, because it gives them the opportunity to buy good homes at a price they can afford. Given the present economic situation in the country, this legislation is socially equitable and financially sound. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is highly preferable to the inequitable, irresponsible, discredited yet revived proposal put forth by members of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, there is a saying to the effect that activity in the building trade is a sign of prosperity, yet when we look at the latest figures for housing starts, we see that there were only 227,667 housing starts in 1978 as compared to 254,725 in 1977. The number of completed homes in 1978 came down to 246,653 units compared with 251,789 in 1977. So there has been a decrease in construction in 1978, and we must do everything possible, Mr. Speaker, to boost the construction industry in the province of Quebec as well as in the whole country.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed listening to this debate, particularly the remarks of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) who, in true Liberal fashion, came down four square solidly on all sides. On the one hand he is in against the bill, and on the other hand he is in favour of it. He did not like the fact that his leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), issued a fiat to the effect that this department will be abolished, but he is going to vote for the bill anyway. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) was right when he said the government had no business in this business in the first place. Over the past ten or twelve years, experience has shown that it should never have gone into it. There are a lot of sorry home owners in Canada who have had the disagreeable experience of buying homes under some of the more unfortunate schemes this department put together.

The intent of Bill C-29 was well capsulized by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) who has a talent for compressing a comprehensive subject into a very few sentences. On March 1, as reported at page 3742 of Hansard, he said:

Essentially, the bill does three things. First, it disentangles the mess which the government has created in housing at both provincial and municipal levels over the last seven years; second, it cuts out the government's financial commitment to housing and urban affairs and, third, it winds down the Ministry of Urban Affairs after its death was announced in 1978. That is really what the bill does on behalf of the government. It disentangles, it cuts losses, and it winds down the ministry.

In a nutshell, that is what the bill is all about, but that really does not tell the history of some of the experiences people have had with this department.

I remember, when I came to this House almost five years ago, listening to the former minister of housing and urban affairs who is now the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson). Every year he would give statistics for the new housing starts—20,000, 30,000—they all looked good and it sounded as if the needs of the Canadian people were being met. It was evident that he was very statistics conscious, as I am sure the present minister is. It took two or three years for the reactions to those statistics on AHOP to come in. The big problem with AHOP is that it is not a "people" program. It was just another public relations gimmick, made to sound great, fun to end load the thing, to make sure that people could afford the downpayment. All the new housing starts to meet the needs of the people would make the government look good, and actually its purpose was to meet the public relations needs of the government. It took three or four years for us to find out what was going on. While this bill gets rid of the original department, it does not get rid of the problem, Mr. Speaker.

Some of my constituents who talked to me about the AHOP program showed me a brochure from CMHC which said that the government inspection would look after things. I notice that the bill does not change that. Clause 1(a) reads as follows:

(a) in accordance with this Act make approved loans on such security in favour of the lender as is provided for by this Act;

Mark those words, Mr. Speaker, "in favour of the lender." That is why I say it is not a people program.

An hon. Member: It is called free enterprise.

● (2130)

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member from Saskatchewan, who has never had a housing problem in his province because nobody ever moves there, wants to educate everybody else on what should be done about housing. I understand there is zero population growth in Saskatchewan. I would say that the lenders, the trust companies, mortgage companies and the banks, are big enough to look after themselves. Surely the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal or the Bank of Nova Scotia and all the trust companies have enough resources to supply their own inspectors.

The first-time home buyer who reads that brochure is starry eyed at the prospect of moving into a new home and thinks he is going to be protected. It is not the home buyer who is protected by that inspection, Mr. Speaker, it is the lender, and those lenders are big enough to look after themselves. The bill does nothing to correct that and I think the minister ought to change it so that it does. If inspections are necessary, and they are, why should they not be done on behalf of the buyer rather than on behalf of the money lender?

The second area in which this is not a "people" policy is that a ceiling is put on the price of the homes, especially in AHOP projects. At first blush that looks good. A buyer does not have to pay more than $47,000 for a home and that seems to be an advantage to the first-time home buyer. While it imposes a ceiling on the price of the home, however, it in no way imposes a ceiling on the cost to the contractor. It costs him just as much to buy the lumber, provide the services and pay the subtrades. The bill does not impose a ceiling on the cost of production, but only on the cost to the purchaser.

If the contractor is to meet that cost price squeeze he must look for ways of doing it, and it is likely that he will try to get money above the ceiling. Of course this is not legitimate.

On Saturday morning when I was in my riding I received a call from a constituent who claimed that he had not slept all night. The evening before he had signed an agreement to purchase an AHOP home. After he signed, the realtor slipped another piece of paper to him on which was written "lot differential fee". It turned out that in this project the original plans had not been good enough to suit the municipality and the developer was asked to upgrade them, which of course cost more. In an effort to recoup he put this piece of paper before the buyer and told him not to show it to his banker, otherwise he might not approve the mortgage.

I asked for a copy of the documents which I said I would take to the minister, as I did. To the credit of the former minister he said this was not right, and got in touch with his officials in Vancouver regarding the matter. Before the day was out, that project was frozen and about 35 home buyers had their money refunded.

When a ceiling is put on the price of the home, with no way of controlling the cost to the contractor, he is going to try to make it make it up in some other way. He can make it up by cutting corners. That is fine, as long as they are not cut so much as to produce a shoddy piece of merchandise.

The former minister was so interested in statistics that he put pressure on CMHC officials to get the contractors involved in this program. They were supposed to get out and build the homes. The result was that the good reputable contractors who had been in business for a long time and were concerned about their reputation and about ethics, stayed away from the program for the first two or three years. Meanwhile the quick operators moved in, put together a land assembly and, because there was no proper surveillance, they cut costs.

In a project in my constituency there were about 35 homes. I have shown the minister a video tape of some of the things that are wrong with it. He says it is too bad, that it should not be that way, and indicated that his officials in Vancouver say it is not right. It does not look as though the people concerned are going to get anything out of it, however. They have lost thousands of dollars in these homes but are not going to get anything from the government. I visited those people who bought some of those AHOP homes, Mr. Speaker.

In one case I know I hit my head on the dining room chandelier near the fridge. Would you believe that in a number of cases there was an electric splice box with bare wires? These were located behind medicine cabinets directly above the sinks. Just for kicks someone said, "I bet I can short that out." The man took a screwdriver to one of the boxes and blew out the fuse. This was a CMHC inspected home. Then there were water problems to contend with. These included seepage of water into the basement and water running into the basement instead of away from the house. The design did not call for closet doors, and there were none. Every closet door was a different size. Now it costs the home buyer twice as much, perhaps even three times as much to buy closet doors. In another home one had to open the oven door in order to get the cutlery drawer open. The list goes on and on.

The government inspectors were not doing their job. The former minister was so anxious to get statistics in order that he could have his 20,000, 25,000 and 30,000 new homes each year that he sacrificed the home buyer in the process. What we had was a series of companies throughout the country which were forming new companies to develop one project. They would then build all the homes and move out, taking the assets from the company and finally dissolving it, so that there was no way the homeowners could ever touch that company again. This happened because the minister was in a hurry. We have CMHC saying that they will secure the mortgage. But they made sure those homes were just good enough so they would last the life of the 25-year mortgage. Who knows what will happen after that?

Mrs. Pigott: Instant slums.

Mr. Friesen: Instant slums, right. Why were there not more inspectors? I understand from officials that they could not hire enough of them, first, because the growth factor was so large and, second, because the turnover rate in the inspection department was so great they could not train people fast enough to take care of the inspections. But, the minister got his statistics. Is it any wonder that as a result of AHOP now, after five years of production, out of 130,000 AHOP units built between 1973 and 1978 we have 53,000 units unsold? This amounts to roughly 35 per cent to 40 per cent unsold. Who knows how many of them are now vacant because of midnight movers? People said that the payments for the first five years were going to be subsidized, and in the next five years they would have to make that up. But in the next five years the house has already depreciated, so why pay higher payments for a depreciated house? And the midnight movers move in, and the 'for sale' signs go up.

In 1978, 10 per cent of the owners of AHOP homes defaulted on their payments. This compares with one half of 1 per cent of conventional mortgage home owners. That is the human problem. The minister can look at the statistics, and the House can study the statistics. That is one thing, but what about the pain and the anguish of those people who, for the first time, said, "I am going to have my own home."? They move into their dream home and those dreams are shattered within two years. For about three years there is one project on which I have worked with these people and with the minister and got zilch satisfaction out of it. The latest thing which the minister introduced is a kind of insurance program for new home buyers. That insurance program is about five years late. Incidentally, that insurance program is a confession of failures in other programs.

The other indefinable, intangible problem that this massive failure has created is the problem of reputation. What must it be like for someone who lives in an AHOP home in what has already been described as an AHOP district when he has to try to hide from other people that he lives in an AHOP project?

Reputable contractors have been coming on stream and they have been sharpening their pencils. They have said, "Look, if I do this and this, I think I can put out a new product within the price the ceiling establishes." So there are a lot of good AHOP projects around. The people who have bought in these projects are satisfied. They have a good reputation, except blurred across that good reputation are the other AHOP projects that people want nothing to do with. These include homes that were bought for $47,000 and are now worth perhaps $45,000, $44,000 or even $43,000. These homes were for first time home buyers. People not only had to come up with the down payment, which was hard to come by because obviously this program was designed for low income home owners, but frequently they had to borrow that down payment either from the bank, relatives or friends. Once they are in these homes they have to borrow more money for upgrading purposes so the houses will look the way they were supposed to look in the first place.

There is this mixed picture of good AHOP projects, mediocre AHOP projects, and poor AHOP projects. There is blurring in the public's mind. Where is the home buyer at in a situation like this? What do we do?

Now that the program seems to be working, as this government so often does, it has cancelled the program. That is it. It did this with the assisted rental program. Then it moves into another new area. The government's new alternative to AHOP is a graduated mortgage payment. It simply says that if one cannot afford a steep down payment, "We want to help you with that and temporarily ease the burden." In other words, in the first five years the burden will not seem quite so bad, but in the second five years it will get worse.

The government has ensured that inflationary pressures will continue. It is building on inflation on the one hand. In all the other programs it is saying, "We are trying to fight inflation, we are going to reduce inflation from 9 per cent to 7 per cent to 6.5 per cent." The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is continually saying, "We are going to cut it down." But in a program like the graduated mortgage payment program it is saying, "Inflation is going to be here a long time. We are going to help you fight inflation by helping you with this graduated mortgage payment." By so-called levelling out these payments it is increasing the inflationary pressures for these people who are buying these homes.

I note with interest comments of an earlier speech in this debate where the speaker quoted one of the economists in this country. At page 3746 of Hansard for March 1, 1979, it reads:

> Administered by the CMHC, GMP's are designed to give a house buyer one of the major advantages already provided by AHOP during the first five years of a graduated payment mortgage, monthly payments are much lower than a conventional mortgage would allow. From then on, payments are stepped up gradually until after the tenth year, when they reach a plateau.

The economist was a good man with figures, and he whipped out his pocket calculator. He found out that this was not such a great deal for the home buyer. As he said, the unpleasant, less obvious fact is that over the life of the debt the graduated mortgage payment will cost the borrower $9,324 more than the standard mortgage would, $105,024 compared to $95,700. As the speaker said at that time, the man who buys this mortgage borrows $35,000 and he pays back $105,024. Who needs that kind of help? Not the first time home buyer.

The economist goes on to call this permadebt. He will never get out of debt. It used to be that a man's home was his castle. It is now the case that the government is going to make sure that a man's home is somebody else's castle. The home buyer will never look forward to the day when he can own his own home.

I do not know that we can afford in this country to encourage a policy of debtorship. I thought in this country we were proposing policies of ownership, not debtorship, but the government seems to insist on wanting to lay the burden on those who cannot afford it so that they will be perpetually in debt, never seeing daylight. It believes in debtorship, not ownership.

A number of government members have criticized the Conservative plan to introduce deductibility of mortgage payments and home owner taxes from income tax.

Mrs. Pigott: They just wish they had thought of it first.

Mr. Friesen: That's right, they wish they had. Now they are fighting a rear guard action and spending all their time trying to find fault with something they wanted to promote previously. That is not easy.

The latest gimmick is to say that members from both sides of the House visited Washington where everyone was against the program. I lived in the United States for about seven years and I remember the home owners talking about that. There was not one who was not claiming it on their income tax. They thought it was the greatest thing to happen since sliced bread. At least it led to home ownership.

Mr. Hare: And early.

Mr. Friesen: As the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare) says, it leads to home ownership early. There were people in Washington who were against it, the same type of people as those in Ottawa who are against it, those in the department of HEW, the housing department. The bureaucrats think it is their God-given right to collect all the taxes in the country and to be the omniscient dispensers of tax money in programs which they design, programs which they believe are infallible. In Washington, as in Ottawa, they believe they know best how to spend the tax dollars.

Mrs. Pigott: They get advice from tax lawyers.

Mr. Friesen: That is right, those who specialize in that kind of mentality.

Mrs. Pigott: They make a lot of money.

Mr. Friesen: That's right.

Mr. Benjamin: How much help do you need?

Mr. Friesen: I will take all the help I can get from the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) because it is good. I don't mind. The Liberals are saying this does not work well. When something has worked for 30 or 40 years in the United States and they say it does not work, I wonder about their rationale. We are making a proposal to the people of Canada. So that those who need it most will benefit the most, all those up to a level of $50,000 will be able to deduct their mortgage interest rate from their income tax.

I just finished a survey in my constituency. One of the questions I asked was, are you in favour of being able to deduct housing interest payments and property taxes from your income tax? Surprise, surprise, 81 per cent of those who responded were in favour.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): I love it.

Mr. Friesen: There is one of those rich Liberals who will make use of this. I do not think the minister of amateur sport should get involved in this. She has not yet solved the coastal transportation problems. Therefore, she should not get into the housing debate.

Mrs. Campagnolo: You had better stick to AHOP.

Mr. Friesen: I am sorry AHOP ever came into Surrey.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Ask your mayor.

Mr. Friesen: I have, and don't think we haven't been talking about it. As a matter of fact, the whole GVRD looked at the AHOP program and you know what they thought about it. This is the minister who said she was going to resign if in 90 days the transportation problems along the northern coast was not solved. She must have invented the metric calendar because that 90 days was up three years ago and she is still hanging around.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Go back to Surrey. They don't want AHOP in their boundaries.

Mr. Friesen: She is now taking the expertise she gained solving all the northern transportation problems and is investing her expertise in Loto Canada where she has managed to lose $13 million. Now she wants to help in housing problems.

Members of this House, I do not think we need that kind of help from the minister of amateur fitness.

The Liberal members want to draw up a list as long as your arm listing all the reasons the program we have devised will not work. Although they are against it, millions of home owners across Canada are in favour of it, and they are going to see that we have a chance to bring about that policy and provide them with the kind of help for which they are looking.

Mr. Hare: If there is ever an election.

Mr. Friesen: That's right. There is another suggestion that I think is interesting. Something like 400,000 home owners in this country spend over 30 per cent of their income on housing.

Mr. Johnston (Westmount): They own homes though.

Mr. Friesen: Can they afford them? The CMHC guideline states that you should never spend more than 25 per cent. The government is breaking its own guideline and allowing CMHC mortgages to people paying more than 30 per cent of their income. There are something like 800,000 home owners who spend over 25 per cent of their income on housing.

We have a situation where 1,200,000 home owners in this country spend more than 25 per cent of their income on housing. We in the Conservative party have a solution to that problem. If the Prime Minister gets the nerve to call an election we will be able to present that solution. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, so that I can finish tomorrow?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been made.

LABOUR DISPUTES—ACTION TAKEN TO AVERT POSSIBLE STRIKE OF VANCOUVER DOCK WORKERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise in connection with questions I raised last Friday in the House during the question period with respect to some of the difficulties being experienced by our grain transportation system. I know that we often rise in this House for the purpose of trying to get better answers to some of the questions we put in question period, but I am in the awkward position of having taken the exceptional step of giving notice of my intention to ask a question, explaining to the minister precisely what I was going to ask, and having the parliamentary secretary get up and tell me that he would take notice of my question. That is what I would term the ultimate in unsatisfactory answers as far as a question very important to western Canada is concerned.

[Mr. Friesen.]

Quite apart from the fact that grain transportation is vital to the farmer and an efficient grain delivery system is vital to people in western Canada, I should point out these are also vital to the total economy in Canada. I think the government should pay attention to that fact, and when people from western Canada ask questions about such very important topics, the government should understand how important they are to all of Canada. They are not local, parochial, or regional questions at all.

I want to deal this evening with that aspect of my question which related to hours of work regulations under the Canada Labour Code. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that under the amendments to that legislation which were passed in 1977, there has been ongoing consultation between the Department of Labour and western grain elevator operators with respect to whether elevator managers in western Canada are going to be exempted from the hours of work provisions in that legislation, or whether there is going to be some special arrangement for elevator managers, having regard to the unique and seasonal nature of their business in terms of the grain trade. I am sorry to report that there has been no resolution of that very serious matter.

The minister has been out in Western Canada meeting with representatives of elevator companies, pools and others. They have been very dissatisfied with the way in which this matter has been handled as far as the Department of Labour is concerned. In fact the secretary-manager of the Western Grain Elevator Association, Mr. Keith Grey, is quoted as saying that the Western Grain Elevator Association is totally dissatisfied with the proposed hours of work regulations for grain elevator workers. He said:

> We are not happy with anything because we feel the managers are exempt and Labour Canada is taking a firm position in opposition of that representation, which we feel is not on sound ground.

The article in which that quotation is printed goes on to say:

> He said the minister has met with the association on two separate occasions to explain why country elevator managers "cannot be totally exempt from the hours-of-work provisions of the Canada Labour Code."
> "The bureaucrats are not concerned with political ramifications. If we cannot obtain an understanding with the minister through discussion, then we will have to go another route," Grey said.

In another interview Mr. Grey put his finger on the way this problem might be solved. He is quoted in the Western Producer of Thursday, March 1, 1979. The article in which he is quoted reads in part as follows:

> A change of government in the next federal election would probably help the grain elevator industry receive a permanent exemption from federal hours of work rules for employees—
> If the Progressive Conservatives win, "I think they are in tune with the concerns of western Canada," he said. "It could well mean a total exemption."

Mr. Grey went on to reiterate that the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) understands and is sympathetic to elevator company concerns about hours of work, "but he is getting bad advice from his bureaucrats". The situation is simply that federal proposals to end the exemption have been postponed several times, and the latest postponement came last February 15 when implementation was put off from April 15, 1979, to April 15, 1980. The article goes on:

> Industry officials have argued that because elevator managers are paid both a base salary and some "incentive bonuses," hours restrictions and overtime would require a major revision of pay structures. It would also require an extensive monitoring and policing system.

● (2205)

I think the worst complaint of the people in the industry and of the people in western Canada is the indecision and lack of sensitivity of the government to the practical circumstances of the western farmer in terms of his relationship with the western grain elevator managers. These people, by and large, are highly industrious, highly efficient managers of western grain elevators, and they perform a very important and useful function within the community. They are available to farmers at a time of their greatest need. They are compensated in terms of incentive bonuses and are given time off to make up for the overtime they put in during the course of a busy season. Probably this is hanging over them as another obstacle to the efficient grain delivery system, so I ask the parliamentary secretary to give us some assurance, and to give some assurance to western Canadians and to the grain elevator managers with regard to the government's intentions, whether or not it is going to play around with the matter indefinitely, causing the kind of inconveniences which have been caused up to this point.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend my apologies to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) for not answering his second question last Friday, but unfortunately, despite the generous 15 minutes' advice he gave to the minister's office, it had been impossible for me to grasp all the aspects in his question in order to give him a reliable and complete answer. I hope I will be able tonight to give him some elements of answer which will prove to his satisfaction.

[English]

Since his appointment last year, the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) has had numerous discussions with representatives of the Western Grain Elevator Association on the hours of work question. The association is fully aware of his position regarding the need to ensure fair treatment of employees. He is also aware of the needs of farmers for extended grain elevator services during the planting and harvest seasons.

Consequently, the Western Grain Elevator Association and the grain services union have now been informed that the current exemption from the hours of work provisions of the Canada Labour Code for country elevator agents, managers and their assistants, due to expire on April 14, 1979, will be extended to April 14, 1980, at which time a modified hours of work regime will come into effect.

The new hours of work regime will take into account the interests of the employees concerned, the interests of farmers and the interests of the grain elevator companies, by providing for standard hours of work of 48 in a week and a maximum of 60 hours a week during the planting and harvest season, instead of the 40 and 48 hours respectively provided by division I of Part III of the Canada Labour Code.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—INQUIRY WHETHER AGREEMENT REACHED WITH NEW BRUNSWICK ON ADDITIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion about the progress made in the negotiations with New Brunswick concerning a subsidiary agreement on so-called developing regions.

These regions include not only my riding of Madawaska-Victoria but also that of Northumberland-Miramichi and the regions of Grand Lake and Charlotte in southern New Brunswick which, as a whole, have not yet been covered by a special agreement as was the case in almost all other regions of the province.

The northeast agreement has been known for years and includes the counties of Restigouche and Gloucester. There was an agreement on the Mactaquac region, the agreement concerning the special zones of St. John and Moncton, the agreement on Kent county, and let us not forget the sectorial agreements on agriculture, forestry, highways and others which of course concern the whole province.

In the circumstances, it was perfectly normal that northwest New Brunswick should claim its fair share. However, I emphasize that my region benefited from the programs offered by the federal government through DREE, the Department of Transport, the Department of Urban Affairs and others. The regional airport, Assomption Crossing in Edmundston, the regional museum, McCain Foods, Nadeau & Nadeau furniture, Fraser plants and dozens of small businesses are just a few examples of a long list of achievements in which the federal government has been involved. However, there is still some basic work to be done and I shall deal with this tonight. There are the municipal infrastructures that are essential to a certain quality of life and conditional to our economic development.

The small municipalities which do not have a large enough tax base to provide a minimum of services are particularly deserving in this regard.

While the northeastern part of the province and urban areas in the south could benefit from generous federal-provincial development agreements, many northwestern municipalities either had to freeze their water and sewer system projects, for instance, or pay through the nose. The provincial government told them: You are wealthy enough, you are well off in the northwest.

My colleague from Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) and myself were opposed to these disparities being perpetuated in a province which was already underprivileged compared with the others. We urged the present minister to correct these aberrations and I believe that we have won the first 14 rounds of the match, thanks, I am glad to note, to the understanding and the generosity of the minister, and in spite of the stubborn resistance first shown by the province of New Brunswick which opposed the negotiation of this agreement.

We therefore developed, with the industrial boards of our areas and in close consultation with the municipalities involved, a series of projects and proposals which, if all were accepted, would greatly assist in our industrialization and job creation efforts, without however being a solution to all the problems. This does not mean that all the proposals contained in the draft agreement are equally good or urgent or that the federal and provincial governments have enough money to finance all of them. As usual, the federal government will pay the bigger share, from 75 to 80 per cent, and the province and the municipalities, the taxpayers in other words, will pay the rest.

Unlike certain provincial ministers who represent my area, I do not consider the federal government as an inexhaustible source of funds. I feel particularly distrustful of electoral promises made by provincial politicians who will deliver just about anything and unknowingly feed great expectations into the minds of local governments and communities. The very meaning of the words consultation and negotiation should be explained to these people. Furthermore, it is the provincial government which itself put a ceiling of $25 million on the contribution of the two superior levels of governments in the agreement which we are now negotiating. It is a lot or it is too little. It all depends on which side you are. As for me, Mr. Speaker, what is important is to get started and to reach an agreement as soon as reasonably possible. I understand that the federal and provincial governments agree over most of the proposals contained in the draft agreement and that the views vary on one or two projects only.

Orally and in writing I have asked the minister to sign the agreement for the projects on which there is a consensus even if it becomes necessary to add or modify certain aspects later on. The municipalities would like to know the intentions of the two levels of government so as to be able to take advantage of the pleasant season ahead. The minister knows fully well that it takes some time to call the tenders, to study them, to award the contracts, to purchase the materials, to hire the manpower and to get the projects under way.

In answer to my question, last Friday the minister said he hoped that the agreement could be effective as of the next fiscal year. It is also my hope and the Parliamentary Secretary, the honourable member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood), who is going to speak tonight on his behalf and who has been a member of the Atlantic Development Commission, is aware of the problems of my riding and of the maritimes. I am quite confident that he will be able to provide my constituents and myself with an encouraging answer.

[English]

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin).

In order to provide for special development measures in four New Brunswick regions which are lagging behind the rest of the province, negotiations are nearing completion with the province for the signing of a subsidiary agreement to provide assistance in overcoming intraprovincial disparities. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member has discussed this important subject as recently as this afternoon with the minister.

An examination of the distribution of economic activity reveals that each of the regions has a significant reliance on the primary sectors. Growth in the manufacturing sector has not been sufficient to absorb increases in the labour force. The four regions are the following: Northwest—the counties of Madawaska and Victoria; Miramichi—the county of Northumberland; Grand Lake—the counties of Sunbury and Queens; Charlotte—the county of Charlotte.

Rates of population growth in these regions have been typically lower than the provincial average. A contributing factor to the relatively poor population growth is the lack of employment opportunities in these regions. Both average income, and average earned income remain below the respective provincial averages. For the majority of the six counties, the gap is most pronounced for average earned income.

There is little to suggest that these regions, left to their own devices, will significantly alter their relative position vis-à-vis their provincial average. There exists a requirement to revitalize the various regional economies, and to encourage local growth and development. The proposed agreement will attempt to encourage such development by providing funds for specific projects which may have a particularly significant effect on the regional economies.

The agreement proposal has been formulated following a planning and public consultation exercise which has attempted to ensure that initiatives respond to public priorities. Special emphasis has been given to the views of local community business leaders. A series of meetings was held in June and July 1978 in order that development needs and potential could be discussed by representatives of government and those of the designated regions.

A major objective of the agreement will be to halt, and possibly reverse the long-term declining trend in employment and income levels. The proposed programs are intended to take advantage of resource and industrial development opportunities, and reinforce the growth potential of a number of selected centres by the provision of infrastructure assistance.

TRADE—GATT NEGOTIATIONS ON NON-TARIFF TRADE BARRIERS

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate to follow up a question I put to the minister responsible for DREE, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), on February 28, dealing with his knowledge of the current GATT negotiations. In his response the minister said he was not in a position at that time to report on the progress which had been made with the United States in relation to non-tariff trade barriers.

Unfortunately, time did not permit me to pose my supplementary question. It would have been in line with my proposed motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 for which I had earlier sought unanimous consent. It would have been: "Would the minister consider proposing regionalization schemes and negotiating subsidized exports so that provinces such as New Brunswick could benefit from the lowering of trade barriers with New England and become an attractive location for branch plants?"

I should like to reiterate, for the benefit of the House, that the maritimes and New Brunswick were at one time the hub of economic activity in Canada. It was only after the opening of large markets in central and western Canada that our economy began to decline. It is not the way of maritimers or of Atlantic Canadians to expect others to bear the burden of the social and economic stagnation we have experienced over the past number of years. We possess a good many resources, including people, to deal with our problems.

What has happened is that the Atlantic region and the maritime region have become a bit like a boat, adrift in the sea of economic stagnation, with a broken oar. There are all kinds of statistics to point out the fact that the maritime region and the Atlantic region are indeed a depressed area and, therefore, an area at which this government should take a strong look.

The government's approach has been through DREE and in that respect I give it full credit, although DREE has not solved the problem. It has been in existence for approximately ten years and, indeed, it has allayed our difficulties to some degree. I applaud the government's efforts from the standpoint of realizing that the maritime region does have a particular problem. I want the government to know that, as maritimers, we appreciate the feeling that the government has taken in its approach through DREE.

Unfortunately what has developed since the decentralization of DREE is that there has been no change in its attitudes, no gut changes in its approach. This has contributed to the continuing attitude of the Bay Street mandarins toward the Atlantic region, an attitude which I refer to as a "piggy bank" attitude. I feel that there should be a definite plank for development. I believe that DREE should take upon itself a program to establish definite goals that would illustrate the direction in which it would like to see the Atlantic region go. I believe that a fresher approach is necessary, and I would like to see new life injected into the old program and hierarchy of DREE.

Let me now refer to the present GATT negotiations. I am not privy to any inside information, but I believe that one approach which could be taken to help develop the Atlantic region would be to negotiate with the United States with regard to the maritime and Atlantic regions specifically. The Atlantic region is hindered in taking advantage of the great New England market, which is comprised of millions of people, by the economic countervailing duties, trade barriers, and so on.

I would like to see the day when DREE could be disbanded altogether. I suggest that one approach would be to set up a special program whereby products which are manufactured and exported from the maritime region to the New England market are given special consideration. This would have the benefit of attracting new industry to the maritimes and of inspiring manufacturers to expand existing industry. It would also pave the way for that well known approach which has been talked about for some time, the branch plant approach, whereby major manufacturers in other areas of Canada locate and establish branch plants in an area which has access to particular markets. We offer in this case a well positioned geographic location plus a solid, substantial labour market, so that the products of an industry could be very attractive to that very lucrative New England market.

It was in this context that I posed my question the other day during question period. I appreciate the opportunity of having this allotted time to bring my concerns to the attention of the government, because I am not hindered by the question period in so far as supplementary questions are concerned.

I think that the attitude of the government, although it is channelled in the proper direction, has become stagnated. I would like to see a face lift for DREE, with the ultimate goal of phasing out the operation totally because we, as Atlantic Canadians and maritimers, have the expertise, labour, and certainly the willingness.

• (2225)

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to respond to the hon. member on the question of our progress with the United States in the GATT negotiations in Geneva in the area of non-tariff barriers.

The draft agreements that we have been discussing with our trading partners cover a very wide range of subjects—subsidies and countervailing duties, government procurement practices, customs valuation, safeguards against disruptive imports, technical barriers to trade, import licensing procedures, the counterfeiting of commercial trade marks, and trade in civil aircraft and parts. All of these, of course, have been the subject of multilateral discussion rather than direct negotiation with the United States. Given the extent of our trade with that country, however, their impact on the flow of goods between us is clearly of major significance. An obvious example is the code on subsidies and countervailing duties.

As a result of these negotiations, the U.S. Congress will be asked to amend its legislation to require a determination of material injury to domestic industry as a precondition to the imposition of countervailing duties. Such a change will substantially diminish the threat of such duties being levied against Canadian exports which have benefited from Canadian assistance programs. This has obvious relevance to the sorts of cases we have encountered in recent months.

In the area of government procurement, what is being discussed is a code which will provide a start in bringing government purchases under international trade discipline. The question of coverage is still under negotiation. With regard to customs valuation, an international code has also been under discussion. As drafted, there remained a number of difficulties from the Canadian point of view. No government decision has yet been taken as to whether or not Canada will adhere to this code and, if so, under what conditions.

Another important area in the negotiations has to do with safeguards, that is to say, the action which a country is permitted to take to protect its domestic producers from serious injury arising from a sudden and significant increase in imports. One of the special questions under discussion is a provision which would allow such action to be taken on a selective basis against imports from those countries primarily responsible for the injury, rather than against imports from all suppliers of the product in question.

The proposed agreement of technical barriers is designed to prevent the use of standards or technical regulations in such a way as to create unnecessary obstacles to the flow of international trade. Canada and the United States have common interests in this area.

In general, Canada and the United States are in reasonable agreement on these various codes and other arrangements. For the most part they are at a relatively advanced stage and negotiations are continuing. Even after the negotiations are over, of course, there will undoubtedly remain a number of non-tariff problems to be resolved. These will be taken up as necessary with the United States and our other trading partners.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PUBLICATIONS

OFFENSIVE ARTICLE IN "WEEKEND" MAGAZINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the unnecessarily offensive nature of the article entitled "Confessions of an Ex-Priest" in the Weekend magazine of March 3, having no redeeming social purpose or point other than sensationalism in attempting the degrading of a major Christian religion and libelling those who serve that cause, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House regrets the poor taste and deplorable lack of honest journalistic standards of Weekend magazine as shown in the issue of March 3 and hopes that such a lamentable lack of judgment and good taste will not be repeated.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

INTRODUCTION OF MEASURES TO IMPROVE PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), I move:

That this House declares its readiness to give swift passage, before parliament is ended, to any legislation respecting veterans, particularly if it modifies the 48 per cent rule which applies to the widows of disabled veterans, adjusts the rate of compensation for former prisoners of war, or makes improvements in the War Veterans Allowance Act, and that this House expresses the hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) will introduce such legislation forthwith.

PUBLIC WORKS

QUESTION ANSWERED BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of pressing necessity.

In light of information provided in the House yesterday by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Herbert) which is both misleading and in conflict with statements issued by the minister last week, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That this House directs the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouellet), when he is to be absent from the House, to make sure someone in a position to speak for him has been informed about issues affecting the running of his department, so as to safeguard against misleading the House on matters which the minister has already announced to the country at large through the press.

REPORTED PC CANDIDATE IN NEXT ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my motion under Standing Order 43 is in regard to public announcements as reported in the Sunday Post of March 4 respecting a very senior, partially public official, the housing czar of Canada, Mr. Teron, who stated that he is moving into the third world and that he has been recruited by the Progressive Conservative party as a candidate.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter that is urgent and pressing, having to do with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen).

In view of the fact that the minister has allocated $226,000 for Young Canada Works projects in the east half of Regina, where the Minister of Transport's brother-in-law is the Liberal candidate, but the same department has allocated only $50,000 for Young Canada Works in the west half of Regina, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House require the Minister of Employment and Immigration to adjust the allocation of funding for these two areas in a more fair and reasonable proportion, rather than being party to this blatant attempt to bail out the Minister of Transport's brother-in-law at public expense.

NEED FOR DISCUSSION WITH COMPANIES AND UNIONS TO OBTAIN REASONABLE INTEREST RATES AND PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity stated in an article published in La Presse on February 7 last that salary demands denote a sharp upward trend; considering that a report financed by the Economic Council of Canada also published last week indicated that chartered banks had made excessive profits of $500 million from 1968 to 1973 and that this trend is continuing, since one of them increased its profits by 58 per cent in its last financial year; considering finally that those trends could signal a new inflationary push, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House enjoins the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to initiate immediately some discussions with corporations and unions to make them moderate their interest rate, selling prices or wages demands, as the case may be.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

NORTHERN PIPELINES

CONSTRUCTION OF ALASKA HIGHWAY PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the testimony given before the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines this past week which indicates that unless action is taken by the United States Congress very soon to overcome the regulatory delays in the United States, the Alaska pipeline project completion date will be delayed up to two years beyond the date agreed to in the Canada-U.S. treaty, and considering the economic importance of this project proceeding on time both in Canada and in the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne):

That this House supports the action of the Prime Minister in his meeting with President Carter last weekend in impressing upon the U.S. President the urgency of moving ahead with the Alaska pipeline project.

REMOVAL OF PERSONAL DATA FROM TAXPAYERS' FILES BEFORE DEPOSITING WITH STATSCAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Prompted by a measure unveiled by the federal office for the reduction of paperwork to develop a plan allowing Statistics Canada to make maximum use of income tax records, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That in view of the demonstrated incompetence of Statistics Canada to preserve the confidentiality of tax data in their possession, as well as medical health records, that the conditions under which tax data is made available to Statistics Canada, pursuant to the Statistics Act, be severely restricted, and that names and other pertinent details of taxpayers' personal lives be properly removed from income tax forms before Statistics Canada is given access to them.

MONITORING OF CONSUMER PRICES BY CSIP—POWERS OF AGENCY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, I put my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It deals with the National Commission on Inflation. I would draw to the minister's attention a statement made in this House yesterday by the Minister of Finance who stated: "The government has concluded that the power of inquiry was needed by CSIP, but as we could not give this power to CSIP we created a new institution". The minister was referring to the National Commission on Inflation.

My question to the minister is very simple. Did CSIP indicate at any time that they were being frustrated with respect to their own monitoring arrangements because they did not have power under the Inquiries Act, and did they ever request from the government the need for such power?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no responsibility for CSIP. That question would have to be put to the responsible minister.

Mr. Crosbie: What are you responsible for?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I think it is deplorable that the minister in charge of consumer and corporate affairs would say that he has no responsibility with regard to the monitoring of inflation in the economy.

An hon. Member: Order.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Stevens: I will put my question this time to the Acting Prime Minister and, presumably, the Acting Minister of Finance and I hope it will be treated as an original question. Did CSIP at any time indicate that they were being frustrated with respect to their ongoing monitoring of prices and wages in this country because of the fact that they did not have power under the Inquiries Act, and did they ever request such power to be granted to them under this act?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the question is obviously one of fact which I cannot answer because such a request has not been addressed to me. However, it is self-evident that any instrument in this field would be much more effective if it had the power of inquiry. This is why the government has moved to provide a body with the power of inquiry. It seems to me that under the circumstances it is somewhat irrelevant whether CSIP did or did not ask for this power, or whether or not it was frustrated in its operations. The fact is that under the circumstances the government concluded that the formation of the NCI was an appropriate step to take in its concern about inflation in this country.

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON BANK PROFITS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, once we get through the gobbledegook, it is clear that CSIP did not ask for any such inquiry powers.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stevens: My final question is directed to the Minister of Finance and it deals with a statement he made yesterday in answer to a question. The minister stated: "As for bank profits, there was a problem in our system, that we called income debentures, and in our November 16 budget we eliminated this system by which banks could make profits we found excessive—"

The Royal Bank has stated very plainly that income debentures did not contribute even materially to their profit increase in the statement which was brought out with respect to their last quarter. In view of the fact that the minister was told by the Royal Bank that that was the case, would he indicate whether or not he simply misled the House, or whether or not he just did not understand what he had been told?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I pointed out, with regard to this problem, that there are other aspects to the profit picture of the banks upon which they have been asked to elaborate. They made a great deal of their profits last year in their foreign operations. I believe that I did mention yesterday that the problem of the tax aspect of bank profits was one of the loopholes which we were attempting to plug last November.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—ACTION TO CURB UNJUSTIFIED PRICE INCREASES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As the predecessor of the National Commission on Inflation, the incomes and prices board of 1969, under the chairmanship of Mr. John Young, had to fold up after three years because of its complete failure to be able to control unjustified price increases, and as the latest commission which the minister announced with such fanfare on Friday is very similar in that neither commission had or has the power to require that action be taken when unjustified price increases are discovered and, therefore, were and are simply investigative bodies, I ask the minister what the government would expect of the commission if it discovered that there were unjustified price increases? Would it put ads in the papers, or would it take time on television to let the people know? Just what would it do to make sure that unjustified price increases are not allowed?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Phone Herb Gray.

● (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have given a mandate to the commission. They will decide their own procedure in order to inform the public when they find people abusing the situation. If they are not satisfied, after discussions with the people who have been found not to be collaborating for the betterment of the Canadian economy, they will take the necessary steps to make that public. They could make a specific recommendation to the government, as is mentioned in their terms of reference.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This is exactly what happened in the three years between 1969 and 1972 under the prices and incomes commission. Business simply laughed at the commission and nothing was done whatsoever. Now, with no more power, is the minister not aware that the business community is already laughing at this latest attempt by the government, on the eve of an election, to kid the people of Canada into thinking that something is really going to be done to hold down unjustified price increases? Is he not aware of that?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I read in the Globe and Mail this morning that many organizations have commended this action of the government. The situation under the Young commission was at the beginning of our problems with inflation, not only in Canada but in the world. Since then we have been forced to impose controls. Now we have decided to get out of controls, with the support of everybody including the business community. They now understand, just like the unions, that it is in their best interests to make sure it is not they who are causing inflation in the land.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

BUSINESS TAKEOVERS—INTRODUCTION OF REVISED COMPETITION BILL

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is related to the question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, on Friday concerning the takeover bid for The Bay by Thomson interests.

In order to stop the kind of corporate cannibalism which has been taking place in the Canadian economy, will the minister bring in a revised competition bill which will require prior approval for any merger or acquisition over $5 million, to ensure that competition will not be lessened in the marketplace and that prices will not be increased as a result?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have said we will bring forward a new competition bill shortly. Hon. members will have an opportunity to examine the provisions of the bill once it is tabled. I might say that it will contain several changes from the bill that was tabled last year, Bill C-13.

Mr. Rae: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. According to the minister's department, there were a number of reported takeovers in 1978—439, compared with 296 in 1974.

In light of what the minister has just told the House, could he explain why it has taken this government this entire parliament to bring in the legislation that is required?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, in the past few years we have tabled severals bills on this subject, last year Bill C-13 and the year before Bill C-42, which provided quite effective measures to deal with mergers and takeovers. I do not recall any initiative coming from the New Democratic Party, the Conservative party or the Social Credit party to co-operate with us in getting that bill through.

Mr. Rae: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I find it ironic that, when the government controls the order paper, they would blame the opposition for their lack of action in this critical area.

Since we are on the eve of an election and the bill is not going to be presented to parliament, could the minister take steps to confer with industry and explain to them that the kind of corporate cannibalism that has been going on is having a negative effect on the people of Canada and, in particular, is having a direct effect on price increases?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have done that already and I intend to have several more meetings with particular companies which have been singled out for their behaviour with respect to concentration, and so on. Hon. members are probably aware of the recent report with respect to the optical industry, which pointed out there was very heavy concentration in the industry. I intend to have meetings with the industry in that particular field shortly.

CAREER COUNSELLING PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Since I asked him last Friday whether he could tell the House why there is a freeze on the $4 million earmarked for recycling language teachers within the public service, I would like to know if he could give the House an answer today. Did he make an inquiry?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did make an inquiry. I am trying to find that document. As I recall, we have decided to protect those people whom the hon. member referred to in the question he asked me. In other words, I think that those people who might want to follow a career counselling program will be protected until new funds are available.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROPOSED ACTION WHEN EVIDENCE FOUND OF PROFITEERING OR PRICE GOUGING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Given the fact that in this House the minister has leaned very heavily, in reply to questions regarding price gouging and profiteering, on phase two of the competition bill, and given the fact that the Prime Minister has indicated realistically that this parliament will not have time to deal with phase two of the competition bill or, indeed, amendments to the combines act, what does the minister intend to do when faced with evidence of profiteering or price gouging, given the fact that the new inflation agency set-up has no power in this regard?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I referred to the role of the competition act and competition reform, I did so in the context of a longer term. There is no doubt that competition reform cannot affect prices in the short-term, but it can in the long-term.

May I say that is only one of several things we have done. Last year, the Minister of Finance took steps twice to reduce sales taxes, both federal and provincial. He also announced measures to help the weaker people in our society, families and senior citizens. Last week we announced the establishment of the National Commission on Inflation which will be able to highlight unjustified price increases, and I have mentioned that we are working on certain supply policies with respect to food.

SITUATION RESPECTING INCREASED PRICE OF CHICKEN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister if he could tell the House and the consumers of this country what he proposes to do on an interim basis when faced with evidence of price gouging and profiteering, as would appear to be the case with the price of chicken. The minister indicated in the House that chicken prices are going up because of consumer demand. The Minister of Agriculture indicated that there is a chicken surplus of four million pounds. What is he doing about the situation?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while reform is necessary with respect to our combines laws, we must not assume that our present laws are completely without effect. In the last year we had several companies convicted of price fixing or market rigging respecting the food industry. I need only mention the record judgment with respect to the sugar companies and the very keynote judgment with respect to jeans and clothing.

I could give many other examples where our department gained major convictions against companies which deal with consumers on a day to day basis.

Mr. McGrath: What are you doing about chicken?

AIR TRANSPORT

DEFICIENCIES IN COMMUNICATIONS AND OPERATIONAL PROCEDURES AT UNCONTROLLED AIRPORTS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It arises from Transport Canada's committee report on operational interface which was concluded in June, 1976. The committee reported that there were very serious deficiencies in communications and operational procedures at Canada's uncontrolled airports. It advanced some positive recommendations and urged that they be implemented immediately.

The committee further stated that the severe procedural problems were only symptoms of a deeper, fundamental problem which required a solution of national scope. I ask the minister why he and his department have failed to react to this report expeditiously and why they have failed to carry out the recommendations contained therein. Why was the report buried? Why has the minister not seen the report? If he has, why have communications' regulations not been amended to reflect the recommendations in the report?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the report in question was one that dealt specifically with airports at Inuvik, Fort McMurray, and Fort St. John, as I understand it, if the hon. member is referring to the same report on which I have had information. Action was taken on that report to begin development procedures. The report concentrated particularly on areas where there might be many different radio contacts in one zone. Certain procedures were looked at. Therefore, the hon. member is quite wrong in suggesting there was any burying of the report. Actually, it began to be developed in this regard, as it did in regard to other uncontrolled airports, following the report.

Mr. Mazankowski: The report clearly indicates that a thorough investigation of national scope would be required to expose the comprehensive picture and to expose the deficiencies contained therein. I find it appalling that the minister did not see the report earlier, as reported in the press yesterday.

Will the minister undertake to table the relevant air navigation orders that have been implemented as a result of this report, since the report did have national implications notwithstanding the fact that it was a regional study?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I should tell the hon. member that the minister does not see reports of an administrative nature which can be acted on by officials in the ordinary course, unless there is some policy or financial implication directly involved where my assistance is required. If the hon. member wishes to have information about steps taken with regard to this area, an appropriate question on the order paper will allow me to supply him with all the information he wishes.

STATISTICS CANADA

WRITTEN WARNINGS TO MINISTERS ON LACK OF SECURITY OF RECORDS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce respecting the matter of confidentiality of Statistics Canada records. Is the minister now able, by perusing his records and other measures, to ascertain why the written warnings that were given to his predecessors about the lack of security at Statistics Canada were never acted upon? Can he now assure us that corrective steps have been taken?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House and the hon. member that corrective steps are being taken with regard to security within Statistics Canada. The problem really arose with the severe cuts made last fall and some of the cuts in man-years that Statistics Canada has had to endure. That caused a shuffle and may well cause some lay-offs in March. That has been part of the problem. It is suggested that the government's attempt to save money is the cause of the hon. member for Central Nova being made aware of certain documents in a certain room.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer, but I want to inform the hon. gentleman that I have records here which indicate that ten years ago the very conditions relating to the conditions that were illustrated in Building No. 5 were conveyed to his predecessor. Those had to do with medical health records, an even more serious breach of confidentiality. Therefore, I am sure that the excuse the minister just gave would not account for the lack of security ten years ago. I trust he will do something very soon to check the records and find out who is responsible for this.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the whole matter is being examined very fully. Whether it was ten years ago, yesterday or today, it is the duty of all people working within the government to obey the law.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SHOE INDUSTRY—INQUIRY RESPECTING ANTI-DUMPING ACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Last spring, following the representations made by spokesmen for the rubber footwear industry, the Department of National Revenue made an investigation under the Anti-dumping Act. Could the minister inform the House of the outcome of that investigation and tell us what action he intends to take to help this segment of Canadian industry?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, the deputy minister of national revenue responsible for customs and excise made a preliminary statement last February 26 in which he said there was some dumping and stockpiling of rubber footwear exported from Czechoslovakia, Poland, Korea and Taiwan. On the same day the matter was referred to the anti-dumping tribunal which will have to rule on the matter of the serious prejudice incurred by the Canadian industry. The tribunal has 90 days to come to a conclusion.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PRICE PAID TO WESTERN FARMERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It is asked on behalf of the wheat farmers in western Canada. On December 18 last, I raised an application in the House under Standing Order 43, asking that consideration be given to paying an additional 50 cents a bushel to farmers on the delivery of their wheat. If you look at Hansard for that date, you will see that it was turned down by Liberal members, including the Minister of Transport.

In the past few days, on the way to Damascus, the government decided to pay the extra 50 cents a bushel that I asked for in December and which was turned down at that time. I find farmers everywhere saying that prices have gone up because of inflation in so far as farm matters are concerned, and costs are out of all control; therefore, 50 cents is not enough. I now ask the minister, as we approach the election—which has a wonderful influence on the thinking of the government—whether they will add another 50 cents at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I find it extraordinary that the right hon. gentleman makes use of Standing Order 43 to make it sound as though this House turned something down, when all it did was not agree to set aside the business of the House for that specific issue at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The record should show that just because the right hon. member said that certain people said no to that question, that has no relationship to the truth whatever, as quite often takes place under Standing Order 43. All that the right hon. gentleman was doing in December was reading to me what effectively had been passed in the form of a resolution by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool asking for that 50 cents. I told the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool that it would indeed be appropriate to consider this matter, and that that would be done on or before March 1 as we looked at the whole question of the pool for this year and initial prices for next year.

I assure the right hon. gentleman that this government, conscious of the cash needs of farmers in this spring, is doing as it did a couple of years ago in maintaining initial prices as high as is reasonably possible to give farmers their cash as early as possible and not come around, pre-election, with $200 acreage payments like the right hon. gentleman did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, $200 then meant $200, and not $75 as it does today. I suggest, for the benefit of the minister, that he read Hansard of that date. He will find it was Liberal members who turned it down. I now ask him, will he endeavour to tell the truth—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said "endeavour" because what he has said so far is the reverse of the truth to the fullest extent.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that at this time the addition of 50 cents to the initial price reflects more than advisers from the Wheat Board would have said was safe to put forward in an ordinary and past time way. Just as two years ago we held at a $3 level when the Wheat Board's opinion in that regard would have been in the order of $2.25 or $2.50 as being safe, we recognized the ongoing regular needs of the farmer. It is our practice to put in place programs which last, not to do as the right hon. gentleman did and throw, ad hoc, $200 in the way of farmers twice, and only before elections. That is what the right hon. gentleman did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Oral Questions

COMMUNICATIONS

SATELLITE RECEIVING STATIONS—CABLE OPERATORS AND PAY-TELEVISION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Communications. The minister has given the green light to cable operators to own satellite receiving stations and to thereby set up a cable satellite network.

Given the current discussions now taking place with the minister and the industry about programming, does the minister acknowledge that the cable industry sees this as an opportunity to establish a pay-television network which the CRTC opposes at this time?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, with or without a review of the earth station policies, the cable operators were in a position to distribute pay-television. The earth station policy only allows for a network to be installed if cable operators decide to do so.

• (1440)

I would remind the hon. member that pay-television cannot be introduced until the CRTC approves of the content and until it is made government policy.

Mr. Symes: My supplementary question relates to the technical changes which are now taking place and which only facilitate the introduction of pay-TV in accordance with the wishes of operators.

In light of the minister's statement that pay-television is inevitable, how can she justify implementing the very policies which will facilitate the introduction of pay-TV despite the fact that the CRTC concluded only a year ago, after exhaustive public hearings, that pay-TV would further fragment TV audiences to the detriment of off-air broadcasters, would lead to the domination of American programs and would siphon off free programs such as sports into pay-TV?

Mrs. Sauvé: We are, of course, all aware that the introduction of pay-TV would further fragment the audience and we all know that it will be possible at some point in time, as it was when cable was introduced, to get the signals off American stations whether or not the federal government determines that pay-television should be introduced. We do not intend to wait until a situation of this nature presents itself before determining a policy with regard to pay-television and ways and means of introducing it.

As for the hon. member's fear that the review of the earth station policy facilitates the introduction of pay-television in that it allows cable operators to set up a network for that or any other purpose, I would remind the hon. member that this policy allows us to give broadcasting services to people in rural and remote areas; that is the important feature of the review that I have just carried out. It is very important that everybody in this country should have equal access to the kind of broadcasting service which the people in the south enjoy.

FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER CITY OF VAL D'OR REQUESTED FINANCIAL AID

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It deals with money which the town of Val d'Or had to borrow, like several other Canadian municipalities, in a foreign country. As a matter of fact, the town of Val d'Or borrowed on the Swiss market on January 15, 1973 and the loan is refundable over a seven-year period. Can the minister tell us whether he or his colleagues received representations from the town council of Val d'Or asking himself or the government to help that municipality solve its serious problems?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I received no communication from the town of Val d'Or. I do not know whether my colleagues received representations but I would doubt it; this is a decision made by the municipality and a problem it has to solve itself.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WOULD GIVE FINANCIAL AID TO VAL D'OR

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. As the major monetary instruments and economic means are in the hands of the federal government, could the Minister of Finance indicate whether the federal government would be prepared to take steps to help this municipality?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the financial problems of municipalities are a provincial responsibility, and I have received no representation from Mr. Parizeau concerning this.

STATISTICS CANADA

ACCURACY OF FIGURES SUPPLIED BY AGENCY

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. A report published by the C.D. Howe Institute in December claimed that figures supplied by Statistics Canada are inaccurate, misleading and hastily contrived.

Recently, the minister said the people of Canada accept the material published by Statistics Canada as though it were the bible. Would the hon. gentleman comment on these conflicting views? Has he had any discussion with the chief statistician on this matter?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have had numerous discussions with the chief statistician. I do not accept the allegation which the C.D. Howe Institute made about Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada has a difficult problem in assessing promptly what is happening in Canada and to the Canadian economy. If they were to delay releasing their statistics they could, of course, probably be more accurate. In releasing them as quickly, as they do, with respect to each month, as soon as that month is ended, there is, of course, a greater tendency to error. But if one takes into consideration the monthly statements, the quarterly statements and the yearly figures, we see that from time to time they go back and make an adjustment in the figures for a given month with regard to exports, imports, or whatever they are keeping track of.

Large numbers of people, and certainly members of the opposition, always pay a great deal of attention to the monthly release of the CPI figures. This is what I was referring to when I said many people believed Statistics Canada figures as if they were the bible. I do not accept the inference of the C.D. Howe Institute that Statistics Canada is doing a sloppy or a misleading job.

Mr. Corbett: In the light of what he has just said, will the minister have his officials contact the C.D. Howe Institute in an attempt to set them straight, so that people who may not have read the bible from cover to cover may be instilled with as much faith as those who have?

Mr. Horner: Many accountants have passed an opinion on the C.D. Howe Institute and its assessment of Statistics Canada. Most of those I have read, including contributors to the Financial Post and the Southam chain, have said that Statistics Canada, in all the circumstances, is doing a good job.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

REPRESENTATION ON COMMISSION

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Communications. It is prompted by information published by her ministry with regard to salaries paid to CRTC commissioners—hidden, incidentally, by a spread of $13,000 to $16,000—which amount to more than the average earnings of the taxpayers who pay those salaries.

Since the list of original homes of the commissioners shows six coming from Quebec, two from the prairies and one from Belfast, Ireland, would the minister move quickly to remove the commissioner from Ireland and replace her by one from the Canadian province of British Columbia which has no representation?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the commissioners of the CRTC are not nominated to represent regions. They are nominated for their knowledge of the matters with which they have to deal.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): An Irish lullaby!

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SEXUAL OFFENCES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Bearing in mind the high incidence of crime against women and the appeals which have been received from so many women for legal reform because victims of rape are presently more victimized than the accused when cases come to trial, has the minister considered either reintroducing the reforms as set out in Bill C-52 or introducing a new bill which he told us was under review the last time I asked this question?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): My intention would be to introduce an improved bill following representations I have received from women's organizations and various other groups. The offence of rape would be changed to one of sexual assault and aggravated sexual assault, and consent could not be inferred from mere submission, a point to which women have attached great importance.

Further, there would be changes in the law concerning corroborative evidence, another area to which great importance was attached. I hope that when this bill is introduced it will be supported by all women's organizations in Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the minister is coming around to our way of thinking. I would ask him this: Is he prepared to bring that bill before the House before the election, because a number of backbenchers have said in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that an election is coming any day now and they want this to go through?

Mr. Lalonde: I am surprised to hear that finally the hon. member's party has views on this subject. The only views I heard from his party on this whole issue were very distressing last year when Bill C-52 was introduced.

So far as the bill being brought before the House before the election is concerned, if the hon. member can tell me what the date of the election will be, I will certainly be happy to provide him with the date of the passage of this bill.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—ROLE IN RELATION TO RULE OF LAW

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister arising from the answers given yesterday by the Minister of Finance as to the responsibilities of the Chairman of the National Commission on Inflation.

Seeing that the government is giving no guidelines and that it is giving total power to the chairman of that commission to find out what he thinks are excessive increases, and given the fact that he will then try to persuade people to change their views, whether it is labour, business or other segments of society, is this approach not a fundamental negation of the rule of law as it is supposed to be practised in a democratic country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I fail to see why. Perhaps a supplementary question would permit the hon. member to explain.

Mr. Gillies: It seems to me fundamental that in a democracy, people who will have to respond to situations as they are developed by the government should have some terms of reference within which to respond. They have to know what is expected in terms of proper performance.

To give to one man in this country total authority to determine whether or not a labour settlement or a price increase is excessive, and the power to then use the authority of the government to try to persuade people to change when they have no idea whether or not they have broken the law or whether or not they are within the guidelines, because no guidelines are given, seems to negate the fundamental principle of the rule of law that people have to know what they are expected to do before they can do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member, as an economist, would not do better to stay in that area rather than talk about the law. He knows better than I do that it is not against the law to cause inflation. One can do that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You have been doing it.

Mr. Trudeau: Even the hon. member's colleagues understand that, and that is saying something. When they understand something, he should rejoice. The hon. member and his colleagues have been complaining about inflation for some months now.

An hon. Member: Twelve years.

Mr. Trudeau: In fact, the hon. member says, since he was born. I am talking about his mental age, Mr. Speaker. They are complaining about it. It is not against the law to have inflationary settlements or to take inflationary actions, yet they are complaining about it and they want the government to do something about it.

The government has set up an inquiry under the Inquiries Act which is authorized by this parliament. The commission will report on facts which are not illegal but which, we hope, will permit the participants, the actors in the inflation drama, and the government as well as the opposition, to draw certain conclusions. This is not against the law, but policies are drawn from facts and it is facts that the commission will bring to our attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ANTICIPATED DATE OF RECEIPT OF CLYNE REPORT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications supplementary to that of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. Without getting into the pros and cons of pay-television and the recently announced earth station policy in what is supposed to be the new era for Canadians in reception—and I wonder why it did not come ten years ago—may I ask the minister, before any other policy is defined and announced by the minister, when we are finally going to hear from the Clyne committee and when we can expect their report?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I did explain to the hon. gentleman the other day that the earth station policy has been under review for a little over a year and that, having seen the conclusions of that review, I felt I had to make my decision upon the facts which it contained.

As for the Clyne report, I understand I will be receiving it shortly and I will read it and then have it translated.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

FUNDING OF CANADIAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State. Given the allegation raised yesterday by the hon. member for Leeds, in his usual broad-brush strokes, concerning the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, will the minister advise us if he intends to investigate this matter or if he has already done so?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I say at the outset that I find it extremely abhorrent that a member of the House should use his position to cast such aspersions in such a widespread manner, which necessarily brings a cloud over many civil servants, when he himself has indicated he has no proof that any of these allegations are correct.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Roberts: I have found officials, not only in the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews but in my department, to be extremely concerned about these irresponsible charges and I do not wish to let them go by without a reply.

Today I received a request by telegram from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews both protesting against the irresponsibility of these statements and asking that an independent audit be made of their activities so it can be shown that these allegations are baseless. I am pleased that the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews has indicated its good faith in this manner, and currently my department is arranging for an independent audit to be taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INTRODUCTION OF MEASURES TO IMPROVE PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Last Thursday, the Deputy Prime Minister in his capacity as government House leader said this:

I have had discussions with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) and I have assured him that when and if he is ready to bring forward legislation affecting veterans I will co-operate with him.

May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs the obvious question? In view of the fact that he has the green light from the government House leader so far as parliamentary time is concerned, and in view of the fact that the House would pass quickly any veterans' legislation, will he make a serious effort to bring before parliament, this week or next, legislation respecting the 48 per cent rule affecting widows, or legislation to deal with disability rates, or his promised review of the War Veterans Allowance Act?

An hon. Member: Or all three.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the three items mentioned by the hon. member are under review, and I can go so far as to say today that if progress on them is to my satisfaction and that of the government, I could bring them forward at some time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

INCREASED USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. A short time ago, the Prime Minister wrote to Dennis McDermott, president of the CLC, with respect to the use of social insurance numbers in the private sector.

Is it the Prime Minister's intention and the government's policy not only not to restrict the increased use of social insurance numbers outside of government but also to encourage their use as the single identifying number in government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, I did not indicate it was the government's intention to encourage such use. I just indicated that the social insurance number existed and if the parties, those who had the number and those who wanted to use it, both agreed, then of course it was not illegal to do so.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Prime Minister, during the 1972 election campaign, indicated that he saw not far down the road the possibility of a national identification card or number for Canadians. He thought that would be a possibility. Does he agree with the use of a single identifying number in Canada, and does he think that the social insurance number might be a convenient number to use for that particular identification?

● (1500)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to share my thoughts with the hon. member on that matter and I would be interested in hearing his. In my view, as long as society could do away with these identification forms it was for the better. I was not particularly partial to the introduction of identification cards or identification means, but I think at least I was perceptive enough to realize we are living in a society where these instruments are increasingly necessary in a very complex administrative system. Therefore, I am concerned, if the numbers exist, that they be used in all manners which are legal and not in any other manner.

I do not think it will be possible in our society to prevent the use of computers in order to simplify administrative devices, whether public or private. But as long as they could be resisted, that is, in the hon. member's youth and mine, it was a good thing to resist them.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKAY—ACCESS TO INCOME TAX FORMS—MOTION TO REFER SECURITY PROCEDURES TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege as a result of remarks made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) last week in my absence in the course of what he called either a question of privilege or a point of order. Apparently it was prompted by the motion raised under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) regarding confidentiality of tax information. Somehow my name was brought into this matter.

In attempting to assess what the minister was alleging in my absence and the weight to attach to whatever it was he was trying to express, I checked Hansard respecting the most recent question of privilege prior to this one where the minister rose to explain he no longer intended to write memoranda to himself, confidential or otherwise. No doubt the minister was referring to those which somehow escaped his office and were reported widely in the press that illustrated among other things his fixation with trying to get out of the shadow of his cabinet colleague, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). He and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce share responsibility for the confidentiality of income tax forms, and so far he seems much more willing to accept the responsibility.

When this so-called point of order involving myself was raised by the minister on February 27, as reported in Hansard, Your Honour said the following:

> The record will have to be examined. My memory is that the minister in his intervention said that the hon. member for Central Nova was possessed of stolen documents. That was the language used; at least, that is my recollection. Like the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), I will examine the record, as I am sure the minister will, to see whether he made an accusation of a member having committed an offence. If he did, that will have to be withdrawn. We will have to examine the record. The minister, of course, is on notice to that effect.

The following day, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), according to Hansard, defended the Minister of National Revenue by claiming the minister had never said that I "had stolen those documents or knew that the documents were stolen". He concluded by indicating that there was absolutely nothing wrong in that statement, and he asked Your Honour to set any question of privilege aside.

In examining the record of the House, I have found that the Minister of National Revenue, in spite of his self-confessed determination to acquire a reputation of being "a nasty piece of goods" and a "target for animosity", did not claim I had stolen the income tax returns in question. In fact, he said that I was "possessed of stolen tax returns". As I have mentioned already, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council, presumably speaking for the government, assured the House the minister has never claimed that I knew the documents were stolen.

I am quite willing to accept this assertion from the government benches, and I do not wish necessarily to pursue this particular point any further. However, I must remind Your Honour of the fact the minister on the same occasion, as reported at page 3632 of Hansard, accused me of "revealing these forms to the public". I suggest this is not only false but highly objectionable. The simple fact is that confidential income tax information which came into my possession was never made public by me.

The quote from the Globe and Mail story of February 23 indicated that I showed copies of four 1974 tax returns. In the House the minister was wrong again and referred to them as 1977 tax returns "with social insurance numbers, taxable income, income tax paid and spouses' names in full view". Your Honour will note that I took care to see that taxpayers' names were obliterated, while those responsible for the care and custody of the tax returns through their carelessness allowed the forms to be left lying around with all the details clearly visible. Then the Globe and Mail story continued:

> The Nova Scotia M.P. said he would not release the names on the returns. He said some have already been destroyed but he would not say where the others are.

It is clear I took precautions with the confidential material sent to me. On a confidential basis I even sent a letter to the minister responsible for Statistics Canada, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, indicating that some of his constituents were affected. For this reason I ask the Chair, having regard to the precedents in Beauchesne's fifth edition under "unparliamentary remarks" and having regard to Your Honour's fine dissertation on a question of privilege raised on March 22, 1976, to extract a withdrawal from the minister if Your Honour thinks it is proper.

I have just about come to the end of my brief presentation, but since this matter was raised in the connotation of the law being broken, and with some suggestion that I was involved in it, I should like to say that there may very well be some instances of the law having been broken. If so, it requires investigation to see whether the persons in Statistics Canada who, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce very properly said, have a responsibility to ensure that these highly confidential documents are kept inviolate, have not been in breach of the obligations under the statutes, particularly section 23, 18 and 16 of the Statistics Act.

The Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) took a very laudable position when the matter was first raised. As reported at page 3473 of Hansard, the minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, of course I agree there is a responsibility to protect the confidentiality of information provided to the government, particularly the confidentiality that is prescribed by law. It is the responsibility of the government to ensure that the law will be carried out.

Before I make a motion on this matter, and by way of additional information which I intimated to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, indeed there is evidence previous ministers and officials were warned in writing that there were appalling conditions regarding the lack of security in the very building, over ten years ago, where these income tax forms were found. If I may, I will read one sentence to illustrate the point. This is information made available to the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin back in 1969. It reads:

> In 1968, when the Health and Welfare Division at DBS moved to No. 5 Temporary Building, some mental morbidity cards were stored in room 2141, (although a vault was available a few feet away); more current cards were kept as before in unlocked filing cabinets . . . A few flimsy cardboard boxes, lids open, containing notifiable disease cards were also kept in this room.

This is the point: it existed over ten years ago. It continues:

> Any person, a tramp . . . or someone with more deliberate intent, might easily stroll into the rooms where cards were kept when civil servants were off duty, at night or on weekends, and examine these cards.

In view of these longstanding abuses which I have brought to the attention of the minister today and which he indicated he would look into, I should like to make the following motion:

> That the confidentiality and security procedures of income tax forms, made available by virtue of the Statistics Act to Statistics Canada, be referred to the appropriate parliamentary standing committee to determine the adequacy of existing procedures under the Statistics Act and the regulations thereunder pertaining to confidentiality of income tax matters.

I remind the House and the Chair that in the current information being supplied to Canadians regarding their income tax forms under the Canadian Human Rights Act the following is included:

> An objective of Revenue Canada Taxation is to maintain public confidence in the integrity of the tax system. To achieve this objective the Income Tax Act stipulates that the information you provide on your income tax return must be kept strictly confidential.

● (1510)

Sir, I think this matter is sufficiently important that it should transcend any petty bickering about who said what to whom and ought to be referred to the appropriate standing committee. Obviously, if there is no trust in the tax system of this country, the whole system is in jeopardy.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question, and I rose before the minister spoke because I felt there was another very narrow point that should be dealt with in determining the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay).

If I read the record correctly, and if I heard the hon. member correctly, the minister's words were that "the hon. member for Central Nova was possessed of stolen documents". That was the phrase, and that, sir, is a criminal offence. The possession of stolen property is a criminal offence under the Criminal Code. Therefore, the charge that the hon. member for Central Nova was in possession of stolen documents suggests that he is guilty of a criminal offence.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Nielsen: Under those conditions I suggest, sir, that the accusation—

Mr. Pinard: Go back to law school.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary says "go back to law school". I have practised law for 27 years and I doubt very much if he has been practising continuously since he has been in this place.

This is a charge of the commission of a criminal offence, and being that the minister should withdraw. I think you, sir, should deal with that specific point. The words were, "the member for Central Nova was possessed of stolen tax returns", which in essence amounts to a charge of being in possession of stolen documents, a crime under the Criminal Code.

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the minister I should point out that I think we find ourselves in a bit of a procedural difficulty here in that the motion put forward for consideration by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) is not in fact a motion which relates to his grievance in the question of privilege, but is a substantive motion which relates to an examination of the confidentiality of income tax returns. That in itself is a very important matter. The hon. member obtained the floor on a question of privilege which relates to some remarks by the minister, but the motion which he would introduce, while relating to that subject, is not in fact a complaint against the language of the minister.

On the other hand, the point made by the hon. member for Central Nova, and referred to by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), is a valid point.

Let me go back to the intervention by the parliamentary secretary, which is a correct statement, that in fact simple possession of documents that may have been or were stolen is not in and of itself a criminal offence. However, in that regard we are getting very technical. The hon. member, incidentally, said at the beginning of his remarks that he took that intervention as meaning that it was not intended that he be indicted in that way by the minister's remarks.

However, the hon. member for Central Nova then went on to make another point, namely that he did not divulge or reveal this information, and the revealing of that information would be an offence.

On both counts I think we ought to leave this matter very clear. The word of the hon. member in this case must be accepted by hon. members of this House—that is to say, there was no guilt involved in the possession of the documents themselves—and the hon. member's word must be accepted that he did not reveal the information, thereby committing an offence. We cannot deal with this matter without establishing that. However, the hon. member has compounded the case, it seems to me, by ending his remarks with a substantive motion, not one of privilege.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a moment or two, because of the seriousness of this problem, to deal with the question of taxation documents and why they may be in the hands of Statistics Canada. During the course of this intervention there have been allegations made from various quarters that Revenue Canada has been slipshod in the handling of these documents and that Statistics Canada should not necessarily have the documents.

The point I would first like to make is that Statistics Canada has an obligation to provide facts, collect statistical information, and provide, among other important facts, the earnings by society of income and its distribution.

The tax returns of individuals and corporations which are provided to National Revenue for purposes of tax administration provide the best and most reliable source of information on incomes. Parliament recognized this in section 23 of the Statistics Act when it stated:

> The Chief Statistician or any person authorized by him to do so may inspect or have access to any returns, certificates, statements, documents, or other records obtained on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue for the purpose of the Income Tax Act.

At the same time, parliament was concerned that the information so provided to Statistics Canada should be kept confidential and, therefore, it further provided that the "information when communicated to Statistics Canada shall be subject to the same secrecy requirements to which it was subject when collected". Clearly this means that employees of Statistics Canada are required to comply with the severe confidentiality provisions of the Income Tax Act which imposes penalties upon an official or authorized person who shall knowingly communicate or allow to be communicated any information obtained for the purposes of the Income Tax Act.

Statistics Canada publishes income information only about groups in a way that hides tax information about any individual. Those are the provisions of the law, provisions of the Income Tax and the Statistics Act, and my department and Statistics Canada, to the best of my knowledge, operate in accordance with these provisions.

We now come to the point raised by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). He refers to my position the other day, that I was concerned that members were making wide ranging allegations that income tax information, not simply in the hands of Statistics Canada but perhaps also in the hands of Revenue Canada, were being handled in a slipshod manner. I attempted during the question of privilege to assert that this was not the case and that a good deal of the blame for this whole incident rests with the hon. member for Central Nova.

In an article in the Globe and Mail of February 23, which I did refer to earlier on the question of privilege, the hon. member revealed that he had gone to Statistics Canada and had found about 50 cardboard boxes full of confidential tax returns which he said were "lying unattended in a Statistics Canada office building in Ottawa". The duties and responsibilities of the hon. member as a parliamentarian do not give him the right to go into a building which he may say is improperly guarded and under the guardianship of Statistics Canada, to go down to the basement of the said building and look at files in boxes which are marked confidential, return and presumably, if this article is correct, encourage others in the form of news cameramen or others to take the same journey and photograph the boxes and whatever documents may be there.

The hon. member, knowing the law, knowing the obvious security provisions of the Income Tax Act, and knowing that he himself had seen the boxes marked "confidential", received, he asserted, 100 or so returns. He showed a Globe and Mail reporter copies of four 1974 tax returns he had been given, the taxpayers' names having been obliterated, but with the social insurance numbers, the taxable income, income taxes paid and spouses' names in full view. The article goes on to state:

> The Nova Scotia MP said he would not release the names on the returns. He said some have already been destroyed but he would not say where the others are although he promised he would eventually destroy all the forms he had been sent.

He knew perfectly well that he was not entitled to copies of those forms. He knew they were bound by the Income Tax Act, and he knew that whoever had communicated them to him had done so not only improperly but unlawfully. When, indeed, I suggested he was possessed of stolen reports, I had no doubt that these returns, if transmitted to him anonymously or otherwise, had been transmitted by someone acting outside his right under the law and who was committing a serious offence. Naturally, knowing the hon. member's zeal for justice and his inquiring mind, his instincts as a detective—we all remember the bugging caper of not so long ago—he recognized that he had a self-appointed duty to ferret out such matters.

Certainly I was not accusing the hon. member of any criminal offence because he had those documents in his possession, for many people, perhaps disgruntled people, know him as a likely source of interest to whom such information could be sent. Nor do I stand and say that Statistics Canada, in the instance the hon. member revealed, was managing the documents with the kind of care which is required under the law. I think that my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) confirmed this somewhat when he said that the law had to be obeyed but that it was because of financial shortcomings that they could not properly look after the documents. I do not think that this is a reasonable excuse. Statistics Canada must obey the law and look after such documents with great care.

At the same time, however, I think that I was right in taking the position back to the hon. member himself that he had gone to a building, that he knew the records were highly confidential, that he only raised the point because of this high confidentiality and the legal requirements for secrecy and that he brought the matter before parliament and the news media and showed them returns in a fashion, according to the report, that any intelligent observer could find out to whom the returns belonged. For example, the report stated that some of the returns were from Alberta farmers. There was a picture taken, thanks to the guidance of the hon. member who led the media to the premises of Statistics Canada, which shows the form of a resident of Courtenay, B.C. The name was obliterated from the picture, but it was taken.

I suggest that the hon. member did not act with the kind of responsibility which one should expect of a member of parliament in such circumstances. He seems to have done so only for the purpose of gaining the centre of attention by leading his crew of cameramen around so that he could be photographed in his self-appointed role as guardian of our society. When I stated that that information was stolen I suggest that clearly I am correct. The hon. member had no business having that information in his hands. It should not have been transmitted, anonymously or otherwise, by the person or persons who did so, and it is a serious offence under the law. I suggest also that the hon. member acted with a good deal of recklessness in encouraging reporters to take a look at the documents he had in his hands and in encouraging other media representatives to take a tour of Statistics Canada's building to see other tax returns.

I do not feel that there is a question of privilege here. If I had accused the hon. member of stealing documents, of course, I would have been wrong and would have quite properly been obliged to withdraw the remark; but I do think that anybody could assert that the 100 income tax documents which were marked highly confidential and which were in the hon. member's hands, having been sent to him anonymously, could have been sent to the hon. member by anybody who was doing anything but stealing that information as defined under the law.

I am not suggesting that the hon. member is guilty of a criminal offence because he held on to those documents. Perhaps in his position as a member of parliament he has certain rights in the interests of the public to deal with the matter and acknowledge his possession, I do not know. What I suggest is that there is no question of privilege, and I believe that my position in this matter is entirely conscionable.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if the facts as they have been asserted in terms of the status of the document which the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) received—using the words of the minister, "documents that must have been stolen"—are correct, then I do not think that the minister has obliterated of defended the question of privilege which has been raised by the hon. member. In fact, what he has done is compounded the position of the hon. member for Central Nova. The minister's words, "possessed of stolen returns" in reference to the hon. member for Central Nova are damaging to the hon. member. It is also a tenet of the criminal law that the doctrine of recent possession casts an onus upon a member of parliament or anyone else in whose possession those documents are found to turn them over to the proper authority.

The question of necessity under those circumstances takes on a different aspect. What the minister has done in making the statements he has, instead of admitting perhaps overzealousness in his desire to be the cutting, controversial figure and arguing that there is no question of privilege, is in fact established grounds for a question of privilege. The House cannot allow this to stand. The word "stolen" casts aspersions on the honesty and integrity of a member before the House, and it cannot be allowed to stand.

If the hon. member's motion is imperfect in the manner in which it is put, we have had imperfect motions before and time has been given to perfect those motions; and I think that it is the duty of the Chair to allow that time.

It is an offence within the law that applies to income tax officials, Statistics Canada officials, private citizens, members of parliament or whoever, to break the confidentiality which is imposed upon them.

In the second reference the words "and this private dick in residence in the Tory party has been revealing these forms to the public" constitute an accusation by the minister to the effect that the member for Central Nova has committed an offence.

Mr. Abbott: Those are his own words.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not think that those words should be allowed to stand. There is no question of intent there, and the words themselves raise a question of privilege. The hon. member for Central Nova ought to have time, if he has been imperfect in his motion today, to make the necessary corrections.

The final matter which I want to deal with is the question whether a member of parliament has a duty in a public building. For the purpose of my argument, I do not put a member of parliament in the position of trespassing on such property, which is the implication. Unless a member of parliament went into a building against the instruction of the security service guarding that building or against some form of indication on the building that he could not enter, then a member of parliament or anybody else can go into that building and go through it. There is nothing sacrosanct about a government building unless it is made sacrosanct.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): There better not be.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) has said, there better not be. Supposedly, we operate a relatively open system. However, there is a duty on the Government of Canada, which was accepted by the government House leader last week, to maintain certain confidentiality.

If there has been a breach of that duty of confidentiality, then the public will judge the circumstances and conduct themselves accordingly with regard to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) or the minister responsible for Statistics Canada, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, or whoever, as to what credit ought to be bestowed upon them for maintaining confidentiality. In these circumstances and according to the minister's own admission, there is not very much credit to be bestowed.

Unless a member of parliament is stopped—he is no better or worse than any other citizen in society—that member has the right to go into a public building. As I understand the situation, the hon. member for Central Nova was allowed into this particular building and into an unsecured area to look at documents, with the media present, by the security service. This is an indication of the respect for confidentiality—and that is the important issue—that the government has in these circumstances.

I do not think it lies in the mouth of the Minister of National Revenue to try to point the spear at the hon. member for Central Nova, nor does it lie in his mouth to argue as he did that an accusation with respect to an offence—two offences at least—ought to be allowed on the record of this House. The important part of this argument is not who is right or wrong; the question is that the minister, as a gentleman, ought to have withdrawn the remarks he made and he did not do so. I think he ought to be made to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am faced with a fundamental difficulty that seems to have been overlooked. I am not worried about the part which refers to a public building as that seems to me to be peripheral to the main issue.

Procedurally the matter of the hon. member's motion has perhaps a reduced significance. The hon. member was seeking by his motion to investigate the handling of confidential documents in the income tax department. If that is going to be done it ought not to be done by way of a question of privilege related to some remarks by the minister.

The minister has said today in his place, however stridently he has done it, that "I do not accuse the member for Central Nova of the commission of an offence. The documents which he had in his possession which he has acknowledged were documents unlawfully obtained." That is the opinion of the minister; he is entitled to that opinion and he is entitled to express it.

In respect of the possession of the documents he said, "I say those documents were stolen." The minister maintains: "They are unlawfully obtained, therefore I say stolen, and the member for Central Nova was in possession of those. I do not accuse the member of the commission of an offence." It seems to me he added another phrase: "Perhaps the member sees himself in a role as an elected member as having some rights in respect of that."

This question has come up before in respect of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) when he was being pursued on a regular basis over a period of time to return documents to the House which he had in his possession and about which he had given some information. It was contended at that time that the status of those documents was clear—they were unlawfully obtained and the member had them in his possession. The question therefore became one of some interest as to what are the rights of a member who is in possession of these kinds of documents that have been brought to him when he looks at the documents and knows that they are confidential and that they are not being handed to him by the person in whose care they belonged. It seems to me there was more than an allegation in that case; there was an acceptance of the fact that the member was in possession of documents which were unlawfully obtained.

In the case before us it seems to me that the minister has said virtually the same thing. The hon. member for Central Nova, in his capacity as a member of the House of Commons, came into possession of documents which, on looking at them, appeared to be obtained irregularly. In fact, the minister says that, in his opinion, they were stolen, clearly. He does not accuse the member for Central Nova of any complicity in their theft and in fact allows that the member may consider himself to be the logical possessor of such documents if it helps him to bring a grievance against the government which he may see as part of his duties. That remains a very open, legal question. The minister has said today that he does not accuse the member for Central Nova.

I think the minister is entitled to his opinion that the documents have been unlawfully obtained, is entitled to regard the fact that the member for Central Nova had them in his possession and he is entitled to say so. He has to make it clear that he does not accuse the member for Central Nova of any offence and he, in fact, has said that.

The question of privilege of the hon. member in attempting to get to an investigation of the confidentiality of documents is irregular. It does not conclude the same way it began. What remains is the question of whether the minister has made unparliamentary remarks about the member for Central Nova.

I have had to conclude that in respect of the commission of an offence, the minister has said he does not accuse the member of an offence regarding possession of these documents. The member took that, and I think correctly, to mean that he was not accused of an offence in the possession of those documents. In fact, he may consider that confidential documents may be brought to a member of the House of Commons in some way by a person who, as the minister said, may consider himself disgruntled or otherwise in order to air a grievance. That remains, to me, an unresolved legal question. I have to accept the conclusion that the minister is entitled to say that without accusing the member of an offence, and in fact he made it clear that he did not accuse the member.

There remains one other item, however, and that is that the hon. member for Central Nova had behaved in a manner in which he revealed the contents of those documents to the public. That is an offence. Therefore, if I am to be consistent and the minister in his remarks used language which indicated the hon. member was reckless in his duties of one thing and another, I want before concluding this matter to have the same clear position from the minister, if I may, on behalf of the decorum of the House, that he is not accusing the member for Central Nova of an offence in respect of the information contained in those documents. Then I think procedurally we can put the matter to rest.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I quoted only from the Globe and Mail, which was the source of my information in this case, and indicated that the hon. member for Central Nova had shown the reporter copies of four 1974 tax returns, etc. I did not accuse him because I was quoting only from a newspaper report which, however consistently reliable that publication may normally be, none the less could be in error. I am simply saying that if that was the case—and the hon. member did not deny it—then I found it offensive. It is not an offence, I guess, but I found it offensive.

[Mr. Speaker.]

If Your Honour feels that I am charging an offence improperly, then we will clear the record. I did not accuse the hon. member of an offence. I said that presumably by his own acknowledgement he showed certain forms to a newspaper reporter who published the fact, and I found that offensive. I do not say he committed any offence in doing so.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that the matter can be any more clear in terms of parliamentary language. I do not think that procedurally we need to pursue the matter any further.

Had the question of privilege of the hon. member been related, in a motion albeit imperfect, to remarks of the minister, I think we would have perfected it. I think he has gone one step further, however, in attempting to introduce a substantive motion to investigate the confidentiality of documents in the possession of a department. This is a bit of a leapfrog over the substance which is contained in his motion. These two matters of possibly unparliamentary accusations by the minister did remain. I now find that the minister has withdrawn both. If any such allegations were made by the minister they are now withdrawn. The matter is therefore closed.

MR. NIELSEN—PROPRIETY OF MOTION UNDER S.O. 43 MOVED BY HON. MEMBER FOR ALGOMA

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege arising out of today's question period. It concerns a question which was asked by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster); I am sorry to see he has left the House. He has asked questions on the same subject in times past. As you know, he is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the hon. member was recognized in the question period. He presented a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 before the question period.

Mr. Nielsen: That is right. Thank you for correcting me on that, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, chairmen of standing committees have a very particular position, one that is closely analogous to that of parliamentary secretaries. When Your Honour first assumed your duties as Speaker you were very quick to state your view that you were not going to recognize parliamentary secretaries for the purpose of asking questions because of the special relationship they enjoyed with ministers, and particularly you would not recognize parliamentary secretaries asking questions of their own ministers.

Today we have the chairman of a standing committee, who is more knowledgeable than non-committee members, asking questions with political intent, in my view to gain ground only, concerning a subject matter about which he is very knowledgeable and based also on the fact that he enjoys a special relationship with the minister responsible for pipeline affairs. He is the only chairman I am aware of who is following this course.

I do not submit that it is improper for chairmen of committees to ask questions concerning matters not falling within their responsibility. That happened today when the hon.

member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), the chairman of the public accounts committee, put a question to the minister which had no bearing on his responsibilities as chairman of that committee. The chairman of the Standing Committee on Northern Pipelines also has a party responsibility, if not an official responsibility, to keep the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) informed of the progress in committee and the matters discussed therein.

I believe that allowing the chairmen of standing committees to question the ministries for which they are responsible is just as offensive and an abuse of the accepted practice of the House as being allowed to put motions under Standing Order 43, or to ask questions of those ministers.

Incidentally, that committee is sitting this evening at eight o'clock. The content of the motion that the hon. member put under Standing Order 43 was based on evidence which is currently being given and has been given before the committee. The committee, as you know, sir, has not yet presented any report to the House. I submit that that is an offence. It is not within the rules to base a motion on evidence given to a standing committee before that committee has reported to the House. It is just as offensive for a question to be put.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: It is my submission that the evidence before standing committees prior to those committees reporting to the House cannot be raised in the House. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you are familiar with that rule. If need be I can turn it up very quickly.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member is mistaken because he confuses committee with department. The chairman of a committee is not the parliamentary secretary to a minister; that is obvious. But, if in practice parliamentary secretaries to ministers are not allowed to put questions in the House, as you stated specifically in one of your rulings, Mr. Speaker, it is doubtless because the Parliamentary Secretaries Act stipulates, very simply and very tersely, that parliamentary secretaries help the minister as requested by him. However, no law or House rule stipulates directly or indirectly that the chairman of a committee must be muzzled either in the House of Commons or in committee.

Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member stand up even less under close examination because they do not concern a situation where the chairman of a committee put a question to the minister, which would have been perfectly in order, but it does deal with a situation where the chairman of the committee acted through a motion presented pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43 of our House.

Now, if I am not mistaken, you yourself, Mr. Speaker, have recognized that a parliamentary secretary can present a motion under Standing Order 43. All the more so if a parliamentary secretary, like the one sitting on my right, has already done so—the parliamentary secretary to the minister of urban affairs at the time was recognized—so, if a parliamentary secretary can present a motion under Standing Order 43, the chairman of a committee can also certainly present that type of motion. Nothing in our traditions, regulations or laws prohibits this.

Finally, on the hon. member's remarks concerning what is said before a committee, may I remind him that as a rule committee meetings are deemed to be public. There is therefore no harm in repeating in this House, be it by the chairman or any member of the committee, the evidence brought before the committee, be this done by means of a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 or questions to ministers, or even in any debate on a motion or otherwise. Nothing forbids the chairman or any member of a committee referring to revelations made before a committee holding public meetings.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I think the question raised by the hon. member is a little far-fetched. He referred to absolutely no regulations, laws, customs or traditions to support his point. I would therefore ask you to simply reject his contention.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when you rule on this point, perhaps you should also tell us what it was in our proceedings this afternoon that stopped all the clocks.

Mr. Speaker: I intended to keep the House up to date at least on that matter. It is now exactly 3.45 p.m. Hopefully before the end of the day we will reactivate the clocks on the floor.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly on the same point of order. It would seem to me that if the arguments of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) were true, they would also apply at this particular juncture in our history to the chairman of the public accounts committee who happens to be a member of the official opposition. That would mean, of course, that when the public accounts committee is examining the public accounts, the chairman of that committee would not be able to address questions to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan). It would also mean that when the Auditor General's report is before the committee on public accounts he would not be able to address questions to any particular minister whose department was under review by that committee at that time. He did just that.

It seems to me that such action would be a curtailment of the rights of members on that side or on this side of the House. In my opinion, the hon. member's point of order is not a point of order at all but simply an argument that he has put forward, for whatever reason I do not know.

Mr. Speaker: Happily for the Chair the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has not followed his intervention with a motion and therefore no specification is called for by the Chair. However, some of the suggestions which the hon. member has put forward will give us an opportunity for reflection.

The status of committee chairmen is a subject that has been under examination in the past. We do not, as is the practice in the United Kingdom, have an independent panel of chairmen, but when that subject is discussed then the suggestions of the hon. member might be relevant to that discussion. Steps in that direction have been under consideration by this parliament from time to time, and the subject is bound to come up again.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 748, 805, 838, 950, 974 and 1,013.

CBC-JEREMY THORPE—"SUNDAY MORNING" PROGRAM

Question No. 748—Mr. Rae:

Did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pay the participants in the radio broadcast concerning the preliminary inquiry of the alleged criminal activities of Jeremy Thorpe, heard on the "Sunday Morning" program on December 3, 1978 and, if so, in each case, in what amount?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: Andrew Newton and Norman Scott were paid by the CBC for their contributions to the program, in accordance with what is common journalistic practice in Britain. The producers of "Sunday Morning" judged these interviews to be of sufficient importance to their coverage of the story to accede to the demands of Mr. Newton and Mr. Scott for payment.

With regard to the amounts paid, it has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration as costs incurred in the production of individual programs. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975.

RRAP—FREDERICTON, N.B.

Question No. 805—Mr. Howie:

1. Is consideration being given to extending the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Programme to Marysville, Barker's Point, Nashwaaksis and remainder of Devon areas of Fredericton, New Brunswick?

2. What was the total amount spent under the RRAP in Fredericton, New Brunswick by (a) Canada (b) the Province of New Brunswick (c) Fredericton, in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. Applications have been received by CMHC for designation as Rehabilitation Areas for the Marysville and Barker's Point areas of Fredericton, but not for the Nashwaaksis or for the remainder of the Devon areas.

Treasury Board, however, has stated that it will not approve further designations until it has approved a method for controlling the flow of RRAP funds, and review of "in-hand" applications is, accordingly, not being proceeded with until then. It is expected that this submission will be presented to Treasury Board during January, 1979.

2. (a)—1977, $890,000—January 1-October 1, 1978, $383,000

(b)—New Brunswick does not contribute to RRAP

(c)—Fredericton does not contribute to RRAP

HEALTH AND WELFARE—PROJECTS IN RICHMOND

Question No. 838—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Department of National Health and Welfare finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Department planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: None.

DOCUMENT—PROPOSED CHANGES TO PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Question No. 950—Mrs. Pigott:

1. How many of the document entitled Proposed Changes to the Public Service Staff Relations Act were produced and distributed to public servants?

2. What was the total cost of publication and distribution of the document?

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): 1. There were 349,000 copies of this document produced. All but 4,800 have been distributed to public servants. The remaining copies are stored in the Treasury Board's distribution centre.

2. The documents were printed by the Department of Supply and Services at a cost of $24,648 and distributed in bulk quantities to the departments, agencies and separate employers subject to the PSSRA, at a cost of $292.60. The documents were then distributed to employees through their internal distribution system. The total cost for printing and distribution was $24,940.60.

INDUSTRY LABORATORY PROJECTS

Question No. 974—Mr. Howie:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 877, what are the names of the individuals or groups that received assistance and what were the amounts?

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as the National Research Council is concerned, the reply is as follows:

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PATTERSON—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS NOS. 938 AND 180

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to call the attention of the parliamentary secretary to question No. 938 which was placed on the order paper on December 22. In view of the fact that it has to do with events that will take place in the near future, I wonder when that question will be answered. The question reads:

1. How many annual airshows are held on Department of Transport Airports?

2. What are the locations of such airports?

3. (a) What is the cost recovery formula imposed by the Department (b) are there any exceptions to this formula and, if so, for what reason?

It seems that questions such as those could be answered very quickly.

While I am on my feet I would like to call attention again to question No. 180. I made an inquiry about this question a few days ago. The parliamentary secretary indicated that he would seek to obtain the answer. I have not received it as yet, and I would appreciate its being considered.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am taking note of the hon. member's remarks. I am pleased to see that he has carefully read question No. 938.

[Miss Bégin.]

As for the other question, I will see that he gets a reply as soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-29, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, when I called it ten o'clock last night I pointed out that there were just a few more things I wanted to say on this matter. I cannot help but wonder whether the fact the clock has stopped is somewhat symbolic of what is happening in parliament in these closing days. It may by symbolic of how much is being accomplished.

I began my remarks last night by referring to the speech made just prior to mine by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier). There was a great deal that he said with which I agreed. One such comment was recorded in yesterday's Hansard at page 3832, and I quote:

I know the minister cannot control everything going on in these projects, rehabilitation projects, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation projects and others where you have to qualify and where qualifying means being a Liberal.

When he said that, I did a double take. My memory took me back almost five years to the summer of 1974 when it came to my attention that there were some CMHC housing projects in my constituency. One in particular had been built by a developer under the general umbrella organization known as Imperial Ventures with head office in Winnipeg. The head of that organization has added something to his record. He is not only the former Liberal leader of the Liberal party in Manitoba, but the former Liberal leader of the former Liberal party in Manitoba. His organization known as Imperial Ventures built a project called low dividend housing. That was a good idea on the part of the former leader. The program was supposedly to provide houses for low income families. The government loaned money to the developer at a low interest rate, presumably because the profit on that investment would not be in the rental but on the appreciated value of that property. It was a good idea.

It came to my attention that some of the rules for that kind of housing were not only being bent but broken. There are certain strict rules which CMHC officials impose on a venture like that. I took it upon myself to visit the project. One of the rules was that you had to have a family. Second, you had to be below a certain income level. Obviously you had to require that kind of housing. I presented myself to the manager of that project. There were no questions asked about whether I had a family or what my salary was at the time. There were no qualifying questions at all.

I started probing and asking certain questions. I found out that on the bottom floor of the department block were the single bedroom apartments. On the second floor were smaller apartments or family units and on the third floor were the three bedroom apartments. When I asked whether it was necessary to have a family to move in there, I was told it was not necessary at all. I asked what was done about people who did not have families but wanted to rent an apartment on the third floor. I was told that there were career people who rented those. They divide the rooms among themselves. These are several adults occupying one suite. If a couple without a family rented a three bedroom apartment, I was told they would make the third bedroom into a den.

This was a project for low income families. In no way were the rules being adhered. to. The manager was not ensuring that those who needed housing the most were the ones to benefit from that project. The former Liberal leader of the former Liberal party in Manitoba has done very well by this project even to this day.

As the hon. member for Roberval pointed out last night, we cannot blame the minister for that. I do not hold him accountable. As the hon. member for Roberval said, the federal government should never have been involved in this kind of program. It is a centralist notion. It is from a bygone era when a lot of people in Canada, particularly members opposite, thought that the central government could solve most problems in Canada. My colleagues and I did not think so.

We found out through the affairs of this department that that is far from being possible. There is no government agency omniscient enough to be able to supervise all of the building projects and investments that CMHC has made across Canada. There is no one agency that can ensure that the rules are not being broken. When guidelines and rules are set up to protect low income families, they are broken. This means that those who need housing the most are being ripped off.

Therefore, I am happy to see this legislation which will do away with the department of housing and urban affairs. I am glad the government has accepted our proposal and said yes, it is time for this department to be disbanded. I commend the government for taking this initiative and being able to turn over to the provinces some of the projects that belong to provincial areas, letting those governments do as they should have done in the first place.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I participate in this debate. As the housing critic of this party, I will be summarizing the approach this party is taking to the measures proposed by the minister and the government as well as looking at the housing situation in general. From listening to the minister's remarks some ten days ago and from reading the speeches of Liberal members who participated in this debate, one would not recognize that there is a housing problem in Canada.

The minister and his associates trot out figures showing that over 200,000 houses are being built each year. They say there really is no housing crisis in Canada today. The minister spent a great deal of his time assuring hon. members that there is no problem with housing, that what is needed is a bit of tinkering here and there, such as the amendments being put forward, in order to clear up the problem that he says exists.

I have often thought that many members of parliament and many governments live in a cloud in cuckoo land. The minister occupies one of his own rather uniquely. I invite him to come to my constituency in Toronto and tell the people there that there is no housing crisis in the city of Toronto and no housing problem in Canada today. I am sure it would come as news to many people.

Who are these people? It is not the rich who are concerned. It is not only the people we classify as poor. It is many people starting out, with one income and sometimes with two incomes, who 20 or 30 years ago would have found it easier to buy a house even though the standard of living at that time was lower than it is today.

I follow the remarks of my colleagues the hon. members for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) in saying that Canadians are house poor. The high cost of housing is shattering the Canadian dream. It is not part of this party's policy that everyone should live in a single family dwelling or that everyone should live in an apartment, but that people, regardless of their income, should be able to live in affordable, decent shelter. Those who want to live in houses should be able to do so. Those who want to own their own homes should be able to do so. Those who want to own their own homes should be encouraged to do that.

It is more difficult for Canadians to own their own homes now than it was 20 or 30 years ago. Right now, the average price of a house in metropolitan Toronto is $68,500, and it is anticipated the price will rise by a further 7 or 8 per cent over the coming year. In many parts of Toronto, in the central core, for example, prices have risen to about $80,000. With mortgage rates at a high of 11¼ per cent the dream of being able to afford one's own home is becoming unattainable.

It is important that we should look carefully at the causes of the extraordinary inflation which has taken place in this area. What are the components which go into the cost of housing? In all the research the government has sponsored and all the work of CMHC, very few studies have been undertaken which tell the truth about the reasons for the present high cost of housing. It is a monument to the government's political ability that it has managed to convince itself, on the basis of only the Lord knows what information, that there is not an "affordability crisis" in the cities of Canada today. Look at the costs which have gone up. We admit that the cost of labour has gone up. One can see that the cost of materials has risen; this was documented by my hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie when he talked about the price of lumber and so on.

But the price increases do not stem solely from increases in the cost of labour and materials. They are caused by two other factors—the cost of money and the cost of land. When you look hard at what the government has done to protect Canadians from the increasing price of money, you find the answer is "not a single thing". Quite the reverse. They have encouraged interest rates to rise to a point at which it is impossible in Toronto to get a first mortgage for less than 11 per cent or a second mortgage for less than 13 per cent. We all know that increasingly it takes two mortgages to enable a family to acquire a home.

The cost of land is the other factor which must be closely examined. In our view, land should be considered a resource just as we consider oil or coal or gold to be a resource. Precisely the same phenomena as we have seen with respect to the exploitation of other natural resources—domination by foreign companies, a tendency for greater concentration, control over the price of the products—are being repeated in the case of land. We in our party have argued that we can see a pattern developing—a greater concentration taking place in the economy leading to excessive profits and consumer gouging. We can see this happening with regard to the price of land.

So we have "an affordability problem". More than one million Canadians are paying over 30 per cent of their income for shelter. We have a serious interest rate problem which is forcing many families into permanent and uncontrollable debt. Also within the housing industry there is the situation in which fewer and fewer companies are controlling land, not only in the inner cities but in the suburban areas. We know the names of these companies—Cadillac-Fairview, Genstar, Trizec. Such firms are accumulating land around the cities, controlling the choices which are available and restricting the ability of our people to afford decent housing.

What is the major lesson to be learned from this? First, any housing policy which fails to deal with the large developers and the powers of financial institutions cannot possibly succeed because it is these two groups which are the major source of the problem. Proposals such as those put forward by the Conservative party, and put forward as well, though admittedly in a striptease, delicate fashion, by the minister of state for housing and which simply increased consumer demand without dealing with inflation and profiteering in the supply of housing, serves simply as a guarantee of higher prices and higher profits. To put it crudely, if you simply put money into the hands of consumers without doing anything about the supply of housing or the cost of money, you are merely supplying a subsidy to developers and bankers.

The second lesson to be learned is that any subsidy on housing and home ownership should be clearly expressed and costed. The Canadian people should be allowed to see exactly who would benefit from any change in subsidy and at what price. I find it ironic in the extreme that the parties which have been advocating restraint at the expense of working Canadians should now be proposing solutions costing billions of dollars like some nineteenth century evangelist who had suddenly discovered the sins of the flesh.

Third, we should be crystal clear as to the full extent of any subsidies both from the point of view of the direct expenditure of public moneys and also from the point of view of what we call tax expenditures. Tax expenditures have aptly been called hidden welfare, and we are still in the dark as to the cost, for example, of capital cost allowances and accelerated depreciation provisions under the Income Tax Act.

Then there is the cost of tax shelters from multiple unit residential buildings known as MURBs, tax deferrals which allow companies to withhold taxes in a given year and put them off on a continuing basis; and there are the tax provisions which have just been put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) which will allow for the continuing write-off of all carrying charges on undeveloped land.

In addition to action along the lines of the three points I have made, something else has to be done. There is an obvious need for tax reform which would bring relief to lower and middle income Canadians. It is increasingly difficult, I would stress once again, for the average Canadian to afford to buy a house and live in affordable housing or in an affordable apartment. A government which does not take note of this fact will find itself facing some unpleasant music when it finally realizes it has to call an election.

Finally, there is no instant or magic solution to the problem of affordable housing. If there is no free lunch, as the Liberals and Tories are so prepared to say when they discuss unemployment insurance and direct government expenditure, there is no free lunch in tax spending on housing either, and that is something that both the Liberals and Conservatives would have the Canadian people believe. The hard fact of the matter is that fewer and fewer developers control the supply of land. Private land banking has replaced public land assembly, and we have no control over the price of land. To increase demand willy-nilly when so few companies control the supply of land is simply an incentive to profiteer. House prices will not simply rise, they will go through the roof.

That is the background against which we have to consider the housing proposals that have been put forward by the government. It is the background of ever increasing concentration of wealth, of control over the supply of land; it is the background of ever increasing corporate power, private power and control by the public; the background of ever increasing mortgage rates and extraordinary bank profits. Of course, the final story is the high price of a house.

It is against this background and not the cloud cuckoo land in which the minister lives that we have to consider the Liberal party's proposed amendments to the National Housing Act, because the thrust of the amendments is to reduce public control and public investment in housing. But there is one problem, and that is that while the government would have us believe that it is leaving the housing situation to the so-called free market, the fact of the matter is there is no free market in housing.

I want to quote from one CMHC report which was published surreptitiously, one might say, and which exposed the high cost of land in 1976. Peter Spurr says the following about metropolitan land development:

> Metropolitan land development has been taken over by the giants, who are now consolidating their position by buying up their competition, and the suppliers and materials in their production processes. The small builder, revered in the mythology of housing, is an anachronism—the residential construction industry in metropolitan Canada can be recognized as paralleling the structure of the automobile industry during the 1920s, or the aircraft industry in the 1940s. The understanding of this reality could lead to several different objectives for public policy, ranging from the break up of the evolving cartel, to the nationalization of the firms, to increased public supervision of their products and prices. Of the three, the latter seems most directly related to the quality of life and substantive needs of this society.

That was the suggestion and recommendation of Mr. Spurr who wrote the report for the government on the high cost of land and land prices. What did the minister in all his wisdom, and the people who are advising him in CMHC, do? Did they decide to break up the cartels? The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) has been looking for a backbone for four years and he still has not found one with respect to the competition policy. Have they nationalized land or done anything about public control or ownership of land? No. Have they done anything about public supervision of products or prices? No, they have specifically refused to do so. They have gone from one impotent institution to another in their attempt to find an answer to the problem of inflation, not only in housing but in the rest of the economy, and they have not come up with a single answer. Now they are desperately trying to find a political solution to save them when they come to call an election.

What has been the answer? They have rejected each of the three possibilities put forward by Mr. Spurr, and now they have come with a fourth one. It is called "leave the jungle to the lions". It calls for a reduction in public involvement in housing, a reduction in the kind of control that is available, and it leaves it all to the private sector. This would come as no surprise to us because the government and the Liberal party, which have made millionaires of Campeau and Teron, of Cadillac-Fairview and Trizec, of Genstar and Daon, are now fulfilling their historic mandate to make Canada even safer for the development industry than it has been up to now.

We will have occasion, when the bill goes to committee—and we will see what committee it goes to, depending on the attitude of the government—of looking at the proposals in detail. Some of them have been dealt with by my colleagues the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. But I want to make one point. I am sorry the minister is not here to hear this, but perhaps he will have the opportunity to read it. My point is that in the pre-election period in which we are living now the government is attempting to put the gun to the head of the opposition and to say: "We have to have the housing bill passed". They have done it with every other piece of legislation with which they have come up. Each one is a matter of urgency. They say they need to have the unanimous consent of the House to get it through.

Let me say this to the minister. He has delayed the bringing in of this bill and yet he is the one who allowed the neighbourhood improvement projects to lapse and left them hanging in mid air, with the people involved not knowing what was going to come next. He is the one who allowed his deputy minister at this critical time to take an extensive leave of absence and now to quit the government for good. He is the one who announced in May proposals which were opposed by many of the groups affected by these proposals, and it took him until November before he could get agreement from those groups to the amendments he was putting forward. He is the one who waited until December to have the bill printed the second time, and his government was the one responsible for waiting until February before they decided to bring this bill in. They are the ones who are responsible for the delays, the costs, the abandoned projects and the defeated hopes. It is not us but the government who are responsible for this delay and this extraordinary mismanagement.

There are hundreds, not to say thousands, of groups affected by the changes in the government housing program. I can only mention one from my riding in the short time I have been here. There is a project in my riding of which the minister is aware because I brought it to his attention a number of times. The project is for a senior citizens' building which is in danger of languishing—it is a non-profit corporation—because this government has delayed and has refused to give direct government funding to groups which are in need as they wait for the introduction of this new policy.

The basic thrust of the new policy has to be seen in light of the announced cutbacks of over $300 million in the CMHC budget in August and September. The government is determined to get out of a number of areas and to leave them to banks, to the private sector and to trust companies. We have no guarantee that the private sector and the trust companies are interested in supporting co-ops or are interested in supporting non-profit corporations.

The government has introduced the graduated payment mortgage scheme, which is a fraud on the Canadian public, and I say that with no apology whatsoever. I want to quote from the "Graduated Payment Mortgage Safari Kit" which was provided to the members of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs by the minister in December. This kit was supposed to explain to us the great benefits of the graduated payment mortgage scheme. What does that scheme do? It allows a potential home buyer to pay a lower total amount of money in the first four or five years of his mortgage, and then requires that he pay an escalated amount of his mortgage after the first five years. The key fact, which is not mentioned once in this GPM safari kit, is that the total amount of money which an individual would pay is greater over a 25-year amortization period than it would be under an equal payment mortgage, which is what we have in Canada today. It is unbelievable that that fact is not mentioned once in a government document presented to members for briefing.

If a private group put forward this proposal and did not provide an explanation, they would be guilty of misleading advertising of the worst kind and would be prosecuted by the government. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should have a look at this document. It is a clear example of the kind of thing many lenders in the private sector would like to get away with, that is, concealing the true cost of a loan from the consumer. Now we know why the government is afraid to bring in an act to protect creditors and borrowers. It is because the government does not want to reveal the true cost of loans to Canadians.

If the Liberal party is bankrupt, I should like to look briefly at what we have heard from the Conservative party. Apart from criticism, applauding the government for abolishing the ministry of urban affairs and for giving its role back to the private sector, the only proposal put forward by the Conservative party was one to allow the deductibility of mortgage interest and property tax from pre-tax income. I admit this proposal deals superficially with one of the problems I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, and that is the problem of tax relief. Obviously one would pay less tax, and it would provide a substantial saving to a large number of Canadians.

The main problem with the scheme is that it does not do anything about the problems facing the housing industry and Canadians who are interested in buying houses. It does not do anything about high prices, corporate concentration, or creating equity between home owners and tenants. It is a massive hidden subsidy of home ownership at the expense of the rest of Canadians. In political terms it can be compared to those nineteenth century Conservatives who opposed giving the vote to non-property owners. What twentieth century Conservatives are saying is that Canadians who are not lucky enough to own property will not receive the benefit of a tax cut. The Tories are barring nearly 40 per cent of Canadian households from the benefits of economic citizenship.

Mrs. Pigott: The hon. member should say that in the trade union halls.

Mr. Rae: I have said this wherever I go. I admit the scheme provides a form of tax relief, but I do not think it provides the Conservative party with a monopoly on virtue. It is a proposal which creates inequities between home owners and tenants. It means the government will spend millions of dollars in the subsidization of a particular group. The fact it is a hidden subsidy and may be superficially politically popular is irrelevant. Nevertheless it is a subsidy. It does nothing about the key housing problems facing Canadians. It is a tax relief which provides relief to some but not others. We in the New Democratic Party are interested in tax relief. Certainly we are interested in the problem of cost relief, but our approach will not be at the expense of some Canadians and to the benefit of others.

Our approach is based on two premises: affordability and fairness. It is time to look very hard at the groups in our society who have prevented Canadians from having the type of housing they deserve. Since 1945 huge amounts of Canadian investment capital have been absorbed in urban development. With the guarantee of the federal government, financial institutions recognized a safe market and invested heavily in this sector. In 1977 the total value of real estate mortgages outstanding was $73.9 billion, far more than the total federal budget. Since 1945 the government has allowed this distortion to grow in our economy. The economic policy of the federal government has allowed more money than was needed to be used in the development of urban real estate. From 1945 to 1977 the amount of money spent on urban real estate by Canadian financial institutions increased 100 times.

What has been the effect? The effect has been to suck money from many of the productive and manufacturing sectors of the economy into speculation and urban land development. While some sectors of the economy have done well, such as urban land, other sectors have been underfed, underplenished and starved by the lack of capital and investment. Also it is important to recognize what has happened with the massive profits made in urban land and real estate.

Rather than investing in the industrial sector of Canada, our dollars are flowing south into the United States. The investment of Canadian capital in the United States is being led by real estate companies. The workers and the people of this country who are looking for jobs are being bled dry by the investment going out of the country.

For example, Markborough Properties and the Meridian building group announced plans in May, 1978, to finance a portion of a $1 billion new town in Dade County, Florida. Olympia and York Ltd. of Toronto bought eight New York City office buildings for approximately $350 million. Cadillac-Fairview holds close to $200 million in current United States real estate assets. Genstar, a foreign-owned company, has been dominant in the Canadian real estate industry. Now it is exposing its tentacles elsewhere in North America. Recently it acquired Westmor Corporation of Long Beach, California, which owns mortgage bank branches in Georgia, Nevada, Arizona and California. Also it bought 8,600 acres in San Diego for $93 million. This flow of capital south draws money away from Canada. Profits generated in Canada should be used for the benefit of Canadians.

The same trend can be seen elsewhere in the economy. Inco has made money at the expense of the workers in Sudbury and the people of that community for a decade. Now it is investing its profits in Guatemala and Indonesia. The same pattern of dependence, exploitation and the exporting of jobs and wealth is going on in the urban and real estate sectors.

We in the New Democratic Party feel the price of land must be controlled, as well as profit speculation and cost of money. In order to deal directly with the housing problems facing Canadians, those matters must be controlled. Our attitude toward land must change. Land should be seen as a resource which needs the protection of public policy. It is too valuable a resource to be left solely in the hands of private developers. The entire development industry was created from the idea that urban land and buildings are private property which should be used, owned and developed by the corporate sector.

But urban land has been and always should be considered as one of Canada's natural resources. It provides a basic need—shelter. The need for shelter should not be subject to profiteering. We cannot allow land to be taken off the market and held by a developer until he or his company feels the land will bring the desired price. We should provide encouragement to the non-profit, co-operative and municipal sectors of housing. The leading builder in Toronto today is the city of Toronto. I am proud to say that city has had the guts and ability to get into the housing market. It has attempted to deal with the high cost of housing in its own way.

In relation to public land assembly, our proposal has been rejected consistently by the government. We need to reduce the cost of mortgages. That has been the proposal of my party since 1973. Mortgage rates are too high; bank profits are astronomical.

Why does the government not have the ability, guts or integrity to deal with these problems and put them together in a very simple equation? I think the people of Canada would be behind the government if it said to the banks: "Do something about mortgage rates and take the cost out of excess profits".

We need amendments to the Bank Act and to the National Housing Act not only to allow the government to offer mortgages at 8 per cent, but to force banks to do the same for Canadian families that are earning less then $25,000 a year. This is not a public subsidy. We are not the last of the big time spenders, like the Conservatives and Liberals seem to want to be with their tax exemptions and allowances for the people. This is something that will be coming from the banks' excess profits which have been hurting the people of Canada. Let us not forget that bank profits last year were $1 billion. Let us not forget that a good part of this, according to information provided to us by the banks themselves, is simply a windfall produced by increasing the spread between the Bank of Canada rate and the banks' prime rate. Such a windfall has even been admitted to by major spokesmen of the banking community, as I have said.

I do not see why the banks should be allowed to benefit, and I do not see why we as taxpayers and interest payers—and we are all taxpayers and interest payers; certainly I am—should continue to allow ourselves to subsidize these monuments of marble and glass when we cannot affort to buy adequate housing for our children. The Bank of Canada's attitude toward restraint is perhaps best revealed by the building it has just constructed for itself across the way.

Should we not start talking more of the waste and excess profits and misuse of our social resources? The difference in monthly payments between a mortgage of $50,000 at 11¼ per cent and a mortgage of $50,000 at 8 per cent is over $100 a month, or $1,200 a year which could be going back into the pockets of the Canadian people, not at the expense of their brothers, some home owners or another taxpayer, but at the expense of those people who have been living off the backs of the Canadian people. That is a significant saving.

This government should deal with mortgage interest rates, problems in relation to profits and significant savings. It should not go round the circle and brush aside the problem, but should get at the heart of the matter. The heart of the matter is the fact that interest rates are too high, bank profits are too high and land costs are too high.

If the government wants to deal with these problems directly, then it should deal with them directly by assembling land and providing it at no profit to the Canadian people. I think the slogan for the voting public in this election year should be "let the buyer beware". It would be easy enough for us in this party, as the other parties have done, to play the game of cheque book politics. Cheque book politics will not necessarily solve problems in housing. We have seen what the Tories have proposed to buy votes. I think I said earlier in a speech outside this House that rather than buying votes, the Liberal party only wants to rent them, and that is the proposal it has been putting forward. This is a strategy that has been followed by the minister. He says we might have a tax shelter, and we might do something about our unfair tax system that will be of benefit to more than 30 per cent of the people, but on the other hand we might not. This government does not even have the courage to propose something and let the people decide. The fact of the matter is that buying votes will not make it easier for one single Canadian to buy a house. That is the key to the problem. We need to keep the cost of land down and we need to keep the cost of money down. I say, why not take the bull by the horns and do it directly?

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make just one comment concerning the remarks of the last speaker who made reference to the slow passage of this bill. I can only say that the bill has now been before the House for second reading for some two weeks. In fact, during these two weeks I am led to believe that the hon. member who has just spoken has been able to go away on vacation, come back and still speak on second reading. I feel that probably one of the problems in this House is the amount of time we spend on second reading.

An hon. Member: Abolish the House. Do away with it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He was our third speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: Guillotine the House. Shut it down. Pass it by executive fiat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor for the purpose of making a speech, and I suggest we listen.

Mr. Herbert: I hope those remarks appear on the record, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: I hope so.

Mr. Herbert: Frankly, if the member is suggesting that every bill which comes into this House should take up two weeks' time on second reading, he should recognize that we are really not going to get very much legislation through this House. I would refer him to the British Parliamentary system, which so many of his colleagues suggest in many cases we should imitate, where with almost three times as many members it takes only two or three days at most on second reading to put their party position on record.

Let me now talk about the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herbert: Bill C-29 is a carefully prepared and thought out response to the housing situation as it exists in Canada today. It is quite obvious, as has been mentioned many times, that Canadians are among the best housed people in the world. For that reason it becomes even more important to address ourselves to the needs of those people among us who still have problems in getting access to housing that is appropriate to their needs and within their means.

The new non-profit and co-operative housing programs set out in this bill are a practical and workable solution to the problem of generating housing for low income people at an affordable cost. I am particularly pleased that these programs, more than ever before, will involve the private sector of the economy in the provision of social housing. There is no reason that social housing should be the exclusive responsibility of government, and it seems apparent that private investors are now willing and desirous of becoming involved.

Under the non-profit and co-operative programs, and by several other parts of this bill, private lenders will be allowed to provide capital in projects which up until now were financed from government resources. That policy is consistent with the relationship the government has always encouraged between the private and public sectors.

The government is not in the business of constructing houses. The most efficient and economical way to get houses built is by private enterprise within a free and competitive market economy. When the private marketplace is working as it should, most Canadians will be able to deal with their own housing problem. That is why an important part of the government's participation in housing has been devoted to encouraging the maintenance of a healthy housing industry in Canada.

Mortgage insurance was introduced soon after the end of World War II to encourage private lenders, particularly banks, to increase their investment in residential construction, to make more money available to finance the building of housing at a time when mortgages did not seem to be such an attractive kind of investment. That one program, mortgage insurance, has probably dome more than any other measure to establish and maintain a healthy housing market. It has been modified from time to time to conform with changing needs.

In recent years the government has followed the pattern of introducing publicly funded and supported housing programs and then, as they became familiar and acceptable, modifying them in such a way as to permit them to be supported by the private sector. Two notable examples have been the assisted home ownership program and the assisted rental program which initially involved both federal government loans and federal government subsidies to put good housing within reach of people who needed it.

Those two programs were among the most successful and popular ever introduced. These programs were later modified, first, to permit them to be financed with private capital rather than government loans and, second, to replace government subsidies with a system of repayable, interest reducing loans. The logical extension of this pattern is the new graduated payment mortgage, a private loan which allows borrowers to make lower payments during the early years when they are getting established in a new home.

I am not suggesting that the private sector of the housing industry should be expected on its own to take care of all the housing needs of all Canadians. The Government of Canada through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has always had an important role to play, in partnership with private enterprise, to ensure that Canadians have good housing at affordable cost.

There are two ways in which the government will continue to fulfil that obligation. One way is to provide subsidies for the construction and acquisition of housing which fulfils a social need. This bill provides for generous assistance to non-profit groups and co-operative associations that are prepared to make housing available to people who need it. This assistance will be provided in a way that eliminates overlapping administration by various levels of government and allows the provinces to fulfil their own objectives according to their own priorities in an area that is essentially within provincial jurisdiction.

The second way in which the federal government interacts with the private sector to ensure adequate annual production of housing is through the mortgage insurance program. When we ask private investors to make money available for social housing, or for rehabilitation, or through the graduated payment mortgage, we encourage them to do so by making mortgage insurance available.

This bill extends the benefits of mortgage insurance to a number of new situations not previously covered—for instance, mortgage loans to non-profit organizations for the acquisition and improvement of existing housing; for loans to landlords who are prepared to rehabilitate their rental properties to acceptable standards of health and safety; and, for the first time, for housing loans to Indians living on reserves.

One of the most encouraging aspects of this legislation is that it strengthens the partnership between government and private enterprise in the housing industry, making the best possible use of the resources of each sector. This housing legislation gives further support to the provision of housing to people of low income. I am referring to co-operative housing, which has become increasingly popular in recent years as Canadians have come to understand and accept the idea of collective action to solve individual housing problems. The co-operative movement in housing had to overcome many obstacles before receiving the recognition it is given today. It is now considered to be an important alternative approach to meeting low-income shelter needs.

Support for co-operative housing is another indication of federal adaptation to new situations and shifting demands. Canada in 1979 is not the same as the Canada of 1946, and the National Housing Act is not the same instrument it was 30 years ago. At that time the primary task was to rebuild a housing industry that had been virtually closed down by the priorities of a country at war.

The changes since then have been dramatic and comprehensive. It was recognized at the outset that relying on the free market system for the production of housing does not automatically assure an equitable distribution of that production. Without a degree of government intervention, lower income households could face the problem of either spending a large portion of their income to obtain adequate and suitable shelter or paying lower rents for inadequate and unsuitable shelter. As a result, housing legislation over the years has responded to two primary needs: to assist families who were in need of housing but had affordability problems; and to assist builders to supply an adequate volume of good, moderately-priced housing.

An important change in social policy was marked in 1949 when the act first incorporated provisions for public housing. At that time CMHC contributed 75 per cent of the cost of construction and the province paid 25 per cent. The project was owned in partnership by the federal and provincial governments and operating losses were shared on a 75-25 per cent basis.

Just 15 years ago, in 1964, the act was again amended to give the provinces another option in providing housing for low income families. The new provision called for CMHC to make 90 per cent loans to provinces and municipalities to provide public housing. Provinces paid the remaining 10 per cent, and operating losses were shared by the federal government and the provinces on a 50-50 basis. During this time and, in fact, up until 1973 co-operative housing was treated as just another form of home ownership and received the same treatment and benefits as a single applicant for a home owner loan.

I might point out that there are two types of housing co-operatives. One is called the building co-operatives, in which a group of people simply pool their resources to build their housing at the same time, with each member of the group owning his unit outright. A continuing co-operative, on the other hand, is a non-profit group that provides housing for its members. The co-operative itself owns the housing and each member has a share in the project. None of the units in such a co-operative can be sold for a profit.

Up until 1973, although building co-operatives received some assistance, continuing co-operatives under group ownership had great difficulty getting recognition and acceptance under the act. One problem was that legislation did not provide for co-operatives to obtain loans for low rental housing, except as the sponsor for a project in which residents did not have to be members. In other words, low income people could have housing provided for them but they could not own it through a co-operative.

Another problem was that co-operatives could obtain funding only for new projects, not for existing housing, nor even for the rehabilitation of existing housing. As a result, people in a rental project could not get an NHA loan to buy it co-operatively even if the landlord wished to sell it to them. This made it difficult to mount a strong national program of co-operative housing.

In 1973, however, new housing legislation helped co-operatives to develop fully as another housing alternative for low income Canadians. The two most important provisions in the new legislation at that time were first, that housing co-operatives could qualify for 100 per cent loans for non-profit, low rental housing; and, secondly, loans would be available for both the purchase and rehabilitation of existing housing. That new legislation did, in effect, start a new form of co-operative, one in which the members are collectively owners but individually are in a leasehold position. On one hand they have the proprietary rights of a landlord, and on the other hand the rights and advantages of tenants.

As the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has mentioned, extensive discussions recently between his ministry and the co-operative Housing Foundation of Canada have produced an agreement regarding the administration of subsidies and charges to occupants of housing units that serve mutual objectives. The new agreement provides for fewer controls by CMHC on actual project development, and allows co-operatives to have the opportunity to use a wider range of procurement techniques based on the group's experience. Greater latitude is also given to co-operative groups in choosing between the acquisition of existing developments and the construction of new projects. The agreement provides, as well, for a significant increase in federal financial support to co-operative projects, and continued application of the residential rehabilitation assistance program.

There is no doubt that the new program will result in much higher production of this much needed type of accommodation. Federal assistance will be almost doubled, and private lending institutions indicate their willingness to invest as much as $500 million during the next few years in support of co-operative housing. This means that the number of people living in co-operative housing could easily double in a few years, going from the present level of about 50,000 to more than 100,000.

I am pleased that the government is giving support to co-operative housing as another means of offering another choice of housing tenure to families of various incomes. The new program will assist members of the co-operative housing program to build even more housing that they can afford and of which they can be proud.

I am particularly pleased that this bill preserves and extends one of the most important housing measures ever put forward in Canada. I am referring to the residential rehabilitation assistance program—RRAP. Restrictions have been removed from this program and its benefits are no longer limited to housing in certain specially designated areas. With the passage of this legislation, all Canadians will become eligible for RRAP assistance, within the terms of the program, and I have no doubt that the funds available to support it will be applied to the most pressing needs, wherever they may occur in Canada.

It is not surprising that the RRAP program met with such an immediate and enthusiastic response from the people of Canada. Since the program was introduced in 1973, CMHC has been assisting in the rehabilitation of some 20,000 units per year. As the program is broadened and municipal officials become more familiar with its application, that annual rate will increase. The number of homes that can be rehabilitated in any year depends a lot upon the capacity of municipal organizations to manage and implement the program.

All of the demographic trends, economic projections, and our shifting social values suggest that rehabilitation is going to be a more significant activity for at least the rest of this century. The government, in bringing forth these amendments, recognizing the importance of rehabilitation and conservation, has reaffirmed its intention to continue to support it in a tangible way.

I have a few comments concerning the deductibility of mortgage interest, Mr. Speaker. The Tory mortgage interest tax proposal is unjust and unnecessary. Furthermore, the taxpayer cannot afford it.

I should like to put some relevant statistics on the record which show that 62 per cent of Canadian families, some 4.4 million, are home owners while 38 per cent, or 2.4 million, rent their homes.

I should like for a moment to comment on living styles. In Quebec, 50 per cent of the people are home owners compared to 66 per cent in Ontario, 65 per cent in Alberta and 69 per cent in British Columbia. Francophones are only approximately 45 per cent home owners by living style, 55 per cent living in rented accommodation.

I stress this point, Mr. Speaker, because the Tory program makes no attempt to recognize the difference in living styles between Canadians in the province of Quebec and Canadians in the wealthier provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. The program is designed to aid to a much greater degree persons living in those two wealthier provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

Mr. Crosbie: You will swallow anything.

Mr. Herbert: As long as the hon. member opposite is making comments, that may be one of the reasons why the opposition party has never fared too well in elections in the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Herbert.]

Mr. Crosbie: Call the election and we will see. Sixty seats minimum.

Mr. Herbert: Among home owners, 35 per cent have incomes below $10,000, 45 per cent between $10,000 and $20,000 and the rest earn over $20,000. Because marginal rates increase with income, the higher income earner benefits more. The 35 per cent of home owners who have a family income under $10,000 pay about 14 per cent of the total mortgage interest payments whereas the 20 per cent with incomes over $20,000 pay 33 per cent of the total mortgage interest payments.

High income earners are in a better position to borrow and these persons, together with those with debt-free homes choosing to benefit from the program, would receive preference from lending institutions. Lower income groups would face increased difficulty in securing funds.

In Quebec, the average family income for home owners is $19,300 whereas the average in Ontario is $22,500, in Alberta, $21,200 and in British Columbia $22,100. Thus, the marginal rate is higher in the wealthier provinces.

Lost revenues to the federal government would also entail losses to the provinces as fewer funds would be available for transfer. The provinces would have to raise taxes in order to replace these losses.

The amount of the downpayment is often the major problem for young couples wishing to buy houses. The increase in demand for mortgage money by those refinancing their homes with new or increased mortgages would tend to raise the amount of the downpayment required.

Those who have saved to increase the equity in their homes, either by increasing the downpayment or paying off part of the mortgage, will receive less benefit than those who have the minimum investment in their homes.

Tenants who choose not to buy a house or tenants who cannot buy a home would be obligated as taxpayers to contribute to the cost of a plan in which they do not choose to participate or are unable to participate.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—National Revenue—Reason detailed income tax returns placed in custody of Statistics Canada; the hon. member for Halton (Mr.

Philbrook)—Post Office—Steps to improve door to door delivery; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Post Office—Effect of cutbacks on mail delivery.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of Bill C-215 and that the preceding bills be allowed to stand in the same order.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of Bill C-215 and that all other bills preceding this number stand without losing any of their rights?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENT TO DEPRIVE CONVICTED WAR CRIMINALS OF CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved that Bill C-215, respecting war criminals in Canada, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on December 31, 1979, which is the end of this year, unless the German government acts to change its law, the statute of limitations in Germany will bar any further prosecution of Nazi war criminals. In that country the statute of limitations has been extended once already in connection with the commission of war crimes. In the public debate that was held in the German parliament I understand there was a mixed feeling and there is only a slight majority in favour of the further extension of the statute of limitations for war crimes.

The United States congress and some other national governments and legislatures around the world have unanimously passed resolutions urging the German government to extend its statute of limitations. I hope that at some early date this parliament will act similarly and pass a resolution by unanimous consent along the lines of those passed by others urging the Germans to extend their statute of limitations. If no action is taken by Germany we may then face the appalling spectacle of persons coming forward to publish and to sell memoirs of their World War II war crime commissions. Judging by the success of other books written by other sorts of criminals, we can anticipate that these books will make a lot of money for their authors. I very much regret to note that according to the record, a well established record, some of these books about war crimes could be written by Canadian citizens.

World War II was a trauma in history which we must seek to keep alive in everyone's memory. There are lessons to be learned from it about the values of democracy and society, and as well about the dangers of fascism and racism. These are lessons too important to be forgotten and yet too easily forgotten. Already there are those who seek to write this history for their own purposes. One needs to go no further than to give as an example the statement of a candidate in a recent federal by-election by the name of Roger Delorme, who denied that six million Jews, as well as many others, were murdered during World War II, and who claimed that the number was less than one million. I believe that we should fight against this re-writing of history. We must not forget. Canada has too much of a stake in World War II history. There were too many lives lost to allow what happened at that time to be forgotten.

What can we do to help keep intact our history of that war? One thing is to prosecute war criminals who are living in this country. I am proposing in this bill that if these people are prosecuted and convicted, their Canadian citizenship will be taken from them. It is clear that we have the jurisdiction to prosecute people guilty of war crimes here in Canada, even though the crimes may have been committed elsewhere in the world. We are signatories to the Geneva Conventions Act and there are precedents, five cases that I know of, in which Canadian courts prosecuted persons for committing war crimes that occurred in Europe. Our courts have already been prepared to assume jurisdiction in cases of war crimes.

My bill attempts a measure of justice to the memory of World War II. Millions of people have come to Canada who were victims of that war. These people have come from Europe as well as from other parts of the world. They have come looking for the opportunity to establish a better life. In most cases they have become citizens pursuant to the laws that were established by this parliament. Under our laws citizenship has always been discretionary, in the sense that there are tests to be met and criteria applied. But above and beyond these things the government has had the discretion to withhold citizenship in appropriate cases.

I understand that for a fairly long period in our recent history we inquired into communist affiliations and activity by would-be Canadian citizens. If we were satisfied that they were members of a communist or fascist government or had close ties with one, we took steps to withhold Canadian citizenship from them. I understand also that in some cases, by misrepresentation in citizenship applications, citizenship was wrongly obtained by some individuals.

There are safeguards provided in the Citizenship Act. There is a procedure provided whereby an individual who obtains Canadian citizenship by false representation or fraud can have his Canadian citizenship revoked. To my knowledge we fail to press the matter of war crimes as diligently as we pressed the matter of communist affiliation. We did not press the question: Was the individual involved in the commission of war crimes? Opinions have been given that those who have obtained Canadian citizenship and were guilty of war crimes but who represented otherwise may well be entitled to keep Canadian citizenship.

There are, of course, other legal opinions. In the preparation of my brief remarks today I read a legal opinion setting out grounds under which Canadian citizenship might be revoked. These grounds were non-disclosure of the commission of war crimes. Unless we take some positive action and amend our legislation we will have no recourse against these individuals.

Hon. members may ask who I am talking about. I do not intend to name names in this chamber. However, it is well known that there are over one dozen individuals in this category in Canada. Witnesses are available from among the Ukrainian and Jewish population who have come from Europe who can give evidence against these individuals. In my opinion they ought to do so and may do so if the provision such as the one I am proposing is introduced.

I have been somewhat vague in my reference to the term "war criminals" and to its definition. I have not used the term "war criminals" in my bill. The term used is "an offence pursuant to section 3 of the Geneva Conventions Act". That refers to grave breaches which include, among other things, wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments, and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health. I am ascerting that it is well known that there are people in Canada who come within that definition by virtue of their conduct. I am suggesting that action ought to be taken against them and the bill which I have proposed, if enacted, will make it easier and more likely to do so.

I want to add one other matter which I have covered in this bill. In my opinion, it is not fair that the bill be restricted in its effect only to those who have acquired Canadian citizenship by naturalization and not to those Canadian born. I am not proposing that any distinction be drawn. It is conceivable that a born Canadian was in Europe or in another theatre of war and committed a crime within the definition I have put forward. The bill provides that his citizenship also is subject to revocation, not only the citizenship of an immigrant. I am not in favour of making any more differences between Canadians who have acquired their citizenship by birth and those who have acquired their citizenship by naturalization. If implemented, this bill will operate equally against both, whether naturalized or born in Canada.

This provision is not limited only to World War II. God knows, we have evidence of the commission of war crimes in all wars. The amendment I am suggesting here would be applicable to those circumstances as well. It is by no means limited, although I began my remarks talking about the World War II experience and the holocaust.

This is a simple bill. It is easy to understand. It is timely because of what is now happening in Germany. It can be taken as an example and demonstration of the strong feelings Canadians have that we not forget what happened in World War II, and that we not allow those who were responsible for serious crimes during that war to go unpunished. Canadian citizenship should not continue to be held by those who are guilty of war crimes.

I look forward to learning whether the government favours or does not favour the principle of the bill. Whether it does or not, I hope that my colleagues on all sides of the House will make it possible for this important measure to be referred to the justice committee so that evidence can be led on its effect and the need for it. Because I assert that this is a bill that is needed and is needed now.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) for bringing this matter forward for discussion in the House this afternoon. I agree with many of the sentiments he expressed, but I do not agree with the vehicle of Bill C-215. It proposes to take a very drastic course on the part of the Government of Canada. I hope to develop arguments in the next few minutes as to why it should not be pursued.

The subject matter is important. Because of the remarks made by my colleague from York Centre I personally would agree to having the subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I agree with my colleague that the Government of Canada should urge the West German government to extend its statute of limitations for prosecution of war crimes. I understand it will run out later this year. The magnitude of the atrocities in the Second World War by war crime elements is such that this statute of limitations should be allowed to be extended so that justice may pursue many of those who have eluded authority since the Second World War. In that sense I fully support the hon. member for York Centre.

I also support his general premise that today, almost 35 years after the end of the Second World War, we should not allow the lessons learned in that war to be forgotten. I grew up in post-war England, in central London, where the effects of the war were very apparent upon families which lost many lives in the bombing and went to school with kids whose fathers did not come home.

The war had a very profound effect on me even though I was born a year after it ended. It is something that will stay with me for the rest of my life. One of the most moving days in the year, even before I became a politician, was November 11 and our Remembrance Day ceremonies. We of all generations must do our utmost to ensure that the lessons of the Second World War do not go unheeded for future generations. In that sense I fully support the hon. member for York Centre and his intentions.

The bill as projected by the hon. member would place severe constraints upon Canadian law. I wish to develop these arguments now. The bill proposes that the Citizenship Act be amended so that any Canadian citizen convicted of war crimes in World War II should automatically cease to be a Canadian. The hon. member did not use those words, but that is what would happen. He talked in terms of section 9(1) being amended by the following words:

Notwithstanding any other Act, every person convicted of an offence pursuant to section 3 of the Geneva Conventions Act thereby ceases to be a Canadian citizen.

Its effect is to amend the Citizenship Act so that any Canadian citizen convicted of war crimes in the Second World War should automatically cease to be a Canadian. What the amendment seeks to do is entirely outside the philosophy of the Citizenship Act and the very liberal approach taken in this country towards citizenship, especially in the last few years, but historically. In that sense the hon. member for York Centre has good intentions but is somewhat misguided in the remedy he seeks to place before the House.

The Citizenship Act of February 15, 1977 is unique in the world. I wish to quote the former secretary of state, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner), when speaking on February 24, 1976. He said:

What makes this bill unique and a leader among nationality laws of the world? . . . it treats absolutely everyone equally . . . This quality is rare in citizenship law. But, . . . the new Citizenship Act . . . clearly lays down certain steps the applicant must follow and certain qualifications the applicant must satisfy. Upon satisfaction of those conditions, then citizenship shall follow as a right.

In other words, the Citizenship Act recognizes that a person has a right to be a citizen of Canada after he or she has met the requirements set forth in the Citizenship Act and has completed the application procedures, including a person to person interview with a citizenship judge and the taking of the oath of citizenship in court. Not only is the Citizenship Act designed to be equitable in the acquisition of citizenship but also in the loss of it. That is an essential point to remember; equity in acceptance and equity in terms of losing citizenship. Already, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you can see how anomalous the amendment proposed in Bill C-215 would be in the Citizenship Act. We must, however, press on to other facts.

Citizenship may be revoked if, after being lawfully admitted to Canada, it is proven that the person entered Canada by false representation, fraud, or by concealing material circumstances or by obtaining citizenship by the same means. My colleague acknowledges that point. The governor in council, upon a report from the Secretary of State, has had to revoke citizenship from time to time. However, in order to do so, it must have been able positively to identify individuals in the records of citizenship registration which have been kept since 1868. To date, the citizenship branch has been unable to identify individuals alleged to be war criminals since, in all probability, most would have changed their identity before entering Canada. How then, would the branch be in any better position to identify individuals in its records for the purpose of Bill C-215?

It must also be borne in mind that under the Citizenship Act the citizen may request that, before the minister makes a report to the governor in council requesting revocation of his citizenship, his case be referred to the trial division of the Federal Court of Canada. But Bill C-215, if passed, would mean that individuals convicted under section 3 of the Geneva Convention Act, 1965, would have no recourse in law to plead that their citizenship should not be revoked, and would be at an extreme disadvantage vis-à-vis other Canadian citizens. Here we see the essential liberal philosophy which has underlined our legal sense since 1867 being skirted. At one stroke, Canadians affected by Bill C-215 would be stripped of their equality before the law and the their right to Canadian citizenship.

To introduce this automatic loss provision would remove the right of some Canadians either to voluntarily relinquish citizenship or to state their case before the Federal Court. Above all, adoption of Bill C-215 would make a partial, if not total, mockery of Canada's Human Rights Act. I am sure the hon. member for York Centre, who is an ardent proponent of human rights and a strong supporter of the human rights legislation passed by this parliament, would not want his bill to contravene the spirit of the Human Rights Act.

Another factor which must be considered is that both the Geneva conventions of 1948 and 1965 and the Canadian act respecting Geneva conventions for the protection of war victims are not retroactive to 1939. Their intent is to prevent the kinds of crime which led up to Nuremberg. The intent of Bill C-215 is, of course, to strike off the register of Canadian citizens all who are convicted of war crimes in the 1939-1945 conflict in Nazi-occupied territory. Under the Citizenship Act, the judge is precluded from questioning applicants on their activity prior to entry to Canada, including war activity. The citizenship judge may consider only criminal activity which has occurred in Canada within the three years immediately preceding the date of the application. This provision in the Citizenship Act, therefore, renders the amendment useless in practice.

As well as being in contravention of our Human Rights Act and diametrically opposed to the spririt and intent of the Citizenship Act, the implementation of Bill C-215 could create stateless persons. Particularly liable to this fate would be the former nationals or citizens of countries which no longer exist. In addition, it could affect persons born in Canada who have no other nationality. Canada, again in the spirit of human rights, signed on October 15, 1978, the United Nations convention on the reduction of statelessness. Canada has thus pledged to presume that every person is entitled to a nationality regardless of any crimes he or she may have committted.

A couple of months ago the whole concept of citizenship was brought up by the return to Canada of FLQ members involved in certain events in Quebec in the early 1970s. In particular, the Cossette-Trudels came here. I know their case is before the courts and I do not want to reflect upon their guilt or innocence, but these people have been charged by the Crown with committing certain criminal acts and they will be brought to trial. Many people in my constituency had an instant reaction along these lines: why would we want these people back in Canada; why not leave them in France or in Cuba? Of course, these people were prejudging guilt, but the essence of this issue is that, notwithstanding any crimes which the accused may have committed, they did not revoke their citizenship upon leaving Canada. I do not know whether this was a specific intent of the minister of justice at the time or whether it was stipulated as part of the arrangement when these people went into exile, when they were given free passage to leave Canada, but it was always understood that the Crown alleged they had committed certain crimes and should they come back to Canada the accused would have to face justice.

I can defend the right of these people to return to this country as a right to face the Canadian justice system. It is important when we talk about revoking the right of citizenship that we keep in mind Canada's commitment to the United Nations and our pledge that every person is entitled to nationality irrespective of any crimes or misdemeanours that he or she might have engaged in. Canada has agreed to uphold article 8(1) of the convention, which states:

A contracting state shall not deprive a person of its nationality if such deprivation would render him stateless.

In certain circumstances, such as treason, the convention permits the contracting state to deprive a person of citizenship, even though the person would then become stateless. Even then, though, the convention rules that the deprivation must be in accordance with the law "which shall provide for the person concerned the right to a fair hearing by a court or other independent body". But Bill C-215 provides for automatic loss of citizenship in contravention of the convention on the reduction of statelessness.

Just suppose, in spite of all the arguments we have presented, the bill passes and the stateless person, or national of some other country, is extradited. Where shall the person go? To a communist bloc country with whom Canada has no extradition treaty? To a country which no longer exists?

Mr. Speaker, the adoption of Bill C-215 would be in direct conflict with the spirit and intent of the Citizenship Act. Furthermore, it contravenes what Canada has already agreed to, the provisions of the convention on the reduction of statelessness. For these reasons, I oppose the bill.

Nevertheless, for the reasons which I outlined earlier, I believe this whole subject of lessons to be learned from the holocaust, the crimes committed in the Second World War, the pursuit of war criminals and the importance of West Germany continuing its statute of limitations, should lead us to think that this would be a very good subject matter for reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and I will certainly support such a move if it is agreeable to hon. members.

[Mr. Collenette.]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, like the preceding speaker, and in spite of the reservations I have about it and on which I shall elaborate later, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) for sponsoring this bill. This bill is indeed inspired by a commendable ideal and, like the preceding speaker, I am convinced that the House will probably feel the need one day to draw lessons from history and do its utmost to prevent the reoccurence of misfortunes such as those which happened at the time.

To come to grasps, since we must, with the contents of Bill C-215, an act respecting war criminals in Canada, I would like, if I may, Mr. Speaker, to examine with the House some of the implications the implementation of this bill would have both domestically and for our commitments to the international community.

Bill C-215 would add new section 9.1 immediately after section 9 of the Citizenship Act found in the Statutes of Canada 1974-75-76, chapter 108. The new section would provide that any person convicted of an offence pursuant to section 3 of the Geneva Conventions Act, chapter G-3 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, would thereby cease to be a Canadian citizen.

What are these Geneva conventions? It might be a good idea to find out what we are talking about. The above-mentioned act approves the four Geneva conventions on the protection of war victims signed in Geneva on August 12, 1949. These four conventions are: first, the convention for the relief of the wounded and sick in armies in the field; second, the convention for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded, sick and the shipwrecked members of armed forces at sea; third, the convention on the treatment of war prisoners; finally, four, the convention on the protection of civilian persons in time of war.

Section 3 of the act stipulates that any "grave breach" of any of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, as therein defined, that would, if committed in Canada, be an offence under any provision of the Criminal Code or other act of the Parliament of Canada, is an offence under such provision of the Criminal Code or other act if committed outside Canada. "Grave breach" is defined in the four conventions as follows: first, in that on the armed forces in the field, at article 50; second, in that on the armed forces at sea, at article 51; third, in that on the prisoners of war, at article 130; and four, in that on civilian persons, at article 147.

Grave breaches include the following crimes which are committed on persons or property protected by the Conventions, namely, wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments, and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health; the massive destruction and appropriation of property unless it is justified by military imperatives and made legally and wisely.

Section 3 grants extra-territorial jurisdiction to Canadian courts with regard to crimes committed outside Canada when they fall within the limits set forth in the four conventions mentioned earlier. Those crimes fall within the jurisdiction of the court where the accused is located, and that is where he will be judged and punished if proved guilty. Still, the attorney general must given his consent in writing before legal procedures can get under way.

What would be the effect of the implementation of Bill C-215 within the territorial limits of Canada? My colleague, the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette), enumerated a while ago some of the legal consequences under the Citizenship Act; I should like to come back to that because it strikes me as being fundamental.

The Citizenship Act of 1976, which replaced that of 1970 found in chapter 19 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, makes it easier to acquire the Canadian citizenship and keep it. It is the right of those who are protected by the act, and can only be lost or withdrawn under the terms of the second part of the act. And there are three ways to lose Canadian citizenship: first, by renunciation as provided in section 8; second, by order of the governor in council, where the citizenship was obtained by fraud or by knowingly concealing material circumstances as provided in section 9; and third, by the fact, for a person who was born in a country other than Canada from at least one Canadian parent, of not having asked to retain his Canadian citizenship or nor having registered and gone to live in Canada during at least one year before the age of 28, as provided in section 7.

The deprivation of citizenship because of conviction for a criminal offence is inconsistent with the spirit of the act which reduced the number of reasons justifying the deprivation of citizenship. Such deprivation can be an extreme punishment by making the person concerned stateless, and I shall come back on this matter a little later. This is what would happen to the person born in Canada without having another citizenship or to the person born outside Canada who would have lost his or her original citizenship by becoming a Canadian citizen.

Although it looks simplistic, that bill would have very serious effects as regards the international commitments we freely agreed to make. The nationality which encompasses citizenship is an important factor in international law because it is the very basis of the international protection granted by a state to one of its citizens. Furthermore, diplomatic immunity abroad is also based on the nationality.

The United Nations took an active part in establishing everyone's right to a nationality. On December 10, 1948, the General Assembly, then made up of 58 countries, adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Forty-eight countries voted for it, eight abstained and two were not represented. None voted against it. Here is what article 15 of the declaration says, and I quote:

(1) Everyone has the right to a nationality;

(2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality.

As the declaration is not a treaty, there was no need to have it signed or ratified. However, it remains a statement of principle of the highest moral authority. Called the Great Charter, it spells out a common objective for all countries and nations and as far as I know Canada endorses these objectives.

Moreover, and to be more specific, certain international conventions emanating from the United Nations deal with nationality in a very specific way. The convention relating to the status of stateless persons adopted on September 28, 1954 and in force since June 6, 1960, to which Canada is not party, provides the following in article 32 entitled Naturalization:

The contracting states shall, inasmuch as possible, facilitate the assimilation and the naturalization of stateless persons. They shall endeavour in particular to accelerate the naturalization process and to reduce inasmuch as possible the fees and costs involved.

On the other hand, the convention on the reduction of statelessness adopted on August 30, 1961, in force since December 13, 1975 and ratified by Canada on October 15, 1978, provides the following in article 8(1):

The contracting states shall not deprive any individual from his nationality were that deprivation to make him stateless.

The mover clearly stated his intention not to make any distinction between withdrawal of nationality from people who have had another nationality in the past and who have settled in Canada and Canadians who were born in Canada and who would be submitted to the same arbitrary judgment. Obviously, in the second case, this approach would directly result in making these people stateless persons.

That obligation, as stipulated in article 8 of the convention on the reduction of statelessness, is ineffective, however, when the nationality has been obtained by means of a false statement or any other fraudulent act or when the individual has resided in a foreign country for a period of time not inferior to seven consecutive years without informing the proper authorities of his intention to retain his nationality or when the individual has allowed one full year to elapse from the date of his majority without establishing a residence on the territory of the state or without registering with the proper authorities of that state.

There again, Mr. Speaker, there is no mention about the problem of Canadians born in Canada who would be arbitrarily deprived of their nationality.

The International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, adopted on December 21, 1965, in force since January 4, 1969 and ratified by Canada on October 14, 1970, stipulates, at section 5(d) (iii), and I quote:

Pursuant to the fundamental obligations set out in section 2 of this Convention, the Member States agree to prohibit and eliminate all forms of racial discrimination and guarantee to everyone the right to equality before the law regardless of race, colour, or national or ethnic origin, especially for the enjoyment of the following rights:

In particular, subsection (d):

(d) Other civil rights, especially:

In particular, also, paragraph (iii)

(iii) The right to a nationality;

One can therefore see in this section a direct cause and effect relationship between nationality and discrimination.

Revocation of citizenship on the grounds of conviction for an offense is incompatible with the spirit of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as we have seen, and is a direct breach by Canada of its international commitments pursuant to the Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness. Even when it is not on racial grounds, revocation of citizenship is a direct breach of the spirit embodied in the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination.

Also, such a revocation would go against the United Nations' efforts to improve the quality of life for stateless persons. It is therefore obvious, Mr. Speaker, that on an international level, Bill C-215 would have major negative effects and would force Canada to renege on commitments it freely agreed to by ratifying certain treaties, in particular those I referred to.

Finally, the third negative effect that I see in the implementation of Bill C-215, if it was passed in its present form, concerns criminal law. The revocation of the citizenship of a person convicted of grave breach of one of the articles of the Geneva convention would result in a different treatment, depending whether such person had committed his or her crime in Canada or elsewhere. This would result in a further punishment for the person who had acted outside Canada. This situation would be inconsistent with the Latin maxim nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto; in other words, no one should be liable to be punished more than once for the same offence. This same maxim is expressed differently in section 11 of the Criminal Code.

The revocation of citizenship is therefore foreign to our Criminal Code where a convicted person may be either imprisoned, fined or given a suspended sentence with a recommendation for probation. But nowhere is there mention of revocation of citizenship. It could be argued that such a penalty would impose a cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of section 2(b) of our Bill of rights which is found in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the principle of this bill or at least its intent is contrary to the Canadian policies in the area of citizenship and criminal law, as well as our international commitments. However, I would like to reconsider the fact that there is now a popular movement for the remembrance of what happened in the Second World War. I was not then a politician but I am conscious of course of the entirely negative impact of that war and more especially for those who experienced harsh treatment in the hands of Nazi authorities.

The whole debate dealing with the statute of limitation in Germany must necessarily be carefully followed here. This is why in spite of my serious reservations about the mechanism of Bill C-215, which if it was passed in its present form, would compel Canada to review some agreements at the international level and on the other hand, to review some basic principles, more especially the principle stating that one cannot be condemned twice for the same crime and other legislation, more particularly the immigration legislation which does not provide for such penalty and finally would compel parliament to review its basic philosophy underlying the comprehension citizenship issue, one of the most liberal with a small "l" in the world even if I have very serious reservations, I still think that because of the concern of the member and of other Canadians toward this matter of the war criminals and the fact that the memory of the atrocities committed during World War II that must be kept alive, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) I would accept, Mr. Speaker, that a motion be presented so that this bill be withdrawn and its subject matter referred to the committee on justice and legal affairs so that the members of that committee may discuss together means and mechanisms which would enable us to see to it that the lesson of the Second World War be well remembered by Canadians and that we may try to find means to avoid that these horrors be repeated once again.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part in this debate, and I begin by reiterating some of the comments of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance). I should like to remind hon. members and Canadians of the awful experience humanity has faced in the last 50 years. Also, it is good to remind people of what took place between 1939 and 1945. The abuse and cruelty some people were subjected to during those difficult years are fresh in the minds of those who participated in that conflict.

I will not deal with the legal aspect of Bill C-215 as some of my colleagues have done so already, but I should like to add another dimension in the first few words of my contribution.

The tragedies which mankind experienced all too often, Mr. Speaker, are still too fresh in the memory of a great many Canadians. However, for those of our fellow citizens who have not experienced what is a total war such as that of 1939-45, such a concept is so remote from the mind of these people that they find it difficult to truly perceive what these people who have lived through the war have endured, be they those people who lived on the continent or in England, our enemies or our allies. It is an experience, Mr. Speaker, which left a mark on all of us who have contributed in some manner or who have actually participated in that conflict and it is a story which should be regularly reminded, as I mentioned earlier, so that no one may forget the memory of these trying times humanity went through.

As French-speaking Canadians from the province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, when reference is made to Canadian citizenship we ascribe, or at least I do, a great value to a citizenship which we hold so dear to our hearts.

The purpose of this bill is to take away from the known war criminals this great privilege of going about freely posing as Canadians and enjoying Canadian citizenship. Mr. Speaker, war criminals, those who have been found or who will be found guilty of war crimes against whichever nationality, and incidentally, some 15 of them are said to live in Canada, should be denounced, they should be stripped of their Canadian citizenship so that mankind may know that once and for all there is no longer any room in this modern world for this kind of abuse, such atrocities and acts of violence.

This is even more important, Mr. Speaker, when we consider the situation throughout the world and the great temptation that certain politicians have to use violence occasionally to get what they want. In view of what goes on at the present time and since I have seen this much more directly, Mr. Speaker, for having passed the three months of the Third Assembly of the United Nations in New York, I was able to see and hear every day reports of serious incidents involving violence where people have lost their lives or been tortured in certain countries to meet the objectives of others.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, will help warn everyone, and especially those who would be tempted to use violence to serve their own interests, that you must always be ready to face the consequences of your actions. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that Germany and the German people will have no objection if their compatriots who brought so much shame on the noble German people are denounced and have to pay for their crimes.

It seems that two or three other countries have passed similar legislation to ensure that all those who are found guilty of crimes against the Jews will be punished fairly and according to the best legal practices. As I say, two or three countries have already passed similar legislation to ensure that those who fled Germany at the last minute to avoid being held responsible for their actions will be prosecuted and will serve their sentences.

Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that my interest in this legislation lies mostly in wanting to ensure that everyone will remember the terrible ills of war and the hardship that certain races or nations faced because of these conflicts. What is most important, Mr. Speaker, is that this legislation will remind us that we are always responsible for our actions and that those who have not yet been prosecuted should be as soon as possible. I understand that another of my colleagues would like to contribute to this debate, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for the time which was allotted to me.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I intend to become involved in this matter only briefly. The hon. member who introduced the bill made the point at the beginning of discussing statutory limitation, saying that statutory limitation for murder has been discussed with increasing frequency in this and other countries of the world. In other western countries almost the only question is whether murders committed during the Nazi era come under the statute of limitations. The federal government of Germany, in my opinion, has so far failed to put before the public in Canada and in other countries the facts about this particular matter.

Since in Britain and in the United States, in particular, the statute of limitations, is for the most part an unknown facet of the law, many people tend to see the expiry of that period as a general amnesty. Hardly anybody in these countries is aware that currently over 3,000 cases involving probable Nazi crimes are the subject of legal proceedings of one form or another in West Germany, and that about 4,000 cases involving investigatory proceedings are to be completed by the year 2000. Nor have Canadians and Americans been made aware of the fact that in the ten years since 1969, when the period of statutory limitation was extended from 20 to 30 years, only three offenders have been convicted. Some of the condemnation then of the Federal Republic of Germany and its statute of limitations that we hear in the west would not have been forthcoming if the federal government of Germany had done its duty and saw to it that the necessary information was made available.

I make that point particularly when our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been such a close friend of the Chancellor of Germany over the past few years, during which time, at meetings between the Prime Minister and Mr. Schmidt, the points raised this afternoon in the hon. member's bill must have been mentioned.

In the meantime, the chairman of the SPD parliamentary party, the party that has formed the government in Germany, has also joined in the debate. This man, with his attitude at a time when Stalin was committing wholesale murder, can hardly have a claim to be heard on this of all problems. He calls MPs in Germany not in favour of dispensing with the statute of limitations "injudicious". His intervention has poisoned the opinion of parliamentary parties, and the leaders of the government cannot seem to make him stop these comments which have made it, frankly, doubtful, as the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) says, whether a majority can be mustered to scrap the statute of limitations.

As a member of the official opposition, in lending some support to the hon. member for York Centre I should like to point out that I have colleagues in West Germany in a similar minded party who are included to favour the abolition of the statute of limitations, but they see themselves in the company of a man whose own standards have been called into question, which indeed prejudices their position in the matter.

I thought that in these few moments I should make the point that in fact the socialist government in Germany has not taken the steps it should and could have taken, to make this matter so much more clear cut and, therefore, make it so much easier to adopt abolition completely, which would have overcome the necessity for a bill such as the one introduced by the hon. member for York Centre. I understand that, for a change, the hon. member for York Centre has induced his government colleagues to allow the content of the bill to go to the committee. It might appear I am standing here with the possibility of talking it out, but I assure you that I have given my word to the hon. member that I will not do that. I will now sit down and allow the bill to go to the committee.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, before you call it six o'clock, and since hon. members are pretty well agreed that this course should be taken, I would move that Bill C-215 be withdrawn, that the order be discharged and that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the best procedure to follow would be an amendment to the motion and, if the hon. member agrees, I will read it, and then if he wants to put his name to it as the mover, and suggest a seconder, I would put it to the House. The motion would then be in the following form:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-215, an act respecting war criminals in Canada, be not now read a second time, but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Would that satisfy the hon. member?

Mr. Railton: Very good, and I thank you Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then I propose that the amendment be moved by Mr. Railton, seconded by Mr. Ellis—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The members present have all spoken. I guess I am the only one left who can second it. I do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland) moved:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-215, an act respecting war criminals in Canada, be not now read the second time, but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the motion as amended. Shall the motion as amended carry?

[Mr. Ellis.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly the order is discharged, the bill is withdrawn, and the subject matter is referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-29, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At five o'clock the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Herbert) had the floor.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by the clock at 5 p.m. I was talking about the Tory program of mortgage interest deductibility and I was listing some points I considered that should be brought to the attention of the population of Canada. If these points were better understood by Canadians, it might eliminate some of the popularity of this program which exists at the present time.

I had outlined several items, and it is from that point I would like to continue. For example, I turn now to the problem senior citizens will encounter with the Tory scheme. I am speaking of those senior citizens who own their own homes and have long since paid off their mortgages. Because of their age, and despite their equity positions, they will find that lending institutions will be unwilling to provide funds that would enable them to take advantage of the tax benefits in the scheme. It is well known that lending institutions are often reluctant to lend moneys to elderly people for home mortgages.

Those who have small mortgages or no mortgages at all will find themselves in the impossible position of not being able to borrow funds in order to take advantage of the Tory deductibility plan. People who can afford to increase their mortgages can use the moneys raised for other purposes, that is, to buy goods or pleasures. They can do this at the expense of the taxpayers generally, many of whom cannot afford a home and certainly cannot afford the extras that will be bought with the tax subsidized proceeds. If a person with little or no mortgage wants to take a trip around the world, that person can very easily increase his mortgage or take out a mortgage on his home and use these funds for whatever purpose he wants, perhaps to purchase a car or to finance a trip. This person can then deduct the interest on these borrowed funds and gain the benefits from the Tory plan.

Home building of the kind that would benefit from this program has always been strong. A look at the statistics would indicate that in the case of single family residences there has been no fall off in construction of this type of house in Canada, with the exception of the province of Quebec. In that province the fall off has been fairly appreciable because of political reasons. The strength in the building of this type of home would illustrate that this is not the kind of construction that needs further boosting.

The United States permits mortgage interest deductibility. A comparison with the United States shows that Canada's record of home building, on a per capita basis, is and always has been vastly superior to that in the United States. At this point I would like to cite some figures. In the ten-year period from 1967 to 1976 one can see that whilst the high in 1972 in the U.S. was some 2,379,000 homes built, the low in 1975 was 1,171,000 homes, and the average is somewhere about 1.5 million homes built per annum. In Canada for the same period the high recorded in 1976 was 273,203 homes built, and the low was 190,528 homes built in 1970, giving an average of approximately 250,000 homes built per annum. This would indicate on a rough ten for one basis—the population of the United States being approximately ten times that of the population of Canada—that home building in Canada has been substantially stronger than home building in the United States. In fact, home building in Canada on a per capita basis has been in the order of 60 per cent higher than that in the United States.

The Carter Royal Commission on Taxation said that the tax system should avoid tax concessions to particular kinds of income, that such tax concessions are always inequitable. I suggest that the Tory proposition is about as inequitable a tax system as they could come up with. Since we have been talking of comparisons between Canada and the United States, I should mention that profit on the sale of a house in Canada is free of capital gains tax. This is not so in the United States. This Tory program will probably cause some major disruptions in the financial market, especially in its initial stages.

There is one other point I wish to mention in the remaining time I have. It deals with the Tory allegations of excessive defaults in the Assisted Home Ownership Program. AHOP loans in arrears do not automatically constitute a default. As of December last year only 1.62 per cent of direct AHOP loans administered by CMHC were in arrears three months or more. One year previously the rate was 1.31 per cent. One can translate that into percentages and come up with a fairly large increase. I would guess it would amount to something in the order of 20 per cent or 25 per cent. However, the default rate is still 1.31 per cent.

The percentage for all NHA insured loans in arrears three months or more as of December 31, 1978, was 0.99 per cent, that is, less than 1 per cent. The Conservatives are making a lot of noise about this because they are able to apply the percentage of AHOP defaults against the percentage of regular defaults. If we look at the figures we will see that very little of the moneys which have been put into the insurance of mortgages has been used. In other words, the losses have been almost negligible.

The application of a percentage to AHOP defaults against regular NHA insured loan defaults will give an obviously false impression. I would suggest it would be a good thing if we used some of the large fund which has been built up from insurance moneys received by CMHC to ensure the construction of additional homes for people with low incomes.

In closing may I reiterate a point which I think is most important. As I said earlier, the average income in Quebec is $19,300 per annum for home owners compared to a figure of $22,500 in Ontario, $21,200 in Alberta, and $22,100 in British Columbia, meaning that the Albertan home owner's income is $2,000 more than that of the Quebecker, and in Ontario and British Columbia approximately $3,000 more.

As I mentioned before, 33 per cent of total mortgage interest payments are paid by those with incomes over $20,000. Since Francophones in Quebec are only approximately 45 per cent home owners compared to 69 per cent in British Columbia, 66 per cent in Ontario and 65 per cent in Alberta, the discrimination between the wealthier provinces of Alberta and British Columbia compared to the people living in Quebec must be obvious to everyone.

As I suggested earlier, it is this discrimination that I find most unjust in the Tory proposal. I would like to hear from some of the Tories how they are going to account for this attitude toward the people of Quebec who have lower incomes and who do not have as many homes on a percentage basis as in English Canada. Because of their lower incomes they are paying lower rates of income tax. Therefore, their total benefit per capita is going to be substantially less than for those in Alberta and British Columbia, the two wealthier provinces in this country.

I am not speaking against the riches of the west of this country. It is good for our country as a whole. However, when we talk so often about what is going into the province of Quebec, I suggest that the Tory scheme is going in exactly the reverse direction. I would ask them sincerely to reconsider their attitude toward the Francophone home owner in the province of Quebec.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the main subject of my remarks on this legislation, I just want to refer to the parliamentary secretary's remarks which have obviously been prepared or certainly vetted by somebody in the department of urban affairs because they were pretty urbane.

Mr. Herbert: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I prepared my own remarks.

Mr. Crosbie: If the hon. member prepared his own remarks, they are still urbane. They are not germane. As far as AHOP is concerned, the best thing this government can do is AHOP to the polls because we are tired of waiting for that crowd to put their record on the line, instead of getting up in this House with all their dreary arguments against the mortgage deductibility scheme. To see you hon. gentlemen trying to crawl through the head of a pin, trying to argue against the mortgage interest deductibility, is really remarkable.

The hon. member now pretends it is a sinister scheme against the Francophones. What he won't stoop to in order to try to hold his seat in Quebec. That shows we are likely to get 60 seats. They are worried about their seats in Quebec. The hon. member says it is a sinister plot against the Francophones that we are going to make mortgage interest deductible. Have you ever in your life heard anything more ridiculous than that statement?

The parliamentary secretary got up and he started bleating about the fact that we had taken two weeks. He bleated piteously that we had taken two weeks to discuss housing amendments in this chamber. Two weeks is not long enough to discuss housing amendments if they are serious amendments. However, I discovered that the parliamentary secretary did not know what he was talking about. It was not a big discovery. I suspected it.

I had my researcher check the record. Here it is. We have not been ten days, eight days, six days or five days. We have been merely four days discussing housing amendments. Friday, February 23, two hours, 10 minutes; Monday, February 26, all day; Wednesday, February 28, 40 measly minutes; Thursday, March 1, all day; Friday, March 2, 20 minutes. The hon. gentleman did not want us to spend 20 minutes on it. Monday, March 5, all day, and today. To date we have had three days. If you take three parts of days it gets us up to four days of debate, not two weeks. If this government cannot stand having its legislation scrutinized in this chamber for four days, it should get out of office.

Where is the minister tonight, the minister who announced all these amendments six or eight months ago? The minister announced the amendments and he is not even here to listen to our comments and learn something. He is cowering somewhere. He is worried about the Francophones being attacked badly by a mortgage interest deductibility in Quebec. That is what he is doing.

Let me just say this. Methinks the hon. parliamentary secretary doth protest too much. What is so bad about mortgage interest deductibility that we cannot have it in Canada, that the fabric of our society and the Francophone element are going to be trampled underfoot and ruined altogether if we have mortgage interest deductibility up to an amount of $5,000 per year phased in over four years with $1,000 a year municipal taxes also made deductible?

The people in my district of St. John's West want it. Those who are not home owners are renters and they want it because they are going to become home owners. They are not worried about all of these things that the hon. gentleman points out. They know they have had it in the United States for years and the social fabric has not disintegrated in that country. They also know they have had it in other countries. Let us not hear any more of these piteous Liberal whines because they did not have the courage and the audacity to bring forward this imaginative tax reform themselves. This alone is enough to win me a huge majority in St. John's West. The more Liberals that come down there fighting and attacking this, the better off we will be.

Have you ever seen a government with a majority that so mealy-mouthed its way around the House of Commons as this one? They cannot control the time of the House for some reason. It is the fault of the opposition that this bill does not come forward. It is the fault of the opposition if that bill does not come forward. It is the fault of the opposition if four days are spent on this. It is the fault of the opposition if two days are spent on that, or two weeks on something else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: What do they want? Do they want all 265 seats? Is that what they want? Well, sir, they are never going to get that. They may have come close to it in the past, but they have had it this time. I am going to leave the parliamentary secretary limp, dangling in defeat, with his 35 minutes forgotten about, because I demolished his whole argument in merely three or four minutes, and I will now come to this bill.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was once a fine institution, strong, a good housing agency. However, it has been molested. This government should be arrested for Central Mortgage molesting, just like the child molesters. It is this government that has molested CMHC. It has brought it from a high platform, from an institution that was respected till today, to the slingy, grey, dim stage that it is today, with scandal after scandal running across the country in CMHC offices, just like an attack of the measles across this country. That is what has happened by political interference by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, politically interfering and molesting CMHC. It has brought it to the position that everywhere you look there is a scandal. I am going to deal with one in my own constituency in a few minutes.

They have despoiled Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It used to be well thought of across the country, respected everywhere, but this political interference, this patronage fount, has turned it into a fount of patronage.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Crosbie: I will prove it; just wait a few minutes. The minister of state for graftology, I call him, the minister in charge of urban affairs. Now they are going to do away with urban affairs and molest it behind the scenes. They had been molesting it in public. Now they are going to do away with the department and do it quietly.

It's the ministry of state for poltroonery, Mr. Speaker, that's what it is. It's the ministry of state for political affairs. It's the ministry of state for "spoil the party friends." Every Liberal lawyer in the country has his tongue lapping out, hoping it will lap up some of those fees that they get, the legal fees and the emoluments that are given by the Liberal government which appoints them to act on CMHC mortgages.

I have given you this aphorism before, and I will repeat it: you might as well open an oyster without a knife as a lawyer's mouth without a fee. But I can tell the House that the Liberal lawyers of this country have got their mouths open. The oysters are all on this side. We cannot get a pea out of it. No way one looks at it, it is patronage gone putrid. It is dingy purse-cutting for political reasons. It is the ministry of state for purse-cutting that cut the purses out of the Canadian people in this institution. They have brought it down from a vibrant, dynamic, well-recognized, leading housing authority, to this slingy object that we see before us whenever we look at the newspaper and look at CMHC. It is not the fault of the people who work there, the permanent civil servants, Crown employees or whatever they are called. It is because of the Liberal government of this country that they have been brought to such a low estate.

Now, what makes me say that? I do not like to say that. I do not like to have to say this. What makes me say it is the fact that everywhere one looks in the country, these kinds of things are breaking out. From the Rudnicki affair—Rudnicki, the man treated shamefully by the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs—to urban transportation, to luxury hotels being financed by CMHC when there is no place for it. Anyone building a luxury hotel should be able to finance it himself through private means. There is York Place, Virginia Park in St. John's East. There is AHOP. AHOP is a living scandal, a running sore across the country. That is what AHOP is, with dingy contractors getting into CMHC and getting finances to build substandard hovels that are falling apart right across this country. They are subsidized by the Liberal government.

Mr. Olivier: Name one.

Mr. Crosbie: I am naming one now, Virginia Park, and I am going to name another one in a few minutes.

An hon. Member: Name a hundred, John.

Mr. Crosbie: There is Quigley Road, the whole thing. Everywhere one looks, the RCMP is probing here and probing there. We will not have a report until after the election, I suppose. That is what is going on with CMHC across this country. It has come to this. Even now when we come to ordinary administrative detail, CMHC has weakened. They are weakened by the interference that they have had from this government. Everyone in the government should get at least ten years as a CMHC interferer, despoilers and molesters of CMHC.

Let us look at the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, RRAP. It was introduced in 1973. This will illustrate the cynicism of this government, the crass cynicism. My God, I wish they would go to the people tomorrow so that we could get them before the public and get them out before their cynicism spoils us all.

Mr. Whiteway: Right on.

Mr. Crosbie: It was introduced in 1973 to provide federal loans and grants to assist in the improvement and repair of substandard dwellings. It was an excellent program. Loans, part of which could be forgiven, were available to home owners and landlords who owned land in a particular neighbourhood improvement area or a specially designated area of the country. It was excellent to rehabilitate present housing stock. That was in 1973. Then it is announced that there are going to be some changes. It is announced by the government because it knows there is a big demand across the country for this. The government wants to pretend it is now going to become available to everyone, no matter where they live. So, the minister made a dramatic announcement that from now on the program is going to be universal, and there are several other changes. Landlords get done in a bit. They are not going to get direct loans, and they are not going to get as much forgiveness as before. Otherwise the program is going to carry on, but it is going to be universal.

When some members of the public hear that, they naturally expect "universal" means that everyone is going to be entitled to get a RRAP home improvement loan of $10,000 with $3,750 forgiveness, no matter where he lives; that one no longer has to live in a NIP area. That is the impression given by the minister of state for urbane affairs or profane affairs.

Then our astute housing critic comes across a memorandum from R. V. Hession, who is in charge of CMHC, to the hon. minister, dated January 3. It gives the lie to what the minister has said and shows the utter depravity of this government. It is a depraved government. I hate to mention that to you, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to shock you, sir. You do not realize, sir, what you have been associating with.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Crosbie: What did Mr. Hession say to the minister? He said this:

> The 1979 capital budget is $56 million. We will need $37 million to maintain activity in the existing designated areas where work has already begun. A further $3 million will be needed to deal with areas already designated but where work has not started.

That is $40 million. He continues:

> This leaves $16 million of the 1979 budget for new initiatives.

How far will $16 million go across the great Dominion of Canada to bring the RRAP program to the rest of the housing areas of Canada? He goes on to say:

However, 68 areas have submitted final applications for designation under the 1978 rules. After the new law comes into effect, they will not need order in council designation, but they will warrant some priority attention. These 68 areas will require at least $7 million. Thus only $9 million for some 2,250 units remains for work under the terms of the new program—

So, this is not a universal program. There is enough money in 1979 for 2,250 units, outside those already committed. It is a fairly modest amount, which Mr. Hession says it is. He points out that neither the industry nor the municipal delivery system can deal with a universal program, and that in a specific sense, anyone any day of the week cannot walk into a municipal office and be served.

When the minister got this memorandum on January 3, did he come out with a release the next day to tell Canadian people this truth? He did not. He continued his deception. He continued his false impressions. He continued his falsehoods until this was brought out by our housing critic, the lady who is going to be the minister of housing in our new great administration and bring into the House the mortgage interest deductibility. Herself and our finance minister will be fighting to the death to see who introduces it first. Maybe they will do it both together.

The letter goes on and talks about the number of units we need. Over two million housing units are in need of modernization. Over a ten-year period there are 200,000 to 400,000 which need serious upgrading, units occupied by lower income people. The letter goes on to say that we can do about 20,000 units a year. So, that is ten years just for just 200,000, not to talk about the two million, the two million homes where the minister has tried to give the impression that they are going to be eligible immediately for RRAP assistance: $10,000 to repair the home and $3,750 forgiveness. That is the kind of sleevenery with which this government hopes to stay in power. Well, it is not going to work. Mr. Hession goes on in his letter to talk about recent CMHC staff cuts which would make the servicing in municipalities very, very difficult. Therefore, 1979 will need to be devoted carefully to making inroads in existing designated areas, not new areas.

This is the most astounding document ever produced to refute and show how a minister attempted to deceive parliament and the Canadian people, and the man is still in the cabinet. That gentleman is still in the Government of Canada, in the cabinet. That shows the standards the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has. When one of his ministers is revealed to be deceiving the Canadian public and parliament, he allows him to stay in his cabinet, and then has attached a ten-year plan to modernize and rehabilitate Canada's housing stock.

Mr. Hession further goes into the details. One can see here a public servant who is trying to do his job, surrounded by depravity and deception and deceit. He is trying to do his job. He sets out the problem. At page 2 of his letter he said the following:

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Accordingly, the policy of universal eligibility in urban areas has been adopted by the federal government. This will come into effect after Parliament has passed the bill—

He goes on to say:

It should be stressed that universal eligibility does not mean that anyone in Canada who feels they are in need of aid will automatically be served. At the moment, some 20,000 units are being rehabilitated annually. Rehabilitation is a complex process in which inspection, cost management, and consumer protection must all be undertaken with great care.

He goes on to point out how there is no possible way that there could be a universal program, and that they must assign priority and deal with those with the greatest needs first. He sets out three factors. I have not got the time to go into all of this. He sets out a ten-year plan to rehabilitate and modernize Canada's housing stock, following consultation with the provinces and so on.

The president of CMHC is an honest man trying to do his job. He is treading through the mire. He is treading through the muck, the worst kind of political chicanery that a government of Canada ever went through or ever put public servants through. He ends up with "this all sounds technical". It is not technical. It all sounds truthful. So, that is what we are dealing with in RRAP.

I tell the people of Newfoundland now, "You are not eligible for RRAP. They haven't got the money to give you the RRAP. It is only you people who are already in designated areas that have any chance of getting it this year. So, forget the lies that you have been told. There is no such program available to you."

Just before passing on to some incidents in my own district, I want to read this concoction from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). It was delivered on February 19, 1979 at the annual meeting of HUDAC. HUDAC? HUDAC was the minister. He was speaking of HUDAC. This is what he said at page 21. He was trying to argue that the mortgage interest deductibility policy of the Progressive Conservative party, the new policy of the new government of Canada, should not be carried into effect. He is green with envy, so he trots out a tax credit scheme. I did not see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) dancing around the country shouting, "Billions for the tax credit scheme. This is going to be $5 billion or $6 billion." No, he certainly kept his mouth shut about that one.

After talking about this great tax credit scheme, which will not make any distinction between owners and tenants because none of them are going to get it, there never will be a scheme, he said this:

To introduce any general program, however, that seeks to redistribute income for shelter purposes, requires a very substantial commitment of government funds.

This is the first peak of truthfulness we see in this speech.

As a minister of the government in power, I do not have the advantage of being able to advocate prodigality on the one hand and retrenchment and restraint on the other.

Why not? Every other minister in the government is doing it. Is this the only minister forbidden to make these little distinctions, to advocate prodigality on one hand and retrenchment on the other? But he says:

I do believe that in the near future, as soon as our economy permits—

That is a way out, Mr. Speaker, because if this crew were kept in power the economy would never permit this to be done. He went on to say:

—we should adopt a shelter allowance system that will provide assistance to home owner and tenant alike, through payment of a tax credit for shelter expenditures exceeding a certain percentage of income.

He is a wizard of weaseling, a weasel hoarding wizard of the cabinet when he can try to pretend to be introducing a great tax credit program and then say we will adopt it in the near future, as soon as our economy permits. We should adopt it so that when they are re-elected, if they are re-elected, they can say they never promised it in the first place because everybody knew the economy would never improve with them in power. That is as despicable as what that minister and his predecessors have done to what was once an excellent housing corporation. The Minister of Defence (Mr. Danson) was once the minister of state for urban affairs. The rot set in when he was there, and it has become far worse. I must say it has become even worse after the minister left. He is now Minister of National Defence, and the rot has set in there.

Now I want to come to AHOP. My friend, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), has put before the House what happened in Virginia Park and the AHOP program. He spoke about the fantastic conditions, the brick deterioration, the absolute lack of any standards of upkeep, of maintenance, of the housing that was put up in this area under AHOP by CMHC. When their inspectors had passed these inferior materials and standards, it was an insult to offer the people in Virginia Park, the low income residents there, additional loans to have their houses repaired so they would be in the state in which they should have been in the first place when the contractor sold them their homes financed by CMHC. They were going to charge them an interest rate on the loans. Well, that will not happen. They will get a far better offer than CMHC is making them before this is all over. These people have been put upon by the national housing agency which should never have permitted those units to be sold unless they were in proper condition to be sold.

It may be that private entrepreneurs can get away with it by saying, "Let the buyer beware." The private seller might be able to get away by using that old slogan, but the government cannot say "let the buyer beware" when the government is involved, and when the government has inspectors. The people of this country think that a CMHC inspector inspects and that what has been inspected is fit and proper when they buy it and assume a CMHC mortgage.

So I support my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, and I support the Virginia Park Home Owners Association when they say that CMHC should put these dwellings into proper condition no matter what it costs them, without them lending any money to these people, with no increase in their mortgages or their responsibilities. There are serious allegations that the contractor, Brenjay Construction, bribed CMHC inspectors. That is even a greater reason for this to be the case. When a contractor uses a corporation to do one job and a second corporation to do another job, and third corporation to do still another job, it is no good CMHC saying they can do nothing about it. These people now can only sue the corporation which built those homes, without the assets, and nothing left in it.

CMHC can police that, because they can say to the contractor, "You did a shobby job. You have incorporated another company, but never come to us for a mortgage loan again or mortgage financing until you have fixed up the first project." That is all they have to do. They should tell them, "Never again will you get CMHC financing until you have fixed up the situation which you have created in Virginia Park." That is all they need to do. Never mind the legalities, the legal struggle. CMHC is responsible, CMHC has to fix up the Virginia Park situation of the home owners who have been taken to the cleaners in purchasing these dwellings and assuming mortgages from CMHC, believing that CMHC had done a proper job.

It is not the old CMHC, Mr. Speaker, now that its morale is gone, with the hot-shot builders looking around their shoulders for hot-shot ideas from their political bosses. They have been ruined in every political sense of the word, and changed from a star agency to one for which we now feel sorry. They no longer seem able to administer properly even the humdrum task they have in my own district of St. John's West, in Kilbride in the Gould's. There is an instance here when in January some 150 to 250 home owners who bought AHOP homes in Kilbride suddenly got a notice from CMHC telling them that their monthly mortgage payments were increasing up to $80 a month because the municipal taxes had increased. When this was looked into, it was found that the municipal taxes had not increased at all, there had been no increase in either municipal assessment or taxes over the last three years in the St. John's metropolitan board area under which Kilbride comes.

What had happened was that originally someone got the wrong information that taxes were going to be $96 to $126 a year on these homes. When the tax bills were sent a year later for the true amount of the tax, in some cases it was $254 a year, CMHC paid the taxes to the St. John's metropolitan area board but did not pass this on to the mortgagors and did not let them know. They let it go for three years. Then, in January of 1979, they gave these home owners notice that starting April 1 they had to pay vastly increased monthly amounts on their mortgage until all the arrears in their municipal taxes, of which they knew nothing, were repaid. They told them they had to repay all the arrears this year, in 1979.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are people in straitened economic circumstances who took over these homes because of the Assisted Home Ownership Program. These are low income and lower middle income people. In some cases when the true municipal taxes are added to what they have to pay, they are no longer even eligible for the AHOP assistance because they do not have sufficient income for that. But along comes CMHC, having made this mistake—it is a mistake of the computers or a mistake in the office, but it is their mistake—and they say, "We want you to start paying on April 1 vastly increased monthly payments. We want you to pay interest on the arrears in municipal taxes that you have not known about for three years."

Think of the audacity of that, Mr. Speaker. They are telling these people, "We did not tell you about these municipal taxes, we gave you the wrong figures, we did not collect them from you, we paid them. Now we are going to charge you interest on those arrears that you owe us." These people did not know there were arrears. These are innocent mortgagors, and they want them to pay the arrears back in 12 months.

I have written to the minister today and, if he has any sense, he can give me an affirmative answer to my letter or this bill will not be going through for months yet. Never mind a week or two weeks, a month, six months. If I could save some innocent 150 home owners in Newfoundland $1 a month, I would keep this bill going for six months, and no amount of squealing by the hon. gentlemen opposite would change my course. I would filibuster within the rules of the House and I would have the House leader of the NDP advise me on the rules. I would be the first speaker to answer the government on third reading and I would go on for ten weeks, easily. I can tell you that, Mr. Speaker. I would check every house from here to Vancouver.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Another Rodriguez.

Mr. Crosbie: I have asked the minister to put off the date of April 1 because it is too soon. Every one of these people has to meet with CMHC officials and go over their accounts, have them verify them and check them with the municipal authorities, so they cannot start paying for the increase on April 1. They should forget their arrears and interest on taxes which they never knew they owed. The arrears and the interest should be forgotten about. In some cases these people should be given two years, and in other cases five years, in which to pay their arrears on taxes, depending on their income, if in fact they should pay any arrears on taxes. They are certainly going to be arguing that they should not be paying any of these arrears because they are the fault of CMHC and its administrative practices.

What has CMHC come to? It has been so overburdened by government changes of policy, by the introduction and cancellation of haphazard programs that the administrative processes of the organization, an admirable organization at one time and still capable of being so, are breaking down. Everywhere you look across the country there is a breakdown in the simple administrative processes of this important government agency, and it is hon. members opposite who have allowed and caused this to happen.

In the particular case I am talking about now there was another amusing incident, I suppose you could call it: CMHC did not pay municipal taxes on time and was assessed interest by the municipality. Then CMHC sent the bill to the people down there who I shall be asking to vote for me in a few days or a few weeks or a few months, if this government ever gets up enough guts to go to the Governor General and get a dissolution so that we can put an end to their miserable tenure. They sent bills to the tenants asking them to pay the interest the corporation had to pay to the municipality because it was late in paying its taxes. Mr. Speaker, they can forget it. They are not going to get these interest payments because CMHC did not pay the municipality on time.

There is another problem I have discovered; it is similar to that of the Virginia Park Home Owners Association. I am told now that the quality of the workmanship in these homes is atrocious. The roofs leak, there is condensation inside and outside the walls, there is water everywhere, the windows don't fit, the doors won't close, and CMHC inspectors do not want to have anything to do with it. So there is another group of AHOP homes where the people who bought them are extremely dissatisfied. In some cases the contractor took the telephones and installed them against a beaverboard wall with nothing behind it. When you dialed a few numbers on your first day in the house the telephone fell off the wall. I suppose I cannot hold the minister responsible for that although I would like to. Was he down there at the time, I wonder? This is the kind of thing that is happening.

Why should lower income people who are being assisted to own their own homes have all this happen to them? It happened to them because there was not sufficient inspection by CMHC, because they moved into the program too quickly, because they did not take enough care, because the whole administrative structure of CMHC appears to be floundering.

I have written to the minister. He will get this letter tomorrow. I am hoping his parliamentary secretary is making notes and will see that this matter is looked into. When we get into committee, when I get back here on Thursday, I hope I shall receive some kind of "billet doux" so that I can tell these people who are going to see officials of CMHC on March 19, 20 and 24 just what attitude the minister is taking. CMHC has said they cannot do these things unless directed by the government.

NIP is a program which was very much used in St. John's, Newfoundland. They took good advantage of it, and in my own district of St. John's West several NIP programs have turned out very well. There have been others in mid-town St. John's and in St. John's East. Now NIP has gone and we are to have something called Community Services. But this will come in very slowly and there is a lot of discontent across the country at the way in which the government tried to fool the governments and the municipalities with regard to the new Community Services program. They tried to pretend it would be a vast expansion of the NIP program, but it was not. They nipped the NIP program; there is not going to be as much in the Community Services program as there was in the NIP program, though there will be more in future years when this government will not be here to be accountable for its promises—or there is going to be more if we can find any money in the treasury to make sure that these promises are kept. One thing is for sure: the Liberal government will not be keeping them.

When I was getting ready for this debate I wanted to look up a quotation on housing from some kind of eminent gentleman. As hon. members know, I speak Chinese fluently. So, looking through my volumes of Chinese literature I came across this saying of Confucius—it seems to me I heard something from a confused lady on the other side of the House. I said "Confucius", not "confused".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: We are going to miss the hon. lady in the next parliament. She is not going to be here.

Mrs. Holt: You will miss me because you won't be here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Is that a threat? Anyway, the quotation reads, "The strength of a nation is derived from the integrity of its homes." Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is correct, our nation has become pretty darned weak because our homes do not have too much integrity unless we have built them ourselves and got our own money for doing it. But if we are members of the struggling working class or the lower middle class and we had to go to an AHOP housing program to get a roof over our heads, to move out of an apartment, then the integrity of our homes is very much in question. I have heard members from right across this nation, from British Columbia to Manitoba to Newfoundland, describe what is happening to their electorate under the AHOP program. No wonder there is a high rate of foreclosures in connection with that program. I am hoping I have enough time to allow me to continue.

An hon. Member: Go on!

Mr. Crosbie: The RRAP program I was discussing earlier sets a maximum of $10,000—that is all you are allowed to spend on any one home. Some months ago I suggested to the minister that $10,000 was not enough, especially in the case of an older home which needed to be renovated and repaired, and that the ceiling should be raised to $15,000. This has been the experience in St. John's.

I also drew attention to some crazy CMHC regulations having to do with certain building materials. Those regulations should be changed. I do not have the name immediately available to me but there is a building material, some kind of plaster you have to mix with water, and there is a factory here in Ottawa which manufactures it. CMHC stipulates you have to bring it to Newfoundland mixed with Ontario water; we are not allowed to mix it with Newfoundland water. So we have to pay a couple of hundred dollars in freight charges to ship this material, instead of paying $20. In other words, freight rates are about ten times as much as they should be because we have to pay to bring in a lot of Ontario water. I pointed out to the minister that there is one commodity we have a plentiful supply of in Newfoundland, and that is water. We do not need to pay freight charges on Ontario water. We get watered on enough by Ontario. I have not had an answer saying whether the regulations will be changed or not. As I say, Mr. Speaker, the maximum amount available under the program should be raised if the scheme is to be effective.

There is another program I want to talk about—the CHIP program, the "Canadians hosed by parliament" program as I call it. This is one of the home insulation programs. That is the program one of the hon. members opposite was talking about. He tried to make out that mortgage interest deductibility was somehow anti-French-Canadian. It is a funny thing, everything we do on this side is supposed to be anti-the-French-fact or anti-French-Canadian or anti-Quebec. These gentlemen who are so much in favour of national unity never stop trying to spread their poison, whether in this chamber or outside. When it came to this CHIP program, what did they do? They arranged it so that the program in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island was different from that applicable to the rest of Canada.

Did we get up and say it was an anti-French-fact program, an anti-Québécois program, an anti-bilingual program because Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia were being treated differently? We did not. We do not want to slither our way into power by playing that game. They introduced a program which discriminates against eight provinces in favour of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. If you live in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island you can get a grant to help you instal insulation in your home, but if you live in the other provinces you get a loan which you have to pay back. I do not have time to discuss all these programs.

That is what I call a discriminatory program, not a mortgage interest deductibility program that is going to apply to every householder in Canada no matter where he lives. How can that be said to be discriminatory? A program is discriminatory that lays down one set of rules for one province and a different set for the other. That is the 1977 program which has been an immeasurable failure, Mr. Speaker. You get a taxable grant of up to $350 to insulate your home, that is in eight provinces, but down in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island you get a $500 grant, non-taxable. That is discrimination. If you want to talk about whether the Québécois home owner is being discriminated against, yes, he is. This government discriminated against him because this government said, "If you want to insulate your home and you live in Quebec you are going to get $350 in a grant to help you, taxable; you have to add it to your taxable income. But, if you live in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island you are going to get a $500 grant non-taxable, not added to your taxable income, and you do not have to pay tax on it." The result of this program was that the demand was far short of expectations.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) says he has got an energy program. This is supposed to be part of it, the conservation program, this disgrace, this CHIP program. I suppose it was a chip program, Mr. Speaker. It was a gyp program, it was a gyp against the eight other provinces. We hear that the hon. gentleman wants to make energy an issue. The government wants to make energy an issue. I hope they do make energy an issue, Mr. Speaker. They will wish that they had not. I hope they make housing an issue.

So this is the sorry story that we have to speak about here tonight, Mr. Speaker, with failure after failure by this government, caused by political interference of every sort and description. We have the York Place affair in Hamilton with bribery, political intervention, cover-up, questionable lending practices, and we have not heard the last of that yet. That is in the courts and being investigated. It always takes years to investigate these. We have the hotel stories where people's money went. Imagine a government housing agency lending money to a luxury hotel, the Quai d'Orsay here in Ottawa, and on and on it goes. All the hotels we were promised were in good financial shape and they have gone bankrupt one after the other. The new Howard Johnson Hotel in Montreal, insured by CMHC, went into bankruptcy. On and on it goes, and whenever you ask the minister a question all he does is double talk.

The minister has got the most twisted mind I have ever come across, if it could be called a mind. Whatever it is, it is twisted, badly injured; it is damaged, it is a mind that has been used to molest CMHC.

There is the Cloverdale Park housing complex in Montreal where again there are a lot of low income earners, and again a lot of difficulty. CMHC is selling the complex to the private sector, and nobody knows about that until they see it in the newspaper. I have mentioned Virginia Park. I mentioned Kilbride and what happened there to 150 home owners, and the CHIP program, a disaster. Then we have the denial of civil rights to Walter Rudnicki, who was fired in 1973, a complete and utter denial of civil rights for he was successful in a lawsuit, was to be reinstated and found to be wrongfully dismissed. This government does not care about somebody being wrongfully dismissed. This government does not care about anybody's civil rights being trod on. It does not care at all.

Urban transportation—we won't even mention that because that is again political cynicism at its greatest. We have the minister letting Liberal MPs and politicians announce when loans are going to be made, or funds are going to be given to a riding, or grants under the municipal incentives grants program. No wonder—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, any housing policies should have begun, instead of after the fact legislation such as this, with objectives and premises whose projections into the future were based on a clear assessment of the present situation in which we now find ourselves. Too often I have heard objectives stated in the negative, determined from limitations and reduced expectations, in the hope that Canadians will happily settle for, not necessarily the form of shelter that they desire, but rather some limited grey matchbox shelter which this government says they should want to live in. Too often I hear politicians and bureaucrats say that the cost of land, labour, capital, and taxes makes it unrealistic to expect that most young Canadians will ever have an opportunity to own their own homes. Governments then, given this premise, began to mass produce multiple matchboxes in order to meet dwelling number targets. This process needs to be reversed.

I say to young people, "Yes, within the productive span of your life, if home ownership is your goal, and I hope that it is the goal of every young Canadian, then the opportunity for you to reach that goal will be made available to you." We are a nation of vast opportunities and a nation with all the raw materials required for the building of housing to meet this objective of young people. We have much lumber for our houses, in fact so much that we export most of it. We have iron for nails, and sand for glass and insulation, and we have skilled labour, much of which sits idly unemployed. We have all these things in a country with one of the highest per capita incomes in the world. Of course we say, "Young man, go out and build your house; build a home in which you can raise a family and help to build this country. You can do it," we say to our young people, "that is provided, of course, provincial, municipal and federal governments and bureaucracies can be cleared out of your way."

My father built his first house out of prairie sod. My grandfather built his first house out of the rocks he picked off the land before he began to cultivate it. Believe it or not, somehow my father and my grandfather managed without the help of a zoning by-law, a land-use contract, a design panel, a building permit, a certified architect, an engineer, an electrical inspector, a plumbing inspector, and a framing inspector. Somehow they even managed without underground wiring, ornamental street lighting, 66-foot paved roads and five-foot concrete sidewalks. In fact, believe it or not, they even managed to move into their homes without first obtaining an occupancy permit from the local government.

Naturally they had other hardships. As well as governments and bureaucracies to do without, they also managed to do without paying 45 per cent of their disposable income to the government in taxes. Although it has, of course, had a few wires and central heating added, my grandfather's house still stands today, a symbol of individual initiative and integrity of both those who dreamed it and those who built it, and I can assure this House that my grandfather's house will be standing long after these AHOP disasters have crumbled into dust.

I am not suggesting that we go back to those days as such, obviously not. What I am saying is that government bureaucracy and over-regulation have destroyed individual initiative, incentive, and inhibited the individual's capacity to build. Integrity and quality craftsmanship, so lacking in today's AHOP home, are not values that are necessarily dead. They are in fact taught and learned values that can be rekindled. In our time integrity and quality craftsmanship can best be ensured through the principle of builders' long-term guarantees or warranties, as opposed to expensive, sand in the gears government inspection and regulatory bureaucracies.

My colleague just spoke and said a lot of faults in AHOP housing units relate to the fact that inspection was inadequate. We would not have required that inspection if, in fact, those houses had warranties with them, and had builders who were willing to stand behind their products. That is the kind of thing we need, not more and more sand in the gears bureaucracy which requires inspection after inspection after inspection. We require builders with integrity who will provide guarantees and stand behind the houses they are building.

The expression buyer beware can be made more meaningful through consumer education in the longer term, and in the shorter term moral suasion could be used, in other words the withdrawal of funding from offenders. We have heard tales here tonight from Newfoundland and I will be telling of people in British Columbia who have built their homes, and have tried to call the builder only to find out that the builder has moved on. We need a new bankruptcy act to prevent that old shell game.

We also need measures that will strengthen buyer protection. Mortgage money could be facilitated through a mortgage exchange corporation and by allowing and encouraging insurance, trust and pension funds to expand their investment portfolios into mortgages. More disposable income could be put into the hands of buyers through mortgage deductibility. Bureaucracy could be dismantled and deregulated, and duplication of effort between governments could be negotiated out of existence. I say, "could be". Apprenticeship programs and school curriculums could be revamped to create more competent and knowledgeable craftsmen. Municipalities could be assisted in land assembly, in the financing of trunk sewer and water lines. And the list of what could be done goes on and on.

Instead of the government trying to create an environment wherein the individual is competent to buy or build his own home, an environment where individual enterprise finds incentive through removal of government barricades and the availability of capital, particularly capital from the private sector, the government continues to interfere in the market place with consistent bungling and blundering. The AHOP program has to be the most classic example.

I would like to tell hon. members of a couple of such examples which exist in my own community. I met John Godmaire of Surrey the other night just as he was preparing to take his son out to the scout troop which he leads. John took me through his house and showed me the wall between the kitchen and the living room and how that wall had pulled away from the ceiling and dropped. I have seen normal settlement to the extent of a hairline crack along the top of the plaster or which necessitated some minor adjustment to the wall, but what I saw in John's house was that the wall between the kitchen and the living room had dropped more than one inch. This house is an AHOP house, and this was only one of the problems.

In addition to the wall falling, the conduit wire leading from the electrical heating unit was drooped over the copper water pipes. This wire came down from a register through the floor and was wrapped completely around the copper water pipe tubing. The copper water pipe tubing, by the way, was wet with condensation. One does not have to be an engineer to know the danger which is inherent in that type of construction. I cannot understand how it could have happened. I cannot understand how a builder could have been so negligent, let alone it being inspected. No one could have inspected this house, because it just is not possible. The next door neighbour could not have inspected it.

Mrs. Pigott: The dog did not inspect it.

Mr. Wenman: No, the dog did not inspect it, because even a dog would have known better. The wiring which should have run through the plates and through the studs, instead was jammed in right behind the plaster board, and the plaster board was bulging out. Not only was the plaster board bulging, but it was absolutely wet from condensation. The windows were frosted over. I once lived in an older home on the prairies and I can remember waking up in the morning to find frost a half inch thick on windows, and I took it for granted that houses were built that way. But a modern house built today should not have an inch of frost on the windows, especially if it is a house located in British Columbia where the climate is not very cold and where there is very little frost.

I have documented this case and I have slides to illustrate this disaster. There was inadequate ventilation. The previous speaker talked about the phone which pulled out of the wall. In this case there was a railing going down the stairs which was merely screwed into the plaster board. There were no studs behind the screws, and the first time someone walked down these stairs they put their hand on this rail and it fell off. They were lucky they were not injured. These are little things which a contractor with any skill at all would have seen and corrected.

All John wanted for his family, Mr. Speaker, was a decent, sound, but inexpensive home in which to raise his family, and built in such a way so that he could go out at night and get involved in the community and the organizations, to work in a very good way and be the good kind of citizen his parents taught him to be. All he received, however, was a compounding debt, a depreciating investment, and shoddy, cheap and inadequate workmanship.

Mrs. Pigott: Liberal workmanship.

Mr. Wenman: Yes, Liberal workmanship, the responsibility of this government and of this minister opposite.

Mrs. Holt: Is the government also to blame if a marriage breaks up?

Mr. Wenman: I am glad that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) has put her remarks on record in my speech, because I am going to send them out to British Columbia and say, "That is the attitude this government has." That is why these houses are built in this manner, because of this kind of sarcastic, non-caring attitude. Is she intending to go out and fix this house? I invite you to come to Surrey with me and I will show you this disgrace because I would like to see what you would do about it. Will she stand up and speak—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would invite the hon. member to address himself to the Chair.

An hon. Member: Who built the house?

Mr. Wenman: Listen to the sarcastic ministers over there and let Hansard record their response.

Sheridan Myers is a railway worker in his late thirties and father of three young children. Sheridan and his wife Betty, salt-of-the earth Canadians, assumed a $39,500 mortgage plus a CMHC loan of $5,900 to buy their AHOP home in Mission, B.C. They put in a great deal of gardening, and they really worked hard and cared for their house. If one walks into that yard, they will see the loving care which went into that garden and how they tried to make that house in such a way that they could be proud of it as most Canadians want to be proud of their house. After a great deal of hard gardening and $17,000 in monthly payments, Sheridan and Betty found that CMHC was selling houses which had defaulted under AHOP next door, the same house that they had paid $39,500 for was now going for $32,000. Next month Sheridan's monthly mortgage payments will go up to $408 and then up by another $120. Unfortunately he finds himself temporarily unemployed, like thousands of other Canadians. He had great hopes for his home; then he found that his payments would be going up and his disposable income going down.

The frustration of Sheridan is undoubtedly shared by many AHOP home owners whose incomes are not rising with inflation and whose equity is falling. Up until a few months ago the Vancouver CMHC office did not have a market analysis branch, so 15 per cent of the units built between 1973 and 1978 are unsold today.

Mrs. Pigott: Would you say that again?

Mr. Wenman: It amounted to 15 per cent of the units built. It is not a one-year mistake, but they kept making it year after year and, as a result 15 per cent of the units built between 1973 and 1978 are sitting unsold.

Mrs. Pigott: Empty.

Mr. Wenman: As a result of the overbuilding and the inflationary price rise in moderately priced housing due to AHOP, people who bought an AHOP home have no equity at all despite having made payments of several thousands of dollars.

To add insult to injury, CMHC sold a house in Sheridan's development, the same type of house for which he paid $40,000, for $32,000. Two weeks later the speculator who bought the house for $32,000 sold it for $37,000. The government gave away $5,000. Fortunately, Sheridan was able to sell his house for $38,000 and get out with only a slight loss—a slight loss in dollar bills, but what kind of a loss in human and social circumstances? What kind of loss of hope for him? He took the responsible attitude. While so many others just walked out of their homes and left the government with the burden, he stayed and paid.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what is going to be done about this nightmare? The Sheridans and the Johns and thousands of others across the country are disappointed, frustrated, bitter. The builder does not seem to care. He has received his money and has probably started a new project under a new company name in order to escape the responsibility for poor workmanship. He says, "That company is now broke; we cannot guarantee your warranty or bring your house up even to the basic standards." After the fact, CMHC comes in and says there is nothing they can do because the builder is now bankrupt—or says he is. When they are told the builder is in business across the street they reply, "There is nothing we can do about that; that is a different company." The builder does not care. He is not going to do anything for them. He is not going to take that wire and unwrap it from that water pipe; he is not going to fix that rail on the wall.

What about the lender? surely the person who put up the money is concerned about the shoddy job? The lender pays little attention. He has not bothered about the risk because, if they walk out, what is the difference to him? Central Mortgage and Housing has guaranteed his risk. The person who loaned the original money does not care and is not going to put any more money in the house. When he gets his out, that is all he cares about.

Central Mortgage and Housing should care, but they cannot do anything about it. They do not really care because they can go on subsidizing with magnanimous indifference. They can subsidize again and again, pick up loss after loss, then walk out of it. What are we left with, Mr. Speaker? The person in the house has been done a serious wrong. He knows he has been wronged, and every Liberal on the other side of the House knows that the man I speak of has been wronged. Mr. Speaker, you know he has been wronged.

Mr. Lalonde: Do you?

Mr. Wenman: You are darned right. Mr. Speaker has been paying attention and he knows. If the minister has not, he should. I hope he knows, because I would not want Mr. Speaker to get caught in one of these AHOP housing deals and see it fall around him. Mr. Speaker, you had better listen. You had better pay attention.

We leave the poor Central Mortgage and Housing person—

Mrs. Pigott: And the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) laughs.

Mr. Wenman: Of course the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) laughs. He sees no injustice in this.

Mrs. Pigott: He does not care.

Mr. Wenman: He does not care. He lives in a big house. Why does he not listen to his constituents and hear some of these people cry? They do not have a bank to go to for credit. Their credit is being destroyed and they have to walk out of these houses. To appeal, they go to Central Mortgage and Housing where the poor civil servant is left holding the bag behind the desk. He hears their complaints and makes some suggestions, but the suggestions are no good because he cannot give them money or rebuild their house. He can do nothing for them. The government leaves the poor civil servant to take all the flack and all the agony of these people.

I hope that everyone sitting in an AHOP house tonight that is built in an inferior manner will hear me and go and see their member of parliament, or write to the minister or to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), inviting them to come and see their houses. I hope every one of them will do that. They should not call Central Mortgage and Housing but rather their member of parliament so that we can get some action on the floor of this House right now.

Mrs. Pigott: Call the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Wenman: Call the Minister of Justice and say, "Where is this just society?" The only just opportunity is just an opportunity to make extra payment.

An hon. Member: That is silly.

Mrs. Pigott: It wouldn't be so silly if it was you.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): You are worse than he is.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the government and the future opposition thinks I am terrible. I am mad, Mr. Speaker. I am mad as can be that these poor, honest, upright Canadians are carrying the bag for this government once again. I can tell you it is so.

An hon. Member: What nonsense.

Mr. Wenman: If the government thinks it can sweep this problem under the carpet by simply terminating the program and omitting any corrective response in this legislation—if it thinks it can get away with that, it is mistaken. Some 130,000 homes were built under the AHOP program of which perhaps 53,000 are still empty, and more are becoming empty every day as people walk out of them.

Some Canadians are still satisfied because, fortunately, within that 130,000—and not because of the government—there were some responsible builders who wanted to make sure the quality of their houses was good. They built their houses strongly and well. If some houses can be built strongly and well for $47,000 in Vancouver, there is no reason why the house next door cannot be built to the same standard for the same price.

Many thousands of builders are unhappy, and many thousands of owners in AHOP houses tonight are unhappy. Many realtors are also unhappy. Their name has been sullied because of the houses and they are now taking the flack. They are just beginning to understand the problems. The walking out is just beginning. The problem will not go away, Mr. Speaker. Corrective measures will have to be taken by this government. Who will do the repairs or finance the corrections that are required to John's home and his neighbours' homes? Will these Canadians have to learn the hard way that their fate in the Liberal government was misplaced?

I should like to quote from an interview I had with Mr. Myers when I asked him:

Is this story that you're telling me your story only or typical of all the people in this subdivision who are having the same problem?

He replied:

That's right. If I walk away from here I'm just out and I have to rent for the rest of my life or until five or six years is up and they forget about my credit.

Well, there are a lot of people who have put a lot of work in a lot of houses. You look at some of them . . . These are the people who are staying here and they are the people who are going to shoulder it and by rights we have just been taken to the cleaners.

I then asked him:

In other words, you are going to carry the mistake of the government. The government won't lose but you will.

He replied:

Yes, isn't that the way it always is?

Mr. Speaker, that is the way it always has been. That does not mean it is the way it is going to be or the way it has to be. If this government will not make the corrections in the next few days in this House, then they will have to be thrown out of office. Let this be one of the reasons that they are thrown out. Let the Johns and the Sheridans stand up and say they have had enough of this government.

Mrs. Pigott: We will make it right.

Mr. Wenman: We will make it right. We will not leave the people to carry the burden of the government.

Mrs. Pigott: We care. They do not care.

Mr. Wenman: The AHOP program was predicated on three factors, first, that inflation would assure that the value of a house would rise rapidly; second, that an individual's disposable income would increase, and third, that market demand would be such that an oversupply would not result and therefore devalue the price of AHOP homes. None of these factors turned out to be true. Inflation rose but house prices generally, and specifically AHOP house prices, dropped. The individuals' income rose but so did his taxes. The hon. member who spoke ahead of me dealt with how taxes have risen. The taxes rose, the government failed to pay them, and now the owner is supposed to pay a penalty on top. His family expenses that were supposed to be in control relative to his disposable income have increased. In fact as his family grew it probably became more expensive to keep them month after month, not less expensive. His monthly house payments increased faster and faster as his disposable income failed to increase.

Market demand for all types of housing, particularly AHOP, softened, and because AHOP was the only game in town supply outstripped demand, lowering the value of AHOPs already purchased as well as over saturating the market with a product for which there was declining demand. The odds were stacked against the Sheridans and the Johns from the beginning because they had to bet on inflation. Their purchase was predicated on factors that might not necessarily occur and that in fact that did not occur.

The Fraser Institute of Vancouver did a critical study of AHOP houses. The results were very negative, Mr. Speaker. The major drawback to the program was the fact that in many instances interest indebtedness accumulated faster than principal payments. Because of this the borrower's underlying security might be marginally in excess of his total liability.

Let me give you a specific actuarial example. I have given you first of all the humanistic example of John and Sheridan. I have told you about their individual problems, and generally how they repeated them to me. But this is how accountants look at the matter. For example, take a housing unit costing $47,000 to purchase, with a $45,115 mortgage. The borrower, at the end of the first year, would have paid $5,210.76 in monthly mortgage payments. Of that amount $361.92 would be applied to the outstanding principal, leaving a balance of $44,753.08. This would be somewhat less than the original $45,000 the borrower paid. Meanwhile an interest reduction loan would have been secured during that same period. That is where the catch comes in. An interest reduction loan of $1,080 is secured bringing his total liability at the end of the first year to $45,833.

It is hard for the man in the street to realize that he can buy a house costing $45,115 at the beginning of the year and at the end of the year, after having paid $5,200 toward it, he suddenly finds he owes more than he paid at the beginning, which was $45,833. In the second year the outstanding mortgage balance would be $44,303 while his interest reduction loan would be increased to $1,944. This now brings the total indebtedness to $46,247. Bear in mind the original cost of the house was $45,115. By the end of the fifth year the mortgage outstanding would have decreased $42,769.23 while the home owner's total liability, which included the interest reduction loan of now $3,240, would be $46,009. After five years the owners' equity in the House would in fact be less. Fiver years later, after he has paid his payments faithfully month after month, he now owes $46,009 on a house which he purchased originally for $45,115. He now wonders how that is possible.

Then comes the tragedy that this $45,000 debt has dropped in value to perhaps $32,000. If that is the case, as it was in the example I stated, the man has lost $16,000. He cannot reclaim it. He is stuck. He cannot move. All he can do is walk out, and leave the government holding the bag. At the same time he will be ruining his credit and losing hope of owning a home. We might say "Buyer Beware. He knew what he was getting into." But unfortunately Canadians do not understand the whys and wherefores of mortgages. What he got into was government deception. This situation occurs in all cases unless houses of this type appreciate in value.

This combination of rising total indebtedness with a minimum downpayment could place purchasers who are forced to sell in the untenable position of having insufficient equity to handle the transaction costs which include lawyers fees and agents costs. In other words, to get out of the situation, even if the individual walks out of the house, and tries to sell, he must still pay agents and lawyers fees over and beyond the debt he has accumulated on the housing unit.

A few years ago when housing prices were generally increasing, this was not a problem. If householders could not keep up the payments because of a change in economic circumstances, such as the loss of employment or perhaps lower than expected income increments, or perhaps they experienced a shift in social arrangements, for example, divorce or separation, these owners could just sell. But now with stable or depreciating house values in some markets, owners will have little in capital value on which to fall back.

As one builder who was delighted to sell his units by first renting them, said, "I know some of these families just have enough income to pay rent in much lower priced accommodation. There is no way they can handle the basic monthly mortgage requirement on a $47,000 home, much less all the other costs of home ownership, such as taxes, heat, water, and minimum maintenance, so I am happy to sell my units. But how the government can be a party to this is beyond me." How can the government allow someone to get so far over his head?

The combination of unsatisfactory improvements in equity and limited down payment—in Canada 86.4 per cent of AHOP purchasers secured ownership on the minimum downpayment of 5 per cent or less—left marginal purchasers with very little cushion and less opportunity for error. The hope, and for that matter their collateral, was the possibility that their homes would rise at a rate equal to or in excess of the rate by which assistance was withdrawn. Backing their trust in the future was an unwillingness to believe that anything could go wrong. People believed that somehow this government would give leadership. These people went along with the blind faith that nothing could go wrong. A program was set up on that basis. People surmised that property values would surely increase sufficiently to offset increased liabilities. One might have thought so, but practice has proven otherwise.

Again, to correct these weaknesses, the government revised the program. They have revised it so many times that not only do the home owners not know that they are doing but neither does Central Mortgage and Housing, nor this parliament, nor the minister. No one knows what is going on. The person who knows is the individual who sees his house crumbling beneath him. He is the one who sees his debt increasing, his payments increasing, and the value of his house dropping. But they do not care.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) does not care.

Mr. Wenman: Does the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) care? I hope he cares but I hear him say that he does not care. Perhaps hon. members say people should look before buying.

An hon. Member: He does care.

Mr. Wenman: He does care.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. I hope that the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott), who is the official critic for the opposition, could at least have the courtesy of not following members around as they speak just to get a few cheap political points on television.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised the hon. member did not stand up to say that he, as a Liberal, cares about these people. But he stood up to care a little bit about politics. He has just made his maiden speech. I hope the hon. member and some of the other Liberals will care enough to stand up and speak out against the problems of AHOP housing. That is the kind of standing up that is demanded in this House. Stand up for these little Canadians and show them you care.

I could talk about the problems of AHOP 1978, but I see that I am running out of time.

An hon. Member: Take all the time you want.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wenman: Listen to them over there. I say that I am running out of time, and they say good. I am pleased to hear hon. members say that, because they are worried. They know it hurts and they know I am right. They know there are thousands of people across Canada who are living in AHOP houses saying tonight, "Maybe we can get some help yet. Maybe there is some hope, and maybe things are not at a dead end." But hon. members over there do not care. The Liberals do not care.

It is evident that several families will be in a no-exit situation in these AHOP homes unless there occurs what a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation official prescribes. This is the answer of the government. This is what Central Mortgage and Housing says, "Home owners, don't worry because there may be a sudden gust of inflation or a sharp reversal of present economic trends." I do not expect there will be a sharp gust of inflation. But the official was right when he said there will be a sharp reversal of economic trends. That sharp reversal will come when the government on the other side is replaced.

For some home owners just walking away is cheaper than sticking around to try to pull out of the financial quagmire. The more vexing question is what will CMHC, as the carrier for insurance for nearly 100 per cent of these loans, do? The AHOP default rate is now running at 10 per cent and growing. What will they do with 15 per cent or 20 per cent? The minister hides the figures. I tried to get them for two years and could not. Either they did not know or they were hiding them.

If a 10 per cent default ratio is any indication of what can be expected under more severe economic conditions, CMHC will no doubt find itself with thousands of unwanted and unpaid for homes sitting on their doorstep. Since the only way to minimize this eventuality is to improve the marketability of AHOP units, they are trying to devise other items like graduated mortgage payment plans. That is just trying to buy time. It is trying to buy the people beyond an election, letting them think that they will somehow, through some magic formula, not have to pay the whole price of a house, that they can delay the payments forever, not recognizing that all it means is that their debt and interest are piling up greater and greater and they are getting further and further in. I can see the former minister smiling.

Mr. Danson: I am not smiling.

Mr. Wenman: No, he is not smiling; he is crying. He should be crying because, unfortunately, he devised the program. I hope he is crying as he is listening to this speech. If he is crying, it may be that he cares a little bit, and that is what Canadians want to see from that side of the House, a little bit of caring, a little bit of correction.

What are they going to recommend now? Who is going to rebuild these houses. Who will finance them? Will they do something constructive like set up a bit of a fund and allow the people to repair their own homes to bring them up to a minimum, not maximum, CMHC standard? Will you give John Godmaire enough just to correct the mistakes the CMHC inspector did not see? Will you let him pay an electrician to come in and take the electric wire that is wrapped around the copper pipe with the water dripping from it, and change it so that his family can be safe and the house will not burn to the ground with the family in it? Will you do that little bit?

Don't just sit there shouting at me to tell you what to do. I am giving you some ideas. Where are your ideas? What are you going to do? You created all of these AHOP problems; how are you going to get us out of them? Don't delay the graduated mortgage program. Don't wait for a gust of inflation. Let's not keep hoping on the false premise that destroyed the program. It has not worked. Do not keep hoping that some day there will be a reversal and one day they will come through.

Don't just shove this program under the carpet. Don't just tell the people not to worry because we do not have AHOP any more and, therefore, there will be no more AHOP mistakes. That is what we keep assuring the people. What about the 130,000 homes already built? What about the 53,000 unoccupied? What are you going to do with them? What are you going to do for these people?

I agree with the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) that this bill should not go through this House until the government has come up with a method to help these people who have been cheated and deceived by this government, and who are receiving inferior workmanship and craftsmanship. I do not ask you to rebuild the houses. Just work a little bit on the ventilation and the heating.

Just give these people a little assistance and they will stay in their homes. In spite of the mistakes that have been made by the government, they will stay in them. They will care. Stop the roof from leaking and they will stay in the home. They would make the repairs, but they do not have the money to do it. The reason is that their monthly payment is going up this month to a rate they cannot afford because their disposable income did not reach that much this month.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired.

Mr. Wenman: I would ask for unanimous consent to continue because this tragedy is continuing in this land.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. After consultation, there seems to be agreement on three very specific points. First, it is felt the debate on second reading on Bill C-29 is over; second, the motion for second reading will not be put tonight; and third, calling it ten o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions to this effect. We think it would be all right to go along.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, we agree that would be a reasonable course.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Am I to understand that I am not putting the question tonight but calling it ten o'clock, that it is agreed and ordered that the next time this order is brought before the House, the question will be put immediately on second reading? Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

[Mr. Wenman.]

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: As the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) is on his way to the House and is not here yet, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is here, in view of the hour I ask for the unanimous consent to proceed with the third motion, that in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, and then come back to the others after. While I was speaking, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Central Nova came in so we can proceed with the first.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL REVENUE—REASON DETAILED INCOME TAX RETURNS PLACED IN CUSTODY OF STATISTICS CANADA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, as far as the response to my question regarding the Statistics Canada matter on February 23 was concerned, the minister stated at that time "our files are kept in strictest confidence". That may be true if you conveniently forget the fact that there is an ongoing responsibility for the files and the data under Section 23 of the Statistics Act, and while the minister in charge of Statistics Canada has acknowledged this from the beginning, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) seems more concerned with trying to evade his responsibility which is clearly set out in Section 23 of the Statistics Act.

The Minister of National Revenue should keep in mind that it is not that long ago that radio personalities were able to extract taxpayers' information from computers under the control of his department. Others share my misgivings, including the prestigious and respected Edmonton Journal which, in an editorial only a few days ago, made the following comment:

> The prospect of Tory MP Elmer MacKay rooting through confidential government documents probably gives the Trudeau government nightmares.
> What he found last week in the basement of a Statistics Canada office building ought to give us all a nightmare: 60 cardboard boxes full of tax returns and other documents, all marked "Confidential—to be destroyed."—
> Industry Minister Jack Horner's observation in the House of Commons that "(Statistics) are taken and collected under the strictest and most confidential methods possible" may be quite correct. It's what happens later that has us worried.
> Deputy Prime Minister Allan MacEachen's promise to investigate the incident was vital, as will be the government's assurances that Mr. MacKay's discovery revealed an isolated lapse of security that will not be repeated.

● (2150)

Canadians are concerned about Statistics Canada's incessant demands for information, its legal right to compel responses and the expanding use of social insurance numbers for identification. Proper guarantees of confidentiality are timely and a prerequisite if this information-gathering system is to continue to function.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) has another responsibility. I am quoting from the Statistics Act, Section 23:

For the purposes of this act . . . the Minister of National Revenue shall cause to be sent to the Chief Statistician returns of imports and exports into and from Canada and details of the means of transportation used therefor, in such manner and at such times as the governor in council may prescribe upon the recommendation of the minister and the Minister of National Revenue.

I think it is important that the Minister of National Revenue, who is obviously making attempts to establish himself as a cutting and controversial figure, as evidenced by the memos he writes to himself, is spending more time trying to play Tiny Tim to his seatmate Burt Reynolds that in trying to get to the bottom of some of these difficulties mentioned in the Edmonton Journal. It is obvious, when you look at the data which has been supplied to the then minister over the years, that there has been an ongoing lapse of responsibility not, I suggest, as it has turned out, by the incumbent as far as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is concerned but basically by the personnel and indirectly by the minister responsible for Statistics Canada.

I have here a report sent to the then minister some years ago by a man who is still, I believe, in the employ of Statistics Canada. It is a very comprehensive report and it deals with the types of security procedure which have been found so wanting recently. It talks about the storage and security of mental health statistics documents, it deals with the question of whether security precautions are necessary, it covers several pages, and I intend to make it available to the minister so that he can endeavour to find out what happened to this document which was submitted on August 22, 1966, outlining the same conditions as are causing Canadians such concern today.

This situation did not arise yesterday. Mental health records which are demanded by Statistics Canada are another matter of great concern, probably of even greater concern, on balance, than income tax information. I want to talk about the situation in which a letter was sent to a former minister, Jean-Luc Pepin. It stated that cards dating back to at least 1931 had been kept in an unlocked, unguarded room. This is in the same building as the forms I came across were in. They were piled helter skelter, freely available for inspection by any citizen. More recent cards have been stored in unlocked filing cabinets.

In 1968 the health and welfare division of DBS moved to No. 5 temporary building, the letter goes on to say. Some mental morbidity cards were stored in a room even though a vault was available a few feet away. More current cards were kept, as before, in unlocked filing cabinets. The door to room 2141 was kept open. A few flimsy cardboard boxes, lids open and containing notifiable cards, were also kept in this room. The question is, what has been done and what is the Minister of National Revenue going to do to exercise his responsibilities under the act. I see you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker. Has my time expired?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, as the minister reminded hon. members this afternoon, under the law Statistics Canada must have access to tax returns and the underlying principle of that requirement should be easily understandable.

In our system of government, Statistics Canada is the agency responsible for gathering and publishing statistical information on all aspects of Canadian society. The federal government, provincial governments and the private sector need reliable information on hundreds of aspects of our society.

The most important measure for a society is no doubt its income and the distribution of that income. Personal and corporate income tax forms sent to National Revenue for tax purposes are the best and most reliable source of information on incomes. If Statistics Canada were forbidden access to those returns, that agency would have to make major and costly surveys to gather the same information once again.

The general principle of the Statistics Act and even of the Income Tax Act is that an individual's business is his own business. If an individual has to provide information for tax or statistical purposes, the government must make sure that information is not made public.

On the other hand, governments and other organizations need over-all revenue information developed by the statistics system from income tax returns.

Therefore, parliament in its wisdom specifically provided that:

The chief statistician or a person so authorized by him may examine all reports, certificates, statements, documents or other records obtained for the Minister of National Revenue for the purposes of the Income Tax Act.

But since parliament also had a concern for the confidentiality of information submitted to Statistics Canada, it provided further that such information, when communicated to Statistics Canada, are subject to the same security rules as applied when they are collected.

Clearly, Statistics Canada employees must comply with the drastic confidentiality rules set under the National Revenue Act, which sets up penalties for officials or authorized persons who knowingly communicate or allow to be communicated information obtained for the purposes of the National Revenue Act.

For this reason Statistics Canada only publishes information on group revenues, without disclosing individuals' fiscal information. Those are legal provisions set forth in the National Revenue Act and the Statistics Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

POST OFFICE—STEPS TO IMPROVE DOOR TO DOOR DELIVERY

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I asked a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) on door to door mail delivery, a problem which in the last two or three years has become a festering sore for myself and my constituents. I must say that the Postmaster General has been very understanding and very supportive on this point. I am glad to see in the House tonight my good friend and colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General (Mr. Collenette), to respond to my question.

● (2200)

Essentially the answer was that there is the problem of restraint in government spending, as we have been told before. We all appreciate this, and we all support the concept of government restraint. But in this case the problem is somewhat different from any other. It is the question of a basic service that is not being provided to some Canadians. Also, there is the question of reallocation within particular departments. In this case it is the Post Office budget. Perhaps these things are not easy, but they are not impossible.

This situation is a rather unfortunate one in a number of ways. The business of not providing door to door mail delivery to some people, when the majority in the same area or neighbourhood are receiving this service, must be called discriminatory. In fact these people are making contributions to society. They are paying their taxes through the same tax system, but they are not receiving the same services which their neighbours receive who, in many cases, are just across the road. This is unfortunate in a time when we are concerned about the high unemployment rate, and when there are many, many programs at great expense to create employment, sometimes with difficulty. This is a natural situation in which to help the employment situation with the hiring of more letter carriers. This type of work is considered regular in our society. It would not be a short-term artificial creation of jobs through job creation programs. Also, there is a general feeling about the postal service these days. Admittedly there have been many problems, but in the case of door to door delivery it is an area which can be remedied easily.

I am informed the total cost would be approximately $24 million to hire enough extra letter carriers across the country to provide service for everyone. That may seem like a lot of money in individual terms, but it is relatively modest and not a large sum in terms of total government spending which amounts at the federal level to somewhat over $50 billion. There are a number of areas of possible savings. Many job creation programs come under the Department of Employment and Immigration. Of course they could be rearranged to provide some or all of this money. Something unusual which happened recently in government programs—and coincidentally the amount of money would be the same—was the proposal to provide perhaps $18 million to $20 million for professional NHL hockey arenas. It seems that is not a matter of very high priority, certainly not compared to providing regular mail service.

All these matters would apply especially to constituencies like Halton. It is a typical suburban riding with a great many new addresses, subdivisions, and people upset about not receiving door to door mail delivery. The people of Halton voluntarily and good naturedly gave up the government job creation program, Canada Works, with the idea that it was not needed there as much as in some other areas. Yet, door to door mail delivery is an area of particular need. Other members of parliament have expressed this concern and have suggested remedies.

I feel justified in speaking at this time during adjournment debate because I have spoken at all levels: in this House, at various caucuses, and so on. We are at the point where something must be done. At this time of year there are more complaints because of the weather, the breaking up of winter. This is particularly difficult for old people and young children. For example, today I received a complaint from a constituent who said, "If we cannot get this kind of help, at least let's make the most of the situation."

Could some level of government perhaps not provide platforms, catwalks, wastebaskets and this type of thing until we can hire more letter carriers? The Postmaster General in his answer to me said this was a matter of high priority for him, and it was simply a matter now of money. He said it was up to the Treasury Board and the cabinet, and people are becoming very impatient, with good reason, some having waited up to two years. Some MPs suggest even longer. I think now it is time to stop talking about it, and time to act. I hope the parliamentary secretary can help in this respect. I hope the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) takes particular note.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) for his concern in respect of this particular matter. I am not sure my answer this evening will do anything to allay his fears. In a sense he answered the question in his own statement. I am not sure what encouraging words I can give.

It is well-known that suburban areas in this country have expanded rapidly in the last three or four years, and generally in these new developments there are alternative services to door to door delivery. These services take the form of group boxes or general delivery. Therefore, the people living in these area like Halton are not without mail service, they merely have a different form of the service. It is obviously not the best service that we could hope for, but certainly it is the best possible service the Post Office can provide at this point in time while the Post Office takes steps to make improvements which Canadians in the rest of the country desire.

Though it is not possible to make any definite announcements at this time, the Post Office is looking carefully at those areas in Canada which are most affected by the restraint on door to door delivery with a view to providing whatever service we can, best suited to each community. The Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) is not insensitive to the hon. member's respresentations or those of his colleagues, the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne), the Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott), the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson), the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell), and others from the metropolitan Toronto area. There are many in the suburban fringes of Toronto who are faced with the same problem as the hon. member for Halton. Perhaps it is most acute in Halton, but it is something about which the Postmaster General is most concerned.

The problem the hon. member raised is one which I know the minister is looking at most seriously. We are trying to juggle resources in order to come up with some effective compromises. There are Canadians right across the country, not just in the metropolitan Toronto area, who do not have door to door service. The minister has mentioned on several occasions that the policy is national in scope and affects the ridings of many hon. members. I am sure the hon. member for Halton appreciates, as do most Ontario members in this House, that individual regions cannot necessarily be treated individually. One must have a national policy and apply it right across the board. All members are familiar with the restraint program of the government which affects the expenditures of all departments. In the Post Office, unfortunately, it is most visible, because door to door delivery in areas which are beyond existing letter carrier routes are the services which are affected.

I would like to assure the hon. member that the government has been exploring ways and means by which to provide this very visible service, as it does affect every riding in the country. There are no funds available at this time, but the Postmaster General is taking the matter up with his colleagues, and hopefully something can be done to improve the situation in the very near future.

POST OFFICE—EFFECT OF CUTBACKS ON MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the question I asked on March 1 is very similar to the question asked by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook). I put it to the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) in the following terms:

In every city in Canada there are tens of thousands of people living in newly built areas in the suburbs who do not get door to door delivery. Some of them have been waiting for three or four years.

I urged the minister to use his influence to try to persuade the government to allow him to hire people to deliver on a door to door basis; perhaps the 1,850 employees by which he proposes to reduce the number of employees in the Post Office department in the coming year.

The minister's answer to me was very much like the answer he has given other hon. members. He said as reported at page 3711 of Hansard:

—I am aware of the fact that many growing areas, especially suburban areas, are without door to door service. I am also aware that in Scarborough, Calgary and other areas there is restraint in door to door delivery. I can assure the hon. member, as I said before, that as soon as money is available it will be my top priority in these urban areas to give Canadians door to door delivery.

I am not satisfied with the answer which the minister gave to me or the answer which was given to the hon. member for Halton by the parliamentary secretary. The fact is that there are tens of thousands of homes across the country in suburban areas which are not getting door to door delivery. I have been told that in the city of Edmonton there are 35,000 homes which are not getting door to door delivery. In the city of Calgary there are apparently 18,000 homes which are not getting door to door delivery. In my city of Winnipeg there are between 7,000 homes and 8,000 homes which are not getting door to door mail delivery. I do not have the figures for other major cities such as Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, Halifax or Dartmouth, but I am sure that we are talking of several hundreds of thousands of homes. The people who have purchased homes in the newer areas of cities, not just my city of Winnipeg, but in every city across Canada, pay substantial amounts of money for those homes. In the last few years these people have probably paid more money than people who purchased homes in the older parts of cities. I do not believe that the people living in the newer parts of the cities should be considered as second-class citizens, but that is how they are being treated as a result of this phony policy of restraint of this government.

The parliamentary secretary and the minister have said that these people have service because they have the boxes. I wish the parliamentary secretary would come to Winnipeg in November, December, January or February, because he would see the kinds of conditions which these people must put up with, the minus 30 degree temperatures, three feet of snow, and a 25 or 30 mile an hour wind. Going to the boxes for the mail is no easy chore.

There are also the cases where these people receive registered letters and, as a result, must trot down to some post office which often closes at 3.30 in the afternoon and, as it frequently happens, both the husband and the wife are working from eight in the morning to four in the afternoon. When there is a parcel these people with boxes often travel three, four or five miles in order to get it from some regional post office.

The parliamentary secretary in reply to the hon. member for Halton said that the people in Halton were not the only people adversely affected, and he is right. He said that this freeze was part of a national policy. I want to say to the parliamentary secretary that a national policy which provides for a freeze on the hiring of letter carriers after tens of thousands of people have moved into these newer areas is dead wrong. I do not accept, nor will I ever accept, that there are people in this country who must be treated as second-class and third-class citizens.

The hon. member for Halton said that it would cost $20 million to provide letter carrier service for all the urban areas in Canada. I do not know if that figure is correct, but I intend to pursue that matter in the committee which deals with the estimates of the Post Office. However, the parliamentary secretary knows, as do myself and the hon. member for Halton, that there are many ways in which the government can save money if it must, but one of the worst ways of saving money would be not to expand the letter carrier service. I think that the people in the suburban areas, some of whom have waited as long as four years for letter carrier service, have waited too long, and I call upon the government to rescind the freeze order on the provision of letter carrier service, and to provide the people of these new areas with the same service as other urban citizens are getting from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I was quite prepared to answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) on an entirely different matter. I assumed that he was raising this evening the question which he brought up last night at the transport committee meeting about the 136 letters which were addressed to NDP members and which took some time in arriving at their destination. The hon. member has not pursued that matter, but has reiterated some of the points which the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) has made.

Mr. Orlikow: Which I made on March 1.

Mr. Collenette: Looking through the record I see that on February 22, I answered a similar question in response to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). It is quite apparent that there is a different approach to this from the three major parties in the House. My colleague from Halton was most reasonable in talking about the problem and understood the constraints upon the system. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) spoke on this a couple of weeks ago. The Conservative party talks restraint, but when it comes down to the crunch it starts talking about deficits and providing mail service, notwithstanding the restraint program of the government. This clearly shows where the real sentiments of the Conservative party lie.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we have the hon. member for Winnipeg North giving the NDP view. The NDP view is—it is the classic NDP approach—that because we have a restraint program and because we recognize that not all people are getting the same quality of service, some are automatically second class citizens. That is the way the NDP gets votes across this country—by creating class division. That is an approach that I completely reject, but it is typical of the New Democratic Party. They do not recognize that there is a certain limit to the financial resources of the country. During the minority government of 1972-1974, the NDP pushed the government into all kinds of costly programs from which we are now extricating ourselves.

I think the hon. member would do a much better service to the cause of providing adequate mail service and letter carrier service across the country if he would adopt the moderate approach taken by my colleagues on this side of the House, especially that of the hon. member for Halton, who recognizes the constraints on government spending. He recognizes that these are difficult economic times and there is not enough money to pay for all the services we would like.

We have been cutting back in health, in transportation, and in mail service. Since 1975 there has been constraint on the letter carrier service. It has been applied fairly and equally across the country. It is a shame that people on one side of a street in a settled part of a city like Winnipeg, and certainly Toronto, have door to door delivery, while people on the other side of the street have to go to the box.

Governing the country is a difficult business, Mr. Speaker. All kinds of interests have to be reconciled. The one solution of the NDP is to throw money around. There are a lot more services that I would support if we had the money—pension increases, for instance. I notice that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is in the House. There are priorities, and we have to decide where to put our money. The Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) realizes that proper mail service is fundamental, but he is operating within the general constraints of the financial restraint program. There are social programs and other programs of the government which certainly deserve the money equally, or perhaps more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.19 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ROLE OF PRESIDENT CARTER IN PEACE TALKS BETWEEN EGYPT AND ISRAEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have already discussed this matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I hope the House will give its unanimous approval. I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

With Canadians being dedicated to the achievement of international peace, I move:

That this House commends United States President Carter for his courageous initiative in going personally to Egypt and Israel in his continuing endeavour to bring about peace between these two countries, and supporting his objectives, expresses the hope that through his unusual and statesmanlike endeavours a just and lasting peace will have been achieved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In order for this motion to be presented at this time pursuant to Standing Order 43 the unanimous consent of the House would be required. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion by Mr. Diefenbaker, seconded by Mr. Jamieson. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS

EMPLOYEES' PENSION FUNDS HELD BY CORPORATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my motion under Standing Order 43 involves a matter of great urgency and has reference to orders in council of this government which permit Canadian corporations to alter the basis of pension funding by employers in this country by increasing assumed interest rates, thereby permitting a reduction of their liabilities to their own pension funds.

The Canadian Railways Employees Pension Association yesterday brought this urgent matter before a committee of the other place, and keeping in mind that the matter of integrity of pensions is one of the most important issues facing the country today, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Finance, or both, on motions, before the dissolution of this parliament make a statement explaining and justifying, if they can, the situation which does not require Canadian corporations to show on their balance sheets the very substantial sums of money owed to their employees' pension funds, and to explain, for the benefit of the House and the country, the justification for the substantially different approach taken since 1966 involving the procedures of the Pension Benefit Standards Act and regulations.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

SECURITY OF OIL SUPPLIES FOR EASTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter or urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the current uncertainty of oil supplies for Newfoundland and other parts of eastern Canada, coupled with the recent experience of Canada being held to ransom by multinational oil corporations like Exxon, and the prospect of the Canadian government importing oil directly from Mexico and Venezuela, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House instruct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to have Petro-Canada purchase the Come-By-Chance oil refinery so that Canadians in eastern Canada can be confident of adequate supplies of petroleum products at a reasonable price.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SPORTS

REQUEST THAT MINISTER LIQUIDATE DEFICIT OF CANADIAN ALPINE SKI ASSOCIATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that the "C" team of the Canadian Alpine Ski Association is asking for $2,000 and $1,500 from the athletes to make up the deficit incurred by that association; considering that under the Loto Canada contract the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) has made Canadians lose $15 million; considering that the same minister refuses to pay the $35,000 deficit of the Canadian Ski Association and that it is unacceptable to lay the burden of that deficit on the athletes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That parliament enjoin the minister to pay $35,000 to the Alpine Ski Association and free the athletes so as to enable them to concentrate on sports.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion cannot be presented without unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PUBLICATIONS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO MONCTON NEWSPAPER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the Department of Secretary of State agreed to grant, directly or indirectly, the sum of $215,000 for aid in the financial situation of L'Évangeline newspaper in Moncton, and whereas other newspapers in Canada have not been so favoured, and whereas such financial assistance leaves some doubt as to possible government interference with the freedom of the press and the free enterprise system generally, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher):

That this House strongly object to such action and request the Secretary of State to reconsider this move in light of strong opposition to this type of grant to newspapers.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TOURISM

REQUEST THAT SECRETARIAT BE ESTABLISHED TO PROMOTE TOURISM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask leave to move the following motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given that our international travel account for the fourth quarter of 1978 reflected a higher deficit in the amount of $351 million, an increase of 7.3 per cent over the previous year, and considering the tremendous potential in attracting more tourists from the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the government take urgent and necessary action to combat the amount in travel deficit and announce the establishment of a secretariat for tourism, and implement some form of controlled deregulation vis-à-vis airlines' operations to Canada in order to encourage an increased flow of visitors to Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

LACK OF OBJECTIVITY IN REPORT ON OPENING SPEECH IN QUEBEC NATIONAL ASSEMBLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to an urgent matter of national import.

It relates to the unfair and, I think, poorly balanced broadcast the CBC gave of the inaugural speech yesterday before the National Assembly of Quebec. As hon. members know, the French network of the CBC fully covered the Quebec premier's speech but refused to extend the same privilege to the leaders of the opposition parties. The House will recall that the CBC had also given poor coverage to the Progressive Conservative convention nearly a year ago. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras):

That the House urge the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to appear before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts and to explain its attitude.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be put only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO REDUCE CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I will put my question to the Prime Minister. It touches on the record current account deficit which was run up in 1978, and the record fourth quarter deficit of last year.

Would the Prime Minister indicate whether he feels that this is a satisfactory performance for Canada and, if not, what does he propose to do to rectify this huge deficit?

● (1415)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am advised that the Minister of Finance is presently attending IMF meetings in Washington and that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is addressing the Canadian Society of Mechanical Engineers in Toronto. I will be very happy to take notice of the question.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not know where the Prime Minister has been since the last quarter of last year: surely he knew we were running up a current account deficit. The point is that it is $700 million higher than anybody expected. Last year the Prime Minister said we were a healthy economy in a difficult world, but it turns out that we are in difficulty and we have a healthy world around us.

Mr. Jamieson: Oh, come on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: In view of the fact that 80 per cent of the current account deficit is made up of interest and dividends going out of the country, does that not at least alarm the Prime Minister? If so, will he speak to the Minister of Finance and suggest that he take certain other measures rather than this continuing borrowing of foreign funds that will only aggravate our problem?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, now the suggestion is that I speak to the Minister of Finance. That is exactly what I said in answer to the first question, that I will speak to him about the hon. member's concern.

As to the preface, to the effect that it was much higher than expected, I would remind the hon. member that he and his leader were suggesting a deficit of some $18 billion for the current year. They were merely $6 billion or $7 billion off.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe it. The Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I cannot believe it either, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: I am referring to the current account deficit that arises with the rest of the world, and the Prime Minister is talking about a budgetary deficit within Canada.

Mr. Clark: He does not know the difference.

Mr. Stevens: I will come back to the current account deficit, Mr. Speaker. Some $2 billion of capital has gone out of the country in the last year. That represents possibly 40,000 homes that could have been financed with that kind of money. Is the Prime Minister aware of that, and will he at least try to do something about the exodus of capital from the country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I told the hon. member that I had not seen these figures and that I was going to discuss them with the Minister of Finance who is at IMF meetings in Washington.

As to the hon. member's disbelief, all I was indicating was that in the estimates of our cash requirements they were exaggerating by $6 billion or $7 billion, and therefore they are not reliable, this opposition, when they are talking figures.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, my question is to that tame pussycat, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth.

TOURISM

CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, following up on the question asked by my colleague, I wonder if in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance I can ask the Prime Minister a question on a subject that he does know something about, which is travel.

The fact is that the current account deficits show a one billion, 700 million dollars shortfall on travel. This is the highest record ever, in any year. Could the Prime Minister indicate why the government has been unable to grapple with this problem?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we do not have export controls or exchange controls in this country. Canadians are free to travel to any part of the world that they want. The hon. member and his leader have made that kind of choice, and we are not going to criticize it.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Let me put one simple question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Tourist Association of Canada has repeatedly asked to have expense deductibility restored in the United States so that Americans can deduct their convention expenses when they come here, surely this would be of tremendous benefit to offset this deficit.

Why does the Canadian government consistently refuse to raise this problem with the United States government? The Prime Minister has just returned from the United States.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was asking about Canadian travel abroad. Now he has switched his question—

An hon. Member: No, your travel abroad.

Mr. Trudeau: —and he is talking about Americans travelling in Canada. To compound his own confusion, he says we have always refused to raise this question with the United States. I raised it personally with the President, and other ministers have raised it. The Americans know our concern. It is a matter of—

An hon. Member: What did he say?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Carter said he understood our point of view perfectly.

Mr. Jamieson: And he has been trying to change it.

Mr. Trudeau: Even the opposition would know that the President of the United States cannot have Congress vote the way he would like it to every time.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

STEPS TO PREVENT PROFITEERING THROUGH FOOD PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I will try again. My question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and it concerns high food prices which the AIB said went up by some 21 per cent last year. This is based on information made available this morning that profits for Loblaws last year went up by some 39 per cent and that profits for Loeb last year went up by 34 per cent.

Since the National Commission on Inflation has no power to roll back high and excessive prices, what is the minister going to do to make sure that companies making these huge profits are not gouging Canadian consumers?

[Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth).]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wants simplistic solutions to very complex problems. In the motion put before the House last week, they were suggesting we return to controls. But I would put to the hon. member and to members of his party that if he wants the power to roll back, does he also want the power to roll back costs, including wages?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, wages in this country have already been rolled back and workers are making less this year than they were last year, in terms of real dollars.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Nine per cent versus six per cent.

Mr. Nystrom: I would like to ask the minister, who is always looking into things, about the following. Nine days ago he took notice of a question from my leader about the price of flour in this country. It was based on the fact that a 5 ½ pound bag of flour went up by some 41 cents, while the subsidy the minister in charge of the Wheat Board took away was worth only 22 cents. He said he would look into why there was such an excessive—almost double—mark-up. What are the results of his investigation? He has had nine days to do something: surely to God that is long enough.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as with several other questions that were put to me by the NDP about detailed price questions, I have prepared answers and I have sent them to members of the NDP, in many cases by mail because they were too long to give in this House. I sent one a few days ago respecting steel, and there was one a few weeks ago on another subject; I think it was with respect to lumber. There is one in preparation, which will go out very shortly, on the question of flour and bread.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the House has the right to know the answers to questions we are posing. I will try once more.

The organization call CSIP, which is now dead, reported a few months ago that the profits for beverage companies were excessively high, yet we notice in the press this morning that beer companies in Quebec have raised the price of beer by 9 per cent across the board.

I ask the minister, what will he do about this in view of the fact their profits are excessively high? Will the minister look into the possibility of price fixing, since three of the largest companies announced price increases at precisely the same time?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, we have under way several investigations with respect to price fixing and other infractions under the combines act. These are being pursued by the director of investigation under the combines act and charges are being laid from time to time.

With respect to the other matter that the hon. member mentioned concerning allegations with respect to profits, as I mentioned in my remarks last week, much depends on the base upon which you start. There is no doubt in my mind that profits in many areas of the food industry were very low in 1976, so an increase in profits in some cases is warranted. The AIB, which studied profit margins in the food industry last summer and again in the fall, pointed out very strongly that the profit margins were quite in accord with historic norms and were not out of line.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POLICY ON CAPELIN FISHING

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. On November 22, 1978 the minister announced that for conservation purposes capelin would no longer be fished in the North Atlantic. At the same time he announced a new study and review of the question of stocks this month. Could the minister tell us whether he intends to announce his new policy concerning capelin fishing in 1979?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): I hope, Mr. Speaker, that following the meeting taking place today in Montreal we will be able to announce our overall policy; however, I can already indicate that scientists are in favour of setting low quotas and that offshore fishing will be first affected. Whenever possible, quotas will be attributed to inshore fishermen. In this regard, I must remind the hon. member that a good deal of the capelin fishing is done outside the 200-mile limit and that we therefore need the international co-operation on which we seem to be able to rely for the time being.

INQUIRY WHETHER QUOTAS WILL BE INCREASED FOR CANADIAN FISHERMEN

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that the reduction in catches was attributable instead to excessive fishing by the Russian fleet, could the minister advise the House whether the quotas for Canadian fishermen will be increased, as this is a type of fishing which can be exploited on this side of the Atlantic and which could be of benefit to us in Canada?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I can accept the hon. member's premise that the damage to our fish stocks is due to only one country. Undoubtedly there exist other factors about which we are not yet sufficiently informed, including the events which have affected capelin stocks and which have not yet been accounted for. Because of this situation we have taken precautionary measures by reducing quotas as much as possible for the current year. But I repeat that stocks will be reserved first for coastal fishermen.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

INTRODUCTION AND DISPOSITION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I ask it of him as he is the clear authority on dates in this House. I tried to get the information from other ministers, without success.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to tell the House that he will see that there is brought into this House before the final days of this parliament a bill dealing with freedom of information? Is he prepared to agree that it should go to committee of the whole, with a free vote, in the hope that what might be a defective bill will be improved and the somewhat tarnished legislative record can be brightened by a good bill being passed in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Deputy Prime Minister that the status of this bill is such that we could bring into the House fairly soon. I hope the hon. member will be patient for a little while longer.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, having been patient for several years, I can be patient for a couple more weeks. Can the Prime Minister assure us that the bill will be brought in before parliament ends, and that it is not his wish to avoid its being introduced because of the various political skeletons in the closet of the PMO?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ROLE OF CANADA IN SECURING PEACE IN MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It follows on the motion successfully introduced a few moments ago by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

May I ask the minister what assistance Canada has offered in enabling Egypt and Israel to take advantage of President Carter's presence in the Middle East this weekend and finally come to a political accommodation that can put into place a strategically important cornerstone in constructing a new framework for permanent peace in the Middle East?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was, of course, more than happy to see the right hon. member's motion, as were all members of the House.

The Prime Minister was given, as I believe he indicated to the House, a briefing on the Middle East situation in Washington on Saturday. In addition, it has been known for some time that we have indicated to all of the parties concerned, including the United States, that if there is, for example, a United Nation's component in any force that may be established as part of the peacekeeping mechanism, we will consider most sympathetically participation in that kind of exercise.

If, in addition to that, the various parties, including Israel and Egypt, were to see some other advantages or role for Canada, in that case also we would respond in as forthcoming a way as possible to any request.

Mr. Roche: In addition to any possible extension of our peacekeeping role, specifically, has the government engaged in consultations that could lead to stronger Canadian economic relationships with Israel and Egypt that would reflect our conviction that a great era of economic and social development lies ahead in the whole Middle East once the pillar of peace is put in place?

Mr. Jamieson: The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. To the extent you will permit me, I can designate two or three examples. In the case of Egypt, we already have a co-operation arrangement in place under which we have provided within the last few months considerable assistance with regard to electrification in that country. There is also a locomotives order, if my memory serves me right, in the order of several million dollars on which we have also provided financial assistance. Several other projects are either being discussed or advanced with that country.

● (1430)

We do, of course, have the closest working relationship with Israel. During the visit of Prime Minister Begin last autumn, we talked about improving the trade balances between our two countries and the level of trade, and specific discussions have been held on those subjects as well. I would have to check the records to see what precise items were involved, but certainly we are committed to the strongest kind of trade relationship with that country.

ARDA AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, who is in charge of the ARDA program. Last year I sought assurances from the minister that a new agreement would be signed with Ontario—a five-year agreement rather than simply an extension. At that time I was told that the negotiations were progressing favourably.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

I further sought assurances that Ontario would receive the same treatment as all other provinces in this regard. I now find that the minister is endeavouring to make Ontario sign an agreement which would not provide any funding for southern Ontario or western Ontario, by which I mean west of Belleville. The federal government does not wish to provide any funding for that part of the province. I wonder why the minister has reneged on his former commitment.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions we extended the ARDA program with the province of Ontario even if we had indicated our intention to terminate that program, but we did so for very good reasons. And when last fall, following the budgetary cuts, we decided to terminate the ARDA program since it was operating only in Ontario, we indicated that we would be prepared to consider some projects within an agreement to be negotiated, which would apply to the eastern part of Ontario. Being satisfied that the agricultural situation has improved considerably in the western part of Ontario, to which the hon. member is referring, we want now to concentrate our effort and allocate the necessary capital to improve the agricultural picture in the eastern part of the province.

[English]

Mr. McKinley: It seems to me that the other provinces are not treated in this way. For instance, all of Quebec is covered by the ARDA agreement. I wonder what the problem is. Is it because there are no ministers from western Ontario who have any clout?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Windsor West.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister in his capacity as the minister with responsibilities for international trade negotiations. Would he report to the House today or at an early date on the trade negotiations with the United States which some journalists have reported could be leading to a free trade arrangement with that country?

If negotiations are moving toward such an arrangement, can he assure us that there will be no final commitment on it until there has been a full study of it by the House, including public hearings by one of its committees on the implications for our industry and its workers and the existence of adequate safeguards for them under any such arrangement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): I can give the hon. member an assurance that there have not been discussions with the United States with a view to establishing a free trade area.

The Minister of Finance met with Ambassador Strauss on February 23 to discuss and, if possible, settle a number of outstanding bilateral issues between Canada and the United States within the over-all context of the multilateral trade negotiations. I can report that progress has been made. The Minister of Finance is again meeting with Mr. Strauss on his current visit to Washington and, hopefully, further progress will be made. But I would again underline that these discussions are within the context of the trade negotiations and whatever arrangements are reached with the United States would obviously be multilateralized, if I can use that dreadful word, under the most favoured nation arrangements.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Deputy Prime Minister has indicated that progress has been made in these discussions, discussions which significantly affect Canada's trading situation. Will he give us an undertaking that the details of what he calls progress will be made available to the House of Commons either by way of a statement from himself or from his colleague, the Minister of Finance, which would make public information on arrangements which will materially affect Canada's future?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it will certainly be the intention of the government to make public the details of these trade negotiations when they are completed. We are at present attempting to bring to a conclusion our discussions with the United States and we still have outstanding questions to settle with the European Community and with Japan. When all has been completed, we shall be making the details public, but it is impossible at the moment to be certain when that will be.

Mr. Clark: We were given to understand by the government that these arrangements are expected to be completed by the end of this month. The Deputy Prime Minister spoke earlier about specific progress having been made. Can he tell us whether to this point any firm agreements have been reached on specific matters in the course of those discussions?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. All these discussions are, first of all, ad referendum to the cabinet and the cabinet will have the final word as to what is proposed by those of us who are involved in the negotiations. We shall not be able to reach a conclusion on all facets of the discussions until we are satisfied that the result is a balanced one for Canada, and we cannot determine that until all the cards are in place.

Mr. Clark: Is the Deputy Prime Minister telling us, then, that no details of these discussions presently under way with the United States will be made available to parliament or to the people of Canada until after an election?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROFITS OF AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS—RESULTANT PRICE INCREASES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It arises from the recent Reisman report and the previous Arthur report which showed auto manufacturing companies were getting higher profits on Canadian car sales than on sales in the United States.

In view of the latest CPI figures which showed that car and truck prices have increased by 11.2 per cent over last year, can the minister tell us what he intends to do to roll back this increase which is obviously inflationary?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): As the hon. member knows, during the past three years the Anti-Inflation Board was dealing with prices, profits, wages, and so on, and it has not been my responsibility to watch this aspect of the automotive industry.

Mr. Rodriguez: The minister well knows that the controls which were in effect under the AIB were very effective when it came to controlling wages. Now we have a situation where price increases in this field amount to 11.2 per cent. Is the minister prepared to say to this House and to the country that he is unable to do anything about increasing prices in the field? If he is saying that, will he at least be honest and tell us so?

• (1440)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the House that we are opposed to further controls at this time. The New Democratic Party now seems to want controls, which its members voted against three years ago.

IMMIGRATION

TRAINING PROGRAMS FOR REFUGEES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Perhaps this does not happen in the House very often, but I want to thank the minister for the agreement with the churches regarding refugees coming from Southeast Asia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: On Friday last the minister was at a federal-provincial meeting regarding the minimum and maximum number of refugee landings which would be possible for 1979. At that meeting the provinces asked the minister to give specific details as to federal commitments on language training and infrastructure for refugee landings.

I would like to ask the minister whether those matters were resolved and, specifically, whether the government has committed itself to increasing the number of refugee landings from Southeast Asia in addition to the ones to which the churches have now committed themselves.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost, I thank the hon. member for his commendation, not so much of me or the government but of the groups which are participating in private sponsorship. They were quick off the mark and the central committee of the Mennonite Church was the first group with which I signed an agreement just last Monday.

Insofar as the numbers are concerned, I had a good discussion with my provincial colleagues on Friday. The numbers which will come under private sponsorship will be in addition to those sponsored by the federal and provincial governments.

Insofar as language training is concerned, the same rules are applicable. Where an individual or both adult individuals in a family go into the work force, language training is the responsibility of the federal government. If, however, only one member of a family enters the labour force, language training for that individual is provided by the federal government but language training for the other spouse and the children of the family is a provincial responsibility. It is one of the provincial responsibilities with regard to participation in refugee and immigration movement.

Mr. Epp: Under the provisions of the new Immigration Act, the minister must file with parliament the annual target of the government with regard to the number of landings for the coming year. The minister put that target at 100,000 for the present year. If he is contemplating increasing the number of refugee landings beyond what he originally proposed and then expanded, are those landings still within the 100,000 total annual flow or has the minister adjusted the 100,000 as well?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, by its very nature the question is hypothetical and I am not very keen on answering it on that basis, but I will say that I think much will depend on where the increase is. For example, if we indicated that we would take 10,000 refugees per year out of the 100,000, and we are getting toward the end of the year and we get into a situation where we suddenly have to take in many more refugees, then in that particular instance obviously the number would go over 100,000. If it happens early in the year, we would probably stick with our 100,000 level to see what impact that would have. If we could not work it out, I would meet with my provincial colleagues again for discussions.

There is nothing hard and fast about the 100,000. We can increase that number if it is necessary, but the provinces and the federal government do have some opportunity for planning based on the figures we anticipate for the calendar year.

NUMBER OF IMMIGRANTS TO BE ADMITTED ANNUALLY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. If the annual quota or expected total remains the same, is it not a fact that if there is an increase in the refugee allotment, this is at the expense of the ordinary flow of immigration; and what is the view of the government toward those people who have normal expectations of immigration, under this new quota system?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of consulting with the provinces was to make a determination of what might be, first, an appropriate global level for the number of immigrants and, then, the number of refugees we might anticipate. We did not see that number of refugees having a detrimental effect on what the hon. member has called the ordinary flow of immigrants. If we found it was having that effect, obviously I would meet with my colleagues and suggest we move that up to whatever number is necessary. However, I have to do that in consultation. Under the present legislation I can no longer do it unilaterally.

LOTO CANADA

PROPOSED TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH GENERAL INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). Appendix C of the Loto Canada document which was tabled on February 21 indicated that all matters relating to the contract between Loto Canada and General Instrument would be finalized at eleven o'clock on Monday, March 5. That Monday has now passed, and I wonder if the minister can tell me whether money changed hands at that time and whether the contract initially entered into between Loto Canada and General Instrument has now gone by the boards and is a fait accompli.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, God in Her wisdom, and Harold Ballard to the contrary, as a woman who is up on her feet in this House of Commons I would like to say that I consider Mr. Ballard's remarks to be a disgrace to all women in Canada, and the answer to the hon. member's question is yes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, the minister has an easy way of smuggling in a few other ideas.

On seven occasions in this House the minister indicated that she was not able to table the contract between Loto Canada and General Instrument, but that after the matter was settled the contract might be available to the House. As recorded at page 1797 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said to the Leader of the Opposition:

> The Leader of the Opposition suggests that there is a waste of money. The minister has told us that when the contracts are completed, she will table them if they are requested.

The Prime Minister was referring to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), and I am now making such a request. I wonder if the minister will be able to table the contract between Loto Canada and General Instrument before the end of this week.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, it was my earnest desire to table that contract. However, there is a confidentiality clause within it which remains in effect even after the cancellation of the contract. Therefore, I am unable to table it. I have asked the lawyers of the corporation to keep me informed as to whether there will be a time when that contract will no longer be confidential. If there is, I will bring it forward as the Prime Minister suggested.

LABOUR RELATIONS

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL INTERVENE IN VOYAGEUR DISPUTE

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

The population of Quebec has been deprived of its Voyageur bus service for several months. Does the minister intend to participate personally in the negotiations between Voyageur Colonial Ltd. and its bus drivers and can he tell the House whether he expects the conflict to be settled in the near future?

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the federal mediator pursues his effort to find a solution to that conflict through personal meetings with both parties.

I agree with the hon. member for Gaspé that the general public, the residents of 450 municipalities are affected by that conflict. I urge both parties to co-operate fully with the federal mediator, particularly when we consider the fact that the company has endorsed the principle of the hourly wage, I think, instead of the mileage compensation system, so the time has come to accelerate their negotiations. Personally, I do not intend to interfere at this time.

SHIPBUILDING

ASSISTANCE FOR GREAT LAKES SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce perhaps I can direct my question to his parliamentary secretary or to whomever is responsible for answering for that department.

In the new assistance program for the lagging shipbuilding industry in Canada, announced just recently by the government, it is very evident that much of this assistance is slated for the east and west coast areas and very little, if any, is earmarked for the Great Lakes shipbuilding industry. I would like to ask the government to take a long, hard look at this program in order to correct any injustices or hardships to the Great Lakes shipbuilding industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in its accouncement the federal government provided for amounts to be allocated for ships or ferries to be built or repaired in Canadian shipyards and, therefore the Great Lakes shipbuilding industry will also be able to tender for those works.

● (1450)

[English]

Mr. Mitges: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if he would take the necessary steps to assure the Great Lakes shipbuilding industry that all applications for assistances will be given the same consideration as those received from the east and west coast areas.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, of course the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce as well as the minister will give as much consideration to the Great Lakes shipyards as to others across the country.

COMMUNICATIONS

CRTC POLICY ON SATELLITE RECEPTION—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. In response to a letter, the minister stated that it is only sensible for the CRTC to impose some sort of limit on the number of foreign signals which are allowed into the Canadian market. Therefore, does the minister support the stated policy of the CRTC of limiting Canadian cablevision systems to the distribution of a maximum of three commercial stations not licensed to serve Canada?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I agree with that policy of the CRTC. It is designed to allow Canadians to view Canadian programs and to encourage the Canadian broadcasting industry to produce those programs. The hon. member is suggesting by his question that he would like to see Canada submerged in American programs to a degree that there would not be a Canadian broadcasting industry any more. I am surprised at that kind of a question coming from the hon. member.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised about the minister's inference from what I have said. Obviously, she did not understand the intent of my question.

In view of the reality of earth stations and the technology which indicates that in a few years earth stations will be a viable option for the private receiver, why does the minister talk in terms of limiting the freedom of choice of Canadians, instead of saying that through technology Canadians should be able to make their own choice of stations throughout the world via satellite? Why does the minister not support the expanded freedom of choice of Canadians and respect their right to do so?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member does not quite understand how the satellite system operates. One has to program a Canadian satellite with the signals one wants people to be able to receive. Even when there is an individual receiving station, that station just cannot be simply beamed anywhere. There are international agreements which preclude allowing an earth station to be beamed on just anybody's satellite.

We decided 10 or 12 years ago to go into the space industry precisely because we wanted to maintain a sovereignty in the field of communications. If one has one's own satellite, then it can be programmed to allow for the distribution of signals, which new earth station policy will allow to be done more effectively and more flexibly.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER LIQUIDATE DEFICIT OF CANADIAN ALPINE SKI ASSOCIATION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). In January I sent her a letter asking that her department provide financial help for team "C" of the Canadian Alpine Ski Association. As these athletes are not chosen on the basis of the money they can bring to or collect for the association but on the basis of their skiing talents, is the minister prepared to reconsider her decision and provide the $35,000 needed to make up the deficit of the Canadian Alpine Ski Association?

[English]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that the sport governing body is supreme in our system. The Canadian Alpine Ski Association underestimated the amount it would need for this year's program. There has been some $720,000 spent on skiing by my department this year, of which $325,000 was for Alpine skiing: $63,000 in the world cup, $147,000 in competition, and $115,000 in training.

I presume the hon. member is referring to two people, the Pratt family of the "C" pool of skiers who have been asked to provide some funds to the sport governing body to assist with the "A" pool training program. They would be refunded at the end of this year.

[Mr. Wenman.]

The hon. member's motion under Standing Order 43 stated that this was a result of Loto Canada profits. Somehow or other he must have forgotten that 82.5 per cent of the profits of Loto Canada go to defray the Olympic debt until the end of 1979. There will be funds up to $24 million for sport, starting in 1980; that is, if people do not listen to the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. As I said, since the young members of team "C" are not chosen on the basis of their family's or their own wealth, does the minister think it is normal that they should be the ones to finance the benefit of the Canadian Alpine Ski Association?

[English]

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, that is a decision of their sport governing body, and this government does not interfere in the decisions of sport governing bodies in these matters.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO SETTLE DISPUTE AT LAPRADE PLANT, MONT-GABRIEL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and concerns the current negotiations with the Laprade plant in Quebec. Last summer, when the Quebec Liberal caucus met in Mont-Gabriel, a brief on the Laprade plant was presented to the Prime Minister. This brief expressed complete disgust with the Canadian government's attitude because, after having virtually imposed a settlement on the province, the government had, with little or no consultations, revised its position. Could the minister tell us, in light of his consultations with his provincial counterpart, what kind of arrangement he is working on or getting ready to announce?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance and I met very recently with two Quebec ministers, the minister of finance and the minister of energy. At that meeting it was quite clear that the province of Quebec is prepared to negotiate an extension of the completion date for the Laprade heavy water plant. That was made clear in the discussions and I believe subsequently by comments the Quebec minister of energy made publicly.

As to the other energy projects which might be undertaken with the assistance of the federal government, that is a matter presently under discussion.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will surely remember that the brief warned him to avoid making the present Quebec government solely responsible for this difficult situation since things had begun to deteriorate long before the PQ came to power. Having read this brief, can the Prime Minister tell us if he has advised his ministers to co-operate more closely on the major problems of Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the hon. member's initial question and I am not very familiar with the brief mentioned. He will probably wish to send me a copy. I think, however, that the people of Quebec have repeatedly indicated which party they feel can best look after their interests, and it is not his party.

DROP IN HOUSING STARTS—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT AND COST OF HOMES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to address my question to the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers.

Figures released by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation show that housing starts for February are down 45 per cent, from 11,761 last year to 6,413 this year. In view of these figures, can the minister explain to the House when he will introduce specific measures to prevent massive unemployment in the construction industry and to allow Canadians affordable housing?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of optimism justified in terms of construction, industrial and manufacturing plant expansion. The construction association in the housebuilding industry has had five or six years of very high-level housing starts. The view has been put that there will not be a requirement for the same number of housing starts that prevailed over the last five or ten years. I think in each of the last five years they exceeded well over 200,000, or closer to 250,000.

It is doubtful there will be a requirement for that level of starts, so the industry is going to move into industrial and commercial enterprises, as well as the expansion of large plants, energy projects and many others about which the construction industry should be justifiably optimistic.

EMPLOYMENT

PROGRAM FOR SUMMER JOBS FOR STUDENTS

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Recently, the summer student job centres opened up in the Peel and Halton regions and I understand they are already off to a very strong start. I should like to ask the minister if this indicates another improved year for summer student jobs in general right across the country—

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH GERMANY

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it stems from the case of a German born Vancouver resident, Herman Von Pfetten, but it stands to affect many thousands of Canadian citizens who were not born in this country. Mr. Von Pfetten was arrested in the United States on an extradition request by Germany. After a scathing attack on the procedure, a United States magistrate dismissed the case.

I would like to ask the minister about the treaty that Canada has drafted with Germany dealing with extradition, which treaty is expected to be ratified later this year. Will that treaty be retroactive, and will it affect Canadian citizens who may have been born in some other country such as Germany? Will they be subject to extradition requests to Germany, a state which does not extradite its own nationals to any other state?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I share his satisfaction with the outcome of what was a most unfortunate and, as it turned out, unwarranted action against the gentleman in question in the courts. As the hon. member knows, he has been totally exonerated and the case is now closed.

In light of the notice I received, I have been able to get this answer, that the treaty to which the hon. member has made reference must be approved by the German parliament, and that has not as yet taken place. We have had a reciprocal extradition arrangement in effect with West Germany since March, 1974.

On the specific point of the hon. member's question, as it does not apply to offences committed before March, 1974, in the case in question they could not have proceeded against the gentleman. In any event, there is a considerably more complex legal explanation which I will be glad to send the hon. member by letter, if he so desires.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could give us a projected date for the passage and ratification of this treaty, and could he tell us whether copies are available?

Mr. Jamieson: I would imagine, on the second part, the answer is yes. I would have to make inquiries. I am afraid I have a hard enough job predicting what matters are going to be passed through this House. I do not know what happens in the German parliament, but I will make inquiries.

PRIVILEGE

MR. R. STEWART—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DECISION TO SIT AS PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE MEMBER

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, some 11 years ago it was my privilege to be chosen by my people in the Cochrane riding to represent them in the Parliament of Canada. I have done my best to serve them ever since.

Being a person of frank expression, I have never hesitated to voice my disagreement. It became clear that any opposition to policy on the part of the troops is not looked upon with favour by the government.

A few years ago I became increasingly disillusioned following the famous musings of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on national television when he stated that the free enterprise system had failed. I could not accept that kind of thinking. The free enterprise system is what made the United States great and brought Canada on the road to becoming a great nation.

Later that year many of my colleagues were scandalized when the Prime Minister stated in no uncertain terms at a meeting of Ontario MPs that he had come into politics to move the country further to the left and he had never abandoned that goal.

Feeling that I could not accept this thinking, nor could I change it, I thought seriously of resigning from the caucus. This would have been a betrayal of those who had elected me as a Liberal because it was not long after the last election, so I did nothing in that regard. However, now that this parliament is playing an overtime period, the circumstances are vastly different. It is abundantly clear to me that Canada must reject a further drift to the left and it is time for me to take a serious stand.

I fully realize that I shall be making a great personal sacrifice by taking this action today, but my feelings for the principles involved run very high indeed. There is no amount of personal security that could make up for a failure on my part to come to grips with my gut feeling that to do otherwise would be a betrayal of my commitment to Canada and the people I have served.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Several years before I got into active politics, I was already fighting in favour of bilingualism and the French fact in Canada. I believed that better understanding was necessary to promote Canadian unity. I worked hard and I became one of the first advisors on bilingualism within the public service.

[English]

In respect of bilingualism and Canadian unity, it is my opinion that the whole problem has been handled badly. Our country is less united that it was ten years ago. The government has gone about it the wrong way and has even allowed it to become a personal vendetta amoung a few elite, including the Prime Minister and the premier of Quebec. The climate created as a result has been one which pits faction against faction and threatens the very existence of Canada as a nation.

The potential of Canada, in my view, is great. It is my feeling that the present governmental policies will not develop that potential.

Accordingly, I have decided, after consultation with my wife and a few respected associates, to leave the Liberal caucus and seek to take my seat with the Progressive Conservative caucus.

MR. ALLARD—DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to question No. 356 which is on the order paper since October 24—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Rimouski has the floor.

Mr. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. SUPPLY AND SERVICES—DECENTRALIZATION TO MONCTON, N.B.

Question No. 77—Mr. Jones:

1. Was the move to decentralize the Superannuation Branch of the Department of Supply and Services originally planned for Moncton, New Brunswick? Upon whose recommendation was Moncton chosen and on what basis?

2. What costs were entailed in planning and preparing for the move of the said Superannuation Branch to Moncton, New Brunswick?

3. Why was the change made to go to Shediac, New Brunswick? What additional costs were necessitated by such a change? Whose recommendation was followed to change the destination from Moncton to Shediac? And on what basis?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): 1. The decision to relocate the superannuation branch of the Department of Supply and Services to the Moncton area in New Brunswick, not the city of Moncton—was approved by the Treasury Board early in 1976 and announced on June 14, 1976. The Moncton area was recommended by the Department of Supply and Services and the Treasury Board task force on decentralization.

2. Not applicable. See following answer (number 3).

3. The relocation of the superannuation branch to the Moncton area community of Shediac is consistent with the original decision by the Treasury Board. There are therefore no additional cost associated with planning and preparing for the move.

LYTTON INDIAN BAND—HOUSING PROJECT

Question No. 180—Mr. Patterson:

1. Did the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development receive a bid for work on a housing project for the Lytton Indian Band from Carter Building Systems in 1977?

2. Did the Department receive a bid for work on a housing project for the Lytton Indian Band from the Matsqui Correctional Institution in 1977 and, if so (a) what hourly wage rate was used by the Matsqui Institution in determining their costs (b) what is the Department's policy regarding federal minimum wage rates on departmental projects?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Ministry of the Solicitor General as follows:

Order Paper Questions

1. No. However, the Lytton Band has responsibility for administering its own housing programs on its own reserves. We understand that a bid was received from Carter Building Systems but was not accepted by the band.

2. No, but it is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development understanding that the Matsqui Correctional Institute submitted a bid to the Lytton Band.

(a) One dollar per hour.

(b) Normally, the policy of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development regarding wage rates on departmental projects is to pay either the provincial or the federal minimum wage rate, whichever is higher.

NOTE: Chapter VIII of the sub-committee's report on the penitentiary system in Canada, 1977 particularly refers to work education and training. Recommendations 39, 40, 41, 42 and 43 underline the necessity for further development of industries within the Canadian penitentiary service and, with the Solicitor General's agreement in principle, these recommendations are now in the process of being implemented.

However, the Canadian penitentiary service has been operating an industrial program for many years. The construction of modular housing is only one aspect of the program. The objective of this program is to ensure that inmates would be fully, regularly and suitably employed at tasks that would train them to operate and hold employment upon their return to society. It would also assist in defraying the cost to the public of operating the Canadian penitentiary service.

Prior to the construction of modular units for Indian bands, inmates under the program would build structures as a phase of training. At the end of the training period, the training structures would be demolished. To eliminate this waste of materials and the frustration of inmates in knowing that what they had built would serve no useful purpose, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Canada penitentiary service developed the modular housing program. The training program leads to inmates learning a trade thus enhancing their potential for resocialization and their chances of being absorbed into the labour market on release. Many of the inmates undertaking the training are Indians and, on release, return to the reserves to assist in the band's housing construction program.

SHIPS ON CHARTER TO CN MARINE

Question No. 525—Mr. Muir:

1. What are the names of the ships on charter to CN Marine?

2. For what service are they chartered and at what cost?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. Marine Nautica
Marine Atlantica
Marine Cruiser
Marine Evangeline
Princess of Acadia
Marine Sprinter
Marine Voyager
M.V. Kloster
M.V. Clyde
M.V. Sarah
Marine Coaster
M.V. Glencoe

Marine Runner	M.V. Mount Blair
Marine Packer	Marine Transport
Topsail Star	Marine Trader
	Dunure

2. The ships are chartered for mainland Newfoundland, Bay of Fundy, and Newfoundland-Labrador service. It is not the practice of the company to disclose financial details of commercial transactions between itself and persons or firms providing services.

DEFENCE INDUSTRY PRODUCTIVITY PROGRAM

Question No. 939—Mr. Crosbie:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76 (c) 1976-77 (d) 1977-78, under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Defence Industry Productivity Programme (DIP) or any successor programme under the Enterprise Development Programme (EDP), what was the number and total value of contracts (i) between $0 and $50,000 (ii) between $50,001 and $100,000 (iii) between $100,001 and 500,000 (iv) between $500,001 and 1,000,000 (v) $1,000,001 or more (vi) in total?

2. For the same years, what were the expenditures of the Department under the Defence Industry Productivity Programme (DIP) or any successor programme under the Enterprise Development Programme (EDP) in (a) the Textile and Consumer Products Branch (b) the Agriculture, Fisheries & Food Products Branch (c) the Chemicals Branch (d) the Electrical and Electronics Branch (e) the Machinery Branch (f) the Resource Industries Branch (g) the Construction and Consulting Services Branch (h) all branches?

3. For the same years, by province and territory, what was the total in grants and contributions by the Department under the Defence Industry Productivity Programme (DIP) or any successor programme under the Enterprise Development Programme (EDP)?

Hon. Jack. H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

1. See list No. 1 below.

2. See list No. 2 below.

3. See list No. 3 below.

The Defence Industry Productivity Program has remained separate from the Enterprise Development Program.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is very brief. It has to do with amenities provided for members of parliament. I just wanted to draw the matter to your attention and to ask you, sir, if this is to continue, to check into getting facilities to dry out the fur of hon. members who jump off ships.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HNATYSHYN—DELAY IN DEALING WITH MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with a notice for the production of papers to which the parliamentary secretary has in fact referred but once again has not dealt with. I refer to motion No. 1 standing in my name. It deals with production of documents relating to the establishment of a uranium refinery in the province of Saskatchewan.

This motion is the first motion on that particular list. A number of subsequent motions have now been dealt with by the parliamentary secretary on behalf of the government. This is not the first occasion on which I have asked for the production of those particular documents. In fact, it has been a longstanding request and goes back to previous parliaments, but it has been refused.

Saskatchewan is on the verge of very considerable expansion in terms of its uranium industry, and I think that it is absolutely essential in the dying days of this parliament that the government produce the documents so that the people of Saskatchewan will know what has been done with respect to the establishment of a uranium refinery and with respect to environmental studies in the areas of Saskatoon and Warman.

I would ask the parliamentary secretary to direct his mind to obtaining a response to those particular requests and that he ask for the appropriate documents so that they can be tabled in the interests of western Canada and the people of Saskatchewan in particular.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if the papers involved can be tabled, they will be. If not, the motion can then be debated. I see the hon. member has already gone ahead and tried to debate his own motion even before a decision was reached on whether or not the papers would be tabled. As far as we are concerned, we shall follow the usual procedure.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for documents be be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—UNQUALIFIED RIGHT OF WOMEN TO WORK

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved:

That this House recognizes the unqualified right of women to work in any and all fields of endeavour and that it urges the government to set an example for the private sector through:

(1) employment programs and practices based on the fundamental premise of the equality of women and of their right to work;

(2) economic planning that reflects the reality that women will continue to want to work and that the influx of women into the labour market is not a temporary aberration;

(3) thorough study of the pension situation of women with special emphasis on the relation between low wages and low pensions; and

(4) adoption of policies that will put an end to the serious exploitation of immigrant women in the Canadian labour force.

Mr. Speaker: Members will recall that proceedings on this motion will expire in accordance with Standing Order 58(11) at the ordinary hour of adjournment this day.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this is an important day in that it marks one year plus one day since we last debated the situation of women in this House. On that instance the motion was moved by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). It is perhaps symptomatic in the decline and disintegration of this government that we are forced again to debate today, by way of an opposition day motion, the unqualified right of women to work in the occupation of their choice, and that we must in fact urge the government to set an example in this regard to both the public and the private sectors.

One would have thought after almost a decade following the report of the royal commission on the status of women in 1970, the establishment of numerous advisory councils, both federal and provincial, and the enunciation since 1972 of equal opportunity programs for women in the public service along with a declaration of support from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on down for the equality of opportunities for women, that such a motion today would be both unnecessary and irrelevant.

The tragic facts are, however, that in the last few months we have seen a growing response on the part of concerned Canadians, and particularly those women's groups that try to reflect the current status of women, nationally and provincially, to the point where it is now a virtual outcry. It was perhaps most clearly focused in the statement issued by the chairman of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women at the most recent quarterly meetings on January 10, 1979. The opening paragraph of her statement stands as a sorry tribute to the government's present record with respect to women in the work force. Here is what Madame Yvette Rousseau had to say in her opening paragraph:

> After considerable study, consultation and discussion I have come to a tragic conclusion: not only Canadian women are excluded from the employment strategy proposed by the Canadian government, but they are subtly evicted from the labour force. This conclusion is all the more bitter in that it questions women's right to work. After ten years of in-depth studies, conclusive research and multiple recommendations, such are the facts.

Madame Rousseau then goes on to state some of the collective experiences both of the advisory council and other bodies concerned with women's right to work. She mentions some of the historic developments which have taken place in the last decade, and goes on to say:

> I will mention only a few documents and organizations which have clearly explained the realities of women's lives and their claims: the Bird Commission, Provincial and Federal Status of Women Councils, "Carrefour 75" in Quebec, and the latest Quebec Status of Women Council's report . . . Were those efforts in vain? Is the whole exercise considered a farce? Have those organizations been established in order to sugar-coat the "pill"—this time, a psychological and bitter one.

She continues:

> But when we dissect official statements made in time of economic ill-health, we are appalled to see that women are consistently held responsible for the high rate of unemployment, though they fall victims to it more than other groups. Consequently, they are used as scape-goats and as a screen for a chronic inability to redress the economy.

In more specific terms—and I will come back to this matter in a few moments—she directly focuses on the employment strategy enunciated by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) in September, 1978. She asks these two questions:

> Before it was decided to exclude women from the employment strategy, why is it that the CACSW's advice was not asked? Is an advisory council a political ornament? Are there any women on the regional working groups advising Canada Employment and Immigration Commission's sector task forces?

I understand that the minister responsible for the status of women and for this particular body which Madame Rousseau chairs will be speaking this afternoon, and I for one will be most anxious to hear what the minister, who has been in his position responsible for the status of women since 1974, has to say to these serious allegations. We know only too well what his colleague the Prime Minister thinks of these allegations because he has told us so. I raised these statements with the Prime Minister on January 23, and I asked him what steps are being taken to reverse this situation. His reply was very short and direct. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I have had a report and I can state unequivocally that either the president was not directing her remarks at the government or else she was unequivocally wrong.

In case there is any doubt in the minds of the Prime Minister or any members of the government, it is useful to look at the letter which was sent to the Minister of Employment and Immigration on June 29. I simply want to read the first two paragraphs, which are as follows:

● (1520)

> At a special meeting of the leaders of the Advisory Councils on the Status of Women of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario and Saskatchewan held in Toronto, January 26, 1979, there was unanimous endorsation of Yvette Rousseau's position that "not only are Canadian women excluded from the employment strategies proposed by the federal government, but they are subtly evicted from the labour force."
> On behalf of my colleagues I wish to reaffirm to you our conviction that every person has the right to work. Women who make up 46 per cent of the work force in this country are not secondary nor marginal workers.

That letter has still to be answered. I know that the Minister of Employment and Immigration put some specifics in writing to the six provincial and one federal advisory councils some two or three weeks later. The essential thrust of that letter, the allegations put forward by Madame Rousseau on January 10, have neither been addressed, to my knowledge, publicly or privately, by the Prime Minister, who said they were false and not directed to the government, nor by the minister responsible for the status of women. We hear almost nothing from him these days with respect to developing and deepening women's issues. There was nothing either from the Minister of Employment and Immigration who seems to be the forward advance—or, should I say, retreat—with respect to adequate programs for the status of women, particularly as their employment and right to work is affected.

It might be useful, Mr. Speaker, to review the history briefly. Hon. members will recall that in 1967 at the time of the government of Lester Pearson, a royal commission on the status of women was appointed with the distinguished member of the other place, Senator Florence Bird, as chairman. It made its major report in December, 1970. Many of the recommendations were long overdue and were implemented within a short period of time.

Interestingly enough, I believe the first debate that took place as a result of this report was instigated by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) in March, 1971. There was a valuable contribution on his part as well as contributions from our former colleague from Fundy-Royal, now the chairman of the Human Rights Commission, Gordon Fairweather, and others.

In March, 1971, the Prime Minister enunciated his perspective and concern with respect to the status of women—not in the House, as is so often the case, but at a meeting of a number of Liberal faithful in Toronto.

By 1972 the cabinet had formulated directive no. 44, referred to as the status of women directive in Canada. The report of the interdepartmental committee over the hand of Mr. Gordon Robertson, then secretary to the cabinet, gave a very clear indication of what appeared to be the direction the government was taking. This directive was to ensure the implementation of recommendations from the royal commission on the status of women. In addition, it said that the Public Service Commission had embarked on an active program to promote equal opportunity for female public servants. Indeed, deputy heads of departments were directed by cabinet to take steps to encourage the assignment and advancement of more women into middle and upper echelon positions.

That was almost seven years ago. In 1974 the minister responsible for the status of women assumed his responsibilities and declared the great things that were in store for 1975, International Women's Year. In the concluding part of 1975 a more detailed cabinet document entitled "Equal Opportunities in the Public Service of Canada" was enunciated. It stated:

—the federal government as an employer actively supports the principle of equal access to employment, training and development, and career opportunities for all employees—

It went on to say:

—within a reasonable period of time representation of male and female employees in the Public Service would approximate the proportion of qualified and interested persons of both sexes available by department, by occupational group, and by level.

Program guidelines were established. Policy examination was to take place under the responsibility of Treasury Board—I will say more about this shortly—and the deputy heads of departments were expected to establish and publicize their own statements of policy consistent with the policy outlined in January, 1976. Indeed, the minister stated there was to be very active monitoring, reporting and action on the part of all levels of the federal government.

The minister himself made such statements and I should like to quote from a couple of the many speeches he made in 1975. The minister responsible for the status of women said on October 15, 1975:

We find a society that pays lip service to the principle of equality while continuing to support actions that reinforce the inequities in women's situations. Perhaps we suffer from a collective time lag between conviction and action.

Perhaps today the minister will tell us about his collective time lag between conviction and action in the past two or three years. In another instance the minister said:

It would make a mockery of this international women's year, both in government and the private sector, if we were only to speak out against this enormous inequality without taking firm steps to end it.

Those firm steps have still been held in abeyance, Mr. Speaker. We wait to see what real action the minister is going to take.

The tragic fact is that the present government seems intent on undoing or undermining much of the rhetoric and programs that characterized the earlier years leading up to and including International Women's Year in 1975. Certainly one does not have to be a detailed student of events of the past half dozen years to realize that rising expectations and implementation of new programs were very much the order of the day, reaching a peak in International Women's Year.

If we follow the performance curve with respect to developments in employment in the public service, a kind of peak was achieved in a number of areas in terms of accelerated access for women into middle and upper levels and into training programs. The tragedy is that, as we follow that curve beyond 1975, and as the Advisory Council on the Status of Women pointed out so clearly, it has begun to go, in some cases, into rather sharp decline.

How tragic it is that in the last year or so the only time we seem to have heard from the minister responsible for the status of women is when members on this side either direct questions to him or introduce motions, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) did a year ago yesterday and as we are doing today, so as to create a situation by way of opposition day debates for the minister to issue some kind of defence. I sincerely hope that in his response today the minister is not going to recite, as he did last year, a catalogue that is somewhat out of date and in some ways irrelevant to the present difficult situation for women. I can understand the minister's distraction over the past two years with the current pressure of federal-provincial relations, but one must conclude either that he has not sufficient time for the present major issues confronting women in our society, or the government feels it is sufficiently unimportant to bother appointing someone who might effectively bear these important responsibilities.

There is far too much that one could recite about the present sorry performance of the government and concerning its attitude toward women in the work force. A notable example of the current direction of federal policy was the action of this government in introducing Bill C-14 last fall. As the chairman of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women pointed out, there was no advance consultation with that council or with the National Action Committee, the umbrella organization that represents 140 women's groups across the country. It was sprung on them, so to speak. Even after it went into direct correspondence with the minister about those specific areas of amendments which would do severe damage to women in the work force, in many instances the minister quoted statistics that bore no relationship to the facts. Inadvertently, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has indicated the difficulties he has created for women.

It is interesting that in his communication to the Advisory Council on February 14, he indicated that women will suffer disproportionately from the establishment, for instance, of a 20-hour weekly minimum for insurability. He pointed out that a 2.4 per cent reduction of the total benefits would occur for women compared to a 0.7 per cent reduction for male claimants. That so disturbed the joint meeting of provincial and federal advisory councils that they appealed directly to the Canadian Human Rights Commission for a decision with respect to direct discrimination against women in this act.

I am only going to deal specifically with part time workers. The advisory council had five specific objections to Bill C-14 and the National Action Committee had three. In a letter to the Minister of Employment and Immigration on January 29, they pointed out that women make up 71 per cent of part-time workers in Canada. When they raised this with an official of the Employment and Immigration Commission, he replied:

> We simply do not have the data base to do that study (of part-time workers, 71 per cent of whom are women). We are now trying to determine the impact of this particular change (20 hours per week) but I am afraid that that information will not be available to us early enough to make a judgment as to whether or not the impact will be as severe as you have claimed—

● (1530)

What kind of nonsense is that, Mr. Speaker. With a major change in federal policy respecting part time work, the officials from the Employment and Immigration Commission tell us they do not have the facts in terms of impact and the minister is left to give statistics which, by themselves, certainly indicate severe and deliberate discrimination.

The following was drawn to the attention of the minister responsible for the status of women, and to his colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration, in a meeting of federal cabinet ministers which took place in Toronto on February 22. This statement is taken from the brief of the National Action Committee:

> —the economic outlook for women now is less encouraging and more desperate than it was a year ago. Women have the highest unemployment rate of any group in the country and yet actions taken by your government in the intervening months have almost without exception tended to make matters worse for women.

In defence of this situation the government talks about growing participation rates creating higher unemployment situations for women, ignoring the historical reality that traditionally women have had lower unemployment rates, certainly during the 1940s and 1950s, than over the last year or so. This government not only fails to recognize the acute problem created for women because of the federal policy it is imposing, but it tries to make out that there is no particular problem.

In Toronto on February 21 I served on a panel with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Maine). This was a public forum concerning women and unemployment. When he was trying to defend the cancellation of the federal government's program with respect to the outreach program and training and re-training for women, he said, I suppose as a final act of desperation: "But women can in no way feel severely disadvantaged just because they are women". As I recall, he added the offhand remark: "What is so special about women?" I do not know where that particular individual and his minister live, but they have not looked closely at the situation either in the private or the public sector.

I will say a few words shortly about the situation respecting the public sector particularly because that is an area of basic responsibility for this minister and the government. There are serious implications about the general trend of development of government policy. Members will recall when we were debating Bill C-10 in this House respecting changes in the family allowances and the new child tax credit that concern was raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), myself and others about the very bad precedent that would be established in terms of lumping the husband's and wife's income together for the purposes of computing the child tax credit. As we pointed out on that occasion to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), this could create a serious precedent in terms of future amendments to the Income Tax Act and to the unemployment insurance program.

I believe the minister at that time treated these comments as being wildly out of line compared to the possibilities that might occur. In case she has not heard, her colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration made a speech on March 5. In it he referred to unemployment insurance and changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. He said:

> I am considering producing a "green paper", in which the problems of the program and alternatives to these problems could be spelled out. For example, there are some strong suggestions that the program ought to be restructured to take account of family income.

I trust he has shared that new development with his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Perhaps one other comment is worth noting at this point. It concerns the government's attitude on its withdrawal from the important aspect of assisting women into the work force. One of the central issues over the past few months has been the cutback with respect to the women's Outreach program. The Minister of Employment and Immigration, in seeking to explain much of the criticism he was receiving, offered this one defence for the withdrawal of the Outreach program. It is indicative of this government. He said:

> Many of the women's Outreach projects were started in 1975 during International Women's Year and, because the normal duration for funding is three and a half years, many of the projects are coming to the end of their funding period.

The secret is now out. We were prepared to do things in a particular year because it was the "in" thing. The button which the minister responsible for the status of women used to wear proudly in this House which said "Why Not?" was the fad of 1975. Now we have it in holy writ that three and a half years is as long as anyone will get for any particular funding program. That is the end of that exercise. It is now "on to other and more important things".

I want to speak briefly about the situation of immigrant women workers. Nowhere does the government's present policy toward women seem more harsh and shameful than its attitude with respect to immigrant women workers. Increasingly over the last decade immigrant women, either as landed immigrants or as visitors, have been brought to Canada primarily for the purpose of employment in "sweat shops" or low income work. Not only does the federal government fail to act by taking appropriate measures to improve their situation, but it ensures that there will continue to be a sufficient supply of these low income people.

The situation is even worse than that. Under the new immigration act more barriers are put in the way of those who come here to offer low paid work in terms of attaining landed immigrant status. The most dramatic example is the recent decision of the Department of Employment and Immigration with respect to Jamaican women and the government's present unbelievable attempt through the courts to prevent the Human Rights Commission from investigating aspects of discrimination which might have existed in this case. The recent report to the Advisory Council on the Status of Women by Sheila Arnopoulos pointing out the problems of immigrant women in the Canadian labour force indicates how the government adds to the exploitation, if you like, of those who come here to do domestic work.

It is clear that the government in recent years has taken a new direction with respect to immigrant women. It should be pointed out, as Sheila Arnopoulos does in her paper, that the permanent use of foreigners on temporary permits to do jobs which Canadians find unacceptable is not in the tradition of Canadian immigration practice. It is clearly a case of the exploitation of any possibility of compensation at some present or future time.

As hon. members know, I have been particularly concerned about the situation with respect to the performance by the government in its own employment practices in the public service. I have asked the minister repeatedly in this House to give a clear accounting, department by department, of what is happening to women in the public service. I have asked him to tell us where in real terms we have made progress, what goals have been achieved, what structures have been in place and where progress still needs to be made. All we receive are occasional generalized remarks, self-serving ones at that, which do little to encourage confidence or give a clear report as to what has transpired.

The advisory council, almost on an annual basis, has published report after report indicating the difficulties for women in the public service. Its most recent report has indicated again that in spite of cabinet directives in 1972 and 1975 the government's own employment practices respecting women, to use the words of the advisory council, have been a failure. I hope that the minister will indicate today why this has been so. For instance, why has it been, in comparing two programs that have tried to end discrimination in the public service, that there has been such inequality of staff support? Hopefully the minister will tell us directly why, in Treasury Board, with respect to the official languages program we have a staff of around 45 people and a budget of something over $1,300,000 but with respect to the area of equal opportunity we have a staff of two with no budget. Why has it taken, I don't know exactly how many years because it depends where one starts to count, but at least three and perhaps six years to have one full time person per department managing and working on equal opportunities? Last year I think there were about 15 people. Now we are up to 20. That figure is still less than half the number of departments.

A few days ago the minister told me that we are making progress, that we have a full time person in the major departments and it is not really necessary to have a full time person for the smaller ones; but perhaps the minister could tell us if there is a kind of two department policy within his government. Does he believe some departments must be more responsible with respect to equal opportunities than others? This would appear to be the case.

It is clear that in the last few years we have seen a subtle but real shift in the government's over-all approach to women in the work force. It is one with disturbing dimensions for it is reminiscent of the situation that existed in the 1930s and following the Second World War when the gains that had been made during the previous period in terms of opportunities for women in the work force had been dramatically reversed. The royal commission on the status of women very clearly pointed this out in its report on page 54, if the minister would like to refresh his memory.

In both instances it is interesting to note that the government played a major role in leading that reversal. This is what we do not want to see happen at this time of economic difficulties for the country and for this government. This is why we, Mr. Speaker, are committed to the unqualified right of women to work in any and all fields of endeavour and believe that it is the right and the responsibility of the federal government, as the largest employer of women in the country, to set an example both for the private sector and for other elements of the public sector in this country.

The recent report of the advisory council on barriers to equal opportunity points out that the federal government has lagged behind the public sector, incredibly enough, in its own employment practices in respect to women. I note with interest that yesterday, in the Speech from the Throne at Queen's Park, there was included this paragraph:

> In addition to the ongoing programs of the Women's Bureau and the Women's Crown Employees Office, the Ministry of Labour will establish an Equal Opportunities Advisory Committee composed of senior labour and management representatives.

We believe that employment programs, policies and practices should indeed be based on the fundamental premise of the equality of women and of their right to work. More than that, we believe that economic planning that is so important to a healthy and fully functioning economy should reflect the reality that women will continue to want to work and play a major role in the economy, contrary to what the Minister of Finance said to me the other day when I asked about his projection of declining members of women in the work force. He said:

—it is obvious that the rate of increase has been very high in the last few years. We do not object to it.

We believe that the influx of women into the labour market is not only not a temporary aberration or a pathological problem to be managed and if possible reduced, but a new opportunity to expand and enlarge skills and opportunities for the whole of our economy. In more specific terms, and my colleague from Kingston and the Islands will deal with this, we believe that the present pension situation with respect to women and particularly elderly women is atrocious. Particular emphasis must be placed on the relationship of long periods of dependency, low wages and resulting low pensions.

We believe that the time is long past for us to have a clear set of publicly enunciated goals indicating how the federal government is going to put its own house in order with respect to equal opportunities for women. The directions that were set out in 1972 and 1975 should be clearly defined in a detailed manner.

There should be, as the minister has promised, a response and a public accounting of what has happened year by year with regard to the implementation of equal opportunity programs. The annual reports which apparently for the past two or three years have been made to Treasury Board and the evaluation, department by department, of the implementation of equal opportunity programs should now be made available to the general public. Structures must be firmly in place if any real progress is to be achieved on a cumulative basis.

There are a number of other measures we would take, measures which I think are becoming increasingly obvious. I am troubled by the fact that this is a year in which we are going to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of women being recognized as persons under the British North America Act. It could be an important year with respect to progress for women in the work force, something that is very much needed in our economy. However, the likelihood with the current drift and indecision of this government, and at times actual opposition to women in employment, is that we will have to move further motions like this and continue to raise questions until we can get some kind of appropriate action.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the opposition has decided to precede International Women's Day with a debate on women in employment. In spite of the strong words of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), words that I suspect are not always shared by his colleagues, this new and quasi-annual commitment to women seems to be at variance with some of their other notions about economic policy.

I have said many times that women want to, need to and, most important, have a right to work. We recognized ten years ago that the government could and would make changes to legislation to improve the status of women.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I can say that the present government has been committed for a long time to improving the status of women. I do not intend to review all its accomplishments in this area. I need only remind the House that Canada was the first member of the United Nations to establish a Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Canada was among the first, if not the first, to create the function of minister responsible for the status of women, as well as an Advisory Council on the Status of women.

Moreover, we have translated our philosophy into action through major changes to our programs and through basic legislative amendments. Those are, of course, prerequisites to provide opportunities for women within the economy. I readily recognize that the measures already adopted might not be the final answer, but it is surely a step in the right direction.

Hon. members will remember the numerous measures that were taken since the early seventies, especially in 1971 following the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. When that report was tabled, the government proceeded to amend many statutes in order to remove any form of discrimination in existing federal statutes. We did not stop there, since we acted not only at the legislative level but also at the executive level by promoting women from the economic point of view within the federal civil service and in areas coming under federal jurisdiction. I remind the previous speaker that only recently, in the past few years, in 1975, this government introduced in the House an omnibus bill on the status of women, a bill amending eleven federal statutes to ensure equal opportunities for women.

Similarly, in 1975 the federal government passed a law authorizing the payment of allowances to persons aged 60 to 65 whose spouses receive the old age pension or the guaranteed income supplement. Obviously those benefits went mostly to senior citizens of the female sex. In 1976 the Unemployment Insurance Act was amended to allow women to determine during which 15 weeks out of a 26-week period, they would receive the unemployment insurance maternity benefits. In 1977 a law was passed allowing credits accrued in the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan to be shared upon dissolution of a marriage.

In 1977 the Bill of Rights was passed forbidding any discrimination based on sex and ensuring equal remuneration for equal work to every person working within federal jurisdiction. I must mention, in passing, that the federal parliament was the only government to pass such a law. No provincial legislature, at this time, has gone as far in that direction.

In 1978, very recently, a major amendment was passed to the Income Tax Act providing for a reimbursable tax credit to the mother or father of a single-parent family. That credit is based on the family income and can amount to as much as $200 a child. It is very clear that this measure will be of particular assistance to single-parent families and especially those whose head is a woman. The net benefits resulting from that act will clearly be advantageous to the underprivileged women in our society. Those are only a few of the measures which have been adopted. I have already indicated that other legislation, for instance, dealing with sexual matters under the provisions of the Criminal Code will soon be introduced in the House, as well as other measures now being drafted.

[English]

What is important to remember is that we are acting not only in the legislative field but in the economic field, the social field and the cultural field. In these areas one cannot change history overnight or even in a decade. The demands on the economy and the expectations men and women have of their society reflect centuries of social and cultural attitudes which we are working to change.

Obviously, governments and political leaders have a major role to play in this respect but all other agencies in society also have a role to play. The federal government has a responsibility but the provinces also have a large responsibility which we should not ignore. As the House knows, the provinces have complete jurisdiction over education, health and social services, the administration of justice and a large proportion of the labour laws. In large measure they determine the availability of training through apprenticeship, particularly in the so-called non-traditional sectors.

As we developed during the years our programs for the improvement of the economic position of women, we were very surprised to find that most provincial governments and political leaders seemed unaware of their responsibility to women. We were even more surprised at the comment of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) recently that such steps would, and I quote, "create a terrible conflict" between a woman's natural instinct to stay at home and her natural instinct to provide for her financial well-being and for her pension. Frankly, we did not realize that women had such a "strong instinct to stay at home", to use the words of the hon. member.

Let us consider just one area of economic importance to working parents—day care. Let me remind hon. members how day care is financed. In 1974, the Department of National Health and Welfare introduced new day care policy guidelines under the Canada Assistance Plan. Under this plan it is up to the provinces to decide on priorities. If day care spending decreases, it is because provinces like Ontario and Manitoba, good Conservative provinces, have decided it is not important. The federal government matches what the provinces put in. We cannot match dollars which have not been spent.

Still in the area of services, the federal government has led the way in funding important demonstration projects such as the new Women's Centre in Montreal, the Ottawa-Hull Rape Crisis Centre and the Vancouver women's health project. Countless projects for women were initiated through job creation projects.

But let me remind the opposition that many of our provincial colleagues do not like this very much. As a matter of fact, we received continuous representation and objections from the provinces when the federal government was financing services of this nature over an extended period. We have led the way and we can do so through demonstration projects, but only for a relatively short period—three years, for instance. We do not have the jurisdiction to engage in the financing and supervision of social services of a permanent nature. That is a responsibility of the provinces and I am sorry to say that in general the provinces have not been quick to reallocate their resources to accommodate women's needs. Nonetheless, we do intend to continue to encourage the provinces in all possible ways to see that these essential changes do occur.

The opposition says it is concerned about pension benefits available to women. So are we, and we have done something about it. We increased the GIS by $20 this January. We are the ones who introduced the spouse's allowance and in future we shall be bringing forward more amendments for the improvement of pensions.

Again, though, we can act only on one part of the pension legislation. The Canada Pension Plan, for instance, can only be amended with the consent of two-thirds of the provinces with two-thirds of the population, and the whole area of private pensions lies overwhelmingly under provincial jurisdiction. Two years ago we agreed to amend the Canada Pension Plan to permit the splitting of pension credits on divorce. The provinces agreed and we were happy with it.

We wanted also to recognize the important contribution made by home makers through a special drop-out provision in the plan. What happened? Most provinces agreed with us but the biggest Conservative government of them all, the government of Ontario, would not accept that amendment. I was interested, almost amused, to hear the hon. member's reference to what was said in the Speech from the Throne delivered in Ontario yesterday. I would have been happier had Ontario lifted its veto on this very worth-while proposal which would benefit many thousands of women in Canada and which has received the support of all the other provinces along with that of the federal government.

The federal government is committed to recognizing the importance of the role of women in the economy. That is why, for example, women in Spence Bay in the Arctic have been receiving LEAP funding to make high-fashion coats and parkas that are marketed down south; that is why the northern pipeline agency has contracted with the Vancouver Women's Research Centre to examine the role of women in relation to that project. I could go on to quote hundreds of cases where funding has been made available through various federal departments.

We have expressed our support for the improvement of economic opportunities for women. This is shown not only by the direct actions we have taken but by what has happened in the economy. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Egmont has said, in the last year 324,000 new jobs were created. Out of this number, 207,000, almost 64 per cent, were filled by women. We are pleased that more women are working. We are pleased that the broad economic policies of this government have not only created more jobs than ever in the history of this country but also that women have benefited from those policies more than ever in the past.

I said a year ago in this debate, and it must be said again, that the federal government is not trying to hide the problems unemployment poses for women. Since 1966 the Canadian labour force has increased by 37 per cent due to population growth, immigration and rising participation rates generally. There has been a steady increase in the labour force participation rates of women of all ages, and adult women in particular. In the period between 1966 and 1976 the Canadian labour force participation rate of women rose from roughly 34 per cent to 45 per cent, with the greatest increase in that age group often termed primary age; that is, the age group between 25 and 44. The participation rate of adult women alone increased by 59 per cent over that same period. In aggregate terms the economy responded well to the demands of women for employment. Employment growth among adult women relative to their population compared with that among youth and adult males increased substantially over the last ten years.

As I pointed out, women have been entering the labour force, not just out of a need for self-fulfilment—which is valid in itself—but increasingly for economic reasons, to support themselves and their families, whereas in the past women tended to enter the labour force during good times and to drop out during bad times. Their persistently high participation rate suggests that women in the work force is a phenomenon here to say, and it is one which we welcome.

What is important to recall, however, is that this is not something which can be dealt with by the federal government alone. The federal parliament has authority over only about 10 per cent of the work force of this country. Only about 10 per cent of the work force comes under the federal jurisdiction. The other 90 per cent is controlled, regulated and legislated about by the provinces in this country. That implies that provincial governments have large responsibilities as well as the federal government. It also implies a large role for unions.

I would like to pay tribute here to women leaders of the labour movement such as Shirley Carr, Grace Hartman and Nadine Hunt. I know that in spite of considerable efforts the union movement has its problems too in focusing on women's issues. Some unions are just now getting around to hiring status of women co-ordinators. We began in 1971.

I would like now to say a few words about the public service.

[Translation]

Early this year I was happy to receive from the Advisory Council their report entitled: "Women in the Public Service: Barriers to Equal Opportunity." We are aware of the need to multiply our efforts in that regard. Mr. Speaker, why do you think we have set up the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women in 1973? It was precisely to play that role of advisor and critic with the federal government and to inform the public. Finally, I am happy that after their occasional criticisms the opposition members realize at last the existence of that council and the valuable help they give to all of us.

The latest directives from Treasury Board to the department restate the government's commitment and insist precisely on those same points raised and highlighted by the advisory council, namely increased involvement of management in the planning, implementation and control of the equal opportunity program for women.

We have established qualitative and quantitative objectives to ensure fairer representation and better distribution of women at the various levels of the public service, not to mention greater job diversification for women. Deputy ministers are accountable for the programs of their respective departments. From the beginning of next financial year, departmental plans on equal opportunity for women will be made public. Once again, we have established objectives and will concentrate our effort in order to achieve them. Had the opposition really wanted to gain an insight into the matter, they would certainly have insisted on inviting Public Service Commission Chairman Edgar Gallant to appear before a parliamentary committee. Unfortunately it is easier to have only half-truths, as was the case with statistics on surplus staff.

Hon. members opposite did not even try to check the facts because if they had, they would have seen that a good number of surplus employees are nurses who work in federal hospitals, which are now transferred to the provinces. Those nurses still appear in federal government statistics on surplus personnel so as to give them priority status if they want to find a job with the federal government. So, in fact they are now employed by the provincial governments in the hospitals which were transferred from the federal government to the provinces.

[English]

These are facts opposition members could easily have found if they had bothered to check. These are facts which they could have obtained from the Public Service Commission just by asking. These are facts they could have gone into extensively with the chairman of the Public Service Commission, if they had bothered to ask him to appear before a parliamentary committee to explain the policies of the Public Service Commission, which is an independent body answerable to this parliament. Opposition members could have asked the commission to explain what it was doing, where it was going and what problems it was facing, but no, the Conservatives prefer to stay at the level of generalities and half-truths. They assume things which are just not true.

We have direct leverage in order in council appointments, and it is where we have direct leverage that we feel we are making headway. I examined statistics regarding order in council appointments, and I was pleased to see that in that area we are proceeding at a faster rate than the rate at which the public service generally is proceeding. The public service is regulated by public service legislation and, obviously, by the Public Service Commission.

In the last few years we have roughly doubled the percentage of women being appointed by order in council; that is, by the cabinet. These appointments have not been purely to honorary functions or to positions without responsibility. In my own area of responsibility the number of women appointed judges of superior and supreme courts has increased very substantially. There are women who are presidents of Crown corporations. The president of the Economic Council of Canada is a woman. The president of the National Gallery of Canada is a woman, the first in the world. Women sit on all kinds of boards in the various departments. These are things this government has done. We have led the public service and, I might add, we have led provincial Conservative governments by a very wide margin indeed.

● (1610)

Conservatives have made a great fuss about the size of the public service. Repeatedly they tell us that they do not want the public service to lead or to increase. As a matter of fact, they want to cut 60,000 jobs, according to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Does that mean they intend to cut out the progress we have made in equal opportunity? I heard the hon. member talk about equal opportunities officers in departments. If they cut 60,000 jobs in the public service, where will they find their equal opportunities officers? I am amazed that a party which wants to cut 60,000 public servants will appoint full time equal opportunities officers in small departments and councils that have only 30 or 40 employees. Is that the type of management the opposition is offering to the country?

Mr. Benjamin: It is called working both sides of the street.

Mr. Lalonde: I am afraid the hon. member opposite is quite correct in that respect. We believe in comparability with the private sector, but not without catch-up for disadvantaged workers. The hon. member for Scarborough East, the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell), made that clear when we received the National Action Committee brief two weeks ago.

We believe in ending job ghettos. That is why we have a federal Human Rights Act which indicates there shall be equal pay for work of equal value.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Job ghettos in the public service?

Mr. Lalonde: We believe women should be trained for, and have the opportunity to work in, a wide range of jobs. That is why we have minimum quotas in non-traditional job training. That is why all government publications must stress the diversity of opportunities within the public service. We believe child care costs must be considered as part of a family's working costs. That is why we amended the Income Tax Act in 1972 and why we want to examine further changes to that act.

We believe the pension situation for women must change. That is why we changed the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Canada Pension Plan. That is why we will introduce more changes soon. That is why we have asked the Economic Council of Canada to undertake a major study on women in the economy: the nature of their participation and its effect on their dependence.

We believe immigrant women must receive language assistance and be treated fairly by employers. That is why our work plan for the future addresses these questions. That is why the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission has officials studying the problems of domestics in particular. But I must remind the House, and the opposition in particular, of the importance of provincial labour legislation in this field and the great deficiencies which exist in that regard in most provinces at the present time.

We believe women workers need protection. For example, they need protection from workplace hazards during pregnancy. This will be an important focus of the work of the recently established Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. That is why we introduced maternity benefits under UIC in 1971. Moreover, that is why we are making changes this year to allow more flexibility in using those benefits. We recognize times have changed since 1971. More fathers would like the option of looking after their new babies. Also adoptive parents feel they should have this kind of income support. For these reasons, in the future we envisage a parental insurance scheme which could accommodate this changing pattern of shared family responsibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but I must advise him that his allocated time has expired. He may, however, go on with the unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

Is there consent to allow the hon. minister to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lalonde: I thank hon. members of the opposition for their co-operation. Let me say that the government has recognized in the past and continues to recognize the right of women to work, the need to ensure opportunities are available and the need in the foreseeable future for special measures to improve their place in the economy.

We spell out our program in a document which I will make public today. I should like to table it in the House if there is agreement by all parties. It is entitled: "Towards Equality for Women". We are committed to improving women's place in the economy and society. In spite of the annual concern of the opposition, apparently the message has not reached the ranks of the Tories. When one Ottawa Centre Conservative campaign worker was questioned about the Conservative platform on women, a member of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women was told the following:

> You know, you ladies don't have as much support as you think. Women just aren't an issue in this campaign.

If that is what Tory workers are thinking, the hon. member for Egmont has a lot of evangelizing to do. "Towards Equality for Women" is the federal government's contribution to the United Nations world plan of action. The document constitutes the federal government's main program of action on the status of women's issues between now and 1985.

[Translation]

"Towards Equality for Women" is the result of recommendations and representations submitted by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, by women's associations and individuals in recent years. "Towards Equality for Women" reflects the federal government's commitment to fight vigourously against all barriers to equality of opportunities for women and to launch deep reforms through legislative amendments suggested by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

[English]

Through the plan resources will be reallocated, both at the level of policy development and program support, to respond to women's increasing participation in the economy and the wide wage gap between men and women. Women's problems in the labour force will be addressed as a separate agenda item by an economic conference of first ministers in 1979. Discussions will begin immediately with the provinces to increase trades training for women in non-traditional occupations and apprenticeship programs. Economic development policies will be reviewed to assess their specific effects on women with a view to increasing their participation in high wage work. Education grants to labour unions will be redirected to ensure that they will benefit women workers.

[Translation]

A task force on women and employment will be created shortly under the leadership of the co-ordinator of women status Canada. The Economic Council of Canada will be asked to inquire into the status of women in the economy. Reviews of policies relating to pensions will be centered on problems particular to women. The plan also includes the first steps of an important inquiry into violence against women stressing the need to consult with the provinces to ensure that services are in accordance with women's needs.

● (1620)

[English]

A national clearing house for information on victims of family violence and sexual assault will be established. More research and program support will be directed towards health promotion in the areas of safety of contraceptives, occupational and environmental health hazards, alcohol, drug addiction and nutrition.

Federal policies will be assessed for their effects on the parental roles of men and women, and the feasibility of a parental insurance scheme to replace maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act will be examined.

[Translation]

We will analyse the conditions under which joint custody could be exercised after a divorce, keeping in mind the children's right to maintain relations with both parents. We will negotiate with the provinces and take the necessary steps to improve the enforcement of alimony orders. The government also recognizes that income tax abatements for child support are not having the intended results. We will therefore consider other measures. We will reinforce the equal opportunity programs within the public service by insisting that managers assume a greater responsibility, by making relevant ministerial plans public and by correcting the classification systems which impede the promotion of women. We will prepare directives to eliminate all sex-typing in government publications and teaching aids.

[English]

In all work being undertaken in relation to this plan, the government will consult with the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. In addition, it will seek out advice from experts on women's issues. The plan will strengthen the mandate of the co-ordinator's office in relation to policies of all departments so that focus on the implications of all government policies on women is increased.

[Translation]

Finally, by informing people of the content of the five-year plan, we are encouraging everyone to monitor its implementation and launching a vast debate on this whole matter.

[English]

In the many areas affecting women under provincial and territorial jurisdiction, action by the provinces and territories is crucial to achieving equality, and we will welcome any steps that are taken by provincial governments in this regard.

[Translation]

The five-year plan is the symbol of our continuing commitment to work towards still greater equality for women.

[English]

This document is not a working paper. It does represent a commitment by this government, and it does represent decisions that have been taken by the cabinet in all areas of activities of the federal government. I commend it to the House and I commend it to the women of Canada and to all Canadians, because each of us has a deep interest and a deep concern about the promotion of opportunities for all Canadian women.

Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House I would like authority to table this document.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House consent to the minister tabling the document to which he has referred in order that it will be available to the public?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend most warmly my friend the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) for presenting this motion to the House today. I regret that it does not come to a vote. We would vote for it unanimously and with enthusiasm. I thank the hon. member also for his references to a motion that was moved by my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), a year ago yesterday, as well as to other motions on which we have debated women's issues.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) seemed to enjoy referring to this as an annual exercise. I do not know where he is week after week, as hardly a week goes by without some of us on this side of the House asking questions concerning women's issues.

I took the trouble to look at the debate that took place on March 6, 1978, and one of the things that is interesting to me, and I was scanning it while the Minister of Justice was speaking, is that his speech today is practically the same speech he made last year. At least, it is the same kind of speech but for one alteration. He spent a good deal of time last year and this year trying to tell us what the government has done for women. The rest of his time was spent on attacking the party that brought in the motion. The one difference is that last year he attacked us; this year he has attacked the Progressive Conservatives.

I must say that I have a great deal of admiration for the gall displayed today by the Minister of Justice. I want to document that gall. He cited a number of things as evidence of the active concern of the Liberal government for the women of this country. If I miss any of them, forgive me, Mr. Speaker, as I took notes while he was proceeding.

One of the items he listed early in his catalogue was the spouse's allowance. He calls that doing something for the women of this country. That is one of the most discriminatory pieces of legislation we have on the statute books.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It discriminates against women between 60 and 65 years of age who are of single status, whether single, divorced, widowed or what have you.

Then the next item, or one shortly after, was what the government had done by way of splitting the benefits under the Canada Pension Plan when there is a marriage breakdown. That is a big deal, Mr. Speaker. The minister is worried, of course, about the fact that the government did something else having to do with women who stay at home to rear their children in terms of Canada Pension Plan benefits, and he is concerned that the Ontario government did not go along with the proposal. May I point out to him that neither of these proposals, the splitting of benefits where the marriage breaks down or the proposal that was put forward regarding mothers who care for their children, touches the real problem in respect of the Canada Pension Plan, and that is that there is nothing in it and no equivalent to it for those women who work at home. There is no excuse at all for the government to stand up and boast about what it has done for women and, in that context, talk about the Canada Pension Plan, when it has left out any right under that plan for millions of Canadian women who stay at home.

The minister did not seem to like the idea that reference was made to some women having an instinct to stay at home. We suggest that women should have the choice. If they choose to work there should be a place for them out there in the work force and in the economy. If they stay at home, the contribution they make at home should be recognized just as much as the contributions made by their husbands who are out in the work force.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister went on to cite as another example of this government's concern for women the enactment of the Canadian Human Rights Act and the setting up of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. I thought that even the gall he showed today would have been tempered by the fact that the hon. member for Egmont had already referred to the fact that this government is trying to get the courts to deny to the Canadian Human Rights Commission the right to deal with the case of the Jamaican women. I suggest that my reference to gall is well put.

Then the minister went on to talk about the projects for women that this government has undertaken—rape crisis centres, projects that have helped women to get employment, and providing counsel for them. Where has he been when day after day we on this side of the House have been questioning the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) as to why these projects are being denied additional funding. We have been at that minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) with this story, whether it is Outreach or other programs that are being cut back. This minister has the audacity to stand up today and cite that as an example of something which the government has done for women.

Somewhere down the line he talked about the jobs that had been created for women. He said—I forget the particular category to which he referred—that there are twice as many now as there were then. Of course, two is twice one.

With respect to the judiciary the minister told us that there are many more women being appointed to the bench today than in days gone by, but he did not give any figures. If the number has gone from three up to nine, that is a threefold increase, but it is still hardly substantial enough for a minister to boast about as a sign of what the government is doing for women.

He went on to talk about the jobs for women that the government has created. The government talks all the time about every job created, no matter whether by a private employer or by somebody in a home. Whenever anybody hires a person to do something, it adds to the statistics, and we have the government standing up and saying that it has created some hundreds of thousands of job in a year.

I will pass that subject by because I want to get to the fact which two or three of us on this side of the House tried to bring out the other day. I am referring to the apparent policy of the government in this time of restraint to discriminate against women generally when it comes to layoffs. It is fine to say that more women have been hired, but when the government turns around and lays off proportionately more women than men, I do not know how the minister could have the gall to stand up in the House and say that the government's employment policy, particularly in the public service, is something which proves its dedication to the cause of women.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): His Gaul is divided into three parts.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) says that his Gaul is divided into three parts.

Mr. Orlikow: There is enough of it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, statistics which came to some of us through the plain brown envelope route, and I believe that they are from the Public Service Commission. The minister was anxious for us to go to that particular commission for information. At any rate, the statistics are here and many people have them. If there are some who do not have these statistics, I suggest that they apply to the Ottawa women's lobby.

These statistics illustrate that in the professional and scientific category of the public service there are 18,000 male employees and 5,000 female employees. However, these are times of restraint and people have to be laid off. One would think with that proportion that probably three times as many men as women would be laid off. This government, which is supposedly devoted to the welfare and rights of women, does not work that way. It lays off 70 men and 90 women.

If one takes all the groups on this page of statistics, which have fewer than 50 per cent females working—and this is the key statistic—one finds that 18 per cent of the employees, in all those groups combined, are women; but when it comes to lay-offs, 40 per cent are women. Yet this minister stands up today and cites the government's employment policy in the public service as an example of what it has done for the women in this country, and how we should trust this government in the years that lie ahead, especially to the year 1985.

I will have something to say about 1985 in a moment. One wonders why the minister did not say 1984 as the year that this government will bring total disaster to this country. Time is passing, and I had better not use more statistics from that sheet, but, as I say, we accepted this challenge to get the figures, and the figures in my view do not support the minister's position that this government is carrying on an employment policy in the public service that is attuned to the rights and the needs of women. He can give statistics about the additional number that are being hired—and I would like to know what categories they are in—but the moment restraint is imposed and people have to be laid off, it is the women first.

We are not dealing with a sinking ship where the women are let off first. This is an employment policy which is totally out of keeping with a supposed belief in the equality of women. I think that phrase which was attributed to the minister last year when he said that there is a "collective time lag between conviction and action" is a very lamentable situation.

I have made references about the minister having spoken last year and having given us this same line, except that last year he talked to us more than the Conservative party and this year he has talked more to the Conservative party than to us. I would like to read a paragraph from what the minister said in his speech last year. Once I have read it, I intend to present a challenge to the minister. The part I refer to is on page 3483 of Hansard, March 6, 1978: He referred to a number of areas in which studies should be undertaken and in which the government would hope to make improvements. Then he said:

> In order to have a fresh look at these and other questions which are of interest to women we have decided to develop a plan of action or global policy on the status of women. This will detail both legislation and practice necessary to achieve concrete goals between now and 1985, the end of the international decade for women. We have had initial discussions with the provinces on this question and we hope that many of them will be reviewing their own policies and programs with a view to responding to the needs of their citizens.

That is the paragraph which I wanted to quote, but I will also read the next one.

> As far as we are concerned, there are 25 government departments and about 100 officials who are involved in a complete review of all recommendations made to the government in all areas under its jurisdiction.

That was a pretty massive operation which the minister announced on March 6, 1978, when he stated that there would be a huge study involving 25 departments and 100 officials who were going to look at everything and who were going to develop a plan of action or global policy on the status of women geared to 1985.

I understand—as a matter of fact I have seen it though I do not have it in my possession—that that proposal was implemented in terms of a cabinet paper being produced, approved by the appropriate committee and confirmed by cabinet. The committee in question is the cabinet committee on social policy which made its decision with respect to this document on December 13, 1978. It was confirmed by the entire cabinet on December 21, 1978, and the document was deposited with the supervisor of cabinet papers on January 3, 1979. It is a very bulky document. It certainly fits what the minister said on March 6 last year about what the government was going to do.

As I said, I had that document in my possession for a short while, and I challenge the minister to make it public. The document he produced today, the little booklet in three or four colours, is obviously a public relations effort to try to kid the people of Canada into thinking that something is going to be done.

An hon. Member: It is an election ploy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I challenge the minister to produce the real document in which the cabinet made its decisions as to what it intended to do or not to do.

Everyone knows of my intense interest in questions on pensions in so far as women are concerned. I find in the reference in this cabinet paper to the study of the Department of Finance on pensions that there is a paragraph that says that there are no recommendations to be made regarding pensions for women except further study.

● (1640)

I find, in the section of that cabinet paper which deals with veterans affairs, the suggestion that steps must be taken to establish, equality between men ands women regardless of their various conditions and so on, but there is not a reference to the 48 per cent rule which is one of the most serious forms of discrimination against widows of disabled veterans. There is not a reference to it at all.

I looked in vain in the document for some reference to immigration. There is none. There is a reference to the Department of Employment and Immigration and there is going to be a study of employment matters and so on, but there is no reference to the proposal in the last paragraph of the motion before us today which reads as follows:

(4) adoption of policies that will put an end to the serious exploitation of immigrant women in the Canadian labour force.

There are calls for a study of the impact on our economy of women. We had that statement today from the minister; the government believes in keeping women in mind in the development of our economic structure. Wonderful!

As for the cabinet paper that was issued by the cabinet committee on social policy on December 13 last and confirmed in cabinet on December 21, the key line of which is "get this ready by 1985", there is really no hope in there for the women of this country that things will be any different at all.

If the minister is going to make public that classy coloured document that he tabled today, which is obviously a public relations effort, he should also table the document which tells the real story on what the cabinet does not intend to do for the women of this country.

In my view, there are many ways in which improvements could be made for the women of this country. We are all saying now that they have their right to be out in the work force, and they do; but unless they get equal pay for work of equal value, unless they get equal opportunity at the high level jobs as well as the low level jobs, those words are so much rhetoric.

I think we should take the minister up on his reference to the statement made about some women wanting to stay at home. I believe that women in this country should have that free choice. They should be able to work on an equal basis and if they choose to stay home they should not suffer discrimination because of that decision, particularly in terms of economic security during those working years and more particularly in terms of economic security when it comes time to retire.

When I am through, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues will probably congratulate me for not having devoted the whole of my speech to discrimination against women with respect to pensions, but I am not going to sit down without dealing with that matter. We still have all these ways in which we discriminate against women. There is nothing for them equivalent to what is in the Canada Pension Plan if they stay at home. I know the compilation of the plan is that it is a work-related scheme and all the rest, but there should be an equivalent for women who stay home, and until we get it we cannot talk about equality.

There is, then, the question of the spouse's allowance. For the minister to stand up and quote that as an example of doing something for women is more than I can understand. There are things that all of us here know about because we are involved in the process, but the people out there do not pay attention to things until the time comes. Every year I get a new crop of letters from women who have turned 60 or 61 who hear about the spouse's allowance and then find they cannot get it. They did not know about or pay attention to the legislation when it was introduced in 1975. I get letter after letter which asks how the government could pass that kind of law that would give something to a wife if she has a spouse she is living with who is 65 years of age or over, but nothing from the same legislation if she is widowed or single.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall take only two or three minutes, Mr. Speaker, as I see an hon. member down the way wishes to speak.

I want to declaim again against the tradition that is still with us that says a widow's pension, whether it is under the Public Service Superannuation Act, the armed forces or in the private field, is only 50 per cent of the pension of the husband. I suppose if we go back to the days when pension plans were for husbands only, it was a step forward to get the 50 per cent survivor pension for the widow; but how can we justify that now? A man and wife live together, build their home, build for their future and the day comes when they retire. There are a certain number of dollars of pension, whether public or private. The day comes when one of them dies. If she dies first he gets 100 per cent of the pension, but if he dies first, she gets only 50 per cent of the pension.

We do a little better for ourselves as members of parliament. We seem to manage that. Even in our case, however, if a pensioned member of parliament dies first, his widow gets only 60 per cent, but if the wife dies first the member gets the 100 per cent pension. There is no defence for that in a society that says women have equal rights.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that one of the serious deficiencies in our veterans legislation is in this field. I am not only prepared to admit we have made progress in recent years, I am prepared to assert it. It is a thrill for me to have been part of winning that improved legislation. Surely the time has come when the rights of women who are married to veterans should inure to them as persons in their own right. The widow who has helped care for a veteran who was on a 40 per cent disability pension is just as much in need when he dies as is her sister down the street whose husband was on a 50 per cent pension. In one case there is the full widow's pension, and in the other case no pension at all. We have the problem of widows when the war veterans allowance runs out. It lasts for a year and then drops.

The cabinet document which I have seen says that the Department of Veterans Affairs is being asked to look at things in its legislation that are of concern to women, but there is nothing in there about the War Veterans Allowance Act, about allowances that are discontinued, and not a single reference to the 48 per cent rule.

This is a speech I often make, Mr. Speaker, to women's groups when they come to see me. They usually consist of younger women and they are not concerned about their pensions. I listen to them and then ask, what about pensions? I am diplomatic and tell them they are not of an age when they are thinking about pensions but that I think that is the most serious discrimination of all.

It is bad enough when women have a tough time in the work force or when they are at home instead of out working, but when the retirement years come and there is more for men than for women—and all statistics show that the section of our older community that is having the toughest time is women—that is not fair. It is not the equality that the people across the way try to talk about.

I commend my friend the hon. member for Egmont for producing this motion today. It is good that we are having this debate, as we had a similar debate a year ago. I would remind hon. members opposite, however, that it is not only once a year that they hear from us; they hear from us every week and they will go on hearing from us until something is done to establish real equality for the women of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to express my sincere appreciation to the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) for putting forward such an important motion on the rights of women in Canada. This is not the first opportunity we have had in this House to discuss this parliament's responsibilities to women.

Hardly two months ago, I believe, we had the opportunity to discuss a motion I had the privilege of putting forward to invite all members seriously to consider recognizing the rights of homemakers. When we speak of salaries, jobs for women, the reference is always to women outside the home, whether women as secretaries, women as nurses, or women as workers in clothes manufacturing. But we forget the homemaker does a tremendous job, for which there are no records because she does not have to punch in and out. But she does a tremendous job nonetheless. Not only manual work in preparing meals, mending clothes and so on, but also a fantastic job of bringing up our children. A people having the privilege as we do to have mothers taking their responsibilities as educators is bound to grow, develop and play a tremendous role in the world.

I am therefore happy to see once more that hon. members who spoke before me seriously discussed this matter. I listened closely to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) who earlier spoke to the motion and expressed most valuable views and ideas. And if the Minister of Justice took the time to remain in his seat this afternoon when he had so much to do, this shows how important the matter is. I commend him for that. Of course newspapers tomorrow will say a Social Credit member supports the government, pays tribute, offers congratulations. This does not worry me.

For my part, I want to say quite frankly that when someone in authority accepts his responsibilities towards the country, I believe we must say so and encourage him to do more. Of course we can criticize each other, but I believe this subject is too important for us to show any partisanship. Mr. Speaker, I consider this subject as the continuity of Women's Year a few years ago.

I recall with emotion, Mr. Speaker, the day when Mrs. Morin, who was then Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons and member of parliament for Louis-Hébert in Quebec city, was called upon by all members of the convention and all parliamentarians in Ankara, Turkey, to preside over a very special day, International Women's Day. I have already said this in the House and I want to say it again, she presided with great dignity over all our proceedings and all participants showed much consideration and seriousness in all their speeches made on International Women's Day. Mr. Speaker, not only in what we say but also in our legislation should we recognize the right of women to choose freely as is asked in the motion, which, I must note in passing, is quite well written, especially the first paragraph which reads as follows:

> That this House recognizes the unqualified right of women to work in any and all fields of endeavour and that it urges the government to set an example for the private sector—

Mr. Speaker, it is quite logical for all levels of government to set an example for the private sector, not only in the area mentioned in the motion, but in all other fields. We may invite our fellow citizens to practice such and such a virtue, for instance the virtue of economy, which is certainly a great virtue nowadays. I believe that it was very late last Sunday night on television that I saw a man who travelled to China with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a few years ago. I may be wrong, but I believe that a book, entitled Two Innocents in China was published at that time. And this gentleman, one of these two innocents who are not as innocent as all that, was relating how they used to live in the family home. He did not name the village but it sounded familiar when he spoke of a small village in eastern Quebec. So he recalled, Mr. Speaker, that his mother, though she was not rich, had managed to give her family a reasonable standard of living and how they made good use of things already used but not quite finished. And he gave what I considered a striking example, because I recall seeing my mother do this so many times. When she was breaking eggs to prepare meals she would put the shells one into another and then put them in the oven.

This man told me that when they were dry his mother would crush them and feed them back to the hens to help them produce eggs with a stronger shell. Mr. Speaker, those things may seem old fashioned but we shall have to come back to those customs and principles. We are living in a society where everybody has the right to spend—the more the better—and no one has to save. We talk about an energy crisis, but tomorrow it will be other kinds of crises. I say that there is a crisis among the population, caused by the absence of a cardinal virtue, that of economy. When I was a little boy I attended at the school of my village a conference given by Commander Desjardins, the founder of Caisses Populaires. My father let me go with him and we were not seated as comfortably as we can be these days. They were small hard benches with precious little room. For adults it was not enough, but for little boys like me, it was. So I heard Commander Desjardins talk about savings, the pooling of money to use in the parish or develop means of living, industries or the pooling of our small savings. Today, Mr. Speaker, when we talk about the virtues of saving as opposed to wasting, we are considered old fashioned.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we have the responsibility to go back to the practice of thriftiness. We administer Canada. We are 264 members responsible for legislating to administer our country, and this is called the legislative power. There is the executive power of ministers who implement the laws. Yet, if we go to the trouble of playing our role seriously and making sure that taxpayers' money is spent as wisely as we do in our homes, we shall witness a change in our country and enjoy a high level of prosperity. I am sure of this. It is certainly possible to manage our country efficiently and more economically. Telling others is a lot of fun; you are not compelled to do anything. But to tell oneself to do it and see that it is done with a view to setting an example so that the private sector can act accordingly would be to me of considerable help to the people.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I recall having recently toured Mauritius with a few colleagues. I saw with my own eyes women harvesting sugar cane. That is not an easy job. If our Canadian women had to do that kind of work, they would certainly feel like slaves. I saw that and my friends did too. It is really strenuous work.

Women would go out to the field early in the morning and come back late in the evening. They could be seen with their sickles—

Mr. Nystrom: It was very hot!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, indeed, it was very hot, but they were doing their utmost to contribute to the prosperity of their country which had just become independent. Independence had been granted to them, so they were going out to work precisely in order to earn a living and thereby contribute to the prosperity of the country as a whole.

Let us talk about women's right to work, Mr. Speaker. In this country we sometimes hire cleaning women to ease the burden of elderly people in the upkeep of their homes. Nowadays such women are hard to come by. Yet there is nothing degrading in their job.

Before 8 a.m. this morning on the radio in my office I heard that there was a young man 20 years of age who was offering his services to perform housework. He just wanted to earn a living. He said he was willing to perform housework in private homes. Mr. Speaker, I indeed found it a wonderful thing for a young man 20 years of age to be willing to do housework. I think that this motion is an invitation for us to appreciate the splendid job performed by women and to let them know it. Is it not nice to enter a house and get a feeling of cleanliness around the place! Poverty does not mean that it has to be dirty.

An hon. Member: Even if there is no beauty!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Even if there is no beauty? There is no such thing as a woman who is not beautiful and when the hon. member for Verdun tells us there is no beauty he is insulting women—

Mr. Savard: Even if the house is not beautiful.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Oh, I see, he is talking about the house. But anyway for those who live in it the house is always beautiful.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from a document used by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) when he was still national health and welfare minister on April 4, 1974. In this document we can find statements which are still true today. I remember that one day I introduced a motion—I think it was last year—asking that women who want to stay at home get an income. But one female member of the House got up to say that it did not make sense. This is why I thought that quoting what the Minister of Justice and then minister of national health and welfare said just might help people think differently so that we could adopt as quickly as possible a formula for a guaranteed annual income. We could start with the mother who stays at home. For those who find this idea extraordinary or think it does not make sense, let us start with the case of the homemaker.

Here is what this document says.

The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women gives all the relevant data about this problem and advocates a number of concrete solutions clearly defined which could be considered in the future. It is said in this report that apart from some rare exceptions, the homemaker has to rely on her husband to have some money.

But as it happens often and we know that, as representatives we become almost confessors and we receive extraordinary confidences, but not to be specific, how many times have we heard a married woman say: "I feel embarrassed asking my husband for some money." And yet we all know she needs it. It is as necessary for her as for anybody else to have money to get what she fancies without having to ask her husband: "Give me a few dollars."

This is why we should correct this situation which is sometimes embarrassing for mothers and wives.

It says although they may be receiving family allowances, that money goes for the maintenance of the child and cannot be considered a payment. When Bill C-10 was being considered the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said that the family allowance was not intended for the mother but for the child. Some mothers understand that, and the minister of national health and welfare of the day understood also—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, time really flies. I had not even realized that my 20 minutes were already up. So I thank my colleagues for giving me a few minutes to conclude my speech. I know there are other members who have interesting things to say. So I will conclude in a few seconds by saying that I wholeheartedly support the motion before us and I hope that the debate will serve as a starting point, that it will be a new effort to try and do more to allow women to have rights that will be recognized and upheld better not only when working outside the home but also inside the home.

Mothers watching us now who are having difficulty making ends meet and think what we are saying might prompt the government to ensure better distribution of the gross national output to give them a supplementary income which would be added to the income the father gets from working at the plant, the yard or anywhere he can to earn money. Then mothers would be proud to say: Finally, we are in a very civilized country in Canada and the role of mothers, of all married or unmarried women contributing to society is being recognized in a tangible way.

Mr. Speaker, I remember where we went during the last war when we needed soldiers. We went to homes with children where there were boys and girls to take on the responsibility of defending our freedoms, of defending Christianity. That is where we went. If those women were able to provide our country with the elements essential to our survival, let us be grateful enough to give them a recognition that will allow them to live honourably in this country on an equal basis with men.

[English]

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be addressed to the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) to compliment him on having introduced this motion today. I congratulate the hon. member for having done so just as on previous occasions I have congratulated the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for bringing this important subject to the floor of the House. How else, Mr. Speaker, do we ever get this issue discussed here if it is not through the initiatives of members of opposition parties? It is never the government which brings it forward. The minister who spoke earlier, the minister responsible for the status of women, has held that responsibility for five years yet only once in that five years has he taken personal initiative to bring the question of women's rights to the floor of this chamber. That is a shocking indictment.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he admired the minister's gall for speaking as he did this afternoon. I do not know about that. I do not know whether I feel angered or saddened by the way the minister spoke. I say this because I find that with regard to women in the work force, with regard to their economic status, the government allows them to take one step forward and then forces them to take two steps backward in some kind of fancy gavotte.

The minister presented us with a public relations document, as it was called earlier. Mr. Speaker, if we had not initiated this debate today he would never have brought it into the House of Commons. He would have gone elsewhere, outside the chamber, to try to peddle his booklet. And what is it entitled? It is headed: "Towards Equality for Women". If he had only bothered to read the motion in the name of the hon. member for Egmont, he would have noticed that it states that we accept the fundamental premise of equality for women. We do not have to work toward it; we accept it as a fundamental premise in this country, whereas the government has said we are only moving toward equality for women, that this is not something which is accepted as one of the fundamental rights. That is what I mean by taking one step forward and two steps backward.

It is the attitude of the government on this whole question that forces us to bring this issue to the floor of the House of Commons time and time again. I am saddened by what the minister has said this afternoon because unfortunately he showed not the slightest glimmer of understanding the magnitude of this issue in all its perspectives and what it means to millions of people across this country. Nor has he recognized the role the federal government can play in providing leadership. All we got from him was a recital, once again, of short-term programs, ad hoc measures and stopgap procedures, all of which we have heard over and over again.

At the same time he lashed out at opposition parties, the provinces, the Public Service Commission and the trade unions. Why? Obviously because he feels a sense of remorse and guilt on this whole subject. I am staggered by the attitude of the minister. I have gone back over some of his speeches. I have looked at what he said to us in 1974 when International Women's Year was approaching. He said then:

I am honoured to be given the responsibility of guiding government policy in this area and I intend to devote a good deal of time and effort to bringing about the necessary changes in our laws and in our society so that women and men will be able to participate fully in all activities of life.

Five years later we get a document from him saying that women are going to be able to move toward equality. The minister was so honoured by his responsibility that since 1974 he has addressed this issue once in the House of Commons. When he is asked questions he always has some excuse to explain why he did not bring in a program, why he failed to secure a commitment on the part of the federal government to the full principle of equality for women.

Listening to the minister this afternoon I was reminded of a phrase from Macaulay. It goes like this:

● (1720)

From all the angelic ranks goes forth a groan, "How long, O Lord, how long?" The still small voice makes answer "Wait and see, O sons of glory, what the end shall be."

Mr. Speaker, it may stretch your imagination to see members of the opposition as the angelic ranks groaning "How long, O Lord, how long?" on this issue, but it takes less imagination to see the minister as the still small voice saying "wait and see, wait and see," particularly when he brings forward a document saying "Towards Equality". Yes, indeed, the tokenism of International Women's Year has been surpassed this afternoon. We no longer have just tokenism; we have empty words.

I do not lay the entire burden of this issue on the federal government, but I do expect the federal government to show leadership, and that is what has been lacking. I do not expect the government to be able to legislate attitudes or to move mountains, but I recall the words of a former colleague of mine who is now the chairman of the Human Rights Commission when he spoke on this subject some eight years ago. He said:

All that governments can really do is lead, that is their mandate. They can influence people because of the information they give and the leadership they exercise. They can lead people into changing attitudes and ways of thinking about problems.

What has this government done to lead people into changing attitudes and thinking about problems? I would say that in the five years the minister has been in his position, very little. Oh yes, we heard him this week. We heard him evade answers about what would happen when his colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) moves to repeal the rights of immigrant women before the Human Rights Commission; he is moving to appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal. The minister responsible for the status of women evaded that question. He will not face up to it.

Women's Right to Work

When the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) announced a new policy this week about women, he said "Last hired, first fired". The minister responsible for the status of women did not enlarge on that. He evaded the issue once again. Is that changing attitudes? Is that providing leadership?

I am interested in several areas where government thinking should be changing to keep up with changing realities, but instead where government policy reflects anything but a change. In these areas the government's thinking is as rigid, unbending and unchanging as the rock of Gibraltar. I am thinking, first, of labour market projections and the planning which must go with them, planning which must be done at the federal level. The government's planning in relation to the job market does not reflect any change in ways of thinking about problems. Rather, it shows that the same old thinking is at work in not responding to exciting possibilities or potential regarding women in the work force. There is not that kind of thinking. Instead, we are locked into the same old problems. We are locked into facing this situation in a way which will add to women's problems rather than solve them.

I would like to direct the attention of the House to the government's economic forecasters in the Department of Finance and others who have predicted a labour shortage in the 1980s based on the belief that the increase in the participation rate for women in the work force will subside.

Last February the Department of Finance published a study on medium term economic trends, and in it the department predicted that the women's participation rate would rise from 46 per cent of the working age population in 1976 to 47.4 per cent in 1981, to 48.9 per cent in 1986 and to 49.5 per cent in 1990. That is what the government is basing its employment policies on, participation of women in the work force of 49.5 per cent in 1990.

These predictions upon which the government has been basing its economic and employment policies could not be more wrong. Already, in 1979, women have reached the participation rate in the work force which the planners predicted for 1986. A recent publication of the C. D. Howe Institute put it this way:

Labour-market analysts have consistently underestimated the growth of the Canadian labour force in the 1970s, mainly because they assumed the female participation rate must be reaching its upper limit.

The government's analysts were wrong about the 1970s, and they will be wrong about the 1980s because of their belief that the participation rate of women has peaked and will subside. On what is this belief based? On what are these projections based? Certainly not on the fact that women have more education, which they have, are demanding greater economic independence, which they are, or are having smaller families or even no families. Yet that is the reality in Canada today. Women have more education, are more independent and many are choosing to have fewer family responsibilities, all factors which point to increased rather than decreased participation in the work force. Yet the government blindly assumes that the influx of women into the work force has reached its peak.

Just recently the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development predicted an 85.8 per cent participation rate for women in Sweden by 1990. Closer to home, even in the United States the prediction is a 60.8 per cent participation rate for women by 1980. Yet the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), clinging to the analysts' top rate of 49.5 per cent of Canadian women in the work force by 1980, says quite emphatically of the increased rate of participation of women in Canada, as reported by the Toronto Star of February 22: "We expect this rapid increase will taper off in the future". That is what the Minister of Finance says, and that is what the Minister of Employment and Immigration bases his employment policies on.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration says that we must look forward to a strategy which will help fill the employment gap over the next several years. How can he be so sure that there will be an employment gap? The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration are attacking new problems with their old thinking. It has already been shown that that thinking is totally wrong. Why do they carry on with it? The reason they carry on with it is that they think and state that women wanting to work is just a passing phase. That is what they are thinking, and they base their planning on that. They think that this is an abberation which will pass.

Among other prestigious groups, the C. D. Howe Institute thinks otherwise. That institute looks at the situation realistically. Understanding that the factors contributing to the higher female participation rate—higher education, lower fertility and increased urbanization—are unlikely to change through the 1980s and 1990s, the institute says this:

> There are strong reasons for arguing that the behaviour of women will continue to change.

That is the assumption on which predictions about the job market should be based. Women in the work force are here to stay. They will join the work force in increasing numbers, and not just in programs like LEAP at Spence Bay, which the minister cited as an example of what the government has done.

There are almost four million women in the Canadian work force now, and there is no reason why we should not think there might be five million in another few years. Perhaps an additional million women will be in the work force, perhaps more, at a time when the traditional occupational roles for women are already becoming more than saturated.

Those are the matters the government should address itself to. I did not hear one word about them today. We will see more and more women coming into the work force and finding the traditional roles they occupy are no longer open to them. This kind of situation calls for imaginative thinking and planning on the part of the government. It calls for positive and innovative thinking of a kind which says: "What can we do to best marshal the potential of this group of people?" It does not call for the negative and stale thinking of the government which says: "What can we do to cope with this problem until things return to normal?" That is the kind of situation we have seen in government thinking over the years. It has brought about the situation we face today. It will not be diminished if we carry on with the lack of innovation which the government has shown in recent months and certainly prior to that.

If we take a positive and innovative approach to this situation, it could lead to new attitudes concerning work and training suitable for women. The new attitudes could have women filling the predicted shortages we hear so much about in the skilled trades. We have heard so much about shortages in sheet metal work, woodworking and a number of skilled trades such as electrical and plumbing. Skilled trades should be open to women far more than they are today. While it may be heartening to note that men are moving into the jobs of secretaries or bank clerks in a manner that they were not ten years ago, it is less heartening to note that women are not making much headway in the highly paid, skilled worker category. We need to break down the attitudinal barriers which keep women out of many occupations. The government can show the way to business, unions and the trade labour movement through its manpower training programs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that her allotted time has expired. She may continue with unanimous consent? Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) contains many articles. To some extent it has sprung from the complaints of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women which indicated that its advice was not requested before amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act were introduced. It is understandable that the advisory committee would be unhappy about not being consulted, if indeed this was the case. However, the real answer to having policies which reflect the current needs of women is for every government department official to be aware of the impact of policies on women.

At the present time the major obstacles to the recruitment and promotion of women have been long since removed, but the difficulties which remain are more subtle and pervasive. Therefore, they require more vigilance and greater sophistication. Perhaps I might state my personal bias. I have always seen the struggle for women's rights as being very much in the context of human rights. Of course, this has been the tradition of the Canadian women's rights movement. The most effective measures to assist women in the labour force very often are ones which also have the effect of opening up certain jobs to young men or men with unusual qualifications.

A few moments ago I mentioned that most of the major obstacles to equality have been removed. I should like to list a few of these obstacles in so far as they affect federal government employees. In 1971 the equal employment opportunities office in the Public Service Commission was set up. One must remember that it was established to ensure equal employment opportunities for women, native peoples and other traditionally disadvantaged groups. Also in 1971 there was the defence council direction that women be employed in the Canadian forces on the same basis as men in all classification except combatant, sea-going duties and isolated positions.

In 1971 the Unemployment Insurance Act included age, sex and marital status as prohibitive grounds for discrimination. Also in 1971 the Canada Labour Code prohibited discrimination on the grounds of sex and marital status.

In 1974 the Public Service Commission removed from its questionnaire and job application forms all mention of sex, age and numbers of dependants. Between 1971 and 1974 obvious discriminatory factors were removed, but we were left with matters which perhaps are more subtle and therefore require more vigilance.

In 1972 a cabinet direction required every government department to have a senior official whose duty was to consider the effects of policies on women. Of course, this official is quite separate from the equal opportunities for women employee. If the official concerned with policies at the Unemployment Insurance Commission had been as much concerned with style as with substance—and there are times when I think one must be—he or she would have moved earlier to get rid of the economists' jargon which refers to women as "secondary earners". It is economists' jargon but it offends. It offends for reasons concerned with the status of women at this time. Since women are just taking their places as permanent members of the labour force, it is offensive to apply the term "secondary earner" to someone who may work part time or may be required to take summers off to meet family responsibilities if there is no affordable child care available. The term "secondary earner" offends.

The comparable piece of economists' jargon which refers to men between the ages of 25 and 44 as "prime rate males" does not offend in the same way, because generally a 45-year old man is quite secure in his occupation or profession. He knows what his earnings are, what his pension plan is, and he is not upset by being categorized as non-prime rate.

It was more the style than what was done by the Unemployment Insurance Commission which raised a lot of distress. People have seen an unfortunate style as an indication of changing government policy. The essential change made in the act at that time was that part-time workers working less than 20 hours a week were no longer allowed to contribute to the unemployment insurance fund. This was the substantive change. Interestingly enough, the only complaint I received was from a male teacher in my constituency. He made the point that in the present state of things he cannot work more than 20 hours a week in one job, and that there is administrative rigidity in requiring people to work over 20 hours with one employer.

If, indeed, this particular exclusion from eligibility for unemployment insurance for people who work 20 hours a week or less with one employer is causing a hardship, it certainly should be reviewed. But this is only one indication of the long neglect of part-time workers of this country, and this has been a neglect by the employer and by unions. Part-time workers generally have not had access to pension plans, sickness benefits or even to regular pay increases, and unions have not considered that they have the same responsibilities for their part-time workers as for their full-time workers.

Since women, very often by reason of family responsibility, have no choice but to work part time when the money is needed, I think it is high time that part-time workers received more attention. That attention should be directed not only toward a possible change in respect of unemployment insurance benefits, but should also be directed toward the benefits they have and the treatment they receive when they are employed.

I might just mention here something about the attitude of unions to family responsibility, and I do not mean in any way to single out unions for particular criticism because I think in this regard they have been reflecting society's values. Recently when I took up the cudgels for a woman working in a Crown corporation who needed a shift change because of family responsibility, I found that management was willing to accommodate her but the union insisted that changes in shifts be handled strictly on the basis of seniority. I can see why, because it perhaps builds in a certain equity. But I suggest that it also might be equally important for unions and management jointly, whether in the federal civil service, the provincial civil service or in private industry, to look again at the treatment of part-time workers, and also to look at the question of whether seniority must always be the overriding factor or whether there are other parameters which should be looked at too.

I remind hon. members, too, that when the equal pay for work of equal value provision was written into our human rights legislation a couple of years ago there were unions which were unhappy about that and were afraid this might interfere with some of their traditional seniority requirements.

The federal government only controls or can regulate something like 10 per cent of the labour force, but it is obviously important that the trend or the example set should be models where possible.

It is interesting to note—and the full potential in this regard has not been realized—the access women have in the Department of National Defence. In a peacetime army the emphasis on trade and technical training is tremendous. Since the military is so performance oriented, the increase in the number of women with skilled training is perhaps an indication of the fact that in the army the woman who can perform a job competently quickly gets recognition for this and then more jobs start to open up. The tasks they do in the army are measurable, but also they have very good measurement techniques, and we have women in the army able to get into technical training more easily than they can in certain community colleges in this country. In addition to their training they will also get experience that will stand them in good stead when they return to civilian life.

Another initiative of the federal government that has received rather less attention than it might, but which I think is having far-reaching benefits, is the voluntary compliance provision whereby firms doing business with the Government of Canada are expected to have, if not affirmative action programs, an awareness of the need to provide equal opportunities for women.

To return to what I said a little while ago about the need for subtlety and for better evaluation, we put a measure in place in the public service a long time ago which is not producing the results it should. This was a measure that includes on a classification form a space for voluntary experience. This has potential benefit for a woman who has been out of the labour force raising children but who in the course of that time may have gained tremendous administrative and organizational experience while working with voluntary organizations. The theory was that this would be recognized when a woman returned to work so that she might very well be able to enter at a position other than at the entry level.

This has not worked, and it has not worked because the techniques of evaluating that voluntary experience are not well developed. I think this is an important measure to develop. Again this is one which, in addition to benefiting women who have been out of the labour force, should also benefit the man who perhaps has not had very much formal education but who may have a tremendous commitment to his community, a lot of energy and ability that can be reflected in promotion if the system were able to evaluate it.

One of the other rigidities of the public service which sometimes limits the access of women to jobs is a built-in male bias that is not overt but occurs in terms of qualifications. For example, for a job as inspector under some of the regulatory authorities, if one of the job requirements is an absolute one of five years on a police force, the effect of that will be to exclude women. If the requirement is written with some equivalencies, then women who have had other kinds of experience in which they have developed an ability to assess conflicting facts and have shown an ability to evaluate conflicting evidence and produce factual reports, could qualify. Equally, men who do not have those rigid qualifications would be eligible.

Within the public service at this time we are at a stage for the most part of not needing new laws or regulations, but rather more subtle, more careful and more committed administration of what is in existence.

To return to the question of pensions, which I think has been addressed by almost every speaker, when middle and upper income people are pre-planning their retirement they usually have at least four planks; savings, the Canada Pension Plan or old age security, a pension plan from their work and perhaps some additional purchased retirement plan such as an RRSP. Low earners depend on the Canada Pension Plan and old age security or state provided plans. Women overwhelmingly find themselves in this position, partly because family responsibilities have taken them in and out of the labour force and they have not been able to build up credits. Even with the Canada Pension Plan their credits may be lower than they might have been.

Miss MacDonald: Oh, oh!

Miss Nicholson: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has had her time. If there is some particular reason why she would like the floor, perhaps she could advise me and I will sit down; otherwise I will continue.

Miss MacDonald: Very thin skinned.

Miss Nicholson: As I was saying before I was interrupted by noise from the other side, the majority of women are absent from the labour force for long periods during which they contribute to society by raising children. This reduces their ability to build up pension benefits in their own right and as a result each is dependent on her husband's financial planning for retirement.

Even if the husband worked with a firm that had a good retirement plan, it does not necessarily mean that the wife will receive a pension after his death. As we know, women generally live longer than men, but only 45 per cent of all members of employers' sponsored plans in 1976 belonged to plans that paid a widow a pension, and in most cases that pension was only 50 per cent of the husband's entitlement. It is for reasons of this kind, with women not being able to build up pension credit themselves, that in 1975 more than two thirds of all women over the age of 65 had cash incomes below $3,500.

I raised this question of pensions when I first spoke in this House in 1974. I pointed out at that time that many firms have an earlier compulsory retirement age for women than for men, which results in lower contributions from both employee and employer and therefore lower benefits. Although this practice was changing at that time, almost one quarter of the women enrolled in pension plans were required to retire at an earlier age than men under the same plans.

If the earlier retirement age is combined with low earnings and late entry—because many plans also delay vesting for women—then the pension is doubly or triply depressed. The whole question of pensions is one which involves provincial governments and private industry at least as much as the federal government. It is a question to which we are hearing different solutions at the present time. The Toronto Star has been advocating that the Canada Pension Plan be increased and that the people be encouraged to reduce their dependence on private plans. Other people are saying that the insurance industry should be much more flexible. It needs to build up earlier vesting, easier portability and perhaps require permanent vesting at an earlier stage in a person's work career. Whatever the solution, I think it is urgent that this be addressed. I hope that the federal-provincial ministers' conference planned for next year on the economic position of women will devote considerable—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but her allotted time has expired. She may continue with unanimous consent. Does the parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the minister is not here today, that he did not have the courtesy to stay through the debate. The minister touts his great ability and his great concern for women but he cannot even sit through the debate. It is a disgrace.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is having trouble with his gall.

Mrs. Pigott: He is having trouble with some of his members too. It would be very good for the minister if his colleagues on that side would tell him to watch the wonderful story of Agnes MacPhail which is on television tonight. It is a story which could teach him more in an hour than he has learned in his while life, as far as I am concerned.

An hon. Member: She was a socialist.

Mrs. Pigott: She was a woman who cared about half the people in this country, the half who are women, and that is more than you care about.

The hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) mentioned in her speech that she did not receive many comments back about the changes for part-time people under the UIC bill. There are 1,129,000 women who are interested in part-time work. They should be considered a resource, not a penalty, as the government considers them. I just do not think that the government realizes that the stag party is over in politics, government, business and in labour unions. For the first time since womankind came out of the trees, women are now going on the hunt. I would like to salute the United States for their Uncle Sam. He is a traitor to his sex because he has ordered the hunt to be opened to women and that they be given equal opportunity.

The title of the minister's booklet is, "Towards Equality". Where on earth has the minister been? This book was printed with my tax money. The thing which he must remember is that his and her signs are now out in this world. Why has this government been so slow to act? The women's revolution, the women's movement, has been in force for ten to 15 years in this country.

As I was sitting here today I began to wonder about what the matter is, and I now know what it is. The minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) are afraid of women. It is the only excuse which I can find. They are afraid of women as peers, as colleagues and as equals in running this country.

Perhaps the problem is that, with very exceptions, there have been no role models between men and women in government circles, but we intend to change that. I discovered today watching you people over there that I think your Prime Minister and your Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) think of women as wives, mothers, sweethearts or girlfriends. They do not look at women as co-workers—

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mrs. Pigott: —or you would have done a lot more.

An hon. Member: To the Chair.

Mrs. Pigott: Pardon, me, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I know the wife of Mr. Speaker and he understands women's revolution. The reason this government has been so slow is that it has been dragging its feet. They are a group of fearful men.

Mr. McIsaac: We're scared when you come into the House, Jean.

Mrs. Pigott: We on this side of the House see a monumental opportunity to harness a virtually untapped energy, to put into service in this nation limitless new brain power and a totally fresh perspective. One way or the other women will be in the hunt. They will move into the decision-making areas to manage this country. I hope that the poor Minister of Justice will lose his fear of women. He has nothing to lose but the chains of the past and the limits of his own growth as a human being.

I would like to comment on the motion because there is the tremendous challenge that if the government could set an example for the private sector—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11) proceedings on the motion have expired.

This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTION OF MORTGAGE INTEREST EXPENSE—GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

This afternoon, the government of the province of Saskatchewan intends to announce that it will permit the deduction of mortgage interest expense from personal income taxes, thus repudiating the national Leader of the New Democratic Party who says that such a program is a sop to the rich and does nothing to help the poor.

Mr. Broadbent: That is no good; you have your facts wrong.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu):

That this House directs the government to follow the precedent, set by at least some of their NDP brothers, reverse their previous wrong-headed policy, and recommends that the federal government introduce a similar program of mortgage interest deductibility together with property taxes deductibility for the benefit of all Canadian taxpayers.

I want to thank the Leader of the New Democratic Party for also agreeing.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: How do you feel about being repudiated, Ed? It is a divided party.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO WOMEN'S ORGANIZATION TO FIGHT FOR FAIR PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this being International Women's Day, I believe that we should recognize and try to assist a group of women in this country who are trying to do something about one of the serious problems that faces all our people.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House calls on the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make available to WARP, Women Against Rising Prices, the necessary funding and the assistance of his department so that this movement, which is mobilizing Ontario consumers, can become a national organization and give leadership to consumers from coast to coast in the fight for fair prices.

Mr. Speaker: According to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

MEASURES TO ENSURE ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF OIL TO EAST COAST REFINERIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion.

Considering the scope of the recommendations in the report of the National Energy Board published on February 28 past; considering the precarious and uncertain situation of eastern Canada following reduced fuel supplies from Iran; considering the decision of Exxon Corporation to divert oil supplies meant for Canada to the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That the government seriously consider the possibility of extending the Sarnia-Montreal gas pipeline into eastern Canada so that the energy needs of that part of the country are met and that we are no longer dependent on multinationals and oil exportating countries.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such motion to be presented for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST APPLICATION DEADLINE BE EXTENDED FOR SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM FOR STUDENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

On February 20, the Minister of National Health and Welfare sent out a news release announcing the Health Activities Summer Employment Program for Students, with an application deadline of February 28, 1979. It arrived at one of its destinations right here in Ottawa on March 2, 1979, three days past the deadline. This made it impossible for the sponsoring association to notify students nationally and students who would have benefited from this opportunity were not able to participate.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick):

That this House instruct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to extend the deadline of the Health Activities Summer Employment Program for Students—HASEPS—to the end of March so that sufficient time is available for applications to be made.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COST OF EXTENDING TV COVERAGE OF PROCEEDINGS TO MONCTON AND OTHER AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas special arrangements have been made to carry the televised proceedings of the House of Commons, commencing Monday, March 12, 1979, to various parts of Canada, including an arrangement with the Moncton cable station; whereas the exact arrangements and agreements across Canada have not been revealed; and whereas these areas have gone without such programming for some time now, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House commends this venture and requests that a full disclosure be made as to the arrangements, agreements and costs, particularly in light of the fact that the Moncton cable station bears no cost and the timing almost appears to be politically oriented.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LABOUR DISPUTES

BARGAINING IN DISPUTE BETWEEN INCO AND USWA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to seek the unanimous consent of the House for my motion.

In view of the fact that 11,600 workers are on strike against Inco Ltd., and in view of the fact that the recent revelation under the Election Expenses Act shows that for 1977 Inco Ltd. gave to the Liberal party of Canada, $20,500 and $20,000 to the Conservative party of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instructs the Liberal government to meet with their friends in the boardroom of Inco Ltd. and press upon them the need to bargain in good faith with local 6500, USWA, whose members have been on strike for six months because of the arrogance and intransigence of this multinational giant.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate by the House at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF 20-HOUR WORK WEEK REQUIREMENT FOR LONGSHOREMEN AND MARINE WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The new eligibility requirement respecting a 20-hour work week imposed by the unemployment insurance regulations has undermined the marine work force and threatens the shipping industry in eastern Canada. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir):

That this House direct the Minister of Employment and Immigration to present to the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission an amendment removing the 20-hour requirement in the case of longshoremen and marine workers to protect the viability of the eastern shipping industry.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented at this time, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF ADMIRAL HARRY D. TRAIN

Mr. Speaker: Before we begin question period, may I ask all our colleagues to join with me in signalling the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished visitor in the person of Admiral Harry D. Train, Supreme Allied Commander of our forces in the Atlantic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUFFICIENCY OF PRODUCTION QUOTAS—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday, in an interview with Canadian Press—a news agency that is known for its integrity and accuracy—the minister is quoted as having said that the government is about to bring in measures to increase production quotas for federal and provincial marketing agencies and to bring in new incentives to fishermen and farmers to increase production.

● (1415)

My question to the minister is, has he satisfied himself that present quotas are not sufficient to meet consumer demand? Can he also tell the House if this matter has been agreed to by the various provincial governments?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the stories were incorrect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You and Marc Lalonde.

Mr. Stevens: Were they four-fifths right?

Mr. Allmand: O-o-o-h! It is like a Greek tragedy, Mr. Speaker. I explained to the reporter what the supply policies were. I stated that production quotas had been increased by several marketing boards for the 1979 calendar year, and in fact the government had increased the beef quota by seven million pounds for this year, but it was too early yet to know what the effects of those increased production quotas would be.

I said that the government was looking at other alternatives, but they would be announced by the Minister of Agriculture or by the boards in due course; and that is all I said.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, under the rules of this House I have to accept the minister's word, but Canadian Press is under no such restraint and I leave the minister to the Canadian Press.

I ask the minister this: Was he accurately quoted in a story on March 1 when he referred to the fact that the government would be bringing in measures to deal with supply shortages, and was he accurately quoted on February 22 when he also alluded to this in an interview outside the House? If he was not accurately quoted, perhaps he would tell the House exactly what he did say on March 1.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I did say that we were examining supply policies and I did say that marketing boards under the government had increased their supply or production quotas for this year. I said it was too early yet to know what the results would be. I also said that those boards have the flexibility to change their quotas from time to time, but if they did so, that would be announced as the year went on.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, this morning in the Standing Committee on Agriculture, the Minister of Agriculture expressed the fact that he had not been consulted by his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Did the minister consult with the Minister of Agriculture when he came to the conclusion that quotas were insufficient at the present time to meet consumer demand, notwithstanding the fact that in the case of chicken, for example—on which the minister was confronted with questions regarding profiteering and price gouging—he replied that this was as a result of increased consumer demand, whereas his colleague said there is a surplus of four million pounds of chicken on hand? It would seem to me that this minister is going around like a chicken with his head cut off: he does not know what he is doing.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture was reacting to the press story which was incorrect. By the way, the headlines were even worse; they in no way reflected the story written by the reporter. The Minister of Agriculture had no chance to talk to me before he was asked to comment on those stories. I spoke to him afterwards. He told me he said in committee that several of the marketing boards did increase their quotas for 1979 and that we did increase our beef import quotas. So far as I know, we are together on that.

Oral Questions

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INCREASING FOOD IMPORTS

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has become the leading spokesman on behalf of the government for the development of agriculture and food policy.

He has denied the CP story, but he cannot deny the fact that he indicated inside and outside the House that he is considering several options and several proposals. That minister should recognize that the major contributing factor to food prices is really the record of this government and its policies—high interest rates, high inflation—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member intend to ask a question?

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wise: Does the minister agree with the concept of increasing imports and increasing the value of imported foods? Does he agree that that concept is the proper answer to today's food prices?

● (1420)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well informed, I think, in many instances—maybe not in all—on what the marketing policies are for our marketing boards that have control of poultry products. They have a pricing formula that they use for increased production of poultry as the provincial boards have set for meat. What they are going to do is not under a full-fledged agency at this time.

There is a sizeable increase. For the month of January, I believe it shows a 20 per cent increase in slaughter. It shows a big increase in the amount of poultry. It does not necessarily mean that because you are going to increase import quotas of any products, the consumers are going to get any benefit. Some history shows just the opposite of that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. I would ask him to put aside his usual barnyard verbiage and answer my question. Does he agree with the concept that if we increase import quotas, that is the answer to the food crisis? Just a "Yes" or "No" would be quite sufficient.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows my philosophy on import quotas. As he is as closely associated with the barnyard as I am, I am sure he is familiar with barnyard language. At least, he claims to be when he is on the hustings.

[Mr. Allmand.]

The production of poultry in Canada has, as he knows, the greatest efficiency in the history of our poultry production. We have the know-how and the means. He also knows that because of our agreements with our trading partners, when we go into a supply-management system we have to negotiate the quota for the imports of that product from our trading partners, those with whom we normally do business. We are doing this with the United States at the present time. Therefore, it does not necessarily mean it will have any effect on prices if you increase import quotas because, as I said, there is ample poultry in stock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EMPLOYMENT

COUNSELLING PROGRAMS FOR WOMEN—REQUEST THAT FUNDING NOT BE REDUCED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A secret cabinet document dated December 21, 1978, a copy of which I have here, in a reference to the National Plan of Action on the Status of Women refers to the need of counselling programs for hard-to-place clients such as women. It states, on page 57, "Staff training programs and counselling techniques should be developed for such women".

Considering that Women's Career Counselling Service here in Ottawa performs precisely this function now, and was informed just yesterday of a 45 per cent cut in its budget, and given the commitment made in this cabinet document, is the government prepared to practice what it preaches and completely restore this budget?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I have my figures right, that particular project was sponsored to the extent of close to $280,000 for the past four or five years. The program was looked at very carefully, both in discussion with people in the program and the people that they assisted. We looked at it very carefully and determined that the cost for placement that they were involved in was very, very expensive—something like $324 per placement, as opposed to much lower figures for other placements. On that basis, it was determined that some of the functions they are performing are necessary and are being done in an efficient and effective way, so that program will continue, but with reduced financing.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister knows, as well, that this program in this city as well as in London, Toronto, Saskatoon and a number of other cities has either been cut back or eliminated. They were outperforming the department of manpower precisely because they were set up to do that. He is now cutting back.

I now would like to go to the minister responsible for the status of women, the Minister of Justice. Yesterday, the minister tabled in this House a National Plan of Action on the Status of Women which recommends study in 21 areas, research in 15, examination in 10, reviews in 6, but action now in no areas at all.

● (1425)

Considering that his colleague, the Minister of Labour, has not replaced the head of the women's bureau in his own department—the vacancy has existed for two years—and considering the budget of the women's bureau has been cut from $200,000 to $29,000 will the minister, who is advocating all these studies and research programs for the future, commit himself to some action by urging his colleague to reappoint the head of the women's bureau and reinstate its budget?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): The hon. member is as wrong in the second part of his question as he was in the first part making allegations against the Department of Employment and Immigration. He has got his figures all wrong, and all I can advise him to do is go back and read the National Plan of Action and he will find out.

As far as the general and argumentative introduction to the hon. member's question is concerned, he is wrong—and that is nothing new for him.

As to the specific question he asked, I want to advise him that a number of the functions which had been assigned to the Department of Labour have been assumed by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. For instance, the whole area of contract compliance and the development of Affirmative Action programs has been taken over by the Department of Employment and Immigration. It is, therefore, understandable and normal that some of the functions which have been transferred should appear in the budget of the Department of Employment and Immigration. So I suggest the hon. member should get his facts straight with regard to all the questions he has raised. I believe he will then think twice.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I shall be rising at three o'clock on a question of privilege. The minister, without any validation, has said I was misinforming the House. I want him to document that accusation at three o'clock, or withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Broadbent: The government admits in this cabinet document on the National Plan of Action on the Status of Women—on page 3—that it has been referring to women as secondary wage earners. Since 40 per cent of our labour force is female, and since this rate has changed by less than 1 per cent a year over the past decade—there has been no significant change, contrary to what the government likes to suggest—will the minister assure the House that this highly phoney and false description of women in the economy will not be used in government publications in the future?

Mr. Lalonde: We have not been using the expression "secondary wage earner" in the National Plan of Action or in any of the statements made by ministers for a long while except when quoting some economists in certain circumstances. The government's policy has been stated and restated constantly over the last few years: that women are in the work force because they want to be there and because they need to be.

We welcome the increased participation of women in the work force. We believe women should have complete freedom of choice and opportunity in the field of work, whether they want to work at home or outside the home. All our policies are oriented in that direction. As to the statistics given by the hon. member about the participation rate, I fail to see how he can pretend there has been no increase in the participation rate of women over the last while.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS SURPLUSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology.

The National Energy Board noted in its recent report that a possible surplus of 2,000 billion cubic feet of gas could be exported to the United States, adding in the same breath that there could be a gas shortage in Canada by 1992. Can the minister explain how he intends to approach and reconcile, during the talks on the issue of new gas export permits, the obvious contradiction in what the National Energy Board said, namely that Canada can export that surplus gas over the short term but that, over the long term, it will have to face a shortage of gas?

● (1430)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board made it quite clear that there has been a significant increase in our supplies, some 4.7 trillion cubic feet, and that the prospects for additional supplies are very good. There has been record activity and growth.

The board also indicated that it set aside substantial reserves for Canadians and particularly for eastern Canadians. In addition to that and in addition to a simple reserves test, the board introduced two additional tests to protect Canadians with respect to future gas supplies. Those two tests are based on deliverability of current reserves and of current reserves plus expected additions. Those two additional tests provide an additional measure of security for Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I feel there is an obvious contradiction here, for the minister surely knows that, if Canada now seems to have surplus gas, it is because the National Energy Board used another formula to arrive at those figures. Canada, to my mind, has no more surpluses today than it had before the report was published. The data were manipulated, that is all. How then can the minister consider selling a surplus, which in fact does not exist if one bears in mind the new formula for arriving at surplus figures, and the eventual shortage of gas?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member reads my answer to his first question, he will see that there has been a substantial increase in reserves since the last report of the National Energy Board. I indicated that the increase in the reserves is 4.7 trillion cubic feet. That is a very substantial additional volume of gas. I also indicated that the surplus as calculated by the National Energy Board—surplus to Canadian needs and therefore exportable—is based on a formula which provides for 2 trillion cubic feet. Those 2 trillion cubic feet are subject to the two additional tests introduced by the National Energy Board which I mentioned.

REQUEST PIPELINE BE EXTENDED FROM SARNIA TO EASTERN CANADA VIA MONTREAL

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, considering the minister's answer, can he tell us whether his department is taking steps to extend the Sarnia-Montreal gas pipeline from Montreal to eastern Canada?

Mr. Guay: And to Lévis.

Mr. Beaudoin: And to Lévis, as the hon. member says.

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that the government welcomes the additional reserves and the exportable surplus. I have indicated that I felt that there should be a linkage between exports which might be authorized and the building and development of a pipeline which would serve Canadians east through Quebec and into the Atlantic regions of Canada. That exportable surplus could be linked in a way which would make an otherwise uneconomic line economic.

TOURISM

REASON FOR DEFICIT IN CURRENT ACCOUNT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in connection with the huge deficit in our current account and the international balance of payments of $5.29 billion in goods and services which is mostly accounted for by the services trade deficit of over $8 billion. Of that amount, $1.72 billion was the net outflow of tourism in 1978.

I want to ask the minister to explain this. Why was that the result, when he stated in February of 1978 to the great Liberal policy-making convention that Canada would come, and I quote, "awfully close to balancing its tourism budget this year after two years' deficits". Was Statistics Canada's figure wrong? Was the minister wrong? What happened? Is $1.7 billion "awfully close" to balancing? It is the worst deficit we have ever had in tourism in our history.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would like at the same time to suggest that our deficit in tourism would go to $2 billion. Certainly, I was wrong in thinking that the great efforts this government made last year to convince Canadians to travel in Canada and to see Canada first would curtail a desire to travel outside Canada. I was wrong in believing that would happen.

The economy was so strong that the Canadian people felt a desire to spend money outside Canada and pay no heed to the reduced value of the Canadian dollar. That did not seem to deter Canadians at all. They travelled a great deal outside Canada and it was not the intention of the Canadian government to stop them. However, I felt I could encourage them to see Canada first, and I can say that a great many Canadians did travel extensively across Canada before they travelled outside Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, what the minister is saying is that his jawboning was the jawboning of an ass.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: My supplementary is this: The U.S. travel service predicts that fewer Americans will visit Canada this year than last year, and they predict that spending in the U.S. by Canadian business will be up 9 per cent, to $2.5 billion this year. Is this the reason the minister stated on February 23 that he thinks it is sinful for Canadians to go south to ski in the winter, and that they should see Canada first? Has he pointed this out to the Prime Minister, who went to Colorado at Christmas and went there the year before?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How about you?

Mr. Crosbie: Is the Prime Minister now repenting his sin, and will the minister apologize for the Prime Minister?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. member's question, one could rightly say that I am jawboning with an ass.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: With regard to skiing and having to go south to ski in the winter, what is sinful about it is that we in Canada have not developed enough ski resorts in Canada to accommodate all those people who want to ski.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Hon. members opposite can laugh, but I have not noticed them taking any side on the further development of ski resorts at Lake Louise. A long time ago I advocated more facilities at our national parks for Canadians to ski. That is a little bit risky politically, I suppose, so we have not heard from the hon. member who is supposed to be representing that area on that question in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CREATION OF JOBS DUE TO INCREASE IN EXPORTS

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Statistics Canada recently announced that exports have increased by about 5.8 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis and, most importantly, that there is a higher labour content in manufactured products. I wonder if the minister has had an opportunity to analyse how many new jobs this might represent and what percentage increase in plant capacity this will represent.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not had time to analyse the number of jobs this situation has created, but in the month of January there was a trade surplus of $100 million more than January of last year.

I would like to report to the House that utilization of industrial capacity in Canada has increased in the last 12 months from 83 per cent to 89.2 per cent, well above the average of the last 15 years and even higher than utilization in the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL PARKS

SKIING FACILITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for national parks. Was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce expressing government policy when he said it was his position and the position of the government that skiing facilities in Canada's national parks should be substantially expanded? Is that the position of the government, or is it the position of only one-fifth of the government as represented by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr Speaker, I am surprised at the question—

An hon. Member: I'll bet you are.

Mr. Faulkner: —because, as the hon. member should know, two weeks ago in Calgary I announced an expansion at Lake Louise, and that is precisely what my colleague was referring to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Where were you, Joe?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I will wait until hon. members opposite calm down a little.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated clearly that he has been making very strong representations regarding dramatic expansion, I presume beyond the present state. The Minister or Indian Affairs and Northern Development correctly referred to his announcement two weeks ago regarding Lake Louise. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to expand significantly, beyond the present state, skiing facilities in national parks?

● (1440)

At the same time, the minister might also tell us whether it remains the position of the Government of Canada that the primary purpose of Canadian national parks is conservation, or whether the representations of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce have detracted from that purpose.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out a moment ago, there have been expansions proposed in Lake Louise and there have been expansions agreed to in Sunshine.

My view is that there should be a limit to the expansions, and that expansions should take place outside the parks. I think that is totally consistent with what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has said. He is saying there should be expansion in parks, it is allowed, but there should be development of skiing facilities outside the parks as well; and Kananaskis is a development, Golden is a development, and near Revelstoke there is a development. I think we can achieve the conservation objective and still have restraint with respect to the parks.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

DEFICIT IN AUTOMOBILE TRADE WITH UNITED STATES—ACTION TO CORRECT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Statistics Canada report an $89 million defict in the auto trade with the United States for the month of January. Noting that automotive parts appear to be a large portion of this deficit, and noting as well that there is a good deal of controversy surrounding the automotive figures published monthly by Statistics Canada, can the minister advise us whether his officials have checked into the authenticity and accuracy of this deficit and, if they have, what is he doing to bring it in balance, as he said he is going to do?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think the first thing I should point out in answer to the hon. member's question is that Statistics Canada in their release suggest quite clearly that it is a preliminary estimate, and so one should judge it as a preliminary estimate. It is as large as it is because automotive exports for the month of January amounted to $986 million. In January of 1977, automotive exports were $764 million. So we exported approximately $200 million in automobiles. Naturally, in order to manufacture these automobiles we had to import more parts and that is why the parts deficit appears to have increased in relation to our total exports.

Mr. Kempling: That is fine, Mr. Speaker; we know that there are many figures relating to imported parts which come in as imported parts for production and are exported but are not shown as exports, and that is what I am getting at.

Let me ask the minister the following question: Several recommendations have been made for a comprehensive annual report on the automotive industry by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, in the Reisman report and by numerous other organizations. Can the minister tell us what progress has been made in this area and what progress is being made to correlate the figures in that report with those in the U.S. report, so they will have relevance?

Mr. Horner: This whole question has received a great deal of attention from the cabinet. We studied the Reisman report and early next week I intend to make a full statement on the government's reply to the Reisman report. I can assure the hon. member that the recommendation was in the Reisman report and I will be dealing with it extensively next week.

TRANSPORT

LICENSING OF RAILWAY EXPRESS OPERATIONS—AREA OF JURISDICTION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a request from one of the national railway companies to have its express service operations exempted from the provisions of the Ontario motor vehicles' transport act and brought, instead, under part three of the National Transportation Act, such request presumably being prompted by concern over the validity of express operations with respect to provincial licensing requirements?

[Mr. Faulkner.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that issue and that possibility has been raised with me and my officials have examined it. I do not know whether I could characterize the nature of the message to me as "resquested"—I want to look back at the original letter—but certainly the issue and the problem that might be created by the particular position of the express operations of that railway company has been brought to my attention.

Mr. Jarvis: The minister is aware of the serious implications of having express operations, on the one hand, possibly brought under federal jurisdiction whereas the great majority of trucking operations, on the other hand, are controlled by the provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, the attitude of provincial governments with respect to the use of part three of the federal act has heretofore, as I understand it, been directed toward the trucking industry. Can the minister indicate, at least, his attitude toward a situation where express operations of the national railway company might be exempted from provincial jurisdiction and brought under part three of the federal act?

Mr. Lang: I would like to make sure that I would not speculate on that happening. I would not put it beyond the range of possibility that such an exemption might be needed in one case or another within the whole range of the trucking industry. We found it necessary on one occasion in relation to buses, for instance, so it could happen in other cases. But certainly I would not speculate on the possibility or probability of it happening in any specific case in advance of having fully examined the implications.

I can assure the hon. member that from our consultations with the provinces they will know very well that we prefer to have the trucking regulations administered by provincial boards and under their rules and so have delegated the matter to them. Of course, we want to ensure uniformity and consistency and, therefore, the really free movement of goods across the country, so we pay close attention to the matter but, as the hon. member suggests, it would be by way of a very special exception if any action were taken.

THE SEAL HUNT

INTERFERENCE WITH SEALERS—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO PREVENT

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and it concerns the seal hunt off the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador which is to begin later this week.

On Monday of this week, this House unanimously passed a resolution endorsing the seal hunt off the coast of Newfoundland. In view of the fact that the protest ship Sea Shepherd is at this very moment sailing toward the Front area carrying protesters with the expressed intention of disrupting and interfering with the seal hunt, in complete defiance of Canadian law, what steps is the minister prepared to take to prevent this ship from entering the hunt area?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check. The latest information I have is that the Sea Shepherd is moving in the Gulf, but I have to say to the hon. member that the right of innocent passage must be presumed until such time as violations occur. There are clear regulations for non-interference with the legitimate activities as approved by the House.

We have sufficient personnel in Fisheries and in our police forces to deal with violators if and when there are incidents. Frankly, I hope that those who are involved in these protest movements will act as responsibly as we ourselves are trying to act.

Mr. Faour: Mr. Speaker, the minister seems to forget the old adage that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. As the minister is aware, these protest groups have as their avowed intention the complete ending of the hunt off Newfoundland, which would have a disastrous result for Newfoundland both economically and environmentally, yet the minister refuses at this stage to bring in any measures to prevent such a disruption.

My supplementary question is whether he will consider asking the Department of National Defence to provide a destroyer escort, or perhaps a coastguard escort, to ensure that these protesters do not disrupt the hunt this year.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): There are already coastguard vessels in the area. I have searched the Fisheries Act very carefully and found that there is no way the act would give me the power to stop a vessel from sailing on the Gulf of St. Lawrence or in other areas in the 200-mile zone. What the personnel on that vessel do, and how they act, falls under the regulations and I would certainly not hesitate to pursue them if and when they do violate the rules which have been clearly spelled out.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE OF LITHIUM-POWERED BATTERIES IN AIRCRAFT LOCATOR TRANSMITTERS

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: I would like to ask the minister whether he has any reasons for reconsidering the ban which has been recommended against those batteries which are used to power emergency locator transmitters—ELTs. These lithium sulphur-dioxide batteries are considered by many to be an important factor in finding "downed" aircraft and we in northern Ontario are very concerned about this problem. Would the minister tell us whether these batteries are going to be reinstated?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are making progress with alternative batteries, but it certainly is not our intention to allow lithium-powered batteries to be replaced in aircraft. Indeed, I should tell the hon. member—and I am sure the hon. member for St. John's West will want to apologize to me for all the things he has said about this issue—that the United States administration has just ordered the removal of the lithium batteries from private aircraft in the United States, reporting that they have now reports of 500 incidents of explosions or other events having happened with them and, therefore, as a safety measure they must immediately be taken out.

They hope that within the next six months they can follow us in finding alternatives. I would like, therefore, to point out to the hon. member, particularly the hon. member for St. John's West, that once again we were about a year and a half ahead and he was a light age behind.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CBC-TV ITEM ON MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT CROSSING THE FLOOR

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Secretary of State, who reports to this chamber on matters connected with the CBC.

Yesterday there was a most interesting, revealing and historic occasion when an hon. member walked across the floor of the House but did not appear on CBC last evening. It was explained by Mike Duffy, a most reputable announcer at all times—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was not an advertisement for Mike Duffy, but it is certainly appreciated nonetheless.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He said, and hon. members had better wait for a moment to hear what he did say, "We're not able to show you everything that happened because the House of Commons . . . staff . . . was instructed not to show Stewart's dramatic walk or cheering opposition MPs".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: You can laugh, but I ask the hon. gentleman this: Were the CBC afraid that the finer pre-election susceptibilities of Liberals would be exacerbated if this were shown? Who gave this instruction?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House should know, of course, that the capacity of the CBC to carry film is only as limited as the film that is taken in the House. These cameras are under my direction, and instructions for the operations of the cameras were issued by me and remain the same instructions that were taken from the special committee which was struck to establish the policy in respect of these cameras, on which committee, of course, all parties were represented.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not question Your Honour, because I cannot, but there should be no selectivity on the part of anyone to determine what the Canadian people should see.

TRADE

ANNUAL DEFICIT IN FULLY MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister advise the House what steps he intends to take to deal with a very serious situation which was outlined in the February edition of the government's publication "Forging the Links", which stated:

> The Canadian economy is faced with a serious crisis which is manifest in high unemployment, persistent trade imbalances, and a falling currency. These immediate problems reflect a deeper crisis in the structure of Canadian industry, and in particular, manufacturing, which precedes the recent recession in the western economies.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that publication was brought to my attention. I did not read it in detail. I did note the paragraph the hon. member has read to the House. In my perusal of the book, I noted that it was dealing with 1975 and perhaps 1976 figures.

If one made a careful analysis of the economy as was set out in a paper prepared by, for example, the Royal Bank, if one wanted a neutral opinion, away from politics, and using the figures for 1975 as a base for our productivity being 100, that graph suggests that our productivity now, based on 1975 figures being equal to 100, has gone up to 120. One can take from that that we have made substantial improvements in our productivity in manufacturing since 1975, to 1978 and into 1979. If one reads that book and understands that it is based on 1975 and 1976 statistics, one will realize that it is hardly a gauge worthy of mentioning in comparison to 1978 and 1979 figures.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if everything today is going along as well as the minister would like us to believe, would he explain to the House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: You had better wait for it, boys.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Would this minister explain to the House why it is that this country is suffering from an annual trade deficit of more than $12 billion in fully manufactured products, the area that produces jobs, and why this deficit is increasing steadily at a rate in excess of 10 per cent each year? In view of this, would the minister please get down to the facts and answer my question, and stop handing me so much of that commodity which is a by-product of his cattle ranch?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is pretty good at handling that by-product of a cattle ranch, and if he is ever looking for a job I am sure one of my sons would be able to hire him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, with regard to the question of manufacturing in Canada, looking at total manufacturing, and the hon. member likes to refer to end products—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: You have to be pretty good with a fork, I guess. I really think that in order to assess Canada's ability to meet competition in the world one has to include as manufactured products steel, cement, lumber and paper. It is pretty difficult for a Canadian outfit to print the New York Times here in Canada. That would be an end product. We can send them the paper, which is a manufactured product.

If one takes a look at total manufactured goods, he will see that our deficit last year was $2.1 billion in total manufactured goods and a substantial lessening of that deficit occurred last year. It will continue to lessen in the years ahead. When I look at the utilization capacity of manufacturing today in Canada, I see it has gone from about 81 per cent to 97 per cent. In fact, in the steel industry it is up as high as 94.7 per cent of utilization—nearly maximum capacity, really—in the steel industry.

Mr. Hees: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Hees: I've got a dandy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, please, please!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. As the new chairman of the National Commission on Inflation will be Mr. Renouf, who will be bringing with him many members of the disbanded Anti-Inflation Board, is the Prime Minister preparing for the reimposition of wage and price controls, particularly in view of the fact that he suggested last night the economy was zig-zagging?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTS SUBMITTED BY NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would direct this question to the Minister of Finance. Will the new NCI be making its reports directly to the government, or to the public, as the now defunct CSIP did so the government could be aware of what its reports contained before communication to the public?

• (1500)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, according to the terms of reference of the commission, it is their decision and they may make the report public if they so desire.

LOTO CANADA

POLICY RESPECTING EMPLOYEES LAID OFF—SIGNING OF NON-DISCLOSURE AGREEMENT

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). I am sure that the minister regretted not being able to table the report yesterday and having to renege on the promise which she made some time ago.

Would she now explain to the House whether or not Loto Canada has instituted a new policy which is a departure from the policy of the government? Why did Loto Canada require some 50 people who lost their jobs to sign a note of secrecy, and a non-disclosure agreement before they could pick up one cent of their termination pay?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, so far as I have learned from the people in charge of personnel policy at Loto Canada, this approach was undertaken because of the technological adjunct of the equipment that was to be used by them in their jobs.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—VERACITY OF STATISTICS REFERRED TO DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) gave me an indication during the question period that he would rise at three o'clock, and I see that he is rising now. The hon. member indicated that he would be raising a question of privilege because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) had said that he had misled the House. According to my recollection—and I have no notes to which I can refer—the minister, in answering the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, said that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby was wrong and that he should get his facts straight, or something to that effect.

I would indicate that a member is not entitled to enter into a dispute of this kind in this chamber. The minister did not say that the hon. member was misleading the House, nor that the hon. member had uttered a falsehood or anything of that nature which could lead us into some difficulty.

It seems to me that what has been said would provoke a debate between the two ministers. If the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby intends to develop a question of privilege, I would hope that it will be something more than simply challenging the minister about whether or not the hon. member was in error. Perhaps the hon. member will want to restudy his facts and check the record before carrying the matter further. I will now hear the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I do not need to check the record, but I will certainly respect your ruling. I would, very briefly, like to make my case.

I am sure that all members on this side have had encounters with the minister in which he has responded to questions in a way that the hon. member asking the question has no opportunity to reply. The minister leaves a clear impression that one is lying and that one is misleading the House by saying that the information which the hon. member has given in a question is false or wrong. Is the minister saying unequivocally that I am misleading the House, or would he, in support of his accusation, document very briefly his own case?

Politics ought to be about the application of certain principles. There should not be disagreement about the honesty of members in certain situations. If there is one member who is implying that the integrity of another member is not to be accepted, I think that that member should prove his case, and if he is wrong then he should be big enough to withdraw. If it is pointed out that I am incorrect, I will unequivocally admit that the minister is right, if he makes his case.

I was referring to three sets of figures. I used one set of figures in a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) in which I said that the budget for Women's Career Counselling Service in Ottawa had to be reduced by 45 per cent. That is a straightforward claim, and it is my understanding that that is the case. If that is not so, however, I would like the minister to say that that is not so.

The other figures to which I referred were taken from the minister's own document which he tabled in the House yesterday. It is the document which pertains to the National Plan of Action on the Status of Women. I said that there were 21 areas which were referred to for study, 15 for research, ten for examination and six for review. There were no figures for action. I would like to know if they are false figures.

Finally, the third set of figures which I used pertain to the women's bureau in the Department of Labour. I said that the budget had been reduced from $200,000 two years ago to $29,000. If the minister wants to quibble I can be more precise and say that the figure is $29,250. That is the other figure to which I referred.

I would like the minister to point out which of those figures is inaccurate, because I conscientiously used those figures. They were doublechecked and they were used in good faith, and I think they stand up. I would like to hear from the minister.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be as brief as the hon. member. I stated that he was wrong on several counts. I can think of one in particular, which he did not repeat in his question of privilege, when he said that placement in the voluntary sector was being conducted at a cheaper cost than in the public sector by the Employment and Immigration Commission. For the record, I would like to point out to the hon. member that the specific case which he has brought before the House has an average placement cost of $324, that the average cost for placement per Outreach program is $112, and that unemployment and immigration placement costs $50. So the statement of the hon. member is completely wrong, completely erroneous. Whether or not he misled the House is a matter I will leave to him to decide. I say that he was wrong, and the facts that I have indicate that.

The hon. member then said that in the National Plan of Action there is no action now. I would like to point out to him for the record that the three changes which the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) announced would take place are already in motion under this plan. With regard to unemployment insurance, supplementary unemployment benefit plans are extended to include plans covering unemployment costs as a result of maternity, paid maternity leave during the two-week waiting period would not affect UI benefits, payment of maternity benefits will be made outside Canada. We are working out the details of implementing this program.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, there is now before the House on the order paper a notice to introduce a bill amending the Criminal Code with regard to sexual offences. I have already indicated to the House the substance and the nature of those changes which are being proposed. We are ready to move in these areas.

I could cite a number of other examples. We have announced that there will be a greater trades training program for women in non-traditional occupations right away. There will be greater accessibility to language training for immigrant women right away. There will be a greater amount of money allocated for research and information with regard to health and environmental issues particularly dealing with women. There will be priorities in these sectors. There will be a redirection of grants to labour organizations that will take place right away so as to encourage the support of women in the labour movement.

In terms of action which is presently taking place, I could go on. We are not talking about studies, reviews or anything of that nature, although, contrary to what the hon. member said, I do believe that a lot of issues need to be studied and examined. We do not necessarily have to decide policy by the seat of our pants, as the honourable member often does.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that we are back where we started. I do not believe that the hon. minister accused the hon. member of misleading the House or that he used unparliamentary terminology in his answers.

The minister has now defended his position, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby had defended his position, and I am sure that both members will recognize that they are locked in disagreement, which is quite legitimate in the circumstances. However, it does not extend into procedural grounds.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the government House leader the government business which he contemplates to be called today, tomorrow and perhaps into next week. While he is doing so, would he indicate whether or not next Wednesday will be designated as an allotted day in accordance with our discussion?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the order of business for today, as we have already discussed, is, firstly, the bill dealing with the independence of parliament, followed by the Northwest Territories bill, followed by the government organization bill and the shipping conference exemptions and dangerous goods and non-profit corporations. That would be the order in which we would call items today if we make very rapid progress.

• (1510)

Tomorrow it is my intention to call the housing bill subject to the conclusions and understandings that are already being worked on among the parties. If the energy supply bill comes out of committee before the end of the week, it would be my intention to call that bill on Monday; and probably after that, if the referendum bill comes out I will call that, followed by the excise and the income tax bills.

Of course, I readily agree to designating next Wednesday as an allotted day.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to hear about the income tax bill and the excise tax bill because there has been some concern expressed in the communities generally about the fact that these bills have not been brought forward and about what the effect of not bringing them forward might be.

I wonder if the government House leader could enlighten me with respect to the commodity tax review. I have asked him whether he would refer it to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. We have indicated, and I will indicate again, that we are prepared to have that reference go without debate. It becomes particularly important in view of the fact that the government's answers to the paper that he and I discussed some time ago seemed to imply that it had already been referred to the committee. We are anxious to have it referred and I presume the committee is also anxious. If that could be done I would be very grateful.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will seem as though I am playing a record I have played many times, but that does not bother me; I should like to get action. Now that the government House leader is placing before us not just three or four items, as though time was ending, but is placing before us quite a few things, as though we have a few months to go yet, why is it not possible for him and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to get together and put at least one piece of legislation regarding veterans affairs on the order paper?

While I am on my feet, may I ask the government House leader a question with respect to one other issue. There have been a number of discussions about legislation respecting economic boycotts. I believe there was some discussion at one time that we would deal with the matter quickly. In this party we indicated our readiness to do so. Is there any prospect of that legislation being placed before us at an early date? Could I have an answer to those two questions.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, on February 6 this House unanimously passed concurrence in the second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This contained a recommendation that the House expand the terms of reference of that committee in order to reconstitute the subcommittee on penitentiaries. For three weeks I have been asking the government House leader whether he has consulted with his colleague the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) to bring that resolution before the House in order to expand those terms of reference to reconstitute the subcommittee on penitentiaries and enable it to get to work, and perhaps defuse the increasingly tense situation in the penitentiaries system in the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition concerning the business of the House, I would like to know whether the government House leader is in a position to tell the House whether the committee to which Bill C-12 was referred is proceeding normally with the study of that bill and whether the House will soon receive its report which deals with retirement funds, the armed forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the public service. If the bill comes back from committee during the week, does the government intend to call it before the House at the report stage, and then for third reading, of course?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) will have noticed that I have placed a motion on the order paper providing for the commodity tax to be reviewed by the standing committee. It is my intention to call that matter as soon as there is some indication that the committee will be ready to deal with it. I should like to reserve that decision a little bit longer. I understand that the standing committee is still dealing with the Bank Act and that it has the estimates before it, so this might not be the most opportune or timely moment to get an additional reference. It is my intention, as is indicated on the order paper, to have that reference go to the committee.

I take note of the representations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on the question of veterans. Certainly it will be the intention of the government to continue to assist the veterans in the way it has asked parliament to do in the past.

The hon. member asked about the international economic boycott bill. I did say that I would be prepared to bring that bill in if we could secure agreement to deal with it in all its stages in one day. I am glad to receive the reaction of the hon. member and will await reactions from other parties in the House.

The hon. member has asked about Bill C-12. As I understand it, the standing committee is still hearing witnesses on that particular bill. When the bill comes before committee we will try to deal with it as quickly as possible because it is quite an important bill that we would like to get passed in all its stages.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) spoke about the motions that came out of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which really asked the House, or the government, to consider the advisability of amplifying and enlarging its said reference. I am in somewhat of a difficulty as to how to discharge the concurrence of the House asking the House to consider the advisability of amplifying and enlarging the said reference.

Quite apart from that particular difficulty, it is my intention to try to get an enlarged reference to that committee. I have not moved on it because each time the hon. member has raised the question the Solicitor General has not been in the House. I should like to have him here to register either his assent or disapproval in regard to making that reference.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STEVENS—COMMODITY TAX REVIEW GROUP REPORT—ALLEGED DELAY OF REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what I think is perhaps one of the most basic questions of privilege that could ever be raised in this House. It is based on the fact that this institution is being used to create a false impression through the government's continued refusal or hesitation to make a reference to the appropriate committee of this House of the commodity tax review matter.

The reason I rise now is that, as I understand the government House leader's comments, he is now saying that while it is his intention to make a reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with respect to this matter, he intends to delay it until the committee indicates that it is, in effect, ready for that reference.

The reason I rise on this question of privilege is that I feel there was a very important representation made in February to this House by the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras) when he gave 46 responses to the recommendations put forth by the so-called second tier committee dealing with task force reviews of various sectors of our industry.

Recommendation No. 6 of the second tier report dealt specifically with the federal sales tax matter. I should like to read verbatim the response of the government, which was as follows:

● (1520)

> The Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs has already received a large number of submissions on the report of the Commodity Tax Review Group. It is expected that the committee, after it has finished its review, will make recommendations on the structure of Canada's commodity tax system.

The important fact is that that committee has no reference. The commodity tax review group study is not before us. For months as members of that committee and in this House we have asked that the reference be made. I think it is important that the members of this House recognize that the government has represented to the outside world that a committee of this House is actively reviewing that study and will be, to use their words, making "recommendations on the structure of Canada's commodity tax system." It is doubly important when we bear in mind that we have just experienced the largest current account deficit in our history of $5.2 billion—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was never sure that the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) had a procedural matter before us. He had an answer today given through his House leader from the government House leader as to his intentions in this respect. He may not like the answer but I would have great difficulty in translating that into a question of privilege. In any case, the hon. member has now departed from the question of privilege aspect and is beginning to debate the merits of the need for this reference, which would be quite improper.

He has made his point. I do not know whether the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) wants to answer the suggestion that has been made up to this point, but it seems to me that some answer was made as to the intentions of considering that matter and making the reference. I did not understand that it would necessarily come after the committee had completed its work. There was some reference to the fact that the committee is now busy with two other matters. In any event, while that may not be the answer which the hon. member for York-Simcoe wants, it is very difficult for me to translate that into a question of privilege.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, the reason that I referred to the import question is that this aspect has been raised in some 60 odd submissions when the commodity tax review group was inviting submissions. It has been raised as one of the fundamental aspects of our commodity tax that imports are being favoured at the cost of Canadian jobs. The point I am trying to make in my basic question of privilege—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for York-Simcoe is to continue, he will have to establish some procedural ground. He is continuing to argue that there is some real importance why the committee ought to consider this matter. That may very well be, but it has nothing to do with procedure and nothing to do with privilege. I have to be persuaded that the hon. member has some procedural grounds for the point he is trying to make. Up to this point I have not heard any.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my procedural ground is the simple fact that the government, in February, represented in their action for the industrial growth continuing dialogue brochure as follows:

> It is expected that the committee, after it has finished its review, will make recommendations on the structure of Canada's commodity tax system.

The committee referred to is the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

My question of privilege is simply based on the fact that there is no reference. There is no review going on in a committee of this House. It is totally wrong that the government should be permitted to create that impression, as they have done in this document. It is not enough for the House leader to stand up and say that they are still thinking about making the reference. The fact that he says that confirms it. He knows there is no reference, and yet they have held out to the world that the committee is actively reviewing this matter.

I do not feel that we in this House should tolerate that type of misrepresentation.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made three speeches but has not established any basis for a question of privilege. There is no basis in this House for a member to get up on a question of privilege and complain that he has not got a reference to a committee. If that is permitted, any hon. member can get up and complain that his particular pet reference has not gone to committee. The plain fact of the matter is that the committee itself has not asked for a reference from the House of Commons.

Mr. Stevens: We cannot.

Mr. MacEachen: The standing committee is empowered to report to the House, if it wishes, and ask for a reference.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The standing committee has not asked for a reference. I understand the steering committee has not agreed to ask for a reference.

Mr. Stevens: Because your members say no.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member says that the majority say no. He might understand that under the British North America Act the House of Commons and its committees operate on a majority. Perhaps it is an unpalatable fact for hon. members opposite to have to live under that provision of the British North America Act.

We had a debate with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) as to the meaning of the report. The hon. member is either very thick in the head or he is perverse when he attempts to argue that those particular references say that the standing committee has a reference. All the words say is that the committee has received submissions—

An hon. Member: A con job.

Mr. MacEachen: —and when it finishes its review—

An hon. Member: It doesn't have any review.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member ought to enlarge his mind a bit and understand that when the committee gets a reference it will commence a review, and upon completion of that review it will make recommendations. That is all the report says. The hon. member seems incapable of enlarging his mind to understand ordinary, plain words, and is attempting through bogus questions of privilege to delay the work of the House and to create false indignation about a case which is really quite plain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I indicated at the outset, the matter remains a disagreement. I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that if at any time in March it appears a February commitment has not been fulfilled, it will give rise to a question of privilege because I think we would be swamped with questions of that nature. We ought to refrain and stay on the rather strong procedural grounds on which a question of privilege now rests.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa

March 8, 1979

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Louis-Philippe Pigeon, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 8th day of March, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF P.E.I. ON PUBLICITY ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) copies in both official languages of correspondence between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Premier of Prince Edward Island concerning publicity arrangements between the Government of Canada and the province of Prince Edward Island.

Order Paper Questions

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER ACT

MEASURE TO REGULATE USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-464, respecting the use of social insurance numbers.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, two days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) challenged me to set forth my views on what restrictions should be put on the use of social insurance numbers. Naturally I accept that challenge with great pleasure.

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that the use of social insurance numbers will not be expanded out of the original area for which they were brought in without first having prior consultation and full discussion in parliament on the subject, so that Canadians can have full participation and parliament can deal with this most important abuse in terms of individual privacy and human rights.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CMHC—ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM

Question No. 405—Mr. Roy (Laval):

During the past ten years, did CMHC participate in the Assisted Home Ownership Programme and, if so, in how many cases and for what amount and, in each case, what was the (a) number (b) amount (c) interest rate of the subsidies granted?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

(a) and (b) See list below.

(c) 1970—Initial assistance for home ownership began under section 58 of the National Housing Act, progressively extending the term for home ownership loans from 25 to 40 years, and progressively reducing the interest rate from 9½ per cent to 7⅞ per cent, to bring home ownership within the financial capabilities of families in the $4,000 to $7,000 income ranges.

1973—With the introduction of section 34.15 to the NHA assistance was provided in accordance with a graduated scale of adjusted family incomes, beginning with interest rate adjustments down to 8 per cent, followed by a maximum grant of $300 per annum. This grant was increased to $600 in June 1974, and to $1,200 in August 1975.

1976—The grant was replaced by an interest reduction loan, which was interest free for five years, the principal amount being progressively reduced by one-fifth each year, with repayment to begin after five years. Direct subsidies continued to be available to families with children, up to $750 during the first year, to help reduce monthly payments to 25 per cent of income.

1978—A payment reduction loan secured by an interest-bearing second mortgage, was provided, the first mortgage being obtained from an approved lender and the second mortgage from CMHC.

Mr. Pinard: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council) moved that Bill C-6, respecting the independence of Parliament and conflicts of interest of Senators and Members of the House of Commons and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill represents extensive consultation with parliamentarians extending back more than five years. In July, 1973 I tabled a green paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest". The proposals in that document received study by a committee of the House which reported in July of 1975, and by a committee of the Senate which reported in June of 1976.

The recommendations in those committee reports were given close consideration within the government, and in June of last year I introduced a bill entitled the Independence of Parliament Act and tabled a document setting out related proposals for changes to the rules of the Senate and the Standing Orders of the House. A bill incorporating some minor amendments has been reintroduced as Bill C-6, and the proposed Standing Orders have been again tabled without change. All members have now had the opportunity to review this bill and the proposed Standing Orders. I expect that hon. members would wish to give the bill second reading so that it would receive detailed consideration in the standing committee.

The principles underlying the proposed policy are straightforward, and the committees of both the House and the other place were in broad agreement with them. They are indeed the same principles that underscore statutes relating to standards of conduct of parliamentarians that date back to before confederation. As the title of the bill indicates, the main objective is to ensure that the independence of parliamentarians in the performance of their public duties is not affected by their private financial or professional interests. Members and senators are trustees of public confidence who must perform, and appear to perform, their duties in a manner reflecting the highest degree of concern for the public interest.

Both the public and parliamentarians, therefore, have an interest in a set of well defined standards. For the public, the conflict of interest rules will provide a clear assurance that the highest standards do prevail. For parliamentarians, the rules will make it easier to ensure that their activities conform to the ethical principles that the public has a right to demand.

Obviously setting clear standards is a complicated task. The rules must deal carefully and precisely with complex situations. There must be a fair balance between the requirements of sound conflict of interest provisions and the right of parliamentarians to manage their private affairs in ways that involve no threat to the public interest. The rules must be strong enough to merit public confidence without being so rigid and restrictive as to be unfair or to deter capable individuals from seeking public office.

It is also important to develop rules that do not unduly disadvantage any particular group. Members have very diverse professional backgrounds and financial interests; what would be an innocuous rule for one member could have very serious implications for another.

The proposed policy meets these challenges by combining the two basic approaches to dealing with potential conflicts of interest—disclosure and avoidance—and by providing the mechanisms through which parliamentarians can seek authoritative advice on the application of the policy. Much has been said about the respective merits of disclosure and avoidance. Each mechanism is apt in different circumstances and in meeting different needs.

Public disclosure of financial interests is a method of allowing members to continue managing their financial interests while at the same time making abuse of office less likely by allowing the public to judge their conduct in full knowledge of the facts. To put it another way, by allowing the public to know the facts the member is assured that what he does is subject to public scrutiny. Avoidance provisions are designed to prohibit parliamentarians from holding offices and managing financial assets which involve a conflict of interest or appear to create such a clear conflict.

Throughout the consultations and preparation of the policy, there has always been agreement that we should include both disclosure provisions and avoidance provisions. The strength of the policy lies in the way the two elements have been combined.

The bill requires parliamentarians to make very broad public disclosure of their assets, interests and activities. They will also have to make certain disclosures concerning interests of their spouses. Disclosure will be made annually through a registrar who will be an official of the House of Commons. It will include such major items as certain government contracts and grants; outside employment; gifts received by the parliamentarian or his or her spouse of a value greater than $100; honoraria; sponsored travel of the parliamentarian or his or her spouse outside Canada; real property of the parliamentarian or his or her spouse; shares and bonds of the parliamentarian or his or her spouse; unsecured debts over $5,000; trusts; and other sources of income worth more than $1,000. These are very significant disclosure requirements for members and also for the spouses.

The partial applicability to spouses reflects the need for another balance between conflicting objectives. On the one hand, there is the important principle that parliamentarians should not circumvent the rules through the activity of spouses. On the other hand, it is important not to restrict the ability of spouses to pursue independent careers. The bill resolves this quandary by requiring certain disclosures by spouses while exempting them from avoidance prohibitions. It is made clear, however, that parliamentarians may not escape the avoidance provisions by asking their spouses to undertake prohibited activities on their behalf.

Another important feature of the disclosure provisions is that members and senators will be required to disclose any personal pecuniary interest they have in a matter when they are communicating with government bodies, public servants or other parliamentarians. This is to ensure that potential for a conflict of interest will be easily recognized by persons who may be in a position to make decisions affecting the interests of a parliamentarian.

The disclosure provisions simply require that a parliamentarian make public certain interests and activities. The avoidance provisions are more restrictive because they prohibit activities that either involve direct conflicts of interest or appear to involve conflicts. The prohibitions can be grouped under three main headings: prohibited fees; prohibited contracts and licences; and prohibited offices.

In the case of fees, parliamentarians will be prohibited from accepting compensation of any sort for interceding with other parliamentarians, public servants or government tribunals. They will also be prohibited from representing before these individuals and tribunals firms of which they are a director or officer. Finally, they will not be allowed to accept compensation for representing clients in court cases where the Crown in right of Canada is a party.

One of the most prominent areas for potential conflicts of interest is that of participation by parliamentarians in government contracts. The bill prohibits members and senators from being officers, directors, legal counsel, financial auditors or consultants for corporations that contract with or receive licences from the government. It also prohibits parliamentarians from holding significant share interests in such corporations.

The prohibitions should not restrict activity where there is little threat of a conflict between a parliamentarian's public duties and his or her private interests. For that reason, the bill contains a number of exemptions to the prohibition against participation in government contracts. I believe these exemptions will make good sense to both members and the public.

Parliamentarians will be permitted:

1. To purchase government bonds or property, and to acquire permits where the terms are standard for all citizens;

2. To hold publicly traded shares of corporations where he or she owns less than 5 per cent of $15,000 worth of voting shares;

3. To participate in contracts authorized by the Government of Canada or parliament;

4. To participate in government contracts where the aggregate amount is less than $1,000 in a given year.

Members will also be allowed to place their assets in trust if they do not wish to dispose of assets which might put them in violation of the provisions of the act relating to prohibited contracts and regulated activities.

Thus, there will be a balance struck in the area of government contracts and licences. Contracts and interests will not be allowed where there is a recognizable potential for a conflict of interest, but they will be allowed where the potential for conflict is small. In the ordinary course of life members of parliament, like other citizens, will find it necessary to enter into contracts with the Government of Canada in ways which are not exactly obvious until one examines the question of government contracts more deeply.

The distinctions in the area of incompatible offices have been easier to draw. The bill states that parliamentarians will not be permitted to hold foreign, provincial or municipal offices, with few exceptions, or remunerated federal offices.

I need not describe in detail the administrative aspects of the bill. The basic approach is to place responsibility for the administration of the act in the Senate and the House of Commons. That responsibility will be exercised through standing committees of the Senate and the House and their registrars. Of course, the bill empowers only the courts to impose financial penalties for violations of the statute. The fact that a standing committee, for example, of this House can be established and will be involved in exercising the responsibility of carrying out the rules is not only an assurance that the standards will be maintained but also a protection to hon. members that, once having received the blessing or approval of certain activities or certain difficult borderline cases which might be dealt with by the committee, they need have no fear of legitimate public criticism of their activities.

It is my view, therefore, that although the introduction of a conflict of interest regime for members of parliament may appear demanding—and it is demanding—it is also a very desirable protection for them against unwarranted and unjustified criticism which may arise from time to time about their activities. They will, in a sense, be able to fall back on the prestige and authority of a standing committee of the House which will have the responsibility for the administration of the act.

As I said before, the conflict of interest policy proposed in this bill is a demanding one. However, it cannot and does not purport to deal with all ethical aspects of a parliamentarian's responsibility. To do this would lead to a code so detailed and complex that it would be unworkable and probably would obscure the main purpose of the policy. Certain principles cannot be codified into rules. Others need hardly be stated, such as a member's responsibility for the conduct of his staff and for the proper administration of the financial and other resources made available to him.

I would say that when hon. members begin to examine in detail the provisions of the bill they can undoubtedly point to various theoretical cases which could arise, and often it is difficult to devise precise guidelines for every foreseeable case. If we attempted to do so I think our task would be difficult indeed. But I think it is important that we have clear rules in order to maintain public confidence and for the protection of members from unfair criticism.

When discussing the question of conflict of interest, I have always said that while the rules, the legislation, the standards and the codes may be important, the fundamentally important matter is the moral commitment of members of the House of Commons.

It is my conclusion that the moral commitment of members of the House of Commons, by and large, is very high indeed and that in the pursuit of their activities they have been generally scrupulous in avoiding conflicts of interest; but while that may be the case, there will now be a code in operation which will make their obligations even clearer than they have been in the past. That is in a sense a benefit to members of parliament.

I believe we would all agree that the public has a right to expect the highest ethical standards of its representatives in parliament, and therefore we have a duty as members to leave the least possible doubt in that area. I believe this particular bill is a considerable attempt both to provide necessary guidelines for members of parliament and to provide them with protection against unjustified criticism. It will also be a considerable step in providing additional assurance to the public that members of parliament are conducting their affairs or their business with the public interest in mind and that their personal, professional and financial interests are not standing in the way of the carrying out of their public duties. That really is the purpose of this legislation.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my colleague the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), particularly to the last part of his speech when he went beyond the details or the framework of the bill and talked about the spirit of this legislation, and I want to assure him that that approach is also ours with respect to this legislation. That is why I think we all welcome the opportunity, after some period of time, to debate this legislation.

If we recall the time, the gestation period for this legislation is something like the gestation period leading to the birth of an elephant. It has been an extremely long period of time, especially when there has been such wide agreement on the necessity for legislation of this kind.

The green paper was tabled in July of 1973, almost six years ago. It was studied extensively by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and a substantial report was made on June 10, 1975. The proposals were also examined in the Senate in July of 1975 and, a year later, in July of 1976. Last June 26, as the minister has said, Bill C-62 was introduced, far too late to be passed in that session but perhaps not too late to be brought out if there was an election as evidence of the good intentions of the government.

Now we have Bill C-6, one of the first bills to be introduced in this session of parliament. I realize that time is always a consideration, and in the normal event this will likely be one of the last bills to be brought forward in this parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Purely coincidental.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think we are entitled to ask not whether this trip is really necessary but whether this trip is really being made. That is the question we have to put in terms of timing. We are expecting an election call daily. It may be put off a week or so, but we are expecting an election call within a matter of days.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or a month.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Constitutionally, it could be a month or perhaps two.

Mr. MacEachen: October.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Everyone's last expected date for an election call is really the Easter break, and that is what we are talking about, about mid-April. That seems to be the appropriate time. I cannot look into the mind of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) any more than can the Deputy Prime Minister. Unless the Prime Minister has taken leave of his senses, we will be into an election before any serious examination of this bill can be completed at all stages.

Today's debate will be brief. I will be the only speaker from this party. However, the committee discussions cannot be brief. Despite the agreement on principle which exists in the House, there are too many complex issues to be examined. Can we possibly cover all these issues adequately and appropriately in the spirit which was mentioned by the Deputy Prime Minister in the next three weeks, carry a report stage and third reading and then get the bill through the Senate, which has a great and legitimate interest in its provisions? I suspect not. Even if we could, the question is, can the Chief Electoral Officer put into place the sections on declarations to returning officers?

It is not hard to conclude that this bill is being dragged out for the second time on the eve of an election as a campaign ploy and that this debate is all fanfare and no parade. If the government really wanted this bill through and in place on the statute books, it would have proceeded with it back in October, November or perhaps December.

I must also express my disappointment that the codification of conflict of interest laws has not been done comprehensively to include cabinet ministers as a separate category, and public servants as well. It seems that members of parliament, who are generally perceived as the least powerful element in the governmental process—nonentities, or "nobodies" in the words of the Prime Minister—are singled out first so that they do not abuse the power this government has never let them have. I think we have our priorities mixed in terms of where the legislative structure on conflict of interest should begin. I think it would have been more appropriate to spell out conflict of interest rules for members of parliament in the first part of the bill and then to add a second part with even stricter rules for cabinet ministers and public servants.

Be that as it may, conflict of interest rules are necessary and welcome, and if this bill is not passed before the election is called a Progressive Conservative government will bring in one at least as strong.

The reasons for this bill are fairly clear. As government—lamentably in some instances—extends its control over all types of business and other activities in this country, the possibility that a member of parliament or a group of members of parliament may be affected directly by an item of legislation, a regulation or some other government action brought before the House increases. We have to recognize that, and we have to ensure that discussions are undertaken to determine what is in the national interest, without distortions caused by conflict of interest in the House itself. Members have to draw a line between, on the one hand, representing their communities or interests with which they are familiar and, on the other hand, representing themselves. I suppose that is the nub of the problem which this bill seeks to address. I do believe that this is not yet a frequent occurence, as the Deputy Prime Minister said. We are, rather, anticipating and meeting a danger which has not yet reached the critical point.

More important for the moment than clear and present instances among members of parliament of conflict of interests is a strong public perception that the danger is not in the future but in the present. We have to take cognizance of that public perception. It is a feature of our national political environment that we do not function in isolation from events in other jurisdictions. The common political gossip of our news media is drawn from the entire democratic world. If an American senator appears to have misappropriated public funds or succumbed to a bribe, that is on our front pages in Canada and it reflects on all of us who are in the legislative function.

When a British member of parliament goes for a swim in Florida and reappears in Australia—and we had an instance of that—we are as fascinated by that as are his own electors. The word "Watergate" conveys almost as rich and varied a meaning to us in Canada as it does to the Americans when they consider their own jurisdiction. These events, however little they may be drawn from our own experience, are a part of our environment and the climate of distrust which appears to go automatically with democratic politics, particularly in those societies which began their political systems when the country was an underdeveloped frontier area.

Sadly, not all blame for the poor image of politicians can be shifted to other countries. We are not free of clear instances of unwarranted use of influence on the part of politicians and their close associates. In the recent past, three of our colleagues have, regrettably, been involved with the courts on charges not reflecting on the dignity or propriety of this House. If we wish to be free of all suspicion, we must be clear of all charges. If we wish to establish and to continue the trust we feel we deserve, there is absolutely no alternative to the passage of strict conflict of interest rules as quickly as possible.

In examining Bill C-6 we must remember that nothing in a political system happens in isolation, and I think this is the point which the Deputy Prime Minister was trying to make. We are all aware that nothing worth while can be accomplished without significant consequences, both intended and unintended. We want to make sure that anyone who is elected to this House is encouraged to uphold its reputation for impartiality. Equally, we do not want to turn away people who should be here. Every decision we make in the House about salary, staff and rules of behaviour affects the type of membership we will have.

Conflict of interest rules must be carefully designed to fulfil their purpose without the unwarranted side effect of discouraging from public duty anyone who has been successful in his career as an independent businessman, a professional, a skilled tradesman or a farmer. It will be of little utility to the reputation and representative quality of this House if it were to be filled entirely with former salaried employees. This will be the challenge of the committee study—to ensure that this bill is clear, fair and enforceable, without making it a barrier over which the most talented in our society cannot leap.

To retain its full vigour and relevance we must continue to attract to the House of Commons men and women at the peak of their energy and creativity. We must remember too that not everyone elected to the House is able to remain as long as he or she might wish.

I hope that when this bill goes to committee we will be given a clear idea of the type of regulations contemplated for it. As well, it would be useful to hear a little more about clause 2(2), which seems to contemplate "any decision, order, rule or regulation" being overturned by the House, without spelling out exactly how this is to be done. To leave it too vague is to put the procedure for even initiating such a reconsideration entirely at the discretion of the cabinet, and none of us wants that to happen regardless of the political stripe of the cabinet.

Several of the provisions of this bill have been designed—I say this with some regret—without sufficient consideration of the fact that the House is a political forum, the actions of which in many cases are in fact the actions of the majority only. For this reason, they seem to me to provide insufficient protection for the minority opposition parties in the House.

When a candidate is running for election, he or she must make a statement to the deputy returning officer, who happens to be a government appointment, whatever the government is, and partisan favouritism has been known to be a factor. The registrar described in the bill is appointed by the cabinet. Everyone knows that this government would never appoint a Liberal partisan to such a position—we know they do not do that kind of thing, especially in the case of a position for which he might be entirely unsuited—but some future government might, and we must guard against the actions of future governments.

I am glad to see members on the other side and perhaps to my left, when contemplating a future government, looking to this side of the House. I think that is very encouraging. Pity the poor opposition spokesman—and my friend might very well have to consider that situation—who has had to bare his soul to a local government appointee, fly to Ottawa on "Air Mackasey," and then put himself at the mercy of a government appointed registrar. If a member is appealing for some sort of exemption or judgment before the committee established by the draft Standing Orders which will be sent to the standing committee for consideration with this bill, he would undoubtedly feel slightly uncomfortable laying out his case before a committee that happens to be controlled by his opponents.

The situation is a difficult one. Would it not be tempting in some situations to knock off a few troublesome opposition members of parliament by making life unusually difficult for them under the conflict of interest rules and by refusing normal and reasonable exemptions? That is a possibility which we have to consider.

Mr. MacEachen: It may be very shortsighted.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not want to be partisan with respect to this matter, but this government and other governments have been known to do things from time to time that are very shortsighted. I call them lapses of judgment, but they do lessen the opportunities for the House to be as representative as possible; and with the possibility of that happening—I think we should be on our guard and devise ways of getting around it. It is a situation which I think deserves the best from all of us.

The whole set-up is itself a conflict of interest between the obligation to treat all members alike and the demands and emotions of partisan competition. That is why I think it would not be unreasonable for the committee to consider some changes, perhaps one where candidates should make declarations to the Chief Electoral Officer rather than to the returning officer in each of the ridings. That would remove it from the passionate political atmosphere. The registrar should be appointed after consultation with and approval by all parties—that is not in the bill but it would be an improvement to the legislation—and after passage of a debatable motion in the House. The position of registrar is so important to the working of the bill that it should not be merely left to the judgment of the cabinet. I think it should be left at least to the judgment of and consideration by the House in the way in which I suggest.

Any committee that is established should not operate on the basis of a simple majority. That is built into the bill now. There is a potential for unfairness. We should consider other methods of getting around that so that the committee can function on some basis other than a simple majority. Because it is a unique committee and may require unique ground rules. Perhaps in doing that we should consider whether some special protection for minority party members of parliament should be built into that structure. Those are matters to which we would like to have attention directed.

I remind hon. members that until the passage of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act the setting of boundaries for redistribution was under the control of the House itself. The situation led us directly to abuses and a new system had to be introduced. In respect of the matter I have been speaking about, there are in this bill many features that smack of the worst abuses of the old redistribution mechanism which I think should be removed or tempered. I do not think we ought to put ourselves in the position with this important bill where we have to re-learn a lot of old lessons which I think are better behind us than in front of us.

Many features of the bill are quite satisfactory and I am pleased to see the comprehensive nature of the disclosure which must be made. We have regarded in the past and are continuing to regard in the future such things as speaking engagements as part of our public duty. As MPs we are all supposed to discuss political issues with the public and to hear their views. This duty should not be regarded as an opportunity for profit. I think disclosure will help prevent that.

So far this temptation has not been too strong for members of this House, and it is not likely to become strong because I do not think we are seen by the public as entertaining personalities to the extent that perhaps some of our friends in the free world are seen as entertaining personalities, people who are paid huge honorariums for speaking. Indeed, the United States is one of those jurisdictions where that has taken place and the congress there has moved against it. They have used their methods, and this is one way that we are considering in moving against that kind of thing in this country.

The touchier issue of foreign travel is also included. We have in the past in this House left this to individual consciences and justification. What I am talking about when I refer to foreign travel is travel by a member of parliament at the expense of a foreign government. My own party has actively discouraged the acceptance of such foreign-paid trips. There is no doubt that foreign countries offer such trips to members of parliament to influence them, and our position is not strong if we are reduced to arguing whether these generous hosts receive value for the money. It is not an argument we ought to enter into. It is a good thing that this bill lays it out clearly that this is a matter to be disclosed.

Another provision the committee will have to look at, and which bothers me a good bit, is clause 23 which specifies that the Statutory Instruments Act does not apply to regulations made by the designating committee under this act. I happen to be a member of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who is in the House today, is co-chairman of that committee. We are developing and have developed guidelines by that statute for a review of statutory instruments such as orders in council and other things, work that I consider to be quite important. As time goes on that work will grow in importance, in an era when the government seems to step more and more into areas where it heretofore had not trodden. I do not see why that act ought not to apply to statutory instruments which arise from this statute. I know it may not be desirable to have one committee reviewing the work of another, but I think we should retain this control over the possibility of abuse of regulatory power.

I have tried to be brief, but I want to say in conclusion to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my colleague the government House leader, that we approve of the principle of this bill and most of its detail. I am sorry there is not more of it and that it did not come sooner so the committee would have the realistic hope of finishing its work. The government should have given us a bill that covered all possible instances of conflict of interest. Indeed, there has been time for that over the period of years about which I spoke earlier, but the government has chosen not to do that. It has chosen this first step at the beginning to give us a bill in areas which so far have caused us the least trouble.

I have indicated that we favour the principle of the bill and there will be no other speaker from our party for that reason. We are anxious to get this bill to the committee because it is important not only that this House operates appropriately, not only that members conduct themselves appropriately, but that this parliament—not just this House but as well the other chamber—appear to operate and act appropriately, and that the respective members of each of our Houses appear to act the same way.

It is in that spirit that we accept this bill for the purpose of getting it to the committee where it can be dealt with, and we are anxious to deal as expeditiously as we can in the circumstances with all its detail. We shall be suggesting some changes to strengthen the bill along the lines proposed by the government.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons we on this side of the House—and I am speaking of all three parties over here—were willing to agree to a one speaker per party debate on second reading was that we would still like to see this legislation put in place before this parliament comes to an end. There are some other things like veterans legislation which I regard as more important, and the government House leader knows that, but this is also an important piece of legislation.

As my friend the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has indicated, and as the very number of the bill, C-6, indicates, it has been before us for a long time during this session. It came as no surprise that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton appeared to be a bit sceptical of the motive in bringing in the bill at this time. He seems to think there is an election coming and that just before an election governments do interesting things. Our hope is that we can get the bill off to the committee this afternoon, that the committee can go into the details of the bill and possibly get it back before we are dissolved.

Mr. MacEachen: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hear the government House leader saying "hear, hear" so there is more agreement here this afternoon than one might expect.

An hon. Member: If we get it back, will he call it?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I imagine quite a few of us listened with interest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he was interviewed last evening on the CBC by Patrick Watson. I am sure that any of us who were listening perked up our ears particularly when he got to the question of the possible length of this parliament. He was acting as prime ministers do in that situation, talking without giving any precise answer.

I believe the Prime Minister made one thing very clear, and that is that he does not intend to exceed the length of time set by two procedents, and he referred by name to Prime Minister Bennett and Prime Minister Mackenzie King. We know in the case of Prime Minister Bennett that he called the election in 1935 for a date that was five years and three months after the one that had been held in 1930. We know in the case of Prime Minister Mackenzie King that he called the election in 1945, so that it was held five years and three months after the one that had been held in 1940. Whatever else the present Prime Minister said last night, he made it pretty clear that he would not exceed those precedents. That means that there could be not just a few days or a few weeks but a month or two yet in which to get legislation through before dissolution.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What date are you betting on, Stan?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am still predicting election day on my birthday. The last time there was an election held on my birthday was in 1962. I found it delightful to use as my slogan throughout the campaign these words, "All I want for my birthday is many happy returns." I would be happy to use that slogan again if the Prime Minister decides to call the election for that day.

An hon. Member: When is it?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): June 18.

Mr. MacEachen: Did you save the posters?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It would make Charlie Lynch happy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, it would make Charles Lynch happy because he is predicting that date also. I was asked if I saved the posters. I did not save those posters because that was quite a while ago. We saved the posters in Winnipeg North Centre from the last election but, of course, that will be a problem this time because under the new Canada Election Expenses Act we must declare their value in the coming election campaign.

Mr. Peters: They have one in antiquity though.

Mr. MacEachen: It will not have any commercial value; therefore it will not be an election expense.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At any rate, Mr. Speaker, this little by-play in which we are indulging is intended to underline the fact that there could be time, not just for today's second reading debate but for this piece of legislation, to be dealt with in committee, reported back to the House and for the government House leader to call it. It is an important piece of legislation dealing with a very important subject.

This is not the first time that we have had legislation dealing with the independence of parliament. There are a number of sections in the Senate and House of Commons Act, sections 10 to 24 inclusive, which have the general heading, "Independence of Parliament", and there are also three sections—sections 3, 4 and 5—in the House of Commons Act which relate to the independence of parliament.

A great deal has happened in society and things have become a great deal more complex and much more involved than they were in the days when those pieces of legislation were passed, however, and it is certainly time that our conflict of interest legislation as it affects members of parliament should be brought up to date. That is the purpose of this legislation.

As the government House leader pointed out, the matter has been discussed previously in the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and there was general agreement in that committee on the main outlines of the bill which is now before us. I think that it is reasonable to hope, if the committee has a bit of time to deal with the bill, that it might make a few amendments, some of which I think are desirable, and that it get the bill back in time to be passed before this session ends.

My friend from Grenville-Carleton wondered what the Chief Electoral Officer would do if a bill which includes amendments to the Canada Elections Act were passed very close to the election. I would point out to him, of course, that even the passing of the bill would not put it into effect. It comes into effect at a date to be fixed by proclamation. Even if we had the bill on the statute books, the government could delay proclamation until after the election. Then, of course, it would be up to whatever group of men and women who form the government at that time to decide what to do about the matter.

I think that most of us agreed with the general principles that were outlined by the Deputy Prime Minister when he made his statement introducing the bill today, and it is not necessary to go over that ground. The Deputy Prime Minister made reference to the fact that any bill—and this bill is one in point—that lays down rules regarding one's holdings, investments or connections can be awkward for some persons either in this House or in the other place. There is no use denying that. But I make again the point, which I think my hon. friend across the way made and which the hon member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) made, namely, that the public interest comes first. If it is a bit awkward for some members to have to declare their holdings and their interest, the fact that the public interest comes first overrides that awkwardness.

I appreciate the fact that the legislation deals with two main areas. There is the area of avoidance which informs members of parliament and senators of the kinds of things they must avoid. The other area is disclosure. The bill does not say that a member cannot have investments, resources or what have you, but the heart of the legislation is that there shall be full and complete disclosure. I hope that there are no loopholes in this bill that would make it possible for members of parliament or senators to avoid that requirement of complete disclosure. Sometimes I wonder about this business of a blind trust. I think that the committe had better take another look at that. One wonders at times whether that is not a means of avoiding the real intent of legislation.

I would like to support the point made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton with regard to the registrar. We already have certain officers who are regarded as officers of parliament. I refer to the Chief Electoral Officer, the Auditor General and the Commissioner of Official Languages. There may be one or two others, but certainly those three are regarded as officers of parliament. It may be that the government makes the choice and the nomination, but at least the matter must come before parliament and be the subject of a resolution of the House of Commons.

It would seem to me that that type of position ought to apply in the case of the registrar for both Houses or one registrar for each House. I suppose that I might go so far as to let the senators in the other place have a say about their registrar. I am not sure though; it is someting that I will have to think about.

Mr. Peters: Now, don't get carried away!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I feel that it does make a difference and is more than just so many words for an officer to be appointed by a resolution of this House rather than by the governor in council. The governor in council appointment means that it is cabinet appointment exclusively, and that we learn about the appointment afterwards. If it were to be an officer approved by the House of Commons, at least we would be told in advance and at least there would be some consultation and assurance that the person proposed is acceptable to all parties in the House. I would urge that that change at least be made in the bill when it gets into the hands of the committee.

There is one aspect of this whole situation that still worries some of us. I am referring to the special position of cabinet ministers. I know that the government's argument in presenting this legislation is that by laying down rules that apply equally to all members of parliament, whichever House they are in, cover cabinet ministers because cabinet ministers are either in this House or over in the other place.

However, cabinet ministers have a special position in that they know what is going on more than some of the rest of us. They are involved in deals and contracts of one kind or another. I do not wish to make reference to any names, but it does concern us at times when a person who has been a cabinet minister leaves this place and in the course of a very short time turns up on the board of directors of some giant corporation which, in turn, deals with the government. That kind of situation ought to be covered somewhere in the legislation.

I know that even before this bill was presented, the Prime Minister established a kind of voluntary registry for cabinet ministers, and under certain conditions one can find the information therein, but there is no legislation requiring such disclosure. There are certain rules of conduct or guidelines about what ministers can do within a period of time after they leave a cabinet post, but they are only guidelines. They do not have the force of legislation. I think they should and I think they ought to be in this particular act that is before us now. I urge that when the committee is dealing with this bill clause by clause it consider this point.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton had quite a bit to say about the public's view of politicians. Whatever happens to a politician anywhere in the world, and certainly in the democratic world, seems to reflect on us in this country. That puts a pretty heavy responsibility on us to be above reproach in every possible respect. I suggest that means we have to think very carefully about the things we do, not only with respect to legislation, contracts and all the rest, but about the things we do for ourselves.

I am not going to get into a long speech on a subject about which I feel very strongly, but I hope that in the next parliament we will think very carefully about what we do with respect to pay, allowances, trips, perquisites and all the rest for members of parliament. I do not think it would hurt us to have to struggle a bit to do our job instead of taking the position that we have to be well taken care of. That is not something to be put into this kind of legislation, but if we want to convince the people out there that we mean it when we say we require integrity, honesty and dependability on the part of members of parliament, we should go all the way with it.

I indicated at the start that on this side of the House we gave our agreement that there would be a short debate—one speaker per party—to let the bill go to committee. With that there was also a commitment that our speeches would not be long. I am happy to say that we are prepared to give this bill second reading this afternoon. We hope the government House leader will show that it is not just a piece of window-dressing, but that he is serious about it and will put it pretty close to the top of the list—right up there with veterans affairs as something to be dealt with before this session ends.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO MODIFY NUMBER OF COUNCIL MEMBERS

Hon. Warren Allmand (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-28, to amend the Northwest Territories Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Allmand (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

M. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief on third reading of this bill. As the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) indicated on second reading on February 16, we, of course, had urged the government to bring this particular motion before the House. Indeed, we indicated we would proceed with quick passage at all stages on that date.

It is important that we understand the urgency of this bill and frankly, as Your Honour will recall, the bill is in response to representations from the Territorial Council simply asking for additional representation in the Northwest Territories. The reason it is urgent is that the council has passed an ordinance on October 27 indicating that they wanted to increase their representation from 15 to 22. In addition, the second part of the bill, which is brief, indicated it would be retroactive in terms of that particular ordinance. I would simply bring to the attention of the House that the deadline is March 31 this year, which shows a degree of urgency to pass the bill. We agree with that particular principle.

I think it is important to point out, as my colleague did on second reading, that this bill does not prejudice the important issue of comprehensive land claims in the north. We must recognize in addition, as my colleague pointed out so eloquently on second reading debate, that it does not represent progress in terms of political evolution in the north. It is a simple measure to increase representation at this time in the Northwest Territories for the obvious reasons of geographical size and the necessity to have additional representatives on the Territorial Council that they feel are absolutely essential.

I hope that the brevity of my remarks will influence others in the House and that we can see speedy passage of this bill on third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Government Organization

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1978

DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Prime Minister) moved that Bill C-35, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacEachen (for the Prime Minister) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on third reading of Bill C-35, an act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

• (1640)

As members of the House are aware, when this bill was introduced for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, speakers on this side indicated that we were in agreement with the government's proposal to set up a department of fisheries and a separate department of the environment. In our opinion the government should not have divided the two responsibilities in 1970. It was not long after the change was made that the government realized that it had made yet another blunder and it has taken approximately nine years to right the wrong that was committed in 1970.

During second reading debate we also suggested the bill be sent to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry rather than to the miscellaneous estimates committee. The government accepted this proposal. The fact that the bill is back in the House this afternoon is indicative that we made a sound recommendation. It is unfortunate the government does not follow the sound advice we give it more often.

Quite frankly, the bill would have been returned to the House at an earlier date if the minister and government supporters had been more co-operative. When the bill was under discussion in committee we raised no objections to the minister reading a lengthy statement dealing with it and other matters pertaining to the over-all fishing industry. However, this co-operation unfortunately was not in evidence when members of the opposition asked relevant questions relating to policies of the new department. It was only after members of the opposition, following an hour and a half of stonewall tactics, walked out of the committee—the minister laughs, Mr. Speaker. These are the facts as I recall them. The minister sat there and said nothing. All he had to do at that time was say—and he was surrounded by his officials—that he had no objection to members of the opposition asking questions. However, that reasonable course was not followed, and it was only after we walked out of the committee en masse that they relented, which resulted in the bill finally being passed. But the government's actions did delay study of the bill.

When making this strict ruling initially we wondered what the government had to hide. This soon became evident. It had given windfall profits to certain fish companies and processors by allocating quotas to them which they could in turn sell to foreigners. According to statements made by the minister and the government's supporters, this policy did cost Canada some jobs. It also became clear that Canada has been out-negotiated by the United States in the quota allocations on Georges Bank.

In addition, as has happened in so many other areas, the government appears to have adopted a policy which we on this side put forth, namely that of licensing at least five freezer trawlers over a five-year period to catch species which Canadians have not generally fished. This is evident in the decision to allow Canadians to catch loligo squid in the U.S. fishing limit zone. I point out to the House that squid has to be frozen almost immediately it is brought in from the ocean so as to retain its quality.

During our examination of the bill a number of government amendments were moved, primarily to improve the French text. It is a matter of some regret, however, that I say to you, sir, and inform the House that an amendment moved by the official opposition to strengthen the proposed fisheries and oceans research advisory council was rejected by government supporters. As the bill reads at present, the government proposes to set up an advisory council under the control of the minister which shall consist of a chairman and not more than 24 other members. It is proposed that members of the council shall include persons from departments, boards and agencies of the Government of Canada.

At that point it was proposed by supporters of the official opposition that the advisory council also contain members representing governments of consenting provinces, for example, those that have a specialized interest in the marine sciences. Unfortunately, this worth-while proposal, which we believe would have served to give the provinces a sense of belonging, a sense of making a contribution, a feeling of unity and of participation in helping solve some of the very basic problems troubling the fishing industry on both coasts, was rejected by government supporters.

Undoubtedly there are times when it is necessary to be partisan, but there are other times when I believe a government should be conciliatory and not reject a worth-while proposal just because it comes from supporters of the official opposition. In my view, this was one of those occasions when the government should have considered some provincial representation on the research advisory council. Such a move would have strengthened the work of the council, and though we in the opposition believe that the over-all management of our fisheries resources must remain in the hands of the federal government, we also believe that there is a greater need for consultation with provincial fisheries ministers concerning the manner in which quotas are established and the manner in which these quotas are allocated to the provinces concerned and to foreign countries fishing within our 200-mile zone.

We in the official opposition believe that the role of the province must be strengthened so they can assist in upgrading the present processing facilities within their borders. Still more emphasis must be placed on upgrading the quality of our fisheries products if we hope to make further inroads into the American market. This is equally true, sir, if we hope to make a dent in the European Economic Community.

At the present time there is great uncertainty within the industry over our future prospects in Europe due, in no small measure, to this government's close-mouthed approach to the GATT negotiations. Since 1974 the industry has submitted three briefs to the Canadian trade and tariffs committee. However, there has been little by way of communication between the government and the industry about progress in the negotiations. At one time, prior to Britain joining the European Economic Community, Canada had free entry of canned salmon, shrimp and lobster into the British market. Now the tariffs on these products range from 17 per cent to 18 per cent, despite the fact that these tariffs are not protecting any European product. The same tariff walls apply to groundfish where exports to the Common Market face a tariff of some 15 per cent to 18 per cent, whereas the Common Market tariff against Norwegian groundfish exports is something like 3 per cent, and I believe Iceland exports its groundfish into the European Economic Community duty free.

The Canadian fishing industry in particular seeks only equal treatment with its two main competitors. It continues to ask just what is going on with the GATT negotiations. I ask the government, what does it have to hide? Why is the government so secretive about the progress, or perhaps I should say the lack of progress, that is being made behind closed doors? I submit you could get more information about the GATT negotiations from the Kremlin than from this government. It is high time that our negotiators and representatives pointed out to these countries that Canada is still granting licences allowing them to fish within our waters. Surely one favour deserves another.

Last year—the minister can correct me if I am wrong but I obtained these figures from the minister's officials in Halifax and I presume them to be correct—we licensed some 300 foreign freezer trawlers and some 190 foreign factory ships which enabled them to carry out fishing operations within our 200-mile limit. Surely this is worth something in the way of a negotiating tool when one sits down with European friends and discusses trade. The fishing industry is not asking for special concessions; it is asking for an equal opportunity when trying to make sales to the European Economic Community.

We asked that the provinces be represented on the advisory council, for we believe they should have the right to make a greater input into the field of fisheries research. The minister has cut down on the number of scientists employed on the east and west coast. I will not quibble with him over the numbers but my information is that some 34 scientists have been laid off, some 23 on the east coast and 11 on the west coast. These men will no longer be employed in the department. All of this is happening at a time when we have declared a 200-mile limit, when the need for specialized research in the fishing industry was never greater.

The provincial arm in this field should be strengthened. In fact, that was the interpretation I took from the minister's remarks when we discussed this issue on previous occasions. In my opinion and the opinion of my party, the place to start this form of meaningful discussion would be with the fisheries and oceans research advisory council. We also believe that the provinces should be represented on the advisory council, which is Part II of Bill C-35, because the province should have their hands strangthened in the field of fisheries education.

There are vast changes taking place in the fishing industry today. New species are being utilized; the catching of capeling, although the stocks are declining, the catching of squid, silver hake, round-nosed grenadier, to name but a few. These are all specialized species, fish that we have not previously utilized because the regular groundfish species, namely cod, haddock, hake and pollack, to name but a few, were in plentiful supply. Now we are aware that some countries look upon some of these species as a delicacy. Squid in particular are considered a delicacy by Japanese interests. Therefore, we believe that new emphasis must be placed on the scientific as well as the educational end of the fishing industry. Our fishermen must be trained in these new techniques.

In the view of the official opposition, this should be the role filled by the provinces. The provincial administrations are closer to the resource, certainly closer than is Ottawa. They are more aware of the species and the methods that must be used in catching them.

These are at least three fields where greater authority can be vested in the provinces. We believe that if this course is followed, our fishermen, whether they be inshore, mid-water or offshore, will enjoy even greater opportunities in this important primary industry.

There is room for hope as evidenced in clause 6 of the bill, which states that the minister of fisheries and oceans may enter into agreements with the government of any province or any agency thereof respecting the carrying out of programs for which the minister is responsible.

This section raises a number of important questions. For example, on February 14 the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) made a statement outside the House which was really a carbon copy of the releases made by his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), dealing with the agreement reached between Canada and the United States for the Atlantic coast fisheries and boundaries disputes.

In the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs we are told that the two treaties, the one on the third party settlement of the boundary and the other on fisheries arrangements, will be completed and ready for signature, if possible, by the beginning of March. I would like to know whether these treaties have been signed. Why were these statements made outside the House? Who determined these quotas and the species to be caught in various areas? What fisheries groups were consulted prior to these decisions being taken by our Canadian negotiator?

Were the provincial fisheries ministers consulted on this matter? Will there be any opportunity provided for members of parliament from all parties for an in depth study and debate on this important matter? Speaking of boundaries, where do we stand in our negotiations with France over the fisheries and boundaries claims put forth by France around the small islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon?

When speaking about agreements with the provinces as outlined in Bill C-35, I cannot help but ask what happened to federal-provincial negotiations when the minister recently awarded contracts for the catching of 12,000 tons of codfish off the coast of Labrador. The manner in which the minister awarded each of the five eastern provinces a share of this catch has created considerable concern in all areas, especially among Canadian fishermen. To help clear up this confusion, I believe it would be beneficial if the minister informed us about the method he used to determine the foreign countries that would be licensed to catch these fish, the method used for determining the quotas to be awarded to each province and the final disposition of the processed product. Just what are the terms of the contract he arranged with two communist countries, East Germany and Poland, and how much provincial input was obtained prior to making these decisions so vital to the people of Atlantic Canada?

According to all reports, inshore fishermen are dissatisfied with the government's policy as it applies to class A lobster licences. They claim that present regulations are defeating the idea of a multipurpose inshore fishery. This is especially true in the Northumberland Strait area where a recent meeting was held between the district protection officer and some 70 fishermen who stated that class A licence holders should be allowed to fish for anything available.

These same fishermen have stated that they are also unhappy with the present government's policy on scallop licences. Current regulations state that only those who took scallop during the last two years will be eligible for a licence this year. In addition, the area manager for fisheries has also stated that anyone who has not been active in the groundfish industry will get a licence this year.

Here we have three distinct problems all dealing with licences, licences of lobsters, scallop and groundfish which are requested by our inshore fishermen. I hope the minister will explain the rationale behind his present policies which are obviously creating mistrust and frustration among the inshore fishery of this area.

When we raise these issues, government supporters often ask what we would do. They say it is easy for us to criticize. There are at least 18 different species of clawed lobsters in the Atlantic ocean and another 12 from the Indian and Pacific oceans. Since all clawed lobster species other than Canadian, American and European live in relatively deep water, there has been little commercial development except for the Norway lobster whose current landings exceed the combined catch of European and Canadian and American lobsters.

In the Atlantic ocean clawed lobsters occur from Greenland and Iceland south to the waters southeast of the Falkland Islands and the southern tip of South America. One species has been reported from deep water off New Jersey down through the Caribbean with additional species also in the Gulf of Mexico.

Although most clawed lobsters are much smaller than the Canadian-American and European lobsters, many of them compare in size with the canning lobsters of the southern Gulf of St. Lawrence, approximately two and three quarter inches in carapace length.

It is my understanding that Norwegian clawed lobsters prefer colder temperatures than the European or Canadian-American lobster. Has the minister ever considered conducting experiments which might lead to establishing the Norway lobsters in our own habitat, closer to the Atlantic coast, which would be beneficial to our inshore fishermen?

In another field, Holland and Germany import more than $1 million worth of eels annually from the United States. Eels breed in the ocean and they come up our rivers to lay their eggs. What steps have been taken to improve and develop a Canadian eeling industry for export to Europe where they are smoked and considered a delicacy?

Finally, I would like to know—and this is under the minister's responsibility—what progress has been made in opening up the Canadian swordfish market in the United States. Now that an acceptable level of mercury in swordfish has been established in the United States, swordfish catches are showing up on the docks of Gloucester, South Carolina, Georgia and Florida. This is a multimillion dollar industry. I recently held discussions with the Japanese ambassador concerning the potential for swordfish in his country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—The Canadian Economy—Measures to reduce current account deficit; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Post Office—Overnight intercity courier service—Alleged secrecy respecting program; the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie)—Energy—Inquiry whether DREE represented in Maritime Energy Corporation.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) would like to complete his remarks within the next few minutes, I am sure the House would be agreeable. At least, I would ask if the House would be agreeable, particularly the hon. member whose bill we will be dealing with, to consent being given the hon. member to continue until he completes his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the request of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1978

DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for Mr. Trudeau) that Bill C-35, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I thank the Deputy Prime Minister and the House. Only recently I discussed with the Japanese ambassador the possibility of opening up the swordfish market. At that time I pointed out to him that the market in his country for tuna which are taken in the St. Margaret's Bay area and put into a corral and fed until they are fat enough to satisfy the Japanese was a very profitable one for the people of Nova Scotia, and I suggested some steps might be taken to open up and expand the swordfish industry. The ambassador appeared to be very interested and I pass this information along to the minister in the hope that his officials will follow up the matter and bring us up to date not only with regard to the swordfish industry but with respect to all the other items I have raised in the course of my address.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) on a point of order?

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, I was intending to speak. I was trying to catch your eye.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation, there was time allowed in order to permit the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) to finish his remarks. I understand that the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) also wishes to take part in the debate. As far as I know, he is the last speaker in the debate so I presume we shall be dealing with this matter to complete it finally at eight o'clock.

Mr. Railton: Do I understand we shall not now be talking about this fisheries bill? We have agreed to allow the bill to be completed at this time but we did not leave it open for further speeches. It was due to the courtesy of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) that this extension of time was allowed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I gather, then, that there is not unanimous consent that we should proceed. Therefore, we have to call private members' business.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, if it is intended to continue with the government bill, I am quite willing to give that consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the intervention of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). Is that agreed to?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed.

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my remarks are largely confined to Part VII, having to do with the National Research Council. According to the 1977-78 report of the president, the National Research Council is to "undertake, assist or promote scientific and engineering research to further Canada's economic and social development".

Since 1917 the NRC has been the premier research agency in Canada. The government has modified the functions and altered some objectives of the NRC in recent years in its effort to co-ordinate scientific effort in Canada. It is beyond question that the policies of the government have greatly altered the operation of the NRC. It is certainly questionable whether the co-ordination of the Canadian science effort has been effective. Until recently, NRC had three operations programs, namely the engineering and natural sciences research program, the scientific and technical information program, and the scholarships and grants in aid of research program.

In 1974-75 the principal research activities of the NRC were modified so that the highest priorities were accorded to the following two activities. Firstly, top priority was given to research on long-term projects of national concern. This research is directed toward the solution of problems in such areas as energy, food, transportation, building and construction. Second priority was assigned to research in direct support of industrial innovation and development. This category includes research on promising areas of new technology, effective methods of technology transferred to industry and technical and financial assistance to industry to carry out specific research and development projects to the point of industrial innovation.

In 1977-78 technology transfer and utilization of research results was accorded a separate priority status reflecting the growing concern for the dismal state of Canada's secondary manufacturing industries and the low level of innovative high technology industry in this country.

It is important to note, however, that the NRC has not abandoned its basic and exploratory research which composes about 25 per cent of its intramural research effort, a field that has won world-wide respect for the council.

In 1972, the special Senate Committee on Science Policy recommended that the NRC be transformed into "an academy devoting all its activities to basic research and long-term applied research with no specific objective, that most of the intramural basic research be concentrated in this institution, and that a substantial portion of its work be performed at the request of government agencies and private firms on a fee basis."

At the same time, the granting function of the NRC would be given to a "new foundation for the physical sciences". This proposal has been converted into reality with the creation by parliament in 1977 of the natural sciences and engineering research council. Beginning in 1977-78, NSERC has assumed the administration and operation of the NRC's program of scholarships and grants in aid of research in the natural sciences and engineering.

The Senate committee also envisaged the creation of a new institution to be called the Canadian Industrial Laboratories Corporation, primarily to carry out intramural research and development programs designed to serve the needs of manufacturing industries. To date the government has not acted on this proposal.

Finally, the Ministry of State for Science and Technology was intended by the science committee to be the central government ministry charged with the task of reviewing and assessing the proposed science programs of the other departments and agencies of the federal government. To date, the Ministry of State for Science and Technology has not been able to discharge this simple duty.

I want to consider for a moment the effect of the creation of the NSERC and the loss of this granting function by the NRC. In the past the NRC has spun off certain major functions as these have grown to independent status of their own. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the Defence Research Board and the Medical Research Council are cases in point. These three organizations are different in nature from the NRC's granting function. To refer back to the National Research Council of Canada report of the president, 1977-78, at page 18, Dr. Schneider comments:

> The separation of the university grants function which has been one of the cornerstones of NRC's broader science role in Canada represents a more fundamental change. In fact, the development and nurturing of scientific research in Canada and the provision of the necessary infrastructure for science has been an ongoing NRC responsibility since its was established some 62 years ago. There is no doubt that the interaction with the university sector which this role engendered has been highly beneficial to NRC in carrying out its own research mission, and the close contact it has had with all three sectors, university, industry and government, has greatly facilitated the co-ordination of research programs in Canada. In order to retain some of these advantages in future, it will be essential for NRC to endeavour to maintain active liaison with a new council and the university sector.

In the future, because of the creation of the NSERC the role of the NRC will be less involved in the general development of science in Canada, particularly at the university level. Rather, NRC's future role will be more mission oriented and, according to the same report:

... largely centred around its laboratory programs together with extramural research projects strongly coupled so as to reinforce, extend or exploit laboratory programs. Additionally special emphasis will continue to be given to promoting industrial research and development and to supporting promising research projects in industry.

● (1710)

The granting function represented a major program for NRC, amounting to almost $110 million in 1978-79. Whether the separation of the two bodies will affect the relationship between NRC and the university basic research program remains to be seen. In addition to the fear that the creation of the NSERC will have a detrimental effect on the general development of science in Canada is the concern that the appointment of a non-scientist to the presidency of the new council has not been well received by the scientific community.

The formation of a Canadian industrial laboratories corporation proposed by the special Senate committee has not been accomplished. The committee felt that CILC was necessary because the NRC could not, in the committee's view, excel in the fields of basic research and industrial research. It is perhaps appropriate to question the accuracy of this conclusion since NRC has the right to claim considerable success in both areas. During the last five years 80 patents resulted from research carried out in NRC laboratories and, of these, 42 have thus far been successfully licensed to industries in Canada.

Under NRC's industrial research assistance program 255 projects were supported during 1977-78 for a total value of $15.6 million, which supported 744 research scientists and 507 technicians on industrial research projects. As a partial measure of benefits arriving from successful completion of IRAP projects, a sample survey of ten companies showed that previous IRAP support of $3.619 million subsequently led to the creation of 410 new permanent jobs in these industries or one job per $8,800 of IRAP funds invested. These figures do not include indirect employment in associated construction, subcontracts and services. Contracts completed, currently in place and under negotiation under NRC's program for industry laboratory projects, PILP, which will cost approximately $25 million are projected to give rise to about $1.5 billion in product sales and about 3,000 jobs.

In addition, the NRC claims that it has established an effective program of technology transfer to industry and that it also has an effective publication and technical information transfer capability. These propositions are demonstrated in the report of the NRC president which I quoted earlier and are illustrated at page 12.

I suggest that this clearly demonstrates the tremendous effectiveness that research and development can have on developing industrial production and marketing capability and creating good jobs in Canada for Canadians. It is my feeling that the creation of the CILC as a spin-off of the NRC is now due and that the specialization we require in this field will be a dynamic to improve Canada's research and development capability in years to come.

[Mr. Howie.]

Finally, we have to consider the performance of MOSST. With the partial dismantlement of the NRC by the removal of its granting function to the NSERC, Canadian science, in the view of some, no longer has institutional leadership. Certainly, NRC exercised leadership over many years. It is abundantly clear that MOSST does not exercise leadership in science mainly because it has no control over the science program of other federal departments and agencies. Also, the rapid turnover in ministers has inhibited the development of a strong voice in cabinet. One is left to conclude that the government has not effected a comprehensive science policy for Canada. Granted, some of the recommendations of the Senate science committee have been enacted, the NSERC and MOSST, but other recommendations have not been pursued.

Caught in the middle, the NRC has lost its major function as a central power in Canadian science, but no other body has been established to pick up the mantle. It appears to be a question of incomplete planning and inappropriate half actions. In the field of science Canada has lost more in reorganization that it has gained.

Canada's research and development effort is dismal compared with that of other industrialized nations. At present Canada's annual gross expenditure on research and development stands at about .92 per cent of gross national product. In 1970 the figure was 1.21 per cent. In 1975 when Canada's gross expenditure on research and development was 1 per cent, comparable figures for the other nations were: United States, 2.35 per cent; Germany, 2.16 per cent; Japan, 2 per cent; France, 1.86 per cent; Sweden, 1.59 per cent. From 1970 to 1978 the real value of federal government research and development expenditures measured in constant dollars declined, although current dollar expenditures rose each year. Further, regarding the federal government's research and development effort as measured by the ratio of total government research and development, total government spending declined steadily from 3.55 per cent in 1970 to 2.02 per cent in 1976. In 1977-78 there was a slight recovery, with the level on effort measuring 2.1 per cent in 1978.

By the most objective measurements, then, it must be concluded that the present government has not been notably outstanding in its support of science and technology. What is particularly ironic in this situation is the fact that few countries, particularly in the last decade, have devoted as much study, analysis and creative energy to science policy as Canada has.

In 1978 the government made some serious attempts to stimulate research and development both through increased federal funding and through tax incentives. A major goal announced by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) in June was an increase in gross expenditure for research and development to 1.5 per cent of gross domestic product—not gross national product, as reported by many observers and commentators—by 1983. Critics pointed out that to attain this goal, research and development expenditures in industry would have to grow by an average 19 per cent each year and government and university expenditures by 12 per cent or 13 per cent annually. These were seen as possibly unrealistic targets, and it was suggested by some that the total package of incentives announced in June of 1978 was motivated, at least in part, by the anticipated federal election.

In August of 1978, however, the government launched an austerity drive and announced plans to reduce federal spending. Science and technology, including various research and development programs, were affected in some areas. The government proposed to reduce the fisheries program by closing down the main Halifax laboratories and cutting back on the work done at facilities in Vancouver, Winnipeg, St. Andrews, New Brunswick, and St. John's, Newfoundland. The purpose of the cuts was to effect a $2 million saving in the federal budget.

At the same time the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) proposed to eliminate the Petawawa forest experimental station north of Ottawa, a 60-year old enterprise which represents a $100 million Canadian investment in forestry research. The Globe and Mail described the action as being initiated "for the sake of a paltry cut in government spending which is in fact not a cut at all but a bookkeeping exercise to scrape up funds for other spending programs". A loud public outcry ultimately persuaded the government to reconsider its decision.

Agriculture Canada announced at the same time that the Canfarm program, a computer based financial management service to farmers, would be closed out. The program also had a significant research component, particularly in the field of farm management, but also in communications and business administration. The net saving was set at $5.5 million.

Then in his budget speech on November 16, 1978 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) announced new tax incentives for industries performing research and development.

The picture which emerges over the past year is rather confusing. On the one hand, the government announces increased funding and tax incentives to stimulate Canadian research and development; on the other hand, it abruptly terminates important government research programs. The Globe and Mail commented on the confusing activities of the government in the following way:

> If science and technology of which research is the cutting edge are important enough to have a minister of their own they are surely important enough to have a policy of their own. But the manner in which they are left scattered in shreds and patches, $2 million here, $5.5 million there to be cut at the whim of any minister or any department makes it evident that the only policy to which they are subject is that of short-term opportunism and that the only minister responsible for defending them would rather keep his portfolio than fight for it.

A prophetic comment! The minister was promoted. It is at least arguable that the present government, although it has belatedly recognized the importance of research and development both in industry and elsewhere, has not yet evolved an effective and coherent national science policy.

Basic to an effective research and development effort in secondary manufacturing is a national industrial policy. Canada's industrial research and development effort is strangely out of step in the industrialized world in which Canadian products must compete. The business sector in Canada provides only about one third of research and development expenditures, compared with figures of 40 per cent to 50 per cent for most industrialized countries.

● (1720)

Further, the business sector in Canada performs about 40 per cent of R and D compared to 50 to 65 per cent for business sectors in most advanced countries. In Canada also, for every scientist and engineer engaged in R and D in the government sector there is slightly more than one in the business sector. In 1975 the ratio was actually about 1.2, and 30 per cent of the national scientific and engineering manpower was in universities. In contrast, in the United States, Japan, Germany and Sweden there are approximately five scientists and engineers in the business sector to every one in government or industry.

A factor of major importance in industrial R and D is a very high proportion of foreign ownership of Canadian secondary manufacturing industry. In June of 1978 the Financial Post quoted a science ministry official as stating that Canadian owned firms do proportionately more R and D than do foreign subsidiaries. Thus, until a coherent and effective industrial and foreign investment policy is put in place in Canada it is illogical to expect that effective R and D and significant innovative high technology industry will be developed in Canada.

The forest industry by any standard is a major enterprise in Canada contributing $6 billion to a favourable balance of trade and providing direct or indirect employment for nearly one million people. The industry is in trouble, however, because Canada's share of world markets for forest products has declined over the past 20 years from 31 per cent to 19 per cent, while the United States share has increased from less than 9 per cent to more than 12 per cent. Canada has 13 per cent of the world's soft wood resources but produces only 11 per cent of the world's harvest in soft woods. In contrast, the United States with only 11 per cent of the same resource harvests 22 per cent of the world's total. General productivity in the Canadian wood products industry is about 15 per cent less than in the United States. As a specific example, British Columbia saw mills recovered 25 per cent less lumber from a given log volume than mills in the United States Pacific northwest.

The present state of forest products research and development in Canada is lagging as it is in most areas. But the situation in forestry may be worse than the national average. Federally funded R and D in Canada is about $7 million as compared to $14 million in the United States. Industrially funded R and D in Canada is only $20 million compared to $180 million in the United States. Among the 20 leading industrial sectors in Canada, wood processing ranks last in R and D expenditures.

The Canadian forestry service is only poorly supported by the federal government. Although forestry once enjoyed the status of a separate department, the federal effort has been consistently reduced over the years. In the last decade the Canadian forest service has lost more than 50 per cent of its man-years, a time period when significant manpower growth has occurred in almost every other area of the federal public service. The budget of the Canada forest service is only one quarter that of the federal science and technology expenditures for fisheries, energy, mines and resources, and agriculture. Forestry is noted to contribute $6 billion to Canada's trade balance, which is comparable to the net contribution of fuels and minerals and much greater than the $1 billion created by agriculture and the $0.3 billion from fisheries.

The budget of the Canada forest service will be slashed by a further $5.3 million, or 15 per cent, in 1979. Both the eastern and western forest products laboratories are to be handed over to the private sector and will face an effective budget cut of more than 45 per cent as of April 1, 1979.

Again, the government actions in cutting forestry in R and D is puzzling, considering the stated intention to stimulate industrial related R and D in Canada. The forest enterprise is already seriously underfinanced at the federal level and the proposed cuts can hardly be justified. One might suggest that these moves represent another symptom of the lack of a coherent federal science policy.

Consider the recent government program to assist in the modernization of our pulp and paper industry over the next three years. It has a pleasant sound but the sound is distorted when we look at the government's performance. On June 1 of last year the government earmarked $2 million for the creation of five regional university based industrial research innovation centres, to be spent over the next five years in consultation with the provinces. Where are they? They are non-existent.

The centres of excellence was another excellent program announced last June. The province of New Brunswick in good faith proposed a forestry complex for the University of New Brunswick to assist the forest industry which is so important to Atlantic Canada. Last fall I asked the minister of science when the announcements would be made and he indicated that many interesting proposals have been received and were being reviewed; and, Mr. Speaker, they are still being reviewed. Where are they?

Another proposal to expand the NRC's program of industry laboratory projects is an excellent development but there is a dearth of information regarding its implementation. There is also great disappointment that it was not extended to include university laboratories. The research experience that inhouse university scientists or engineers have must be combined to assist the industrial development of marketable products. I believe too that Canada's scientific and technological associations are capable of making a major contribution in the process of developing the appropriate marketing and management skills necessary to effect transfer of technology to the private sector.

I remain deeply concerned that the government has not yet devised a long-term policy for the funding of university based scientific research. Three to five-year budget projections for the granting councils updated annually would confer a much needed stability to the Canadian university research effort and eliminate cost-ineffective on and off funding planning.

The government's procurement policy announced last June is still not before us and a new and important role for FIRA is still mystery. The government announced new programs which are not implemented, dismantled old programs, does complete about-faces in terms of industrial incentives for research and development, and sets small national goals which it seems to hope to achieve by some form of magic or levitation. Our science policy seems comparable to the man who jumped on a horse and drove off in all directions. In real terms we are making a great effort and going nowhere.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being after five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

DECENTRALIZATION OF DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications relating to the decentralization of the Department of Veterans Affairs to the province of Prince Edward Island.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken on this motion on previous occasions and will not repeat my comments, which are already on the record. Suffice it to say that I have asked for these papers because concerns are still being expressed about the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Prince Edward Island.

Let me put on the record that I am not speaking against decentralization but only hoping that enough information can be produced to convince everyone that the move is a wise one. In that regard, all I want to do this afternoon is to put on the record some of the latest concerns that have been expressed, and I will do that by reading an extract from a letter which has been sent to me, and possibly to other members of the House, dated February 2 from the Royal Canadian Legion. It reads in part:

The Royal Canadian Legion is convinced that the inclusion of the Canadian Pension Commission in the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Prince Edward Island is a grave error. We had serious reservations in 1976 when the decentralization plan was first announced and told the minister so. We believed then and we do so even more strongly today that it would be impossible to move the commission without serious impairment of that organization's ability to serve disability pensioners, prospective pensioners and their dependants.

We are in sympathy with the plan to create jobs in Prince Edward Island, but not at the expense of disabled war veterans.

● (1730)

In the attachment to the letter one can read as follows:

The Royal Canadian Legion opposes this move for it is convinced, after careful evaluation of the position, that such a move will have a very harmful effect on the commission's ability to serve veterans. It is the Legion's view that it will impair efficiency, reduce productivity and involve substantial delays in adjudication for a period of three to five years.

The commission employs many specialists, both in medical and other categories. These people are vital to the maintenance of a fair and efficient adjudicating process. It takes years of experience and training as members of the commission staff before the majority are proficient to a point where they can process pension claims according to the high standards which we have come to expect as proper. For example, it normally takes two years or so for a doctor to be fully versed in the specialized pension work. The number of such specialists who have indicated that they would be willing to move to Prince Edward Island is pitifully small. For example, four doctors on the medical advisory staff out of twenty-five seem likely to move!

Many of the medical/clerical specialists who now work for the commission are married women whose family ties will make it impossible for them to move to Prince Edward Island. It is not easy to recruit suitable people for this work in Ottawa, where there is a considerable pool of prospective candidates. We believe it would be very difficult to recruit and train people for employment in Prince Edward Island, without a serious deterioration in the speed of processing claims, and the standards of adjudication.

A percentage of pension claims has to be processed in French. The reluctance of French-speaking persons to move from the province of Quebec to Ottawa is a known fact. This is so despite excellent educational and cultural activities in the French tongue which the Ottawa area can provide. We believe that the task of recruiting properly trained French-speaking people to fulfil the commission's requirements in Charlottetown will be a difficult one.

The relative isolation of Charlottetown also gives cause for concern. Despite official claims to the contrary, this cannot help but make for delays. As is well known, these occur now, despite the fact that Ottawa is more or less in the centre of things. With the exception of entitlement boards, almost all of the commission's business is transacted by correspondence. Eight per cent only of the veteran population lives in the Atlantic region, within easy reach of Charlottetown.

The isolation of Charlottetown will also complicate the travel arrangements of the pension commissioners who must move around the country to hold personal hearings. The extra travel time required for journeys to western Canada will mean a reduction in the number of cases to be heard each trip, unless travel on Saturdays and Sundays becomes the norm.

The Royal Canadian Legion has continued to press for the retention of the Pension Commission in Ottawa since the move was first announced.

I put those comments of the Royal Canadian Legion on the record as I think they express these concerns in just as good terms as possibly I could use. I have asked for the documentation and papers supporting the move on the assumption the department has already looked into these questions. I should like to know what answers it came up with, and that is why I have asked for the production of these papers. I think this recent letter of just last month from the Royal Canadian Legion is a clear indication of the continuing concerns that have been expressed by many groups, and it is for that reason I ask again that there be more disclosure of the investigation carried out prior to the decision to make this move.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the parliamentary secretary on his motion as I think it is important, and I should like to show him that he has struck a responsive chord on this side. I understand this is the third time going through the proper channels that he has attempted within a month to have parliament demand that papers be made available. He has been supported each time by someone from this side. The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) has participated in the debate on each occasion.

It is particularly difficult for us to understand why these papers are not made available to a parliamentary secretary. It would be difficult enough to understand if he were a backbencher, but you will know, Mr. Speaker, that since 1974 parliamentary secretaries have been considered to be nearly part of the cabinet, for when ministers are absent they speak for them in the House of Commons. Yet here is a parliamentary secretary who asks for simple, innocuous papers, and cannot get them. He cannot get them from this minister, who once again is not in the House to hear the representations of the parliamentary secretary. The last time I heard this minister advance anything in the House was about three weeks ago when he advanced D-Day by about three and a half months so he could make his eulogy before the dissolution of the House. That must have provided one of the more funnier viewings for the TV audience in recent months.

I should like to commend the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for his persistence in this matter. On looking back through Hansard I found that a year ago yesterday he was speaking in the same vein. He has tried, faithfully and with all the proper decorum, to get what should be the right of every member of parliament. The government will not give anything to the opposition, and now it turns out it will not give its own members information, information which they want for purely practical purposes.

I would like to point out what the parliamentary secretary said a year ago. As reported at page 3725 of Hansard for March 7, 1977, some two years ago, the hon. member had this to say:

The recent announcement that many of the branches of the department would be transferred en bloc to Prince Edward Island met with anything but a favourable reaction among employees. A release issued by employees of the department gives expression to this concern and draws attention to the disruption of family life, the main reason given by the overwhelming majority of departmental employees for rejecting the transfer to Charlottetown. According to answers given by employees of the department responding to a Public Service Alliance circular, many members of the veterans affairs component last November rejected the idea of a transfer by some 90 per cent; only 5 per cent favoured the move, and the remainder claimed they were undecided at that time because of lack of information as to the government's intentions.

That is a very clear indication of what is going to happen to the Department of Veterans Affairs which, let us remember, is here for the benefit of veterans, not for the benefit of government, not for the benefit of the mayor of Charlottetown, and not for the benefit of the minister. It is in existence for the benefit of veterans.

Veterans have the right to be treated well and efficiently by the department. This is a department noted for being behind in its business. Every time a question is asked in the House or by letter to the department about a pension application, a pension readjustment or a pension hearing, we hear that there is a backlog of thousands of applications. Yet at this precise time the minister decided to shatter the department and send the pieces that survived to Charlottetown. God only knows how many thousands of cases they will be behind as a result of such a move. It really boggles the imagination that these people should come up with the idea of doing this at this particular time.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs, read from a letter from the Legion. I should like to read from an editorial that appeared a few days ago, which I think sums up the whole problem in respect of this move. It is not that people are against decentralization, but they are against anything that turns the administration into a shambles, particularly when there is one element that is vitally affected by a decision made by the Canadian Pension Commission. The editorial is headed, "They Have Done it Again" and it reads:

The problem began October 28, 1976, when Veterans Affairs minister ... dropped a bombshell: his department would be moving from Ottawa to Prince Edward Island as part of the federal government's decentralization program.

On October 29, 1976, Douglas McDonald, then dominion president, announced that the Legion realized the need to create jobs in Prince Edward Island, but was opposed to the move because there was "bound to be a deterioration in the service to veterans and their dependents."

A relocation task force was set up to carry out the political order and the 1977 survey of DVA's headquarters staff showed that only 20.5 per cent of respondents wanted to move. The minister insisted that this group would form a sufficient core to ensure continuity and maintain the level of service.

● (1740)

It just does not stand the test of practicality that you can take one fifth of a group that is always behind in the review of pension requirements and pension claims, and say that that one fifth will be able to keep up the service.

The editorial continues:

On January 27, 1978, Mr. MacDonald announced that a 11.9-acre waterfront site in Charlottetown had been selected and he praised its suitability.

The editorial goes on discussing the hilarious fiasco that then went on to the effect that they had chosen this site but the people who own the property had never heard that the department was even looking at it or thinking of it. The latest story is that the department will be decentralized within Charlottetown in various bits of rental accommodation here and there. The story goes on and on, and it does not get any better the more one reads of it.

I would like to refer to a speech made by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, on March 16, 1978 one year ago. How is it that these things always seem to come up in March?

Mr. Parent: Beware the ides of March.

Mr. McKinnon: Yes, beware the ides of March. Somebody ought to get assassinated over this matter. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion pointed out some of the things which were going on with regard to this move and the care that they were taking. As reported at page 3852 of Hansard he said:

Officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs have worked with Treasury Board secretariat task force on decentralization for more than a year to determine which units and functions can be relocated. They also developed details of operation, cost and other factors which would permit cabinet to decide which units can best be relocated.

This is exactly the kind of information which the hon. member for Vaudreuil is seeking. The hon. member would like to know why they are doing this, but the minister will not tell him and the government will not let him look at the reasons for making its decisions. Will the world crack apart if someone finds out what is causing this government to move in the irrational way which it frequently does? The studies were done, the task force met, they kept minutes, they prepared notes and made recommendations. One would think that we are in a time of war and that these are great state secrets which might lead to the defeat of the nation if they were made public. The government will not only not allow them to be made public, they will not allow their own advisers to see the information. There is paranoia about the matter of secrecy in this government.

The parliamentary secretary went on to say:

In preparation for location, the Department of Veterans Affairs, in conjunction with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Urban Affairs, together with representatives of the province of Prince Edward Island and of the city of Charlottetown have formed a trilevel committee to address itself to all aspects involved in the relocation.

What is the matter with us finding out what these people decided? What is the matter with us finding out about what they were considering when they decided to move this department at that time?

The parliamentary secretary went on to say:

Also included in the advance planning team is Dr. John Glendenning, president of Holland College in Charlottetown, with whom the department might soon be working to develop curricula to provide islanders with skill training for possible recruitment to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

What is so tragic if a parliamentary secretary finds out what they were thinking about? Will it cost an election or something? Is there anything that this government is willing to tell anybody about?

Mr. Parent: That is what I am going to do.

Mr. McKinnon: I will not hold my breath waiting for you to do it.

Here is another quotation from the parliamentary secretary's speech:

When the committee addresses itself to all aspects of the relocation and a great many different subjects, among the committee's concerns will be the effect of the move of employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs and their families on the medical, health, cultural and educational facilities in P.E.I.

Why can we not get that information? The hon. member keeps asking for it, and he is a parliamentary secretary. I would think that at some point he should have a chance of obtaining this information.

I do not want to take up too much time or be accused of talking this particular motion out. As I said before, I rose to speak so that the hon. member on that side would know that he has friends on this side, even if he does not seem to have any sympathetic souls on that side. Why is there not a civilized compromise on this matter?

I had the same problem a couple of years ago with one of the ministers, one who is not quite as bullheaded as the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I needed information that was being supplied by a company under contract to the government, and the particular minister did not think that I should have that information. We had a little chat, and he said, "You can't have that, and you can't have that", and I said, "Well, I want that and if you'll give me that one, I'll give up on the other one." We came to an amicable arrangement and he provided the information that I needed to do my job as a member of parliament. I suggest that that is all the parliamentary secretary wants to do is his job and represent his constituents. Yet the government will not give him the slightest bit of assistance. It just closes the door and lets him fret outside.

We saw an example yesterday of what happens when the government gets too autocratic with its own supporters when the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) took about the only solution available. I would like to welcome anyone else who would care to participate in the same trip.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have a chance to remind my honourable colleague of what happened a few years ago when someone was dissatisfied with his party and crossed the floor to this side. You win a few and you lose a few.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You've regretted it ever since, haven't you? We got the best of the deal.

Mr. Parent: I would like to deal with the strategy and the impact of this very important move. I think that addressing ourselves to this matter is what we should be doing. I would be more than willing to present this type of information. For example, in preparation for the relocation in Prince Edward Island, the Department of Veterans Affairs in conjunction with the Departments of Regional Economic Expansion, Public Works, and Urban Affairs formed a tri-level committee which collectively addressed itself to all aspects of the move. This is what the hon. member was talking about.

Among his concerns was the availability of medical, health, cultural and educational facilities on Prince Edward Island and, also, everything from French classes at the schools, colleges and universities, to cultural and recreational resources. I would like to add here, however, that the extent of the requirement of the French language training will not be known until it is determined how many French speaking employees will choose to locate in Prince Edward Island. Considering the current trend in Canada, one would expect greater availability of education in the French language by 1981, and this is when the move is contemplated to be made.

This tri-level planning committee is not only a group of federal officials, but it involves the participation of people from the federal, provincial, and municipal governments. Many times we are charged with taking the position that we do not want to discuss such matters with other people. Just the opposite is true. We are doing all we can to bring all levels of government in on the situation.

I agree with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) when he states that the most important thing in this matter is that we take care of our veterans. Is the hon. member saying though that by moving to Prince Edward Island the veterans will not get the services to which they are entitled? I would remind him that there are many offices—and I will refer to this topic a little later—right across this land where our Canadian veterans can get services. Surely Ottawa is not the only place in Canada to get whatever problems that exist straightened out. Surely there will be enough talented, trained, educated people in Prince Edward Island to solve these problems as they come up.

There may be more federal officials on the committee than officials from the provincial and municipal governments, but this is because there is a lot to be done with respect to the work which is to be carried out by the Departments of Regional Economic Expansion, Urban Affairs, and Public Works.

One might ask who will be relocating when the department moves. I agree that many federal employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs will be unable to relocate. Some of them are two income families with either the husband or wife employed outside government, and so may choose not to move. There is, however, evidence that some federal employees look forward to becoming members of the Prince Edward Island community. It is one of the most beautiful islands and provinces in Canada. Some of the federal employees in the national capital region are orginally from the maritimes and, because they joined the federal governement, they had to leave Prince Edward Island and the other Atlantic provinces to work in Ottawa.

For years the opposition parties have harped on decentralization. They want to spread everything out. Now that we are doing it, they do not want it. They cannot make up their minds whether they are coming or going.

With the government's over-all decentralization program a variety of federal departments and agencies are being brought closer to the people of Canada. Why should all the agencies be in Ottawa? Surely the people of Canada deserve to have some of them located in their communities. More maritimers now find they can work for the federal government without having to live in Ottawa. This is one of the major aspects of government policy on decentralization.

There will be many who do not wish to or cannot relocate. My colleague behind me who is from New Brunswick knows of the employment problems they have in that area and we hope to alleviate the situation by locating a government department down there. A large number of positions will be filled by people living in the Atlantic region—

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The motion is for the production of papers. We are not criticizing decentralization per se.

Mr. Parent: My chubby friend over here says I do not know whether I am coming or going. I do not think that it is exactly what he wants to say. In response to my colleague from Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who wanted papers produced, I hope to share with him some of the information we were able to get from our very able Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Macdonald).

Most of the correspondence received by the Department of Veterans Affairs comes from veterans' organizations and primarily from the Royal Canadian Legion. There are three main areas of concern. First is the effect on our services to veterans and their dependants, and the loss of experienced and trained personnel who will choose not to relocate. This is a very important factor. Second is the department headquarters' relationship with the national offices of veterans' organizations in Ottawa. Third, is the over-all cost of relocation during a time of financial restraint. Mr. Speaker, I think someone is here for my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is the desire of the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General that this honourable House attend him immediately in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

[Translation]

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that the Honourable Deputy Governor General has been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-43, an act to amend the Judges Act, to amend an act to amend the Judges Act and to amend certain other acts in respect of the reconstitution of the courts in New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan.—Chapter No. 11.

Bill C-2, an act to amend the Health Resources Fund Act.—Chapter No. 12.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being past six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.02 p.m. the House took recess.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO EXEMPT CERTAIN PRACTICES FROM PROVISIONS OF COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Hon. Monique Bégin (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S-6, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the main object of this bill is to exempt certain practices of shipping conferences from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. In anticipation of the expiry of legislation currently in force this year, the government has considered the question whether or not to continue to exempt conferences from the provision of the act. The government has concluded that conferences continue to serve the public interest in providing stable services for Canadian shippers at reasonable cost. This was also the almost unanimous view of the private sector as reflected in the responses to inquiries carried out last year by the Canadian Transport Commission in connection with the review of the effectiveness of the current legislation.

The main features of the present legislation have been retained in Bill S-6. There are, however, a number of significant changes designed, for the most part, to ensure the protection of Canadian interests, particularly Canada shippers who make use of conference services.

Bill S-6 was given very thorough examination in the other place. Its standing committee on transport and communications met on numerous occasions and received submissions from various groups representing conferences and shippers. While the carriers and shippers differed on a number of aspects of the bill, all were in favour of continuing to exempt conferences from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. Moreover, I think it became clear during the course of the discussions that Bill S-6 represents a reasonable compromise between the requirements of the conferences on the one hand and shippers on the other. Minor amendments designed to provide clarification of some clauses of the bill were adopted in the other place, and I can now recommend Bill S-6 to the House and request its early passage.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, as has been pointed out by the parliamentary secretary, this bill has undergone fairly extensive study in the other place. I believe some nine meetings were held that some 20 witnesses appeared before the committee to present their views and submissions. The groups which appeared represented shippers, shipping conferences, and the government. As has been pointed out as well, some seven amendments were brought forward in the other place, and I believe those amendments serve to improve the bill significantly.

It is important that I point out that this bill is a replacement for existing legislation which will expire at the end of this month. I believe that the clause of this bill relating to Section 23 of the National Transportation Act is worthy of consideration, and we will certainly have some questions to ask at the committee stage.

I will not attempt now to plow over the same ground gone over by members of the other place. Upon reviewing the hearings which took place in the Senate committee I think we will find that the bill has been studied exhaustively. There were some good submissions. There are some pros and cons with regard to this bill, but on balance I believe that what we have here today is supportable.

We certainly will support the passage of this bill. We will not impede its passage other than to seek some answers with respect to some questions arising out of the application of section 23 of the National Transportation Act. We will also have questions with respect to regulations which can be made by order in council. We would like to be assured that sufficient safeguards are provided so that regulations will not be unduly rigorous or unduly generous. We would like to see this bill move forward. We are prepared to see that it passes through all stages at this time. If it is the general wish that it proceed to committee, that is fine as well. We can certainly move on it expeditiously.

There is some other important legislation coming up having to do with transportation of dangerous goods. We think that legislation deserves early attention as well as other transportation legislation.

It is not our intention to impede the progress of this bill, and we are prepared to deal with it either in committee of the whole or in the standing committee, whichever the House decides.

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, as has been mentioned already, Bill S-6 received quite an exhaustive review in the other place. As has also been mentioned, basically the bill would extend the provisions of legislation enacted in the early 1970s which will expire at the end of this month. The bill would provide exemptions with regard to certain practices of shipping conferences operating in Canada and outside Canada. The exemptions to which I refer are in relation to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act under several different circumstances.

In general terms I suspect that this bill is probably essential at this time in the sense that shipping conferences are operating now. We deal in an international shipping situation, and it would be difficult for Canada to change the system without some massive restructuring of our own shipping system. However, that does not alter the fact that the whole principle of encouraging this type of monopolistic tendency in the shipping industry is not good for Canada, the Canadian consumer or the Canadian shipping industry, what little shipping industry there is left in Canada. This debate opens up the broad question of whether conferences in this sense are good or bad for shipping, the shipping industry, and the economy of Canada.

Shipping conferences are associations of shipping lines. Basically, they are cartels. Bill S-6 would extend the legality of the cartels which have been operating in Canada for some time now. The operations of these conferences in Canada would be illegal except for this bill and, of course, its predecessor act.

It is necessary to look at the consequences of this type of activity in the shipping industry. Because of the operation of shipping conferences, shipping rates are not set by the market forces of supply and demand in general terms but end up being set on the basis of what the market will bear. This means that in Canada, since there is no competition, or very little, in international shipping, we have higher rates and lower rates, depending on the type of goods shipped. There is a tendency toward price discrimination in Canadian shipping. There are higher rates for high value and low weight goods and lower rates for low value and high weight goods. This acts to the detriment of Canadian consumers.

A justification for restraint upon competition in the shipping industry, other than the fact that this is the way it has always been and this is the way the world runs in general terms, is that it maintains the health of merchant marines. It also maintains regular and frequent cargo services and creates—it is alleged—stable rates in the system.

The first of these justifications just does not apply to Canada because we do not have a merchant marine. It has been the policy of this government and of previous governments to allow our merchant marine to deteriorate to the point where it does not exist any more.

● (2030)

The operation of conferences may give us stable rates in the shipping industry, but the prices, while they may be stable, are still too high. A study, commissioned by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, by the institute for policy analysis at the University of Toronto came to the conclusion that the high prices in this area are an excessive price to pay for any alleged advantages of a healthy liner trade. We do not even have one in Canada right now and we still have to pay the price. That institute and that study, which was released not too long ago, recommend change and reform in the system immediately. This bill continues the recent trends in world shipping of decreasing and lessening competition in the industry, which has not been good for Canada mainly because we do not have an industry operating in the field.

Generally speaking, conferences augment their power and exercise their power through discriminatory pricing, which has tended to favour exports over imports in Canada recently. This may be good in terms of balance of payment, but in the long run leads to certain misallocation of resources and a high cost to consumers. Also, they operate by means of patronage agreements to force shippers to use only certain lines or routes. The competition between conferences even is limited. There are some 50 conferences operating out of Canada on international routes, but on essentially heavily used routes like the north Atlantic there is such a great overlapping membership among these several conferences that there is very little effective competition among them.

Other countries have attempted to control the power of these conferences in various ways, through regulation and so on, where the conferences' activities are most obviously in conflict with the public interest, but in general the effects of regulation have been negligible in terms of positive effects upon the economic welfare. So with the experience of other countries as a guide, it seems pointless for Canada to attempt regulation of conferences in conjunction with this type of bill in order to minimize their most objectionable points. But then neither should we make their activities legal when our whole economic tradition dictates that we should be doing just the opposite, that is, increasing competition.

Canada has no merchant marine, as I mentioned before, and in two ways this would, or should, dictate that we not allow conferences such leeway in our economy. Without a merchant marine we have no leverage in the shipping industry to control the adverse effect of the conference operations. As well, there is no benefit to Canada as a result of the high rates which result from conferences. High rates in another country might encourage the development or continuance of a merchant marine and its healthy operation; in Canada that factor does not exist because we do not have a merchant marine.

However, there is a problem, and that is why I suggest at this time that, in spite of my opposition to the bill, it might be difficult to make conferences totally subject to the Combines Investigation Act, because most conferences or most lines operating in Canada also belong to conferences operating out of the United States and it would be very difficult to prove collusion or some other action contrary to the Combines Investigation Act, where, in most cases, it would only be a passive agreement between conferences or member lines of conferences. But in spite of those difficulties we should not be encouraging such practices as price discrimination, and perhaps we could specifically prohibit them if we did not allow the legalization of the conferences in this country.

As I mentioned before, one of the main reasons for this bill right now—and the problem I have with this bill—is that we do not have a merchant marine. If Canada had a viable merchant marine we could effectively counter the power of conferences on the international scene, and we could effectively gain from the rate structures and the frameworks that are set up by conferences internationally. It is astounding to me that the Canadian government would make a conscious decision as far back as the early 1950s not to foster a merchant marine. At one time, as hon. members are aware, Canada was one of the top countries in the world in the size and power of its merchant marine. Now our sea-going traffic is limited mainly to lake traffic on the Great Lakes in central Canada. For a country that relies as heavily on international trade as does Canada, we should have some control over the way we get our goods to markets and over the way we bring goods from overseas. The whole problem of shipping conferences is that they operate with little if any direction or control by Canada, and because of the monopolistic tendencies of the conference operations they do us harm economically.

[Mr. Faour.]

Not only do we not have a merchant marine but we do not require Canadian companies such as CP, which receive many dollars in subsidies and tax referrals, to register their ships in Canada like a good corporate citizen should. The benefits of bringing home these vessels, which are now flying flags of convenience like Bermuda but are beneficially owned in Canada, would be great. It would give us a merchant marine under Canadian control to counter the power of the conferences internationally. It would provide jobs and employment at home rather than in foreign countries which fly flags of convenience, it would subject the ships to greater Canadian regulation in a great many fields, including working conditions, and finally, it would benefit consumers by providing a competitive Canadian presence in world shipping.

This bill would not be perceived to be so necessary or so objectionable if Canada had its own merchant marine, and I suggest it is incumbent on this government to begin developing one now rather than pursue a conscious policy which is going in the opposite direction. Also, I suggest that this government should encourage, and perhaps require companies like CP, Federal Commerce and Irving Oil, to register their ships in Canada, thereby employing Canadians and making them subject to Canadian law. It is important to bring some democracy and competition back to the market place in the shipping industry so that Canadian workers and consumers will benefit.

As I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, at this time, without some drastic reorganization of the Canadian shipping industry structure, it is probably a little impractical for the government not to pass this bill at present. But in principle we are opposed to it because of the reasons I have outlined, that it decreases and restrains competition in the industry, thereby bringing less benefits and greater costs to Canadian consumers, Canadian workers, and the Canadian industry.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the main object of this bill is to exempt certain practices of the shipping conferences from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

Let me provide some background, Mr. Speaker. Shipping conferences are associations or groups of shipping lines serving the same route or area that act together to set rates and other conditions under which they will carry goods. These associations or conferences exist in what is known as liner sectors, that is, among companies operating between fixed points on a regularly scheduled basis. Moreover, conferences exist primarily in the carriage of general cargo rather than in the dry or wet bulk trade, such as the shipment of wheat or oil. Conferences carry about 10 per cent of the Canadian exports in tonnage terms but considerably more in dollar terms since much of their business consists of higher value goods.

There are about 50 conferences serving Canada at the present time, each consisting of two or more members and each serving a particular trade, such as exports from Canada, the United Kingdom, Scandinavia or Japan, with separate conferences covering the inbound trade.

● (2040)

The shipping lines making up any given conference typically adopt an agreement which governs their membership voting procedures and other aspects of their relationship. They maintain a permanent office or offices, and meet from time to time to agree on rates for various commodities, or to discuss other matters in relation to the operation of the conferences. While conference members normally agree on rates, at least for most commodities, typically they also compete with each other for business on the basis of such factors as service or delivery times. In many trades they also are in competition with other lines that are not members of that conference, or for certain high value products with the airlines.

The conference system is not new, nor is it unique to Canada. Liner operators have been operating in conferences for more than 100 years, and are active in most parts of the world. Since their origins in the 1870s, conferences have been subject to analysis and discussion, both internationally and in Canada. In this country, for example, there have been several investigations into conference activities, the first of which was in 1913. The most extensive inquiry was that carried out by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission which concluded, in a 1965 report, that conferences operate as cartels, contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, but that the public interest would not be served by the excessive rate and service instability that might result if shipping conferences were not permitted to exist. It was the report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission that led to the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, which came into force on April 1, 1971, and which will expire on March 31 this year.

The act that is currently in effect sets out a number of conference practices, such as the common setting of rates, that are exempted from the Combines Investigation Act. At the same time it sets out other practices, such as the use of deferred rebates, that are not exempted from the act, or in other words, practices that are not permitted. The act also requires conferences to file copies of conference agreements, memberships, tariffs, etc. with the Canadian Transport Commission so that they are accessible to the public. This is the framework of the legislation currently in force, allowing conferences to operate in Canadian trades subject to clearly established ground rules.

In anticipation of the expiry of legislation currently in force this year, the government has considered the question of whether or not to continue to exempt conferences from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. The government has concluded that conferences continue to serve the public interest, in providing stable services for Canadian shippers at reasonable cost. This also was the almost unanimous view of the private sector, as reflected in responses to an inquiry carried out last year by the Canadian Transport Commission in connection with a review of the effectiveness of the current legislation.

The main features of the present legislation have been retained in Bill S-6. There are, however, a number of significant changes, designed for the most part to ensure the protection of Canadian interests, particularly Canadian shippers who make use of conference services.

Clause 8, which spells out filing requirements, ensures that changes to tariffs and other conference documents will be accessible to shippers and other interested groups on the date on which they come into effect, rather than 30 days after the date of their adoption, as in the current legislation.

Clauses 13 and 14 require conference members to make copies of all conference documents available for inspection or purchase at an office or agency in the region of Canada where they operate, and to make copies of current tariffs available for inspection at all members' principal offices or agencies in Canada. This would provide shippers with easier access to relevant information since at the present time the conferences are required only to file this information with the Canadian Transport Commission.

Clause 15 requires members of conferences operating from Canada to meet with designated shipper groups, when reasonably requested to do so, and to provide the shipper group with information sufficient for the satisfactory conduct of the meeting. This section is designed to ensure that such conferences meet with Canadian shippers to discuss problems of mutual interest and to ensure that shippers are provided with information on which they can judge conference actions, such as proposed rate increases.

While it is hoped that any additional information can be obtained voluntarily, clause 16 empowers the governor in council to make regulations requiring members of a conference to provide information necessary to enable the commission effectively to supervise their activities. The government appreciates the sensitivity of this question of information, but is of the view that clause 16 contains adequate and appropriate safeguards to protect the legitimate interests of various members.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, clause 23 provides for the legislation to expire after five years, with provision for extension by proclamation for periods not exceeding five years.

Bill S-6 was given very thorough examination in the other place. Its standing committee on transport and communications met on numerous occasions, and received submissions from various groups representing conferences and shippers. While the carriers and shippers differed on a number of aspects of the bill, all were in favour of continuing to exempt conferences from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. Moreover, I think it became clear during the course of the discussion that Bill S-6 represents a reasonable compromise between the requirements of the conferences on the one hand, and of the shippers on the other.

Minor amendments designed to provide clarification of some clauses of the bill were adopted in the other place, and I think that following the contributions we have had from the opposition and from this side we could probably now go into the committee of the whole on the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Does the House consent that we change the motion, referring the bill to the committee of the whole?

Mr. Mazankowski: As I pointed out earlier on behalf of our party, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to consider this piece of legislation in the committee of the whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to agree to the request to deal with this bill in committee of the whole.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on the motion that Bill S-6, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act be now read a second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to the committee of the whole. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

On Clause 2—Definitions

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a few questions to the parliamentary secretary in connection with clause 2 of the bill. My first question has reference to the commission, meaning the Canadian Transport Commission. I notice that later in the bill there is reference to investigations at the request of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. This leads me to wonder why there is a necessity for involving another commission in the processes under the legislation. I would ask the parliamentary secretary how many references were made under the existing legislation to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, and whether any consideration has been given to having investigations of the kind in clause 12 of Bill S-6 carried out by the Canadian Transport Commission?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I must honestly inform hon. members that I am not very familiar with this bill and in view of the specific nature of the question the hon. member has just asked, I would ask to be allowed to reserve it until such time as, when departmental officials arrive, I can reply in more specific terms.

[Mr. Dawson.]

• (2050)

[English]

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, I will certainly grant the indulgence and move on to the next provision of clause 2 of the bill which is the definition of "goods". In the parliamentary secretary's judgment and the judgment of the people who have been concerned with the administration of the act in the past, is the definition of goods intended to cover all and every kind and class of goods that might be expected to be carried by an ocean carrier, or is there some element of restriction? The words used, "articles" and "commodities", might be taken in some circumstances to be restricted in meaning, as opposed to being broad and including every class and kind of chattels and property. Is there any intention to exclude some goods from the definition?

Mr. Lapointe: The definition of the word "goods" in clause 2 of this act reads:

"goods" means any articles or commodities that may be the subject of trade or commerce.

In my opinion there is no restriction.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, I understand from the parliamentary secretary that the words used are intended to be as broad as possible and not intended to exclude any particular class or kinds of articles or materials of any sort. It might be argued that lumber or something of that sort would not be regarded as an article or commodity if it is in its very natural form and not in any way processed. The term commodities normally implies a processing, and the term article refers to articles produced by man. I query whether lumber in the raw form would be included in the definition of goods. In specific terms I would ask whether natural material like lumber, material in a relatively raw form, might be included?

Mr. Lapointe: According to the information I have been able to get in the last few seconds, the commodity referred to by the hon. member is included. On the other hand, bulk such as wheat is not included, and liquid such as petroleum is not included. These materials are excluded from the word "goods" as it is described in this bill.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, can the parliamentary secretary give us any explanation beyond the mere words of the bill in terms of whether or not there is some intention to exclude natural materials? For example, are petroleum in its natural state or even in its manufactured state and wheat excluded on the grounds that they are natural products?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I think I will be in a position to provide the hon. member with more information a bit later.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the parliamentary secretary to elaborate on the definition of "patronage contract". To what extent and how broad is the use of patronage contract in relation to and in respect of the conferences that we are talking about here?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, if I refer to the text of the bill, I find that "patronage contract" is fairly well defined; may I be allowed to quote the fifth paragraph of clause 2:

"patronage contract" means a contract between a shipper of goods and members of a shipping conference whereby in return for certain advantages the shipper agrees to offer to members of the conference for transportation by them all goods, all goods of certain classes or a fixed proportion of all goods or of all goods of certain classes shipped by water by that shipper to places served by members of that conference;

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, could the parliamentary secretary indicate to the committee just how widespread the use of patronage contracts is in relationship to the shipping conferences? That was my point. Is it predominant, is it very widespread, or is it on a minimal basis?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, once again, I must admit my ignorance of such a specific point. But I am told that the officials of the department will be here in a few moments, at which time I can give a more specific answer.

[English]

Mr. Faour: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding, according to the deliberations on clause 2, that questioning can be fairly general. I would like to address a question to the parliamentary secretary concerning the thrust of this bill and what it is to accomplish in so far as benefits for Canada are concerned.

In my remarks earlier this evening I mentioned, in quoting from the summary of a study prepared for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs by the Institute for Policy Analysis of the University of Toronto, that restraints on competition, such as are included in this bill, are usually justified by national governments. For example, one ground is to maintain and strengthen the financial health of the national merchant marine. Other grounds are that there is a virtue to regular and frequent cargo services, that restraints on competition, such as this bill will allow, will encourage regular and frequent cargo services and also stable freight rates.

The criticism on the other hand is that the rates, while stable, are too high to justify this sort of restraint on competition. Usually the only benefits that accrue to a national economy are when there are possible benefits that may be gained by a merchant marine. Canada does not have a merchant marine. What sort of benefits in general terms—I realize that it is difficult to be specific—does the operation of conferences such as this have for Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, to my mind, the advantage, in general terms, is rather obvious, and protecting shipping conferences allows Canadian shippers or users to bank on a service that is regular and stable, and also on stable tariffs. A while ago, in the course of his remarks, the hon. member criticized the Canadian government for not setting up a merchant marine. I should like to tell him that this may not be a substitute for a merchant marine but, on the other hand, protecting shipping conferences will give Canadian ship owners a sheltered market, up to a point, and allow them to set up business for operating a ship on a profitable basis.

[English]

Mr. Faour: Mr. Chairman, I recognize that the operation of conferences is helped by a bill such as this one which exempts their operation from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. I can also see perhaps the advantages of stable prices, but there have been criticisms and, in particular, the study by Professor Bryan Kotowitz of the University of Toronto which was commissioned by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The study finds that the cost to the Canadian consumer is greater than any benefits which may be received by an increase in the stability of the shipping rates structure. I wonder if any studies have been made to determine what the costs are in higher rates to shippers, and hence the Canadian consumer, as opposed to how unstable the shipping industry would be if the conferences were not allowed to operate in Canada?

• (2100)

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I would like to remind the hon. member that in the study he referred to, they do not recommend the abolition of shipping conferences. Furthermore, on the second point he raised, namely, whether studies were made to determine the cost of that shipping conference system to the consumers, I would say to the hon. member that there were no special studies on that subject. However, I would like to advise him that those shipping conferences enable us precisely to avoid, both for the Canadian consumer and for the shipper who uses that system, unduly great fluctuations such as in oil shipping, for example.

[English]

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, now that the official has arrived to assist the parliamentary secretary, I should like to come back to an earlier question with respect to the definition of "commission." I asked the parliamentary secretary how many investigations had been held in the past under the provisions of the old statute. I should like to know at the same time whether, on the basis of past experience, there has been any need to involve another commission as is referred to in clause 12 of the bill, in terms of conducting these investigations and of the kind that are described there, or whether they might be conducted by the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, clause 12 is in this bill only to provide an additional avenue or means to protect shippers and consumers in this matter. It has not been used so far to my knowledge, but I think it is important for Canadians to have this additional protection over and above the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, as the parliamentary secretary may know, the investigations provided for in clause 12 are at the initiative of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I assume if there have been no such investigations in the past, it was because the minister did not see fit to order any. I want to confirm that that is the case, that in the past the minister has not seen fit to order any investigations.

Mr. Lapointe: As far as I know, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has not ordered any investigations under these provisions.

M. Faour: Mr. Chairman, I have one more question on clause 2 in the general vein of those I put to the parliamentary secretary earlier. I should like to read a brief extract from the Department of Transport "Shipping Policy for Canada", on page 3, as follows:

Canada's shipping policy to date rests on the belief that in the long run a freely competitive shipping environment will prove more beneficial to her interests than measures to develop and/or subsidize a national deep-sea fleet.

That seems to imply that competition is more important than a merchant marine. If competition is so important, I wonder why it is necessary in this bill to put restraints on it. This is a serious question and it may be difficult to answer, but what is the point of decreasing competition in the industry when the thrust of economic policy in Canada has been to encourage competition for the benefits that it brings?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, the principle of shipping conferences is recognized internationally, and it enables those who enter that contract to make the large investments which are necessary to buy the equipment, the specialized vessels or the other things which are needed. Of course, by accepting the principle of those conferences you have some restriction as far as competition is concerned, but it does not prevent us from encouraging competition, and there is the fact that other ships or other means of transportation, such as air transport, can compete with those shipping conferences.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, my question arises out of comments made by my hon. friend to my left and the response he received. We talk about the advantages, and an example comes to mind regarding the movement of grain out of eastern Canada. Would the vessels carrying the bulk of Canada's grain be a party to some form of shipping conference? Is there any advantage in this regard? I see the parliamentary secretary shaking his head in the negative. If they are not associated with the conferences, is there any particular reason for that?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, the conferences are there to provide the regular, scheduled service at specific points, not for bulk cargos. Bulk cargos are taken care of by chartered companies that have charter ships, not conference ships.

Mr. Mazankowski: Would that also apply to commodities like coal and crude oil?

Mr. Lapointe: In general, Mr. Chairman, bulk cargo is not carried by conference ships.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the parliamentary secretary regarding the coastal trade, and the passage of bills within the last year in which our avowed interest was to establish the use of Canadian vessels between one Canadian point and the other. Will the conferences set prices? Will it be detrimental to the possibility of Canada establishing coastal trade for deep sea fishing? We are making arrangements for a lot of other countries but we are not making arrangements for Canada. I believe we have less than a dozen ships that will be affected by any of these conferences. I would probably be exaggerating if I said we had a dozen deep sea ships under Canadian ownership and Canadian registry. By making this kind of an arrangement will we not eliminate the possibility of developing our own fleet at some time? As I understand it, we would be subject to similar international regulations as those under which the airlines operate. We cannot do things that we do not allow someone else to do.

If we are to have deep sea fishing we will have to do many other things so that coal can be handled in Canadian bottoms, or wheat or other things. If we lock ourselves into this conference arrangement, are we not in effect making it almost impossible for us to do anything about getting into shipping if the government ever desires to subsidize the industry? Subsidization is an arrangement a country may make to give itself an international advantage in using its own bottoms.

● (2110)

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, since shipping within those conferences applies only or mainly to international transport, it does not conflict with coastal trade or coastal shipping. On the other hand, some Canadian companies, such as CP Shipping, belong to such conferences which enable Canadian companies to integrate into that framework and allow them to do some international shipping. I do not really see the point which the hon. member wants to make.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the point is fairly simple. We have no merchant navy. At one time Canada was among the top five nations of the world with a merchant navy. This merchant navy in the main was sold to Mr. Onassis in Greece. From listening to members of parliament over the past five years I am sure that members on all sides of the House feel that it is advantageous for Canada, sooner or later, to get into the shipping field again, and that Canada should not be subjected to other countries shipping our produce.

If we allow international conferences which set international tariffs, what kind of a position will we be in after signing such an arrangement or international convention? I am well aware there may be some advantages in having these conferences and that sometimes the rates are beneficial. I think Canada is committed, more or less, to the idea of developing a merchant navy. Canada has one of the largest coastlines in the world. It has a large export market for raw and bulk materials. I am aware of what happened with respect to the coastal trade which does not necessarily apply in this case, but we do not have too many ships involved there either.

Someone indicated that there were reciprocal trade agreements signed with countries that do make available certain things which are not necessarily available in this agreement. I say on behalf of the Canadian public that I am sure we would not want to lock into anything on a short-term basis that may be to the advantage of some of the trading blocks in our own society, but is a situation which will not allow us to build a merchant navy. Over the next few years, unless we can fly our Canadian flag around the world, we will not be the trading nation most of us think we are.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, the bill requires no ratification of international agreement. It only provides a legislative framework enabling shipping conferences to operate in Canada. In my opinion, there is no relation between the creation of a merchant marine and shipping conferences since most countries that already have a merchant marine also belong to those shipping conferences.

[English]

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary made reference a short time ago to some of the commodities that might be excluded from this particular bill, for example, wheat, oil, coal, and things of that nature. Is he in a position to inform us what other products or commodities might generally be excluded from this type of a bill?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, properly speaking, there is no exclusion of certain goods.

[English]

Those conferences will carry mainly, and I think I can safely say, only general cargo composed of manufactured goods and liquids which are carried for the most part in containers. It is related to the size of the ship, so they do not carry bulk.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Chairman, it appears to be a rather loose framework for dealing with the various commodities. Can the parliamentary secretary give the House any indication of how the Canadian Transport Commission, which I would assume is the governing body and the one making the decision, will decide which will be exempt and which will not? Could he tell us what guidelines will be taken to determine which commodities will or will not be involved? For instance, will there be dollar values put on, tonnage, or things of this nature?

Mr. Lapointe: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding of this particular set-up that there is an open class conference and a closed conference. Apparently the United States has been involved in an open type of conference and the Canadian conference is presently closed. From the information I have, the United States is now moving toward the concept of the closed conference. Can the parliamentary secretary indicate what the future direction of the Canadian conference might be in this regard? If it is toward a continuing closed conference, will the parliamentary secretary indicate what procedures a new shipper might have to go through in order to be accepted by the Canadian Transport Commission?

● (2120)

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is correct in saying that in Canada we operate mainly under a system of closed conferences. Any shipper in Canada wanting to join must apply to the conference and the membership of that conference will decide whether or not to accept the application.

With regard to what is happening in the United States, the shipping policy there is now under review. At this stage it is impossible for me to say which way it will go. I might refer the hon. member to the proceedings of the Senate transport committee where this question was dealt with thoroughly.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Chairman, I apologize if I am digging up old ground, but I am not very familiar with the proceedings that took place in the Senate. For those who might be in the same position, perhaps the parliamentary secretary can give some indication of the guidelines for acceptance of a new shipper into the closed policy conference set-up that the Canadian Transport Commission is apparently working toward.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, if a shipper wants to become a member of the conference, as I told the hon. member, he must apply to the conference. Membership is left to the members of the conference. There are no criteria devised by the CTC. It does not enter into it unless there is a complaint to that body to inquire into a request which has not been accepted.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Chairman, I just might make a suggestion. As governments are involved in the parliamentary process of this country, it might be a thought for legislators to have some input into the exclusion or intrusion, as the case may be, of new shippers or at least prospective new shippers into the business of the Canadian Transport Commission.

I would like to expound somewhat on the comments of my friend to my left about the establishment of a merchant marine which is an admirable direction for the country to be taking. I heartily endorse it. Can the parliamentary secretary indicate whether his department has had negotiations with the union involved, the Seafarer's International Union, which played a very important role in the demise of the Canadian merchant marine in this country several years ago?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I think that possible negotiations or contacts with the International Seafarer's Union bear little relationship to the bill before us. As for the more general issue of a merchant marine for Canada, we have had many opportunities to discuss this in the House. As I said, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any relationship between this question and the proposed legislation.

[English]

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal with one aspect of the points raised by an hon. member in questions to the parliamentary secretary with regard to the coastal shipping trade. I appreciate that the bill relates to and deals with international shipping. The definition of transportation of goods makes that clear. There is an area of coastal shipping trade that is both intra-Canada and international in its make-up. By way of example, a ship can travel from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to St. John's, Newfoundland, and on to the eastern seaboard of the United States. I just wonder about the effect of excluding this kind of transportation route from the operation of the bill and presumably from the operation of the shipping conference. Is there a benefit to be derived from including in relation to the coastal shipping trade that portion of the transportation that is intra-Canada, that is, within Canadian points such as Halifax, Nova Scotia, and St. John's, Newfoundland?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I do not clearly see the purpose or the basis of the hon. member's question. I do not quite understand what he is trying to get at. In so far as coastal shipping is concerned, it is clear, as I mentioned earlier, that it is protected for Canadian ships. I do not see what he is driving at.

[English]

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, I would not have thought it was obscure. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary is not familiar with the geography involved. It is convenient for ships to travel from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to St. John's, Newfoundland, and on to the eastern seaboard of the United States. That kind of shipping route would involve an international aspect as well as an internal or domestic aspect. As I understand the provisions of the bill and the designation of the transportation of goods, such a transportation route would be excluded from the operation and the protective aspect of the bill. Having regard to the fact that the bill is intended to benefit Canadians by curtailing, in some respects, the effect of the Combines Investigation Act, I am asking whether this is really of benefit.

[Mr. Corbett.]

• (2130)

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can ask the hon. member to give me some clarification on the substance of his question. He could perhaps give me a factual example, and I could give him a clearer answer. Does he mean for example, that transport between Halifax and St. John's should be restricted to vessels flying a Canadian flag or would he include those vessels flying a Canadian flag within those conferences?

[English]

Mr. Crosby: I thought I had given the parliamentary secretary an example. As I understand it, a ship which travels between Halifax, Nova Scotia, and St. John's, Newfoundland, and then goes on to Boston before returning to Halifax to continue that circular pattern is not included in this definition of the transportation of goods and does not get the benefit of exclusion. Is that correct?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, if the definition of transportation of goods was included in clause 2, it is precisely to take care of the hon. member's concerns. Those goods are therefore included within those conferences even if they travel from one point X through Y, in another country, to come back to Z, in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Crosby: It seems to me the parliamentary secretary has not given my question the consideration for which I was hoping. Can any consideration be given to permitting the inclusion under the definition of routes which are partly within Canada and partly outside, such as the one I have described? The answer, apparently, is either that the hon. gentleman does not know or else he is not interested.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: I think, Mr. Chairman, that if the hon. member had understood my previous answer, he could have concluded that I said yes to his question. Now, I would not want to give here a legal opinion on that subject.

[English]

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Investigation

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I have had some experience with section 23 of the National Transportation Act, particularly as it relates to the establishment of a prima facie case of circumstances detrimental to the public interest. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could obtain from his officials a brief explanation of the relationship between clause 4 and section 23 of the act? Under section 23 the difficulty in establishing a prima facie case has been one of the inherent obstacles to making that provision workable.

I recall a case under section 23 involving freight rates as applied to the movement of processed rapeseed; it took well over three years before this issue was resolved by the CTC. The bottleneck was the difficulty in establishing a prima facie case of a circumstance deemed to be prejudicial to the public interest. Has that section been streamlined sufficiently to make the clause before us workable? What provisions existed in the previous legislation for protection against rate fixing or tariffs which may have been prejudicial to the public interest? Was a clause of the kind we are considering necessary at that time? Have a series of problems arisen because existing legislation was not able to deal effectively with the application of rates which were clearly prejudicial to the public interest?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. member's concerns. I know that the operation or the use of section 23 of the National Transportation Act, as it is now, is difficult.

I suggest that is why Bill C-20 has amended the structure of this section to facilitate the recourse to this appeal procedure. Why then is it mentioned in clause 4 of the bill? There was no specific reference in the previous bill. It was made part of Bill S-6 to remind shipowners and conference members that this appeal procedure exists in the National Transportation Act.

● (2140)

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, am I to understand that this clause is inserted in anticipation of modifications to section 23 in a new National Transportation Act? May I assume that the parliamentary secretary is optimistic that those will be passed in sufficient time to be utilized in conjunction with this measure? That section of the existing act would otherwise be made unworkable.

I wonder as well what options are open to the CTC if in fact it found a prima facie case of tariff fixing or rate fixing which was indeed prejudicial. What would the commission do? Would it order a correction? What sanctions are available to redress a problem in the event that the finding of the commission is that a certain practice is prejudicial?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I do not have with me the text of the National Transportation Act and it would have to find out what is provided for under section 24. As far as I can remember, the Canadian Transport Commission is empowered to order corrective measures if it feels a situation is prejudicial to shippers, and to recommend to the governor in council to take steps to correct such a situation. As for Bill C-20, I am sure that if the hon. member for Vegreville and I had had both to look after it, this bill would have been adopted long ago.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, would that mean that the CTC would have the power to disband a conference?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, what is contemplated is that the CTC could order a specific conference to correct a situation which has been found to be prejudicial.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, in my earlier question I asked whether any specific examples under the existing legislation were cited in a request to have this kind of safeguard inserted. Were there examples of customers who had complaints about the impact of conferences acting contrary to the public interest? Is that why this clause is being inserted?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, there has been no specific request made to the Canadian Transport Commission or any other organization for an investigation to be made or for a situation to be corrected. I think however that clause 4 was made part of this bill to provide additional protection to shippers, and remind them that this appeal procedure exists and that they may avail themselves of it.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Limitation

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, clause 5 refers to those who deal with a particular conference, and clause 6 refers to those who do not. There are five or six reasons why there might be a dispute. When there is a dispute, where can appeals be directed? Are they to be directed to the appeal board provided for in Section 23 of the act and the Canadian Transport Commission as well, or are we setting up some other agency? It seems to me that any appeal under clause 6 would have to be made right away, or it really would not be an appeal. Such an appeal would not be long-term litigation but simply a request for an answer.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, clause 6 lists only those practices of a conference which would not be allowed under the present act and which still come under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, if clause 6 applies to practices referred to in the Combines Investigation Act, where can an appeal be taken? For instance, if a vessel is used for the purpose of preventing or lessening unduly competition in the transportation of goods by an ocean carrier which is not a party to such a contract, agreement or arrangement, where can an appeal be taken?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, a third party could appeal to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission or to the Canadian Transport Commission under section 4.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 12—Inquiry and report by Director

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask further questions of the parliamentary secretary in relation to matters raised previously regarding the references by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. I understand that in the past there have not been any references by the minister, and I would like the parliamentary secretary to indicate whether in the course of the trade carried on by the various conferences there have been complaints made by particular shipping conferences about competition from other shipping conferences, or anything of that nature. More specifically, have complaints been recorded or have requests about unfair competition been made to either the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or to the Canadian Transport Commission?

• (2150)

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, as I stated earlier, to my knowledge there were no complaints or formal requests to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, nor were there formal complaints to the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, on a related matter, as I understood the remarks made by the parliamentary secretary or by another hon. member, there are approximately 50 shipping conferences operating under the provisions of this act. Could the hon. member indicate to us to what extent these 50 shipping conferences are in competition with each other or in what way they are classified or divided for competition purposes?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, conferences themselves do not compete with one another because, normally, the shipowners within a conference devote their activity to a given ocean route, for instance, there is a conference for shipping between Canada and the United Kingdom, another for the transport of goods between Vancouver and Japan, or something similar. There may be some competition within a conference, that is, between shipowners who may be competing with one another, and of course, there will be competition at large with other shipowners or other companies outside the conference.

[English]

Mr. Crosby: I am not sure I understand the parliamentary secretary. He is indicating there have been no complaints under existing legislation similar to clause 12 of the bill. Now he seems to be indicating there is no occasion for any complaints. Perhaps he might explain why clause 12 is in the bill, and perhaps he can give us an example of a complaint which might require investigation under clause 12.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer the hon. member to clause 6 of the bill, which has already been passed to show him there are cases of complaints or inquiries. In addition, clause 12 as included in the bill, as I said earlier, grants additional protection to Canadian ships, though we hope it will never have to be used. But, should it happen that some conferences use means that do not respect the spirit of clause 6 in particular, or the bill in general, clause 12 will authorize the director of the Combines Investigation Commission to undertake an enquiry if he feels that the activities of a given conference go beyond what is envisaged by the bill.

[English]

Mr. Faour: Mr. Chairman, I have one brief question for the parliamentary secretary. Can he give me an indication as to whether this power of inquiry has been used before and, if so, how many times has it been used before?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: No, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the parliamentary secretary one question. Is the reason it has not been used the fact that these companies do not necessarily have an office in Canada and there is no way we can use that provision on them? They are all foreign companies. We do not have ships in Canada and, therefore, many of them do not have an office here. Is the reason we have not considered subjecting them to this provision the fact that they do not exist in Canada and that any law we pass in this manner would not apply to them in any way since they are normally outside of Canada, and we would have to extradite them each time?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I think we should not split hairs in this matter. If no investigations were ordered, it is probably because the conferences are providing Canadian shippers and the Canadian public with good services and that there has been nothing to investigate.

[English]

Mr. Muir: Mr. Chairman, I have one short question for the parliamentary secretary. The whole bill is full of legal jargon, as most bills are, and I offer my apologies to the lawyers in the House, but I understand that of necessity we must have that. Under the heading of "Investigation of Shipping Conference" it is stated that the director, on his own initiative, may carry out an inquiry, and also that an inquiry may be carried out on direction by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or at the request of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. I wonder what steps would be taken. Does the director have the first decision on this, following which it goes to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and then to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission? In what sequence does this take place, if necessary?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I think that I cannot, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, answer this question. This mechanism comes under the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13—Office in Canada

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I have one question on the matter of offices. Are there any in Canada now and, if so, how many, where, and how long would it require for a conference to establish an office? What sort of latitude would be given?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, of the fifty-odd existing conferences, only a few do not have an office in Canada. Now I think the bill uses the verb "shall", therefore we will have to give those conferences which do not have an office here time to establish themselves.

● (2200)

[English]

The Chairman: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, if hon. members have only a few more questions to put at this point, maybe they will accept, by unanimous consent, to continue this consideration a little past ten o'clock in order to complete it.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: That would certainly be O.K. with us, Mr. Chairman. I think two or three more questions would certainly round it off as far as we are concerned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All right.

The Chairman: In order to sit beyond the normal hour a decision would have to be made from the chair. Perhaps I could just not see the clock, if that is agreeable to hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 13 agreed to.

Clause 14 and 15 agreed to.

On clause 16—Regulations

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to put one point to the parliamentary secretary for clarification. Clause 15 establishes that members of the shipping conference shall provide information sufficiently satisfactory for conducting a meeting, which I assume deals with information that perhaps is in conflict between the groups. We then get to clause 16. Under subclause (2) we have reference to confidentiality and it is noted that information shall not be made public in such a manner as to be made available for the use of any business competitor of the persons to whom the information relates. It seems to me that these statements are contradictory, one to the other, and that they work against the purposes of the ideas of each group. Certainly if that is not the case this is less than crystal clear, at least to me. Could the parliamentary secretary give us some clarification in that regard?

Mr. Lapointe: Clause 15 represents the differentiation between the shipping lines which make up the conference, and the shippers and the exporters and importers. It gives to Canadians who are using the conference the ability to obtain information necessary to make a judgment about the tariffs imposed by the conference. Clause 16 is a last resort clause, giving power to the government to help those shippers get that information necessary to make a judgment about the tariffs. That is why there is this clause in respect of confidentiality, in order to put before the public all the financial operations of the companies.

Clause 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—General security by ocean carrier

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could advise the House if in fact there are any securities now on deposit? If so, for what reason? What are the terms and conditions? Perhaps the parliamentary secretary might even have the number that may be on deposit at this particular time. I am just wondering how widespread it is in fact utilized.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, to the knowledge of the official who is present, there was no requirement under the section. We are not totally certain of that assertion, but I will find out and pass the information along to the hon. member.

Clause 17 agreed to.

Clauses 18 and 19 agreed to.

On clause 20—Annual Report

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, very briefly, the bill requires a report within three months of the end of year. There is a similar provision now in enforcement. Could the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether the report provided under the provision currently in force has been made and, if not, when will it be made?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I would have to secure that information from the Canadian Transport Commission which is responsible for the administration of this act. Unfortunately, I do not have it.

[English]

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Chairman, for clarification it is the Minister of Transport who must submit the report.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, up until now annual reports have been tabled regularly. I do not know exactly when the last one was. As I said, I can find out by tomorrow morning and get back to the hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, about the business of the House for tomorrow, following the meeting that took place this afternoon between the respresentatives of the various parties on Bill C-29, and as there is complete agreement on the procedure and the amendments that could be made to the bill, we will be proceeding, barring a change, the consideration of Bill C-29 tomorrow. As there was also consent for the consideration to take place in committee of the whole rather than in a standing committee of the House, therefore, since the motion has not yet been introduced in the House and it will in all likelihood be introduced tomorrow, I want to advise hon. colleagues on both sides of the House that that motion will be disposed of with the necessary amendment to refer Bill C-29 to a committee of the whole. That motion will be disposed of without a vote and at the committee of the whole stage. As I mentioned earlier, there is complete agreement among the respresentatives of the various parties as to the nature of the amendments to be made to Bill C-29.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, what the parliamentary secretary has said is in accordance with the agreements that have been reached, at least in so far as I understand that matter. It would seem to me that it might be useful to have an order made tonight in line with what we have done to change to motion for second reading, so that when we vote on it tomorrow, the motion will be to give the bill second reading and refer it to Committee of the Whole House. That is part of the agreement.

Mr. Ellis: That is our understanding also, Mr. Speaker.

● (2210)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, that meets our views also, it being agreed that the motion will be disposed of by consent without a vote.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I find it difficult to do that at this time. I might be ready to receive further direction from the House. The question not being before the House, I do not even have a motion in front of me. Unless an hon. member wants to indicate an acceptable procedure by which we can do that—of course by unanimous consent we can do anything we wish—we do not have that order in front of us. I wonder if it is possible for me to do it. I am ready to receive advice.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, about the request for an order of the House made by my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I personally do not see any objection but in view of what I mentioned with respect to the agreement among the representatives of the various parties, if you prefer to dispense with that order of the House tonight, it seems everything could be done tomorrow without complication when the time comes to proceed with government orders.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That would be satisfactory, although I had thought it might be a House order that when item No. 29 is called tomorrow we could proceed with it, as we understand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I find it difficult to do it. The motion is not in front of me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At least we know what we are going to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think I could only seek agreement of the House to do that tomorrow—to change the motion. Perhaps we should wait until tomorrow when the motion is in front of us.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I note the consensus.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—OVERNIGHT INTERCITY COURIER SERVICE—ALLEGED SECRECY RESPECTING PROGRAM

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on March 2 I questioned the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) about the new overnight courier service which it was rumoured had been launched by the Post Office Department.

There has been a veil of secrecy surrounding this service. The rumour was circulating following the somewhat embarrassing information revealed in the House that the Post Office Department has phased out this so-called assured mail service notwithstanding the expenditure of something like $1.5 million to provide special boxes and facilities of that kind to launch this now phased out program of assured mail.

● (2215)

It became necessary to ask the question then because it was impossible to get information from the department. Unfortunately this is a pattern that has been adopted by the Post Office increasingly in recent years. It has been surrounded by a sea of troubles, frequent changes of postmasters general, trouble with its mechanization program, increasing labour-management difficulties resulting in frequent strikes, and, of course, the inevitable result is the loss of business to private couriers.

The Postmaster General replied to my inquiry in rather enigmatic terms. He says this as reported at page 3763 of Hansard for March 2, 1979:

> It seems the hon. member is referring to our new service which is called Priority Post. It was devised to give to certain customers under contract a mail service comparable to that of any private enterprise competing with us at the moment. We could promote it, in a way, without publicity; the reason we have not publicized it is that we wanted to make sure that the operation was a success, that it was self-sufficient and that undertaking this new venture would not lead to a requirement for more money from taxpayers.

He goes on to say:

> There is nothing secret about it. It is just a question of good management on the part of the Post Office.

It really is quite secret. I was amazed in light of what the Postmaster General said that the Post Office Department had not been shouting from the rooftops about this overnight courier service. The best way, and this has always been a custom in this House as you well know, Mr. Speaker, when new programs of this kind are announced, is that they are announced in the House of Commons and members of parliament have a chance to respond. The public is informed, and the information should result in a favourable response from potential users of a new service of this kind.

Unfortunately, as I have said, the Post Office has developed an inferiority complex. It has become paranoid almost to the point where it is shrouding itself in a veil of secrecy. It refuses to table reports that would be helpful in resolving Post Office difficulties. There is suspicion and confrontation between management and labour rather than consultation and co-operation. This attitude even extends to the proposed Crown corporation legislation where the Post Office is surreptitiously attempting to extend its monopoly by using phrases such as "the transfer of goods" instead of transfer of parcels, and "the transmission of messages" rather than the conveyance of mail, which suggests it wants to move into the electronic transmission business. It spends great sums of money in fighting courier services, such as UPS, rather than providing the superior service which would compete easily with private couriers if the Post Office could only get its act together.

The point in raising this matter tonight is to restore confidence in the Post Office. Canada used to have the best postal service in the world. It was open and accessible to all Canadians. Members on this side of the House still believe that the Post Office is capable of recovering its morale and its efficiency. We believe it should be open and honest with the public if it is providing this service, instead of keeping it close to the chest. Let the public know that overnight courier service is available. Then they will recover the business and will increase their revenues in this manner rather than having to go to the regular periodic increases in rates which have occurred with frequency over the last three years. Inevitably when rates are increased one must face the prospect of losing business to competitors.

I would hope that when the parliamentary secretary replies he will be forthcoming to the House, that he will tell us without equivocation that the service is the best available, and let the customers know that the Post Office is trying to provide the service it is capable of providing rather than hiding its light under a bushel.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) for accommodating my schedule this evening by allowing this question to be dealt with first in the adjournment debate.

I think I can give the assurances to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) that he wanted in terms of explaining Priority Post. When I have concluded my remarks I will give him a promotional piece of literature which the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) signed for his edification. I can really only repeat the minister's answer that was given in the House the other day. I quote from Hansard:

> It was devised to give to certain customers under contract a mail service comparable to that of any private enterprise competing with us at the moment. We could promote it, in a way, without publicity; the reason we have not publicized it is that we wanted to make sure that the operation was a success, that it was self-sufficient and that undertaking this new venture would not lead to a requirement for more money from taxpayers.

To say that we have kept the service a secret is somewhat inaccurate. How can a service operate if we keep it a secret? How could we have contacted over 500 business firms and induced them to try a secret service? We have had coloured brochures, like the one I have in my hand, specially coloured bags, training programs, interval instructions and reports to postal employees. How could this have been done if it had been our desire to keep the service secret?

Knowing the diligence with which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris pursues his activities as official critic for the Post Office, those of us associated with the Post Office are not so naive as to think for one moment that we could keep something secret from the hon. gentleman. It can be seen that indeed it was not a secret. From past experience we knew perfectly well that the hon. gentleman would pose enough piercing questions often enough to gain us many lines of free publicity across the country. He has done that.We thank him very much for drawing public attention to this very worthwhile service.

What is Priority Post? I am not sure how much time I have left. I could tell the House it is a new service from Canada Post, fundamentally a next day premium mail service between designated places of business. It is only offered on an individual service agreement basis. That means that the Priority Post you buy has been tailored specifically to the needs and schedules of the various businesses. It also means that, in committing itself to an agreed service, Canada Post plans to live up to its end of the bargain.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—MEASURES TO REDUCE CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the adjournment debate that I join in tonight arises from a question I attempted to put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday dealing with Statistics Canada current account deficit figures that were released at one o'clock yesterday afternoon. Unfortunately the Prime Minister was right out of it yesterday. He must have had a very bad caucus or something because he literally did not understand what I was talking about.

I was talking about the fact that it was revealed yesterday that our current account deficit was $5,261 million for the year 1978. That means we had a record deficit in that year, a record for any year to which you want to compare it. Most important, the fourth quarter of last year was also a record deficit. I think it is unfortunate that the government is attempting to gloss over the extent of the deficit into which it has led this nation. The fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was in this House until a few minutes ago and then left without replying to my remarks this evening shows how little they care about informing this House and the Canadian public concerning this matter.

● (2225)

A deficit of $5,200 million on current account represents 2.2 per cent of the gross national product of this country last year. That is a record deficit, as I have said, and it is a record ratio. When we compare it to the deficit in the United States we find that the U.S. current deficit was $17 billion on a $2,111.2 billion economy. Their ratio was .81 per cent. What is of even greater importance, though, is that in the economic report of the President transmitted to Congress in January of this year the following statement is made:

> The United States current account deficit is expected to decline considerably from the levels at the end of 1978, dropping to about an annual rate of $2-$8 billion by the end of 1979.

In short, Canadians have been led into a current account deficit which is almost equal to the anticipated deficit in the United States in the present year. Let us get this into perspective. All OECD countries in 1978 were, in the aggregate, actually in surplus as far as current accounts were concerned. All those countries, put together, were in surplus. We had a deficit of $5.2 billion. Let me put on record the surpluses of some of those other countries: Japan $20 billion, Germany $6 billion, France $2 billion, Italy had a surplus of $5.5 billion, and the United Kingdom had a deficit of $500 million compared to our deficit of $5.2 billion.

We note that time and again the Government of Canada is borrowing foreign funds. Appearing before a committee of the other place, the governor of the Bank of Canada, speaking on January 24 with regard to foreign borrowing, said we borrow enough money to cover our current account deficit. Then he went on to say, "I certainly do feel the current account deficit is too large now." The governor made that comment when it was anticipated that our current deficit for 1978 would be $4.5 billion. It turned out to be $700 million more than anticipated. Not only have we permitted a record deficit, but it is growing. We find, for example, that in 1973 this country actually had a surplus as far as our trade and services account with the rest of the world was concerned. But in the last five years we have run up an aggregate deficit with the rest of the world of $19,429 million. This means that for every man, woman and child in this country we have gone into debt to the extent of $844.

It has been said that somehow this position will correct itself if we can hold inflation down. But the sad fact is that to the degree this deficit has caused our dollar to collapse, it is causing inflation. It is expected that the CPI figures to be released next week will show on a month over month basis that inflation in February of this year was running approximately 9.4 per cent higher than one year ago. This is an intolerable situation. The government is simply using monetary means, the borrowing of foreign funds, to cover a foreign account deficit instead of using effective fiscal measures to correct the problem to which I have referred.

The whole key to this situation is not to take the current account deficit as a basis and then just try to finance it by foreign borrowing and forcing up our interest rates either to prevent a capital outflow or to stimulate an inflow. The Trudeau government has placed the Bank of Canada in an impossible position because it is asking them to use purely monetary tools to correct a situation which can only be corrected by fiscal steps. A Canadian dollar defence using monetary policy is doomed to failure from the beginning because the government has asked the Bank of Canada to do an impossible job.

● (2230)

When I raised the question yesterday I sincerely hoped that the Prime Minister would rise and say that the government was alarmed, that it felt it could handle this problem by monetary means—foreign borrowing—that it now realizes it has to take more severe fiscal steps, and that it is going to narrow the budgetary deficit which is triple, in relative terms, the deficit with which the Americans are living. If the Prime Minister had said that, I would not be in this debate tonight. However, not only did he refuse to say anything, but commenting on the figures I have referred to, the Minister of Finance said yesterday that this is a problem we have to live with. The hard truth is that this country cannot live with a chronic current account deficit of the magnitude we have been led into by this government. That is why I was hoping we would have received some answers tonight, not from a parliamentary secretary but from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that it is blatantly unfair of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) to suggest that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) should be here in this late show to respond to his question. He knows the tradition in this parliament whereby it is completely accepted that parliamentary secretaries respond at this time.

The second point I would like to make is that it is equally blatantly unfair of the hon. member to have anticipated that in the absence of the Minister of Finance yesterday, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), having just come into the building at two o'clock, should have been briefed on a release which came out at one o'clock.

Mr. Stevens: He had it the day before.

Mr. Martin: These points should be borne in mind.

Let me point out that historically Canada's balance of international payments has been characterized by a significant deficit on current account and a surplus on capital transactions. Current account deficits for Canada are neither new—in fact, they are the rule, not the exception—nor are they in themselves a bad thing.

The current account of Canada's balance of payments has registered a deficit in 25 of the past 30 years. As a percentage of gross national product the current account deficit it not out of line with our historical experience. In order to finance high levels of capital formation and enhance economic growth, Canada has traditionally supplemented its domestic savings by recourse to foreign capital markets. Deficits on current account are the necessary counterpart of this.

Nevertheless, under present circumstances the government would view a reduction in Canada's current account deficit as a favourable development. Despite temporary reversals we are optimistic that this will occur. Since the first quarter of 1976 we have experienced a substantial improvement in our merchandise trade account, and we expect further gains. As the House knows, the merchandise trade balance registered a record surplus of $3.5 billion in 1978. The merchandise trade figures for January, which were recently released, showed a merchandise trade surplus of $386 million. Projected on an annual basis, it comes to $4.6 billion. Our competitive position on international markets, which earlier had been a cause for concern, is much improved, and this should exert a positive influence on our current account over the coming quarters.

An additional favourable indicator is the halt in the deterioration in our travel balance. In fact, in the fourth quarter it registered a significant improvement.

The increase in the current account deficit was primarily due to increases in net payments of interest and dividends abroad and a swing in the balance on net transfers from an inflow of $366 million in 1977 to an outflow of $24 million in 1978. The swing in net transfer payments was almost exclusively due to an increase in official government contributions to non-residents, a large part of which was not a cash outflow.

I should also like to point out that the flow of dividends abroad in the fourth quarter was abnormally large and was associated with the removal of controls on dividends and the expiry of certain deferred tax advantages associated with the tax reforms of 1972.

Additionally, I would like to note that a portion of the increased dividend outflow in the fourth quarter was in the form of stock dividends and was offset by an inflow of direct investment in the capital account. Thus to some degree the deterioration in the current account last year was more apparent than real.

ENERGY—INQUIRY WHETHER DREE REPRESENTED IN MARITIME ENERGY CORPORATION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the Maritime Energy Corporation is an excellent vehicle for the development of a full-scale maritime power pool with strong interconnections to the United States and the rest of Canada. The Maritime Energy Corporation can also be an effective development tool for Atlantic Canada if the federal government is prepared to invest money to help this region help itself.

The government has chosen the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as its instrument for development, and I feel strongly that, as such, it should be represented on the Maritime Energy Corporation directorate and work with it and the premiers of the Atlantic provinces in creating a regional development strategy for Atlantic Canada.

• (2235)

The basic cost of energy is dictated by the cost of production, the cost of transmission, the cost of distribution, and the cost of operating the system. Clearly, the cost of production of energy that is used in an interprovincial grid and the cost of transmitting it is an area where the Government of Canada could wisely invest money in the form of a grant to reduce the cost of the end product. The amount of money invested would have a direct effect on the end product and could result in a very low energy cost. By introducing this low cost energy into the maritime power pool, the total cost of energy would necessarily be lowered.

In plants that are capital intensive and produce power from low cost sources such as hydro plants, tidal plants, and to a lesser degree nuclear plants, the elimination of this capital cost by the Government of Canada would be a real investment in the future of the Atlantic provinces.

If the Maritime Energy Corporation proceeds with the Fundy tidal power study and reports favourably on it, the maritime provinces would have in place a massive energy source that would be most attractive to metal and chemical based companies which could well locate on the periphery of such a plant, creating a large number of well paying jobs.

Then too, plants building electrical components for the staged development of Fundy might find it very much worth their while to build in that area. The spinoff in service and support industries could be considerable. That is where DREE comes in and that is why DREE should be involved with the Maritime Energy Corporation.

DREE should get away from the idea that its main responsibility is to provide industrial incentives to entrepreneurs who wish to move into the Atlantic area, or to local businessmen who want to expand their present operations, or a series of ad hoc programs providing valuable services, but on a small, piecemeal scale. DREE should be doing more than that. It should be looking at the big jobs crying to be tackled. For example, DREE has done nothing so far about the Fundy tidal power project. It is very convenient for the government, whenever Fundy is seriously mentioned, to be able to pass it off to a study or a commission or a committee, which it knows full well can stall the project another year or another decade. DREE should be brought into these discussions. DREE should be handed the responsibility of correlating these studies. DREE should be given the job to do.

DREE was created to lead the attack on regional disparity. Like Uriah, the Hittite, it was to be thrust into the forefront to battle, there to do or die. But DREE stayed in the background when the big conflicts were raised. It handed out its grants and loans to justify its existence, and failed miserably to take hold of the big projects which the Atlantic provinces have needed for generations. In short, it avoided the massive development undertakings without which the Atlantic provinces will always remain what they are today—the most neglected part of Canada.

Finally, I want to say that I am very pleased to see the Maritime Energy Corporation moving forward. In addition to the financial advantages this corporation can have as a vehicle combining the credit potential of three maritime provinces with the Government of Canada, I see tremendous future planning opportunities for the corporation by utilizing the excellent resources of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission and the Nova Scotia Power Corporation which are already in place. I do not envisage a large or expensive organization, nor need it become another layer of bureaucracy. Instead, I see a vehicle for development which has tremendous potential, and its success depends entirely on the extent to which the Government of Canada is prepared to invest in it and develop Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, before responding to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie), I should like to place on the record a correction to part of my response earlier to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who was good enough to draw to my attention that Statistics Canada does indeed record that in the fourth quarter of 1978 there was a further slight deterioration in the travel balance. That reference I made should have been to the month of January, 1979, when there was some significant improvement.

Mr. Speaker, on February 19, 1979, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) tabled a memorandum of understanding between Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island dealing with the Maritime Energy Corporation.

This memorandum establishes the agreed functions which the corporation would perform, and these may be summarized as follows: (1) Carry out regional planning of electrical generation and transmission for the three maritime provinces; (2) finance, build and operate regional generation and transmission; (3) co-ordinate and dispatch the day to day operation of the maritime electrical system; (4) purchase and sell power over transmission ties external to the region; and (5) engage in research and development.

It has been agreed that the Point Lepreau nuclear unit will be MEC's first major project. Its output will be sold through back-to-back contracts with Canada as an intermediate purchaser. This involvement by Canada in back-to-back contracts ensures a strong credit rating for MEC and should permit borrowing for project financing at reasonable rates.

The provincial utilities and the federal government will contribute equity up to 10 per cent of the Lepreau project cost. In addition, the federal government will provide a performance loan to reduce the impact on revenue requirements of possible performance problems that might seriously reduce Lepreau output. The maximum drawdown will be $200 million.

This agreement promises to provide regional co-operation unique in Canada and will ensure greater stability in electricity price within the maritime region than would have been possible without MEC.

There remains to be worked out the detailed legal agreements to implement the decisions reached and to permit the incorporation of Maritime Energy Corporation under the Canada Corporations Act. The shareholders will exercise their rights under these agreements and provide direction to the officers of the corporation through a board of directors nominated by each of the four parties. Federal representation on the board of directors will likely reflect the interests of several departments, and will undoubtedly take into account the individual contribution which directors can make to the effective operation of the new corporation.

The final structure of the board of directors has not yet been determined. It should be noted, however, that in negotiating the details of this agreement the Department of Finance and DREE have been closely associated with Energy, Mines and Resources. Undoubtedly the interests of all three departments will be taken into consideration in the nomination process for members of the board.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning, at eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.43 p.m.

PROPOSED AUDIT OF BOOKS OF CANADIAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity concerning the statement of the Secretary of State a few days ago that an independent audit, so-called, would be conducted of the affairs of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Secretary of State forthwith announce who the auditors will be, why the Auditor General of Canada is not being utilized, whether the audit will reconcile government grants given with the fact that annual reports of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews make no mention of such grants and, finally, whether the audit will investigate bonuses from government funds to certain directors, and when and why an Air Canada pass was issued to Peter Jones, president of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, who has now resigned his post.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF IJC ON GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In consideration of the representations made by Governor Link, of North Dakota, to the Congress of the United States for additional funding to continue construction of the Garrison diversion project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs make a statement on motions today outlining Canada's official position on the International Joint Commission's final recommendations for the Garrison diversion project.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE SEAL HUNT

REFUSAL OF NOVA SCOTIA NDP LEADER TO ENDORSE SEALING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the same Order on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the leader of the NDP in Nova Scotia, Mr. Jeremy Ackerman, refused to support the introduction of a resolution in that legislature endorsing the seal hunt off the east coast of Canada and offering support and encouragement to the fishermen of east coast Canada in pursuing their lawful activities, introduced by the minister of development, thus refusing to support the workingmen of east coast Canada, unjustly criticized for engaging in their traditional fishing occupation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House condemns the leader of the NDP in Nova Scotia for his refusal to support the activities of Canadian fishermen and regrets his party's lack of concern for the workingmen of Newfoundland, the Magdalen Islands and east coast Canada generally.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have great difficulty in trying to fit that motion into the administrative responsibilities of this House.

SUGGESTION THAT PUBLIC FUNDS BE USED TO SUBSIDIZE "HANSARD"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), I move:

S.O. 43

That this House notes that public funds are used to subsidize the press gallery and to cover the cost of televising our proceedings, as well as to publish and distribute great quantities of government informational material, and this House therefore asserts that it is appropriate for public funds to be used to subsidize the distribution of Hansard at a reasonable subscription rate, so that those who wish to receive the official record of the debates of this House will be encouraged to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ASSISTANCE FOR HALIFAX SHIPYARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Halifax shipyards are in danger of losing multimillion dollar contracts for the construction of fishing trawlers unless assistance is made available to repair existing facilities.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir):

That this House direct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to convene a meeting with the Premier of Nova Scotia to determine what assistance can and will be provided for the Halifax shipyards.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

NATIONAL RESOURCES AND PUBLIC WORKS

FAILURE OF ONTARIO TO PROVIDE HOUSE COMMITTEE WITH BRIEF BEFORE INFORMING PRESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Ontario government failed to observe the common courtesy of providing the parliamentary Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works with its brief on Bill C-42 before leaking it to The Globe and Mail last night, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne):

That this House urges the Ontario government to reimburse its citizens for the public funds needlessly spent in sending an official to appear before the parliamentary committee last evening.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CONTINUED FUNDING OF COUNCIL OF RURAL DEVELOPMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) has axed the Council of Rural Development Canada. This agency is one of the few positive attractions in what has become an otherwise oblique and unimaginative department. It is the one vital connection that rural Canadians in the undeveloped regions of the country have with a ministry that is supposed to serve their interest.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this House does instruct the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to continue funding that one apolitical body in the country that speaks on behalf of millions of rural Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CURRENT ACCOUNT DEFICIT—EFFECT ON INFLATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, perhaps I could put my first question to the Prime Minister.

Two days ago I asked the Prime Minister a question concerning our current account deficit of $5.2 billion; in other words, our shortfall with the outside world—$5.2 billion being a record for this country. At that time the Prime Minister hesitated to reply. Could he tell the House, first, has he looked into these figures; second, has he had discussions with his Minister of Finance; and third, does he agree with the Minister of Finance that it is a problem we will simply have to live with?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): "No" to the first two questions, Mr. Speaker, and "Yes" to the third.

• (1115)

Mr. Stevens: Can the Prime Minister go further and tell us what, specifically, he sees the government doing to relieve the situation, bearing in mind that the current account deficit means our dollar will stay under heavy pressure? This causes inflation in the country. For example, we find that raw hide prices in Canada went from 42 cents a pound to $1.05 a pound this week. This is largely due to the fact that Japanese and Korean buyers find that our hides are now so cheap that they are reaching over, buying them and driving up Canadian domestic prices, with the result that shoe prices, already up this spring $2 to $3 a pair, will be up substantially more come the fall.

Mr. McGrath: We'll all be barefoot.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, Canada has been a capital importing nation for many, many decades. We continue to be a capital importing nation. The essential question is whether this creates development in Canada, creates jobs and creates expansion. This has been the history of the past half century, that foreign capital has added itself to Canadian savings in order to develop this country. I have never heard any party protest against that, including the party of the hon. member.

Mr. Stevens: The Prime Minister apparently misses the question. The fact is we are paying for last year's grocery bills; we are paying what we owe the rest of the world. This is not bringing in capital to build the infrastructure of this country. As a result, we have a low dollar which has now caused oranges, for example, to go from $1.78 to $2.28, a 28 per cent increase compared to last March. The same is true of various other products: grapefruit have gone from 25 cents to 33 cents each, up 28 per cent due to the inadequacy of this government's fiscal policy.

Will the Prime Minister now tell the House that he made a mistake in the past and that he is going to bring in proper fiscal measures to arrest this haemorrhaging compared with the rest of the world?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I will manage to explain it to the hon. member. If people want to buy oranges, grapefruit and bananas, they will have to pay the price for them that is set in other countries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Let them eat cake!

Mr. Trudeau: Cake can be made in our country. I know the hon. member's face is full of it all the time.

INCREASED COST OF IMPORTS DUE TO DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON DOMESTICALLY-PRODUCED GOODS

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. This morning he spoke about the cost of imported goods which has increased because of the drop in value of the dollar. The same kind of increases have occurred with regard to Canadian-produced goods. Sockeye salmon went up over 23 per cent in the last year. My colleague mentioned the increase in price of raw hides.

Does the government have any plan to take fiscal steps to correct these increasing price levels and inflation, or are all these price increases simply something the Canadian people will have to live with?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will consult the statistics and look at the increase in revenue of farm groups, for example, in the past ten years he will find it has increased about three times. In the case of fishermen it has been even higher. We are satisfied with this; we think it is good that the fisherman and the farmer are getting higher revenues.

Mr. Parker: We are not suggesting there is anything wrong with farmers getting a decent income. What is wrong is that consumers are having to pay ever higher prices, not because of our domestic producers but because of—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Parker: My question is also to the Prime Minister. Will the latest watchdog agency, the NCI, have any kind of guidelines to govern its procedures over the next few months and are they going to be able to live with the problems they see?

• (1120)

Mr. Trudeau: Once again, I fail to understand the hon. member's policy. In his first question he complained that fishermen are getting too much for their fish; in his second question he says he does not object to fishermen getting too much money for their fish. I wish he would make up his mind.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ONTARIO DOCTORS WITHDRAWING FROM OHIP—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I will address my question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is not a detailed question; it affects over-all government policy.

Considering the countless doctors in Ontario currently withdrawing in massive numbers from OHIP are forcing increases in their charges from 25 per cent to 30 per cent above OHIP rates and beginning virtually to destroy the universality of medicare, would the right hon. gentleman tell the House what the government plans to do to preserve this essential service in Canada's largest province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to refer to my colleague for details of the particular situation in Ontario. The medicare plan, which was established by a Liberal government is, of course, one which is basic and essential and it is founded on the principle of universality and accessibility. If anything is done by any province to depart from that principle, we would have to review the very high payment the federal government is making to the province in respect of half the cost of medicare.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed that the minister will be back later in the question period, so I will ask my supplementary later when she returns.

PUBLIC WORKS

POSSIBILITY OF FARMERS LEASING EXPROPRIATED LAND AT MIRABEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Quite recently it was announced in the press that a committee would be set up to consider the possible uses for expropriated land at Mirabel airport. Could the minister tell the House whether the unused acreage which was formerly farmed land will be returned to farming and, if so, whether there have been discussions with the provincial agriculture minister concerning agricultural zoning?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the land situated on the outskirts of Mirabel airport was expropriated a few years ago to provide a buffer zone that would make it possible to operate the airport 24 hours a day, seven days a week without the noise and pollution inconveniences found in most large international airports. That land now belongs to the Canadian government. We think that it is now under-used to some extent and this is why I announced last week the establishment of a federal corporation which will be asked to put those acres to a better use, and more especially to intensify their agricultural use. I can therefore assure the hon. member that such decision is consistent with the policy of provincial authorities and that the Quebec agriculture department has been asked to appoint to the board of directors of that corporation representative who will state the case of that department.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as this corporation will be responsible for the administration of these pieces of land, will farmers be allowed to lease these pieces of land which are available at the periphery of the airport?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that these pieces of land will be put at the disposal of farmers who are prepared to farm them, although some of them will be reserved for testing certain species in co-operation with the federal Department of Agriculture, the Quebec agriculture department and the Quebec Agricultural Producers' Union.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—MANNER OF OPERATION

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister with regard to the National Commission on Inflation. How can the government expect the commission to be successful if it is given no guidelines to appraise price performance in the economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the mandate given to the commission is to watch for any settlements or increases in incomes or prices which would be dangerous in causing accelerated inflation. That is a matter of judgment. Mr. Renouf and his commissioners will exercise their judgment ably in the future as they have in the past.

Mr. de Cotret: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government itself has any guidelines which it will use in making its own judgments on the reports from this commission. How will the government determine what constitutes normal price, wage and profit behaviour, and how will it determine what constitutes abnormal or reprehensible behaviour in this area?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this kind of judgment is made all the time by people engaged, for instance, in collective bargaining. When you refer to an arbitrator, you do not give him guidelines. You ask him to look at what would be an appropriate settlement in a particular case. He looks at settlements in other areas. He considers whether there is need for a catch-up or whether the group involved is ahead of others, and he makes a judgment. The same thing can be done with regard to prices.

FINDINGS BY CSIP—GOVERNMENT ACTION THEREON

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Before the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity was aborted by the government, it made public a number of significant findings concerning the cost of living in Canada. For example, it pointed to food industry profits and dairy industry costs, and criticized the government's wage settlement with letter carriers as being excessive and inflationary.

What action will be taken to follow up on these findings, and what about the many other studies CSIP was undertaking? Will they be published, or will they also be aborted?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has given examples to his colleague from Ottawa of the kind of judgment which can be made without any specific guidelines. I hope these new members will meet and explain some things to each other.

Mr. Fraser: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Hare: Mr. Speaker, in introducing the National Commission on Inflation last Friday, the Minister of Finance claimed it would have broader investigatory powers than CSIP and that this would enable the commission to get to the truth behind rising prices. I understand that when CSIP requested information from companies, only a very few refused to provide it; and I am pleased to hear that the minister is concerned about the truth. It is in this regard that I put my supplementary question. Why is the NCI not directly responsible to parliament, as CSIP was, and why is the NCI reporting to the minister and not to parliament and the people of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, CSIP was under the direction of the Economic Council of Canada which was not reporting directly to parliament; it was reporting directly to the Prime Minister. The new group will report to the Minister of Finance. I do not think there is any objection to that, even on the part of the hon. member.

The important thing is that in the case of CSIP it was put under the Economic Council of Canada at the request of the provinces which, at the time we were discussing the post-controls period, did not want that particular institution to have any power to compel production of information. Experience has shown that that was not sufficient because some groups did, indeed, refuse to supply CSIP with information. That is why we took the next step.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO SYDNEY STEEL PLANT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I am informed that the cabinet reached a decision yesterday with respect to providing financial assistance to the Sydney Steel mill to assist Sysco in the urgent and necessary modernization of its plant. I wonder if the minister can provide the House with details of such financial assistance.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I cannot provide the House with detailed information on the mandate I have been given by the cabinet to enter into a final round of negotiations with a view to an agreement with the province which will help Sysco upgrade its present facility and meet the requirements which would allow Sysco to fulfil the contract it entered into with Tisco recently.

I hope in the coming days we will be in a better position to work it out with the province. I do not have a mandate to sit down with the province and talk about the details of what we are prepared to offer to the province for that purpose.

Mr. Muir: I regret that the minister is not in a position to provide dollar values, and so on, but I wish to commend and thank the minister for his reply. I am sure I speak not only for the steelworkers but for thousands of Cape Bretoners and Nova Scotians when I pay tribute to him, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to the right hon. Prime Minister, and especially to the Deputy Prime Minister, for their activities in this regard. I have been in close touch with them all in reaching this very important decision to at least make a start on solving this most vital problem.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST PEACE TALKS—ARAB COUNTRIES CONSULTED BY CANADA

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

On Wednesday I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs about consultations Canada is having in support of a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel. Yesterday, the minister announced, "we have encouraged Israel's Arab neighbours to join the negotiating process". Can the Prime Minister tell the House which Arab countries have been consulted, and the general nature of those discussions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot. The Secretary of State for External Affairs did not inform me which Arab countries he was contacting.

Mr. Roche: I hope that the House can be informed on this important question very soon. Jordan is one of the key countries in the effort to build Arab support for the Egypt and Israel peace treaty.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the time has not arrived for Canada to establish a modest-size embassy in Jordan, where we now have no Canadian presence, and to pay for it by diverting a portion of the present $48 million for capital construction of embassies which is now in the estimates to pay for the establishment of a Canadian presence in Jordan at this critical moment?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is a Canadian presence in Jordan. I recognize that it is not a permanent mission, but there is a Canadian presence there. I had the opportunity of meeting with it when I visited Jordan a couple of years ago.

Certainly, the hon. member's representation will be considered by the minister. It is a country with which we would like to have good and closer relations. But once again we run into the difficulty of expenditure cuts: the Department of External Affairs, like other departments, has been severely curtailed in its rate of expenditure growth.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

REQUEST FOR MEASURES GUARANTEEING ADEQUATE OIL SUPPLY FOR INDEPENDENT DISTRIBUTORS

Hon. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the excellent measures which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology announced last week to help Quebec independent oil distributors obtain their oil supplies from outside Canada, could the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs advise the House whether his department is now prepared to take the necessary steps under the Combines Investigation Act to make sure that these independent distributors may continue to obtain their oil supplies from inside Canada?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have already asked the director of investigations to monitor the oil industry's behaviour in respect of section 31.2 of the Combines Investigation Act; that is the section dealing with refusal to supply. I have asked them, further, to apply, if appropriate, to the Restrictive Trades Practices Commission for an order directing the oil companies to provide oil supplies to independents.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DECENTRALIZATION OF DEPARTMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Considering the Prime Minister's well known concern about conflict of interest and political integrity, can he explain the rationale and criteria employed to justify the federal government's decentralization plan in the public service whereby, of the 15 departments or agencies shifted from Ottawa, 14 went to Liberal ridings, eight of these ridings being represented by cabinet ministers?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know if the facts are as recited by the hon. member. I would have to refer to the minister in charge of decentralization to verify them.

I do know that many Liberals are elected in various parts of the country, including ridings which deserve decentralization, and certainly we would not deprive an area of decentralization merely because it is represented by a Liberal.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, those figures come from the PSAC. I think the Prime Minister is stretching the credulity of the House if he believes that only Liberal ridings are deserving of this decentralization assistance.

I wonder if the Prime Minister, at a later date, could table in the House the exact criteria explaining that what we on this side of the House think, namely, that the number one priority is to be a Liberal, is not in fact the case.

Mr. Trudeau: I really do not know if the allegations made by the hon. member are based on fact or not. I did undertake to refer them to the minister and I will take note of the question.

REORGANIZATION OF AIR OPERATIONS PERSONNEL—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Ron. Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I will address my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

In view of the serious morale problem which exists in the air operations groups of the Department of Transport, and the increasingly difficult challenge to enforce Canada's air safety standards with the limited manpower resources left in that group—all of which is now aggravated by the March 5 resignation of the officer in charge of the air safety division of the western region—will the minister advise if it is the government's plan to privatize the civil aviation inspection function, or is it taking steps to reorganize and recategorize that group within the Department of Transport?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first portion of the question is no, there is no intention to privatize that function. So far as the organization within the Department of Transport is concerned, that falls within the bailiwick of my colleague, the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Huntington: In view of the fact that the collective bargaining process has been stretched beyond the limit of credibility and now appears to be little more than make-work projects for negotiators, will the President of the Treasury Board and his colleague, the Minister of Transport, now come down from their apparent rigid, aloof and technical stance, meet with the parties concerned and take measures to correct this whole sorry, sad mess?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the allegations of the hon. member that there is a rigid, inflexible stance, nor do I accept that the matter has reached the point where there is no hope of negotiating a satisfactory conclusion. My hope, as I indicated to the hon. member in answer to previous questions put on this matter, is that in fact we can reach agreement with the air operations group. That is the intention and we intend to proceed toward that goal.

EMPLOYMENT

REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON NUMBER OF JOBS CREATED

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I should like to ask whether he could lay before the House a breakdown of the statistics which he and the Minister of Finance use repeatedly in the House when saying there is an annual increase of 430,000 to 450,000 jobs every year.

The question is whether the minister could break down these figures, since they cannot be equated with the actual job inventory or unemployment statistics. Could he break down these figures to the actual jobs created by industry, jobs created by the public sector, and jobs which are simply recycled through Canada Works and student employment programs?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): It is a welcome change, Mr. Speaker, to hear someone from the opposition talking about the number of jobs created.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: At least they are now coming to recognize that this is, in fact, taking place. I would point out to him that such a question could be put on the order paper and I would leave it up to StatsCan to come out with the specific figures, because I do not think I am required to remember them.

I would remind the hon. member that in the manufacturing sector—this figure comes from that organization as well—there were in excess of 125,000 jobs created. There were more jobs in manufacturing last year than the year before. So jobs are being created, and at a record pace.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, my concern is not so much about the jobs being created—all of us are concerned about that—but, rather, about the jobs being recycled and used for political purpose in statistics quoted in the House.

● (1140)

Does the minister have, and will he present to the House, the statistics concerning how many of these jobs are being recycled every year and how many are permanent? Is it the intention of the government to make more of these jobs permanent? In other words, will the government channel more of the money being wasted in some areas of the country into the private sector, which would be more capable of creating permanent jobs, instead of recycling useless endeavours every year?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any point in providing information to the hon. member because, obviously, he has not read what has been provided already.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: We indicated that Canada Works—I am sure that is the type of thing the hon. member is talking about—creates temporary jobs, and that we established an economic growth component factor under Canada Works to create permanent jobs.

Now there are three agreements—one with New Brunswick, one with Nova Scotia and one with Quebec—directed specifically at creating permanent jobs. For example, there is the local employment development assistance program. There is a whole series; I think there are some 14 which I named in my announcement in September. If the hon. member does not read what we have put in place already—and, heaven knows, a lot has been done—I do not know why we should add to his burden if he is not accepting this in any event.

COMMUNICATIONS

PORTRAYAL OF WOMEN IN ELECTRONIC MEDIA PROGRAMMING AND ADVERTISEMENTS

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Communications. In recent months, numerous women's groups have made strong representations to the CRTC respecting the stereotyped portrayal of women in electronic media programming and in advertisements carried by our networks.

What has been the reaction of the Minister of Communications to these representations? Does she have any intention to act on them in areas under the jurisdiction of her department?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I feel so strongly about the subject—

Mr. McGrath: I am sure you do.

Mrs. Sauvé: —that last spring I made a speech on the matter when I addressed the National Association of Broadcasters, which is the United States equivalent of our Canadian Association of Broadcasters. Perhaps I exhausted the patience of my audience, but I wanted to make the point very strongly that broadcasters and the advertising industry should refrain and restrain themselves from using women to advertise anything and everything, and also that they should look at the matter of advertising feminine hygiene products.

I have raised the matter with the chairman of the CRTC in the hope that he will be able to set up standards very much like those for children's broadcasting. I am prepared to set up a group to monitor the advertisements on television in the hope that the regular publication of their comments would help to educate the public and apply pressure.

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

DELAY IN DELIVERY OF MAIL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. A week ago I asked him a question referring to problems which arose in the city of Calgary. Other members have asked questions concerning areas across the nation. I want to ask him if an investigation has been conducted.

Perhaps at the same time I could ask if he is aware of a letter posted at Mayerthorpe on September 4, 1975, and postmarked on that date, which was received on Feburary 6, 1979. It took three years and four months after posting for the letter to go 300 miles.

Mr. Trudeau: Was it urgent?

Mr. Woolliams: During that time, the price of a stamp increased from 8 cents to 10 cents, to 12 cents and then to 14 cents. After almost 3½ years, does the receiver have to pay six cents more because of a Post Office delay?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can answer in detail—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: —the question as to why somebody should have to pay six cents more for a letter received approximately three years after it was posted. That is part of the process. But perhaps I can tell the hon. member for Calgary North something more serious.

In the first part of his question he asked if an investigation had been made concerning the allegations of vandalism and different reprehensible acts in the Calgary post office. I am a little fed up with allegations coming from everywhere concerning vandalism and the inquiries we are attempting to conduct. I know Mr. Woolliams received a communication from Mr. Hall, the president of CUPW in Calgary, concerning this—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lamontagne: —but every time we attempt to make an inquiry about such matters we meet with silence from the workers' representatives, and even some media representatives, who do not want to speak and give us leads which could help us do our work in trying to find out who—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: The hon. member for Nickel Belt is laughing, but I think a responsible union leader such as Mr. Hall from Calgary should help us, instead of keeping silent. He should help us find the responsible people. I challenge him to help us take some disciplinary action.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Calgary North.

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could help the Postmaster General. I ask him if he would be prepared to set up an independent investigation. The Postmaster General spoke of Mr. Hall. Mr. Hall wrote a letter to me last week in which he admitted many of the allegations I have made. If he will write to me in that regard, I am sure he will talk with an independent investigator in order to get this mess cleaned up once and for all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I challenge Mr. Hall, the president of CUPW in Calgary, to help us find out who was responsible for the vandalism in the Calgary post office, even if it was a member of his own union.

SOCIAL SERVICES

PROPOSED ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON REHABILITATION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was in the House earlier but unfortunately is temporarily absent. In her absence, perhaps the acting minister can respond.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): She has gone to mail a letter.

Mr. Dinsdale: Hon. members will be aware that the Easter Seal campaign has been launched in Canada. Now that the bureau on rehabilitation has been restored in the minister's department under the capable direction of André Leblanc, when will the hon. lady be taking the next essential step to set up the long anticipated advisory committee on rehabilitation, drawn from the voluntary sector of the rehabilitation movement which has been carrying an increasingly heavy responsibility arising from the government's long delay in proceeding with the Social Services Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to take notice of the question on behalf of the hon. lady, who has gone to attend a ceremony at the Governor General's since I could not go myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: You did not want to go.

Some hon. Members: Go, go.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Prime Minister has responded for the minister, I will seize another opportunity. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has been good enough to indicate in a letter that she supports the motion I have proposed over a long period of time, calling for the setting up of a parliamentary committee to investigate and report on the state of the rehabilitation arts in Canada in preparation for the Rehabilitation International Congress to be held in Winnipeg in June, 1980.

In view of the frequent reports revealing drastic deficiencies in treatment facilities and services available to physically and mentally handicapped Canadians, will the minister use her good offices to have this committee set up while this parliament still survives? Perhaps the Prime Minister is knowledgeable in that respect.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the details of the motion of the hon. member, but I commend him for his very valuable thoughts in this direction. Certainly I will undertake to pass on his suggestion to our House leader. It would be useful if the hon. member contacted the House leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That has been done.

Mr. Trudeau: Who knows, perhaps between them, with the help of the House leaders of the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party, they would be able to set up this parliamentary committee. Certainly it will have my approval if it has the approval of those four gentlemen.

LABOUR DISPUTES

BARGAINING IN DISPUTE BETWEEN INCO AND USWA—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. At the moment there is in the Sudbury basin a strike which is in its sixth month. It is between the United Steel Workers of America and Inco Ltd. and 11,600 workers have struck the company.

• (1150)

In view of the fact that it was revealed yesterday, in the latest contribution figures to political parties, by the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada that the Liberal Party of Canada received $20,500 from Inco Ltd., would the Prime Minister be good enough to get in touch with his friends in the boardroom of Inco and lean on them a little so that they will negotiate in good faith with the workers who have been forced into a very untenable position vis-à-vis the strike?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to make sure that the hon. member's thoughts are conveyed to the directors of Inco. The hon. member might perhaps consider leaning a little bit on the union, because I understand that the New Democratic Party receives very considerable funds, way in excess of $20,000, from the Steel Workers.

Mr. Broadbent: We all select our friends.

Mr. Trudeau: If I were in the position of the hon. member, that of the relying so heavily on the Steel Workers, I would suggest to them that it is probably a very inopportune time to have a strike, when there are excessive stocks of nickel all over the world and particularly in Sudbury.

Mr. Huntington: What about steel?

Mr. Trudeau: I would leave the hon. member, with his friends, to decide if they should not be negotiating in good faith as well.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I am not so concerned about my views becoming known to the board of directors of Inco, because they are already well known, and in view of the fact that any contributions made by the Steel Workers of America to this labour party are made in a democratic process but the contributions of Inco—

An hon. Member: Explain.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: I understand the sensitivity across the floor. In view of the fact that the contributions of Inco Ltd. are not made with the consent of the shareholders of Inco, I wonder if the Prime Minister—and I would insist, again, that the Prime Minister, in his role as leader of this country, show some leadership in this particular dispute—would get in touch with the directors of Inco Ltd. and insist that they present an offer to the workers which will let them walk away from the bargaining table with some dignity and respect.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, or he should know, that labour relations in Inco are not within federal jurisdiction; they come under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Rodriguez: You took their money.

Mr. Trudeau: In so far as my asking the directors of Inco to make a particular offer to the union, I have not studied the particular case and therefore I do not know what is a reasonable offer. I do know that when the hon. member talks about negotiating in good faith, he should ask the union members of that particular local to negotiate with some good sense.

THE SEAL HUNT

REQUEST ACTION BE TAKEN TO PREVENT INTERFERENCE BY GREENPEACE GROUP

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Reports this morning indicate that Mr. Cleveland Amory and his small band of misguided, misdirected people have managed to paint seals in the Gulf of St. Lawrence with red paint.

The minister has issued a permit to Greenpeace to visit the Front of St. Anthony and the Canadian branch of Greenpeace has now turned over that permit to the American branch of Greenpeace. I would like to ask the Minister of Fisheries if he will now revoke the permit which was given to Greenpeace to visit the Front so that the incident of painting seals with red paint in the Gulf will not happen at the Front and so that fishermen will not be deprived of this income because of the devaluation of seal pelts.

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has truthfully stated a fact which has taken place. The American protest group on the Sea Shepherd did paint a number of seals red in an area 40 miles west of the Magdalen Islands. Eight persons were arrested and are now on board our icebreaker Wolfe. A number of charges have been laid, including the charge of interfering with the herd and going within a half-mile of the herd without a permit. The Canadian Greenpeace group does have a permit to observe, but it has been suggested that this permit may have been given to the American group. If this is the case, the permit will be revoked and charges can be laid.

There is one other point, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to make clear to all hon. members. A permit was issued to the Canadian Greenpeace on the basis of one permit to one person for one day. They were to notify us who this party would be. An individual from Boston has been selected and he will be accompanied by one of our enforcement officers. I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Hastings.

LOTO CANADA

REQUEST THAT BELLEVILLE ORGANIZATION RECEIVE ASSISTANCE FROM PROGRAM

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). One of the most efficient lotteries in the country was the Belleville Yardmen Benefit Fund which did a great deal for the city of Belleville. It was put out of business by the combination of Wintario and Loto Canada. Wintario, in recognizing this fact, contributed an amount equal to the contribution from the Belleville Yardmen Benefit Fund.

Now that the minister has $18 million on her hands, I wonder if she would, in her largesse, do what has been done by Wintario and the Belleville Yardmen Benefit Fund, for Belleville?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the $18 million to which the hon. member has referred is to be used in the years from 1980 to 1985. If we listen to the hon. member's leader, there will not be any money at all to talk about at that time.

The hon. member mentioned a private corporation. Perhaps he would be interested to know that Loto Canada does assist those that are non-profit corporations if they wish to take on the job of selling the tickets. These corporations receive $1 for every $10 of tickets which they sell. Many non-profit corporations in this country have been able to raise a considerable amount of money in this way.

Lottario is currently taking in $700,000 a week, and I think I should refer the hon. member to that organization.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, just to make my point absolutely clear, the Belleville Yardmen Benefit Fund contributed over $3 million to a sports complex. Wintario, because they realized they had put the yardmen out of business, matched their contribution with another $3 million. They need money to finish the project. I am suggesting that Loto Canada, because they, too, helped to put the Yardmen Benefit Fund out of business, should contribute as well, but not in the form of selling tickets.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely the hon. member is making a representation.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR FUNDS TO IMPROVE TRANSIT SYSTEM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tries to tell us that all is now economically well on this election eve, as he did again yesterday, I wonder whether or not the Prime Minister would take advantage of the days, or perhaps weeks, that he has left and fulfil one of his 1974 election campaign promises; specifically, the urban transit funds promised for the expansion and improvement of the transit system in and around metro Toronto.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe this question has been answered many times by the Minister of Transport and myself.

Mr. Stevens: Not properly.

Mr. Trudeau: We were not able to allocate the many hundreds of millions of dollars that we had hoped to allocate to the transit system in Toronto; but funds have been earmarked, some of which are being used around Toronto.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, in that case, could the Prime Minister explain why his minister of sport—I leave out the "amateur" portion of her title because she does not seem to be preoccupied with that area—was prepared to offer $18 million for the construction of NHL arenas to house professional teams which in their own right are making millions, while the government continues to withhold these promised funds from such important areas as urban transit development around one of the largest cities in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member perhaps has not noticed, but the funds from Loto Canada will essentially be used for sports and for culture, and not for building roads.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

EVALUATION STUDY OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—COST THEREOF

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the recent announcement by Supply and Services that a contract has been awarded to Decision Dynamics Corporation of Toronto for an evaluation study of gun control legislation as it refers to Bill C-51, in the amount of $292,400, could the minister tell the House the reason for spending this large amount of money on the study at this time of restraint?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the question of gun control is one of high sensitivity. He knows very well that in his own area it is one of high sensitivity.

• (1200)

As a result of that sensitivity, I announced recently, and repeated in this House, that we have a firearms advisory council which will be looking at the implementation of gun control legislation. We also felt it would be advisable to see how the implementation was proceeding in order to be able to present changes to the program, if necessary, to make it more effective and palatable.

Mr. Whittaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister has announced forming this advisory committee, and in view of the fact that it will apparently have exactly the same functions as the study by Decision Dynamics Corporation, can the minister advise this House and the people of Canada of any logical reason for such a waste of taxpayers' money occurring?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it is not at all a waste of taxpayers' money. It is, exactly, an assessment of a very sensitive program. We are very much interested in the impact of gun control both in terms of controlling their use and in controlling criminal activity. Surely the hon. member recognizes that once a study is made and reports are made to the minister, we can take whatever appropriate steps are necessary to improve a system which we feel is very commendable at this time.

Point of Order—Mr. Diefenbaker

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ONTARIO DOCTORS WITHDRAWING FROM OHIP—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, if I could get his attention.

I have learned that the Minister of National Health and Welfare cannot come back here for the question period. This matter goes to the root of government policy, as it affects the universality of medicare and the major cost-sharing agreement with the provinces. Considering that one of the requirements for any province to get its share of funds for medicare from the federal government is that the provincial plan be universal, and considering that about one-fifth of Ontario's doctors have already withdrawn from OHIP as a means of raising their fees by 25 per cent to 30 per cent, will the Government of Canada inform the government of Ontario that the federal government has the right to cut off funds unless reasonable access to medical services, and universality are maintained in that province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to verify the details of the hon. member's statement. The principles introduced by this government and supported by parliament, are those of universality and access.

I said in my early answer that any plan which went against that would lead the federal government to operate sanctions of some kind. I can only give the same general answer, because I do not know the details of the case put by the hon. member. I will certainly take it up with the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. DIEFENBAKER—DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Parliament can only operate properly if questions asked in parliament are answered within a reasonable period of time.

Yesterday Your Honour made a ruling that he had taken a certain step because of the fact that a committee of this House had made the recommendations as to the guidelines, and therefore he took it upon himself to decide that certain broadcasts should not take place. I mention that because through the years parliament, over and over again, has declared both effectively and traditionally that there shall not be unreasonable delays in the answering of questions.

I brought this matter to Your Honour's attention a couple of weeks ago and you very properly said that you had no authority to take any action but that you would look into the question. What I am dealing with is, to me, one of the most reprehensible examples on the part of the government of its efforts to hide the facts. I brought this matter to the attention of the House several weeks ago. Since then there has been no action thereon and I must therefore repeat once more the questions that were asked three and a half months ago.

Question No. 576 placed on the order paper on November 14 reads as follows:

1. Was an order made that files containing secret or security information were not to be released until the expiry of 30 years and, if so, on what date?

There was such an order and date. I have it at the moment. The question continues:

2. Has the government decided that all files in connection with the Gouzenko revelations of 1945-46 shall not be released now and, if so, for what reason and on what basis?

3. Is the government aware of a press report that the reason given for non-production is "That they might hurt some people now living"?

4. Were any such individuals then or thereafter or since Cabinet Ministers?

Another question, No. 611, was asked in connection therewith on November 22 as follows:

1. In consequence of Mr. Igor Gouzenko's revelations, how many individuals were prosecuted and (a) who were they (b) what happened in their respective cases?

2. How many named in the revelations were not prosecuted and for what reason?

3. With the termination of the 30 years during which secret documents are not revealed, for what reason is an exception being made in connection with his revelations?

Sir, I have been here a long while, almost 39 years, and I have never known a case to equal this in which concealment is the obvious purpose of the government in not answering. What is the reason for the concealment? They are very simple questions. Parliament becomes effete unless answers are given to questions within a reasonable time.

In addition, I asked a question on February 6, No. 1,032 on the order paper, as follows:

1. Did the government give its consent to the Government of France to confer on Dr. William Jaffe the Légion d'Honneur and, if so, on what date?

2. Did the government give its consent to the granting of the Award, some time ago, of Chevalier of the Order of the Légion d'Honneur on Premier Lévesque and, if so, on what date?

Why was that question not answered? It is not a long delay, only a month, but it would take about five minutes to answer if the government desired to answer it.

I endeavoured to have you, sir, as custodian of the traditions of parliament, as you made clear yesterday, to do something and you said nothing could be done. Why is this government hiding information? It has been three and a half or almost four months since these questions went on the order paper. What are they afraid of? There can be no excuse whatever for this kind of Star Chamber action.

We approach an election, I believe, at some time. Why have members of this government who posed as lambs now become rabbits when it comes to answering simple questions? Who is covering up? I repeat—you cannot do anything, you have made that clear—the House and the country has the right to know that the failure to answer these questions in three and a half months indicates a government that cannot be believed. That is what we have found here over and over again.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

This is an example of simple questions that could be answered. Is the government waiting for dissolution? How many months do we have to wait? Are they waiting to allow this session of parliament to end because they have no reason to believe they are frightened of the answers if they are given to the Canadian people?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member referred in particular to two questions indicated by an asterisk, namely, question No. 576.

● (1210)

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want an answer from the government, not from one of the underlings.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: However, I expected from the right hon. member a minimum of respect for this institution which we, government members, have always respected. He also read question No. 611 bearing an asterisk. Then he referred to another question he claims he had put on the order paper sometime in February, which I cannot track down because he failed to mention the number.

Mr. Speaker, what I find unacceptable in the remarks of the right hon. member is his insinuations to the effect that we, on this side of the House, have something to hide, while in fact our attitude proves quite the contrary. If I may refresh the memory of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), in the last two sessions we answered, to my knowledge, about 90 per cent of the thousands of questions put on the order paper. In so doing we also try to get maximum information. I see the right hon. member is not interested in knowing the facts; yet he complains about our hiding them, Mr. Speaker. There he goes making gestures which would indicate that he is not interested in knowing the truth about the matter. I am giving him the information requested and I ask him to have the decency and politeness to listen.

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member knows full well that during a session, when we try on this side of the House to get all the information and give answers that are as complete as possible, we manage to keep up a 39 to 42 per cent rate of reply. Then, during the summer recess, we usually manage to give answers to about another 40 per cent of the questions on the order paper so that, come fall, towards the end of September or in October, when the new session starts, we have by then answered 90 per cent of all questions on the order paper.

The right hon. member should know that an average of some 4,000 to 5,000 questions are listed each year on the order paper. He should also know that of those, several are referred to dozens or even some forty departments or government agencies and that each question that is so channelled costs, today, in 1979, in this day and age, an average of $100 each to every agency or department concerned.

I have always maintained in this House, however, that it is not a matter of money or of judging whether the question of the hon. member is stupid or not. We treat all questions on the same footing. As they are put, they are referred to the departments and agencies concerned, and as soon as we get all the information requested, we answer them. Everyday, I answer some question or other on the order paper and we print them without discrimination.

The right hon. member should know that what he is trying to do today is unfair to his colleagues on both sides of the House. It is unfair to stand in this House and bring up the matter every two or three weeks. He has just done so now, and did it three weeks ago. He had three questions put on the order paper which bore an asterisk as our standing orders allow. We have already answered one third of those questions. We answered his question bearing an asterisk about fifteen days or less than two weeks ago.

There are two other starred questions and we are dealing with them seriously. Mr. Speaker, if other hon. members did not respect this institution more than he does and if we had to rise every day to read questions on the order paper, the House would continuously hear the same thing. We can read them in the order paper. We do the necessary research work, we give the answers, and each hon. member is put on an equal footing. I have deep respect for the right hon. member for Prince Albert but I have as much respect for the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard) who is here or for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Everybody here is put on an equal footing. There is no preference. Each question is considered seriously. Once again, finally, I hope that the right hon. member will understand that we have nothing to hide. We showed in the last few years that we answer 90 per cent of the questions on the order paper, which demonstrates the very opposite of the innuendos of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, which are unfounded.

I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to tell the right hon. member, once and for all, in a very polite and respectful manner, in reply to his point of order, that he is complaining of certain anomalies in the standing orders. I once told him, about two years ago, that he was complaining about 1/116th of the problems we are faced with in this House. There are 116 House standing orders, Mr. Speaker. There is a need here for an in-depth revision not only of one rule but of all the standing orders of this House. If he and his party seriously wished to sit down and discuss the changes required to modernize this institution and make it more efficient, I would be the first to support his efforts. But as long as he behaves in this manner, wasting our time by reading his own questions on the order paper, complaining without reason and insinuating that we, on this side of the House, are seeking to hide the truth, I cannot consider that he is acting in good faith and it would be very difficult for me to sit down with him in a positive attempt to reform this institution in such a way that it would reflect our times, prove to be more efficient and give a new meaning to our role as members of parliament.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member has raised a grievance by way of a point of order with respect to the answering of questions and the parliamentary secretary has responded. The matter does not seem to me to be able to go any further at this time. It is a well-known grievance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: False is the nature of the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—INTERVAL BETWEEN REPORTING OF BILLS AND PROCEEDING TO REPORT STAGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to further proceedings on a couple of bills that have just been reported. I do so, Your Honour, because it has been in the usual way that the government might like to proceed on Monday with one of the bills that has been reported today.

I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that this problem has arisen on previous occasions, and you have ruled that if a bill is reported on Friday it is hardly fair to proceed with the report stage on Monday because we do not have the reprint of the bill in time and the chances of getting report stage amendments filed are very slim.

I would hope that there would be no effort to call the report stage of either of these bills on Monday. I will not take time to read the rules but I think there is some ambiguity; one rule says that it can be done 48 hours later and another rule says that you have 24 hours in which to file report stage amendments. That envisages the usual wait for something filed on Monday that can have amendments filed on Tuesday and be debated on Wednesday.

As I say, on previous occasions Your Honour has ruled that it was unfair. I think you took the position that unless there was unanimous consent, the report stage of a bill, reported on a Friday, should not be proceeded with until Tuesday.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the problem which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) speaks about. I say to the Chair, so that the Chair understands, that if we are pressed we could go ahead on Monday, but it would be with inconvenience in terms of putting down amendments, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. However, if we are pressed we can do so.

Perhaps the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader could consider the problem from the point of view of time, if that is a problem, and perhaps we could agree on what we might deal with on Monday and if it is possible to have something else come forward. But I want to say to the parliamentary secretary, because he must plan the business, that we are prepared to go ahead on Monday unless that should prove inconvenient for the government or for someone else in the House.

● (1220)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that our rules in their present form allow us to proceed next Monday with the study of one of those two bills that have been reported today. In fact, considering the urgency of the situation, we intend to call the energy bill on Monday.

I think we are going to make the necessary arrangements to deal with the problem raised by my hon. colleagues. We are now making all possible efforts to reprint the bill in order to make it available to all parties as soon as possible. Considering the time required to reprint this bill, I shall consult the representatives of each party in the House to concretize and finalize our intent to call Bill C-42 on Monday.

If the members of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works were able yesterday evening to sit until one o'clock in the morning, it indicates that if we proceed rapidly enough today we might ensure that the bill be reprinted and that we could, if only out of respect for the exceptional work done by the members of that committee, proceed diligently considering the urgency of this bill, as the Deputy Prime Minister indicated this week, so that we may call it, as I said, next Monday.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I do not have in front of me the precedent to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred, but I do recall dealing with it on a previous occasion. I know at that time I drew on some very sympathetic reasoning from my predecessor. If I am not mistaken, the action of the Chair, faced with these actions previously, had been to discourage, except under the most necessary circumstances, the calling of the bill for third reading on Monday. I do not know if the Chair has ever said—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Report stage.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, the commencement of report stage when the bill was reported on a Friday. I do not know that any of the pronouncements, and I will have to look at them, really say that that cannot be done technically; I do not know if they have gone that far. I am not prepared now, without further examination, to make a decision as to whether or not technically that can be done. I rather think the precedents have been such as to say it would appear on the face of them that technically it can be done.

A bill reported on a Friday can be called on Monday in the strict interpretation of the language of the standing order, but because of difficulty that it places on members who wish to propose report stage amendments it is a practice that ought to be discouraged. If it is going to be done in necessitous circumstances, some arrangement should be made, as has just been offered by the parliamentary secretary, to at least come to some accommodation with those members who wish to table report stage amendments in some way, perhaps by extending the agreed deadline for the filing of amendments to a later hour in order to give them the opportunity to examine the text. Anyone who proposes a report stage amendment surely ought to be able to read the reprinted text of the bill, which is, after all, the bill they are proposing to amend. They should have some time to study and prepare their amendments.

If I am not mistaken, the reasoning of the Chair has always been not necessarily a definitive interpretation against this right of the government to proceed in this way, but rather an indication that, because of the extraordinary circumstances, if the government does feel it has to rely on the technical interpretation to do this, it ought in some way to reach out and make an accommodation with members who wish to file report stage amendments. It would certainly be expected that the House would give its consent to any alternate arrangements to make that a little more sensible. I certainly hope that that can be done. If there is any way that the Chair can co-operate with that, we certainly will.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

SUPREMACY OF STATUTE OVER OTHER FEDERAL LINGUISTIC PROVISIONS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-465 an Act to amend the Official Languages Act (supremacy of the Act).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, this bill aims at emphasizing the compulsory nature of the Official Languages Act and its preponderance over all other language provisions contained in other acts and regulations of parliament and the Canadian government, as recommended by the Commissioner of Official Languages in his annual report for 1978.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—COMMODITY TAX REVIEW GROUP REPORT—REQUESTED REFERENCE OF REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the course of the House business yesterday, a matter was raised with regard to the commodity tax review and the reference of that matter to a standing committee of the House.

As the parliamentary secretary knows, I raised this matter on a number of occasions during regular House business discussions. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has raised it. Indeed, the importance of it has been raised as part of the process in the question period. Yesterday this matter was put down so that it is now a government motion. It is an exceedingly important motion.

In his comments yesterday to the hon. member for York-Simcoe the government House leader indicated that it would be inappropriate for that to be done since the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs had a full plate and could not deal with the matter. We indicate our anxiety that this be done to the point that we are prepared to agree that, if that reference is made today, that reference could go without debate. Because it is extremely important that the matter get to the committee.

If the government needs any suggestions with regard to how it might be dealt with by the committee, I remind the parliamentary secretary that the miscellaneous estimates committee, for exactly the same reason, namely burden of work, split itself into subcommittees to deal with a specific matter. I suggest that is not beyond the ken of the finance committee.

I would ask, request, plead, that the commodity tax review report be sent to standing committee. It is important to a whole host of industries and people in this country. People have been crying for that review. The government had indicated in a document that it is being reviewed by a standing committee when we all know it is not being reviewed. I give an undertaking on behalf of this party that if it is sent to the standing committee, we will not debate the motion. If it can be called today, it will go without debate.

The government has some responsibility in this, not merely to be at the behest of the standing committee, but to direct that this matter go to the standing committee and that it be dealt with there. The standing committee is a servant of this House. I give that undertaking now publicly to the parliamentary secretary because it is important we get on with this work and not stall any longer.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): The representations made today by the hon. member are quite similar to those he made yesterday and about which he received an excellent reply from the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister. In any case, I shall take note of these representations and advise the House leader in good time. The hon. member suggested that perhaps we could agree to refer this matter to the committee tomorrow, which is, of course, a mistake on my part since we shall not be here tomorrow, but at the beginning of next week, the Deputy Prime Minister will definitely be able to come back to this matter and discuss it with the hon. member.

I would simply like to draw the attention of the hon. member once more to the fact that the matter now before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs is most serious since it also concerns the Bank Act, and the committee has a lot of work to do. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that the report mentioned by the hon. member does not specify that the subject matter must be referred to the committee. On the contrary, this report suggests that such referral will be considered once the subject has been brought to the attention of the committee.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I shall take note of these representations and early next week we shall probably be able on our side to reply further to the hon. member on this important matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS

Question No. 396—Mr. Masniuk:

What are the names of the individuals who joined the Department of External Affairs as Foreign Service Officers (FSO) during the year 1968?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the reply is as follows:

B.I.M. Applebaum	W.G. Licari
S. April	T.P.J. Lonergan
R.D. Auger	I.W. McLean
A.P. Bissonnet	G.L. Ohlsen
A.G. Bolduc	D.P. Richards
J.P. Carrier	J.M. Robinson
A.L. Després	G.J. Sleeth
J.R.W. Fieldhouse	G.J. Smith
L.E. Green	P.J. Thibault
I.M. Hall	L.J. Villeneuve
H.G. Korn	D.E. Waterfall

NAWAPA

Question No. 424—Mr. Brisco:

1. Was NAWAPA referred to the International Joint Commission for their study or review and, if so, what were the decisions or conclusions reached by the Commission?

2. Has the cabinet or any past or present Minister been asked by any provincial or other authority to consider or comment on the NAWAPA proposal and, if so, what were their views or opinions?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. No.

2. External Affairs records show that in 1965 the Honourable R.G. Williston, British Columbia Minister of Lands, Forests and Water Resources, wrote the Hon. Paul Martin, Secretary of State for External Affairs, to express his province's strong opposition to the NAWAPA proposal. Mr. Martin took note of British Columbia's stand, but reserved his own position on the proposal, which preliminary federal study had shown to offer no benefits to Canada that could not be derived from a more limited development primarily in Canada. The Hon. Judy LaMarsh, Secretary of State, said in the House of Commons on April 3, 1967, "The NAWAPA, Grand Canal and other suggested schemes diverting water to the United States are based on the as yet unestablished assumptions that there is an economic demand for Canadian water in the United States, that Canada has a surplus, over and above its own requirements, with which it might supply this demand, or part of it, and that it would be in Canada's national interest to export water to the United States." Since then, the NAWAPA scheme has not been raised as an issue and is not an active subject within the federal government at this time.

CMHC—LAWYERS RETAINED IN VICTORIA

Question No. 500—Mr. McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria who performed services for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation during 1977 and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: CMHC retained the lawyers listed below to handle mortgage documentation for loans approved in the Metropolitan Victoria area in 1977:

Name	Location
Cecil O. D. Branson	Victoria
R. B. Hutchison	Victoria
Michael J. O'Connor	Victoria
T. P. O'Grady, Q.C.	Victoria
Ian H. Stewart	Victoria

Legal fees in connection with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation direct loans are paid by the borrower and CMHC, therefore, has no record of the amounts paid to these lawyers.

The following lawyers were retained to handle legal actions for 1977 in the Metropolitan Victoria area:

Name	Location	Legal Costs and Fees
Ray, Wolfe, Connell, Lightbody and Reynolds	Vancouver	nil
Cox, Taylor and Company	Victoria	nil

Where actions are settled prior to trial, the costs are paid by the borrower and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has no records of the amounts.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—BANFF

Question No. 906—Mr. Bawden:

Has consideration been given to adding maintenance and sanding equipment to ensure the safest possible conditions on the Trans-Canada Highway between the east Banff Gate, the Town of Banff, the Sunshine turn off and Lake Louise?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): At present maintenance operations (including sanding) on the Trans-Canada Highway in Banff National Park are provided on the basis of 12 hours per day, seven days per week with call outs on off hours as required. Adequate equipment is available for this operation.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—VIBRATION AND SHOCK TESTING

Question No. 1,021—Mr. Huntington:

1. What are the names of the companies, their addresses and amounts of each bid on Department of Supply and Services Contract 09SD, 97701-7-46309 (8SD 77-09061), "Vibration and shock testing"?

2. Who was the successful contractor, and what was the amount of the bid?

3. Was the contract awarded to a Canadian bidder and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services):

1. Dayton T. Brown Inc.,

Church Street,

Bohemia,

Long Island, New York 11716

U.S.A.

This company submitted a bid in the amount of $9,625.00 U.S.

2. Same as above.

3. No. This company is the only known commercial laboratory in North America with capabilities and experience in testing external stores (SUU-20 MOD Bomb and Rocket Dispenser) to U.S. specifications.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—STATIC LOAD TESTING OF LAUNCHERS

Question No. 1,022—Mr. Huntington:

1. What are the names of the companies, their addresses and amounts of each bid on Department of Supply and Services Contract 09SD, 97701-7-46310 (8SD 77-09062), "Undertake static load testing of two LAU—5003/A launchers"?

2. Who was the successful contractor and what was the amount of the bid?

3. Was the contract awarded to a Canadian bidder and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services):

1. Dayton T. Brown Inc.,

Church Street,

Bohemia,

Long Island, New York 11716

U.S.A.

This Company submitted a bid in the amount of $4,545.00 U.S.

2. Same as above.

3. No. This company is the only known commercial laboratory in North America with capabilities and experience in testing external stores (LAU5003/A Rocket Launcher) to U.S. specifications.

Order Paper Questions

BUREAU OF INTERNATIONAL CULTURAL RELATIONS

Question No. 1,147—Mr. Jones:

1. What is the purpose of the creation of a Bureau of International Cultural Relations? Under whose auspices will this bureau be?

2. Will this Bureau be taking over responsibilities of any other programmes and if so, name them. What will the relationship of this Bureau and Canadian missions abroad be?

3. Who has been appointed to this Bureau and what are their qualifications? What will be their respective responsibilities?

4. Does the creation of this Bureau of International Cultural Relations represent any elimination of jobs from programmes which have been taken over and if so, how many? Does the creation of this Bureau of International Cultural Relations represent any reduction in the annual budget of the Department of External Affairs and if so, how much?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Bureau of International Cultural Relations in the Department of External Affairs was created as a distinct entity to reflect the increasing importance attached to projecting Canada's cultural image abroad in support of Canadian foreign policy objectives. As is the case for all bureaux in the department, the Bureau of International Cultural Relations reports through the Under-Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

2. The Bureau of International Cultural Relations is comprised of the academic relations division, cultural affairs division and historical division, all of which formerly formed part of the Bureau of Public Affairs. The new bureau will not be taking over the responsibilities of any other programs. Its relationship with Canadian missions abroad will continue to be one of close co-operation in promoting Canada's cultural image abroad.

3. Mr. Gilles Lefèbvre has been appointed to the new bureau. Formerly director of the Canadian Cultural Centre in Paris he studied music in Ottawa and Paris and gained an international reputation for his work with "Jeunesses musicales du Canada", which he founded in 1949, and the Orford Arts Centre which he also established. He has served five terms as president of the "Fédération internationale des jeunesses musicales" (36 countries are members) and was president of the Canadian Conference of the Arts from 1970 to 1972. His responsibilities will be those of director general of the bureau.

4. No programs were abolished. The creation of the new Bureau of International Cultural Relations does not represent any reduction in the annual budget of the Department of External Affairs.

Point of Order—Mr. Pinard

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PINARD—BILL C-29—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, last night at the time of the adjournment debate I rose on a point of order about the business of the House for today and I referred at that time to the consent of the representatives of all parties on Bill C-29. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, it was agreed previously in the House to end the second reading stage on this bill.

The motion is to be introduced in the House today and there is agreement among parties, and that was recognized last night, as reported in Hansard, for the motion to be amended so as to provide that the bill in question now be considered in committee of the whole rather than in a standing committee. There is agreement for that to take place without a vote; there is also agreement, Mr. Speaker, on all the amendments that will be brought in during consideration of the bill in committee of the whole and subsequent stages, and there is also agreement, of course, to have the bill put through all stages without a vote. So I would like it to be made an order of the House that, in short, we would proceed today by unanimous consent with the consideration of Bill C-29 in committee of the whole, and there is agreement for that bill to go through all stages without a vote as the representatives of the parties are fully agreed on the amendments that could be made to the bill.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is quite agreeable to us. I think the House should commend the work which has been done by all the party representatives to bring some finality to this legislation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I join in that word of commendation. As to the proposal that we should go into committee of the whole, I argued for this last night and I have not changed my mind.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The House is, of course, under an order with respect to the second reading stage dated March 6, 1979. That order would have to be varied so as to accomplish the purpose now set out, that is, reference to the committee of the whole House. The House had given its consent to such a course and it is with the consent of the House that an amendment is made to the second reading motion so that the bill may now be referred to the committee of the whole. Hon. members will deal in committee of the whole with the amendments of which the Chair now has notice.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt that course?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-29, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, it is customary to hear from the minister on clause 1. We know he is conciliatory and that he is such a reasonable minister today, so we would like to hear from this new minister.

Mr. Ouellet: At the beginning of the discussion on clause 1 I should like to say I very much appreciate the co-operation which has been extended to me by the housing critic for the official opposition, by the housing critic for the New Democratic Party and by the hon. member for Bellechasse. Along with a few other members of parliament and research assistants to the Conservative caucus, they worked yesterday and the day before to deal with some possible amendments to this bill and I am happy to say that the input which has been made by both sides will, in my view, have the effect of improving the measure. I believe an amendment will be forthcoming to clause 1 and that we are ready to accept it.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move an amendment to clause 1, but before I do so I would thank the minister for the remarks he has just made.

Nevertheless, I feel it is important to put certain observations on record. A year ago last February, I think it was, the minister met with the provinces and outlined changes he thought should take place in the National Housing Act. Hon. members will recall that last April there was a scare, or mini-scare, about an election. At that point certain pronouncements were made. We waited to see what would happen; we hoped legislation would be brought before the House. I think it was last November or December that we heard there were to be changes. Again we waited. It was only two weeks ago that the House began serious consideration of this important bill on second reading.

History has shown that when we go through the proper procedures with respect to a bill we usually get a good piece of legislation. I must say I feel very sad we are not able to consider this measure in the standing committee following second reading. I do not like to be negative after all the good times we have had in the last two days, but there are three things which concern our side very greatly.

Housing has not been a priority of this government or this situation would not have arisen. I refer to the fact that we are suddenly obliged to forgo committee meetings on this important subject. We on our side wanted these committee meetings very much.

Mr. Chairman, there are three things we wanted to discuss. We wanted to discuss this whole graduated mortgage payments system. We think this is a departure from what we would have done.

● (1240)

We had hoped that in committee we could have studied AHOP, which was a good program. We felt that some things should have been studied so that we could find out why there has been a high default rate recently. I feel very sad that we could not bring in witnesses and that we could not have the time to find out what happened to AHOP.

We had hoped to study the good parts and the weak parts of the program in relation to this new program. Even yesterday all members of the House received a booklet put out by the ministry with respect to the graduated mortgage payment, as if it already was approved. We have not even had time to discuss it. I am new in this area, but I come from a management background and the most important thing about putting out a new product is that it be test-marketed. Products should be evaluated. There should not be mass distribution of something until it has been analysed.

I am worried because we did not spend some time after second reading having proper committee meetings. There are some very fine experts we on this side wanted to bring in. I would have liked to have heard about the graduated mortgage payment from all those people who would have been affected. I would have liked to study that, but we had only two days discussion of it and now we are in committee of the whole. I do not think that is right. I recognize that the minister has politics on his mind, and I understand that. I have had politics on my mind this week too, but I say that the graduated mortgage payment really should have been studied.

We on this side have a few amendments to move. My amendment is about housing projects, and part of my amendment reads as follows:

—"housing project" means a project consisting of one or more houses, one or more multiple-family dwellings, housing acommodation of the hostel or dormitory type, two or more condominium units or any combination thereof, together with any public space, recreational facilities, commercial space and other buildings appropriate to the project, but does not include a hotel;—

I think this has been a very sad part of the history of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the last few years. We had hoped to talk with the minister and his officials in committee about bringing in the Auditor General to look at what really happened in this hotel area. We on this side happen to feel that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has had a very fine and admirable reputation over the years.

We are concerned about articles in the newspapers and other things which suggest that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not been what it was in the past, and there are several areas we had hoped the minister would agree to look into with us.

I feel that I should put these matters on the record now because I had hoped to ask for a report and an investigation into all hotels and large projects. I had hoped that we could have had a full discussion with the minister and perhaps the Auditor General about the policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with regard to the disposal of assets. I do not think people realize the extent of the rental holdings of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with respect to a project called Cloverdale in the province of Quebec. We feel that it is very important that CMHC be removed from this now. It is not in the business of being a landlord, but how can CMHC dispose of these assets? Who does the appraisals?

I have had some rather horrendous experiences recently with respect to appraisals when dealing with the National Capital Commission, and I feel that this is a matter which should be investigated. Who does the appraisals? Is the Appraisal Institute of Canada the right one to use? The Appraisal Institute of Canada has had a checkered history.

I think there should be an investigation of low rental projects. Are they really low rental projects? I would like to find out whether some of the stories I hear are true. I am not blaming CMHC, but if projects have been built under its jurisdiction, I want to know whether they are supervised afterwards and whether they are really low rental projects.

Another project which should be investigated is the project in Hamilton known as 150 Sanford. That one should be cleaned up and put to rest.

We should also talk to the minister—and the Auditor General should take a look at this—about the computer programs at CMHC. This matter should be investigated using the Auditor General's new assessment of value for money.

Before we get into the amendments, as spokesman on my side of the House I must say that I feel very badly that we did not have adequate time to go into these areas. For example, the hotel matter should be investigated, cleaned up and wiped away so that the reputation of CMHC can be retained.

My colleague, the hon. member for Selkirk, will be speaking about another amendment. One of our amendments deals with tragic AHOP cases regarding quality problems. One amendment which I think we worked out with the minister has to do with warranties. I understand that the minister will be speaking about this and about what we can do to rectify some of the serious mistakes of the past. We want to see that consumers perceive CMHC as what it is, a lending agency and an insurer of loans. CMHC is not necessarily in the building inspection business.

I think my time is almost up. When the NHA changes came before the House, we felt we should have adequate time to talk about the future of urban planning in this nation. We recognize that the ministry has to cease. It has not met its mandate, it has failed; but we still believe it absolutely essential that we have long range plans, policies and strategies for urban living.

We know that in the coming years more and more people will be living in cities, and we must make certain that they are liveable cities. There have been some magnificent studies done in the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, but tragically they have not been converted into policies and strategies. We feel very strongly that we should have had time to go into this in committee. Cities are not planned quickly. There should be 50 and 100-year plans for cities. That is vital and important. Young as this nation is, we want to be certain that the cities of the future are planned properly.

We should have had time to study with the minister and his officials some of the sad stories regarding CMHC, and we should have had time to talk about the future role of CMHC. What should the future role of CMHC be? It has changed and evolved. Companies always change and evolve. We should have talked about CMHC. Should it continue to be a mortgage company which takes risks, or should it just be an insurer of other people who take risks? These things should have been discussed and planned. I feel sad that we did not have time to do that because shelter and the kinds of cities we live in are matters of vital importance to us on this side of the House. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move:

● (1250)

That Clause 1 of Bill C-29 be amended by striking out lines 4 and 5 on page 1, and substituting therefor the following:

1. Section 2 of the National Housing Act is amended by repealing the definition of housing project and substituting therefor the following: housing project means a project consisting of one or more houses, one or more multiple-family dwellings, housing accommodation of the hostel or dormitory type, two or more condominium units or any combination thereof, together with any public space, recreational facilities, commercial space, and other buildings appropriate to the project, but does not include a hotel;

1.1 Paragraphs 3(a) and 9(b) of the said act are repealed and the follow-

I will conclude my remarks by saying that when we come to clause by clause consideration of the bill, we will speak more on the amendment I have moved.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment of the hon. member.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, it has been said that nothing concentrates the mind of a man more than the prospect of hanging. I can say, with respect to this bill, that nothing has so concentrated the mind of the minister as the prospect of an election.

That being said, I want to join in the sugary part of these proceedings by saying that I appreciate the courtesy which has been offered to me and to people in my office as a result of the amendments which we intended to make and the efforts which the minister has made to have them incorporated in the bill.

[Mrs. Pigott.]

I do not want to make a lengthy speech because we have agreed to certain limitations with respect to time, but I do want to emphasize that we in this party lament the tendency on the part of the government to allow its housing policy to become an insurance policy. We lament the fact that the Department of Urban Affairs has been abolished and, as I said in the committee some three months ago, it seemed to us that at a time when more and more Canadians were being confronted with problems in urban areas it was the height of irresponsibility for the government to abandon that critical field.

That being said, we do not agree with the basic thrust of the policies of the government. We recognize the importance, in the face of the legislation that has been put forward, of attempting to be as constructive as possible. The efforts we have made have really been twofold. First of all, we have tried to provide for the possibility, at least, of land assembly programs being continued by our municipalities and provinces by allowing the federal government to guarantee certain loans. We regret the fact that the government has abandoned its land assembly grants program to municipalities. We know for a fact that this has affected the ability of many of our city governments to put an end to land speculation and to construct housing on their own.

The second major thrust of our amendments which we will be putting forward later in the day has to do with taking out the statutory monetary limitation that is currently in the bill on the community service grants program. We think, as a matter of principle, it is a mistake for the government to have limited the amount of money to $250 million. When you include the loan portion that is currently available under NIP grants, you find there is no comparison between the government's efforts made under the community service grants program and the efforts previously made under previous divergent programs.

The over-all impact of the community service grants program will be that fewer funds rather than more funds will be allocated, not only for improvement of neighbourhoods but also for the construction of sewage projects, and so on. Therefore, we have argued that the monetary limits should be taken out and made subject to a review which it will be possible for the government to carry on, one that other governments could carry on in the event that other people are sitting on that side of the House, which, it seems to me, provides for the kind of flexibility we need.

I do not think there is any need to make a long speech. We indicated our views at length on second reading and so has the Conservative party. We take issue with the Conservative party's basic position on housing and we also take issue with the Liberal party's position on housing. As we enter the election period, it is perhaps best to leave it to Canadians to decide whose policy makes the most sense.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Chairman, here we are on March 9, in the House of Commons in committee of the whole, with that great spirit of co-operation and agreement. Today we feel that the minister, my colleague from Ottawa-Carleton, my colleague from Broadview and I could go down to the United Nations and solve their problems and reach an agreement in that spirit of co-operation. That is the spirit in the House today, and it is reflected by the sunshine on this, the warmest and nicest day we have had here in Ottawa in four months.

However, there still remain sharp differences between the Liberal approach to housing and urban affairs, the approach of members in the P.C. party and certainly that of the NDP. But I want to point out to the minister and to hon. members here what we on this side are giving up, in this spirit of co-operation, to get this bill passed. We have agreed to do it, but I want hon. members to know what we are giving up.

We are giving up the chance in the standing committee of the House to question the minister regarding the fundamental shift of direct lending from CMHC and from the government to the private sector. We know that the government and CMHC will no longer be direct lenders, so there is a dramatic shift of responsibility from CMHC as the banker to the private sector; and we are giving up the chance to question the minister on the reason for this shift in the standing committee.

We are also giving up the chance to query the minister in committee on why the government has decided to wind down the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. We agree that it is a good idea, one that we on this side have advocated, but we are still giving up the chance of putting questions to the minister.

Last night before I dropped off to sleep I was doing some light reading of Hansard and went back to a speech given on October 22, 1970 in this very chamber by the then minister of state for urban affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who was he then?

Mr. Whiteway: He is now the super minister, the present President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. I was reading some of the comments he made when the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs was first created. Back in those days he was just a "clerk", a "reporter;" now he has come out of the telephone booth. He said at that time:

> Let me repeat the words I have just used—consult, co-operate, co-ordinate. These are meant to be neither soothing motherhood words nor words to gloss over any supposed lack of real intentions by this government. They are, in fact, precise indicators of how we will approach the problems posed by rapid urbanization in Canada at the federal level,

If I had time to read his speech I would show that his approach is like one who is found sniffing the thin air surrounding the metaphysical peaks of political intellectualism because he never deals with the centricity of the issue. It is a great speech.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and continue after lunch?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for Selkirk had the floor.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned for lunch at one o'clock I was quoting from the comments of the hon. member for Port Arthur as reported in Commons Debates for October 22, 1970. He was talking about the very first Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. Now that I have had some lunch, I return strengthened, encouraged and ready to quote again from this very eloquent speech. The speech was made approximately nine years ago, and it outlined the reasons why the then government was setting up the new Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. Of course, we have the same government today. It is long in the tooth, worn and weary, running down and will soon run out. But nine years ago it was a reasonably new government which was ready to work.

I should like to quote one other sentence from that speech in order to provide the committee with some idea of the hopes and dreams of the government at that time. At page 467 of Hansard the speech reads as follows:

> We will hope to attract the best minds now diffused through governments, industries and universities and to return them again to governments, universities and industry in a continuous and cross-fertilizing stream.

That was a most noble objective, but I should like to deal with the crux, meat, essence and undergirding principle to establish the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. He went on to say:

● (1410)

> In addition to an urban secretariat, of course, the ministry shall have reporting to it, an increasingly co-ordinated into a more total urban effort, the Crown agencies, of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the National Capital Commission.

The minister then talked about setting up a senior inter-departmental committee to study, co-ordinate and to report annually to the minister. That committee was known as SIDCUA. The only problem with that committee was that it was not only made up of boys from the mail room but comprised of no less than deputy ministers of this government. These nine deputy ministers were to meet, co-ordinate, consult and determine whether or not the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs was doing his job of co-ordinating the activities that would touch the provinces and the municipalities in order to maintain the jurisdictional argument and the constitutionality of rights respecting the provinces.

Those deputy ministers were not just put there for window dressing. They were in fact the backbone of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. So back in 1970 when this government introduced the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs they said that this most critical body of deputy ministers from some nine departments will make sure that this ministry is a co-ordinating ministry.

Let us look at the record. This committee made only one report in nine years. It was the first and only report. Now we have the minister and his government coming before the Canadian people and saying, "we want to wind down the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. It isn't working, we're stepping on the toes of the provinces, we're interfering with the municipalities. We are so sorry; after nine years of interfering with the provinces we want out."

Mr. Rae: They only took your advice.

Mr. Whiteway: Well, now, we have heard from my friend on the left who says that the government has taken our advice.

Mrs. Pigott: Like Saskatchewan took our advice on mortgage interest deductibility.

Mr. Whiteway: If I thought that this government would take my advice so readily, I would give them a list, and we would not only clean up the bill, we would clean up the government. If this government wishes to take my advice and the advice of most Canadians, it is that the Prime Minister ought to have more than lunch with the Governor General and that he should, indeed, ask for a writ so that the Canadian people can review the activities of this government which has been around here for some ten years. Nine of those ten years have been too long.

This government, Mr. Chairman, created the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. The ministry was to be reviewed by SIDCUA. We now have them coming back and saying that it did not work. We on this side wanted the ministry of state wound down because it was not working, not because the terms of reference were not adequate, but because this government went beyond the terms of reference. This government began to do things which were constitutionally within the bounds of the provinces.

As a matter of fact, the last task force of the western premiers, in a document known as "The Western Premiers' Task Force on Constitutional Trends", at page 31 says:

—in the broad area of housing, consultation was non-existent.

The four western premiers were saying that in fact the very duty of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs was non-existent. It is no wonder that we on this side say that the whole ministry of urban affairs should be wound down because housing is a provincial jurisdiction.

This, however, does not mean that the federal government does not have a role in housing. It does not mean that the federal government cannot co-operate with the provinces. The problem is that this government cannot co-operate with anybody. They cannot consult with anybody. Their concept of consultation is ratification. I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, how much they consult. This little booklet which I have will prove and illustrate the difference between consultation and ratification.

The historic role of parliament has been that the government proposes legislation, and I give them that right. They have the right to govern because they have the majority, for the time being at least. They have the right to set the fiscal and monetary policy regardless of the mess they have made of it. That is their right and I give it to them. They have the right to set foreign affairs policy and housing policy, and I give it to them.

Our right in this House as the opposition is to oppose and to suggest from time to time alternatives that will help make legislation bearable for Canadians. The proof of this is illustrated in the number of amendments which we on this side have introduced on Bill C-29 which have been accepted by this government. This proves that we on this side are ready at the drop of a hat to help write legislation which will work. We on this side have the absolute right to oppose.

Another historic right of parliament is to debate proposals by the government before they are put into effect. I had delivered to my office down there in the "bush", in the Confederation building—but the post office was able to find me—a booklet that has printed on the back of it "NHA 522" and printed in the ninth month of 1978. This booklet is about graduated payment mortgages, "another way to home ownership". It was printed by the hundreds and thousands, and it says so right here. The cover letter says that over 100,000 copies of this booklet are available. All one has to do, Mr. Chairman, is fill out this card on the back; it is perforated and you tear it off and send it to CMHC; then they will send you this booklet outlining the graduated payment mortgage, the GPM.

However, the GPM is not law yet. It has not been passed. We have not given our consent. The difference is that this government comes to parliament for ratification when historically it should come to parliament for debate and approval of legislation. This government is so quick off the mark that they print 100,000 of these booklets. Just the day before yesterday the minister was prepared to scrap the GPM. It was only through amendments from this side that it was cleaned up. We did not want to see it scrapped, we wanted to make it workable. We introduced amendments which were accepted by the government and we would have saved the GPM and, in turn, the Canadian taxpayers the cost of printing 100,000 of these booklets before parliament had a chance to debate the question and help the government clean up the mess.

Mr. McGrath: Maybe they are already printed.

Mr. Whiteway: They are, 100,000 of them.

An hon. Member: At what cost?

Mr. Whiteway: At what cost? This government is not concerned with cost. What we on this side are forgoing is the chance to have this bill go to a standing committee where it would be investigated and where witnesses would be called from across the country, from, for example, the banking institutions and the credit unions, to give us their expert advice which is available to all Canadians. But because we want to accommodate the minister and this government in getting this bill through, we have agreed to send the bill to committee of the whole. However, we will have questions from time to time this afternoon.

I have a whole list of things that I want to bring up this afternoon as we go along. I have one question which the minister may want to respond to, before I sit down after my first 20 minutes of the opening salvo here, with regard to clause 1. The question is with respect to Cloverdale. Would the minister tell the House whether or not the $180,000, which is the 5 per cent deposit made by Grado Development Corporation in the bid for Cloverdale on December 1 when that corporation was not able to finance the purchase of Cloverdale, was retained by CMHC and, if not, was all of it refunded or was part of it refunded?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, the cheque was kept by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for reimbursement of its expenses.

[English]

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I do not have the evangelical zeal of my hon. friend and colleague who just finished speaking. I wonder if I might bring to the attention of the minister and the officials with him today a problem that ties in with this particular clause.

In the city of Belleville there are a number of low rental and senior citizen housing buildings supported by CMHC. Within the last two years a young man with a great deal of foresight has put forward an exciting plan for a senior citizens' housing building adjacent to the river and facing on the main street of Belleville. It is right across from three movie theatres and next to excellent shopping. It is a building where senior citizens could be very happy, and unlike some of those on the outskirts, it would enable them to be very active in the community. Day after day they could walk on the main street, meet friends, go shopping and take part in the cultural activities in the city.

Even though the developer has the environmental studies completed for the city, has the zoning completed, has the permit approval ready, the feasibility study and the affordability study all finished—all of these things which were set out by CMHC—none the less CMHC have failed to give approval for this development. They keep asking more questions. The developer has a lender in place who is ready, willing and indeed anxious to participate in this very exciting and worth-while project. He also has a contractor of some proven ability in this form of construction in place. Everything is ready to go, yet CMHC still does not want to give approval. When questioned they said there is a 9 per cent vacancy rate, but they did not say that was in another city 50 miles away. Even when questioned on that argument, it was found that the vacancy rate in downtown Kingston, which was the city they chose as a model, was only 1 per cent. The vacancy rate in downtown Belleville is less than that. There are very few apartments for senior citizens in the downtown area.

We have an exciting, imaginative program ready to go ahead. We have a developer who wants to put up 185 units, 135 of which have already been requested by individuals. Still CMHC will not give approval.

I have heard this kind of criticism before, Mr. Chairman. I wonder what there is about CMHC that it tends to delay when the horror stories that the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton have spelled out today are so readily approved? Everything is in place for this project but still CMHC does not want to give approval.

I shall deal with other questions later, Mr. Chairman, but I wonder if the minister and his officials could tell me why Mr. John Halloran of Halloran Real Estate, with his exciting proposal for main street Belleville, Ontario, cannot get approval.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I shall look at this matter and try to arrive at a speedy conclusion of it.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, I want to outline a few things that the minister is going to have to answer satisfactorily before this bill completes passage through committee of the whole House. I want to congratulate him on having it brought before the committee of the whole House. This gives us an unlimited opportunity to spend the time that needs to be spent on going into some of the details that need to be gone into in connection with the minister's handling of CMHC.

I hope the minister has read my remarks of a day or two ago. I have them here to read again in case he has not.

Mr. Rae: Don't you have them on tablets?

Mr. Crosbie: I spoke during debate on second reading on March 6. The minister was not here for my few remarks. I hope he has read my speech, because if he has not I will have to repeat it any number of times during the coming weeks. I assume that the minister has read my remarks, so that I can abbreviate.

Mr. Ouellet: Page 3882 of Hansard. I have it here.

Mr. Crosbie: It is wonderful how a minister's mind becomes clarified when we get into committee of the whole. It is wonderful how nice ministers become, how reasonable, how agreeable. I am glad to see the minister in that mood.

There is one item I should like to find out about. I know the minister cannot answer right now because it would be too small a matter to have come to his attention. At Come-By-Chance in the province of Newfoundland where there is a refinery that has not operated for three years there is a subdivision of houses formerly occupied by employees of Newfoundland Refining. It was financed through mortgages provided through Nova Scotia Savings and Loan Company and insured CMHC. When the refinery closed down and payments were no longer being made, they foreclosed, of course, on the mortgages and took ownership of the houses, and claimed against CMHC and the mortgage insurance fund. CMHC is now the owner of those properties on behalf of the mortgage insurance fund.

I should like to find out what the position of CMHC is on these units. Are they now attempting to sell them or are they going to hold them for the possible reopening of the Come-By-Chance oil refinery? Have they met with the Come-By-Chance town council to discuss what should be done with these units? They were making an evaluation of the units and attempting to fix prices based on market value during the summer of 1978. Have they completed that and, if so, what do they think the proper market value is? In other words, just what do they plan to do with those houses that, unfortunately, they had to take over under their insurance scheme? I should like to find out at some point as we go through this bill.

I have another problem, Mr. Chairman, that I spoke about the other evening. That is the problem in Kilbride in the district of St. John's West where some mistakes occurred through the administration by CMHC of an AHOP project there. I am not sure yet how many people are affected—perhaps 150.

To summarize the matter, in January all these people got notice that they were going to have an increased monthly mortgage payment. In some cases it was up to $80 per month. It was said the reason was that the municipal taxes had increased, or that it was to collect municipal taxes that had not been collected by CMHC in the previous two of three years. The increased monthly payments are to commence on April 1 and CMHC has said they will collect the arrears of taxes in 1979.

In some cases, Mr. Chairman, people had been told a few months earlier that they were in credit. In one case the monthly payments for municipal taxes were reduced to zero or to 50 cents per month, I think. That particular person has been told the monthly payments are to be increased to $40 or $50 per month because there are supposed to be arrears. Naturally the people who got these notices were shocked and stunned. They had never heard of any arrears of municipal taxes. They are objecting and meetings have been arranged so that CMHC can go into each individual case.

There was no tax increase in the last three years in the St. John's metropolitan area and there was no increase in tax assessments. CMHC had considered that taxes were going to be between $96 and $120 per year originally, but when the actual tax bills were sent out they were more than that. For some reason CMHC neglected to inform the mortgagors. They neglected to increase the mortgage payments for municipal taxes, then allowed the arrears to build up over two or three years which they paid themselves. They now want to collect the arrears from the mortgagors. They want to collect the interest on the arrears, and they want to do this all in nine months commencing April 1.

● (1430)

Mr. Chairman, that is not acceptable. These are low income people, working class people or lower middle income people who cannot afford to pay vastly increased monthly payments.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

CMHC is aware of the situation in St. John's. We have been talking to them, but they need direction from the minister, as I said in that speech.

Without going on too long about that, I would like to know what the minister can do. First I hope he will direct that they will not collect arrears of interest on municipal taxes which the mortgagors know nothing about. They were not informed about this matter and it is not their fault. There should be no collection of arrears. Depending on the individual case, people should have longer that 12 months to pay the arrears, once the arrears are shown to exist. There should be no attempt to collect arrears of interest caused by CMHC making late payments of municipal taxes to the St. John's metropolitan area board.

Apparently CMHC were charged interest by the St. John's metropolitan area board because they did not pay the taxes themselves on time, and they were in turn trying to collect that from these mortgagors. It may be something to do with the computers. Anyway, it was some fault in the administrative system of CMHC, and as a result this happened.

This situation is the responsibility of CMHC, and I cannot see how these people can be expected to start paying on April 1. It will take two or three months to straighten this matter out. CMHC should be directed not to start collecting their increased monthly payments until at least June 1 or until this matter has been straightened out with these very irate home owners.

It was not drawn to my attention until all this happened that many of the homes occupied by these AHOP home owners—once again built by a contractor through CMHC, inspected by CMHC and all the rest of it, and then sold to these poor innocents—are defective. They have had a lot of trouble with them. They are in poor repair already although they have only been built in the last two or three years. The workmanship is atrocious. The roofs leak. There is condensation inside and outside the walls. I am told that they have things growing literally on the walls of their houses. I do not know what kinds of things. There is water everywhere.

An hon. Member: Fungus.

Mr. Crosbie: There is some evidence of NDP fungus.

Mr. Rae: A healthy development.

Mr. Crosbie: I am afraid not. It will require the absolute excavation of these structures if that turns out to be true. If there is an NDP infiltration in these homes, it has to be stamped out.

Mr. Rae: That is the only way you will beat us in St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: I managed to keep the rot from spreading there in 1976 and I hope to keep the rot from spreading again this year.

Quite seriously, there is a lot of dissatisfaction with the condition of these homes. They are not as bad as the homes in the area which the hon. member for St. John's East is complaining about, and rightly so.

Might I make a suggestion to the minister, Mr. Chairman. One of the things that CMHC and the minister has stated to my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, is that they cannot do anything. In my friend's case this gentleman incorporated a company to do the project. The project is now finished. There are no assets left in the company. The people in the development have been left with inferior homes. These homes are in Virginia Park in St. John's East. There is not much good these people suing the company which built the homes because the company is now only a shell. This well-known contractor in St. John's has now moved on to other projects. CMHC say, "Well, you can only follow your legal remedies." The legal remedies in this case are not much good to you. What is the good of suing a company with no assets?

Apart from the question whether CMHC should be held responsible, which I am sure my learned friend and colleague will deal with again, this contractor is also accused of having bribed a CMHC inspector. The way to deal with him is quite simple. CMHC should advise that contractor that if he does not put those homes in good repair and does not correct the deficiencies, never again will he or any company in which he is a shareholder, or in which any of his family are shareholders, or anyone found to be representing him, receive any financial assistance for a building project from CMHC. That is the least that CMHC can do to put some pressure on the contractor.

A contractor should not be allowed to use CMHC financing facilities unless his main company, his principal company, his head company, his company that has assets, guarantees the job. In other words, Joe Smith, whose main company is Smith Construction Ltd., should not be allowed to incorporate XYZ Construction Ltd. to do a job, such as the Virginia Park job, does that job only, and then comes back to CMHC with another incorporated company, without assets, and does a further job, and so on. In my opinion, in every case his main company should have to guarantee the work he has done to CMHC and to the purchasers of those homes. He should not be allowed to use the legal device.

The ordinary home buyer is an innocent party who will probably only buy a home once in his lifetime. People do not know what to look out for. When you talk about an AHOP unit, they are the lower income people who probably do not want to pay lawyers' fees or they think the CMHC lawyer is acting for them. But he is not acting for them unless they agree to pay him the usual fairly substantial legal fee. In this case where the government is involved, the old principle of caveat emptor has to be forgotten. It is not a case of "let the buyer beware". In this case the government is involved and it has to help the purchaser be aware. It is the government's responsibility. They are financing these kinds of developments. If they are trying to help low income families get houses, it is the government's responsibility to hold them by the hand as they go into these projects. In this case it was the government's responsibility to assist them as they bought the houses. If it turned out they had a bad bargain, that they had been put upon as has happened in my friend's district, it is the government's responsibility to help them get out of that situation. It is not enough to say they will give them an increased loan to pay the thousands of dollars they have to pay to repair the monstrous conditions they are now experiencing.

I suggest that if CMHC investigates Kilbride and finds that there is poor workmanship, that people are having lots of problems there, CMHC should put pressure on the contractor in those developments. The contractor will not go back now with these individual complaints. The only way he will go back is if he gets extra legal pressure put on him. How can people who are barely able to cover their shelter costs because they are in an AHOP project hire lawyers to sue on their behalf if they need a few thousand dollars worth of repairs done? This is CMHC's program and it should help those who need help, but instead of helping them they have got them in over their heads. They have them tied to a mortgage which they have to repay and they are now leaving them to like it or lump it by themselves. That is not good enough. We are hoping that the minister will have some answers in this connection as this committee goes on.

I have another matter to bring up. I was not here this morning but I would like the minister to explain Mr. Hession's letter of January 3, 1979. The RRAP program has been very popular in Newfoundland particularly in my friend's district of St. John's East and in my district. It has been much used in the NIP areas there and in other areas. The people have been led by the minister to believe that RRAP is available now to them all. I used to write CMHC and ask them if they would include St. Mary's Bay as a RRAP designated area, Come-By-Chance and various other areas. Now it is universal, the minister says.

Mr. Hession's letter of January 3 to the minister certainly shows that that is not a correct statement. He said that the 1979 capital budget is $56 million and that $37 million has to be used in the existing designated areas where work has already begun. That leaves a further $3 million in areas already designated but where work has not started. That is $40 million. This leaves $16 million for new initiatives for the whole of 1979. He goes on to say that 68 areas have submitted final applications under the old rules. After this legislation is passed they can be designated by order in council and they have to have priority. They will require $7 million, which leaves $9 million to cover some 2,250 units. That is the universal amount.

• (1440)

As Mr. Hession says, this is a fairly modest amount and we should avoid raising expectations which we cannot satisfy. I say that the minister has roused expectations throughout this nation that he cannot satisfy, unless he is going to rise here this afternoon and say that he now has $600 million or $1 billion for this program.

We are not going to allow him to fool the people of Canada into thinking it is universal when according to his own president he has $9 million for the whole of Canada outside the present RRAP areas and he can do 2,250 units during 1979. The people from St. Mary's Bay are going to hear from me, as well as the people from Placentia Bay and the people of St. John's West. Anybody who can hear my voice over the media, or in fact across the nation, every householder from the tip of St. John's East—if the hon. member does not mind me referring to his district—to Vancouver Island, will hear from me that this is not a universal program.

This is a universal fraud, a universal attempt at deception. A statue should be raised to our housing critic, Lady Pigott, the member for Ottawa-Carleton who exposed this massive attempt at deception by giving the world the letter from Mr. Hession. We are going to send Mr. Hession's letter to every householder in this country once the election is called. At least, if we do not, we should. The threat of it alone will be enough to strike fear into the heart of the minister because he will have to explain to the people in our areas who want to get loans and grants to repair their homes why they cannot get them when the program is now universal.

Mr. Hession went on to say:

> You realize I am sure that neither the industry nor the municipal delivery system nor the present and projected RRAP budget permit the operation of a universal program in the specific sense that anyone, any day of the week can walk into a municipal office and be served.

He points out that he proposes a ten-year program to do 200,000 dwellings for those in the most serious need. He points out that two million could use the program. We have to go into that with the minister and try and get that straightened out.

I want the minister to explain to me all about his speech to HUDAC on February 9 of this year. I said the other night that the minister was a wizard of weasel wording. He was going to bring in a great new program. We heard the Prime Minister admit here this morning that they do not have a thing to tinkle in. They could not even tinkle in the pot, they were so tight for money, except for the $18 million that the "minister of amateur fitness and professional sport" is talking about for NHL teams.

This minister said in his speech to HUDAC that our proposal for mortgage interest deductions was unsatisfactory and Canada would be better served by a tax credit scheme so that the new advertising campaign could start. Where did the money come from, honey? All we know is it came from the government. Where does the government get the money, honey? The government gets the money from us, honey.

That is the most dishonest advertising program since Mr. Smallwood left the political scene. They have brought themselves finally to the Smallwood level. I never thought I would see the day when anybody could be lower in that regard than our former premier, but I have seen it now.

Mr. Corbin: You are doing pretty well yourself.

Mr. Crosbie: You get on your feet and we'll be delighted to hear you.

Mr. Corbin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member has invited me to get on my feet if I have anything to say. I simply said, in case he did not understand me, that he is doing pretty well himself to bring someone down to the Smallwood level. In fact, I think he has surpassed that level in depth.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Crosbie: I will pass on the good wishes of that Liberal member to Mr. Smallwood, who will probably get his tongue around him if he ever goes to Madawaska. I am going to ignore the interjection from the gnats and the mosquitos in the Liberal party. We are only interested in the horse flies and the horse dragons, not in the little buzzers, only the large ones.

The minister had this to say:

> To introduce any general program, however, that seeks to redistribute income for shelter purposes, requires a very substantial commitment of government funds. As a minister of the government in power, I do not have the advantage of being able to advocate prodigality on the one hand and retrenchment and restraint on the other.

I asked the other night why this minister is being discriminated against. Why is he the only minister of the government that is not allowed to promise more spending on one hand and less on the other? Every other minister does it. Why is he discriminated against? The minister went on to say:

> But I do believe that in the near future, as soon as our economy permits, we should adopt a shelter allowance system that will provide assistance to home owner and tenant alike, through payment of a tax credit for shelter expenditures exceeding a certain percentage of income.

Before this bill clears the House, the minister should tell the people of Canada when he is going to introduce that program. He should put a date on it. Can the minister tell us when the economy is going to permit his great new program? When is he going to be able to bring it in and what are the details?

What is the point of the minister saying there is going to be a program if the promise is that it is going to be brought in as soon as our economy permits? The minister knows that as long as his government is in power the economy is never going to permit the bringing in of such a program.

We are promising the people of Canada that mortgage interest and municipal tax deductibility will be brought in as soon as we are brought in. When the people of Canada bring us in, they are bringing that program in with us. The people of Canada have had this government for 15 years and it has not yet introduced this program to redistribute income for shelter purposes or a shelter allowance system. They have been here 15 or 16 years and now the minister says that some time in the future, as soon as the economy permits, he is going to bring it in.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may speak again after someone else has spoken.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, in the traditional spirit of co-operation that characterizes our Friday afternoon sittings, I am glad to see that the minister is in an unusually good and co-operative mood. He was, however, uncharacteristically brief and we had to prompt him to say a few opening words on clause 1 of the bill notwithstanding the practice that it is customary on clause 1, when we are in committee of the whole or in standing commmittee, for the minister to make a statement.

In that same co-operative spirit, the same born again spirit that I perceive in the minister—he sits there smiling at me—I still have hope the minister will address himself to some of the problems that we raised during second reading stage of the bill and which have been repeated here today on clause 1 of the bill by my colleagues.

I have a special interest because of the constituents I have the honour to represent in this House, those unfortunate people caught by a bureaucratic kind of stalemate with regard to the Virginia Park AHOP development. That case has been made in this House. It has been made outside the House by the solicitor for the AHOP home owners in Virginia Park. The minister has correspondence on it. I will not repeat all that I said on second reading. I am not going again to lay the whole horror story on the record because that would be taking advantage of the committee.

I am firm in my resolve that this matter has to be addressed. There has to be some indication from the minister before this debate ends that the government is going to live up to the responsibility that it assumed on behalf of these home owners when it agreed to extend financing under the National Housing Act and the assisted home ownership plan to the builder, who is now no longer in business because he conveniently put together a paper company for the purpose of building this sub-development.

The minister nods his head. I find that encouraging. I am not going to belabour the point. I take the minister at his word. He says he is going to tell us when we get to clause 3. Why cannot he tell us on clause 1?

● (1450)

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock has outlined the problems in his constituency in the Vancouver area. The hon. member for Hamilton has outlined similar problems in his own area. We could go within a mile of the minister's own constituency in Montreal and find AHOP projects where there are problems which seem to characterize AHOP programs all across the country. There has been a spirit of give and take evident in the last few days. I must admit I do not know who is taking; we can never be sure in that regard, and I do not say this unkindly but in reference to the hon. gentleman's sharpness as a politician.

It seems to me we have reached a productive arrangement as a result of which when the bill before us is on third reading it will in many respects be a vast improvement on that which we dealt with on second reading. But in the interests of making progress I hope the minister will state what are the intentions of the corporation with respect to the AHOP home owners in Virginia Park, in the constituency of my hon. friend from St. John's West, in the Hamilton area and in the Surrey area.

If he does not, then out of the sense of support that I feel for the people we represent I cannot promise we will make the kind of progress we would all like to see. After all, this is the only chance I have to make a case in this House on behalf of those unfortunate low income people who bought these houses with the guarantee of the corporation, knowing that they had the backing of the National Housing Act and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. So I invite the minister to tell the committee now what he is prepared to do about these home owners, not only in St. John's but elsewhere in the country.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, my remarks on clause 1 were very brief. I felt that because there were before us a series of amendments dealing with a number of points which have been presented by members of the opposition it would be more appropriate for me to address those points specifically as each of the amendments came before the committee. However, I respect the view expressed by the hon. member for St. John's East, who has invited me to address myself specifically to the difficult situation in which home owners in Virginia Park and certain other AHOP projects in various places in Canada find themselves.

One of the amendments presented later today will be introduced by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton. Under its terms, we would enshrine in the National Housing Act a clause which would provide that, in the case of a loan made to a builder for the purpose of house construction, the builder should provide the purchaser with a warranty under a warranty program approved by the corporation.

There is no doubt in our minds that in future no loans should be insured by CMHC unless the builder offers a warranty program to the purchaser. I want to remind hon. members that I have been advocating this for a long time. As a former minister for consumer and corporation affairs I made many speeches advocating such a program, so one of the first things I did when I was appointed minister responsible for urban affairs was to discuss with the National Association for Housing and Urban Development the desirability of setting up a warranty program. We presently have a national warranty program which is administered by each provincial association. In practice, though, CMHC no longer insures loans for building projects unless such projects carry a guarantee to the purchaser. I am glad to note that the hon. member wants to enshrine this practice in the National Housing Act. I support her initiative and hope the House will approve the amendment.

In relation to the case which has been put forward in the House in recent weeks by the hon. member for St. John's East on behalf of some of his constituents who have been very badly affected by the incidents in Virginia Park, I told him in the House that the tools at our disposition were very limited but that CMHC was acknowledging the difficulties these people were facing. I assured him we were ready to put up the cash money required to enable them to carry out the necessary repairs immediately but that CMHC had no authority to make grants to these people. There is no provision allowing CMHC to do this. But we are ready to make an advance to them, to re-open their AHOP files and give them an appropriate amount of money with which to pay for these necessary repairs, and to make appropriate arrangements with the individuals concerned for reimbursement to be spread out over as long a period as possible.

Also, there were certain grants attached to the old AHOP program. I know that in Virginia Park some of the residents have an income which is sufficiently low to allow them to benefit from such grants in relation to the offer made by CMHC. I would be quite willing to re-open each individual file in order to help them. The response by the hon. member at the time was that something more had to be done and that some specific adjustments had to be made for these people.

● (1500)

After consultations with the representatives of these people I would be prepared to appoint someone to act as a special adviser to CMHC and to these people, to make recommendations in order to solve the problem of these residents. I recognize the difficulties which are inherent in these actions. At the risk of going beyond the legal responsibility of CMHC I think we ought to take an affirmative step which would allow these people to receive some relief, but not under the legal umbrella. I understand that they have lawyers who have put their case before the court. Perhaps through the court they will receive a much more substantial remedy than they could expect at this moment, but I am ready and willing, without prejudice to their court claim, to appoint a special mediator or ombudsman to deal specifically with their case, to re-open their file and to try to accommodate them quickly so that the problems they have at the present time can be solved.

The errors of the past ought to be corrected, and the ideal way to do that is to make sure that no loan is insured by CMHC unless the builder guarantees the purchaser that there is a warranty plan to protect him.

The second thing I want to say is that indeed, as suggested by the hon. member for St. John's West, I am ready to develop guidelines within the CMHC for dealing in the future with the builders of these projects about which there are complaints. I want to assure the hon. member that we on this side of the House are no more happy—and we are probably as disappointed and disgusted as the hon. member—than the hon. member about some of these things which have taken place in the past. Indeed, we do not approve of the conduct of builders who create companies just for the purpose of financing one project, after which those companies immediately disappear. They escape any liability or responsibility. I am ready to say to the hon. member for St. John's West that we will develop guidelines to make sure that CMHC will not in future do business with those companies which have bad records.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of questions I would like to put to the minister. I am especially interested in the community services program proposal in this legislation. It was announced last May, and a number of municipalities in my constituency have been especially concerned about when these funds will actually be made available. Some of them applied for funding for projects under the four programs which where amalgamated into the community services program. I understand that about $51 million is available for the province of Ontario in the first year, and larger amounts in subsequent years. That would be out of $150 million the first year and $250 million the second year for the whole country. I would like to know how soon this agreement with the province of Ontario will be implemented.

I am thinking especially of communities like Sault Ste. Marie, where a large sewage treatment facility and water mains are to be installed. There is also a neighbourhood improvement project to be developed. I am thinking also of communities like Little Current, which is putting in a sewer and water system. It applied for funding last year. The project did not get under way in 1978, so the community is waiting to know how soon that funding will be committed so that it can go ahead with tendering on the project. There has been approval from the province of Ontario, but funds under this program have not actually been identified.

I am also thinking of the community of Elliot Lake, which is growing very rapidly. There are some 15,000 people there now, and the community will grow to over 30,000 in the next four or five years. There is a very rapid expansion of infrastructures such as sewer and water. A community like that really has to know from where funding will be coming. Indeed, it will require all available assistance under the community services program, from the Ontario department of the environment, as well as assistance under a subsidiary agreement with DREE, because of the massive funding which will be necessary. That is one matter I wanted to put to the minister. How soon will agreement with the province of Ontario be reached? Time is marching on, and if contracts are to be let for construction this year, that has to be done very soon.

The second matter I want to raise with the minister is whether there can be some special assistance under the rental supplement program for communities like Elliot Lake which are growing very rapidly. In such communities mining companies subsidize the rents of their employees. For a new housing unit which would cost $55,000, $60,000 or $65,000, the rent would normally be about $400, but the mining company would charge only $200. That is fine for the employees of the mining company, but there are people who work in the service sector who do not have that kind of assistance, so it seems to me that there has to be some mechanism developed for communities which are expanding very rapidly. That mechanism should provide proper accommodation for people in the service sector. It seems to me that a rental supplement program is the only solution for medium and lower income families.

I am familiar with one problem regarding the rental supplement program which is carried out jointly with the Ontario government. If a project is developed by the private sector, I think normally only one quarter of the units can be eligible for this rental supplement, and I wonder if in fact there is enough leeway in this legislation, or in the National Housing Act, to allow for entire apartment blocks or housing complexes to be set up so that there would be this rental supplement but not restricted just to one quarter of the units. I would be very interested in knowing if the minister feels that that kind of assistance could be made available to Elliot Lake, where approximately 3,000 units will be developed over the next few years to accommodate expanding uranium production at that community.

I hope the minister will be able to respond to those two questions.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I will answer the questions raised by the hon. member very quickly. In the first place I would like to say that I have had preliminary discussions with representatives of the Ontario government. They have already submitted their documents for signature. We expect to sign an agreement with the government of Ontario dealing with the community services program. As soon as this bill is passed, we hope to have the signatures some time next week.

● (1510)

In relation to the second point raised by the hon. member, indeed, under section 44(1)(a) and 44(1)(b) of the National Housing Act we have an agreement with the government of Ontario to designate four supplementary subsidies when the province decides to designate these units. So rent supplements could be granted to specific projects that the hon. member has in mind. It would be up to the Ontario government to designate these units, and the federal government would then be willing to accept this and pay the rent supplement on a 50-50 basis with the Ontario government.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be seen to be intervening more than is reasonable and necessary, but I did not take up my time because I wanted the minister to reply to my invitation to him to respond to clause 1 to the grievances that I put forward on second reading on behalf of the people of Virginia Park. I want to say to the minister that I believe the proposal he has put forward is, under the circumstances, a reasonable one.

The people I have the honour to represent, the home owners in Virginia Park, are reasonable, decent, honest, hard working people, and they believe in the justice of their case, so much so that they, with great personal expense to themselves, engaged solicitors and consulting engineers because they believe their case is just and will stand in any court of justice or any tribunal. That is why I say to the minister that I welcome his suggestion to appoint an arbitrator, a mediator, or an ombudsman who would act independently between both parties, the CMHC on the one side and the Virginia Park home owners on the other. I know that that suggestion will be welcomed by these people.

This prompts me to make another suggestion, one which I have cleared with my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, who should be commended on the very forthright manner in which she has handled this bill, and indeed on the way she has addressed herself to the whole problem of the housing industry and the impact on the economy and the way it affects individual Canadians. This brings me to a suggestion which I would like to put to the minister. Most major corporations in the country today which deal with the public have a vice president or a senior executive who deals with consumer affairs or consumer relations, someone who handles specifically consumer complaints at an executive level. There is no such person within CMHC. I think the experience of the Virginia Park home owners demonstrates the need for such a senior officer within CMHC, a practice that has been widely and effectively used by most of the major corporations dealing with the public in commercial transactions.

I know I cannot put this forward as an amendment beause it carries with it a charge against the Treasury, and so the amendment would not be procedurally acceptable. I can only make it as a suggestion. I put it forward to the minister, safe in the knowledge that with his background as former minister of consumer and corporate affairs and with the way he has responded to the complaints we have raised in the House on behalf of my constituents, of Virginia Park home owners, and others as well, I know that this is a suggestion he will not treat lightly. I hope it is one which the corporation will accept and that, before long, we will have such an official appointed within CMHC.

Mr. Ouellet: I want to say that this is a very worthy suggestion, and indeed with my previous experience in consumer affairs I welcome the suggestion. I will be speaking with the chairman of the board of CMHC, with the recommendation that appropriate procedures be applied to have one of the vice presidents of CMHC pay particular attention to consumer matters.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, I want to make some comments in three areas. I restrained myself on second reading from making a speech, and now I will try to be brief in commenting on the three areas. I hope I will receive some answers from the minister in these areas.

The first one has to do with native housing. Some years ago the announcement was made that some 50,000 structures will be built for natives in, I believe, seven years. At the moment, a little over 7,000 have been built. When I look at the statistics on what is happening on reserves, I find that much still needs to be done. The statistics come from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and I will read a couple pertaining to a few of the provinces. We find that reserve Indian families needing homes in Ontario number 2,270 out of 7,000 families which still have no place in which to live. In Quebec, 1,182 families out of 4,353 families have no place to live. In the province of Alberta, 662 out of 2,821 families have no place to live. These families are living on reserves with their parents and brothers, or in rental accommodation together with a number of other families.

In the province of Alberta, the province with which I am most familiar, in the last couple of months—I am not sure exactly how many—some babies died from respiratory problems, and the Indian people in that area put the total blame for those deaths on inadequate housing. It was documented on television and in the newspapers that, in the mobile home where one of the babies died, three families, or 16 or 17 people, resided, a mobile home with the space for only one family or three or four people. At present they are documenting hundreds of more cases in northern Alberta living in similar conditions. The native people in the province consider housing to be the number one priority.

I am fortunate in my riding to have two reserves which have oil money available for their use, and the first area for which they have designated royalties from their oil is the building of homes on the reserves. But by far the greatest number of native people in Alberta are not as lucky and they require assistance in housing from the federal government, and the total responsibility should be on the federal government for giving assistance in housing to the native people.

Under RRAP, money can be made available for native housing, and not only on reserves, because this problem is now extending itself to the cities of this country as young people and families from the reserves are moving to the cities in an attempt to find jobs and get off the welfare rolls and off the unemployment insurance rolls. So we must look at the problem as not only a problem on the reserve but also as a problem in the cities of our nation.

Under this program as well, it is possible to provide assistance for the repair of homes. The statistics tell me—in the non-native community we would never put up with such a situation—that only 80 per cent of native houses have electricity, only 31 per cent have water and sewage facilities, only 30 per cent have indoor toilets, only 26 per cent have indoor baths, and less than a third have telephones. Surely we in the non-native community would not put up with such housing conditions, and I do not think that we, as Canadians, should accept that the native people have to live in that way either.

I see that under this program it is possible to make conversions and major repairs to dwellings, and I hope that the minister will say that certain funds will be set aside under this program for this purpose. Perhaps the minister could tell us how many more homes out of the 50,000 can be built in the next number of years, and whether some funds can be provided under RRAP for the repair of homes and the building of new homes. I would like to spend a lot of time on that, but I realize our time in committee is limited and I want to deal with another area. That other area is the CHIP insulation program.

When it was announced, people who owned older homes felt that the program would provide them with a method of reducing their fuel bills. According to an announcement, I believe some 900,000 dwellings were available for the program, that is, homes built before 1946. For some reason the program has failed. Approximately $65 million was set aside for the program, and it has not been spent. The statistics in Alberta indicate that there are 120,000 homes built prior to 1946 which are eligible for the program, and that only 2,200 grants have been given out in that province.

I had occasion to speak with the chap in charge of the program in Alberta. He indicated that because of the surplus of gas in that province, Albertans are not concerned about insulating their homes. I do not believe that. Anyone who can save on his heating bill will take advantage of it; it does not matter from which province he comes. I could cite similar statistics for other provinces, but I will deal only with my own.

For some reason the program was not put properly before Canadians. Possibly it was because the $350 grant was taxable and many people felt it was not worth going through the problems of receiving the grant. I understand that major recommendations have been approved within the department to change the program somehow. I have a letter from the Insulation Contractors Association of Ontario. I will not read it, but it indicates that changes must be made in order for the association to take advantage of the program and insulate thousands of homes within Ontario. They are looking forward to the changes which the minister is capable of announcing in the very near future. Perhaps he can make such an announcement today, or perhaps he can make it as soon as possible if such recommendations have been approved within his department. If not, I suggest a long look should be taken at this program.

Until one o'clock this morning I was in the energy committee which was dealing with the energy allocations bill. According to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, there is a crisis respecting the allocation of oil, particularly in eastern Canada. The best way to save on our energy requirements is by conservation. This program should be successful and should do Canadians a great deal of good, yet it is failing.

Earlier this year an announcement emanated from CMHC regarding the addition of solar panels in homes. I am not sure of the person's name who wrote an article dealing with this matter, but I believe he suggested that people who feel there is some future in putting solar panels in their homes can be compared to zealots. I simply cannot accept such a remark coming from people within CMHC. This is an area which the Canadian government must move into in order to provide renewable energy for Canadians who are willing to take the chance and put solar panels in their homes. The technology is there, but it requires CMHC assistance by allowing mortgages to be extended at least ten years to 15 years in order for home owners to pay off the costs of the installation of solar equipment in their homes. I hope the minister is looking at this and is in a position to give some answers respecting those three areas.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin I should like to indicate that the rural and native housing program started a few years ago. It has provided approximately 18,000 units out of the target of 50,000 units which we wanted to do over a course of five years to seven years. The reason why the start has been slow and that we have not produced a larger number of units is because we want to involve natives in the program. We want their input into the implementation of it. Of course we were ready to suffer some delay in the implementation of the program because we felt it would be useful for them to be part and parcel of such a program. Our average in production every year is now good, and we believe we will meet the target of 50,000 units.

In relation to the hon. member's second point, I agree the CHIP program perhaps did not receive the response we expected from the public at large. It is an important program, but we still have a job to do in convincing Canadians that they could be very active in the conservation of energy. One of the best ways for Canadians to be active is for them to insulate their homes and spend the necessary moneys to have well-insulated homes. Indeed it would be a wise investment because, in the long run, their heating bills will be reduced. In order to provide an extra incentive in that regard, we have put forward a program to give $350 to home owners in order for them to insulate their pre-1946 homes. Discussions are taking place perhaps to improve some aspects of the program. In relation to the dates, recommendations were made to the effect that now that the old stock has had a chance to benefit from the program, maybe more recent housing stock should be eligible as well. I am looking at this proposal, and I hope to reach a decision soon.

In relation to the hon. member's third point, I agree fully that it is an area to which we must give much more attention in the future, and I support his view on it.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed with clause by clause consideration, the minister suggested that he will appoint an ombudsman. I would like to have this clarified. Is that to look into just the situation in Virginia Park, or is he saying that he will have an ombudsman to look into these situations wherever and whenever they occur? I should like him to clarify that because it is important for Virginia Park. But there are other areas as well where there are these complaints. I would like to have that clarified.

Another area in which I would like to have some reaction from the minister is the situation in Kilbride. I wrote him only two or three days ago and he may not be in a position yet to indicate what he can do; but I would like some indication as to his frame of mind on that problem because the date is drawing quite close. I think this is March 9, or maybe it is March 10.

Mr. Rae: Don't look at me.

Mr. Crosbie: The NDP never know. It is no good looking at the NDP for an answer; they have no answers.

An hon. Member: It is March 9.

Mr. Crosbie: It is March 9.

Mr. Rae: It is 3.30 on Friday, March 9.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is a half hour later in Newfoundland.

● (1530)

Mr. Crosbie: It is an hour and a half later in Newfoundland. The first payment is called for on April 1. I would like the minister to give me some response to that problem of municipal taxes.

Another area, the NIP program, has been most valuable and well used in the area of St. John's East and St. John's West. It is to be replaced by the Community Services Grant Program. I would like the minister to say when he expects to enter into a program with the province of Newfoundland on the community services contribution program or whatever it is now called, CSGP, and what the funding is likely to be for that program during the present year. Is the funding at least as great as it was last year under the NIP program?

Another area is the CHIP program which my friend from Alberta mentioned. Let me tell the minister that two of the reasons that this program is not being used are that the grants are too small and that it is a discriminatory program. When the minister brought in that program he discriminated against householders in eight of the ten provinces in Canada. As he knows, if you live in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island you get a grant of $500 from the government to insulate your home and it is non-taxable, it is not added to your taxable income. There are other advantages.

I am not against Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island householders getting that, it is grand, but all householders across Canada, no matter where they live should get the same assistance, at least the $500 grant non-taxable, and not the $350 grant that is taxable which is now being offered. The householders in Quebec, Newfoundland, Alberta and New Brunswick have been discriminated against by that CHIP program. The minister says that he is carrying on discussions on that program and that they are considering the dates. In other words, they may bring the date up. You do not have to go back beyond 1921. There may be a house that was built before 1941 or 1950 and they are going to do something with the dates. That is all well and good, but just changing the dates will not matter if people are n applying because the program is not generous enough or because they are disgruntled because the grant is taxable in their province and not taxable in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

I would like the minister to indicate to the House how many of these grants have been made in Newfoundland, for example, as compared to Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island, and what are the per capita results? I do not have the figures here now, but I am sure that the program has been much more used per household or per capita in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island than in any of the other provinces. In other words, the program could be called somewhat successful in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, while it has been a flop in the rest of Canada, and proportionately they are receiving very much more.

If the minister does not have the figures this afternoon, could he provide them, as to what has been spent in each province under that program, the number of grants, and how Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island compare with the rest? If they compare more favourably, then obviously the thing to do to improve the use of that program is to extend the program to the other provinces in Canada as it is now in effect in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. If the minister could address himself for a few minutes to those points, I am quite willing to go on clause by clause, but I would like to get some answers there.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, in replying to the hon. member I would like to indicate that the proposition which I have submitted, and which has been accepted by the member for St. John's East, is in relation to the people of Virginia Park. Indeed, the program in that area could serve as an experimental project or as a pilot project, and the experience gained therefrom could probably serve in other projects of a similar nature in the future. I hope that the hon. member will appreciate the fact that I would prefer that we restrict the program to one project at this time.

In relation to the Kilbride situation, I notice that the hon. member raised his concern in his speech of March 6. I have asked my officials to report to me. The hon. member just mentioned that he wrote to me about this question. I can give him the assurance that I will come back to him next week with the full details of his question that we will try to help these people if, indeed, what he is conveying to me today, that no taxes have been paid for three years and now they are asked for a very substantial sum of money and that these people are really in no position to absorb these extra costs, is what is happening. We will look into the matter and try to find a more appropriate solution to their financial difficulties.

Thirdly, the hon. member raised the community services program and the agreement in relation to this program with Newfoundland. There has been an exchange of correspondence with the government of Newfoundland, and I can tell the hon. member that I am expecting a response to my last letter from the government of Newfoundland. I told them in a telex some of the answers to their queries, and I am awaiting a response from them. They have indicated to me that they will not sign the agreement until this legislation which we are studying here, Bill C-29, is passed. That is the position of the government of Newfoundland.

When this bill is passed and when the government of Newfoundland has signed this agreement, they will benefit in 1979 by receiving $4.2 million, and in 1980 by receiving $7 million for community services programs. Indeed, there will be consultation between the provincial authorities and municipalities to decide how this money will be spent with regard to neighbourhood improvements, municipal infrastructures, or any other municipal priority.

Finally, in relation to CHIP I will just repeat what I said in response to a previous intervention made by a colleague of the hon. member, that we have received a number of recommendations to improve the tenure of the CHIP program. I will add the recommendations of the hon. member to these. I can see from his intervention that he would like to see the CHIP program be of similar nature as the Home Improvement Program which exists in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. We are looking at this, and I will undertake to give to the hon. member next week the details of the program, how it would affect the people in Newfoundland and the people in Nova Scotia, as he has requested.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the minister, and it is similar to the one asked by the hon. member for St. John's West. It is with regard to the community services part of this particular bill. The minister's department and my office have exchanged considerable correspondence about the need for more flexibility especially as regards infrastructures, and particularly the older sewer systems in small municipalities. I am referring particularly to the municipality of York in Toronto.

Would the minister tell me when it would be possible for the municipality of York to take advantage of this community services program, particularly as regards infrastructure?

● (1540)

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, in response to the hon. member I can assure her that the list of eligible community services that could be used by the provincial government and by the municipalities in order to take advantage of the program will include planning and installation of sewage treatment trunk lines and plant, in new and existing areas, in order to be sure that we will not make this money available only for new areas but also to help in the repair and reconstruction of existing areas.

It will be up to the municipality concerned to raise this matter with the provincial authorities and make sure that when the allocation is done in the province of Ontario that the government of Ontario accepts such a program being done by the municipalities. I think that the program as it exists is wide enough to allow this to take place.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mrs. Pigott) agreed to.

Clause 1 as amended agreed to.

On clause 2—

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to this clause. I think the Chair has already the amendment in its possession as have hon. members of the opposition. I move:

That clause 2 of Bill C-29 be repealed by striking out lines 14 to 26 on page 1 and lines 1 and 2 on page 2 and substituting therefor the following:

"2(1) All that portion of paragraph 5(6)(b) of the said Act preceding subparagraph (i) thereof is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(b) in respect of a loan made to assist in the construction or purchase of a rental housing project or in the alteration of an existing residential structure to add one or more family housing units thereto,"

(2) Subsection 5(6) of the said Act is further amended by adding the word "and" at the end of subparagraph (b)(ii) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(c) in respect of a loan made to assist in the repair, rehabilitation, conversion or improvement of a rental housing project or in the conversion of an existing non-residential building into a housing project, a fee of seven-eighths of one percent of the amount of the loan." "

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I also have an amendment to clause 2. We have passed copies of this to the minister and to my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton. The subject matter deals with the question of the rights of public housing agencies to be allowed not to pay the insurance fees charged by CMHC. It provides substantial benefit not only to provinces but also to many municipal housing agencies which would otherwise have to pay substantial fees. I therefore move:

That clause 2 of Bill C-29 be further amended by adding thereto, immediately after subclause (2), the following subclause:

"(3) Section 5 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after subsection (6) thereof, the following subsection:

"(6.1) In the case of an approved loan

(a) made to or guaranteed by the government of a province,

(b) made to a public housing agency, or

(c) guaranteed by the government of Canada pursuant to any other Act, no insurance fee shall be charged, collected or remitted." "

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Rae) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 2 as amended agreed to.

On clause 3—1973-74, c. 18 s. 2(1).

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to subclause 3(1) of Bill C-29. The amendment you have before you had the words "repair, rehabilitation, conversion or improvement of an existing" home. The reason for the amendment is to make sure that a loan could be insured by CMHC not only for the purchase of a home but also for the repair, rehabilitation, and conversion of a home. I think it is an important step in having the private sector finance the repair and rehabilitation of existing homes. I, therefore, move:

That subclause 3(1) of Bill C-29 be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out line 8 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"purchase, repair, rehabilitation, conversion or improvement of an existing";

(b) by striking out line 15 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"loan secured by a mortgage on a house, rental housing project"; and

(c) by striking out lines 17 to 24 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"dominium unit, or

(v) for the purpose of assisting in the"

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, because of the previous amendment I made I should like to draw to the attention of the House that there are now certain subclauses in Bill C-29 that are no longer necessary. I should therefore like to move:

That subclause 3(2) of Bill C-29 at lines 32 to 41 on page 2 be deleted.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move:

That subclause 3(4) of Bill C-29 at lines 1 to 12 on page 3 be deleted.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That subclause 3(5) of Bill C-29 be amended by striking out line 23 on page 3, and substituting therefor the following:

"writing;"

(5.1) Subsection 6(1) of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after paragraph (i), the following paragraph:

"(i.1) in the case of a loan made to a builder for the purpose of assisting in the construction of a house, the builder provided the purchaser with a warranty under a warranty program approved by the Corporation;"

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mrs. Pigott) agreed to.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That subclause 3(6) of Bill C-29 be amended by striking out line 29 on page 3 and substituting therefor the following:

'(a) to a municipality, a public housing agency or a non-profit corporation for the'

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Whiteway) agreed to.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That subclause 3(6) of Bill C-29 be further amended by striking out line 10 on page 4 and substituting therefore the following:

"regulations.

(5) An approved lender may, subject to and in accordance with regulations of the Governor in Council made under the authority of this subsection, make a loan to a province, municipality or public housing agency for the purpose of assisting that provinces, municipality or agency to acquire and service land for housing purposes or for any purpose incidental thereto, and such a loan is insurable in the manner provided by such regulations.

(6) Where an approved lender makes a loan to a province, a municipality or a public housing agency, the approved lender may take debentures as security for the loan in lieu of the security mentioned in paragraph (1)(d)."

Mr. Chairman, I know we are rushed but I should like to explain the purpose of this amendment. It represents a substantial change, in our view, to the bill, and also to the direction of government policy to which this party has taken a great deal of exception.

Section 42(1) of the National Housing Act reads as follows:

The Corporation may make a loan to a province, municipality or public housing agency for the purpose of assisting that province, municipality or agency to acquire and service land for housing purposes or for any purpose incidental thereto.

Pursuant to the Greenspan report released in the fall of 1978 it was the government's wisdom that land assembly would no longer become a priority in its housing policy.

This party takes the position that there is increasing evidence that the cost of land is one of the primary elements in housing inflation and has been one of the primary elements in the extraordinary housing inflation in Canada since the mid-1960s. We also take the view that land assembly should remain one of the critical features of the policy of any government that is determined to do something about profiteering in land speculation and the increasing conditions of monopoly in the assembly of land that we see in Canada today.

We are political realists, if nothing else, and we accept the fact that the government has rejected this view and has taken a view that the return to the so-called free market in the assembly of land will provide the best protection for the Canadian public. I think that view is completely misplaced, but it seems to be the view of the government.

One of the things that we have developed in this country in the last few years is that the municipalities are doing something in their own jurisdictions, if they can, to keep the price of land down and to assemble land for their own projects. That is the reason why, since my election last fall, I have asked the minister several questions in the House and in committee concerning land assembly projects in urban areas. I have asked him to change his mind about his policy and to continue to use the powers granted to him in section 42 of the act. I am pleased to see that the minister has agreed, as a compromise, to accept a proposal from this party which would allow municipalities to borrow 100 per cent of the moneys that would be required for the assembly of land within their jurisdiction from private institutions, particularly when dealing with problems of the inner city, and that the government would insure those loans at 100 per cent as it does for many of the other loans that are going to be taken out under the act. But it is not the whole loaf, Mr. Chairman.

If I may say so, the entire approach of the government that the private sector will take up the slack left by the government is a point of view which we do not share. We think there is a continued need for active participation by CMHC and by the government, both as a lender and as a grantor of moneys, not only to municipalities but also to co-operative groups and municipal housing corporations. This view has been rejected by the government. They are falling over themselves to become better new conservatives than the Conservatives themselves. Be that as it may, the amendment we have put forward is an important one. It is an improvement on the bill. It is something which has been asked for by many municipalities. I know it is of concern to the housing corporation of the city of Toronto. It will allow that city and that corporation to continue to become actively engaged in the provision of housing for people, and I think it represents an important advance on the bill itself.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Chairman, I am speaking on the same point and relating the point raised by the previous member to the question which I raised during my speech on second reading. I mentioned the very serious case that is occurring on the Caughnawaga Reserve and on a number of other Indian reserves located close to cities. There are situations where executors of estates and individuals are forced to sell land holdings, in effect, at fire sale prices.

Indians can sell only to other Indians. This ends up in a situation where few people on a number of Indian reserves are collecting huge parcels of land. It is creating an unhealthy imbalance. My question is this: if the amendment as proposed by the NDP is accepted, whereby private moneys would be insurable for purposes of land assembly by municipalities, would this require any further amendment to have this provision extended to Indian reserves?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, in the bill there is a special clause which deals with the financing of housing on reserves. We have improved the bill. You will find this clause at the bottom of page 3 where loans to Indians will be allowed.

[Translation]

With this bill, we will now be able to provide loans to Indians living on reserves.

[English]

Mr. Watson: Mr. Chairman, I am aware of that. The point is the land assembly provisions, which the hon. member who preceded me made reference to, and whose proposed amendment, I understand, is acceptable. Will they require further amendment to the act to render Indian reserves eligible for what has been proposed in the previous member's amendment?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, subject to correction, I believe the land on reserves belongs exclusively to the government or to Indians on reserves. It cannot belong to anyone else. Therefore via the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development there could be some specific projects undertaken by the department in relation to this land, but I believe that in reference to specific projects Indians on reserves will now be eligible for loans for projects insured by CMHC. As far as ownership is concerned, that is a much more difficult aspect which has to be dealt with not by my department but by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Chairman, I realize the minister is being sympathetic, but I just want an assurance that we can assemble land on Indian reserves in the same way that it is proposed for municipalities. The land assembly will be done by the band council on behalf of the people of the reserves. Perhaps there could be some consultation with the minister's officials, but all it requires is simply to make sure that in what we are doing today we give band councils exactly the same power as we are proposing to give municipalities, that is, to assemble land with a loan from private industry guaranteed by ourselves.

Mr. Ouellet: This bill gives this authority to public housing agencies, being agencies of the federal, provincial or municipal governments. It does not specifically address the question of bands because that question is not within my jurisdiction but within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I regret therefore I cannot give these assurances to the hon. member. To do so I will have to consult first with my colleague, the minister responsible for Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Chairman, one of the changes proposed which I find rather interesting concerns subclause 6 which states that the approved lender making a loan to a province, a municipality or a public housing agency may take debentures as security for the loan in lieu of the security mentioned in paragraph (1) (d), which states:

(d) it is secured by a first mortgage—

Does this mean, Mr. Chairman, that from now on a municipality can provide debentures as security for the projects or the works it undertakes?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this will indeed give more financing flexibility to the municipalities, and in many cases, they can obtain financing only through debentures.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendments agreed to.

Clause 3 as amended agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—

Mr. Whiteway moved:

That clause 5 of Bill C-29 be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out lines 34 and 35 on page 4 and substituting therefor the following:

"insured loan described in subsection 6(4) of (6) or made under a graduated"; and

(b) by striking out lines 5 and 6 on page 5 and substituting therefor the following:

"the Corporation, according to a formula incorporated in the mortgage"

He said: I should explain that my amendments deal only with very small sections of the bill. What are more operative are the regulations that will accompany this legistation. I would like an understanding from the minister as to what the regulations will say.

This clause on deals with the graduated payment mortgages which replace AHOP. As we know, AHOP was based on two principles, one of inflation, that is, that the value of the house would go up; second, that the income of AHOP families would increase substantially and they would be in a position to pay back the subsidy at the end of the first five-year term when they went on to the regular mortgage. We say that it did not take place and so we saw the massive defaults and walk-aways. To make sure we do not have a repeat performance on GPMs, I would like an assurance from the minister.

The formula outlined by regulation, that is, the existing formula, would be 5 per cent down and the initial payments would be 75 per cent of the normal level of payment. The compromise, which is the formula that I am talking about and on which I would like to get agreement with the minister, would be as follows: 10 per cent down. Half of that 10 per cent, 5 per cent of the down payment, would be in cash. The other 5 per cent would be put in an interest bearing savings account which would accumulate over the first five years, and the purchaser would have a cash equity in his home.

In the case where it is co-operative housing, where there is sweat equity as opposed to cash equity, the 10 per cent in terms of the 5 and 5 would be determined by the approved lender. Co-operative housing, rather than have any cash down or the 10 per cent, would be equity vis-à-vis the sweat equity. Otherwise, without these changes the GPM would be morally indefensible in terms of financing.

Although the minister could not put this in regulation, I hope that the GPM would be applied to those Canadians who would be in the higher income mobility group. To base a GPM on anything else, simply to say that inflation would increase a person's income, is to count on inflation in order that a person will be able to pay for his home. When we form the government there will be deflation. They will not be able to count on inflation. GPMs can only work if real disposable income increases.

We are talking about applying the GPM only to families which have an obvious high income mobility so that the real disposable income five years from now would be substantively and substantially more than it is outside the GPM.

I conclude with those remarks, and with the assurance of the minister that the regulations as I have outlined will be changed to the 80-10 formula, and half in the case of cash, other than the co-ops, that 5 per cent would be in an interest bearing savings account to ensure at all times a cash saving and that the mortgage would never be in a net debt equity position.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to see this amendment moved by the hon. member. I support him in his amendment. I want to thank him for making constructive suggestions to this clause of the bill. I agree with him that the graduated payment mortgage should present some advantage and might represent some disadvantage. His amendment will indeed be a sort of safeguard to alleviate any difficulty down the line.

I want to assure the hon. member that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will have the appropriate regulation to ensure that in relation to these insured loans there will be a 10 per cent down payment. That will be put specifically in the regulation. In relation to the initial payment, we will ensure through the regulations that initial payments are never less than 75 per cent of what the level of payment mortgage would normally have produced.

In relation to the other aspect that the hon. member has raised, whether it should be 5 per cent cash down and 5 per cent, I think that aspect should be left entirely to the lending institutions. I agree that it could be a feature and we have no objection to it. However, I would prefer that it be left to the financial institutions to decide.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. There have been consultations and I believe it is unanimously agreed that you not see the clock for the next 25 minutes or so in order that we complete this stage of the bill. I think there is unanimous agreement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I want to make quite clear our position on the graduated payment mortgage scheme. The position that our party has taken consistently has been that there is a need for a home ownership assistance program, but that this is a phony solution to a very serious problem.

The graduated payment mortgage scheme in fact creates a higher level of debt for the individual and his family than would otherwise be the case in taking out an equal payment mortgage, the kind of mortgage most people have. It is an attempt to sugar the very unpleasant pill of inflated mortgage payments and inflated interest rate payments. It is not a solution to that problem.

The position of this party has been that rather than allow the banks to pick up profits at the expense of people on the basis of a government policy of having a high interest rate, and their profits are nearly $1 billion, we should be instructing the lending institutions to begin providing lower mortgage rates for families below a certain level of income. That deals with the problem of interest rates directly, not indirectly as this does. It does not saddle people with a higher level of debt than they can afford.

The premise upon which the whole concept of graduated payment mortgages is based is twofold. The first premise is that inflation will increase the value of the house automatically. The second premise is that incomes will continue to increase and the level of income of a family will be constant and will increase over time.

Both those assumptions are false and very dangerous. There is no telling what inflation will do to the value of a house or what it will do to the value of a house relative to the cost of living. The fact is that in the past two years the rate of inflation has surpassed the increase in the value of existing housing stock.

The second premise on which it is based is equally false. It is that we are going to have guaranteed employment for both wage earners in the family and that those people will be working at a higher level of income five years from now. That is a false premise. With the nature of the economy which has been created and encouraged by this government, we know that there is an increasing prospect of unemployment amongst men and women, that families can no longer rely on two salaries in order to pay the GPM, and that people will not necessarily be able to afford the kinds of payments required by the GPM scheme.

I know that the headlines say this is a home ownership program designed to help young families purchase homes. The minister's public relations are very good. I congratulate him on them. However, the press should look very carefully at the hard facts as to exactly what this kind of scheme will cost individuals as compared to existing schemes. Compare what it would cost an individual if we had the courage in this country to take on the lending institutions and told them to lower their interest rates. There is no comparison.

Instead of going around the circle of the problem and attempting to make high interest rates more palatable to people, the government should be determined to hold down interest rates and, in fact, lower the rate of interest. In our view that is the best, most effective, and most honest way to get hold of the problem of mortgage payments for young people.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Chairman, I want to underscore what has been said by my new friend from Broadview—

An hon. Member: Socialist!

Mr. Whiteway: His comments are well taken. I do not necessarily agree with the solutions he offers but he was certainly able to identify with the problem. I want to underscore that GPMs can work only if they are applied to families with high income mobility. This is where they have been successful. They are not a financing instrument to be used for low income Canadians. Let it be clearly known that we in the Progressive Conservative party do not endorse the scheme in such circumstances though we recognize it as being a useful tool in the case of families with high income mobility.

Amendment (Mr. Whiteway) agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 6—1974-75-76, c. 38, s. 4.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move:

That Bill C-29 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after line 18 on page 5, the following clauses:

"6.1(1) Paragraph 28(1)(d) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(d) the principal amount of the loan did not at the time of the making of the loan, together with the amount owing in respect of other guaranteed home improvement loans previously made to the borrower in respect of the home on which the loan was to be expended and disclosed in his application or of which the bank or approved instalment credit agency had knowledge, exceed ten thousand dollars in respect of each family housing unit;"

(2) Paragraphs 28(1)(f) and (g) of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(f) the loan was repayable by the terms thereof in monthly instalments and in full in not more than twenty-five years;"

6.2 Section 30 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"30. The Corporation is not liable under this Part to make any payment to a bank or an approved instalment credit agency in respect of any loss sustained by it as a result of a home improvement loan or a home extension loan made after the aggregate principal amount of guaranteed home improvement loans and guaranteed home extension loans equals nine hundred million dollars."

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 6 as amended agreed to.

On clause 7—1973-74, c. 18, s. 12; 1974-75-76, c. 38, s. 11.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 7 of Bill C-29 be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out lines 21 and 22 on page 5 and substituting therefor the following:

"34.1(1) The Corporation may, in such circum-";

(b) by striking out line 13 on page 6 and substituting therefor the following:

"(a) bear";

(c) by striking out lines 28 and 29 on page 6 and substituting therefor the following:

"(b) not exceed such";

(d) by striking out lines 32 and 33 on page 6 and substituting therefor the following:

"(c) be for a term not"; and

(e) by striking out lines 44 to 49 on page 6 and substituting therefor the following:

"building in favour of the Corporation or by such other security as the Corporation deems adequate to safeguard its interests; and (e) subject"

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet), agreed to.

Clause 7 as amended agreed to.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clauses 10, 11 and 12 at lines 1 to 48 on page 8 and at lines 1 and 2 on page nine be deleted.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair would suggest that the motions be put separately. If members wish the clauses deleted they will vote against them. Shall clause 10 carry?

Some hon. Members: No!

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Some hon. Members: No!

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Resign!

Clauses 10 to 12 inclusive negatived.

On clause 13—

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 13 of Bill C-29 be amended by striking out line 16 on page 9 and substituting therefor the following:

"incurred, or paying for the results obtained, in the provision, development,"

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 13, as amended, carry?

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, we have recommended an amendment as follows, and which I move:

That clause 13 be amended by striking out lines 30 to 38 and

What I would like to do is simply explain what the purpose of this amendment is with respect to the community service grants program. The community service grants program proposed by the government is part of its effort to appease the provinces and cut off its direct relationship with the municipalities. The community service grants program is not only intended to replace the neighbourhood improvement program as has been suggested by some people, it is intended to replace this program together with a vast number of other programs which I would like to list, including sewage treatment, trunk lines and plants, community water supply facilities, trunk storm sewer systems, sewer and water site services, social and cultural facilities, community recreational facilities, non-profit housing in municipal equity, upgrading and insulation of municipal buildings and community facilities, facilities which convert municipal waste to energy production and any municipal capital works specified in the federal-provincial operating agreement.

The complaint we have about this entire concept, is that the government, in getting out of this area and limiting its activities to giving a bloc fund to the provinces, will have the effect of cutting out the neighbourhood improvement programs. This is because the amount of money allocated by the federal government to the provinces will so quickly be absorbed by basic infrastructure expenditures. In other words, the money being spent on sewer systems and so on—the very important work of neighbourhood improvement which goes on in many of our urban centres—will simply go by the board and be taken over by the building of basic infrastructure. This is why we have opposed the entire concept of a community service grants program which, we say, will do nothing but bring to an end those neighbourhood improvement projects and those cultural and community recreational facilities which are so important to people living in our urban areas.

In our view it also represents a dangerous tendency on the part of the government to abandon important areas of jurisdiction—and I think they can be argued as being under federal jurisdiction—at a time when cities and communities are starved for funds and continue to look to the federal government for leadership and for assistance. The federal government is cutting those groups off and saying, "Nothing doing, boys, you can go back to the provinces." I think this is not only politically a very big mistake in that it means that people will no longer look to the federal government for leadership at a time when they should be able to do so, but philosophically, and at a social level, it represents an abandonment by the government of people living in our urban areas. I think it is a major mistake.

We have therefore suggested two proposals which the government has accepted. The first is that rather than impose a statutory limit of $250 million on the community service grants program, there should be no statutory limit to the money spent. The second proposal is that the bill shall last for two years. One of the things mentioned by my colleague and occasional travelling companion from Ottawa-Carleton was—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: We went to Washington together, that's what I was referring to. The delays in the implementation of this program and the fact we had to wait for over a year before the government could make up its mind as to what it wanted to do, have meant that many municipalities have been without funding, without projects, without guidance—and the hon. member for Algoma knows precisely what I am talking about—for an exceptional period of time. Municipalities have been waiting for an assured level of funding so that they could put forward their projects, get facilities built, instal their sewage lines and soon. These needs have not been met because of the federal government's indecision and its inability to come to agreement with the provinces.

We have therefore proposed that we have a guaranteed two-year limit to this funding. Let us have the program clear and have it last a specific length of time so that people will know to which agency they are supposed to apply to get funding. They are tired of that old shell game, which I am sorry to say has only been encouraged by the minister, of one level of government saying to another. "Go to the other level." It is time that shell game was brought to an end. In order to do that, the period during which this measure will take effect should be clearly stated in the bill itself. That is why we have extended it to cover the period we have suggested.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Rae) agreed to.

Clause 13 as amended agreed to.

Clause 14 and 15 agreed to.

On Clause 16—Rights Saved.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 16 of Bill C-29 be amended by redesignating that clause as subclause 16(1) and by adding, immediately after line 30 on page 11, the following subclause:

"(2) The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is authorized, after section 15 of this section come into force, to use any document or means of identification then existing in the name of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, until it is able to obtain equivalent documents or means of identification in the name of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation."

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Chairman, this has been a wonderful afternoon, and there has been much unanimity, but if we do agree to change this name I wonder if we might make an announcement to the effect that this corporation will be under new management.

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

Clause 16 as amended agreed to.

Clause 17 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Rae.]

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is the hon. lady—

Mrs. Pigott: I'm coming.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since we have had very positive discussions yesterday and today with opposition spokesmen to allow us to move certain amendments to this bill and make this legislation quite acceptable to the four parties represented in this House, I wonder if it would be possible to ask the unanimous consent of the House to have third reading of this bill immediately without debate in view of the spirit of co-operation which has been shown to improve this bill.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I know we have had a very good afternoon, but I do not think we are in a position to proceed to third reading at this moment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The bill should be reprinted anyway.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, if I could—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that third reading of Bill C-29 will take place at the next sitting of the House, but I am rising with regard to another bill. Would Your Honour be kind enough to call Bill S-6? After consultation there is agreement that Bill S-6 be read the third time today without debate.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of cordiality we have had this afternoon we are quite prepared to let Bill S-6 go through. Unfortunately, some members of my party wish to speak briefly at the third reading stage of the housing bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question regarding Bill S-6, we are prepared to agree. We hope that these agreements on our part will be reciprocated one of these days.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I note the proposition or the suggestion just made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council about Bill S-6. I would have liked very much to participate in the debate yesterday because it is a very important bill.

On the other hand, I always take into consideration the wisdom of my colleagues and as this bill came to the attention of the House and everything was done to give it careful consideration, so as not to delay it I am prepared to agree to the third reading of this bill, as proposed, provided I keep the possibility at a later date to ask for a revision, if necessary, because it is a very important bill and one on which we will necessarily have to come back to sooner or later. I agree for the time being.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO EXEMPT CERTAIN PRACTICES FROM PROVISIONS OF COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Hon. André Ouellet (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S-6, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to.

Some hon. Members: Four o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, there is unanimous agreement that we should proceed with the motion in the name of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie), and I wish to thank him for his co-operation in letting us proceed with Bill C-29.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall motions Nos. 7, 9, 16, 19, 20, 21 and 22 stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Maritime Transportation

TRANSPORTATION

SUGGESTED STUDY OF NEEDS IN MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Regional Development be empowered to study the concept of using transportation as a development tool by putting in place a modern transportation network in the Maritime provinces, incorporating bus, train, highway and air services, and report back to the House its findings on the desirability and the best ways and means of achieving such a concept.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we must focus the attention of all departments of government on the issue of regional development if we are to succeed in helping Canadians who live in the Atlantic provinces to help themselves. Transportation is of paramount importance to the region, and since it is related directly to the whole question of regional economic expansion I want it placed before the appropriate committee of this House to be considered and dealt with, within the total context of that committee's mandate.

Before I suggest that air transportation ban be improved in the maritime provinces, I have to tell the House that it is our best mode of transportation available at this point in time. The problem is that we do not have enough direct flights within the maritimes and between points in the maritimes and points in central Canada and northern parts of the United States. We do not have these flights because we do not have enough volume of trade to make them pay. Even with the large subsidies which are paid to air carriers, we still have difficulty in providing the numbers that are needed to make it a good, efficient operation.

The sad fact is that we are never going to have the numbers or the trade unless we first have the service, and therein lies the key to our basic problem in transportation in the Atlantic provinces. A high quality of air cargo service is absolutely essential if Atlantic Canada is to develop a good industrial and commercial base. In this regard some of the larger firms in the Atlantic provinces have purchased their own planes.

Rail passenger service and, to a degree, rail freight have not really been given a good chance in the Atlantic provinces because the railways have allowed their rail beds to deteriorate to the point where trains move very slowly, and the equipment they use, particularly with respect to passenger service, is generally 25 years of age or older. Depending heavily on the United States for reefer cars which the railways rent or buy, our potato industry has been affected detrimentally by the shortage of equipment.

● (1630)

The gateway to commerce in the maritimes is the deep water ports of Halifax and Saint John which, because of their advantageous geographic position, can become arteries of commerce in an expanding trade environment if the ports are properly equipped with modern facilities. Improved terminal storage and handling facilities are badly needed in the Atlantic provinces.

Highways in the Atlantic provinces are the principal arteries of commerce and they are carefully preserved by our highway departments. Highway weight restrictions are essential in the spring to preserve the roads for use during the balance of the year. This means, of course, that truckers have to operate with limited loads and therefore make more runs to achieve the same volume of traffic, which adds considerably to the cost of transporting goods.

The economy can be stimulated by an improved highway network. Four lane highways can be built in many instances on existing rights of way, and with two lanes going in each direction, turn and elevation gradients require less expense to permit safe passage than is the case with single lane roads. This significant saving would go a long way toward paying for the additional pavement.

These more modern highways are not as much in evidence in the maritimes as they should be because, without federal aid, our provincial governments have not the funds to build them. In New Brunswick, for example, I feel the federal government should participate financially in a ring road around Fredericton, the new highway bridge across the river at Fredericton, and a four lane highway connecting Fredericton, the capital city, with the port of Saint John.

When approached with such concepts, the federal government is only too quick to suggest that current traffic needs do not warrant such expenditures. New Brunswick's five-year highway and bridge program which contained such a concept was discouraged by this government only two years ago. The point I am making is that the traffic will never warrant such highways unless the highways are built to stimulate development and thus develop the population that would warrant the highways.

Despite all the subsidies, freight rates remain too high because they are too high to begin with. We had a good example of this before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on May 31, 1977, in reference to our very important New Brunswick forest products. A comparison was made between the rates in New Brunswick and in British Columbia, and on raw wood products we found that rates in New Brunswick were 60 per cent higher.

Instead of paying increasing freight rates to ship our farm produce to distant markets and buying back cooked meats, bottled jams and canned vegetables, we urgently need a fundamenal change in our transportation and DREE policies to enable us to develop plants to purchase and process local products in New Brunswick for sale in New Brunswick and across Canada, and, through tariff changes, to our natural trading partners along the Atlantic seaboarb. We have the resource potential to supply and operate plants to process cheese, meats, fruits and vegetables, to name only a few. I urge the government to invest in the future of New Brunswick and to take this giant step in creating good jobs and markets for our farming community. My remarks apply equally to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

The simple concept that we must ask ourselves in terms of transportation cost is, "How much does it cost to get a product to market economically? How much does it cost to get it there now?" Any difference in cost must demand a subsidy, or a roll back in freight rates. A user-pay concept cannot achieve this purpose.

The railways should be required to retain, modernize and upgrade the service they presently give to the total area of the maritimes. Better rail freight cars are absolutely essential for shippers, particularly for agricultural products, and the integration of rail freight and passenger service with other forms of transportation is an important step in developing an efficient transportation system.

The federal government should not simply content itself with giving a department such as DREE a limited degree of authority. It should establish machinery which would produce co-ordinated results and which would, in terms of regional economic development, co-ordinate the policies of all departments, particularly, transport and finance, with the policies being followed by DREE.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of co-ordinating efforts within departments of the federal government. It is also necessary to co-ordinate the efforts of the federal and provincial governments, especially in the Atlantic region. The three maritime provinces have improved their machinery for interprovincial co-operation, but we are still a long way from a plan of development for the region in which each provincial government and the federal would play a co-ordinating role.

DREE should get away from the idea that its main responsibility is to provide industrial incentives to entrepreneurs who wish to move into the Atlantic area, or to local businessmen who want to expand their present operations, or a series of ad hoc programs providing valuable services but on a small piecemeal scale. DREE should be doing far more than that. It should be looking hard at the big jobs crying to be tackled. For example, what has DREE done about the Fundy tidal power project? Nothing. It is very convenient for the government, whenever Fundy is seriously mentioned, to be able to pass it off to a study, or a commission, or a committee, which it knows full well can stall the project another year or another decade. Why is DREE not brought into these discussions? Why is not DREE handed the responsibility of correlating these studies? Why is not DREE given the job to do?

DREE was created to lead the attack on regional disparity. Like Uriah the Hittite, it was to be thrust into the forefront of battle, there to do or die. But DREE stayed in the background when the big conflicts raged. It handed out its grants and loans to justify its existence and failed miserably to take hold of the big projects which the Atlantic provinces have needed for generations. In short, it avoided the massive development undertakings without which the Atlantic provinces will always remain what they are today—the most neglected part of Canada.

I am an infrastructure man. I will always be an infrastructure man, for infrastructures are the only hope of getting Atlantic Canada into a position of parity with the rest of the country, a position from which it can stay caught up. Millions of dollars in piecemeal grants over the years have done nothing but keep us from sliding farther behind, and that itself is an achievement. The dole has failed.

Now it is time to develop a bold and imaginative policy of regionalism, the principle of special aid to the Atlantic provinces on a massive scale—where mere millions have been parceled out to keep the wolf from the door, billions are needed; billions not in spending but in investment—investment in permanent and lasting projects which will bring the Atlantic provinces to equal-partner status with the other six, and which will dispose of the need, once and for all, of the subsidies and handouts which have always been associated with us as a backward area.

I believe that the infrastructures necessary for economic growth involve water, power, roads, railways, port facilities, sewers, schools, universities and research establishments, among others.

The provision of infrastructure should be an important part of the operations of DREE, which must launch a mighty drive to get the job done. DREE must have the powers to provide assistance by direct action, and by action through the provincial governments to create the necessary infrastructures.

DREE was launched with great fanfare as the answer to all of our economic problems. It did not take very long, however, for the Atlantic provinces to realize what DREE was—just another federal agency handing out grants and loans and doles and shirking the responsibility of getting to the fundamental problems of the area, of spearheading the mighty projects which common sense tells us must be the cornerstones of Atlantic prosperity—the Fundy tidal power project, the development of the ports of Saint John and Halifax, and an Atlantic transportation policy which would provide modern high speed highways to transport agricultural and forest products, parts for manufacturing industries, and other goods to world markets via the ports of Saint John and Halifax, and by land, air and rail to Canadian markets.

Development of the ports of Saint John and Halifax as major growth centres connected to all parts of the maritimes by modern transportation systems is basic to the development of our region. These two ports jut far out into the Atlantic and can receive the largest tankers in the world and offer a transportation facility to the whole Atlantic seaboard which is not blessed with such a natural advantage.

Not one of these projects came under the aegis of DREE. After nine years of DREE, the positions of each of these projects are exactly as they were when DREE was created—in limbo.

I believe that new policies should show a willingness to get to the basics of the Atlantic economics and to put first things first. There has to be a new set of priorities, and the projects I have mentioned have to be in the top echelons of those priorities.

On a New Brunswick note, I want DREE and New Brunswick to work out a five-year plan of highway development that will put in place a modern and efficient network and, among other things, study the concept of a north-south highway running from St. Andrews through Fredericton to Campbellton, connecting to other major arterial highways which lead to other New Brunswick centres. The study should consider not only the important transportation function but the potential of the highway in developing resources, recreation and tourism in the interior of the province.

I am receiving more and more support in my campaign for Atlantic infrastructures. Some of my colleagues have joined me. I would hope for the support of more of them; the support of all Atlantic members as well as that of the minister responsible for DREE. I am not asking for the moon. I am asking for fair treatment in an area with problems no amount of subsidies and grants can solve if a solid base is not laid down.

Give us the Fundy tidal project and the maritimes will become the powerhouse of the continent, with Canadian, American, British, French and Japanese interests clamouring to invest. Give us the modern highways, rail lines, bus and air systems, and the shippers, travellers and tourists will come to our area as we come in time closer to the markets and attractions of central Canada, and vice-versa. Give us the port developments, and the great tankers and container ships of the world will come to us in armadas of profit. In short, give us the infrastructures and let them form the foundation. Then the rest of Canada can forget the subsidies, grants and handouts which they have been forced to provide us, often against their will, for the simple reason no one has ever had the common sense, foresight and resolution to face facts squarely and give us the tools with which we can put our own house in order.

I want the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) to convene a meeting of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) with the premiers of all Atlantic provinces to devise a regional development strategy, to build modern infrastructure and identify areas of comparable natural advantage, committing the resources of our nation to develop them. Once we have a modern infrastructure in place and have identified the areas for regional development which should fit into a national industrial strategy, then we require the personal attention of the Prime Minister to focus the resources of our nation in a determined effort to develop the Atlantic provinces.

I thank the House for providing me with this opportunity by allowing private members' business to go forward this afternoon.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to take part in the debate this afternoon as it provides me with an opportunity to set the facts straight. I just listened to the hon. member who spoke before me and who is a colleague from New Brunswick and in a certain way I think I am happy to be sitting on this side of the House rather than the other side, because he just gave us an absolutely exaggerated picture, a most gloomy picture not to say that he just put a host of half-truths on the record. So I would like to use the few minutes I have to set the record straight.

[English]

In participating in this debate on the motion presented by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie), let me first emphasize that DREE is very pleased to be able to discuss its role in the transportation sector of the maritime region. My government and I share the view that transportation is most important to the development of the maritime region, and that indeed the government, DREE in particular, has been and should continue to be very much involved in the important sector of transportation.

I should like to take the opportunity to quote some figures which speak for themselves. DREE has been in existence from 1969. The combined provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, under programs which have since concluded or under ongoing ones, have received in the field of transportation from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion a sum total of $353.5 million. DREE funds apply to the important infrastructure of transportation in the Atlantic area. My own province of New Brunswick has received its fair share under this program, the sum total of $118 million so far.

All hon. members now know that more programs are being negotiated and discussed. This is quite a record, and I am sorry the hon. member who has just sat down did not refer to DREE's involvement in the effort to improve the entire transportation structure in the Atlantic area.

I am not only referring to roads, paving, or roads to resources, but DREE has been involved in marine transportation. For example, it was involved in the Miramichi channel dredging study. It has been involved in port improvement facilities in Saint John. Contrary to what the hon. member has said, we are involved there on a continuing basis, and we are prepared to receive further submission from the province of New Brunswick. In spite of the fact that it is not its primary field of jurisdiction, DREE has become involved in airport construction in my riding. I am grateful to DREE for that contribution and participation, and I am looking forward to even greater participation.

There is no basis whatsoever for the hon. member to suggest that the government, DREE, and the Department of Transport, have not been involved seriously in ongoing discussions with the provinces. DREE has been involved even in fields which come under the primary jurisdiction of the provinces. DREE has gone into fields which have been the traditional reserve of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island because it is committed to improving the over-all infrastructure of Atlantic Canada since its establishment in 1969.

However, it appears that the motion proposed by the hon. member either reflects his lack of understanding of maritime transportation issues, or his lack of knowledge as to what DREE and the Department of Transport have been doing in this important area of endeavour. In the next few minutes I should like to tell the House of the work, planning, efforts, and the money which has been and indeed is being spent on transportation projects and undertakings in the maritimes by DREE and the Department of Transport, so that it may be realized that the motion proposing "the Standing Committee on Regional Development be empowered to study the concept of using transportation as a development tool" in fact is inappropriate, redundant, and comes after action already is under way in the context of DREE's related efforts in the Atlantic region today. Also this is an opportunity to outline to hon. members the many initiatives taken by the Department of Transport to illustrate most clearly just how transportation is being used as a development tool in the Atlantic area. Many of these initiatives are a direct result of the consultative efforts of both federal and provincial officials and representatives of the private sector working together to improve the transportation system of the region at a time of severe restraint.

The hon. member has indulged in some local politics. He suggested that the federal government should share in the cost of the building of a bridge across a river in his riding. I think that is carrying it a little too far. There is a limit to what the federal government should be involved in with the provinces. Transportation, road transportation and bridge building, were and still very much are provincial responsibilities under the constitution. To want to drag the federal government into all phases of infrastructure building in the realm of their jurisdiction indeed is an exaggeration in the sense that these people are attempting to milk the federal cow to death.

Perhaps the best example of the fruits of our ongoing consultative process is the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Program announced almost two years ago in co-operation with provincial first ministers. This program was the result in part of a joint federal-provincial passenger transportation study embracing all modes. Subsequent to the study, a total of $125 million of Transport Canada money—this is above and beyond the figure I quoted just a few minutes ago of $350 million contributed by DREE—was allocated by the federal government for bus, highway and air services in the Atlantic provinces.

Surely the mere indication of those figures would indicate that the hon. member for York-Sunbury has not given the House the full story of the government's involvement in regional development in the maritime provinces, in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and certainly in Nova Scotia. As far as DREE is concerned, I would point out that important references to transportation are, indeed, enshrined in the General Development Agreements as negotiated by DREE on behalf of Canada with the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, as well as in the comprehensive development plan negotiated with Prince Edward Island.

In New Brunswick the general development agreement specifically recognizes the importance of the service sector to the province's economy, and pledges to implement a development strategy which will encourage the expansion of this sector. Transportation and distribution are cited as important components of New Brunswick's service sector. In Nova Scotia the general development agreement for that province specifically identifies distribution and transportation related industry as being of prime importance to the development strategy of that province.

The Prince Edward Island comprehensive development plan highlights the importance of adequate and reasonably priced transportation as an essential part of that province's developmental strategy. The plan also pledges to upgrade, where necessary, the island's network of resource collector and arterial roads and the feasibility of additional container service and other methods of moving freight are cited as worthy of joint study under the plan, as is the critical issue of the distribution of island potatoes and other bulk produce. That also applies to New Brunswick.

Both DREE and Transport Canada, in extremely close co-operation with provincial civil servants and politicians, have sat and studied these matters almost to the absurd. However, they did not stop at the study. They went ahead with a plan of action agreed to by all the parties. All the parties concerned are keeping an eye on the situation as it develops with a view to improving that infrastructure still more.

Through the general development agreements which were signed with the provinces, DREE has the mandate to pursue development opportunities in the maritime region in order to reduce the disparity gap. As it turns out, the general development agreement concept, with it's jointly agreed to strategy, is indeed proving to be a most flexible development tool to implement any indentified component of the region's transportation needs. Almost since its creation, DREE has worked with this important principle in mind. Indeed, prior to the general development agreement era, DREE was already involved in the construction of roads and highways under the FRED and ARDA programs in the special areas agreements.

There is a feature that I cannot help but notice every time I raise the question of transportation in my own Liberal caucus, because there are times when I must bring to the forefront and to the attention of the government some of the transportation problems of the Atlantic area, and that is when I hear my colleagues from British Columbia, western Canada, Ontario and parts of Quebec say, "How can you guys down in the maritimes muster so much government support?" On a per capita basis the maritimes indeed are being served much better than the rest of Canada from federal funds, to aid them in establishing needed and appreciated transportation infrastructures. I do not think that the maritimes should apologize for that federal help—far from me the thought. Far from me also is the thought that no work remains to be done.

Essentially what we are addressing here today is a reference to a committee to study the concept of using transportation as a development tool. What I am saying is that that concept has been very much in the mind of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and very much in the mind of Transport Canada. They have been co-ordinating committees at the interdepartmental level. There have been frequent meetings with provincial officials from all three provinces and they are being carried on on an ongoing basis, and there are federal-provincial management committees which meet regularly to review the progress being made on the transportation front.

I can come to no other conclusion than that the hon. member who posed this motion must be somewhat like Rip van Winkle and lived in a cave during this past decade.

Mr. Oberle: You are certainly some clown.

Mr. Corbin: In 1973 for example, with the advent of decentralization and the negotiation of general development agreements with the Atlantic provinces DREE took a comprehensive look at all sectors of the Atlantic region economy, not just transportation. DREE is involved everywhere one can possiby imagine. In the opinion of the hon. member, DREE should be involved in energy issues. It is involved in energy issues because DREE sits on interdepartmental committees which arrive at decisions, for example, with respect to Fundy tide development and with respect to the nuclear plant in New Brunswick. I do not think that DREE should be electrified as is the suggestion of the hon. member.

That is not DREE's mission and, indeed, I would hope that DREE would remain in its present state, in spite of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) the other night. After what he said I wonder if that is another one of the departments which the Progressive Conservative party will drop after the next election. They have committed themselves to dropping Petro-Canada, Loto Canada, and we now have a statement by an hon. member from that side that DREE should disappear altogether. That is incredible. I think that the hon. members on that side of the House should first consult with Premier Richard Hatfield who thought it a very advantageous position last fall to carry an election campaign based on the programs of DREE in his province.

I do not think, on the one hand, that they can say there has been close co-operation with the federal government, DREE and Transport Canada and, on the other hand, stand up in this House and pretend that we have unco-ordinated policies. As a New Brunswicker and maritimer I regret that negative approach. I am prepared to say that we may not have been successful on all fronts, but I do not think that we should be faulted for not trying, and the figures are certainly there to prove it. Of course the transportation sector and the region's needs will be a matter of ongoing concern for all levels of government. Among other things, a comprehensive analysis, commencing a process of looking at transportation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

COMMONWEALTH DAY

DECLARATION TO STRENGTHEN COMMONWEALTH TIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to ask the unanimous consent of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity relating to Canada and the Commonwealth.

In light of the fact that today, March 12, has been declared Commonwealth Day, in view of the importance of the Commonwealth as a cornerstone in Canada's external policy, and because of the important role the Commonwealth can and ought to play in world affairs, not to mention the importance of the heads of government meeting to be held in Lusaka next August, I move, seconded by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That this House confirm Canada's deep attachment to the Commonwealth and its determination to take all steps that will strengthen the ties between the countries of this unique international organization.

Mr. Speaker: Although I will not put the question, I hope the hon. member will be satisfied that I will be making a statement just before question period that we are holding a reception in the building to mark the occasion. I hope that will do the job adequately.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CRITICISM OF AWARD FOR EVALUATION STUDY OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the announcement of contract awards made last week by the Department of Supply and Services disclosed that a $292,440 award to Decision Dynamics for an evaluation study of gun control legislation was charged to the budget of the science department and not to the Solicitor General's Department, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That this House disapprove of badly needed science dollars being allocated for an expenditure clearly within the Solicitor General's jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be put forward, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO ASSIST VOLUNTARY, NON-PROFIT SECTOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that because of government restraint and high inflation in this country the voluntary, non-profit sector is undergoing great difficulty in order to survive, and in view of the fact that the agencies and organizations in this sector have grown tremendously in the last few years and are performing many functions which would have to be done otherwise by some level of government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Government of Canada initiate greater and special measures to protect this vital and necessary sector in our Canadian society.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

DOOR-TO-DOOR DELIVERY FOR URBAN AND SUBURBAN AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the government is dedicated to programs of restraint, so-called; whereas the mandate of the postal department is to provide postal services for all Canadians; whereas many areas of Canada are in need of door-to-door delivery service; whereas restraint only means the cutting out of excess, not necessities; and whereas all Canadians pay taxes and postal rates on the same basis, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher):

That the postal department implement immediately and forthwith door-to-door delivery service for Canadians in all urban and surburban areas of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

MORATORIUM ON TRANSFER OF VETERANS' HOSPITALS TO PROVINCES PENDING REVIEW—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Owing to the rash of reports of problems being encountered by veterans seeking admission to former veterans' hospitals, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That the government declare forthwith a moratorium on the transfer of veterans' hospitals to provincial jurisdiction until the consequences arising from previous transfers have been reviewed.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time, in accordance with Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CALL FOR REOPENING OF OIL REFINERY AT COME-BY-CHANCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Since the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance has been closed since February, 1976 with a loss of some 500 jobs, and remains closed despite statements by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in October of 1976 that the refinery would be operating the following year and on September 15, 1977, that he had meetings with three reputable companies to discuss the possible takeover of the refinery, and that there were a number of options open to the government, including discussions with the United States for supplies of oil products to the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Government of Canada cease its policy of indifference to the reopening of the refinery and give high priority to negotiations with the U.S. so that refined products can be sold to the eastern U.S. by eastern Canadian refineries, and that the government make available to the First Arabian Corporation, or whoever makes a successful bid to take over and operate the refinery, the government wharf at Come-By-Chance on nominal rental terms to encourage the reopening of the refinery, and guarantee no interference with export contracts of the refinery for a period long enough to ensure financing of the repairs and reopening of the refinery.

SHIPBUILDING

INCENTIVES FOR CANADIAN SHIPYARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Because of cost factors, east coast shipyards cannot compete with foreign shipbuilders in tendering for fishing trawler contracts for Canadian companies. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Minister of Finance be directed to consider accelerated tax write-offs or deferrals for Canadian taxpayers who construct fishing vessels in domestic shipyards so that Canadian shipbuilders can compete internationally.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

CEREMONIES IN RECOGNITION OF COMMONWEALTH DAY

Mr. Speaker: Before beginning question period, may I invite hon. members to join with me in calling attention to the fact that today has been designated Commonwealth Day. This is an annual event which hon. members will know owes its origin to a Canadian proposal, made during the 1975 Heads of Government Meeting, that the second Monday in March should be so designated in order to underline in Canada and in all other Commonwealth countries the importance that we attach to this unique association of 40 countries of great diversity in terms of size, race, colour, creed and culture, and at all stages of economic development.

Across Canada, special programs have been planned today, especially in schools and public libraries, to mark this special occasion. Yesterday, special interfaith services were held in various centres across this country to mark Commonwealth Day in Canada. Hon. members will have observed the display of flags of all the Commonwealth nations in Confederation Square. This evening, all members of this House are guests at a special reception hosted by the Commonwealth High Commissioners, in co-operation with the Speakers of both Houses, in the Confederation Room in the West Block to mark this very important occasion.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO COUNTER RISING FOOD PRICES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister is quoted as having said a month ago, "I hope we can announce certain new measures shortly"—to counter rising food prices. Since that time we have had the announcement of the National Commission on Inflation, and nothing else.

● (1415)

Could the minister tell the House, now, since he promised a month ago that he would be introducing these measures shortly, what these measures are and why they have not been introduced?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The Leader of the Opposition is correct; we did announce the establishment of the National Commission on Inflation. I also announced we were bringing back a new, revised competition bill to replace Bill C-13 which was tabled during the last session. Further, I believe the Minister of Agriculture and some of the people responsible for marketing boards did announce increased production quotas for 1979, and the government increased beef quotas by seven million pounds.

Mr. Clark: Outside the House, the minister was quoted as saying he was planning a three-pronged attack on prices. As part of that three-pronged attack he indicated the government would come up with measures to deal with supply shortages and bottlenecks. What specific proposals does the government intend to make to deal with supply shortages and bottlenecks?

Mr. Allmand: These measures will be announced by the responsible ministers in due course. The supply situation is continually under review, as I mentioned in my first answer to the Leader of the Opposition. Some production quotas have already been increased for 1979 as against 1978, but the ministers responsible for the different food producing sectors will be reviewing these things and making announcements when appropriate. I understand there will be further announcements in this respect during the coming week.

Mr. Clark: For five years now, ever since the Speech from the Throne which opened this over-long parliament, the minister and the government have been proposing a national food strategy. A month ago, the minister said he would be proposing certain specific measures. Now he says there may be various proposals coming from other ministers at some date in the future.

Would he tell the House on what date we can expect a detailed announcement of a national food strategy which would bring relief to Canadian consumers faced with ever-increasing food prices?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the national food strategy was never intended to culminate in an announcement at one time. It was a process whereby the many departments in the federal government concerned with food, and in the provincial governments, would get together and work out policies which would be announced from time to time. One example was the recently announced revision of the regulations governing the National Farm Products Marketing Council and the appointment of a new chairman who had experience both in farming and in the consumer movement.

PRODUCTION INCENTIVES FOR FISHERMEN AND FARMERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the minister surely knows this is a subject which concerns all Canadians—the rise in prices and the failure of the government to do anything about them.

One of the things the minister said outside the House in the course of his cruel, ongoing deception of the Canadian consumer was that the government proposed to bring in measures to provide new incentives to fishermen and farmers to increase production. Will the minister tell us precisely what new production incentives he is talking about?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have already answered that question. I said there were policies announced from time to time dealing with the supply of food. I stated clearly that the major problem with respect to food prices is, in a sense, beyond the control of the government inasmuch as we must buy a good deal of our food in the winter time from abroad. Consequently, to a certain extent we are stuck with the difference in the value of our dollar as compared to the value of foreign currencies.

The other major cause of increased food prices has to do with the beef cycle; because beef prices were very low a few years ago, we are now faced with short supplies and higher prices. In the long run, we hope to work with the producers to make sure we get more stable production and better prices for both consumers and producers.

[Mr. Allmand.]

Mr. McGrath: This kind of ongoing gobbledegook on the part of the minister is doing nothing to relieve the minds of the people.

Let me ask him this. He has placed great emphasis on phase two of the competition bill which has been dragged out in front of parliament every time an election scare is on. The Prime Minister has said that this parliament will not have time to deal with it. In view of the fact that the new National Commission on Inflation has not been given any guidelines by the government, and in view of the fact that phase two of the competition policy cannot be brought in until the next parliament, what steps does the minister intend to take when he is faced with evidence of price gouging or profiteering which reflects badly on the producers of this country and which, in fact, is causing great concern in the marketplace in the absence of guidelines? Does the minister have any guidelines? What, in his estimation, is profiteering and price gouging?

● (1420)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have never said that the reform of competition laws would be a short-term solution to the high prices we are experiencing now, but I did say in my remarks in the House that in the long run the guarantee of fair prices in the marketplace would be an open and competitive marketplace.

With respect to the comments of the hon. member, he and his party last week had an opportunity to put forward their proposals with respect to food prices when the New Democratic Party put its motion before the House. The official opposition had nothing to suggest but that we call an election. I think the hon. member's response to high food prices is to bluster and to make a lot of noise.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the people of this country would certainly welcome an election so that they could get rid of this tired, worn-out government. If the minister wants proof of that, all he has to do is go to any supermarket check-out counter on any Saturday afternoon and he will get the message loud and clear. This do-nothing minister has assumed responsibility outside this House, but then tries to shrug it off inside.

When can we expect some action from this government, which promised action when it opened this parliament in 1974 when it promised incentives and an adequate return to producers and fair prices to consumers? We had a strategy on food prices last February. When are we going to get some action from this government?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member does not understand very well, but I said that in the short-run, especially with imported fruits and vegetables, nothing can be done. Nothing much can be done in the short-term with respect to those other than to have a good information program which would help Canadians understand that there are many good, nutritional alternatives available which are much cheaper.

Our department led the way in encouraging the introduction of no-name generic foods which are a good price saving with respect to many foods, and also the development of no-frills stores which are also a very innovative development which will help bring down food prices. There are many other things and I would be glad to discuss them with the hon. member.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ONTARIO DOCTORS WITHDRAWING FROM OHIP—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCE ON MEDICARE PLAN

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say that there are also nutritional alternatives to this government.

My question also deals with the problem of prices, but it is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It deals with the price of medical care in Ontario. It arises from certain questions which my leader asked the Prime Minister, in the absence of the minister, on Friday.

The minister knows that both the Medical Care Act and the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act of Canada provide certain clear criteria for federal contributions to provincial medical care programs. We know that Canadians must have equal access to medical care and that no charges can impede this access either directly or indirectly. In view of the number of doctors who are leaving the plan to charge higher fees, will the minister agree to meet immediately with those responsible for the medicare plan in Ontario to see that it meets these requirements of federal law?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, over the last six months or so we have observed different signs that the medical care plan may be eroding. It is surely very fragile right now. I am not referring only to Ontario. I am also thinking of talk of deterrent fees. Other provinces have been testing public opinion in that regard. Of course, we are witnessing the opting out of physicians in Ontario. In Ontario, 17.9 per cent of the physicians have opted out of the medical care program. I have instructed my department to develop guidelines, through consultations with provinces and to make the results of these discussions public, with a view to defining where barriers have developed which prevent access to medicare for Canadians.

I also want to say that on the agenda of last week's meeting of March 6 and 7 of all the deputy ministers of health in Canada, this question was thoroughly studied. I want to reassure everybody that, of course, the federal government will not see eroded the benefits which Canadians derive and enjoy under the national medicare program.

Mr. Rae: My supplementary question to the minister is this. In Ontario, the number of doctors leaving the plan has increased by at least 40 per cent. As the minister has just said, this departure of doctors from OHIP not only takes the gut out of medical care but also represents an inflationary attack on patients because patients are now paying $600 or $700 for operations and only getting about $400 or $450 from OHIP.

My question to the minister is this: What do these surcharges do to the principle of fairness and to free access to medical care for all Canadians, and what will she do about it apart from simply carrying on investigations and consultations with the provinces?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to underline that the situation is serious. So far as I know, it is one of the most serious situations for social security in all of Canada. For instance, Alberta, so far as I know, did not have an opting out provision and extra billing but has now permitted it. That is very dangerous in terms of eventually breaching the universality and accessibility of medicare for all Canadians. The hon. member might think this is a very easy question to solve, but Ontario does not have information to describe what that extra billing represents on which only partial information exists up to now.

As I have said—perhaps I did not put it clearly enough—I have instructed my department not to wait for the provinces to give us that data. Instead, we should seek out all information we need directly to decide whether, yes or no, it is time to withhold payments and eventually give notices to provinces.

Mr. Rae: If we in this party appear skeptical as to how seriously the government is taking this problem, it is because it was only when it was raised by my leader that the government responded at all or even said it was a problem in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Wake up.

Mr. Rae: In view of the information which the minister has given us, which we can supplement, that nearly 50 per cent of doctors in Hamilton and over 50 per cent of doctors in Peterborough and Orillia have dropped out of the plan, will the minister undertake to give to the House detailed information, not only as to the level of medical service but also as to what the cost of medical service is and how much it is going up as a result of the surcharges which the doctors are now charging in Ontario?

Miss Bégin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, of course I am willing to give information, but the hon. gentleman has just asked a very vague and general question. He is obviously brand new to the topic, because months ago we discussed that very problem in the House. If we had a description of the situation of all the provinces on the agenda of the meeting a week ago, I would not wait for the leader of that hon. gentleman to wake up and speak of medicare.

Oral Questions

[Translation]

FINANCE

GOODS AND SERVICES DEFICIT—INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES GOVERNMENT WILL TAKE

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the deficit relating to goods and services reached a record level of $8.73 billion in 1978 and economists are generally predicting a deficit of over $9 billion in 1979, I want to ask the following question: As Canada's prosperity depends on our capacity to produce new technologies to improve the competitiveness of our industry, but since, as the deficit relating to goods and services indicates, we are losing ground in this area would the minister explain what he intends to do to correct that situation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we expect an improvement in the situation with time because as the hon. member may realize, the trade surplus increased considerably from $2.9 billion to $3.5 billion last year. For the month of January of this year alone, we had an increase of $100 million. We are also hoping the tourist deficit we have been experiencing for the last several years is going to improve. The growth of these deficits was arrested in the last part of the year and the more competitive Canadian dollar gives us reason to hope that the deficit will start to come down in that area in 1979. So I believe the situation will improve in coming years. We are confident our new competitive position on world markets is going to help us considerably with our trade surplus, and at this time the high level of our balance of payments is not alarming when related to gross national income. The proportions are generally the same as in past years.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear the minister because he is always optimistic when he talks about the deficit but at the end of the year we note that his forecasts are always proven wrong. That is regrettable. While there is general agreement to identify the deficit for goods and services with a poor technological performance why is the government constantly reducing its support for research and development as that sector could probably restore, at least in part, a positive balance with respect to goods and services?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the last two budgets that I gave in this House considerably increased tax incentives for research and development and that my colleague, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, is now conducting a study with all departments to increase the efficiency of the services provided by the Canadian government to industries and universities for scientific research. I know that in the last few years the government has made considerable efforts to promote research and development in the Canadian economy.

[Miss Bégin.]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, this is once again unfounded optimism since the OECD clearly shows that Canada has one of the lowest rates of participation in research and development among its member countries, with a fantastic yearly contribution of 1 per cent of its gross national product.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have just given explanations about the previous budgets. I imagine that the OECD studies mentioned by the hon. member were made before these new initiatives were taken by the federal government. We want research and development to be carried out in private industry and this is why we increased tax incentives to help achieve this goal.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REASON CANADIAN DOCTORS LEAVING FOR UNITED STATES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by a member of the New Democratic Party concerning the medicare scheme.

I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether she is aware of the fact the average income of a doctor in Canada is substantially less than that in the United States, and whether the minister has been able to determine if this has been a factor in 800 well established Canadian graduate physicians having left this country for the United States in the past year?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member is of the profession, he may be naturally asked by his friends to be a lobbyist in the House in favour of higher fees for medical doctors.

Mr. McGrath: Shame.

Miss Bégin: Of course, the wage structure of the United States is much higher than that of Canada for all classes of occupation.

An hon. Member: Not true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: As far as I remember, medical doctors in Canada are still at the top of the list of average wages in the annual publication of Revenue Canada. This matter has nothing to do with the House and should be asked in the proper legislature. I would very much like to know what the hon. member has to tell the House about what just happened in Alberta concerning the manner in which fees were settled.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the inflation rate last year in Canada was somewhere in the range of 9 per cent or 10 per cent, and that the increase per visit for the family doctor was from $7.20 to $7.35, for a grand total of 15 cents, can the minister indicate whether she thinks this is an outrageous increase and it is fair for the medical profession?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I can repeat only that it is not for this federal House to pass a judgment on provincial settlements.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: However, I should like the hon. member to explain why Alberta has not permitted physicians to opt out, and why extra billings have risen so much recently that the public is complaining and that the commission issued 10,000 questionnaires to look into what is happening?

Some hon. Members: Order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REPORTED DECLINE IN REAL INCOME OF CANADIANS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my initial question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It arises from the new publication of the Conference Board in Canada entitled "Industrial Relations 1979 Outlook and Issues". This publication came out of a round-table discussion where seven experts passed on our industrial future during this year. At page 2 of the release, referring to the anti-inflation program of the government, it reads:

> The program was not effective in controlling prices, but was clearly effective in reducing wage settlements. The experience of declining real income for over a year cannot be expected to induce moderate demands at the bargaining table.

Would the Minister of Finance indicate if he agrees that real incomes on the part of wage earners in Canada fell during 1978?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the figures in front of me, but it could be that it was the situation in 1978. If we take the longer view than that, we will realize the net increase in take-home pay by Canadian workers over the last three or four years is above the growth of the gross national product in Canada, and much more than the take-home pay of their colleagues living south of the border.

It is extremely important for the Canadian economy, in order to maintain the competitive position of Canadian businesses and goods, if in 1979 everyone decides to be reasonable and collaborate with the federal and provincial governments to maintain a competitive cost in Canada so that we can take full advantage of the new competitive position of the Canadian industrial sector.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, who indicated that there was a real income drop for wage earners in Canada last year.

As the Conference Board in Canada indicated that the wage settlements in 1979 will have to be in the 8 per cent to 9 per cent range if real incomes are not to continue to be eroded, would the minister indicate if he sticks by the guidelines he brought out in February, 1978, dealing with Canada's economic middle-term projections and targets? At that time the minister indicated that average wage settlements in Canada should be 7 per cent, based on prices rising only 5 per cent.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have not issued any guidelines this year. We have said that everyone must show restraint, and in negotiations with our own employees we attempted to achieve a good level of settlement, but we want to make sure we are not leading the country into a new period of inflation. That is why I am pleased to report that the public sector, both federal and provincial, by the end of 1978 was two points below the private sector. This is a good change from the situation in 1974-1975, when the public sector was the leader.

Everyone must show restraint. Sometimes circumstances can warrant lower than the federal level, or higher, but I think everyone should keep in mind that we must maintain the competitive position of Canadians in world markets.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. So that we may get a better handle as to where the minister and his government see the Canadian economy evolving, I should like to direct the minister's attention to page 62 of his economic projections in February 1978, at which time he indicated that the share of the gross national product going to wages and salaries would fall during the 1978 to 1981 period, while profits would rise from their 1977 level during that same period.

Will the minister confirm whether it is still the government's position that the wage share of the GNP should fall somewhat, while profits should go up?

● (1440)

Mr. Chrétien: I think, Mr. Speaker, that in the last four or five years the share of profits in relation to the total Canadian economy has fallen very substantially. I hope that with more profits, those profits will be used for reinvestment so we will improve the capacity of production in Canada, creating more jobs for the workers who are looking for employment.

I do think there is a realization that we need some profits for reinvestment in Canada. For example, a group of workers in my province has settled quite reasonably because they want the pulp and paper industry to reinvest in more modernization and productivity so it will maintain its competitive position. I would like to congratulate that union for taking that responsible stand.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO ALTER HOUSE INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The house insulation program has been very successful in the Gaspé area. I have received representations asking that this program progressively be made applicable to houses built before 1970. Can the hon. minister tell the House if he expects to make any changes to the house insulation program to increase the amount of grants and change the criteria so that tenants or owners of houses built before 1970 can benefit from this program?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that these two excellent suggestions are now being studied by my department in co-operation with the department of my colleague responsible for energy, mines and resources. A decision in this matter should be made within a few weeks.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON STATE OF ECONOMY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, who spoke in Alberta Saturday night to a vanishing breed—Alberta Liberals. He said at that time, and I want to ask him about this:

> We wail about our weak economy, we talk about too much government and inflation and unemployment.

The minister said that the reason for all of this is that "Canadians are suffering from crabbiness" and that we do not have a positive outlook on a healthy economy. Is it the minister's position that our economy is in the shape it is, with high unemployment, 9 per cent inflation and a 21 per cent increase in food prices, with a decline in the value of the Canadian dollar—that all of these things are caused by Canadians' crabbiness and that the government has nothing at all to do with it? It is just that we Canadians are too crabby; is that his theme?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member started off on the wrong wicket. I was not in Alberta on Saturday; I spoke to a very enthusiastic group of Liberals in Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: John, you are still confused.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I pointed out that some Canadians are crabby—and I see a lot of them across the floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: But many other groups in Canada do not accept the doom and gloom philosophy that is preached by some members across the floor, because they recognize the underlying strengths of this country. I pointed out that a lot of businessmen are putting their money where their mouths are and reinvesting, as the Minister of Finance just indicated.

I pointed out that a lot of Canadians are travelling and buying. I pointed out that a lot of foreign investors are interested in this country as a good investment, and I pointed out that about 800,000 to one million people from other lands fight, plead, request and apply to come to this country. I suggested that I would place my bets with the people who see this country as a land of great opportunity, in good shape economically now and for the future, rather than with those who are crabby, some of whom I have pointed out.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, if the minister spoke in Saskatchewan to a group of Liberals, he must have spoken in a phone booth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: My supplementary question is this. The Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) has told Canadians that "the fat times are over". The Minister of Finance in September, 1977, blamed Canadians for "bitching", and the Prime Minister said "Canadians are a bit soft, and they have to be told they're soft".

Is this the official policy of the government, that we are too crabby, too fat, too bitchy and too soft; that it is all our fault—and will the government now give the Canadian people a chance to defend themselves by calling an election?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, this is a kind of interesting exchange. We did not need a phone booth; we had to take two extra rooms, I believe, in the Hotel Saskatchewan to accommodate the overflow of people who wanted to come and hear some common sense rather than the kind of nonsense they are hearing from the hon. member. I think he was really giving himself a self-description when he made that comment on the kind of Canadians I was referring to as being crabby and lacking confidence in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

STEPS TO ROLL BACK UNFAIR PRICES AND PREVENT FURTHER INFLATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for York-Simcoe, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance based on the study issued recently by the Conference Board in Canada. However, I am not concerned about a review of statistics or predictions the minister may have made in the past; I am concerned as to what he is going to do now.

In view of the fact that the Conference Board says this is likely to be a tough year in industrial relations because unions are trying to catch up with rising prices, and in spite of the by-play we have had about this sort of thing, will the minister give serious consideration to the finding of ways to roll back unfair price increases so that we can protect the consumer and save this country from another round of inflation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is possible in an economy like the Canadian economy to control just one small sector. It cannot work this way. We decided in the fall of 1977, when I became Minister of Finance, that we were to get out of controls and put our faith in the market economy, and that is what we are doing at this time. We are trying to make sure that there are no abusers. We have created a commission to look into this problem in order to help the workers of this land.

In the last budget we increased very substantially the tax incentives to those people, through indexation and through other tax cuts, and I do think the take-home pay of Canadian workers has increased regularly over the last few years and they appreciate that, particularly if they compare their situation with the situation in the United States. They want at the same time to make sure that they do not contribute to another round of inflation which could lead us to more controls. If everyone will take his responsibility, we will all be better off.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister made the assertion that the federal government cannot exercise its powers in respect of just one sector of the economy. I would point out to him that the Conference Board in Canada said precisely that the anti-inflation program was effective in holding down wages but did not control prices, so that is the answer to the minister's statement.

May I put the question to the minister again? In view of the fact that the issue facing our economy at this time and throughout this year is unfair price increases, especially in selective areas, will the minister not get serious with this matter, forget his constitutional and his technical problems and find some way to deal with this very real problem that faces the people of Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: I am very startled by the assertion of the hon. member that I should not be worried about the constitution of Canada. There are some limitations in the constitution that do not permit the federal government to establish controls unless we are in a crisis situation, and we have to accept that fact.

An hon. Member: You did it for wages.

Mr. Chrétien: For the hon. member, with his experience, to say that is very surprising to me, particularly when he suggests that I should not pay attention to the constitution. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to take the Conference Board as his bible, I would point out that the Conference Board predicted last summer that unemployment in Canada this winter would be 9 per cent, and it is only 8.1 per cent; so I would rather not rely on them all the time.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

JOBS LOST THROUGH BANKRUPTCIES—WAGE CLAIMS OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Each year, $4 million in wages and several thousand workers' jobs are lost due to employer bankruptcies, and, some claim, many times more.

Could the minister assure the House that he will try to ensure that employees will continue to have first claim on back wages owed to them, rather than first claims being given to secured creditors such as banks and mortgage companies, or merely establishing a limited fund for employees?

● (1450)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the bankruptcy reform bill was introduced in the Senate last week. It provides that wage earners will rank at the top of preferred creditors with an increase in their preferred claims from $500 to $2,000 for each employee, but they do not rank ahead of secured creditors.

On the other hand, we have provided for a study to determine the feasibility of a funded insurance program which would protect employees of bankrupt companies. That seems to be the best response to that kind of problem.

STATUS OF WOMEN

PARTICIPATION OF WOMEN IN DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for the status of women. He will recall that in January of this year the chairman of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women suggested that she was quite disturbed at the exclusion of women from the employment strategy of the Department of Employment and Immigration. In particular, she asked whether there were any women on the regional working groups of the department.

Since the minister indicated in his report tabled last Thursday that there will be some inclusion of women only on subcommittees with respect to the federal-provincial discussions and strategies on employment for women, could he indicate whether this represents a failure in attempting to persuade his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to allow women full participation rights on a very important aspect of employment strategy as formulated by his department?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, the proposals that have been put forward are quite clear and women have full participation rights on those committees.

I might mention to the hon. member that the Advisory Council issued a press release last week indicating that they are particularly satisfied with two elements contained in the report which represents many areas where important steps will be undertaken within government and interested groups, in particular in the area of data collection and a study of women in the economy. The Advisory Council adds that it is pleased that the federal government has produced a plan which includes many of the council's recommendations which have been already submitted to the government.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since, in the words of the minister, the Advisory Council seems pleased with some of the recommendations, could he indicate whether he has had any response, or has he consulted with the Advisory Council on their action, along with the six provincial bodies on February 22, to appeal the discriminatory aspects of the Unemployment Insurance Act with respect to part-time workers?

The minister refers twice in his report to the importance of part-time workers both to the public and private sector, yet there is no recognition of the discriminatory aspect of recent legislation on the part of his colleague. Can he indicate whether the Advisory Council is satisfied that this objection has been met, or what action has been taken in view of the appeal that is presently before the Human Rights Commission?

Mr. Lalonde: I repeat to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that the Advisory Council has indicated its satisfaction with the plan of action put forward by the government last week. That plan of action is going to be further examined and studied by the Advisory Council at its next meeting. I have no reason to believe that the steps announced by the government are not meeting the full support of the Advisory Council.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS' ACCESS TO CONFIDENTIAL RECORDS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. I believe he will be aware of reports in the past few days that criminal investigation branch and security service officers have for a number of years had access to the confidential records of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Pursuant to a direction or instruction of July, 1964, these officers may have believed, giving a broad interpretation to that instruction, that that activity had in fact been authorized or condoned by their superiors.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Is that instruction or directive still in force? Is this activity, wherein confidential documents of the Department of National Health and Welfare are available to these law enforcement officers, still being carried out?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has created a great deal of ongoing interest in all members of the House. The hon. gentleman will recall that last year I indicated to the House that a directive had issued from the commissioner of the RCMP at my request, so that there was no doubt but that all activities that did not strictly conform to the letter or spirit of any law were to cease. I understand that directive was issued in August, 1978.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not quite sure that the Solicitor General's response would lead me to believe there has been an abrogation of that particular instruction or directive.

Apparently, the access to the confidential records of the Department of National Health and Welfare has been for the purpose of tracing missing or wanted persons. Let us assume that is a vital or important law enforcement tool. Can the Solicitor General tell the House why legislative or regulatory authority has not been sought from him or his predecessors by the various law enforcement agencies? If it has been sought during the past 15 or 20 years, what has been the response of the Solicitor General or his predecessors regarding permission to legalize this rather dubious activity?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any requests that have been made to any of my predecessors. There were no requests made of me.

I might indicate that the question of the process relating to the investigative instruments that are made available to the RCMP, and how these can be made available to them either by the regulatory process or by the legislative process, is one of the issues that the McDonald commission is charged with deliberating on and making recommendations.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ASSISTANCE FOR HALIFAX SHIPYARDS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It concerns the recent exchanges between the minister and the government of Nova Scotia with respect to the Halifax shipyards.

It is my understanding that the minister has recently expressed great reluctance on the part of the government to move ahead with further aid to the Halifax shipyards. Could the minister indicate in a specific way why, in face of the Nova Scotia government's clear indication of accepting their share of any further developmental capital so that the yards can get into new construction, at this time the federal government is reluctant to cost-share in the needed improvements?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if I expressed these few doubts it is because we are now reviewing the whole Canadian government shipyards assistance program and what I am now considering is an application by a company for development and some modernization. We received all the information only in early March. In fact, I have had the information at my department only since the first week of March, a few days ago. We therefore had certain reservations. Before making a decision about the file now before us, we want to know precisely what will be the commitments of the provincial government to support development and operations of the seaport and Nova Scotia shipyards, especially in Halifax, because we cannot proceed only on the basis of a commitment by the Canadian government.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. What measures has the government taken, or what conversations has the minister had with his colleagues, the Deputy Prime Minister and the president of the super board, with respect to ensuring that Canadian shipyards and, in this case, the Halifax shipyards, have fair access to the six or eight new trawlers that National Sea Products Ltd. are going to build?

Has there been any discussion with National Sea Products Ltd., with the province of Nova Scotia and his colleagues in the government to determine or develop a move which would make it possible for Canadian shipyards to receive the business of building the six new trawlers?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that consultations have been held and are even now under way with a view to establishing clearly how to program our undertakings with the shipyards in various cities of Canada. In the case of Halifax, I think discussions are now in progress. As I have indicated, we have a specific application for assistance from the Halifax shipyard and the hon. member is well aware that we are now looking into how best to help the specific project submitted to us. Of course, all that has to be considered in the context of the global project of much greater importance because in the case of Halifax, one project alone will not be enough. Consideration is being given to other expansion projects I am very familiar with.

ENERGY

UNITED STATES AIRCRAFT FILLING WITH FUEL AT CANADIAN AIRPORTS

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and relates to a problem I brought to his attention last week. I spoke of the practice of U.S. airlines filling up their aircraft completely with fuel in Canadian terminals such as Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, which is very wasteful of fuel. They are taking on more fuel than is required, because of the apparent shortage in the United States. I wonder what the government intends to do to stop this great inefficiency.

● (1500)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all clear that there is any particular legislative authority that the government has to interfere with a normal commercial transaction. The airline companies have had their sources over the years, of course. But I will be pleased to take a look at the matter.

FINANCE

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I saw him speaking with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and maybe at long last veterans will get a break from this government. However, that remains to be seen.

I want to bring to the minister's attention, again, the employment tax credit program that was the panacea that was supposed to create 50,000 jobs. To date, as I understand it, only 15,742 jobs have been created, which means that this program is a complete, disastrous failure in my opinion. The government has been tinkering with the program since its introduction.

What special steps does the government intend to take to make this program more attractive? It is the only wage subsidy I know of where people are not running after it in order to pick up the money. There is something wrong somewhere. Can the minister give me the answer?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when we put this program forward a year or so ago, we indicated to the House that, according to experience in other countries, there is a time lag between the moment it is put forward and its implementation. I have received information that over these last months the program gained much speed and a much larger number of Canadians showed an interest, and hopefully the question put by the hon. member will make a larger number of businessmen aware of this program, under which they can get an income tax credit of up to $2 an hour when they hire a new employee.

I think it is a good program. Unfortunately, employers did not take advantage of it as soon as we had hoped, but the program is still available and we have reason to believe it will be increasingly used over the coming months.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, that answer is complete boloney. We heard the statement about six months ago, I think by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, that he was going to go with the program. Does the minister not realize that this is a cash flow situation and the employer cannot wait for his money?

Is the minister giving serious consideration to the possibility that the employer will get the money when he takes on an employee, rather than waiting six or seven months? That is the problem and that is why the program is a complete disaster.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, that is another attitude of the opposition which complains about the level of expenditures of the government. Today they are proposing another scheme by which we would be spending more money and further increasing the level of expenditures of the federal government. I think the tax incentive that we are giving is a good system. Of course, some people have to wait until they file their tax returns.

Mr. Alexander: That is the problem.

Mr. Chrétien: That is the problem. But we have decided, Mr. Speaker, that we have to limit the expenditures of the government. We want to be responsible. We are not going across Canada, like the Tories, promising up to $6 billion in all sorts of incentives and at the same time complaining about the level of the deficit.

Mr. Stevens: That is not true and you know it.

Mr. Alexander: You are full of boloney, sir, and you know it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RAINES—SUGGESTION PROCEEDINGS IN HOUSE MISREPRESENTED BY PRESS

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a matter of privilege concerning an article written by Canadian Press and also a publication put out under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc).

My authority for raising this matter of privilege is as reported in part by Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice Nineteenth Edition. At page 153, under the heading "Misrepresenting Members' Proceedings", it reads as follows:

—misrepresenting their proceedings in parliament, is a breach of the privilege of this House, and destructive of the freedom of parliament.

Also I want to refer to the proceedings of the House of Commons for Monday, March 5, 1979. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) placed a motion under Standing Order 43. I have no quarrel with the reporting in Hansard. The motion as passed read:

That this House reaffirms the right of Canadian sealers to go about their legitimate pursuit under the strict supervision of the Government of Canada and the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies, free from harassment and interference.

The motion appeared on page 3795 of Hansard. Further down the page it says:

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

My quarrel arises from a published report the following day in the Ottawa Journal for March 6, 1979, which has just been brought to my attention and which reads:

Meanwhile, in the Commons MPs gave unanimous approval to motion giving full support to the sealers taking part in this year's hunt.

I did not give support to that motion, Mr. Speaker.

Further, there is a publication entitled "Questions and Answers on the Seal Hunt". This publication has also just been brought to my attention. This pamphlet is produced by the information branch of Fisheries and Oceans at Ottawa, Ontario, and comes under the aegis of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. On page 1 of this booklet at the bottom of the page it says:

In March 1977 the Canadian House of Commons unanimously passed a resolution reaffirming the right of Canadians to hunt seals.

Every member of this House of Commons is not in unanimous support of that. Therefore, I feel the proceedings of this House have been misrepresented. I ask that this pamphlet be withdrawn by the Ministry of Fisheries and that that matter be placed on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has raised this matter by way of a question of privilege. He may have a point of discussion that he wants to pursue but he has not been individually wronged by that report; he is not mentioned in it. In addition, the pamphlet reported an event which occurred one week ago today in which all members present in the House unanimously approved that resolution. I do not know how else they could report it. In order to be fair and to report it accurately it would have to name those members who were here and those members who were not here. That would be a more difficult situation than the one which the hon. member has addressed himself to already.

Therefore, while I say the hon. member has a point of interest and discussion, it surely does not constitute a question of privilege.

MR. YEWCHUK—RESPONSE OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege arises from a response which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) gave me in answer to a question I had put to her. I think her attitude was rather despicable in that she accused me, or seemed to impute motives in my question. She suggested I was here as a lobbyist for the medical profession. In my view, that was a rather cheap shot on her part. It was not up to her to attack my integrity as a member of this House by suggesting that because I am a member of the medical profession I am in some way in a conflict of interest situation each time I ask a question in the health field, and particularly when my question relates to the medical profession itself.

It has been a long established practice in this House that medical doctors who are members of parliament are interested in the health field and they ask questions on all aspects of the health care delivery system. If the minister is allowed to get away with this, I do not see how any doctor in this House can get up freely as a member to speak on health issues. If he does imputations will be made in the same way.

To carry this one step further, if a medical doctor cannot speak on health subjects, how can a veteran who is Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), or how can a farmer who is Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), or how can a lawyer who is Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde), not be accused of being in a conflict of interest situation since they speak in areas in which they either have had direct connections or still do have direct connections? I can also mention the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is a old age pensioner and frequently raises questions dealing with pensions; yet for some strange reason that seems to be quite all right.

I would say that if the minister is allowed to get away with this imputation of motives we are going to be left with a situation where only members who have no medical background will be allowed to ask questions concerning the health field and those knowledgeable in the health field will not be speaking in this House.

I ask that a ruling be made on this matter. I have been faced with this problem on a number of occasions in the past. As Your Honour will recall, a similar question of privilege was raised on behalf of members of the press gallery.

In my opinion, the minister should withdraw that imputation of motives. With all due respect to you, sir, if she does not I would suggest that we take at least a day to review the blues to make sure that this question is properly settled once and for all, so that I will feel free to perform my duties in this place as every other member is entitled to do.

• (1510)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to withdraw. I think my answer was extremely clear. As the hon. member will read tomorrow, I never used the expression "conflict of interest". I logically concluded that the hon. member, being a member of the medical profession, had a natural interest, not at all a conflict of interest. My answer was extremely clear. I did not impute any motive other than the natural and logical interest the hon. member has for the members of his profession, which is a good profession. I simply asked him a few questions regarding what was going on in his province. I did not at all infer what he wants to use in order to do something politically.

Mr. Speaker: My recollection is that the minister said she could understand how the member may be in that position. I do not have the recollection that she indicated a direct accusation of any sort. However, I have to go by memory. The minister says she wants to review the transcript. When the hon. member and all of us review it, we will find if there is anything wrong. We will review it and see tomorrow if any matter deserves to be pursued on the basis of what is contained in the transcript.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I might recall to the minister now the words that I heard her use. Being a fair minister, she might be prepared at this time to bring this to a conclusion. The words she used were "being a lobbyist for the medical profession". In the context that that word was used, and on the basis of the way the answer was given, there can be no other rational conclusion than that the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) was asking his question with motives that were ulterior and improper. Maybe the minister did not intend to put it that way. However, what I got from it is quite clear. Maybe on that basis the minister might withdraw. As the hon. member for Athabasca said, we will have to put ourselves in the position where we come into this House, like some people I see from time to time, with no expertise about anything.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if those words were used, the minister should examine section 16 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. She will find that she not only imputed improper motives, but imputed an activity to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) which is contrary to that statute and contrary to the law. The minister admitted in the course of the interchange that she did use the word "lobbyist", which certainly has an ulterior aspect to it, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) suggested. If she is not prepared to withdraw it today, I believe the matter should be held open so that you can examine the question, particularly in view of the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I just want to confirm that I did use the word "lobbyist". If politicians are afraid of that word, I just do not understand the context of it any more.

[Translation]

I think the situation is clearly degenerating into a game. I invited the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) to check the official report himself tomorrow: he will see that I never used the expression "conflict of interest." We are all lobbyists since we are all politicians and the quibbling in this House is going beyond any imagining.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Once again I think the only sensible course is to examine the transcript and see if the matter needs to be pursued in any way tomorrow.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF MOTIONS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 60(2), I wish to table four notices of ways and means motions and ask that the orders of the day be modified to allow us to discuss them.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order arising from the tabling of these documents by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I believe the minister asked for some time to make a statement. I wonder if that can be confirmed. Will we be getting a statement concerning these tariff changes affecting various food products?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of making a statement. I am following the normal procedure of tabling a ways and means motion in the House. I do not think it is necessary to make a statement. I am willing to send a copy to the hon. member.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RIGHT TO COUNSEL AFTER ARREST OR DETENTION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-466, to amend the Criminal Code (right to counsel).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, this bill establishes and defines the right of an individual to legal counsel after arrest or detention, sets out a mechanism for obtaining it and provides penalties for those who wilfully violate this right.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITION

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENTS IN RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a petition. It has to do with our old age pensioners. If anyone wants to accuse me of lobbying for a better deal for our senior citizens, I plead guilty. I have been at it since 1942.

This petition is presented on behalf of the Saskatchewan Senior Citizens Action Now Association. It is signed by about 8,000 persons. The petition requests an increase in the amount of the old age pension, a lowering of the eligible age, steps to make it possible for senior citizens to remain in their own homes, as well as other improvements for our older people. I have the honour to present the petition and I recommend it to the consideration of the House.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 943, 945 and 1,161.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

INDUSTRIAL DESIGN ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 943—Mr. Crosbie:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76 (c) 1976-77 (d) 1977-78, under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Industrial Design Assistance Programme (IDAP) or any successor programme under the Enterprise Development Programme (EDP), what was the number and total value of contracts (i) between $0 and $5,000 (ii) between $5,001 and $10,000 (iii) between $10,001 and 25,000 (iv) between $25,001 and 50,000 (v) between $50,001 and $100,000 (vi) $100,001 or more (vii) in total?

2. For the same years, what were the expenditures of the Department under the Industrial Design Assistance Programme (IDAP) or any successor programme under the Enterprise Development Programme (EDP) in (a) the Textile and Consumer Products Branch (b) the Agriculture, Fisheries & Food Products Branch (c) the Chemicals Branch (d) the Electrical and Electronics Branch (e) the Machinery Branch (f) the Resource Industries Branch (g) the Construction and Consulting Services Branch (h) the Transportation Industries Branch (i) all branches?

3. For the same years, by province and territory, what was the total in grants and contributions by the Department under the Industrial Design Assistance Programme (IDAP) or any successor programme under the Enterprise Development Programme (EDP)?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: Please see tables for response.

POINTS OF ORDER

DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I notice on the order paper there are about 1,200 questions to be answered. At this speed, 400 days will be required to answer all the questions at three questions a day. I hope the parliamentary secretary will see that the government does a better job than this so that we can at least have another 200 or 300 questions answered before the election.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I placed some questions on the order paper last October; questions Nos. 73, 74 and 75 on October 11, 1978; No. 215 on October 16, 1978; No. 297 on October 18, 1978; Nos. 320, 323 and 324 on October 19, 1978. I have received no reply to these questions. I see no real reason why these questions cannot be responded to. I ask the parliamentary secretary to use more than due despatch to get these replies to me immediately, as they are of some concern to my constituency.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, although I did have a question on the order paper answered today for which I am very grateful, I wish to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary question No. 1,167 which I placed on the order paper on February 19. I hope to have an answer to that within the next few days.

● (1520)

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, on October 17 I placed a question on the order paper directed to the advertising campaign by Post Office Canada entitled "It Hurts". I take it the only reason I have not had an answer is because the answer hurts the government. I wonder when we could have that reply.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): I am a little surprised at the comments made by the hon. member from Edmonton. There may be some 1,200 questions listed on the order paper, but as he and the House well know a great many questions have been answered in addition to the three which were answered today. All I can say is that we do our best to provide these answers as quickly as possible.

I might add that I could come up with the names of, say, three members of this House who among them account for 20 or 30 per cent of all the questions on the order paper. It is not possible to answer all these questions in one day but we do our best to provide answers to them.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as all hon. members know, it is my intention to call Bill C-42, the energy supplies bill, today. However, as a result of discussions which have taken place it would be my intention at eight o'clock to call the housing bill, Bill C-29, which almost received final approval on Friday. A number of members have an interest in this and if there were agreement that we could call third reading and dispose of it not later than ten o'clock, I would seek the approval of the House to alter the order of business and call that measure after the dinner recess this evening.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with respect to that order of business, and as so much work has been done by my hon. friend for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) and others with respect to improving that measure it is now in a position to be dealt with almost immediately. I am grateful to the government House leader for proposing to call that bill at eight o'clock this evening. The order that it be completed by ten o'clock is quite proper in the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) used the phrase "and others" I am sure he was referring to my hon. friend, the member for Broadview (Mr. Rae).

Mrs. Pigott: Absolutely.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Discussions have taken place as stated and we are prepared to agree with these arrangements. I do not ask that it be made an order, but I express the hope that the speeches tonight will be short so that as many as possible of those who wish to participate in the debate on third reading will be able to do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, the government leader informed me earlier of the desire to change the order of business, so that Bill C-29 could be discussed at eight o'clock this evening. I understand the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) is anxious to have this bill passed. As far as we are concerned, we will have very brief comments to make at the third reading stage, and have no intention of impeding its going through by ten o'clock this evening as desired.

[English]

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I certainly was not privy to these discussions but I prefer to give consent because of the need to get this bill through. It should have gone through last week.

Mr. Speaker: I take it, then, that the House is giving its consent to the presentation of a motion which will indicate that the order of business should be changed so as to take the report stage of C-42 followed at eight o'clock by consideration of Bill C-29, and that at ten o'clock this evening all questions necessary to dispose of the third reading of that bill will be put. So part of the order is that the House take Bill C-29 under consideration at eight o'clock on the understanding that it be disposed of by ten o'clock. Though it is not part of the order, the suggestion is that speeches be brief so as to accommodate as many hon. members as possible. Surely the spirit of that suggestion will be taken into account.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURES TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members are aware, there are six motions standing on the notice paper to amend Bill C-42 at this stage. I have had an opportunity to give them some consideration. Three of them, Nos. 1, 2 and 5, deal with separate subjects and ought in my opinion to be discussed separately and voted upon separately.

The remaining three, Nos. 3, 4 and 6, all of which are in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), deal with allocation and it is my impression, subject to further suggestions which may be forthcoming from the House, that they should be grouped together for discussion. Presumably, a vote on motion No. 3 would dispose of motions Nos. 4 and 6. Of course, as the debate progresses I am always open to suggestions that this arrangement be varied; if it appears that a motion required some other treatment I am always in the hands of the House in that regard. However, as I say, my original impression is that the three motions in the name of the hon. member for Peace River may be grouped together and that a vote on motion No. 3 would dispose of Nos. 4 and 6.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I think you are probably correct, Mr. Speaker, I would point out, though, that we are dealing with different types of order here; one is an amending order and the other is an allocation order. However, I have the impression that if the government is unreasonable with regard to the first one, ministers opposite will continue to be unreasonable with regard to the other motions, so we would be saving time by following the arrangement you have proposed.

I was about to rise on a point of order in any event. During your consideration of my three motions your Honour will no doubt have observed that No. 3 is set out in more detail than Nos. 4 and 6. My thinking was that if the government, in one of its rare moments of reasonableness and lucidity, was prepared to accept the first motion, then because the provisions of Nos. 4 and 6 are to some extent based on the fact that No. 3 might be accepted, I put them forward in a somewhat abbreviated form. Your Honour may have noticed this. At the time I was drafting them I received a memorandum from on high calling for the conservation of paper, otherwise I might have set them out at greater length. My meaning, though, is quite clear.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology) moved:

That Bill C-42, An Act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be amended in Clause 9 by striking out line 19 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"(4) The Board shall study and keep under review all matters relevant to a full understanding of the international petroleum supply situation and shall from time to time report thereon to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources together with such recommendations as appear to the Board to be appropriate and relevant to ensuring that Canada is fully prepared to meet any petroleum supply emergency with well prepared and timely plans for action.

(5) Canada's representation on the Standing Group on Emergency Questions within the International Energy Agency shall, if the emergency oil sharing system provided for in the Agreement on an International Energy Program is activated, be under the direction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who shall appoint Petro-Canada to be Canada's representative on that Group.

(6) Petro-Canada, in fulfilling its function under subsection (5), shall be responsible to the Chairman of the Board and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

(7) The Board and its members are".

● (1530)

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to question whether these amendments in the name of the minister are in order at this time. The other evening in the committee when we were able to get any information at all out of the minister there was certainly no indication that these amendments would be anything like the amendments which came forward in the committee. This is now the report stage of this bill. I suggest that where amendments change the very intent and meaning of the entire legislation—and I hope to be able to prove that to the Chair very briefly—this is not the time or the place for amendments like that to be entertained by the House.

There are two main purposes for this bill. One is to have a legislative framework to give the government the authority to declare a national emergency with regard to energy supplies, distribution and usage in the event of a national emergency which may be completely domestic in origin. The second main purpose is to have a legislative framework in place for the allocation of oil supplies in this country in the event of an international stoppage or an emergency in the oil supplies and petroleum supplies industry.

These two amendments go to the very heart of those two purposes, and in my submission they change very drastically the intent, meaning and administration of the bill which was passed by this House at second reading. There was no hint that these very important amendments were coming either from the minister, the government or any representative of the government in the very prolonged and late hours we put in on Thursday night when the committee dealt with and passed this bill.

The first amendment would give the allocation board set up by the bill the power to study and to keep under review all matters relevant to a full understanding of the international petroleum supply situation. This is directly contrary to what many of us believed, following the word of the minister, in the committee the other evening. The implication was that this board would be run only by part time individuals who would not have very much to do unless the government of the day declared a national emergency or in the event that our responsibilities were triggered under an international agreement.

The first amendment, as I read it, would give the board the responsibility, the function and the duty—whether or not there was a national emergency—to set up facilities and staff to study and keep under review all matters relevant to a full understanding of the international petroleum supply situation and to report from time to time to the minister. That was not the meaning or the intent which was conveyed to the committee the other evening by the minister himself. I cannot quote the actual words the minister used last Thursday evening because as far as I know those proceedings have not yet been printed or published. We simply do not have that information here. However, when questioned about the make-up of the board, the minister indicated that there may be no person involved with the board other than the chairman and that the other six members of the board might not even be appointed. The minister said he wanted it that way so that there would be flexibility.

According to the minister's remarks at second reading and according to his clearly enunciated intention in the committee the other evening, this board really would not come into full force and really would not have very much in the way of duties, staff or budget unless there was a national emergency, and a national emergency would be proclaimed by order in council. Only then would the board's powers and the bill itself be brought into full force and effect. That is in contradiction of the amendment which is being brought forward at this late stage by the minister.

My submission is that the first amendment is very clearly out of order. If the minister wants to withdraw the amendment or if he wants somehow to return the bill to the committee where there could be proper questioning and a proper explanation of the amendment, we would be very happy to oblige. At that time perhaps the matter could be dealt with, although I do not really believe that a government amendment of this magnitude and importance with respect to a bill such as this should be introduced even in the committee. However, we could argue that point in the committee. I think we would all be happy to hear the minister in the committee and to ask him questions in the proper atmosphere and in the informal manner in which that type of interrogation should take place.

My submission is that an amendment which completely changes the administration, the purpose and the intent of a board which was to have full powers of administration only when a national emergency was proclaimed by order in council should not be introduced at the report stage.

The second amendment in the name of the minister is of the same nature. The secondary purpose of this bill is to set up some type of domestic allocation scheme as part of our responsibility under an international agreement Canada signed in 1974, if your Honour can believe it. One of our responsibilities is to have in place a legislative framework so that in the event of an international shortfall in petroleum supplies the government will have in place some domestic allocation scheme under the aegis of the International Energy Agency. Indeed, it was that 1974 agreement which set up the agency and an allocation scheme.

At no time previous to this has there been any intimation whatsoever that the Canadian state-owned oil company, Petro-Canada, was going to be Canada's representative to that agency set up under the international agreement. Nor was there any intimation by the government or the minister that Petro-Canada was going to fulfil its function by being Canada's representative, thereby having full control over allocation and the administration of this very important agency and this very important scheme in the event of an international crisis or an international shortfall in energy supplies.

I think the minister will agree that this is a very important amendment. It is not the type of amendment which should come before the House for the first time at the report stage of a bill after committee stage. It surely should have been presented in the committee the other evening by the minister so that we could have the benefit of his views and get into questions and answers in respect of the amendment.

The minister may be perfectly right that the bill is meaningless without these kinds of amendments. The minister may be perfectly right that it is part of an important government policy that Petro-Canada play the leading role in the event of an international oil crisis. I do not believe that but, nevertheless, the minister may believe that. If he does, certainly the time for him to spring this mammoth change in government policy should have been prior to the report stage of this bill.

● (1540)

My submission to you, sir, therefore, is that the minister withdraw these amendments, or perhaps the minister would like to indicate that he would like to see the matter referred back to the committee. In either case we would be happy to oblige. But at the report stage to bring these amendments to the House, to hon. members, to the public, to the industry and to other governments which have not been consulted in respect of any of these matters, is a surprising turn of events. I would also suggest to you that it is completely out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I think we must be clear on one fundamental point, namely, that there is no procedural deficiency in these amendments simply because they were not introduced in the committee. We must be clear on the fact that the right to take advantage of proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 75 in respect of report stage amendments is in the Standing Orders, and therefore if the motions are otherwise in order, the fact that they were not introduced or that there was no indication in the standing committee that they would be introduced might have something to do with propriety but has nothing to do with procedural regularity.

However, that does not end the discussion and I am prepared to listen to arguments that the motions might be out of order. But they have to be so on the merits of the argument, not simply based on the fact that they are introduced at the report stage and were not introduced in the committee.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assist in your consideration of whether motion No. 1 is in order. First, I would draw Your Honour's attention to the proposed new subclause which, as my colleague has just pointed out, deals with Canada's representation on the standing group on emergency questions within the International Energy Agency, and in turn indicates that the minister will exercise direction with respect to what will be our role if that program is activated. It then goes on to state:

—the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who shall appoint Petro-Canada to be Canada's representative on that group.

The point I want to make initially is that if we read the royal recommendation with respect to Bill C-42 we find that it deals entirely with matters within Canada. There is no suggestion that the royal recommendation covers anything of an international nature. It states:

His Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled "An act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages of market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada."

I suggest that when we read subclause (5) we find it deals with an entirely different subject. It deals with the question of what shall be Canada's representation on the standing group on emergency questions within the International Energy Agency, which, as my colleague has pointed out, is an agency which was first referred to in 1974. So I believe that unless you find that the royal recommendation has anticipated this type of clause, on that score alone the motion should be ruled out of order.

Second, I should like to point out that it is proposed that the minister exercise direction regarding what our participation in the International Energy Agency shall be, and that he shall appoint Petro-Canada to be Canada's representative on that group. It is fundamental in law that an agent cannot in turn appoint an agent. Yet we have here the suggestion that the minister will appoint as his agent Petro-Canada to sit at some type of council table. Petro-Canada cannot sit to negotiate at a table; it has to negotiate through a representative or through its own agent. On that basis as well the clause should be ruled out of order.

If the minister had wished to say that he would appoint a representative of Petro-Canada or the chairman of Petro-Canada, or if he had used some such terminology, perhaps the clause would be in order, but on its face the suggestion that this parliament would empower the minister to appoint Petro-Canada to a body must fall because Petro-Canada as such cannot take a seat or in any way be represented other than through an agent or a representative.

I suggest that on those two counts the motion should be ruled out of order with respect to subclause (5).

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to contribute to this debate a few brief comments because I agree with my colleagues that motion No. 1 is most certainly out of order. You are well aware of citation 773(1) of Beauchesne's fifth edition, which states:

An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the bill, beyond its scope or governed by or dependent upon amendment already negatived.

It is my view that this amendment is beyond the scope of the bill. I endorse the arguments of my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), as well as those of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) who indicated that there was absolutely no indication in committee, after an hour's debate, that an amendment such as this one would be coming up. So it came as a surprise to see this motion on the order paper.

Regrettably, I did not have time to look up the Petro-Canada Act but I am certain that an amendment was introduced by this side of the House after a great deal of strenuous debate that Petro-Canada may receive policy directions from the governor in council. The original bill as presented by the government contained the provision that the minister could direct Petro-Canada to obey his written instructions, but the act was amended so that only the governor in council could give policy directions to Petro-Canada. The reason for that was to remove day to day interference.

Subclause (5) of motion No. 1 indicates that the minister shall have responsibility for the emergency energy program and that he shall appoint Petro-Canada to be Canada's representative on that group. In order to fulfil his responsibilities, therefore, he would have to give directions to Petro-Canada in a way that is contrary to the provision to which I referred in the Petro-Canada Act. Those kinds of day to day instructions are simply not permissible under the act.

My other more general point has to do with the International Energy Agency. The International Energy Agency is an outgrowth of an agreement on an international energy program, which is a treaty signed by a number of so-called western industrialized nations, including Canada. It is not an act of this parliament, not a treaty sanctioned by this parliament, but an international treaty which can be changed by an international agreement. It is a treaty from which Canada may well want to extract itself if we achieve self-sufficiency. Indeed, we would be wrong to carry on international obligations beyond those that are to Canada's benefit.

It seems to me most inappropriate and going beyond the scope of the bill to include a motion which addresses itself to appointing Petro-Canada to be a representative on an international group. The title of that group could very well change by mere amendment to the international agreement which was not sanctioned by this parliament. The agreement could lapse very quickly without any sanctions from this parliament, and yet, if this motion is passed, parliament would be directing the corporation to take up membership in a group which may or may not have any longevity and which is created as a result of an international agreement from which we might want to extract ourselves in the near future.

I submit respectfully that this energy agreement was negotiated by the governor in council and the standing groups were as a result of international agreements at government level. I submit that is a quite separate and distinct question from the scope of the bill, which deals with setting up allocation and rationing procedures in Canada if and when the need arises.

Any amendment to Petro-Canada's authority and responsibility rightfully belongs in amendments to the Petro-Canada Act and not in an act dealing with allocation and emergencies. The Petro-Canada Act spells out the responsibilities, obligations and authorities which Petro-Canada receives from the minister. In essence, the motion amends the Petro-Canada Act. Clearly that is not included as part of the royal recommendation or any other part of the act.

As I have indicated, I endorse the reasons put forth by the hon. member for York-Simcoe and the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. Therefore, I submit the motion is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: There are other hon. members who wish to discuss this matter, but I do not want to leave the argument just presented by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) without saying that I think his last point is the most telling. Other points were made relating to proceedings in committee and as they relate to report stage, and there were arguments concerning the international aspect of the matter. I am not as concerned with those because the board will come into existence in a certain manner and for a certain purpose. Obviously the board has domestic responsibilities and it will be constituted for the purpose described in the bill. Without being constituted for its purpose, the board has no powers at all because it does not exist.

Once being constituted in conformity with this statute and all parliamentary aspects contained within the statute, whether it is wise or unwise to give it the power or responsibility to examine international situations as an incident of domestic responsibility is not my question. At least, it is sufficiently incidental to the functions of the board, once it is set up under the act, that I would have great difficulty in finding the motion procedurally out of order on those grounds.

The argument put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Centre is one which has troubled me since first the point was raised, and that is whether this is the first introduction of any activity by Petro-Canada into the statute. As the hon. member argues—and I will have to examine that question—if in order for Petro-Canada to assume its responsibility it must be given powers which it does not have under the Petro-Canada Act, which in other words would constitute an amendment to the Petro-Canada Act or an effort to amend the Petro-Canada Act by amending the statute, then that amendment would be clearly out of order. Of course, there will be arguments in support of the other side, and I will have to reserve and examine the matter, but that is one point raised by the hon. member which concerns me.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would be concerned if Your Honour were to brush lightly over the fact that the committee dealt with this matter in almost indecent haste. We met until midnight or one o'clock in the morning to discuss this matter and to accommodate witnesses who came from all over the country. If we were to accept these amendments on report stage in the House of Commons, really we would make a farce out of the committee system. The minister was questioned repeatedly in front of other witnesses as to his intentions regarding the setting up of this permanent board. We were concerned about another bureaucracy. The minister assured us that the board would not be activated until there was a clear emergency declared by the governor in council.

We asked the minister why the bill was structured in that manner, and he said that there would be a chairman, a secretary, and he was very vague about the other appointments. As a matter of fact, there was a suggestion by the New Democratic Party that Petro-Canada should be appointed to that board. The minister had no objection to that, but he could not commit himself to appointing special members or special interest groups to the particular board.

Contrary to the minister's testimony before the committee, with this amendment before the House the board will be a permanent one. It will monitor not only domestic but international developments in the energy field.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we ought to be very clear on that point because it seems to be in some question. I read the amendment to give to the board, obviously once constituted, the incidental power of inquiring into the international situation in order to discharge its functions of emergency supplies, allocation, control and things of that sort. Obviously the board cannot have that function or any other function until it is called into existence for the purposes and in the manner set out under the statute. Perhaps we ought to be very clear on that.

Mr. Oberle: With the minister's amendments, the board will be brought into existence now. We are not waiting until an emergency happens; the board will be set up now. At one point we had a bill before us to establish the framework in which the governor in council could react to an emergency. Under certain circumstances he must call parliament into session after a certain point in time. That was the intention of the bill, but now it goes further; it establishes a permanent board without an emergency. That is an important factor.

Witnesses representing the oil industry appeared before the committee. Imperial Oil did not attend, but certainly both national petroleum associations attended before the committee. In questioning the minister assured the committee that Petro-Canada does not play any preferred role in the petroleum field in our country; it is to compete in the marketplace like any other company. Also the minister indicated that it was never the intention of the government to establish this company with a preferred position.

Now Petro-Canada will be the agent on which the minister will rely to tell him, first, when there is an international or domestic crisis, and second, to advise him on how he or the governor in council should react to such crisis. If that is not a preferred position of one competitor in the business, then I do not know what is. Surely this goes far beyond not only what the bill intended in the first place, but far beyond the testimony the minister gave before committee. It makes the committee system a farce and it deceives the witnesses who appeared before committee in good faith. I would ask Your Honour to consider this motion on those grounds.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to point out that clause 3 of Bill C-42 reads, "There is hereby established an Energy Supplies Allocation Board—". The board is established by the statute. I gather programs will be referred to it and it will be examined by parliament from time to time; but clause 3 indicates that it is hereby establishing an energy supplies allocation board. Thus, by the passage of the act the board is established. Futhermore, there was an amendment in committee to clause 3 indicating that one of the members shall be a senior official of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is Petro-Canada, not "Perro-Canada."

Mr. Speaker: It reads "Perro-Canada", but I am sure it is Petro-Canada. Surely the notion that the board will be established by the statute is not a new one. The manner in which it is given a program of allocation may come into play in discussion; but the board is established upon passage of the act, or at least it is enabled to be established by the passage of the act. Thus, that cannot be a new consideration.

Respecting the role of Petro-Canada, as I said to the hon. member for Calgary Centre that may be an extension of the powers of Petro-Canada. If it is, I will have to examine it and see if it is out of order. However, obviously the position of Petro-Canada must have been considered because the amendment passed by committee is that one of the members of the board shall be a senior official of Petro-Canada.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will not go over the same ground which Your Honour has observed already. As hon. members opposite have mentioned, it was a late evening. Some of us stayed right to the bitter end and some did not. It may well have been that some of the concerns of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) respecting these kinds of questions might have been answered if the member had been able to stay to the bitter end. I am not blaming him for not staying to the bitter end; it was a long evening and we did a lot of work. But it is quite clear the hon. member is under some misapprehension even as to the nature of the act itself.

• (1600)

As to the whole question of the creation of the board itself, you do not need to have a war in the Middle East in order to create the board; the board will be created. I think that point has already been covered by you, Mr. Speaker. The board will come into existence with the passage of the bill.

The second aspect which I think is very important relates to the submission made by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) to include Petro-Canada on the board with a reference specifically to the chairman. That was amended at the committee and the bill before us now contains the words "a senior officer of Petro-Canada". There was no argument by opposition members at that time about whether this was procedurally correct. They voted against that particular provision, and I give them their due there; but there was no procedural question about whether Petro-Canada could be added to the emergency supplies allocation board, any more than there was any question about when the emergency supplies allocation board would be created.

There have been suggestions that the report stage should deal only with amendments which have already been considered by the committee; I think that was the burden of the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. Clearly that is not the practice of this House, as evidenced by the fact that a member of his own party, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), has introduced three amendments that are before us now but which were not introduced before the committee.

Mr. Lawrence: He gave notice.

Mr. Gillespie: I acknowledge that this amendment we are producing was not dealt with before the committee, but nor were the three the hon. member for Peace River has introduced. He is not a member of that committee.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham says we were given notice. I do not know in what form we were given notice. He may have made some general statement that there would be other amendments, but there was no indication of what the nature of those amendments would be.

There has been a charge that Petro-Canada for some legal reason should not be nominated as a representative of the standing group on emergency questions and as part of the senior administrative body of the emergency oil sharing agreement of the International Energy Agency, of which Canada is a senior member, I suggest that Petro-Canada is a corporation and the hon. member should be the first to realize that as such it is a legal person and therefore can be nominated. There was some suggestion that this would be beyond the confines of Petro-Canada, that this was somehow extending the powers of that corporation. I would think that a reading of the act would indicate that Petro-Canada has very wide powers in respect of representing Canada on international questions. Indeed, Petro-Canada has been acting for and representing Canada on international matters, whether they involve international oil companies or discussions already going on with the International Energy Agency. Indeed, I have reason to believe that the International Energy Agency would welcome Petro-Canada's association with the operation of the emergency oil sharing agreement.

There are a number of committees set up under the oil sharing arrangement by the International Energy Agency, and I will deal with those in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, when we get to the substance of the amendment if you rule that it is in order.

Quite clearly the International Energy Agency set up under this emergency oil sharing arrangement will have to rely on the competence and knowledge of multinational oil companies, and I think it is in Canada's interest that our national oil company be alongside to protect Canadian interests when the implementation of this oil sharing arrangement is undertaken.

In committee Petro-Canada was added to the membership of the emergency supplies allocation board itself, and it seems to me to be even more important now that Petro-Canada be included and designated as our watchdog with the other multinational corporations that will be involved in the implementation of that oil sharing arrangement. After all, all hon. members will remember it was not so very long ago when one of the international oil companies, Exxon, involved itself in the diversion of crude which was destined for Canada. It is in that kind of situation that I think it is important that Canada should be involved, in order to guard against this sort of thing.

There were other allusions by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) about the domestic rather than the international nature of this, which shows, once again, it seems to me, that the opposition is not really seized of energy questions today. Hon. members opposite somehow seem to think that these matters are self-contained in Canada and are not created internationally. That hon. member obviously has not read my remarks on second reading; nor has he followed the details of the discussion during the committee stage. Had he done so he would have recognized that one of the reasons it is necessary to have this bill now is that the international situation may create circumstances under which the International Energy Agency will be called upon to act. That is why the powers are being sought at this time.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Petro-Canada has been involved in international questions. I submit this is not beyond its mandate, and that these amendments are fully consistent with the practice of this House.

I cannot see that the other questions which have been raised require further attention. I think it was argued by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham that we were in some way changing the powers and the duties of the board. That is correct; we are amending the powers and duties. That is the purpose of this amendment, just in the same way as hon. members themselves amended the membership of the committee with the addition of a senior officer of Petro-Canada.

I submit that this particular amendment is in order, and I submit it is essential that Canada be represented on the International Energy Agency by the Canadian national oil company in order to protect us in the implementation of a program which would otherwise be implemented almost exclusively by multinational oil companies.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This matter has been rather thoroughly argued. There are two or three points I have to consider, one of which I may have to take under advisement for some time, depending on the arguments advanced during the debate. There are some I think I can deal with now.

Report stage proceedings as described in Standing Order 75 are independent of committee proceedings and, therefore, I cannot find motions at the report stage as being out of order simply because they were not previously presented. Report stage is, in fact, independent to a very large degree of the committee stage of a bill. As long as the Standing Orders and the precedents in respect of report stage are adhered to, I am in no position to interfere on a procedural ground simply because a motion may be raised for the first time at the report stage. Therefore, I cannot set this motion aside on this ground.

The second point has to do with the scope of the bill and whether the motion introduces a new concept that goes beyond the original scope of the bill, thereby rendering it out of order. With respect, I think I must conclude, as I mentioned during the course of the argument for the benefit of those wishing to make further contributions, that it is not for the Chair to attempt to decide the full effect of the consideration or the passage of any clause by the House when making an examination of the procedural regularity. Certainly the Chair must be bound by the conditions as they are found, as there may be some complication as a result of the details once an amendment of this sort is passed. I have to address myself only to the general question.

The purpose of the proposed statute is to establish a board for the purpose of dealing with emergency energy supply problems. The purpose of the motion that is before me now seems to be that, in the course of addressing itself to the domestic supply situation, the board shall look into the international aspects of Canada's oil supply. I cannot find that function so different from or unrelated to the function given the board under the statute that I should rule the motion out of order. It seems to me to be an incidental function. It is not for me to decide whether it can or cannot be done or whether it may lead to complications. I have to decide whether that function is sufficiently incidental to the basic function given the board under the main statute that I am to consider it a procedurally regular amendment to the bill.

I do so find that it is so related to the function put forward for the board in the bill that this incidental function which is described in the amendment is one to which the House ought to address itself in debate and decide. Therefore, the motion in that respect cannot be found to be procedurally out of order.

It was argued that the effect of this amendment was to establish the board now, whereas previously the statute had only the intention of establishing the board in the face of a national emergency. To me, the clear language of clause 3 provides that the board is established when the bill is passed. It may be activated in certain ways—by the triggering of an emergency or other things done by orders in council—but, nevertheless, the clear language under the statute is that the board "is hereby established". Therefore, I have to put that argument aside.

It seems to me this leaves me with only one argument, that put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). To find in his favour may put the House in a rather awkward position. The House is faced with clause 3 which reads as follows:

There is hereby established an Energy Supplies Allocation Board consisting of a chairman and up to six other members to be appointed by the Governor in Council to hold office during pleasure and one of these members shall be a senior official of Petro-Canada.

If I were to accept the hon. member's argument that service on this board, or in turn on the related international committee which is referred to in the amendment, by someone from Petro-Canada or by Petro-Canada itself as a legal entity constitutes an extension of the function of Petro-Canada, presumably I may have to rule that part of the bill out of order as well and that might put the House in a rather difficult spot.

In any case, I have indicated to the hon. member that I am concerned about the point he has raised. I think I have to reserve that point and examine very carefully the substance of the debate on this motion to see if during the course of the debate I can be satisfied that in fact this function by Petro-Canada is an extension of its functions as described in its own enabling statute and requires an amendment to the Petro-Canada statute. If it does, then I would agree with the hon. member for Calgary Centre that, if an attempt is being made here to amend the Petro-Canada statute, the amendment in that respect is out of order and I would have to strike the Petro-Canada provision from it. On the other hand, if it is simply a function which may be additional to what Petro-Canada is doing now, but not requiring additional statutory authority, then I would think that the amendment could probably stand.

I will therefore examine the arguments on substance and before the question is put to the House return to rule on the point raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted quickly to address this question of clause 3 which was amended in committee. The original amendment put forward by the hon. member for Sault Ste Marie (Mr. Symes) specified that the chairman of the board of Petro-Canada would be a member of the energy supplies allocation board. The consideration of extra duties for Petro-Canada occurred to me and I took the view that that was directing an individual, not an organization. It was not dealing with new duties for Petro-Canada per se, but for an individual. The language was amended by members of the government to "a senior official of Petro-Canada." I think the argument would still hold that we are talking about extra duties for an individual, whereas paragraphs (5) and (6) of motion No. 1 proposed by the minister impose additional responsibility on Petro-Canada, the organization.

The Petro-Canada Act laid out in detail the responsibilities and obligations of this new Crown corporation. To add additional obligations and responsibilities to this Crown corporation, which paragraphs (5) and (6) of motion No. 1 do, is, in essence, amending the Petro-Canada Act.

That would be the basis of my point of order. I do not think we are in trouble regarding the assignment of a senior official of Petro-Canada, an individual, which is quite different from assigning new responsibilities to a Crown corporation whose responsibilities are spelled out in detail in an act specifically directed toward that goal.

Mr. Speaker: If I understand that last point correctly, then, I would take it that in the view of the hon. member for York-Simcoe and the hon. member for Calgary Centre it is not a matter of the principle that is involved here—that if subclause (5), instead of the words "Petro-Canada", had "the chairman of Petro-Canada", and in subclause (6) the same, that it was "the chairman of Petro-Canada" and not "Petro-Canada," the matter would be procedurally in order.

It seems to me that it is a self-defeating argument. If we are worried about introducing a new element or function for Petro-Canada, what is the difference between introducing new functions for the chairman of Petro-Canada, who is, after all, created by the same statute, and for the Petro-Canada corporation itself? In other words, it seems to me that the hon. member is saying that he is not objecting to it on the grounds that there is an extension of the powers conferred in the Petro-Canada statute so long as it is done in respect of the chairman but not in respect of the corporation.

I have to worry about whether it requires an amendment to the Petro-Canada statute. Surely if it requires an amendment to the Petro-Canada statute to do it for the corporation, it will equally require an amendment to do it for the chairman whose existence is as a result of the statute.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have been distressed about this last point for the last few minutes, and if I may I should like to go back in order to give assistance to Your Honour.

We as a parliament clearly gave to the National Energy Board power over the judicial function of managing the oil industry in Canada when we originally passed the National Energy Board Act. We also gave the board the policy function of advising the government or carrying out government instructions in the policy field. That bill became an act of parliament in 1959.

Since that time there has been a battle within the civil service to take away or reduce in measure the powers of the National Energy Board which parliament had put in place to control the world-wide operation of our oil industry by the "big seven". This was a Canadian effort to give control over import and export of energy to the National Energy Board only.

Coming back to this particular bill, we find that on two occasions specifically, if there is a clash between the board that the minister is setting up and any law or regulation of the National Energy Board, this bill has priority.

When we saw the royal recommendation we thought this was purely a bill for emergencies within Canada. We said the measure should be in place in case there was an emergency. I would point out that if that is so, if we are trying to sneak Petro-Canada on to this allocation board—which in the eyes of the National Energy Board is simply a Canadian company, and nothing else—to give it priority of place in decisions dealing with the duties of the National Energy Board on the import and export of oil for energy, we are moving into a very dangerous political field.

I do not think my observations to you bear exactly on the point of order totally but I think they strengthen the position originally taken by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), namely, that in this whole matter we as a parliament must be clear.

In 1959 we gave certain powers to the National Energy Board. Over and over again in the last 20 years there have been efforts to reduce that power. Now there is another clear attack on that power in the setting up of an energy supplies allocation board ostensibly to control emergencies in Canada. It is giving to that one oil company Petro-Canada—which is simply one of the clients or companies in Canada that takes direction from the National Energy Board—either through its chairman or through the allocation board itself, the power to overrule for national purposes the function parliament has already given to the National Energy Board.

I think that if this background were in Your Honour's mind as you were considering the point, it might help you to see it in perspective. I do not envy you your job of trying to decide.

● (1620)

Mr. Speaker: There have been several arguments left with me already. I am anxious to have the debate commence so that we can get into the merits of the matter as to the function of Petro-Canada within this context. I do not think I can usefully consider the procedural aspect of it any further at this point. I would like to get on with the debate. I have reserved on the procedural regularity on the basis of whether the introduction of Petro-Canada into this agency constitutes an extension of the Petro-Canada function that requires statutory control. If that proves to be the case—and I think I will get some enlightment on that aspect during the course of the debate—I have already indicated that I would hold that part of it out of order. If not, then I think it ought to stand.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address myself to some of the questions you have raised.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order which has not yet been made. Perhaps the minister might want to reply to it.

Mr. Speaker: I see the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) and the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) want to make a contribution. Perhaps I can hear the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, then the hon. member for Welland, then the hon. member for Algoma and conclude with the minister. Everyone has introduced arguments already. If I hear one member a second time, surely I should hear everyone a second time. I do not know to what extent we can carry this on. I would like to have all the arguments in hand before I try to decide the matter. I do not see how I can decide the question of the position of Petro-Canada until we get into the debate and hear from the minister what Petro-Canada is going to do.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is rising. There are other members. I will hear them.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House appreciates your patience and tolerance. I am sure Your Honour is aware that the committee dealing with this matter sat until a very late hour on Friday last. It was on Friday, under the rules of the House, which obviously have to be changed in respect to this matter, that amendments had to be put in. Because of the weekend which intervened none of us in this House have had an opportunity to look at these amendments and the notices of the amendments. These came to our attention just this morning.

There is one other point which should be raised at this time. When Your Honour is doing some research into the powers and the authority of Petro-Canada itself, could you also take a look at the make-up of the International Energy Agency? This was set up under a 1974 treaty signed by this government and there are now 18 other signatories to that agreement. Basically the administration of the International Energy Agency is carried on at three different levels, as far as representatives of government are concerned. Of course, there is the secretariat which handles the administration, but the three levels of decision-making within that agency, as I understand it, are as follows. I quote from Article 50 of the treaty:

> The Governing Board shall be composed of one or more ministers or their delegates from each participating country.

As a matter of fact, I believe our own minister is on the governing board, or used to be. Certainly that is a clear indication that the governing board of the International Energy Agency itself has to be composed of people at the ministerial level as far as their being representatives of the countries that are signatory to the agreement is concerned. The next level down is the management committee. In this case I am referring to Article 53, which reads as follows:

The Management Committee shall be composed of one or more senior representatives of the government of each participating country.

Obviously this means that a representative, if not from the ministerial level, should be chosen from at least the top civil servants of the government of each participating country. The third and final level is that of the standing groups. Subsection 1 of Article 54 of the treaty says:

Each Standing Group shall be composed of one or more representatives of the government of each participating country.

I suggest that in actual practice, and in regard to the technical language of the International Energy Agency, the persons who are representatives of governments in respect to the standing groups, where the minister's amendment purports to place a representative of a state-owned oil company, are composed of one or more representatives of the government of each participating country. Under the language that is almost the same for each one of these levels of the agency itself, it is inherent that the representative or representatives of this country on the standing groups of the International Energy Agency should be members of the government, senior civil servants or members of the bureaucracy. By that I mean civil servants and not necessarily public servants.

I suggest to you, sir, that research should be done to decide whether Petro-Canada itself has within its incorporating statute the power to be a representative of the government or whether it is independent of the government. In my opinion, it is not possible to send anyone else but a senior civil servant, or a civil servant, to be a member of Canada's representation on the standing group of the International Energy Agency. Again, to do so would be out of order because Canada is a signatory to that agreement.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I will not enter the argument about who will represent us on the International Energy Agency. In my opinion, it is important to mention the duties given Petro-Canada when the act was passed by parliament. It was to enter into the retail, wholesale, distributing, drilling, and exploration fields just like any other multinational oil corporation. As for serving on a national committee, there is no good reason why it would not be eligible from its incorporation preambles in the bill, as far as I remember them. The appointment of an official, after all, depends upon his acceptance. The government cannot insist that the official designated has to act. It is purely a courtesy. I see no reason to get into an argument as to who will be appointed, whether he is a member of Petro-Canada or not. If that is mentioned in the bill and it is the government's policy to do so, I think that is quite in order and I agree with that.

On the other point, I believe that some research should be done.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on the argument concerning the use of Petro-Canada, the act establishes the energy supplies allocation board. The minister in making his speech indicated that there would be representatives of producers, of consumers, of provincial governments and so on. It seems to me it would be most unusual if Petro-Canada, which I understand is the eighth highest gas producer in the country and is high on the list as an oil producer, was set up to be a window on the industry and was not represented on the board. There will be other senior representatives on the board including one from the oil companies as well as representatives of consumers and of the provinces. It would be most unusual if the government did not appoint one of its people from Petro-Canada to serve on that board.

● (1630)

I really cannot see any conflict with introducing Petro-Canada. It is the national petroleum corporation of this country. There are going to be representatives of the producers. Why could we not have a representative from our own producer, especially when that producer is not only producing oil and gas but will also be buying oil offshore from Mexico? If that is the group within the Government of Canada or its agencies which is concerned with that, obviously it should serve on that committee.

The other section of the minister's amendment, Mr. Speaker, as you have already suggested, is that this board should study supplies offshore. I can do nothing but agree with you that if this board is not studying the supply situation offshore and reporting to the minister, it certainly would not be doing its job.

I do not see the argument which the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has made, that this representative has to be a senior civil servant as opposed to a representative from PetroCan. The amendment proposes that the minister be the person responsible on this standing group on emergency questions, but this function would be delegated to PetroCan as the representative of the federal government who is intimately involved in the whole question of imports and supply from offshore, and production as well.

I really cannot see the conflict, certainly with the amendment that was made the other night. The minister has continually said that we would have representatives of the producers. In fact, the person who is chairman of the board of Petro-Canada now was the repesentative on some of the standing committees of the International Energy Agency for several years. He is probably more knowledgeable than many civil servants, certainly those who came from Ontario to harangue the committee the other night.

I do not see the difficulty here. The whole mechanism of the bill is to establish the board. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) did not seem to catch that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The only question that remains at issue is the idea of using Petro-Canada in this function. I have no more concern about Standing Order 75 amendments and the international function of this agency as being incidental to its function to ensure domestic supplies. There is no sense going over that ground again. There is only one problem on which I have reserved, and that is whether the choice of someone from Petro-Canada in this regard represents something for which an amendment to the Petro-Canada statute is required.

Mr. Foster: At that point it seems we have within Petro-Canada people working for the Government of Canada through a Crown corporation who are knowledgeable in this field. It would be natural for the minister and the government to appoint them to serve on this International Energy Agency, especially at a time of crisis, and also to have one representative from the Crown corporation serve on the energy supplies allocation board.

Mr. Speaker: I see the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) is interested in getting into the argument which has been going on for some time. I will hear the hon. member for York-Simcoe, the hon. member for Bellechasse and then the minister, which will then conclude the matter.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my remarks to the specific point to which you have referred. I simply draw your attention to a very significant difference in the wording of clause 3 which the minister referred to, which states that one of these members, meaning members of the supplies allocation board, "shall be a senior official of Petro-Canada". I suggest that all that is being stated there is that out of the virtually hundreds of people that the government might choose to go on that board, the bill that went through the committee says that one of those people should be a person who is also a senior official of Petro-Canada.

The reason I stress that has nothing to do with the powers within Petro-Canada. In no way does that indicate that Petro-Canada is being called upon to do anything. It simply states that an official of Petro-Canada shall be one of the people who will sit on that board. If you like, it is almost as if by coincidence, but for obvious reasons, in their wisdom the majority in committee felt it was wise to have somebody who is an official of Petro-Canada also act on that board. I stress that has nothing to do with the powers of Petro-Canada itself. It is as if the committee has suggested that included on the board should be a representatives from the National Energy Board. That is something they could say. In other words, the person would need to be wearing two hats.

I stress this because when we look at the proposed wording in subclauses (5) and (6), it very clearly is not a matter of putting an official of Petro-Canada on to this new board or on to the International Energy Agency. The minister is proposing that he will appoint Petro-Canada as his representative. That is why we then have to find whether in fact Petro-Canada has those kinds of powers. Can it act under any circumstances as an agent of somebody else?

The point I referred to earlier, if we found that they did have that power, is how, then, can Petro-Canada, in effect, carry out that power? Because Petro-Canada cannot speak unless it speaks through another agent which presumably would be an official or some other officer of Petro-Canada. Subclause (6) makes it abundantly clear that they intend Petro-Canada as an entity to act, and it must therefore have the power to act. Subclause (6) says that Petro-Canada, in fulfilling its function under subclause (5), shall be responsible to the chairman of the board. I feel that both (5) and (6) conjure up an entirely different role for Petro-Canada from clause 3, which conjures up no role for Petro-Canada other than the simple fact that a senior official of Petro-Canada shall also be called upon to be a board member as set out in clause 3.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, for my part, I understand quite well the arguments put forth by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) to the effect that this amendment should have been moved in committee. Still, as custom would have it, it is possible to introduce amendments at this stage. We are dealing here with an amendment that would entrust to Petro-Canada, through the minister, the role of representative of Canada with the group that would eventually be appointed to supervise the distribution of oil so that all communities are better served.

I feel, therefore, that it would be wise for Petro-Canada, a Crown corporation, to have a mandate that differs from that of the other members. I have always claimed that when it comes to fighting for the interests of the multinationals, it is a bit like dealing with twin sisters, not like the Dionne quintuplets, but something like that. There were five of them at the time, and they got along just fine. Similarly, we would have a company representing Canada, in a position to keep the government and the minister advised on the way things are going, which would be given the required authority to do so efficiently. So, I feel that we should do so. That is how I see the situation, but the fact remains that the minister must have thought of it last week or in past weeks with his officials. He should not have waited till last weekend to introduce that motion amending Bill C-42. In any event, I have no objection to it whatsoever. I would even say that the bill should be amended in that way, precisely to better guarantee that the interests of all Canadian are protected.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to respond to your invitation to deal with some of these issues. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) talked about the structure of the International Energy Agency. He talked about the governing board of the agency. That board deals with a number of matters, not just emergency oil sharing arrangements. In this bill we are concerned with the emergency oil sharing arrangements, not with the research and development aspect or other questions.

Emergency oil sharing arrangements are handled by a senior committee called the standing committee on emergency questions. Attached to that body is an advisory group called the industry advisory board. A number of international companies are associated with this advisory board and Petro-Canada might be associated with this advisory side, the industry advisory board. But there is a second level down. That is the office of the International Energy Agency allocation co-ordinator. The position of allocation co-ordinator is presently held by the executive director in a dual capacity. His office is concerned with guiding the allocation process. He, too, depends upon advice from the industry, the industry supplies advisory group as it is called. It provides information, it is involved with the co-ordination of the actions of the various companies and it is composed of a selective group of almost exclusively international oil companies. It is advisory, as I say, to the co-ordinator.

The next group down is the International Energy Agency secretariat which is concerned with the implementation of the process. This, too, depends heavily on the international companies. It is concerned with receiving and providing information. It is concerned also with implementing the emergency arrangements through the international companies. As one considers the hierarchy of levels of committees one can see that the international companies play a very important part not just in terms of advice but in terms of implementing the allocation.

We are dealing, then, with international allocation arrangements made by the International Energy Agency. The bill before us is concerned with that process because the agency could trigger the actual proclamation of an emergency situation in Canada as provided in our treaty obligations. Once that happens, the process of allocation will have been determined outside Canada, before the oil gets to Canada, by the International Energy Agency. It will have been determined by the standing group on emergency questions with the advice of international companies. This is why I believe it is essential that we should designate Petro-Canada as a representative of Canada, or as one of the representatives, on this important body.

The question has been asked: Would this in some way go beyond the powers of Petro-Canada itself? I would refer you, Mr. Speaker, to section 3 of the act setting up Petro-Canada. Under the heading "Purposes of the Act" we find the following:

> The purpose of this act is to establish within the energy industries of Canada a Crown owned company with authority to explore for hydro-carbon deposits, to negotiate for and acquire petroleum and petroleum products from abroad, to assure a continuity of supply for the needs of Canada . . .

I believe Petro-Canada under the International Energy Agency would be doing precisely that—watching and guarding Canadian interests.

Hon. members will recall that it was not long ago that the Exxon Corporation diverted supplies in the order of 25,000 barrels a day of oil destined for Canada from Venezuela through that corporation's subsidiary, Imperial Oil. They were diverted despite the fact that Venezuela had stated it wanted them to go to Canada. An international company acted on that occasion against the wishes of the country of origin, Venezuela, and against the wishes of Canada. It is to protect ourselves against activity of that kind—international companies deciding things for their own purposes, not necessarily for the purposes of the system—that we need a watchdog. That is why we consider Petro-Canada to be so important.

We have witnessed increasing activity on the part of the International Energy Agency and international companies in this regard. Very recently the agency decided it would be important for us collectively to reduce world demand by two million barrels a day, roughly 5 per cent of consumption in the IEA countries, and once again the international agency will be depending upon the international companies. I repeat that this is why it is essential for Petro-Canada to be one of this country's designated participants at the top level of the allocation's process, where the allocation process starts. It starts with the international companies. Such participation is fully consistent with Petro-Canada's own act, as well as with the bill we have in front of us, and I hope a sense of urgency, which has not always been apparent on the other side of the House, will impel us to go forward without delay.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The argument is reduced, then, to this. If I accept the proposition that the introduction of Petro-Canada is the introduction of a new element into this bill or that by placing this clause in the bill we would, in effect, be amending the Petro-Canada statute, those aspects of the amendment which relate to Petro-Canada will have to be held to be out of order. On the other hand, if the functions of Petro-Canada are already sufficient under its own enabling statute to permit it to do what is proposed here, then I would have to find that the motions, on the face of them, are procedurally acceptable.

There is another difficulty which I have to face, and that is that there is a limited extent to which the Chair on procedural grounds ought to be inquiring into and interpreting other statutes. So if I am to make a finding in that regard, it is going to have to be a rather fundamental finding, not based on some opinion on the basis of the Petro-Canada statute but, rather, on the obvious face of the terms of reference of Petro-Canada.

Finally, I have to take this into account: If I strike the Petro-Canada provisions from the clause, what I would do is, having found that the international study or the international examination of oil supplies is in fact incidental to guaranteeing domestic supply in emergency situations—I have found that, and therefore I have found that the House ought to debate the clause regarding setting up this international study function of this board.

Then I go on to subclause (5) which says, and I think it quite in order, that the representation on the standing group on emergency questions within the International Energy Agency shall, if the emergency oil-sharing system provided for in the agreement on an international energy program is activated, be under the direction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If I were to find the Petro-Canada portion out of order, my inclination would be to stop the clause there, and then I examine it and indicate that, if I stop the clause there, it would seem to me that the purpose of the clause would be to leave it to the minister to appoint whomever he pleases, and obviously one of the appointments which would be open to the minister would be Petro-Canada. If that is the case, how can I then conclude, not on substantive grounds but on procedural grounds, that the undertaking to appoint Petro-Canada in the statute becomes procedurally unacceptable? It may be substantively so or matter of disagreement, but I have a little trouble there.

So those are the matters I will take into consideration. I do not believe the House will resume consideration of this matter until some time tomorrow afternoon. I presume that the great likelihood, since we are under an order to proceed to the housing bill at eight o'clock and there is every indication that that matter will need all the time through until ten o'clock to finalize it at third reading, is that the House will return to this matter only at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon. At that time I will endeavour to finalize this matter so that debate can go on in an orderly way.

With the permission of the House we could conveniently call it five o'clock now, if that is what is desired, and that would give me the opportunity to decide this matter before we go on.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Status of women—Alleged failure of government to provide equal opportunity for women in public service; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—Air transport—Settlement with union to avoid further deterioration of air safety; the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk)—Health and Welfare—Health care of native peoples.

It being five o'clock, I believe the House is of the disposition to proceed to private members' business and to the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

[Mr. Speaker.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING AIR CREW PROXY VOTING

On the order: Private Members' Public Bills:

October 30, 1978—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of Bill C-260, An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act (air crew proxy voting).—Mr. Forrestall.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before the House proceeds to the motion standing in the name of my House leader, I would like to ask Your Honour if I might withdraw a bill from the order paper, private member's Bill C-260, a bill to amend the Canada Elections Act dealing with air crew proxy voting. I neglected to do this after the matter had been included in amendments to the Canada Elections Act, and I now ask for the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to withdraw Bill C-260 from the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Since the matter is in the possession of the House, the hon. member needs the consent of the House to withdraw his bill, which is Bill C-260 with respect to air crew proxy voting. Does the hon. member have the consent of the House to withdraw that bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUESTED ADOPTION OF STANDING ORDERS THAT ENSURE FINANCIAL ACCOUNTABILITY OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton) moved:

That this House urges the adoption of Standing Orders which will ensure the government's accountability to the House of Commons for its management of Canada's finances.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I hope I did not give you heart failure as you were in the chair worrying that I might not be here. I certainly intended to be here today to deal with this important subject, one which has plagued parliaments and democratic governments in the free world. The matter to which I refer is the lack of control over public finance which seems to exist. When we consider what has happened in this country, we find that government spending has increased from about $11 billion in 1967 and 1968 to an estimated $53 billion in the next fiscal year. It is more and more difficult to obtain effective democratic supervision over such tremendous amounts of money, and this situation, which is acknowledged everywhere, forces us as parliamentarians to ask some very serious questions about the effectiveness of our control over such spending.

Two important factors must be taken into account when discussing this particular problem. How do we create financial organization within the government itself? That is one question. Second, how can we create more effective methods of scrutiny and control in parliament?

The purpose of this motion is to deal with the latter portion, namely, control mechanisms within parliament itself. I respectfully submit that public expenditures should be presented in a form which will aid members in their critical assessment of public spending. Indeed, that is the reason members of parliament come here in the first place.

Canada is not the only country in the world which has had to face this situation. Let me mention two others as examples which show the directions which have been taken in dealing with this problem. In 1947 the United States Congress formed special budget committees in both the Senate and the House of Representatives. These committees study the President's budget and recommend changes in fiscal policy and spending priorities. The newly created congressional budget office provides technical support to both those committees. I do not have to outline to this House nor, particularly, to the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board (Mr. Lefebvre) the difference between Canada and the United States in terms of fora, but it is interesting that this has been done.

Similar efforts to control public spending were established in the British parliament based on the 1969 recommendations of its procedure committee. First of all, in Great Britain the traditional supply estimates are accompanied by an annual white paper which gives parliament specific information on government plans for an immediate three-year period as well as provisional planning for a future period of two years. In other words, parliament has an advance look at the priorities of government in a way which we really do not have in this country. The second aspect is that the old estimates committee has been reorganized to form the newer expenditure committee in the British parliament. That committee is divided into five specialized subcommittees and one general subcommittee. This reconstituted committee takes a much more comprehensive approach to government spending and is better able to assess programs from a long-term policy basis than we are here.

In Canada we have taken some steps as well. In 1969 we established the standing committees of this House as an integral part of the operation of parliament to examine estimates, which are now referred to the standing committees rather than being dealt with in the committee of the whole.

I would be the last to advocate a wholesale return to dealing with estimates in the committee of the whole, although I would be prepared to deal with experiments from the point of view of some estimates from some departments. I know there is some agreement in that regard. Moreover, internally the government introduced the office of Comptroller General for Canada and expanded the resources available to the Auditor General himself. This has also aided the process of budgetary control.

However, with all those steps taken in the last little while—they have been significant steps—there are still strong misgivings in parliament about the ability of the ordinary member of parliament to monitor the financial management and accountability of the government. Parliamentary supervision is one of the cornerstones of our system, and with respect to giving more than lip service in terms of the size of the problem we have not proceeded very far. I suggest that we do not have in the House that kind of control or supervision mechanism that is envisaged by the motion. All the good will in the world will not help us in this task unless we are given the effective tools to utilize in carrying out the task.

In our parliament we need at present more detailed and understandable information on government spending, and that is admitted on all sides of the House. Second, we need a more effective parliamentary committee structure to help us assess the information and make responsible recommendations based on such parliamentary supervision. I use the word "responsible" because I think that gets us out of the field of instinctive reaction, and that reaction of parliament and parliamentarians to this should be based on sure knowledge.

The Auditor General has given a great deal of attention to these points. For example, he underlined in his last report the two main roles of the estimates as follows:

> One is to enable parliament to assess the government's proposed allocation of resources and the second is to establish the basics of future accountability by showing why funds are needed, what resources are needed and who is to be accountable.
>
> To improve the financial control, the following modifications are suggested:
>
> —reorganization of the presentation of estimates: a summary volume which shows how resources have been allocated and departmental volumes showing the planned performance of each department.

That was the first suggestion he made and it is a good one. He goes on to say:

> —More information in support of statutory appropriations.

Those are the payments that are made and funds which must be gathered to carry out the intentions of the laws passed by parliament.

> Such expenses now account for 60 per cent of the budget. We cannot have control without having more information about these expenses.

That is the second recommendation that he made and it is equally sound. Then he went on to say:

> —More information on Crown corporations. Parliament should be able to review their yearly activities.

Crown corporations have assumed a larger and larger role in our system. We can debate that role in individual cases, but they are there and parliament should be able to review their yearly activities in a way which we cannot do now. Finally, the Auditor General suggested that:

> —Parliament should have the same information as is available to the Treasury Board so that it can responsibly assess departmental programs.

I say, why not? If Treasury Board has certain information with respect to programs, why should parliament not have that kind of information?

These recommendations made by the Auditor General indicate the present inadequacy of the spending information parliament now receives. The Auditor General also suggests that, in addition to reporting on estimates and public accounts, parliamentary committees should simultaneously be asked to take into account the larger issues of government spending and program development. This is something that our present system does not allow us to do in the way we should do it and in the way the Auditor General felt parliament should have the power to do.

Many points can be made to indicate the problems of the present committee system in ensuring government accountability relating to public spending. These committees are not sufficiently specialized, they are perhaps too large and memberships rotate too often. I think that despite the work of the parliamentary staff and certain other staff, it is fair to say that specialized staff is lacking, the perception of the committee mandate is too narrow and, in the final analysis, the government's attitude towards estimates examination is negative. With respect to further information, I call the attention of the House to the fact that, notwithstanding that there has been a great number of promises, we are still waiting in the dying days of this parliament for a freedom of information act which would be a fundamental tool of parliament which would operate in this milieu.

With these points in mind, I will summarize a suggestion I made in 1976 to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I consider that it would contribute to parliamentary control of public finance and would put us in a better position to exercise our duty efficiently if we had a standing committee on policy expenditure and programs. Its terms of reference would be to consider the over-all spending priorities of government as well as to consider such estimates as the committee wished to examine on a long-term and extensive basis.

The purpose of this committee would be, in the life of an ordinary parliament, to go in depth into programs of individual departments of government and examine them on a long-term basis so that in a normal four or five year parliament we would be able to go through and examine a number of the important estimates, programs and directions that programs are taking to see whether they are relevant, whether they should be modified, or whether they are meeting the needs for which they were set up. This committee should have available the most complete information about the financial situation of each department and should have access to information which the Treasury Board would have. It would have extensive power, I suggest, with respect to the calling of witnesses. I think that this structure would enable parliament to do its job of monitoring the activities of government in a much more effective way.

There is a development occurring now within the government, that of program evaluation. It is in the state of infancy. The Comptroller General of Canada will have a large part to play in the development of that program. It is something that in terms of the public service is relatively new, and I believe that the internal work with respect to program evaluation could be augmented with respect to the consideration of that work in parliament by a committee structure that would be useful in bringing to parliament those matters which are important to the Auditor General.

I point out to my hon. friend the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board that in a phrase from the Speech from the Throne which opened this session of parliament—and I am sure he will remind the House of that in his speech—it is indicated that such a program would be presented to parliament. We are now in the last stage of this parliament and the program has not been presented here. There have been some discussions—I have been part of them and they have been very helpful—but I think that although it is one thing to create this kind of program within the public service to evaluate the programs that are being carried on, the real nub of our program is to have in this parliament a structure by which the work of the evaluation, in terms of the objectives of policy, can be examined by parliamentarians on all sides of the House.

In my respectful submission to the House—and I hope it will be agreeable to members—I suggest that this motion should be passed so that there will be an expression by the House that it is not our desire here to unnecessarily hold up or obstruct the programs of government. It is merely our desire to balance the right of government to proceed with its programs with the right of parliament and the people to make the government accountable to parliament and to the people for the kinds of programs it brings forward. Also it is our desire to engage the attention of members of parliament in looking at the relevancy of programs in a country which is complex and in a society which is pluralistic. The bottom line of the operation of a democratic government is the accountability of that government. That is the purpose of this motion, and I hope it commends itself to the House.

● (1710)

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) accept a question?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Herbert: This is private members' hour, but nevertheless the hon. member is the House leader for the official opposition. Therefore I assume he speaks with some knowledge of what his party wants to propose as a party platform. I would ask him if he has had discussions. The hon. member has made some interesting suggestions. What type of reaction did he receive from his party to the suggestion that his party would be prepared to incorporate these proposals, if it was in the unfortunate position of being the next government?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question is quite relevant. I speak in the House as a private member, but these matters were put by me as House leader of my party to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization in September 1976 as part of the program of my party to open parliament and return it to the people.

I commend to the hon. member an article written by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) which appeared in The Parliamentarian, a magazine to which we have access that deals with parliamentary problems. The hon. member will see that the Leader of the Opposition alluded in the article to this kind of change. The answer to the question is yes.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is a very interesting motion which has been brought forth this afternoon by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I for one welcome the opportunity to speak on it. I would like to take this time to remind all hon. members of a number of significant changes and initiatives taken by the government to demonstrate its concern with establishing an appropriate accountability framework in the management of government programs.

One of these initiatives was the establishment of the royal commission on financial management and accountability on November 22, 1976. The chairman of this commission, Mr. Allen T. Lambert, said the following:

> One of the overriding objectives of the final report which the commission plans to submit . . . is to establish within the government a workable framework of accountability and control for individual departments and agencies in the management of their affairs, and to strengthen the system of accountability by the government to parliament.

The formation of the royal commission was an acknowledgement by the government that with the growing size and complexity of government today, not only in Canada but in all progressive democratic countries, there is a need to re-examine the means of accountability by the government to parliament.

The commission focused its attention on three main subjects: the role of cabinet and central agencies such as the Treasury Board secretariat and Privy Council Office in establishing priorities, allocating resources and maintaining broad control over individual departments and agencies; the role of the deputy head and the management of departments, and the system of accountability to the minister, the executive, the central organizations and parliament; and the system of direction, control and accountability of Crown agencies.

In the interim report of the royal commission published in November, 1977 some interesting questions were posed. For example, in the present day context can the minister alone continue to be held accountable to parliament for every aspect of the administrative performance of the department or Crown agency? This challenges the fundamental doctrine of ministerial responsibility. What information is necessary to enable parliament to carry out its role as protector of the public purse? Could the performance of parliamentary committees involved in the surveillance of government spending be made more effective? Should there be other means for conducting parliamentary review of the performance of departments and Crown agencies, apart from the consideration of the estimates and the public accounts?

Financial Accountability

The progress report of the royal commission directed its attention to the elusive meaning of the word "accountability". It indicated how it could be effective when the commission reported the following:

> In its simplest terms, to be accountable means to be liable to be called to account for an accepted responsibility, but this definition is not practical unless it is extended to include a judgment upon the performance of that responsibility. Thus, meaningful accountability requires that there be:
> —procedures for setting objectives and goals and assigning responsibility to achieve results;
>
> —a reporting system or systems that provide information on the progress made toward the achievement of goals;
> —a review of the reported results with the purpose of evaluating performance.

In effect, the commission suggested that there are two accountability frameworks which underpin democratic and responsible government. It indicated:

> These are the way in which parliament holds the executive to account for the conduct of its administration of government and the way in which the executive in turn holds the senior managers of the public service and Crown agencies to account for their administration.

The government recognized the dual framework, and that is why it has continued to meet the challenge on two fronts: improving the management ability of public servants, and providing better disclosure of the spending plans and program results through the estimates and public accounts. Furthermore, major improvements in the parliamentary process have been made through such bodies as the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and special committees to examine specific matters.

Another initiative taken by the government to demonstrate its concern with accountability was its examination of direction, control and accountability of Crown corporations. As You Honour is aware, a blue paper was produced on this subject in 1977. The paper examined such difficult questions as to what extent Crown corporations should be used as instruments of public policy when the pursuit of policy objectives may detract from the financial performance of such corporations. Also it examined how increased responsiveness to public policy can be reconciled with the arm's length relationship which in theory a public enterprise requires government ministers and parliament to maintain with Crown corporations. The paper was published to encourage public discussion and comment prior to the introduction of a Crown corporations bill in parliament.

On the general subject of accountability I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the new Auditor General Act passed by the House of Commons on June 29, 1977, and subsequently passed without amendment by the Senate. A key change in the scope of the responsibilities of the Auditor General is contained in section 7(2) of the act. It reads as follows:

> Each report of the Auditor General . . . shall call attention to anything that he considers to be of significance and of a nature that should be brought to the attention of the House of Commons, including any cases in which he has observed that . . . money has been expended without due regard to economy or efficiency; or satisfactory procedures have not been established to measure and report the effectiveness of programs, where such procedures could appropriately and reasonably by implemented.

Financial Accountability

As all hon. members are aware from reading the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, in exercising his new mandate the Auditor General has focused on procedures in cost effectiveness and value for money. Also his report contained suggested models for improving the information display of departmental estimates. These models will be taken into account in the joint Treasury Board/Comptroller General study of the form of the estimates which now is under way. Extensive discussions have taken place on this subject with the public accounts committee and with witnesses from the Treasury Board secretariat, the Comptroller General's office and the office of the Auditor General.

● (1720)

The government is continuously searching for improvements. It has established its own internal monitoring function to ensure that there will be sound management and control within the over-all government accountability framework. I am speaking, of course, of the establishment of the office of the Comptroller General and the appointment of Mr. Harry Rogers as Comptroller General. Mr. Rogers' appointment was announced in February of last year by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and he began his new duties on April 2, one year ago.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Supported by all parties.

Mr. Lefebvre: Yes, supported by all parties. The Comptroller General's responsibilities include financial administration policy as it affects departments and agencies of the government, the form of the accounts of Canada, the form and the content of the government's financial statements, including those of its departments and agencies. His responsibilities include also the methods and procedures of control that are followed by departments and agencies, including budgetary methods and budgetary control systems, functional responsibilities for financial organizations, departments and agencies, the professional development of financial officers, and all related areas of financial management and control.

In addition, the Comptroller General has two other major responsibilities in improving management and control, namely, performance measurements and program evaluation. It is through these two major tools that accountability can be explicitly stated. The Treasury Board policy on performance measurement was issued in 1976, and its policy on program eveluation followed in 1977.

The government recognizes in the face of a long-term period of restraint that major new policy decisions and programs will need to be financed out of existing programs. Organizational skills must shift from planning and implementing to managing and controlling. In this connection, the federal government has endorsed three key management objectives: first, improving economy in the acquisition of assets; second, improving efficiency in their use and in the administration of program expenditures; and third, improving the effectiveness of government programs in achieving their objectives. These objectives complement the objectives of maintaining high standards of financial prudence and probity in the conduct of the government's financial affairs.

In addition to the work of the Comptroller General in bringing about needed improvements, a series of seminars has been given to enable deputy ministers and other senior officials to gain a better appreciation of the financial management process. The emphasis of the seminars is on senior officers' responsibilities in this important domain.

Therefore, it will be clear to this House that there is already a climate of good will both in the government and in the public service to continue our best efforts in establishing the most appropriate system of accountability in the management of this government's financial affairs.

Before closing, I should like to underline and once again bring to the attention of hon. members of this House the work now going on in the public accounts committee. For the past several weeks, with meetings and briefings, many times a week, this committee is and has been gathering ideas and suggestions from its members, with constant assistance from the Auditor General and his highly qualified staff, the Treasury Board secretariat represented by Mr. Larry O'Toole, and the Comptroller General of Canada, in order to put together what we of the committee feel will be a very important report to this House on what we believe should be included in the future form of the estimates.

The Auditor General has mentioned more than once that this working group, as he refers to it, is a fantastic breakthrough and a major step forward toward financial accountability and control. This study by the public accounts committee has been an example of co-operation by members of parliament from the official opposition—one of its members chairs the committee—and members from the government side, as well as from Treasury Board, the office of the Comptroller General and the Auditor General. Members hope that some of their recommendations will be evident in the estimates to be tabled next year and each year following until an almost new form of estimates is published, in order that they may become more comprehensive and useful to everyone concerned.

I feel confident that enough data is on the record of this committee's proceedings to ensure that there will definitely be a continual change for the better in the estimates, and when I say "better", I mean better for the parliament of Canada, the public of Canada, the public service and, of course, the Government of Canada.

The committee has not been able to arrive at a final consensus yet, especially on how the estimates should be handled by the House and its committees. It may be that this subject will be part of a study by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I am sure I speak for all hon. members of the committee when I say that it has done a great many weeks of very intensive and hard work. I am sure the evidence of this work will be seen in the form of the estimates. If the committee can accomplish its work I hope that a report can be tabled in this House at this stage which will indicate what that committee has accomplished.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for bringing this motion on today, particularly as he is the House leader of the Conservative party and may have some role to play in the next government. If that is the case I look forward to holding him to fulfilling some of the recommendations he has made.

I think it is safe to say that, as far as members of parliament are concerned, expenditures of government are totally beyond control in any way, shape or form. I listened with great interest when the parliamentary secretary indicated what the government intends to do. The government is always going to do something and it always has done something. It has carried out a great many studies and it has always had a great deal of input from civil service and other interested individuals and groups; but the situation has continually worsened.

When I first came here total government expenditures amounted to about $10 billion or $15 billion. I doubt if they were much higher than that. Today total expenditures have increased to $52 billion. Since the beginning of this parliament expenditures have more than doubled, having jumped from $23 billion to $52 billion. We were not able to handle expenditures very well when they amounted in total to $10 billion or $15 billion, and today we cannot handle them at all.

It must shock new members, as it must shock any thinking Canadian, that we are coming to the end of the month when we will pass those expenditures amounting to $52 billion without knowing what 90 per cent of the expenditures are, let alone whether they are needed. It is all right for us to say that the Auditor General is able to look into them on our behalf. I congratulate the auditor generals we have had for the work they have done. They have found horses on the payroll and a number of other major sensational abuses. I think there are about ten or 12 such sensational abuses each year. I would ask what members of parliament have been able to do about these abuses, the ten or 12 sensational ones that hit the headlines each year. I suggest they have been able to do absolutely nothing.

I suggest there is absolutely no machinery in place by which members of parliament can do anything about such abuses. We have a Comptroller General who may keep a few civil servants honest, and who may have been able in some way to control the manner in which some expenditures are made.

When listening to the parliamentary secretary a few minutes ago I was interested to hear him say the government is going to promote efficiencies and general control over the expenditures of the Treasury Board and the BED ministers. This government has decentralized, that is what it has done. For instance, it took the Department of Veterans Affairs to that minister's riding in Prince Edward Island, about as far away from the government as you can get. If this government stays in office for another five years we will probably have to go through another country to get there.

What have we done about buying pencils, for example? I often wonder what the Comptroller General and the BED ministers think about this if it is not in their ridings—we are buying pencils in Matane, for instance. The Department of Supply and Services increased its purchases tenfold in that area. That is not what I understand as efficiency. To be efficient you buy in bulk; you do not make purchases in every minister's riding. Can we control that sort of thing in the estimates? Are we in a position to do anything about those matters? The patronage exercised by this government is rampant. We do not know the levels where it exists. Patronage certainly is not efficiency. It is where somebody who cannot be elected to government or somebody who is related to someone who cannot be elected, is put in a responsible position where they do irresponsible things. That is surely not an economy.

One of the reasons I hope there is a change in government is that something might be done about some of these problems and not just more committees set up. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) says we do not want to go back to the days of committee of the whole. I think we could gain something by going back to that. We might have to limit the time or, as they do in other countries, set three months aside for it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I left the possibility open.

Mr. Peters: I realize the hon. member left the possibility open. I know the reason he did not do more than leave it open is because he may be responsible for some department and does not want to have to bribe people like the member from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) to get his estimates through. That may be an abuse, and I take full credit for it.

Mr. Francis: Surely that is not bribery.

Mr. Peters: It is a parliamentary arrangement. If I get a bridge, the minister gets his estimates, or if I get a concession in something, he gets—the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) has been doing that ever since he came here. His vocabulary may be larger than mine, and he may call it something with a more fancy name.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to give consideration to what he has said. The allegation that I have somehow received improper rewards for my constituency in turn for holding up or allowing passage of estimates is uncalled for, I think.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I certainly did not imply that the hon. member got unfortunate rewards. He got very good rewards. He has got the rewards he is sent to get and which he believes in.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Peters: I do not see what I have to withdraw. I am giving the hon. member full credit for having done this. Let me give an example. I have heard him many times on the question of veterans affairs, and when he won a point after considerable effort I thought it was a good reward for his people. I am sure he did not do it for other reasons. I hope hon. members will agree that I did not do it for other than a good reward on behalf of my constituents.

I sympathize with the member who interjected. He has not been here long enough to remember when we really had some control over estimates. When we had control over estimates, using the time factor, many amendments were made. How many members can say today that they are able to change anything in the estimates when they are brought before parliament by civil servants? The government does not really understand what is going on. In many cases I am sure the estimates make provision for civil servants operating in concerns of branches of departments that the government does not know exist, and which are self-perpetuating.

It is not going to be easy to supervise the expenditures of parliament. It is not easy in other countries either. It is not easy to control statutory expenditures. We pass a piece of legislation and in perpetuity provide gratuities to agencies that are never questioned. I am sure that if some of them kept very quiet and did not rock the boat, did not start muck-raking or department building, they would find themselves in no difficulty unless they asked for additional statutory expenditure. I am sure the same thing is true of Crown corporations. We really never supervise them. I agree with the parliamentary secretary who says that we probably have to keep at arm's length from them because, if we do not, they would only be departments of government. But we must examine their costs and the direction they are taking.

The charge has often been made that a Crown corporation cannot use money efficiently. The Canadian National Railways is a good example. It is a wonderful organization now because it is making money. The thing is, it always made money but we charged so much of the debt to it that was incurred 50 or 100 years ago that the interest was never paid off, let alone the debt. Now that the debt has been written off we are no longer in the difficulty.

The Canadian Pacific Railway was the only beneficiary of that bad accounting system. When we could show that CN was in debt we could always work out the railroad tariff on the basis that it was not making any money and, because of that, CPR got the benefit of all the subsidization that had to go into making the CN a viable operation.

Recently in the news, Canadian Pacific was screaming about the fact that Air Canada, a Crown corporation, was cutting air fares to a degree that would bankrupt Canadian Pacific Air as they do not have the lucrative lines Air Canada has. Several years ago Air Canada was only a stepchild of the Canadian National Railways and their debt structure was tied to it. Now that we have established Air Canada independently it is a very successful corporation. Maybe most of our Crown corporations would be financially sound if we set up the right kind of structure for proper accounting so that members of parliament would know whether they were operating efficiently and serving a need. The machinery is now in place for us to examine that.

I am not sympathetic with the way the government has handled this problem. All it has done in the last eight or ten years is create more Crown corporations, and establish more controls and committees. It has a committee or royal commission or something to handle every problem that parliament should face itself. If we faced them we would at least know what we are trying to accomplish, rather than establishing all these backroom controls, with the proliferation of civil servants, patronage, and decentralization. Decentralization only seems to satisfy those ministers whose areas are affected.

In my opinion, this government is not efficient. It is not prepared to provide members of parliament with information on which to base reasonable decisions. How many members really understand why the government is able to take money out of the treasury, or borrow at a rate of 12 or 13 per cent in order to stabilize the Canadian dollar? When the Conservatives tried to do that with huge expenditures they were able to stabilize it within about two cents of what it would normally have been. And yet we are allowing the government to make those huge expenditures in the billions of dollars. This is money borrowed which we will probably never be able to pay off in our lifetime. This will saddle our children and their children with a debt for absolutely no purpose.

If the government really wants to do something about stabilizing the dollar, why not peg it? This dirty float is a totally dishonest way of calculating expenditures because there is no statutory control. There is certainly no way in which members of parliament can do anything, except through the public accounts committee. This committee looks at bad debts after they are incurred and wonders how in hell we got them and for what. It has nothing to do with controlling expenditures. In addition, it does not teach us very much because civil servants have a new word for control. The next time they try something else again.

We have set up all kinds of commissions to decide how to make the expenditures of the nation more controllable. In the final analysis we do not need to delegate control over the expenditures of our nation. That is the responsibility of elected members of parliament. This should be exercised in the House of Commons and it should be carried out on the basis of every bit of the information the government has used in making its decisions. If the government makes bad decisions, if it makes them on the basis of poor information, and says that it had done the best possible, members of parliament should be able to look at the information that is available and decide whether the expenditure is justified and whether the information being provided is sufficient. Then they should be able to do something about it.

This government has abused its majority. It has abused its majority every time it has had one. The only time we have had good government in Canada since I have been a member of parliament is when we had a minority government. Why, Mr.

Speaker? Because in the final analysis all members of parliament look at the problems for themselves, decide whether there is a good or bad solution, and vote accordingly. Each member looks at the question and makes a decision. With a majority government, all they do is stand up and say, "Are you ready to receive my assistance for the next election, and God willing, I will be elected." They have decided nothing on their own. The decision is made as a block because they have a majority in parliament. No one can stand up and say they are honestly interested in allowing parliament to control expenditures.

I would like to mention the blue book. When I first came here one could look in the blue book, which contains the estimates of the expenditures for the forthcoming year. This book is not much thicker now, but it has certainly become a lot less useful. What is written in under the headings of each department? It is propaganda. It describes what the government proposes to do in that department and what it hopes to accomplish. Who cares? We are supposed to be looking at the expenditures in the departments and deciding if we think they will be able to do whatever they want to accomplish. We bloody well can't do that with the estimates we have.

At one time there was a list of all these high-falutin' people who got more than $20,000. Now the ones getting more than $50,000 are not listed nor are the ones getting more than $75,000. No matter how high the salary goes these people are not listed any more. At one time we were able to look at this list.

When I used to look through these lists the high-paid ones were usually alcoholics or something else. These were people who were stuck into a corner in a department where they did not have to do anything.

I made a complaint about something that happened in a department. I was told not to go to the director because he had a bunch of toy trains in his desk and all he did was play with toy trains. I am sure many members here know who that is. There was another one we referred to; we found out that his secretary put him back in his chair 37 times in one month.

At one time we were able to phone a department for information. There was none of this "b.s." that you get from Manpower today. The five top people in these departments, without exception, are at meetings every day. It is not possible to get those people unless someone is conscientious and stays after four o'clock because the rest of the time they are at meetings. There are even meetings that last all day. We know this goes on, and when we look at the book and cannot find out who the director is or get information on expenditures, it is very sad. The only thing that is brought up to date is the telephone book, and that is changed every four months. That is probably not more than eight months out of whack.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The speaker who has just sat down used two initials to represent two words which were ruled last week as being unparliamentary. I would like to know whether we can get away with using the initials instead of the full words.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I will check the record and make a decision later.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us urges the adoption of Standing Orders which will ensure the government's accountability to the House of Commons for its management of Canada's finances.

The entire thrust of the motion is in terms of the rules and procedures of this House on the assumption that if we behave in a different way or follow a different or modified set of Standing Orders we can achieve that great goal of accountability to which all parliamentarians aspire.

The Auditor General, and the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre), have pointed out very well, that there cannot be any accountability unless we resolve the very basic problem with the kind of information we are going to have. I suggest that while there is a structural problem, members of this House who are really concerned about accountability take on a chore, and it is a chore, of attending the Public Accounts Committee and reading the documents. The documents are lengthy and they are not always easily understood. The people who are working with the Auditor General are attempting to provide parliament with the tools parliament needs if it is ever to manage properly the funds it votes.

The government has supported the Auditor General and given him the necessary resources. By his own admission there has never been a question or any shortcoming in terms of his budget or the specialized manpower required to do a job to the extent to which it was required. I believe there has never been a more qualified group of management consultants and technical experts assembled in Canada than has been assembled by the present Auditor General in an honest effort to come to grips with some very fundamental problems.

Basically with regard to every government department there are three sets of documents which have to be examined. There are estimates on the basis of which parliament votes supply. This is the mechanism by which the resources for the fiscal period anticipated are described and allocated. There are the public accounts which are the story of what has happened, the story of how the money was spent. In nearly every case there is a departmental report, frequently in narrative form, with appendices at the end, from the estimates or from the public accounts. But the Auditor General has documented chapter and verse of cases where one cannot go from one to another in a logical and consistent way. The form, breakdown and content are really quite incomprehensible in the way in which they are placed before us as parliamentarians and the nation at large.

● (1750)

As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) indicated, he has pointed out the deficiencies in the consistency of treatment of the estimates. If you cannot go back and forth from one to the other, you are lost before you start. The Auditor General pointed out that matters relating to statutory votes are frequently not even in the estimates. They are not even provided. Something like $20 billion of that $50 billion is statutory.

He pointed out again that when he examined the Crown corporations in great detail, he found a great difference in range. Some Crown corporations were doing a good job of setting out their accounts in a form which was understandable, but a large number were not.

We are now having Treasury Board undertake a major revision of the Financial Administration Act and the schedules by which the Crown corporations are to be classified. We have been given illustrated models of the way in which it would have been possible for the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to present its estimates. This would have been in a form that is comprehensible, one which would have permitted parliament to make a rational examination of the priorities assigned to that Crown corporation, how its plans related to what had been done the previous two years, and what is anticipated two years ahead.

Those of us who had the opportunity of looking at what might have been the way in which the information was presented were struck by what we saw and heard. It is quite clear that this is the direction in which we must go. The question of how the estimates are to be prepared in a form by which parliament can properly use them is a very fundamental question. Traditionally, the estimates have been the tool of Treasury Board, and one branch of Treasury Board by which they allocated resources.

In a recent period of restraint, cabinet ministers were called in and told to chop $100 million here, $200 million there, and that they must stay within these over-all limits. The estimates were looked upon by Treasury Board in a proprietary way.

When Treasury Board was told by the Auditor General that the form of the estimates may have been good enough for resource allocation but was not good enough for accountability to parliament, the Public Accounts Committee had to break ground. It was very interesting to see. I regret that the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) is not here. For his work as chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, I want to pay him tribute in this place. I believe he has done a good job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: Those of us who have understood what the Auditor General was trying to do worked in a non-partisan way. My colleague from Pontiac is one of them. We say the Comptroller General has an interest in the estimates because he cannot really be sure that the proper financial control procedures are in place unless the estimates are in such a way that he can use and understand them. We say that members of parliament have been interested in those estimates. We say that the public accounts—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs) moved that Bill C-29, to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in my final speech on third reading I wish to direct attention to certain matters which have been neglected in the course of our deliberations, or which have not been emphasized with sufficient force.

The announcement the minister made last May has had a disastrous affect not only upon the co-operative housing program but upon the neighbourhood improvement program as well as upon projects envisaged by cities, towns, and municipalities across the country. Great uncertainty was created by that announcement. The minister admitted that the central government would be backing away from previous commitments and policies.

It is worth recalling that in 1968 the then minister of housing, Mr. Hellyer, was supposed to devise a new housing and urban policy for Canada. That urban policy and that housing policy involved the federal government. It took him some time, and he switched parties before anything was done, but the thrust of that policy was that the federal government had a role to play in the solution of the urban problems of Canadians. It had a role to play in planning and the assembly of land in order to prevent speculation. It had a role to play in the designation of certain areas in the cores of our cities—improvement areas—in order to get at the problems of poverty and the physical decline of the centres of our cities as well as lack of opportunity for many of our people. That was the thrust and direction of the policy, which was expanded during the minority government of 1972 to 1974.

With the co-operation of the New Democratic Party the Liberal party at that time was prepared to bring in income supplements for many Canadians. It was prepared to bring in programs to provide funding for some co-operative housing, and it recognized for the first time the principle of non-profit ownership in the development of our housing policy. If those were the days of the new liberalism, we are now in the final dying days—and I say this despite the defection of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart)—of the new conservatism.

If the hon. member for Cochrane sees the Liberal party as moving to the left, the only conclusion there can be is that he is suffering from political dyslexia because what I see is precisely the opposite movement. I see a movement to the right. The federal government is saying to the cities that it cannot get involved any more. It is saying to our co-operative institutions that it is not prepared to fund them any longer. It is saying to urban Canadians that if they have problems they will have to direct them to the provincial governments. This is the standard of leadership we can now expect from the Liberal government.

This motley collection of amendments which we have attempted to improve, and which to some extent we have succeeded in improving, is the end result of this policy, this hodge-podge, this attempt at some kind of appeasement of what the Liberal party sees as a conservative mood amongst the voters of Canada.

What does this bill do? It amounts to a full-fledged retreat by the federal government from the solution of our housing and urban development problems. It amounts to a full-fledged retreat, and when the time comes to look at the role of the federal government, I hope the voters of Canada will see that the federal government has put its toes in the water, with respect to trying to solve some of our problems, quickly decided to pull its feet back and daintily returned to the comfortable beaches of the new conservatism. That is precisely the direction in which this government is headed. It is headed, not toward the political left as my colleague, the hon. member for Cochrane, stated last week, but toward the political right.

These amendments are the direct result of a shift on the part of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). Now we have the government becoming a banker. It is not the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation any more. It is the central insurance and banking corporation because the federal government will no longer be directly involved in housing. The government has said it will not get involved, that it will leave housing up to the private sector and that it will assume that trust companies, lending companies and banks will play the role, in terms of innovative social policy, the government was supposed to start playing from 1972 to 1974. We on this side know that that is not exactly what is going to happen, and the time will come once again—I foresee it readily—when whatever party forms the government of this country it will have to recognize that the urban and housing needs of Canadians will have to be met directly by means of government intervention. That intervention will come at the federal level as well as the provincial level. Both levels will have to work co-operatively, recognizing that they both have roles to play in meeting the social needs of their citizens. We know that will happen again because a need will have to be met, and that need simply has not been met by the policies of the current government.

The new Jerusalem was announced by the minister in May. Unfortunately, it took eight or nine months before the legislation was brought before the House, so the governments of the cities and towns of this country, the real governments for most of our citizens, the governments to which they look first, did not know where to turn. That is the housing crisis the minister has not recognized. It is a crisis created by the minister's own inability and the cabinet's own inability to decide what to do.

Today the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) talked about the benefit of his policy of encouraging no-name products in the consumer field. We have no-name products for cabinet ministers today because the average Canadian does not know who is in the cabinet. Cabinet ministers cannot make up their minds about what social policies to bring before the people of Canada. The crisis created by this government is such that communities and municipalities are crying out for federal government policies. They are crying out for money to build recreational facilities, to build sewage facilities, and to deal with the urgent problems they face because they do not have capital to deal with construction problems.

The minister forced us into agreeing to put these amendments through quickly, but a condition was that he recognize that we also had amendments and ideas to be considered. What we got was not the best, because we would have much preferred to be able to bring before the committee of this House which deals with housing, representatives of the Canadian Council on Social Development, the Canadian Welfare Council, national poverty organizations, provincial organizations, co-operative housing organizations, and the private lending institutions which are going to fill the gap. I would like to have heard precisely what plans they had for replacing the vacuum which has been created by the policies the Liberal party adopted from the Conservative party. Instead, we were forced into a position where we had to accept in the committee of the whole at very short notice a series of amendments which three parties in this House agreed would be necessary to get the kind of consent required to get the measures through quickly.

If we look at the level of funding which is being provided, the bottom line, the dollars and cents which are going into these programs—the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program and the Community Services Grants Program—the level of funding is down. This government is masquerading a series of amendments as being progressive and as amounting to a positive policy, when what they amount to are an excuse for cutbacks. The minister knows this. Mr. Hession certainly knows it because he has written to the minister about it. The minister said that RRAP is going to be made universal. Well, 264 times nothing is still nothing, and that is what we have been left with, 264 ridings with practically no money for residential rehabilitation.

The Community Services Grants Program replaces ten programs with three, and that means that the level of funding will not be adequate. As I said many times in the committee, we will not get the funding which is needed for community development or for recreational facilities, and all the money which goes to the provinces will be used for the hardware of urban development.

I am not saying that hardware is not important; it is vital. People need to have the kind of sewage treatment which is fundamental to healthy living. I recognize that, and my party recognizes it. But we do not accept what the minister is saying when he says that all our urban needs will now be satisfied by the money which is being provided to the provinces, when we know that the level of funding under community service grants is far lower than it was under all the old programs under which the cities, towns and municipalities would go to the federal and provincial governments and attempt as best they could to barter their future needs. So we reject the approach of the Liberal government, we reject the cutbacks, we reject the $350 million diminution in the CMHC. You can call it the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or you can all it anything you wish, you can masquerade it, tart it up any way you want, but it amounts to the same old charade, and that is more grandiose programs with less money to fund them, which means that the urban needs of our communities will not be met.

I say to you tonight, Mr. Speaker, that the way in which the government has presented these programs has been irresponsible. Ministers have put themselves in a position where they have had to force the House to consider these proposals hastily because they have created a need in the municipalities which was not there until they cut off their program and until they engaged in this so-called avenue of cutbacks and decreased the expenditure as a result of the miraculous conversion which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has suffered following his trip to Bonn in the summer of 1978. We in our party have attempted to bring forward amendments which would have a constructive effect. We have attempted to say: Let us put a damper on this lemming-like rush toward cutbacks and let us try to provide something for our cities, let us give them the leeway to assemble land and to provide affordable housing, let alone the non-profit motive to work; let us put the co-operative motive to work.

Well, it is an odd assembly of events that has brought us here tonight. We have a housing crisis in Canada and we have the government's amendments, and the two have absolutely nothing to do with each other. The government's amendments are brought about as a result of its determination to cut back on government spending, nothing more or less than that, and the housing crisis in Canada is created today by the fact that we have had an inflation in housing prices which has gone on for the past ten years and with which the government has been incapable of dealing, and we have an inflation in the cost of money which the government has deliberately created by government policy.

We say it is high time the people of Canada were given the opportunity in a free election to decide what they want to do about that crisis. Do they want to adopt the policy of the government which is to let things ride as they are, in the hope that the best will work out and for the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs to present a striptease to the Canadian public saying, "If you are good boys and girls, maybe in two or three years we will give you a tax credit"? Is that what the people of Canada want? No. On the other hand, we can take the policies of the Conservative party—

Mrs. Pigott: No, you cannot take them.

Mr. Rae: You can keep them.

Mrs. Pigott: Saskatchewan wants them.

Mr. Rae: What do those policies say? They say that in order to get a tax benefit in our society, you have to own a house.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You have to want to own one.

Mr. Rae: That is not so, Mr. Speaker. You are sacrificing the present demands of the Canadian public for a tax cut on the altar of some future event which may or may not take place, that is, the buying of a house. We on this side of the House say that if you want to deal with the problem of the cost of money, you should deal with it directly instead of pussyfooting around the side of the problem and trying to make it palatable. You do not make high interest rates palatable; you get the high interest rates down. And if you want to deal with the cost of land, you start controlling the cost of land by getting at speculation which has more than doubled the cost of land in surburban areas of our major centres in the past five years, which has meant that many Canadians have become millionaires as a result of a pure hazard, that hazard being whether or not they happen to own acres of land.

We in our party say: provide tax relief but provide it for all Canadians, do not make it selective and do not make it depend on whether or not you own a house. There are senior citizens in apartments and there are senior citizens in homes. They both deserve a tax break. Do not be discriminatory and prejudicial; deal with all the people of Canada fairly. We say: if you want to get at the cost of money, do it directly; do not pussyfoot around the side of the problem. If you want to deal with the cost of land, deal with it directly; do not pussyfoot around the edge of the problem; get at the root of the problem, which is speculation and monopoly conditions in the ownership of land. Those are the problems that you face in the country. They have nothing to do with the amendments brought forward by the minister with respect to these problems.

There will be many opportunities in the coming months for us to discuss, on various platforms and in various ways, the programs of our party. I have said many times before in the House, particularly in this debate, that the people of Canada will decide who has the right approach, who are talking out of both sides of their mouths, and who is promising the world and delivering nothing. But it is important to recognize—I have said this before—that promising benefits to Canadians will not make it easier for a single Canadian to buy a house. Buying votes or renting votes, as seems to be the propensity of the Liberal government, promising something and taking it away six months later, will not buy a single vote and will not buy a single home, and it is time the people recognized it.

This bill does not deal with the housing crisis, nor is it intended to deal with it. The fact that it and the housing crisis have come up at the same time is simply the result of the government's inactivity and incompetence.

We have attempted to improve the bill as a result of our amendments in committee, and I pay respect to the minister of State for Urban Affairs and to my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott), for having taken the time to try to work constructively with me and with representatives of other parties in an attempt to get a better bill. We have a better bill now than we had before, but I suggest it would not be very difficult.

The housing problems of Canadians are serious, and the affordability problems are serious because there are far too many Canadians who cannot afford to buy a house and there are far too many Canadians who are paying too much for their shelter needs. These needs will not disappear, and this bill will do absolutely nothing to solve the problems. That is the approach that I have taken to this legislation from the time it was announced in November and December to the time we discussed it on second reading, to the time we went through it in committee, and now, and that will be the approach we will be taking in the months to come.

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleagues in the House for the excellence of this debate. I believe that some very constructive things have been offered, and I am sure the minister is paying rapt attention to them.

Areas of poor housing are a reality, as are unemployment and poverty, unchallenged workers and under-educated people and poor living conditions. Disillusioned youth and senior citizens waiting out their golden years in idleness are realities too. The awareness of these injustices and the determination to end them are also realities. With wisdom, courage and determination we can overcome these difficulties, or we can hide our heads in the sand, talk about programs which we know will not be funded adequately, and leave ghettos of frustration, worry and neglect, areas of disillusion and disenchantment, and future problems of tremendous magnitude in terms of hatred and bitterness.

The Athenians taught us that greatness is not related to size. Large cities have taught us that ghettos within and strip development without are enemies of the quality of life, and that we must focus the attention of all levels of government on the very important concept of involving citizens in the future design and composition of the communities in which they will live, work, and have their being. If a city is just to be banks, stores, finance companies, schools, parks and cinemas; if it is just to be houses, cement, streets and roads, then we have betrayed the trust of thousands of people who have worked to make our cities a place where people can live in dignity, security and harmony, and where the great achievements of civilization, culture, hopes and dreams for our fellow citizens should be available to all. If these are to be the goals and objectives of this parliament, we will need all the programs which are possible under the bill before us, and many more. We shall have to identify successes in other areas and focus our purchasing power into realistic programs in the field of housing.

I do not know how many wealthy people have large mortgages and pay high interest rates on them. Some government spokesmen seem to know a lot of these people, but I know very few. I do know a lot of people in the lower and middle income groups who have large mortgages, and pay high interest rates and high property taxes. I know the ability to deduct interest payments and property taxes from their income tax would make life a little more like living and would enable them to take their place in the community with greater security. Also I know that it would open up the opportunity and privilege. Imaginative programs like this one and constructive suggestions should not be overlooked simply because they come from the other fellow. Most certainly they should not be the subject of windjamming rhetoric by small-minded politicians and their political hacks.

The country needs the outpouring of imagination, ingenuity and hard work, not just to provide houses but to provide homes for people. We must encourage human dialogue, common experiences, purposes, understanding and respect, which tie Canadians together. Our municipalities must be encouraged to pay greater attention to neighbourhoods, civic pride and the feeling of community.

The sense of community and belonging enhances the feeling of security and a sense of one's own worth in the over-all championship of others. This is the feeling most of us share as Canadians in our Canadian experience. But it is a feeling shared to a far lesser degree by thousands of Canadians who are denied the opportunity of owning their own homes, and by others who suffer daily the ravages of poverty in inadequate housing situations. I hope the minister, in the course of his remarks, will assist me by indicating where in the legislation we can find the magnitude of thrust which is essential to meet this challenge.

The complexity of administering a nation or a great city is very much a deterrent to providing the quality of life essential to the feeling of community in our larger municipalities.

Members of parliament representing large urban ridings will agree they know very few of their constituents on a first name basis, and that only a very small proportion of their constituents know each other or talk to each other. The facilities for children to play, and for adults to work together in larger centres are not only inadequate in number but are difficult to provide.

Every time our great democracies have been faced with a challenge involving maximum danger, the people of the nation, having a strong sense of community, have risen, met the challenge, and defeated it. That has been very much the history of Canada. Yet in our larger centres this feeling of community is disappearing. It is disappearing at a time when its strengths and leadership are needed badly.

In my community the Neighbourhood Improvement Program and the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program have worked very well to supply some of the dynamics I have mentioned. The difficulty has been that the programs have not been operative in all our urban areas and have no impact in our rural sections. Marysville, Barker's Point, Nashwaaksis, and some portions of Devon in my community have not qualified for the program at all, or they have qualified for it in a diminished way. Municipal authorities and I have been pressing as hard as possible to have the program expanded into these areas.

The minister announced modifications to the RRAP program as of May 16, 1978. The purpose of the modifications was to make more widely available loans and forgiveness grants based on income. The positive modifications involving elimination of the need to live in a designated area to receive assistance, and the priority to people with low incomes and in areas with housing more in need of repairs, are commendable. The expansion of the list of improvements which may qualify for assistance is a good one. But the elimination of subsidized interest, and the indication that housing co-operatives are no longer eligible for assistance, are negative moves. Over all the modifications represent a net reduction in the government's financial commitments to residential rehabilitation. The total budget for RRAP this year is $9 million, and that really limits it as a universal program.

The new low income housing program announced last May to replace the public housing assistance program, the non-profit housing program, is another good feature. The negative aspects are that the RRAP program and the rent supplement no longer apply to co-op housing. The minimum rent to income rates of 25 per cent may mean that senior citizens, the disabled, and low income earners in public housing projects, will face an increase in their existing rents. Certainly I hope they will not. The interest subsidies do not last for the duration of the projects. They rise with the rental incomes of the property. Thus, with rental incomes increasing as a result of the 25 per cent minimum role, the interest rate after one year probably will accelerate.

The replacement of the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, the municipal infrastructure program and the municipal incentive grant program with the new Community Services Grant Program, represents the re-organization of existing programs which appear to deal with the same municipal public works aspects as the former programs. But the block funding aspect, through the provincial governments, will have to contemplate the regional disparities which exist in the country, to be effective, or, like so many other federal programs, it will be welcome but not effective in helping to close the gap between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada.

In summary, I find the legislation before us has some good points and some bad ones. The greatest deficiency is its failure to stimulate community services and social programs in our rural areas. There are some stimulating elements and some good program vehicles for our urban centres, but the bottom line is, "You only get what you pay for". The dedication of the government to community life and housing, like the resources it puts into it, is not yet an inspiring record.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the previous speakers and on several occasions I followed the discussion of the bill in the House. I am however rather surprised to note that in our country where we have almost everything such as concrete, lumber and manpower, many unemployed, some carpenters, we often have to tackle housing problems. Considering that we are living in a system which I feel is all wrong, we are trying, I understand, to make the best possible use of a bad condition and this is why we are considering Bill C-29 this evening.

Following many studies and consultations with provincial governments, the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) had already suggested some amendments to the housing policy of the federal government. Later on, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) announced some budget cuts which required amendments to the National Housing Act.

Amongst those changes, we note that the government, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, will no longer be a prime lender. It will delegate that task to the private sector. On the other hand, the corporation will guarantee loans of up to a maximum of $40 billion. That figure represents the total amount of loans for which insurance policies will be issued under the act and will absorb part of the interest costs through subsidies. The corporation will be a lender of last resort for public and conventional housing.

In a speech given by the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs at the convention of the Quebec Home Builders Association, on November 24, 1978, the government explained its housing policy. First, it would intervene progressively less. We believe that private enterprise can meet the challenge quite well, and meet adequately on its own future needs in the field of conventional housing. Our role will, in the future, be restricted to contributing to the maintenance of a stable market that is competitive and dynamic, without intervening in fields which rightly belong to free enterprise.

Through this bill, the government therefore withdraws from the field of mortgage loans. It will subsidize housing projects of a social nature by reimbursing part of the interest. The government wants to put more money into housing for low-income Canadians and give more responsibility to the private sector in residential financing. Priority will no longer go to housing units intended for the average-income home owner. That will have a bearing on such programs as the assisted home ownership program and the rental housing assistance program since all subsidies are being cut to produce housing for people of average means. However, maximum sale prices under those programs, as well as the maximum guaranteed loans, will be supervised.

The federal government seems to want to simplify the complex workings of federal and provincial community housing and services programs. The administration of joint programs will be simplified thus, in practice, eliminating often costly and inefficient overlapping and duplication. The new non-profit housing program is aimed at the non-profit corporations, be they private, provincial or municipal, and at the non-profit housing co-ops. It is specifically geared towards low-income earners. The government wishes to make this program more attractive for users and to reach a greater number of low-income earners. The goal is the construction or renovation, but especially the renovation, construction being left in the hands of private enterprise, of some 30,000 housing units, compared to the present level of 19,000 units. This is indeed a praiseworthy effort and it is most desirable that these goals be reached. The federal government will be assisting the non-profit housing program through contributions. Eligibility for these contributions and the manner in which these can be allocated under governor in council regulations will be determined by clause 14 of the bill. In practice, the government will pay a large part of the interests charged on money borrowed from the private sector by means of grants, thus reducing the real rate of interest to 1 per cent on loans covering up to 90 per cent of the project's value, and to 2 per cent on loans covering 100 per cent of their value. Both types of loans will be amortized over 35 years.

Furthermore, the government will give subsidies up to $75,000, as a starting fund, to those who want to provide low cost housing, depending on the size and the complexity of the project. It will enable developers to make proposals which may produce viable projects. The accent will be put on the improvement of existing units rather than on the building aspect. Public, co-operative and non-profit units will be offered to low income people, the rent being a percentage, 25 per cent, of incomes or of market rents, whichever solution is the most advantageous. There will be a purchase option for people residing in non-profit and co-operative housing developments, all projects being subject to the standards and regulations of the National Housing Act. The federal government will continue to deal directly with co-operative and non-profit organizations. Provincial and municipal non-profit corporations will no longer be under the responsibility of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as far as selection, review, approval and inspection of the projects are concerned. Instead, the corporation will accept a provincial certificate showing that the requirements of the program have been met in order to determine eligibility for contributions. I will turn to loans and insurances issued by federal authorities, the Corporation's information leaflets. The government will encourage a greater use of the rent supplement program under which the federal and provincial governments support occupancy of a portion of housing units in private sector projects by low income families. Up until now, mortgage insurance was available only for the purchase of a new home. It will now cover the purchase or improvement of a rental housing project and the conversion of a non-residential building into rental housing. Also, certain loans issued by approved lenders will be 100 per cent insurable. This policy will apply to non-profit corporations wanting to buy, improve, build or modify rental housing projects or home or pension type housing facilities, and also to co-operative housing associations wanting to buy, build or modify housing projects.

For the first time, private sector lenders will issue and insure loans to residents of Indian reserves, whether to an idividual or to an Indian band or group, but only with the approval of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner). In this case, Indians are as defined by the Indian Act. This loan may serve for the building or rehabilitation of reserve housing. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation used to lend money to owner-lessors. In view of CMHC's new policy of opting out of the loans market, loans issued by the private sector to owner-lessors, under the residential rehabilitation aid program, will be insurable. Under clause 15, lenders will be able to obtain a rapid settlement of loans insured under the National Housing Act, in cases of default.

Clause 4 provides that insured loans can be made to co-operatives provided the majority of units are occupied or owned by the members or shareholders of the co-operative. Previously, 80 per cent occupation or ownership was required. Under clause 1, the corporation could insure certain loans based on other securities than a first mortgage. That security could be note for a second mortgage or any other security depending on the size of the loan. Clause 2 says that loans made or guaranteed by provincial governments under this law will be exempt for mortgage insurance fees. Let us remember that the total amount of all mortgage loans the corporation will be able to insure will go from $25 billion to $40 billion. The essence of the changes with respect to the rehabilitation program is contained in clause 7.

Private sector financing is made available to owners, non-profit corporations and Indians as amended by clause 7. Furthermore, the need for designated areas is eliminated. All restrictions are set aside or withdrawn. As a result of the budget restrictions of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, loans will no longer be made to landlords for rehabilitation purposes. They will have to get their loans from the private sector. As previously stated, these loans will be insurable under the act.

Clause 8 suppresses the limit of $500 per unit on the rehabilitation on homes for the elderly or boarding-house types of housing facilities. That program helps landlords or non-profit co-operatives and associations. For an occupying owner, this assistance comes in the form of a loan which may be forgiven altogether. The maximum loan is $10,000. The borrower whose adjusted family income does not exceed $6,000 is entitled to a loan forgiveness of up to $3,750. If the adjusted family income is $11,000 or more, the loan must be paid back in full. Owners of rental housing can obtain loans of up to $10,000 per housing unit. Payment of 50 per cent of the loan, up to a maximum amount of $2,500 per housing unit, can be forgiven if the owner consents to rent control. Non-profit organizations can also obtain loans of up to $10,000 in which case forgiveness of payment goes up to maximum of $3,750. New projects involving purchase and repairs are not eligible under this program. When the assistance is granted for the creation or the improvement of the hostel or dormitory type of housing, this assistance can represent up to $4,000 per bed, of which payment of $500 can be forgiven.

There is also the graduated payment mortgages program. Clause 5 introduces the notion of graduated payment mortgages, which is rather complex. This aims at simplifying the acquisition of low-cost housing. What is it exactly? Simply an ordinary mortgage for which the monthly charges start at a relatively low level and go up progressively until they reach a certain ceiling. I have here some evidence about this type of graduated payment mortgages. Of course, this concerns public housing, or low-cost housing projects, and it involves a loan of $1,487,700 for the construction of a public housing building. I see here that the residents of the community where this project is being built will have to pay $5,856,206.32 in interests alone in a 50-year period. The amount that they owe is $1,487,700. This is what we must watch out for in graduated payment mortgages.

The payments for the principal and the interest charges of a graduated payment mortgage start at a lower level than for a conventional mortgage. However, these monthly charges will increase by 5 per cent a year until the end of the tenth year. They will then stabilize at this level for the rest of the repayment period, which means that during the first years of repayment of a graduated payment mortgage, you are not paying current interests on the borrowed capital.

This will increase the total debt on a 10¼ per cent rate, $35,000 mortgage with 25 year term by $10,000, as compared to a fixed payment mortgage. If this be an advantage, this system will allow earlier ownership. So here is the option: Earlier ownership with a $10,000 larger indebtedness, or later ownership with more money in the pocket. Is it really worth it to get lower debt because one is anxious to own a house?

The difficulty, as always, is borrowing. There are a lot of poor people who have difficulty in obtaining a loan, and interest charges are much too high. If we calculate payments the owner will have to make in 20, 25 or 30 years from now, we often find he will have to pay the cost of two or three houses before he can get out of debt.

The only amendment to the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation Act in part two of Bill C-29 is the change of name to "Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation." This comes within the Canadianization program of the federal government, and is aimed at stressing that the corporation is an arm of the Canadian government. Unless the minister is planning early amendments to payment arrangements with reduced interest rates, a better name in the circumstances would be "Canadian Mortgage and Debt Corporation," because the loans help getting people into debt for years to come. I have here ample evidence of that.

The housing co-operatives had this to say about the new federal housing programs: "The new federal housing programs are aimed at helping builders start with hard-to-sell houses rather than assuring the construction of a larger number of units": Le Droit, May 25, 1978. It will be remembered the federal government wants to stress renovation rather than construction. Co-operatives would therefore be "forced to use existing buildings rather than building new ones. Some buildings could not be sold because of poor design or poor location". Should it become almost impossible to build we must expect that people interested in co-operatives, as they make the management of building projects possible, will no longer be interested in that type of organization.

The CMHC is asking for total control over housing co-operatives by establishing in advance the type of restoration and the cost of rent. Those "electorally profitable austerity programs" make a complete farce of voluntary participation of members, one of the basis of co-operatives. The complete loss of autonomy is one of the most discouraging aspects for co-operatives. On November 13 1978, a press release from the Quebec City housing co-operatives urged the government to give priority to the needs of co-operatives by establishing special programs. According to that press release, the government should put directly at their disposal all funds required to finance their projects at a preferential rate compare to that of the private sector.

Housing co-operatives want tenant-co-operators to pay no more than 20 per cent of their gross income instead of 25 per cent as proposed by the government; that interests rates for mortgage loans be fixed instead of variable; that housing co-operatives do not offer purchase options as it is a co-operative of tenants. The government, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, changes its position by supporting totally co-operative housing and abandoning the private housing market to concentrate on housing for low wage earners.

The Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, RRAP, will mostly benefit Quebec: nearly 45 per cent of the $145 million earmarked for this program will be allocated to Quebec which is showing the deepest desire to rehabilitate its old houses. But the minister has been accused in this House of operating for electoral purposes in promising to expand housing programs whereas the government does not have the funds needed to implement them.

Indeed, ministerial advisers are concerned over the shortage of funds needed to meet demands under the promised expanded housing rehabilitation program. Moreover, the RRAP program is likely to change housing conditions in Quebec; but if money is not available, this might become an electoral commitment without foundation since the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program actually is almost starved of public funds.

Evidently, any housing rehabilitation program in Canada becomes a monetary problem in this unsettled financial system of ours. We have all the material required; millions of well disposed workers now without a job and many families who need decent housing. But too often budgetary restraints forbid construction. This results from a broken down financial system which we should change soon as it brings about many useless complications that, in my opinion, could be avoided.

[English]

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have entered the debate on Bill C-29. I have followed with great interest the proceedings prior to second reading, during second reading, at report stage, and now at third reading. I enter the debate at this late hour because of a number of events which have transpired throughout the handling of this bill. There are two specific areas that have not received the attention they should, namely, the problem of housing as it relates to the native community, specifically the Indian and Inuit people; and also as it relates to senior citizens. In my view this bill does not address itself to these areas in a responsible or adequate manner.

From the outset the minister has been toying or playing political games with the provinces and municipalities. I say that because the minister has refused until this late date to introduce this important bill. This is legislation which required far more time, not only at second reading but during committee stage, report stage, and again at third reading.

The minister knows perfectly well there are provinces and municipalities all across Canada which have been acting in good faith in arranging programs. They have been waiting for this legislation to be introduced and passed so they could proceed with the programs they had been contemplating and hoping to have implemented within a reasonable period of time.

I find that an interesting scenario. The minister has travelled across Canada and made important pronouncements about this program. He has prodded and encouraged municipalities and provinces to go ahead with plans for various programs. Then he delays the introduction of this legislation for almost a year. As I indicated, we have had very little time to debate what I consider are some important aspects of the bill. We have not had an opportunity to enlarge on various areas of housing which this party considers extremely important.

Notwithstanding some important elements in the legislation one has to ask the question, why would the minister follow this particular course of action? Why would he talk about this legislation for over a year and then introduce it at the last moment at a time when this House could dissolve imminently? There are probably several reasons for this. The minister is aware of numerous horror stories within that department and I am sure he is aware of various allegations that have been made with regard to the mismanagement of funds, possible patronage and corruption that have existed within that department and various programs. Of course this is not uncommon in other areas of government.

The minister knows there are certain aspects of this legislation that are inconsistent with his public pronouncements. These have been questioned by different segments of our community. I will not go into those, Mr. Speaker, because my colleagues have covered a number of them in the past. However, I feel there are specific areas of housing which have been virtually ignored in this debate.

For a moment or two I would like to talk about senior citizens and the importance of housing to them, and the inadequacy of housing for the native population, specifically the Indian and the Inuit people across Canada.

It is important to put in perspective the extent of mismanagement and misappropriation of funds which are the responsibility of the minister responsible for this bill. It is important for at least three reasons. I am sure there are others, but there are three that I want to emphasize. Initially it reconfirms the position that has been expressed by this party on numerous occasions regarding the excesses of this government, its mismanagement and fiscal irresponsiblity in handling programs. I would suggest that if they were eliminated that could be done without impairing services to Canadians. That is not a partisan position.

I recall being at the public accounts committee hearing when the Auditor General made his report in November, 1978. In issue number five of the minutes of the public accounts committee for November 23, 1978, at page 5:21, the Auditor General, in response to a question regarding the principle of value for money, said:

But I think this value-for-money auditing, Mr. Chairman, is going to catch on like wildfire, in some places anyway, perhaps not with a great enthusiasm by the auditees but we would welcome it. In any event I do feel that what we are talking about here this afternoon perhaps within the next several years can be looked back upon as Canada's "proposition 13:" Obviously, you can see, I am pretty enthusiastic about the prospects.

I believe that is a fundamental principle involved in this entire debate. Indeed if the mismanagement that has been demonstrated in so many programs under the auspices of this minister were removed, the services could be provided to Canadians rather than seeing so many programs cut back or eliminated. I will give some examples of this in a moment.

I must mention also that many of these horror stories associated with the ministry unfortunately have been perceived to be related to the failure of innocent victims. This is not new in this House of Commons. I am sure members in this House will recall that two years ago at the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development we discussed the Indian economic development fund. We demonstrated during an opposition day in this House that there had been at least $50 million mismanaged by that particular department for this one program. Yet the impression was left that it was the Indian community in Canada that had failed. I suggest that same ingredient exists for similar programs that have been handled under this ministry.

Because of the government's inability and its failure to administer programs in an adequate way, it has become immobilized and it has actually become paralysed with respect to many programs and it has lost the ability to govern in that respect. Let us take a look at one department as an example. A moment ago I mentioned the program of Indian economic development, and the government's mismanagement of it. That was confirmed in the Auditor General's 1978 report. What has happend since that time? The entire program of economic development which we consider crucial to Indian problems across Canada has virtually been ignored and there is no program in that sense of the word.

The Indian arts and crafts control marketing service, a program which I consider to be outstanding as an outlet for Indian arts and crafts across the country, was terminated by this government at the end of last year because of its mismanagement of the program. I can assure you that that project will be pursued very actively when the estimates are before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Again, there have been cutbacks on health care to Indian and Inuit people across Canada. Perhaps I could put this in its best perspective by relating a brief part of a conversation I had with the Nova Scotia Indian Brotherhood about two weeks ago. They were talking about the delivery of services to the various reserves and settlements in that province. They came up with a very interesting figure which they could document. It showed that the federal government is spending $8 to deliver 75 cents worth of services to the Indian people on those reserves and in those communities. That is the type of problem about which I am talking. It is the type of issue that has been ignored throughout the debate.

● (2110)

As I indicated earlier, the implications of this legislation virtually ignore senior citizens across the country. I will come back to that in a moment or two. A number of my colleagues have gone into the horror stories with regard to this program over the years. I mention in passing the problems with York Place and similar projects of that nature such as the luxurious hotels, something that is common knowledge to all hon. members of this House.

I was most interested in a brochure with regard to one of them. It describes, and I quote:

—the ambience throughout Hôtel Le Quai d'Orsay is most distinctive and reflects the mood of 20th century aristocratic living.

I can assure hon. members the people I am speaking for and talking about, the senior citizens across this country, certainly those in my area, and the native people, are not interested in aristocratic living. They simply want a roof over their heads and reasonable homes in which to live. I will come to those statistics in a moment.

My colleagues talked about the disasters in the area of AHOP and the graduated mortgage program. I was most impressed with the five-part series published by the Hamilton Spectator during the period January 27 to February 1, 1979, regarding the disasters with respect to CMHC. I have no intention of quoting extensively, but there are two of extreme interest to me because they relate to two of the issues I referred to earlier. One was "$500,000 for 12 basements". The other issue was entitled "RCMP Probing Housing Disaster, Sutton Project Cost Us $300,000". Those two projects relate to the rural and native housing program. As I indicated before, it demonstrates the mismanagement on the part of this government, the misappropriation and misallocation of funds. Because of that this government has not been able to live up to its mandate to provide the type of housing that is needed in this area.

I want to make a comment or two about senior citizens' housing. I must be honest. I am not impressed nor am I convinced that the legislation before us is responsive to that particular need across Canada. Why is it important? I had the fortunate opportunity before coming to the House of Commons of dealing to a great extent with senior citizens across Canada, particularly in my area. Senior citizens are not really a demanding group. However, if there is one aspect that stands out when dealing with senior citizens it is the problem of loneliness. It is probably the single most important medical problem they face.

Senior citizens are interested people. They want to remain in their own homes, near their families and in their community among their friends. I recently attended a ninetieth birthday which demonstrated this in a most eloquent and sensitive way. I knew this individual who was celebrating her ninetieth birthday. How wonderful it was that the entire family could be at this nursing home to celebrate it with her. The sensitivity was experienced by all of us. It was not only felt by her family and those friends around her, but by all the inhabitants of that small community. This is a very important aspect.

The reeve of a small village in my area wrote to me in January after hearing about this bill. He was concerned that senior citizen housing would not be available for the small village of Thamesville. I quote from his letter:

> Council learned from the Ministry of Housing that the village would have to form a chartered public non-profit making organization. Ninety per cent of the capital funds would have to be raised privately just to be eligible for rent subsidies. We would also be responsible for planning and carrying out the project ourselves with only the advice of the Ministry of Housing.

I talked to the reeve of that small village of about 1,000 about this problem. I simply draw to the attention of hon. members the last portion "responsible for planning and carrying out the project ourselves". As I said, this is a small village of about 1,000 people. Do they have an architect? Do they have individuals who can do the type of planning that might be done in metro Toronto or some other large city? That involves a very substantial cost for a town of that size. The government did not address itself to that in this legislation.

I have received letters from that and other communities wherein senior citizens have reflected on the problems and the necessity of our addressing ourselves to those problems. I quote from one letter:

> —we understand they found $18 million to help four cities with hockey arenas. Is this more important than having shelter for the people that played a large part in the building of this country . . . Every year we have seniors that have to leave their larger homes or farms and friends and go to other centres to find shelter. This is very upsetting to older people.

Another woman wrote to say she had lost four friends in the last year. They moved to larger centres because of the absence of senior citizen housing in that area.

I know my time is running out, but I must say a few words about the problem of Indian housing across Canada. I suppose this could be best demonstrated by the experience in Assumption. I am sure hon. members are cognizant of what has appeared on the national news and in newspapers across Canada with regard to the fact there have been at least three deaths in the past two weeks of infants in that small community, due to bronchialitis, which is related to substandard housing in that community. This can be documented across the country.

On our allotted day on November 18, 1976, this party outlined in a very responsible manner the problems related to housing for Indian and native people across this country. Let me just take a moment or two to give some indication of the severity of that problem. On that day we talked about the Indians, the Inuit and, indeed, the native problem itself.

As I recall, today is the fifth anniversary of the rural and native housing program and of the government's commitment to build 50,000 homes for that community. How many homes have actually been built during that period? Not more than 7,000, plus or minus one or two hundred. On the anniversary date, a government which talks about a positive housing policy for the Indians and Inuit has built less than 1,000 homes during the whole five-year period. It is estimated that over a period of 30 years, 31,000 houses were built for Indians; of that number 14,000 were considered substandard in 1976, 9,000 required rehabilitation on a major scale, and more than 7,500 were beyond repair. The figures have not improved. If anything they are worse today, and there is nothing in the bill before us which addresses itself to this problem. Ten per cent of those homes consisted of no more than one room, often with ten to 15 individuals crowding into it.

Seventy per cent of the Indian population were without water, 25 per cent were forced to use water known to be contaminated, and 40 per cent had to rely on surface water—imagine the health hazards there. Ninety per cent had to use outside pit toilets for sewage disposal.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and on describing conditions in the Inuit community. The situation in the Inuit community is no better. We know there were buildings put up in the north in the southern style, which virtually disintegrated over a five-year period. They were unsuited to the lifestyle of those who lived in them and were inconsistent with climatic conditions in the northern regions. Fifty thousand homes were promised five years ago, and only 7,000 were delivered, as I have stated, under the government's native policy.

I can recall bringing the attention of the House to the seriousness of this problem on an earlier occasion, while this subject was under debate on November 18, 1976. I can recall the minister's comments on that day. If I may say so, he demonstrated no interest in native housing policy on that occasion; he was more concerned about other matters. To show the seriousness of the problem let me quote from page 1145 of Hansard for November 18, 1976:

> In many areas houses are so worthless that residents seldom bother to spend money on improvements or make an effort to repair them. Broken windows are patched with cardboard boxes.
> Rusty cream cans are used for water storage. It is rare if there is more than one bed and more than one or two chairs. When a visitor eats at home he usually is given the few dishes and silverware, while the family eats out of the tin pans or even tin cans. Most homes have electricity. Kerosene lamps are the only source of light. In many communities, water is scarce and has to be hauled long distances. Often it is unfit for human consumption.

I could go on. However, I entered the debate at this late stage primarily because of my grave concern, my feeling that the government and the minister have ignored two extremely important areas as far as housing is concerned. I am not satisfied that there has been a positive response from the government to the needs of senior citizens, and I am not satisfied that the government has demonstrated any interest in native housing in Canada or developed any policy to deal with it.

Mr. Penner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept a brief question?

Mr. Holmes: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Penner: I listened with great interest to the hon. member, whom I consider to be one of the more responsible members on that side of the House who sits on the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. During his address he quoted a figure which I am sure he would like to explain more fully to the House. If he is unable to do so tonight the matter will be pursued at great length in the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Penner: The question is coming, if the hon. member would be patient. It takes a little time and a little elaboration is required, so contain yourself.

The question relates to a figure which was given by the hon. member; he told us that 75 cents worth of service was delivered to the Indian people at a cost of $8. That statement requires a great deal of explanation, and because the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) is intelligent enough to know that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development delivers to the Indian people services amounting to $711 million, he may wish to ask his caucus this week whether his colleagues would support an increase in this amount—I think he would find a great deal of opposition on the part of his fellow members to increase expenditures on programs for the Indian people. The hon. member will also be aware that there are another $200 million from the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Canada Works program and the Young Canada Works program, which could be added to that figure of $711 million.

An hon. Member: Order. He is making a speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member is on a point of order but I suggest he get to the question.

Mr. Penner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been given permission to ask a question, but I could have been recognized for the purpose of making a speech. However, I wanted to use my time to ask a question. We are now dealing with a total of $911 million; out of that $44 million is used to administer the Indian programs. I would ask the hon. member to explain how the expenditure of $44 million in dealing with that volume of services could be equated with the statement he has made suggesting that 75 cents worth of services cost $8 to deliver. There is obviously a great discrepancy between the figures given by the hon. member and those I have advanced. Responsible as he is, I am sure he would not wish to leave the chamber without justifying them.

Mr. Holmes: I appreciate the recognition by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) of my interest in Indian and Inuit problems. That is precisely what prompted me to enter into the debate this evening. In my view little attention has been paid to this area. I am sorry the hon. member was not listening very carefully to my speech. If he would look at the transcript he would find I indicated I had met with representatives of the Nova Scotia Indian Brotherhood who had stated, in the course of a presentation, that in respect to certain programs in their area $8 of federal funds were required to deliver 75 cents worth of services. That information was given in a presentation to members of my party, and I would be more than delighted at a later date to provide the hon. member with those figures.

• (2130)

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to rise for the first time in this debate. I expected to participate earlier, but because of the tragedy of miners being killed in my riding I had to spend a much longer period of time than I anticipated down home in connection with that terrible catastrophe as well as with other problems.

I browsed through the Debates so far because that is really all I had time to do. The minister seemed preoccupied in his lengthy speech in this debate with dispelling the idea of a housing crisis in Canada. At this late hour I do not want to get into a semantic discussion because I want to give at least one member of the official opposition five or seven minutes. However, whether we call it a crisis or not, the situation is close to a crisis by anybody's definition except, evidently, the minister's. CMHC figures as recently as last year indicated that approximately 1,225,000 households in this country are suffering from some form of housing deprivation. This breaks down into 180,000 families living in inadequate dwellings, 298,000 overcrowded dwellings, and 547,000 families paying more than 25 per cent of their total income on shelter. These are dry statistics, but they have a very serious meaning for the human beings involved. What I am saying is that a million households being affected means that several million Canadians are affected by these conditions, and if that is not a crisis it is something of which this country should be ashamed.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) quoted Mr. Teron's speech in Calgary of two years ago, which is an additional piece of evidence from CMHC despite the seemingly loose connection Mr. Teron still has with CMHC or what is to be called "the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation" because of these amendments. In November of 1976 Mr. Teron said and I quote, "that when 280,000 families in Canada pay more than 50 per cent of their family income for housing"—and that is shocking to me—"550,000 families in Canada pay more than 45 per cent." Imagine that in this day of high food prices and high prices for everything else. Imagine shelling out that kind of money for housing. Mr. Teron said that 820,000 families at that time paid more than 25 per cent, and two thirds of Canadians in need of housing could not afford to buy or rent without a subsidy from their fellow man. He said that we had a fundamental problem. Whether in the minister's mind we have a crisis or not, we certainly have a fundamental problem. Mr. Teron went on to say that, and I quote, "we must take reasonable action now or more drastic action later".

In connection with one part of this whole housing problem I want to pick up the theme of Mr. Teron when he referred to a national housing crisis. The minister might use some other word. With regard to the national housing problem which besets this country I want to speak of one element which relates to my home constituency. I have been dealing with the minister on this for some two years and with his predecessor before that. This problem relates to the inability of the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program and the Neighbourhood Improvement Program to do certain jobs in certain areas.

In the mining towns which make up a major part of my constituency some housing is 70 to 100 years old. Marx and nineteenth century socialists would call this housing proletarian housing. Private companies have dug pits and built coal mines, and built houses around them. Around these pits or collieries, as they are called in other countries, people were crowded into company housing. After these companies get their money out, they leave. I do not want to digress too far, but the only country in the world which has a real private mining industry is the United States. To me it is no coincidence that United States mines have had over the years the worst safety features of all in the western world and, as far as we know, even parts of eastern Europe such as Poland which is light years ahead of the United States in that respect. I say that by way of digression. However, there is an essential problem.

I am not saying that the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, even in these mining areas, has not been good, because it has. However, the program has been slow and cumbersome. I have correspondence here which dates back to the time I came here. This correspondence is with one minister after another. It deals with Devco, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), the former minister of housing now the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson), and others. This correspondence shows that all of them, including CMHC and Devco, ran around the problem and continually told me that there were other programs or that they could not get into this type of thing.

CMHC told me that it did not want to initiate action. I feel that CMHC is not flexible enough. I do not say that about local officials, but I do say that about policy-making and its application. I agree with the fundamental argument of our party—and I push it forward—that we want centralization of the monetary and fiscal policies of this country to remain in federal hands. If the federal government does not want to give the provinces a bigger share in the management of housing policy within their regions it could at least be more flexible in application with regard to its universal program in areas like mine, and, for example, Sudbury and Timmins which have old housing. This old housing is the legacy of these areas, and it is the worst part of their past. Something should be done to correct that.

I suggested to the minister, CMHC and Devco, that in an area of high unemployment rehabilitation should be promoted. That rehabilitation should be for the benefit of senior citizens and widows who are now living in much of this older housing. It should be made better for them. I suggested that would be a real investment in the future and that it would reduce the amount of new construction for public housing and senior citizens housing. I proposed a special rehabilitation agency for an area like Cape Breton. I have been kept dancing around by these Crown corporations and these ministers on this issue because they just have not been able to co-ordinate or did not have the will to do so. They have not been flexible, and no initiative has been taken to correct the serious deficiencies in the areas to which I referred.

The reason I am so upset about this is that this year RRAP does not include something which may not seem important to some members of this House but which is very important to a member like me, that is, that no foundations are to be included under RRAP this year. I have been asking for a new rehabilitation agency, and that foundations be put under what were formerly company houses now owned by miners since the post-war period, lived in by miners, pensioners, widows, and low income people. I would like this housing to be upgraded by the addition of foundations. We have come to the conclusion it would cost about $8,000 per household. I asked the present head of Devco, who was then interim head, Mr. Steve Rankin, to try to get CMHC going on this and to use the growth component of the Canada Works program, but again things are so slow there, and the explanations given to MPPs are so inadequate that it is difficult to get any of these things off the ground.

I appeal to the minister tonight to tell CMHC officials in Sydney, "Look we have taken in people from Kentucky", which they did. We held meetings and we found there are no parallels whatsoever between the problem in Kentucky and the housing problem in our mining areas and former mining areas, including the area where our Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) was born. We could take 60 houses as a pilot project at $8,000 each, which comes to roughly $480,000. With the present delivery system, we could put foundations under these houses and people could contribute something small out of their incomes, which would come to roughly only $7,300 on average. In that way we would make a contribution which RRAP is not able to make because it is so slow and cumbersome and because of the fact that it does not now include foundations.

I make that special pitch to the minister tonight. I see the minister in charge of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, the Minister of Regional Economic Development (Mr. Lessard), here tonight. He knows that since he has been head of that department I have been bringing up this matter in meeting after meeting. Surely to God places like Cape Breton, which have the legacy of a coal mining area which was exploited to the ultimate by private companies which have then pulled out, deserve, beside employment, to have their houses improved in order to make up for the failures of the past. I want to be fair to the government and state clearly that I do not accuse them of doing nothing because the fact is that they have neglected the area's housing for so long that in the 1970s they have made some kind of an effort, but it is not sufficient and where it especially needs to be made.

I could speak on many other aspects, Mr. Speaker, such as the one relating to the development of co-operative housing and my concerns about co-operative housing under these amendments. But once again I appeal to the Minister of Regional Economic Development to get together with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) and the minister of housing so that those people who have contributed a great deal to Canada in the past and some of whose tragedy we have recently witnessed across this nation, will not suffer in the future, such as the elderly and, pensioners making $7,500 at an average, and that they will have decent shelter from the cold in the meantime. It is better to supply some people with interim employment than to hand out unemployment insurance to people who basically do not want it. Longer term problems of employment of course should be tied up with coal, steel and fisheries development and any diversification that may come from that.

I should like to conclude my remarks now because I know the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott), the hon. lady from the official opposition who is on my right, would like to say a few words. I hope the ministers involved will take my admonition seriously.

Mrs. Pigott: They do not care.

Mr. Hogan: I cannot believe that, fundamentally. I think they do care and they will do something about it for the sake of those people who need this kind of housing so badly.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure, at this stage of the debate on Bill C-29, to take the floor and indicate in public both my desire and the satisfaction it gives me to support a bill which will have three major effects. These, I feel, would bear repeating to the Canadian population as a whole.

The first major effect of this bill sponsored by the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) will be to double the output of public housing in Canada. This noble objective is worth stressing and all to the credit of the minister's social conscience. The second desirable effect of Bill C-29 will be to increase—

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but I hear the hon. member chatting with the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott). Maybe they could pursue their conversation behind the curtains. Personally, I wish to address myself to the Canadian public without being disturbed. We, on this side of the House, have always respected hon. members opposite when they take the floor by refraining from interrupting them. I would like to be extended the same privilege, Mr. Speaker, especially when we are discussing a bill of such serious nature which will have such important consequences on the poor, the category of people the Progressive Conservative party systematically forget about in their attitude and I will have the opportunity to prove that in a few moments.

The second desirable effect of Bill C-29, as I was saying, will be to increase very substantially the rate of rehabilitation of housing this year, to double that performance in 1980 and to triple it in 1981. The third effect worth mentioning will be to encourage—and that is fundamental, Mr. Speaker—municipalities in their community services projects. When one considers these three objectives or the three effects Bill C-29 will have, one wonders how the official opposition can justify the attitude it showed at all stages in the consideration of the bill from second reading, through discussion in Committee of the Whole House up to now, at third reading.

Mr. Speaker, several hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party wrongly pointed out and insisted that the bill had been introduced a year too late. Yet the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs in the speech he made when he introduced his motion for second reading said stressed this, and I quote from page 3467 of Hansard for February 21, 1979. He said:

> —it is obvious that in its most important aspects this bill implements the new orientation the Canadian government intends to give housing. That orientation is being adopted as a result of the meetings I have held with my provincial colleagues; together, as ministers responsible for housing in Canada, we formulated this new policy.

Mr. Speaker, it has been made quite clear at the outset of the discussion of Bill C-29 that there was no undue delay, that on the contrary the minister had felt proper to consult with the people more directly concerned before introducing in this House such an important legislation. The last federal-provincial conference of housing ministers was held last fall, and the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) had committed himself to consult with co-operative housing movements in Canada following the ministerial conference and before the introduction of this legislation in the House.

So, Mr. Speaker, before introducing his bill in the House of Commons, the minister had to respect the most fundamental democracy, namely to consult his provincial counterparts, as promised. This is what they did last fall. They also consulted co-operative housing movements in Canada following that ministerial conference. This is where the new co-operative program was developed, at the beginning of December, 1978.

Mr. Speaker, how can the government and the minister be held responsible for the one-year delay in the introduction of the bill when, as I have just mentioned, the conference of housing ministers was held last fall, when there were meetings with co-operative housing movements following that conference and when the new co-operative program was effectively developed at the beginning of December 1978? Mr. Speaker, I think that it is not serious, that in their speeches, the Progressive Conservatives misled the people by stating that we were not interested either in ending the study of that bill in a reasonable time or introducing it at the proper time. Quite the opposite, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Public Works acted responsibly. He respected the people. He consulted them. He honoured his commitments. He introduced the bill at the very first opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, if we look at the proceedings on Bill C-29, we note that it was introduced into the House on December 8 therefore immediately after the new co-operative program was finalized following consultation with the housing ministers and housing co-operatives in Canada. So, on December 8, according to the official register of the House, we find on the order paper the notice of presentation of the bill and the recommendation of the governor general. First reading was given to it by the House on December 12, 1978 and it was only on December 21, 1978, late in the afternoon, that under unfortunate circumstances we were able to start the debate on second reading of this bill because of the dilatory, childish and irresponsible manoeuvre of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Speaker, I need not remind you that the debate on second reading of this very important bill started on February 21, 1979, when the Progressive Conservative party deemed it timely to present a motion for adjournment which delayed—I hear the hon. member mumble remarks. I should very much like to hear them clearly and be able to answer them. If she has anything to say, I am willing to sit down and hear her out, after which I shall answer her. But I see that she is not in her seat. If she wants to take the floor, I will listen to her.

Mr. Speaker, I was here on February 21, and many Canadians through the televised debates were able to observe the irresponsible behaviour of the Progressive Conservative party which for a period of more than two hours prevented the House of Commons of Canada from functioning normally. It prevented the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs from delivering his speech at second reading on this important legislation which aims at improving the lot of those who are most in need in this country, by building as many housing units as possible at the lowest cost possible. This attitude prompted the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs to say that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) behaved that afternoon like a little kid bent on playing hooky and that it was obvious he did not have the sense of responsibility one needs to take on the heaviest responsibilities in the land.

Today we heard Progressive Conservative members complaining about the fact that this bill was brought forward too late. How phoney on their part to say that, Mr. Speaker! They are precisely those who delayed the introduction of this bill by a manoeuvre which was totally disrespectful of this institution and of the urgency of legislating in the House of Commons by presenting a motion for adjournment in a childish manner and by preventing serious-minded members from working and legislating.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, we only need to consider the duration of this debate at second reading on Bill C-29. We have never witnessed an official opposition so systematically trying to present a bill from being passed by protracting the debates for several days. I want to be specific and I will state some facts in support of my allegations. On February 23, 1979, that issue had been debated during the whole day at second reading, on February 26, 1979, on February 28, 1979, on March 1, 1979, on March 2—

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We had a very good spirit here on Friday. I am absolutely appalled. We agreed to make an order that we would finish the debate tonight. I think we made a fundamental mistake.

Mr. Lalonde: That is not a point of order.

Mrs. Pigott: The minister opposite indicated that we would have time tonight. The spirit of this debate has now gone with this type of tirade. We expected to get speakers on tonight who have not had an opportunity to participate.

Mr. Lalonde: That is not a point of order.

Mrs. Pigott: It is a breach of faith. So typical, so typical.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that that is not a point of order; it is debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I hardly understand the attitude of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) who is trying to make us believe that the Progressive Conservative party is spontaneously in favour of this bill while for several days which I was just listing, they have done their utmost to prevent it from being passed within a reasonable period of time. Mr. Speaker, what the Progressive Conservative party was trying to do and especially the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, was an attempt to prevent the doubling of social housing production in Canada. It is quite unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, and here they come today talking about a spirit of understanding after having thwarted us for days and after having misled the Canadian public by systematically opposing a rational debate on this bill, while the House of Commons—

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have never heard, even from this Liberal government, so many lies one after the other as I have heard from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest the hon. member should withdraw his last remarks about lies. Will the hon. member withdraw that remark?

Mr. Whiteway: Yes, I will withdraw the unparliamentary language of lies. But I will not withdraw the fact that I have never heard so many untruths spoken one after the other as we have heard from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member that that is not a point of order; it is debate.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if Your Honour would advise hon. members of the nature of the House order earlier today. Is it correct that there will be no further debate on this subject after ten o'clock tonight, and that there will be no voting between now and ten o'clock? Is that the nature of the House order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): That is correct, that is the motion moved earlier today.

Mr. Paproski: Then I should like to call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hogan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being ten o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day it is my duty to interrupt the debate and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the bill now before the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

STATUS OF WOMEN—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE EQUAL OPPORTUNITY FOR WOMEN IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped a moment ago until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) left the chamber that he was going to be here to reply to this question, because for over a year now I have been attempting to get some firm accounting from the minister in respect of the treatment by the government of its female employees in the public service. I hope, in the course of the next few minutes, to remind the minister, whether he is here tonight or has the opportunity to read this later, of the very serious allegations and criticisms which are contained in the latest report of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women regarding the situation of women in the public service.

As members will know, in January of this year the Advisory Council on the Status of Women issued again, as it has done on an annual basis in recent years, a report on the progress women have made in the public service. This report is entitled "Barriers to Equal Opportunity." I believe that this report is a veritable catalogue of discriminations and failures on the part of the government in acting on behalf of its female public employees.

As the report states clearly in its introduction, the government's direct responsibility regarding the employment of women is crucial because, as the report sets out at page 1:

> First, as the largest single employer of women, it has a direct responsibility to provide equal opportunities for women in the public service.

That is a mandate and a responsibility which very clearly, as this report indicates, has not been lived up to. The government increasingly has treated women as a reserve pool of labour.

I do not have time this evening to point out all the detail, but I would be delighted to hear the minister's response in explaining how it is that as income difficulties have grown, as the report says at page 13, "the federal government, in its employment practices continues to treat women as if they constitute a reserve pool of labour".

I hope in the course of the next few minutes to point out very clearly how, again and again, this report indicts the government in terms of its responsibilities in respect of the employment of women in the public service.

At page 15, in terms of the situation regarding term appointments, one indication of the attitude that has actually been lived up to regarding the public service is stated in the report:

> As of March 1978, 17 per cent of public servants were employed on a term basis. Approximately half of these employees were men and half women.

On the surface that would appear quite fair, as the report states. It goes on to state that the facts are that "fewer women are public servants." The report states:

> As of March 1978, only 36.7 per cent of public servants, including seasonal and term employees, were women.
> The tendency to place women in term appointments is growing, not diminishing. The percentage of term employees who were women increased from 45.2 per cent in 1976 to 48.7 per cent in 1977—

Further on at page 20 of this report it is pointed out with regard to the over-all improvement women have made in the public service:

> Moreover, there has been little improvement over time. If we compare the 1977 quintile breakdown with quintile figures for 1973 and 1975, we find that the distribution has changed only minimally.

Further on it points out:

> In the middle quintile, there was a reversal in 1977 of an upward trend between 1973 and 1975.

In respect of the recent lay-offs that have been taking place, and I think here we are reminded of some exchanges which took place between my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan), the report points out at page 23:

> Between 1976 and 1977 the number of public servants laid off more than doubled from 1012 to 2347. In 1976, 470, or 46 per cent of the employees laid off were women. In 1977, 1243 women were laid off, representing 53 per cent of the total. This increase is shocking enough in itself, but when we remember that women account for only 37 per cent of federal public servants, the discrimination becomes even more glaring.

● (2205)

Hon. members may recall that a number of questions were raised in this House a year ago about the number of women entering the career assignment program and about those achieving appointments in the upper and middle levels of management in the public service. On page 31 the report says:

Even in this program, the representation of women has dropped. Although, as the table below confirms, in 1975 women accounted for 30.6 per cent of the participants in the CAP, by 1977 they accounted for only 14 per cent falling behind the 1973 representation.

Finally, this part of the report concludes with a summation of the report that has been presented to the government. On page 44 it says:

The preceding statistics reveal that the federal government has failed to provide equal opportunities for women in the public service.

It goes on to point out that instead of being ahead of the private sector, it is trailing behind. Why is this? Why has there been this failure?

On page 46 the report points out:

—the government's failure to address the basic patterns which underly the historic inequality of women.

In effect the report recognizes that the government has not come to grips with the basic elements that would require adjustment or change if real discrimination were to be removed. The report points out on page 52:

Notably absent have been any concrete moves to make the recommended structural adjustments or to actively recruit women into occupational groups where they are under-represented.

It goes on to say at page 53:

It would appear then that inherent in the very programs designed to promote equal opportunities for women is either an unawareness of the historical factors maintaining the inequality or an inability or unwillingness to adopt an employment approach that can address the real issues.

This is the crux of the matter, Mr. Speaker, "an inability or unwillingness" to address the essential structure requires to end discrimination in employment in the public service. I hope that one of the parliamentary secretaries here this evening can give us some concrete reason why the government to this point is only prepared to dismiss a highly important and helpful report.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will understand that in the three minutes afforded to me this evening it will be impossible to provide any kind of thesis or in depth response to the argument he makes relying on the report he has quoted so copiously. It will afford me, however, the opportunity at least to deal with a couple of the points he raised at some length and with some vigour. He suggests that the lay-offs taking place and the figures on which he relied, were shocking.

I would point out, as has the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) in response to questions put by the hon. member and others on that side of the House with respect to lay-offs, and "the last hired, first fired" statement that was made, that in fact those persons hired most recently are those who might be expected to be laid off first. Short of coming out with some kind of hybrid whereby there would be no opportunity for those with tenure enjoying more job security than those most recently hired, it would seem to be impossible, with a large influx of women into the labour market, not to have a disproportionately large number of them laid off when such large lay-offs take place.

The government has indicated that the argument may not be acceptable in terms of what is actually taking place. The difficulty we are dealing with is structural. When there is a larger influx of women, as has been the case in recent days, it might be expected that they would be the first to go when lay-offs take place.

In the time remaining perhaps I might be permitted to indicate by way of history that a cabinet directive No. 44 issued in 1972 requested that deputy heads of departments promote women in middle and upper echelon positions. Since that time numbers of women have been increasing in all categories except scientific and professional. The 1975 cabinet directive stated that every deputy head must assign an officer responsible for the EOW program. That has happened. I should like to be able to present more facts and figures but I am restricted by the time available.

AIR TRANSPORT—SETTLEMENT WITH UNION TO AVOID FURTHER DETERIORATION OF AIR SAFETY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, with every department head having at least three female secretaries, why shouldn't what the parliamentary secretary has said be true notwithstanding what my colleague has just referred to?

My concern tonight is the plight facing air travellers in Canada. In particular it refers to a question which I raised on February 5, well over a month ago, respecting negotiations between the department and the air inspectors and their bargaining procedures. It seems six weeks after the question was raised that negotiations are in limbo, and while this is so there is a continuing demoralization of these individuals. Without question there is a lowering of the capacity of these people to apply themselves vigorously to their jobs and responsibilities.

Continuously in this House in recent months there has been a plea from the opposition for the government to move swiftly to remove any cause for concern on the part of those who use aircraft to travel across Canada. I sugest there is a failure on the part of the government to recognize that beyond the bargaining procedures there is a responsibility to make absolutely certain that there is no cause for fear or alarm among the air travelling public.

Failure of the government to do this prompted me to ask once again this evening if the parliamentary secretary could indicate the status of the negotiations. Could he tell us whether the principle of comparability, so eloquently espoused by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has found favour among his colleagues on the Treasury benches? If so, as a result of that, can we anticipate any action on the part of the government to reopen the talks which seem to be somewhat stalemated at the moment? These are essentially the questions that concern us. We cannot continue to have a high standard maintained if the people who are asked to do the job are not anywhere nearly comparable in wages to those with similar training in the private sector. I will not dwell on that topic, but I am sure the parliamentary secretary appreciates and understands the implications of it.

Let me remind the parliamentary secretary once more, if I may, that the question of safety in transport, and the conflicts which arise therefrom, are not a new subject in this House. I can tell him that I have had a private member's bill prepared for his edification, and I know he has looked at it, which gets to the root of the problem when the regulatory agency continues to have to accept responsibility for the investigated or consequential result of that regulatory authority posed in a statutory manner. These things must come to an end, the charade like that which arose out of Cranbrook, with the attempt by the ministry to bury a report until such time as they have had a chance to prepare new regulations, authorities and tighter and tougher rules with regard to air safety. That is not good enough. The minister should look at his internal organization in the hope that the ultimate beneficiary will be the travelling public in this country.

• (2215)

I am a minor individual. However, I have just completed my 1,300th trip between this city and my city of Halifax. I am not unfamiliar with aircraft. When I board an aeroplane I like to know that the highest standards possible are in effect. We have the capacity and the trained personnel in this country. They are ready to work. What we need is an awareness and attitude on the part of this government to ensure that our air inspection officers are able to work to their fullest capacity and with the best interests of all Canadians uppermost in their minds. I repeat my question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right to say that members of the opposition party have brought up many times the question of the negotiations between the aviation inspectors and their employer, Transport Canada. I believe that it is not intentionally that the hon. member is bringing up this matter again, but I would like him to note, Mr. Speaker, that by bringing up this scarecrow every day or nearly every day—I have taken part myself in four late shows already to explain that negotiations are going on normally.

By bringing up this scarecrow regularly, as I said earlier, that is by saying that this could cause problems in air safety in Canada. I believe that the hon. member could cause, even though unintentionally, unjustified fears among the Canadian travelling public. I would like to remind him that, as was said in the committee on transport and communications, since 1973 the ratio of air incidents to the number of flight hours or flights in Canada has steadily decreased. As for the question he raised about the investigation of aviation incidents, I would also like to remind him that a few weeks ago the minister stated the policy related to a reorganization of these air incident investigation procedures. To come back to the question raised this evening by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that is the current negotiations between the employer and the aviation inspectors, the employer feels that negotiations are progressing normally and that all procedures under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, either the services of a conciliator afterwards or the intervention of a conciliation board and all such mechanisms, Mr. Speaker, have not yet been exhausted. During the negotiations, the employer stated that he was ready to carry on negotiations while admitting the difficulties which the parties had to tackle. He believes, however, that negotiations should be held between the parties directly involved and that it is not proper to use the House of Commons as a platform for collective bargaining. This is what we said on several occasions and I am convinced that my colleague will agree with me in that regard.

[English]

In the meantime the civil aviation inspectors are still performing their assigned tasks without resort to slow-down or work-to-rule activities. The important function of enforcement of the air regulations and other legislation is still being actively pursued. The inspection of air carriers and the performance of the required pilot proficiency checks are still carried on. The investigation of aircraft accidents and incidents is still proceeding normally. The calibration of navigation and landing aids is still being performed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think that the time allotted to me has expired and I hope that I have proved to the House that all regulations and necessary inspections for air safety are now enforced in Canada.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—HEALTH CARE OF NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, you may recall that late last fall, around Christmas time and early in January, there was an outcry from the Indian people because the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) had decided to withdraw certain health services from those people. The guidelines which she imposed at that time were based on a broad accusation that Indian people were abusing certain of the health services, particularly ambulance services, dental services, optometric services, and the use of prescription drugs. She made this broad accusation but to this date I have not heard from her one specific example of such abuse.

It seems to me that the minister, who poses or attempts to pose before the public as a humane lady, chose on this occasion to attack the poor and the weak—as we all know, the Indians in this country are, by and large, poor and certainly economically speaking, weak. As to their physical state, when we examine the statistics we see that the mortality rate for Indian children is much higher than the rate for the rest of the population; the life expectancy generally is much lower, and in many aspects of life the Indians are falling behind the rest of society. Thus it seems to me that it was a callous decision on the part of the minister to impose these guidelines which make it more difficult, if not impossible, for sick Indian people to get ambulance drives to hospital or to obtain the drugs they require, sometimes on an emergency basis. But she acted on the basis of a broad accusation that people were abusing the system.

As a result of representations from members of my party, the National Indian Brotherhood and other Indian organizations, she did, however, agree to suspend these guidelines for a six-month period. She explained she was doing so in order to have more time in which to consult with Indian people. Mr. Speaker, the fact is that so far she refuses even to talk with them. She has refused to set in motion any mechanism for the consultation process in which she told us she wanted to engage.

In support of this statement, I should like to read a telex which was sent to the minister by the National Indian Brotherhood. I may say I had a conversation with the president of the National Indian Brotherhood and the president of the Alberta Indian Association just this afternoon, so the information I have is very current. The telex reads:

> It is unfortunate that you feel it is not applicable at this time to discuss the issue of health services and in particular the consultation mechanism established on January 24. You have my letter of January 28 outlining our concerns with the consultation mechanism. We have had no reply. My staff has been in contact with your office no less than eight times since January 24 attempting to set up a meeting with you to clarify the ongoing issue of health services to Indian people. The consultation process appears to be actually negating discussion and we have an executive council meeting and I am sorry I have to report that once again you have refused to meet to discuss and clarify the ongoing health issue.

It appears that the minister is stonewalling. It appears that her promise to negotiate was nothing more than a political ploy to take this issue out of public discussion until the election is over. It is quite clear that she has no intention whatsoever to carry out her promise to negotiate.

Another aspect concerns me very much insofar as her attitude is concerned. At the meeting of January 24 a representative of the National Indian Brotherhood presented the minister with a blanket as a token of esteem. It was a new Hudson Bay blanket. It was a very expensive and very good blanket. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, if you think back, you will realize that it was a very nice gift for the National Indian Brotherhood to offer the minister.

The minister took the blanket, but the next day she had the gall to telephone the president of the National Indian Brotherhood to inquire whether the blanket carried disease or whether there was a curse on it to harm her in any way. The response the National Indian Brotherhood gave the minister was that it was given to her with only the best intentions and that the minister could send it to her own laboratories to determine whether it carried any disease. I am astonished by the attitude of the minister. It seems quite clear that she has either been badly advised or has committed herself with less than the best of intentions as far as negotiations are concerned. If it was her intention to get past the election with this ploy and if the universe unfolds as it should, my party will pick up the pieces, the consultation process will indeed continue when the election is over, and a humane way will be found to solve this very serious problem.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I deplore the suggestion of the hon. member that the minister attempted to use as a ploy for time an extension of six months with a view to escaping any obligation she undertook. I think this House and those who know the minister know that she is an honourable woman, and if she gave any undertaking she will indeed seek to do everything possible to fulfil it. I reject out of hand any suggestion by the hon. member that anything other than that is the case.

In addition, I suggest that the hon. member has used the late show to go rather far afield from the question he initially put. If he expects a response to a question he put earlier, he should restrict himself to that question so that any preparation for the purpose of making a response is directed to the initial question.

In any event, at the January 24 meeting the minister did meet with Indian participants who presented their views with regard to the department's guidelines regarding the provision of certain uninsured health services to Indian and Inuit people. I would like to take some time to outline the demands of the Indian people, but the time goes quickly. I can only say that on January 24 the minister indicated that primary health services and programs for Indian people on reserves would not be affected.

The minister explained the reasons for implementing guidelines for uninsured services, which include the provision of eyeglasses, dentures, prescription drugs, and transportation of patients for medical reasons. I think it is important that I state once again that, contrary to the incorrect information the hon. member opposite put on the record, the services we are talking about are not insured services, they are uninsured services. This is not a new policy which was implemented just recently by this government. It is a continuation of the policy which has existed since 1958 and which was put in place by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In fact this is not something that is new and different.

What the minister has indicated is that in fact there had been some abuses that had grown into the system and that, as a consequence, it was time for a rationalization of the system to ensure that proper insured services would be provided under the policy. Notwithstanding the fact that there was a rationalization, because of the misapprehension and misinformation that had crept into the debate she provided a six months' suspension so that there could be a further discussion and a further understanding of what was going on. She outlined at that time four guidelines or criteria which were made known to the Indian and Inuit representatives at that meeting. I can provide those guidelines to the hon. member again this evening, if he does not have them yet or does not understand them, and I will be pleased to bring all hon. members up to date on the implementation of the policy pertaining to the health of the Indian and Inuit people, but I see that my time has expired.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CALL FOR AMENDMENTS TO GUN CONTROL REGULATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, in connection with the gun control legislation.

Everywhere across this nation, law-abiding citizens are appalled by the administration of this act, which has become a bureaucratic jumble of misinterpretations which differ among enforcement officers, with the consequent result that injustices occurring to good and responsible citizens, and in particular to sportsmen and sportswomen, are creating grave concern except to the underworld, which is making fabulous profits in illicit sales of firearms.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That before this House adjourns, a committee be set up with power to bring about needed amendments to the regulations, to the end that uniformity of interpretation be achieved and injustices to responsible individuals be done away with.

Mr. Speaker: According to the terms of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE SEAL HUNT

REQUEST FOR OFFICIAL STATEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a very important matter.

Considering the noisy publicity now being made about the baby seal hunt; considering that the matter has raised protests and indignation in Canada and even abroad; and considering all that row is likely to make Canadians abroad look like brutes and unprincipled people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle):

That the House direct the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) to make an official statement in the House to clear up that matter and preserve the good name of Canada and, if necessary, that a debate on the issue be held immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SAFETY INSPECTOR FOR SAINT JOHN, N.B.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that previous efforts of four locals of the International Longshoremen's Association in Saint John, New Brunswick, were unsuccessful in obtaining a full-time safety inspector for the port of Saint John, New Brunswick, in view of the fact that a recent rash of accidents prompted the Maritime Employers Association to hire a safety inspector paid by the MEA, and since the unions involved rejected the proposal that such an inspector be paid by the MEA, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour):

That the federal government should forthwith appoint an accomplished, non-partisan safety inspector for the port of Saint John.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON OIL POLICY RESPECTING ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make a statement on motions informing this House and Canadians whether government policy is related to the continuing development of a healthy oil industry in Alberta, or whether it is federal policy to leave the oil in the ground as proposed by Mr. Nick Taylor, the Alberta Liberal leader.

URBAN AFFAIRS

DEPUTY MINISTER TO APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE ON SALE OF PESTALOZZI COLLEGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In the light of reported statements by the Deputy Minister of Urban Affairs appearing in the Sunday Post of Canada on March 4, that "I have a very active imagination . . . nobody has taught me right from wrong . . . my mind is fluid, always full of wild hallucinations", I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That the Minister of State for Urban Affairs direct the deputy minister to appear before the standing committee to explain whether wild hallucinations influenced the sale of Pestalozzi college at a loss to the taxpayers of Canada of over $3 million.

SUPPORT FOR PETRO-CANADA NEGOTIATING WITH VENEZUELA AND MEXICO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the terms of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that Imperial Oil of Canada has now refused the request of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that contractual arrangements for the supply of Venezuelan oil to Canada be made directly with Imperial Oil of Canada rather than through Imperial's giant multinational parent, Exxon, and considering that the refusal originates from the same Exxon corporation that unilaterally interfered with Venezuelan oil exports intended for Canada only a few weeks ago, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner):

That this House declare its support for the position taken by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that our own national oil company, Petro-Canada, step in and commence negotiations with both Venezuela and Mexico to ensure Canadian petroleum supplies, since the multinationals and their Canadian subsidiaries obviously cannot be trusted to fulfil their commitments or act in the Canadian interest.

DELAY IN MAILING REFUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that workers in the Sudbury basin had been informed by the Minister of National Revenue that refunds on income tax would not go out before March 1, and in view of the fact that we are now beyond March 1 and the

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON UNEMPLOYMENT—EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It relates to the recently released figures with respect to unemployment which show there are still one million people unemployed in this country, including the hidden jobless.

This is nothing to be pleased about; we should be ashamed of those figures. What is even more significant is the fact that in the industrial heartland of Ontario, the city of Windsor is suffering from unemployment at a rate of 10.2 per cent, in Sudbury the rate is 12 per cent, in Hamilton 8 per cent, in St. Catharines 14.5 per cent, and in parts of the Niagara region, it reaches 20 per cent.

● (1415)

Does the minister consider this matter to be serious, and how does he intend to reverse this very unacceptable situation, particularly when he brags about how well manufacturing is doing and what the devalued dollar is doing in terms of job creation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to report to the House that in the manufacturing sector, in the last 12 months, 159,000 new jobs were created, an increase of 8.7 per cent from the previous year, that unemployment went down by two-tenths of a point in Ontario, and that the Canadian economy managed to put 400,000 more people to work last month than in the same month last year.

I think that is good news. It is a good trend. It is not the end of the problem we face, but one has to recognize that we are making progress. Of course, when hon. members opposite have only doom and gloom in mind, it is hard for them to see any ray of sunshine on the horizon.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister should stop misleading the Canadian people. One million people out of work is nothing to sneer and gloat about. We are calling for action.

I will give the minister an opportunity to do something which perhaps can get him out of the mess he is in. The employment tax credit was supposed to create some 50,000 jobs. We are short by about 34,000 jobs. Will the minister, together with the minister he is talking to now, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion get together with their provincial counterparts to determine what to do about the cities I just spoke about—I mentioned Windsor, Sudbury, Hamilton, St. Catharines and the Niagara region—in order to create the 34,000 jobs which have not been created yet? Will the minister do that, instead of gloating about how happy he is that one million people are unemployed?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, since it has been implemented, the employment tax credit program has created 16,700 jobs. I am informed that the business community realizes the advantages of this tax credit for the creation of new jobs. There is a take-up under this program of 500 jobs a week. We had to make some changes in the regulations after we started the program, and the program is starting to pick up some steam. It is helping to create jobs in the private sector; but the hon. member does not want to see the evidence.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that the minister was full of boloney, and I say that he is full of boloney again today. What he has conveniently forgotten to tell the Canadian people is that 9,000 of those 16,000 jobs were created in the province of Quebec. That means that there is a tremendous shortfall in the rest of the country.

The minister evaded my question. Will he meet with his counterparts in the province of Ontario, together with the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to see how the slack in the employment tax credit can be picked up? Will the minister answer that question, instead of giving me a lot of flim-flam?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not impressed by the loud voice of the hon. member. I think the take-up under this new program is pretty good. The hon. member can see that in some parts of the country the program has been used to better advantage than in other parts. Because there was some slowdown in the province of Ontario, I hope more advantage will be taken. If new personnel are put on the payrolls, the advantage will be $1.50 per hour in terms of tax credits. I think this is a good program. It is available to everyone. I hope the businessmen who listen to this argument will realize that there is unanimity in this House that it is a good program.

REASON FOR DROP IN NUMBER OF JOBS CREATED

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, listening to the replies of the Minister of Finance, it is not difficult to understand why the Liberal Party of Ontario would not want to be associated with this government.

I would like to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration if he can explain to the House why the job creation rate dropped so dramatically to 1,000 from 90,000 in the previous month, given the fact that we still have an official unemployment rate in Canada of 954,000. I hope the minister will not gloat over that like his colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry we cannot match the histrionics of the hon. member for Hamilton West. He makes good theatre, but he does not deal with the facts. One fact is that programs are in place. Some $710 million is available for job creation. This is something like the fourteenth or fifteenth consecutive month in which there has been an increase in employment in the manufacturing sector. I am happy to see the unemployment figures go down. We still have a challenge there.

• (1420)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The job experience training program has created something like 30,000 jobs for our young people. I think that is commendable and right on target. The Minister of Finance has indicated his views on the investment potential of the business community. I think this bodes well for Canada now and in the future and for the creation of jobs.

Mr. McGrath: The minister calls it a challenge; I call the fact that we have over one million Canadians unemployed incompetence on the part of this government. When you analyse today's unemployment figures, you see that youth unemployment—the age category between 15 and 24—makes up about 14 per cent of the unemployed.

Will the minister explain to the House exactly what he proposes to do about that, given the fact that that army of young unemployed are about to be joined by the university students who will be coming out of colleges and universities in this country looking for jobs that are not there?

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member seems not to have been paying attention, but the fact is that something like a quarter of a billion dollars has been made available for job creation involving youth in this country. The job experience training program is specifically directed at young people and last year, despite the histrionics of the hon. member, we placed more young students in jobs last summer than we have ever done. I think we will more than match that this year because the economy is improving.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT IN EASTERN CANADA—CALL FOR SPECIAL PROGRAM TO ALLEVIATE SITUATION

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. The unemployment figures released today show, no matter what consolation the government can take from them nationally, that Atlantic Canada, and in particular Newfoundland, is still suffering high unemployment even after all the government's wishful thinking that things are getting better.

The real unemployment rate in Newfoundland is still over 30 per cent, with New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island at over 25 per cent and Nova Scotia at around 18 per cent. Is this sufficient evidence to convince the minister that a special economic program is needed to alleviate the real economic difficulties suffered by individual Canadians in eastern Canada, a program that should of necessity involve tax cuts to lower and middle income people, and investment in housing and public works? Will the minister now consider this sort of program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that kind of program would alleviate the problems to which the hon. member referred. Without in any way indicating our lack of concern for it, because we are very concerned about it, the hon. member knows that a great deal of the problem in the area to which he referred is a seasonal one.

There are many programs of the federal government at work now. The retiring premier of that province has indicated that Newfoundland is poised for prosperity. I doubt very much that panic measures such as the hon. member is suggesting would, in fact, alleviate the unemployment and I think they would cause severe problems in other directions.

HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT AND INFLATION IN EASTERN CANADA—EFFECT ON CONSUMERS

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the retiring premier might say the province is poised for prosperity, but to unemployed people along the coast who make up 30 per cent of the workforce of the province there is certainly no prosperity there.

I should like to address my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The unemployment rates that I have mentioned present a picture of real hardship for people in Newfoundland and the other Atlantic provinces when viewed with the inflation figures for the area. Inflation in Newfoundland is running at the highest rate in Canada, with last month's increase at an annual rate of some 9 per cent.

Has the minister made any investigation as to why inflation rates in the Newfoundland region of slow growth are the highest in Canada, in a region that can least afford high inflation and, if not, will he undertake to see why consumers in Newfoundland are being hit with a double whammy, the highest unemployment in Canada along with the highest prices?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I do not have that analysis available to me at present, but I point out that the government did announce in the fall measures to increase income to lower and middle income Canadians by means of old age security and the family tax credit which will be made available very shortly.

Mr. Faour: This seems to me to be another case of the minister looking into it. Newfoundland still has not seen any concrete action. I will give the minister an example—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, he should put it forthwith.

Mr. Faour: It was reported today that a preliminary study of the Economic Council of Canada showed that national chain stores in Newfoundland have the highest profits in Canada compared with the same stores elsewhere. This appears to be due to less competition and no motivation to charge reasonable prices.

My question to the minister is this: In view of the fact that this translates into extra profit for these stores—about 60 per cent higher than in Ontario—what action will he take to stop this price gouging of the worst kind in an area of the country that can least afford it?

● (1425)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, virtually there are thousands of companies in Canada announcing profit and price increases from time to time, some justified and probably some not justified. It is unreasonable for hon. members in that party to come to the House each day expecting to have information on all those companies and a ready analysis of why profits or prices went up. If they are really interested in information, they will give me notice of those questions and I will be pleased to give them good, sound answers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE SEAL HUNT

ALLEGED INHUMANE TREATMENT WHICH WILL ENDANGER SPECIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Given all the fuss which is being made about the seal hunt and in order to calm people down and reassure the public, would the minister be in a position to tell the House whether illegal hunting is actually taking place, whether the methods used are cruel and whether the number of seal pups which will be killed is high enough to endanger the very existence of the herd in the region in question?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will recall there was a lot of controversy in Canada a few years ago. The more we inform the public, the more they agree that this hunt is absolutely legal, that it is comparable with other activities consisting in killing animals for the meat they provide. It is somewhat brutal, that cannot be denied. This having been said, however, the hunt is carried out under the strict control of persons fully cognizant with fisheries. It is carried out in the presence of people working for groups whose aim is to prevent animal cruelty. I must say that if all animals were killed in a way as tightly controlled and as disciplined as the seals are, there would be no protests whatsoever.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. I want to thank him for his very precise answer. I should like therefore to ask him to tell the House whether these sectors of our industry are yielding rather substantial income for Canada, and whether his departmental officials are taking the necessary steps to preserve this species, so that we may continue to use it in a humane fashion, as he has just indicated.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that no evidence has been produced to indicate that it is in any danger, as far as conservation is concerned. On the contrary, we have set very low quotas to favour a quicker restoration of our stocks. As to the economic aspect, I must say that compared with other sectors of activities, these few millions of dollars may appear modest. But when we consider that this represents one third of their yearly income for a great many fishermen, either from the Magdalen Islands or Newfoundland, I think that we should be ill advised to accept the views of foreigners who are taking advantage of this protest to make money.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER STATISTICS CANADA WILL STUDY SITUATION RESPECTING INELIGIBLE WORKERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In view of the unemployment statistics released this morning and of the fact that Bill C-14 rendered some 200,000 beneficiaries ineligible for benefits, can the minister tell us if he has asked Statistics Canada to undertake a study or analysis to determine if these persons have filed job applications at manpower centres, what percentage of these persons have been forced to go on welfare and what has happened to these thousands of persons who, prior to January 1979, were eligible for benefits?

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is seeking a fair amount of information. I think he should either drop me a line or put a question on the order paper and I will get the specifics back to him.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the minister is not overly concerned with what has happened to the beneficiairies rendered ineligible by Bill C-14. Since the unemployment rate has dropped from 8.1 to 7.9 per cent, and I think the minister is aware that a number of people, discouraged by the provisions of this bill and the fact that jobs are hard to find did not file new job applications with manpower centres, which may explain the apparent drop in the unemployment rate since the Statistics Canada figures hide the true unemployment rate, will the minister undertake to request a study to determine what has happened to these people? This would, I feel, enable Statistics Canada to produce much more reliable figures than the ones published this morning.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the supply of additional information is going to be beneficial. The fact of the matter is that the participation rate in Canada this year among the working force is higher, rather than lower.

We have also indicated to various provinces, particularly to the welfare officers, that if they find people are constantly unemployed, will not be drawing unemployment insurance benefits and this would impact on their welfare rolls or welfare payments, we will make a special study of this situation and make additional efforts to see what we can do either to train them or to put them back in the work force. But to suggest that the numbers are down is not correct; the participation rate is higher this year than last year.

FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT ACTED UNILATERALLY IN REDUCING TARIFFS ON FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, if one were to add up the numbers in all the reports of new jobs created by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the President of the Treasury Board, we would not have any unemployment today.

In the negotiations in respect of food and other items in GATT, the government had an opportunity, according to representations made by the food processing industry and the agricultural industry, to create 100,000 jobs in Canada in that field, while at the same time creating work, productive opportunity and new income. Since the government's new legislation before the House does not bring these changes into place until October 1, 1979, and they will have no impact whatsoever upon the production of agricultural products in this calendar year, has the government included this date in its agreement with foreign nations, or is this another unilateral tariff reduction on fruits and vegetables?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we lowered tariffs on produce because in our opinion it was important to do so at this time in the interest of consumers. We have also chosen October 1 as the implementation date for the protection system affecting people in horticulture because we believe that that is when it will be to their best advantage. In any event, it is of no use to them now because they are not producing since we are still in winter.

[English]

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the competitive structure in respect of those food items which are produced in Canada up to or in excess of Canada's requirements puts them presently on the market at prices which are bargain basement prices, and these are the only products on which the consumer is getting a break—that is, potatoes, carrots, onions and turnips—and these are the industries which have been maintained in Canada and the items which have received protection and support in Canada, why did the minister not extend to the consumer the benefit of a competitive structure by enhancing the fruit and vegetable processing industry in Canada, while at the same time employing another 100,000 people?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the way in which we have proceeded has provided all benefits of the reduction in tariffs to Canadians at this time as well as for the processors and producers in Canada. The change in the tariff as recommended by the Tariff Board will come into place when it is needed, at the end of the summer or at the end of the production season in Canada. I think we are dealing with both sides in that way.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER NCC WILL GIVE CONSIDERATION TO CITIZENS OF HULL CONCERNING PROPOSED LAND EXCHANGE

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the National Capital Commission.

Since the government of the former "belle province" has refused to grant a simple request for land exchange between the National Capital Commission and the city of Hull, and only allowed the city to ask the commission for a 99-year lease on the land where the new city hall will be erected, can the minister tell the House, after consideration of this matter, naturally, if he intends to act in the best interest of the Hull city council and the citizens of that municipality, despite provincial red tape, which is a clear case of infringement on the autonomy of that city which has become a hostage of the provincial government since 1976?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Government of Canada is eager to co-operate with municipal authorities in Hull and to do so in the best interest of the people on the Quebec side of the Ottawa valley.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STATEMENTS BY PETER TREU RESPECTING POSSIBILITY OF FACING FURTHER CHARGES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I should like to ask a question of the acting minister, and one later of the Prime Minister.

In light of statements being made to me today by Dr. Treu, that statements have been made to him that unless he keeps his mouth shut, further charges might be laid against him, will the Acting Minister of Justice report on this and make sure that instructions are given to all concerned with this matter that this form of conduct is highly repugnant to our system of justice in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the acting minister as well, I would be glad to take notice of that question.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS IN CASE OF FORMER MEMBER FOR DOLLARD

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the Minister of Justice said that in his view no compensation should be paid to Dr. Treu as this would establish a very bad and unique precedent, would the Prime Minister, as the man no doubt responsible for the care and comfort of former ministers, undertake to table in the House all memoranda, letters, correspondence, documents, minutes and reasons dealing with the undertaking by the government to help the former minister of supply and services, the former member for Dollard, in connection with a civil trial he is now undergoing?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to take notice of the question. The Minister of Justice told me he was returning to the House a little later today.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice, who was here, has disappeared. I will wait until he comes back.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

STATEMENT OF ALBERTA LIBERAL LEADER CONCERNING FEDERAL MINISTER OF ENERGY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. We are all very much aware of the deep repugnance the Prime Minister has for any sound advice or suggestions coming from the provincial sector, but I wonder if he has given any consideration whatsoever to the announced request made on Friday by Mr. Nick Taylor, the Alberta Liberal leader, that the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology should be fired on the ground that he is "foolish and fatuous"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot vouch for the authenticity of the quote by the hon. member. I do not think his past record is very good in that respect. I can say that, contrary to the Leader of the Opposition, I do not base the federal government's policies on what provincial politicians say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

TARIFF REDUCTIONS—EFFECT ON CONSUMERS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance because, as the Prime Minister knows, he has no provincial government to talk to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: My question to the Minister of Finance touches on the tariff reductions to which he has referred. Could the minister give the House some indication as to how effective these tariff reductions might be. For example, lettuce and celery have gone up by 25 per cent since last March. What does the minister estimate would be the impact for the consumer in Canada as a result of his tariff reductions on those two items?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have in front of me the list of all the items on which the tariff has been reduced. Of course, the price would be reduced in accordance with the tariffs which would have to be paid at this time, but I do not have the exact figures at the moment.

I said yesterday that these reductions would help the consumer marginally because, of course, the maximum tariff is 15 per cent, but that it would not reduce prices if increases in prices were caused by external factors. It will reduce the price only in relation to the decrease in the tariff.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance—and isn't he beautiful!—says the cheap dollar causes the price increase, and then when he is asked, "With a 25 per cent increase since last March, how much do you think your tariff reductions will improve the situation?", he cannot give the answer.

What assurances can the Minister of Finance give to the House that in any event the tariff reduction will be passed on to the consumer in Canada and that it will not stay in sticky fingers somewhere, other than in the consumers' hands?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member is an expert on sticky fingers.

Mr. Alexander: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: In dealing with the marketplace, we have to presume that the marketplace will pass on the reduction in the tariffs. Generally speaking, I believe that the marketplace in Canada is working. I am very surprised that the financial critics on the other side have no confidence at all in the business community of Canada.

MONITORING AGENCY TO POLICE TARIFF REDUCTIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question, which is on the same topic, is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and it is a question of which he does not need notice. It concerns the tariff reductions on imported foods.

Could the minister tell the House whether or not there will be a monitoring agency to ensure that the tariff reductions are actually passed on to the consumer? In other words, in what way will the government police these tariff reductions? Will it establish a monitoring agency to make sure that the reductions are passed on?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we set up a monitoring agency last week to do that.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the minister concerning the monitoring of the tax cut last fall, when $1 billion was given to corporations through the reduction of the manufacturing sales tax. Would the minister tell the House, since many manufacturing tax cuts are still going on, whether or not this tax cut is being passed on to the consumer, and could he also tell us who is monitoring it?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the last CPI that was published indicated that the non-foods sector had moderated considerably and that, in fact, there were reductions in the prices of furniture and clothing. This shows that the sales tax cut brought forward by the Minister of Finance is being passed on.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INFLAMMABILITY OF CERTAIN TYPES OF HOUSING INSULATION

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. A number of news reports recently have indicated that certain types of housing insulation, particularly those made of cellulose, that are advertised as flame-proof or flame-resistant are, in fact, inflammable and highly dangerous.

I would like to know whether the minister or his officials have taken any action to investigate these claims and, if they are true, would he warn Canadians and prompt changes?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has been established that certain types of cellulose insulation can be a hazard in the absence of fire-retardant chemicals. We have initiated a program to determine the exact extent of that potential hazard. In addition, I have met with the leaders of the industry producing this cellulose insulation and made my concerns known to them. They are introducing a program to make sure that the hazards are reduced and that the chemical retardant is applied to the insulation.

However, I am waiting for a full report which will be available in a few weeks. In the meantime, I would like to advise consumers that they should be very aware of this fact when purchasing cellulose insulation and try to make sure that it has been treated with fire retardants.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COMPENSATION FOR PETER TREU—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a couple of questions to the Minister of Justice.

Now that the minister has had several days to think this matter over, has he decided whether or not the government will compensate Dr. Treu for the persecution—not prosecution, but persecution—which he has suffered and upon which the Court of Appeal of Quebec unanimously agreed there was no evidence upon which a conviction should stand?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question in the House quite clearly several weeks ago. I would refer the right hon. member to my answer. I would have thought that he would have shown more respect for the decision of the courts, including the lower courts, in this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about respect. I am not going to comment on that except to say this: Was his explanation the fact that if a payment were made to compensate Dr. Treu for the nefarious way in which he was prosecuted, it would mean that many people acquitted would ask the Government of Canada for compensation?

That is the explanation the minister gave. Does he not realize how specious that explanation is, because no one can lay an information, under the circumstances, in connection with security legislation except the government, and no one can prosecute excepting the government; so the responsibility rests right over there?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, all prosecutions for criminal offences, of whatever nature they may be, are instituted either at the instigation of the attorneys general of the provinces or the Attorney General of Canada.

Mr. Dick: Learn your law; that is not true.

Mr. Lalonde: There is no point in the right hon. member pursuing that kind of specious argument in this respect.

EMPLOYMENT

OVERPAYMENTS IN CERTAIN JOB CREATION PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON COLLECTION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A memorandum from the minister's department indicates that there have been serious overpayments both in the Local Initiatives Program and the Canada Works program.

I would like to ask the minister, what is the policy of his department with regard to these overpayments? Are they being collected? Has he made recommendations to ministers in the cabinet that in fact these moneys should be recovered?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, where there are overpayments the instructions do go out that collection of the overpayments be made from time to time, given the amount of the overpayment. If it is a small sum, in some cases it may be written off. Where there has been a blatant disregard of instructions and advice going out to particular groups, whether it be in the former LIP, Canada Works or, for that matter, Young Canada Works, collection action is pursued.

POSITION OF TREASURY BOARD ON COLLECTING OVERPAYMENTS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. Could he tell the House, in reference to memoranda from his department with regard to overpayments under the Local Initiatives Program and the Canada Works program, whether his department regards those overpayments to be debts due to the Crown and whether or not Treasury Board, is in fact, pursuing the recovery of those debts?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the details. I will be happy to look into the matter and report back to the hon. member.

FISHERIES

FISHING QUOTAS OFF NOVA SCOTIA COAST—RE-EXAMINATION OF STOCKS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

In view of the concern expressed by Atlantic Canada's fishermen over the arbitrary manner in which fish quotas have been decreased for Canadians in the Sydney bight area off Nova Scotia by some 6,000 metric tons, even though the original quotas had been endorsed by the groundfish advisory committee set up by the minister, and endorsed by the government's own scientists, will the minister undertake to carry out immediately a thorough re-examination of the stocks in this area by placing Canadian scientists on Canadian fishing boats operating in the area—whose services have been offered freely to the government—so that up to date statistical data can be obtained which, hopefully, would resolve the disagreement between the fishermen and the federal government?

• (1450)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is asking me, as minister, if I am obliged to accept the recommendations of the advisory committee every time, the answer is no. That advisory committee tends to be dominated by articulate representatives of two or three very large companies in the maritimes.

When I looked at the total landing on the Atlantic coast, I realized that these large offshore trawlers were benefiting from the 200-mile zone, but in fact the allocation for small inshore fishermen would not be adequate to assure them of a reasonable supply of fish for 1979. If the hon. member wants to continue to do what he usually does, which is to advocate policies favourable to only two or three very large companies using very large trawlers, that is his option; it is not mine.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the minister is obviously unaware that there are stocks inshore and there are stocks offshore. We are talking about offshore stocks.

In light of the fact that the minister recently approved additional fishing quotas for the European Economic Community fleet operating within our 200-mile zone, will the minister indicate whether it is his intention to grant similar privileges to Canadians? If so, has he yet developed a policy for encouraging the construction of ice-reinforced ships so they can operate in the northern areas?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the fishery at Sydney bight. He should know that this fish can be taken in winter by large trawlers, or it can be taken in the summer by small boats off Cape Breton, Quebec, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and the Northumberland Strait which his colleague represents. That is his choice. My choice is to protect the fish and fish supplies for the small fisherman who has no alternative and has to fish from very restricted distances.

The hon. member asked if fish is to be allocated to foreign fleets. The answer is yes. Allocation for foreign countries is discussed with our industry. We have a vital interest to protect outside the 200-mile limit. On this matter, he may wish to consult his colleagues from Newfoundland in his caucus. What do we barter? Do we barter protection of our interests outside the 200-mile zone? Certainly not by taking a dog-in-the-manger attitude as far as our zone is concerned.

As for the matter of ice-reinforced vessels, not only do I have a policy but I have authorized one company to go ahead with construction of ice-reinforced trawlers. Two other companies have applied to replace existing old units with ice-reinforced vessels. I hope that when I approve them, a way is found to build these vessels in Canada.

EMPLOYMENT

HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUTH DESPITE PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question through you to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In view of the fact the government is spending over $600 million annually on youth programs, specific and non-specific, almost half of this amount being spent on training programs and the rest being spent on a large number of small-scale programs which make an impressive list but which are of questionable value in reducing youth unemployment, why—despite this significant expenditure—does Canada still have the dubious distinction of having one of the highest levels of youth unemployment of all the industrialized countries in the world? Why is Canada still importing skilled workers when we have thousands of unemployed youth and when we are spending $300 million a year on training young Canadians?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member almost misspoke himself. He indicated it is an impressive list. It is an impressive list of assistance that we are giving to the young people of this country. My concern is that we have depended in the past too much on immigration. I have indicated to employers and to provincial governments that we should become more involved in apprenticeship programs.

[Mr. Crouse.]

We have shifted to some extent from institutional training to industrial training in the interests of seeing that young people get on the job training. In instances where individuals are working for a corporation on a particular project that is phased out, and they need on the job training for the new skill which that plant will embark upon, we should be looking for more in-house training. This is an obligation that corporations, unions and governments have. I think we are making a commendable effort in that field but I think there is more to be done.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, lists do not do the work. Maybe the minister of energy will be able to harness the gaseous energy that has been expounded.

One year ago the minister indicated, with considerable fanfare, the creation of a National Youth Advisory Group which would help him wrestle youth unemployment to the ground. Now that the group has been in place for over one year and has met regularly every two months, which of their recommendations to date does the minister consider to be the most useful, and what action has he taken with respect to those recommendations?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, one of the finest recommendations made to me was that we should maintain the choice program, which has now won worldwide recognition and approbation to the point where states in the United States are looking at our choice programs.

The hon. member is still mumbling, but the fact of the matter is that they did suggest that the choice program be retained. It is being retained. It is being placed in 50 different centres across Canada. It is one of the best assistance programs, in my view, that youth will have for vocational training and for information they need about jobs being available and the kind of training required to take on those particular jobs. The National Youth Advisory Group has served young people very well in this country.

STATISTICS CANADA

REQUEST FOR MONTHLY PUBLICATION OF GENERAL WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Since the month of December 1978, Statistics Canada has indicated that it would no longer produce the wholesale price index. As several industries based their collective contracts on that index taken on a monthly basis, would the minister be willing to ask Statistics Canada to resume publication of those statistics precisely to allow the industries which already have collective contracts signed on the basis of the wholesale prices index to follow its monthly fluctuations?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada has decided to discontinue a number of series of statistics. I believe the wholesale index will be kept up. However, I will make the inquiry to ascertain whether it will be kept up or not.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FUNDING OF PROGRAMS FOR TRAINING OF NATIVE TEACHERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. For a number of years there have been joint federal-provincial funded programs for the training of native teachers at Brandon University. Those programs have produced more than 300 graduates and have been very successful.

Last year the provincial government cut the program by 20 per cent. They propose another cut of 20 per cent this year. Has the minister given consideration to finding money to fund the programs so that they will not be cut back as the provincial government has proposed?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I share with the hon. member his assessment of that program. It has been a very good one. I very much regret the reduction in the funding level. I am not sure I am in a position, because of the restraint program here, to supplement it, but I will certainly look into the matter.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF LUMBER—REQUEST MINISTER INVESTIGATE CAUSE

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with the drastic increase in the price of lumber, which has been in excess of 20 per cent recently. I am also fully aware that the minister has been presented with this problem before. However, in view of the seriousness of the situation and lack of government action, what plans has the minister to investigate the root causes of this problem?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to an earlier question in this House, I had the matter investigated by the director of investigations under the combines act. Since the answer was a complex and lengthy one, I sent it to the hon. member opposite in the form of a letter. If it would help the House, I would be quite willing to table the letter which contains the answer to this question, so that all members of the House can examine it.

Lapel Pins

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, every day I am contacted by people from the woodworking industry as well as by those in the home construction industry. They tell me they are forced to close down their business operations. Is the minister aware of the jobs being lost in this industry? What immediate proposal does he have to take care of this problem?

● (1500)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, my information is to the contrary, that there are many jobs opening up in the wood and lumber industry. As a matter of fact, the high prices that were found with respect to lumber near the end of last year and the beginning of this year have reached their peak and are beginning to decline.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO STUDY COMMISSIONER'S REPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. As on March 5 he tabled a motion to create a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to consider the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, and as in 1976 and 1977 the Leader of the Official Opposition often called for the appointment of such a committee, can the President of the Privy Council tell the House whether he has had talks with the Leader of the Official Opposition and other representatives of the parties in the House with a view to getting unanimous consent for this motion and getting this joint committee appointed this very week?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have not had discussions with representatives of the parties with regard to passing the reference. I should explain that the reason for that is we have asked the President of the Treasury Board to prepare some additional material that would be of assistance to the committee when it begins its examination of Mr. Yalden's report. As soon as that material is prepared and ready, we will move the reference and get the committee into operation, because we believe this is an appropriate subject for parliamentary consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ISSUANCE OF LAPEL PINS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: I would like to borrow for just a moment from the time of the House to reflect on an activity that was undertaken and given considerable study by our Standing Committee on Management and Members Services. It relates to the bringing into existence of a lapel pin to be given to an elected member of the House of Commons. I have the first of such pins here with me.

For some time we have been aware that other parliaments have had an identifying emblem of some sort given to those who have had the honour to serve their fellow citizens in an elected capacity in the national legislature of their country. We have not done so.

Some time ago this committee, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) and the vice-chairmanship of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet), commissioned a subcommittee to study the matter. The work of that subcommittee resulted in a recommendation which in fact was carried forward in consultation with me to bring this lapel pin into existence. I should mention that the subcommittee was headed by a very distinguished and senior member of the House, a former Speaker of the House of Commons, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This is a milestone in Canadian parliamentary history, that recognition is being given to those who serve in this House of Commons. They ought at least to have some emblem they can carry, one that they have been able to earn and which is received only by election to this House of Commons of Canada as a recognition of all that that entails and the serious responsibility that goes with it. I want to congratulate and thank the members of the committee for their excellent work.

I might say that this identifying pin for elected members of this House is in conjunction with a program that is still under study and being perfected in some detail. It will likely be put before the House for approval in the next parliament. That program relates to a further identification of other personnel in the House in the security context. I do not want to cast this pin in the security context, although it has an incidental relationship to security. This is an emblem of election to the House of Commons.

It gives me great pleasure to ask four members, representing each of the four parties of the House, to come forward now and receive one of these pins: the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure hon. members that the number which appears on the back of the pin has nothing to do with their social insurance number! I will be arranging, I hope soon, a presentation to the other members. I will inform hon. members about that as soon as I possibly can.

I will now move on to one or two more contentious matters.

[Mr. Speaker.]

PRIVILEGE

MR. YEWCHUK—RESPONSE OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) raised as a question of privilege some remarks that had been made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) during the course of the question period. The contention of the hon. member for Athabasca was that, in answering his first question yesterday in the question period, the minister had said that the hon. member was acting in the capacity of a lobbyist. I indicated after argument that I would review the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I did review those remarks after I listened to argument on the question. Here is the full quote by the minister at the time as it appears in yesterday's Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member is of the profession, he may be naturally asked by his friends to be a lobbyist in the House in favour of higher fees for medical doctors.

The fact that the hon. member may be asked by his friends to carry out a certain function surely is not in any way unparliamentary, nor does not in any way carry with it an allegation of an unparliamentary activity. I do not decide now and I do not think I have to decide. Had the minister gone on to accuse the member or any other member of being a lobbyist in fact, which is a sort of paid or hired position, I do not know whether that would be unparliamentary in nature. In fact, I am relieved of that responsibility because the language used by the minister, and it was my recollection that was so, had indicated that the hon. member may be asked by his friends to carry out that function. It did not go on to say that the member was in fact doing so. In the circumstances, I would find that falls short of anything unparliamentary.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am not in any way reflecting on your decision, but I want to point out that I have a copy of the blues as they originally appeared and they do differ from the statement which is reported in yesterday's Hansard. I think the difference is one of some significance. The original blues read, "Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is of the medical profession. Naturally he is asked by his friends to be a lobbyist," as opposed to the report in Hansard which says "he may be naturally asked by his friends to be a lobbyist".

We should consider that in conjunction with article 324 on page 114 of Beauchesne's fifth edition, which states that, in order to decide whether there is a question of privilege or not, much depends on the tone and the manner and the intention of the person speaking. It seems that the changes which were made are significant because they appear to be designed to soften up the intent of what she had originally said.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member who just spoke is inferring that I changed, corrected or amended the blues, he is wrong. I would like an explanation to be given to this House by him or by you, sir. If the blues—which are actually green—which the hon. member has in his hand are not those which I received from the Hansard office to which I did not make corrections, as far as I remember, I would like Your Honour to check whether the hon. member's copies are from a later stage of printing. Those changes did not come from me.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has raised a matter regarding the accuracy of the record of Hansard. I will certainly conduct a full inquiry into the manner in which this has been brought about and give the House a report on that investigation.

In addition, there was a rather extensive point of order yesterday related to a matter which was before the House as an order of the day. I will be dealing with that when orders of the day are called later.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HERBERT—USE OF INITIALS REPRESENTING UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thought you might be reporting on a point of order I raised yesterday in a somewhat light vein concerning the use of initials to represent two words which were considered two weeks ago to be unparliamentary. Can I assume, since this matter was taken under advisement yesterday, that we shall be hearing further as to whether the use of initials when they are a substitute for words which are considered unparliamentary is permissible?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises a problem which is very interesting for the Chair, at least in a generic sense. The occupant of the chair at the time this matter was raised was the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner). I know he is taking this matter very seriously and that he has it under consideration. I would think that on an appropriate occasion he would wish to carry the matter further forward with a judgment on his own part.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO LIMIT ELECTION EXPENSE PERIOD OF BY-ELECTIONS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-467, to amend the Canada Elections Act (by-elections preceding redistribution).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to define a 58-day period for the calculation of election expenses during a by-election in order to ensure that by-election candidates are placed on the same footing as candidates in a general election.

In introducing the bill I wish to acknowledge with thanks the contribution made in researching and drafting by five political science students from Professor John McMenemy's class at Wilfrid Laurier University of Waterloo.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITION

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENTS IN RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the third report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 320, 570 and 1,154.

I wonder if I might point out that one of those answers is in response to a question noted by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) yesterday and that another is in response to a specific matter noted by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) a short while ago.

CAUSEWAY BETWEEN MONCTON AND RIVERVIEW, N.B.

Question No. 320—Mr. Jones:

1. Who prepared the federal study regarding the causeway between Moncton, New Brunswick and Riverview, New Brunswick? When?

2. Did such a study consider the possibility of silting?

3. How much assistance was provided for the construction of the said causeway?

4. Have federal authorities caused a study to be made as a result of the silting problem caused by the construction of the said causeway?

5. What liability does the federal government assume as a result of the silting problem in the Petitcodiac River in Moncton, New Brunswick (formerly a navigable river)?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows:

1. Canada Department of Agriculture and the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Administration, Amherst, N.S.—"Petitcodiac River Causeway Survey Report" dated March 30, 1961.

2. Yes. Hydraulics laboratory experiments and measured periodic observations of causeway structures constructed under the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act indicated that silting would take place.

3. By agreement dated March 23, 1965 between Canada (Minister of Forestry) and the province of New Brunswick (Minister of Public Works) Canada agreed to contribute $800,000 in the form of a grant towards the construction of the causeway. The total estimated cost of the causeway was $3,000,000. Canada also provided the design, engineering and construction supervision. The construction contract was signed between Modern Construction Limited of Moncton, N.B. and the province of New Brunswick (Department of Public Works).

4. In 1969 cross-sections of the river were taken and observations on the silt build-up were also made by taking aerial photographs. The sewer outfalls were also checked periodically.

5. By agreement dated March 31, 1966 between Canada and the province of New Brunswick, the province assumed responsibility for the operation and maintenance of all works undertaken under the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, effective April 1, 1970.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—SPEECHES BY MINISTER

Question No. 570—Mr. Cossitt:

ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN FIRMS BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Question No. 1,154—Mr. Jones:

1. What are the restrictions, if any, on foreign countries giving assistance to Canadian firms?

2. Does the above rule apply to all foreign countries and if not, please state why?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the reply is as follows:

1 and 2. There are no restrictions on foreign countries providing assistance to Canadian firms. Should such assistance result in obtaining control of a Canadian firm, the transaction would become subject to the terms of the Foreign Investment Review Act.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HNATYSHYN—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS 207 AND 208

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order because the statement that was made by the parliamentary secretary encourages me to ask him specifically about two very important questions which remain unanswered since the beginning of the session, notwithstanding the fact that on previous occasions I have brought this matter to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). Today, I want to bring it very strongly to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young) in the hope that, just as he has responded to the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) who made representations to him with regard to certain questions yesterday, he will see that the answers to these questions of mine are provided. I refer specifically to questions Nos. 207 and 208 in my name dated October 16.

We all know that an election cannot be far away and these two questions have a certain importance as far as I am concerned with respect to the use of aircraft in the course of election campaigns. I will refresh the memory of the parliamentary secretary with respect to my questions. The first reads as follows:

Has the Liberal party of Canada paid for the use of any government aircraft in the period August 16 to October 16, 1978 in connection with the by-elections held on October 16, 1978, and, if so, in what amount for each trip?

The second question reads:

Did the Prime Minister or members of the Cabinet, during the period August 16 to October 16, 1978, make use of government aircraft and, if so, what was the total cost and what was the destination on each occasion?

Parliament has passed an elections act. I suggest the failure on the part of the government to answer these questions raises serious doubts in the minds of the public as to whether the government is acting in conformity with the spirit of that legislation or whether they are smuggling in expenses incurred on election campaigns and spending taxpayers' money for their own purposes. The information I am seeking is available on a daily basis in the Department of Transport. My hon. friend from Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) has pointed this out. The longer this information is refused, the more suspicious people will get. If ministers have any courage at all they will answer these questions tomorrow in the same way as the parliamentary secretary has answered the hon. member for Moncton. I challenge the hon. gentleman to do his job and to show us how questions can be answered in this House.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make a speech. I just want to thank the parliamentary secretary for letting me have the answers to those questions. I wish he would let me have the answers to the other 33 tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): I am sure the hon. member understands I am doing this on a part-time basis to assist my colleague who is rather ill today and could not be here. I should like to enjoy the success of providing answers to questions which hon. members are looking for. Some of those answers will, I am sure, surprise them.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURES TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed from Monday, March 12, consideration of Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and Motion No. 1 (Mr. Gillespie).

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, a point of order was raised with regard to the procedural regulatory of motion No. 1 at the report stage of Bill C-42. That point of order was supported by several arguments. It was contended that the motion was out of order because it introduced into the bill a new concept by giving the board created by Bill C-42 a role in monitoring the international petroleum supply situation. The argument was that this was a new role for the board, that it caused the board to do things entirely separate from its original capacity under Bill C-42, and, therefore, that it was out of order on that ground.

It was also argued that if the first amendment was in order because the function of monitoring petroleum supplies is incidental to the function of the board in regulating an emergency situation for petroleum, the additional concept of responsibility to be given by the minister in that regard to Petro-Canada was a new concept and ought not to be part of an amendment to a bill at this stage.

● (1520)

I considered most of those arguments yesterday. There was an argument that because these amendments had not been put forward in previous stages of the bill, they could not be put forward at the report stage, and I set that aside yesterday.

I also found yesterday that the function of monitoring international petroleum supplies seemed, at least to me, to be sufficiently incidental to the role of the board in these circumstances and that on procedural grounds I could not consider that the amendment related to the function.

Whether those arguments form a part of the substance of the debate once it begins is not for me to decide. I have to decide whether the amendment is out of order, and if the amendment were out of order on that basis, I think the function would have to be so unrelated as to be clearly a new concept introduced into the bill at this stage. It is a separate role from that which is set up in Bill C-42, but I cannot find that it is an unrelated function. Therefore, I cannot find that the amendment is out of order on that ground.

This leaves me with the matter of the procedural capacity of an amendment to introduce into this bill a role for Petro-Canada, and I said I would give serious consideration to that argument, which was put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). I have done so.

What gave me concern on the face of it—and the hon. member for Calgary Centre as well and others who participated in the discussion—was, of course, the precedents which relate to procedural difficulties where an amendment to this bill would in effect reach behind this bill and attempt to amend another statute. I have, first of all, some guidance from the precedents as to what extent I should concern myself with that problem, because there is a considerable body of argument which states that the Chair ought not to concern itself with what may in effect require an amendment of another statute or may incidentally amend another statute or may even in fact be in conflict with the provisions of another statute. That is not the decision of the Chair because that requires a legal interpretation.

Here I want to refer the House to a precedent in Hansard of May 6 of 1969 by my predecessor at that time who said the following:

I think there is a substantial difference between a proposed amendment that obviously seeks directly to amend the original legislation and one that, by way of consequence, might require amendments which, as is in this case, are not of a substantive nature.

In other words, that is an expression of the proposition that the Chair obviously must be on guard to the situation where the reference to the other statute of Petro-Canada would be clearly in terms of an attempt to amend that statute by adding a clause or things of that nature, or in fact by amending the statute itself in explicit language to attempt to do so.

That is one thing. It is rather a second question for the Chair to take one step further and to listen to the argument that, if this clause is put before the House and passed, it will have the incidental effect of amending another statute or requiring an amendment to another statute to be effective. That may be so, but that is essentially a legal question which is really not an area the Chair should get into in matters of this sort. For that proposition again I refer to a 1969 precedent by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux reported at page 7969 of Hansard.

My feeling, however, is that the Chair should not be placed in a position where the Speaker has to rule on legal points. The tradition and background of the position of the Chair is that the Speaker should rule only on procedural matters.

It therefore ought not to be for the Chair now to look at the Petro-Canada statute and decide whether the statute gives to Petro-Canada the power that the minister seeks to give it in this statute by way of this amendment. However, I am at least somewhat affected by the language in section 3 of that statute which is entitled "Purpose of the Act" and reads in part as follows:

The purpose of this Act is to establish within the energy industries in Canada a Crown owned company with authority to explore for hydro-carbon deposits—

And here is the significant language:

—to negotiate for and acquire petroleum and petroleum products from abroad to assure a continuity of supply for the needs of Canada—

Therefore, I think on balance I have to conclude that, with the role which is assigned to me to look at this matter on procedural grounds, I would have to be examining a situation where there was in clear language an attempt to add a clause to that statute or, by its very own language, to amend that statute, whereas here there is simply a use of the corporation created by that statute. I think it is not for the Chair to go beyond the procedural responsibility I have and try to make a legal interpretation as to whether that can or should be done, or whether it is going to be in conflict with other legislative provisions. I have to decide whether it so introduces a new concept into this statute that it goes beyond the regulations, precedents and practices that we have governing amendments to legislation.

On the whole I have to find, after listening to arguments on both sides, that I am left in some uncertainty and doubt about whether that point has been established, and I think in these circumstances I ought to resolve the doubt in favour of keeping the matter before the House so that the House will debate it, discuss it and vote upon it. In other words, I ought only to take away from the House the right to discuss measures if I am absolutely convinced that they are out of order. In this case I am left in some doubt, and therefore I think I have to resolve that doubt by having the House deal with the matter.

Therefore, on procedural grounds I see no basis upon which I ought to interrupt the putting of the motion. I believe the motion has been formally put. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like just briefly to go over some of the background to this amendment and to put before the House some of the events which I think make this amendment important, extremely relevant and urgent at this time.

Hon. members will recall, as we got into the second reading debate, some of the events which led the government to bring this particular bill before the House. I refer, of course, to the revolution in Iran, the cessation of oil production in Iran, the reduction of world supplies by close to six million barrels a day and the absolute economic and energy paralysis of the world's second largest oil producer and exporter.

Those events in Iran created a ripple effect around the world. It was not very long before those events in Iran were felt on the east coast of Canada. Hon. members are familiar with the fact that there were cutbacks, that a number of Canadian refiners had been dependent upon Iranian supplies, that Iranian supplies amounted to close to 100,000 barrels a day, roughly 20 per cent of Canadian import needs, and that a large part of eastern Canada, sometimes described as one third of Canada—the Atlantic provinces and a substantial part of the Quebec market—was completely dependent upon foreign supplies. Cutbacks began to occur. Reallocations started to be made between the supply companies which were providing oil to eastern refineries.

Hon. members will also be familiar with the fact that the Exxon Corporation, in allocating to its subsidiary in Canada, Imperial Oil, went overboard. It was proposing a diversion of supplies equivalent to about 25 per cent of the imports of Imperial Oil into Canada. It should also be noted that Imperial Oil's almost exclusive source—not completely but almost exclusive source—has been Venezuela. Let it also be noted that Venezuela has been our most reliable and largest supplier of imported crude oil for the longest time, some 40 to 50 years, without any interruption of supply. Let it also be noted that in early January the Venezuelan government gave a commitment to me that it wished to continue to do business with Canada and to supply Canada, its second most important customer, with 200,000 barrels a day. They also wished, so far as possible, to deal directly with importers in Canada rather than through third parties or the Exxon Corporation.

● (1530)

For those two reasons—the reason that Venezuela had given in the sense of assurances for a continuing supply to Canada, and the fact that Imperial Oil was virtually exclusively sourcing from Venezuela—we had reason to believe that Canada and that particular company would have been helped on this in the event of the kinds of reallocations that were taking place as the result of the events in Iran. The effect was not a cutback on any pro rata basis within the Exxon Corporation. What Exxon had proposed to Imperial was an entirely different formula. They had intervened with their own arrangements which clearly undercut the security of supply for Canada.

As a matter of policy, the Canadian government has been trying to increase the security of supply for Canada by sourcing in the western hemisphere. That was the reason for my trip to Venezuela and my trip to Mexico as well. The Mexicans equally were forthcoming. They too said they wanted to deal with Canada, and they too said they wanted to give preference to Canada, a western hemisphere neighbour. They too said they wanted to deal directly, and they gave us an undertaking to supply Canada with 100,000 barrels a day of crude starting in late 1980 or early 1981.

Those two undertakings—the Venezuelan undertaking and the Mexican undertaking—can shift our dependence away from the Middle East in a signficant way. They can increase the security of supply for Canada in a dramatic way from something like 40 per cent in the western hemisphere to 60 per cent in the western hemisphere; or, to put it another way, they can reduce our dependence on Middle Eastern and eastern hemisphere sources from 60 per cent to 40 per cent, and do that within a relatively short space of time.

Since this bill was introduced, a number of other events have occurred which have added a sense of urgency to the situation at present. I am talking about the fact that while the Iranian government has stated it will be resuming oil production, it has not indicated it will get up to anything like full production. The Iranians have stated they may be able to get up to one half of their original production levels, and that is obviously something which we can greet with some enthusiasm and encouragement, but it still leaves a significant shortfall of some three million barrels a day. In other words, there will be smaller volumes from Iran for some time.

There are also going to be, as a result of the policy in Iran, higher prices. The new regime there has indicated they will charge everything the traffic will bear. They have indicated they will auction to the highest price. They have stated they will look for $5 and even $10 per barrel premiums, and their statement and this shortage are creating an uneasiness in some of the other suppliers, because they too are faced with political pressures at home and they too are having to answer to their constituents why they should sell for less if Iran can get more.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

So we have seen a series of events in the Persian Gulf. Countries have been raising prices and announcing increases in prices. We have seen as well the action of the Libyan government which has not only raised prices but has stated it will cut production. These are recent events, not altogether unpredictable but events that have occurred since the introduction of this bill.

At the same time, we have witnessed the increasing isolation of Saudi Arabia. The events in Iran have created an entirely different situation in the Middle East. We have seen the kind of expeditions that have been launched in South Yemen and North Yemen that have been described as border disputes, but these two states are on the southern border of Saudi Arabia. One of the states is described as a Soviet satellite run by a Marxist government in an increasingly Marxist area of the world. I am referring, of course, to the borders of Afghanistan and to the element which has been developing within Iran itself. And there are all of the additional tensions that have been created there.

We have also seen, to our regret and disappointment, the inability of Mr. Carter, President of the United States, to bring a degree of stability and understanding between two of the main combatants, two of the main states of the Middle East, Israel and Egypt, to the bargaining table. The events in Iran have not helped because the government of Iran has stated it would no longer continue the policy of the shah to supply oil to Israel.

I think I have said enough to indicate that the events in the Middle East are less stable today than they were even a few weeks ago when this bill was first addressed at second reading. I should like to say that perhaps in two weeks' time the situation will be better, but I would be a foolish man if I were to predict that degree of improvement.

The other question that has arisen since this bill was introduced is how a shortfall might be allocated. The International Energy Agency of which Canada is a member by treaty has agreed to joint action which would reduce world demand by two million barrels a day, roughly 5 per cent of the consumption of the IEA countries. That 5 per cent figure is very close to the 7 per cent figure which is the figure which will trigger our treaty obligations and the need for this bill, the mandatory allocation of crude oil, the mandatory allocation of products and possibly the introduction of a rationing scheme.

I emphasized two things in these remarks, the fact that the IEA is closer than it has ever been since its inception to dealing with the very reason that it was created, and the fact that the process of allocating international crude and crude movements will be undertaken and influenced to a large extent by multinational corporations, by the internationals themselves.

In the debate yesterday on whether or not this motion was in order there was some discussion about this. The energy critic of the Conservative party put it on the record that the International Energy Agency was set up with a standing group on emergency questions and he indicated that the standing group will be composed of one or more representatives of the government of each participating country. I am referring to article 54 of the institutional and general provisions of the International Energy Agency.

• (1540)

The amendment which has been introduced would name Petro-Canada to the standing group on emergency questions. It is the senior operative executive committee concerned with the implementation of the emergency oil-sharing arrangement. We believe that Petro-Canada's nomination as one of the Canadian government representatives is appropriate entirely, and more than that, it is essential in light of the manner in which the international allocation process will be undertaken.

It is quite clear from the institutional structure of the organization that international companies will play a major role, both in an advisory manner and in an implementing manner. Therefore, it is all the more important for Canada that Petro-Canada represent the interests of Canadians in the highest executive committee, the standing group on emergency questions, not just to advise Canada and other Canadian representatives who might be present, but to maintain a watchdog influence respecting the implementation process to ensure Canada is dealt with in a fair manner.

I would not want to suggest that other countries will not live up to their treaty obligations in the event we are faced collectively with our obligation under the international energy agency oil-sharing agreement of 7 per cent. But there is the possibility some countries will try to take advantage of the situation and will try to over-protect their own interests in a manner which could be harmful to Canada. Also it is quite possible that those countries might be served by their own international companies. It does not take any great imagination to see that an international oil corporation, which will be involved in this very difficult implementation process, could favour some countries to the disadvantage of others. Also it is well known that Canada does not have any international company which might be able to look out for Canada's interests. It is for that reason I believe the addition of Petro-Canada to the standing group on emergency questions is important.

I believe the events with Imperial and Exxon have demonstrated that we will have to depend increasingly upon ourselves to solve our own problems.

Mr. Symes: Tell us about this morning. What happened this morning?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member opposite is asking what happened this morning. He is referring to the meeting I had with the president of Imperial Oil, at which meeting the president advised me that the chairman of Exxon Corporation was not prepared for the Canadian subsidiary to be permitted to negotiate and buy directly or contract directly with Petroleos de Venezuela, the national oil company of Venezuela. As a result of that disappointing information I took action with Petro-Canada to open negotiations immediately with the Venezuelan national oil company.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: It was with a view to obtaining 100,000 barrels a day, which is the level of imports Imperial Oil has been sourcing to Exxon Corporation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: For these reasons I believe the House should deal with this particular amendment in an expeditious and favourable manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I must say most of us in the House, at least on this side, were rather disappointed at the rather lacklustre and fragmentary exposition of the problems we in Canada face today as a result of the lack of a meaningful national policy on energy, oil and gas in the country over the last ten years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Be serious.

Mr. Lawrence: The clear import of what the minister said, in regard to any potential crisis we may have in the country respecting energy supply, is that he has absolutely no policy whatsoever except to lean heavily on a state-owned but not necessarily state-controlled oil company to bail him out of his oil supply problems. When the minister indicated that Exxon, the parent company of Imperial Oil, went overboard in regard to its attempted cutbacks respecting its Canadian subsidiary, Imperial Oil, I must say I agree with him. I do not think there is any question about that.

In the complex marketing, purchasing, wholesaling and distribution set-up of the oil and gas industry in the country, I fail to see how the imposition of one large state-run oil company in that complicated chain of events will be any improvement whatsoever over the efforts, and sometimes unsuccessful efforts in our interest, of a large multinatinal oil company. To my mind, all the minister is doing is substituting big government for a big company. There are many, many other reasonable, sensible and meaningful alternatives than that. If that is the best the minister can come up with, I am sure all he is doing is assisting the control and supervision of many of these matters by a state-run oil company. There are other alternatives in the Canadian interest using Canadian-run companies. There are Canadian companies which can do the job.

An hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Lawrence: If there are not, whose fault is it if it is not the fault of the government? What has this particular government done over the last ten years to develop and promote smaller Canadian companies in the resource field? Absolutely nothing. The tax situation, the development situation and the promotion situation over the last ten years have been simply that. Certainly there have been bona fide efforts by some provincial governments in the resource field to do exactly that. As a matter of fact, in the exploration and drilling sectors of the industry at the moment there is a growing control of exploration for oil and gas in the country by smaller Canadian-owned, controlled and managed companies. There are many, but they are not there because of the atmosphere generated by the government; they are there in spite of the atmosphere generated by the government.

Of course, the minister's actions regarding Exxon have nothing to do with any political consideration by the minister whatsoever, none whatsoever. It is just a coincidence that the minister is waking from his lethargy respecting oil problems in the country because there is an election around the corner. It has nothing to do with the electoral ambitions of the minister whatsoever. The fact he is setting Exxon up as the bogey respecting this entire matter and that this is merely a crass political move of huffery and puffery respecting Exxon obviously have nothing whatsoever to do with the election.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that they have everything to do with the elections. What he is attempting to do is set himself up as the Canadian white knight on a charger that is going full blast at that windmill called the multinational company, Exxon. Of course, this is not only ridiculous, it is almost patently dishonest, because if the minister was not aware that Imperial Oil bought its Venezuelan crude through its parent company long before the date he said he first learned of it in January, he should have known it. I suggest he did know it earlier than January, but again he has done nothing about it for years. Now he is leaning on the state-owned oil company in this country to get us out of the problem. I suggest that is no answer to the problem whatsoever, but again that it is a crass political move on the part of the minister. He is setting up his own straw men so he can knock them down, again with his own straw company, and that is no better an answer by any means.

The minister says it is a matter of government policy, his policy, that he is attempting to source most of the Canadian crude that, unfortunately, we need in this country in the western hemisphere. I suggest to him that a far better move by him, and better worth-while action by him, instead of attempting to shift the burden of Canadian needs from one offshore company and one offshore country like Iran into a state run company, and other foreign countries like Venezuela and Mexico, would be to spend half the effort, half the time and half of the taxpayers' money he is wasting on these other efforts in an attempt to make sure that Canadian energy needs are met by Canadian energy supplies. In that way we would be far better off.

The minister says, quite rightly, that we have been dependent for 60 per cent of our offshore crude on Middle East sources. Now, wonder of wonders, he is going to change all this and make us, instead of dependent on that source, dependent on Venezuelan and Mexican crude. To me that again is another crutch, and we should not be leaning on that type of thing.

In this country of all countries we can, if we only had decent and meaningful national energy policies, produce our own oil supplies, our own gas supplies, our own hydro and our own nuclear supplies. We can do that ourselves. All we need is some faith in ourselves and a government that will produce the tax policies for that type of development, not only for producing these supplies, but as well for developing decent delivery systems across this country. In this way there should be no impending crisis in the Atlantic provinces next fall and winter, a crisis which the negligence of this government, and no other, will have brought about.

In respect of price the minister now says what a terrible thing it is for Canada, because with the Iranian revolution the new rulers of Iran, whom he misguidedly labels as Marxists, are going to try to charge the highest price the traffic can bear. Those are his words of just a few moments ago. He may be perfectly right, and I think he is right. I can see no way at all that there is not going to be at least another 15 per cent increase in international, world crude oil prices by September 1. What is his answer to that? His answer is: We are going to try to move things so we are not dependent on bad old Iran or on increasingly isolated Saudi Arabia. His answer is to again move to Venezuela and Mexico.

I suggest that if Iran is going to charge the highest price the traffic can bear, it will not be very long before that trend is very readily apparent in Venezuelan and Mexican oil prices as well. Obviously that is the case. If the minister is that worried about the price and that worried about this huge hemorrhage of Canadian funds from this country to buy this amount of crude oil offshore, I suggest the way to stop that hemorrhage is to start turning some of that money inward in order to produce and develop our own Canadian resources and delivery system. In the long run that is the only answer, but how and when are we going to shock these people out of their complacency? Obviously the only way to do it is by an election.

The tragedy today as far as the Canadian oil and gas situation is concerned is not that the government is bringing forward a tired old bill that was first brought forward in 1974 for the consideration of this House, but rather that an emergency oil allocation bill is needed in this country at all. We should not need it. We obviously must have it simply because of the policies of the government which have resulted in our being behind the eight ball. We should not be debating this measure today. We should not have this bill before us today, except for a situation that is the direct making of the policies of this particular government.

As far as the bill itself is concerned, it has been described in the press and by others before the standing committee as a bad bill, an unreasonable bill, as an alarmist overreaction with sweeping powers. It has been said that the powers the minister will have under the bill are "absolute and dictatorical powers". These powers have been described by others, not by me, as frightening and unnecessary. It is said that the tone of the whole bill is one of "authoritarianism and federal centralization". Others outside the committee have labelled the minister, if this bill is fully implemented, as a czar. It has been said that this bill is "a piece of tyranny", handled by amateurs with all of the professionals shoved aside.

I do not think any fair-minded and conscientious member of this House, no matter what political persuasion he may be, could help but agree that this bill, as far as its terms are concerned, is a bad bill. Certainly I agree with that criticism, and I could add a few of my own. The first criticism I would add, for instance, is that we are dealing with a bill that will be implemented at a time when the federal cabinet, and no one else, believes we are into a national emergency as far as energy supplies are concerned.

One of the major gross deficiencies of this bill is that there is nothing in the bill to indicate what a national emergency actually is. There are no guidelines, no restrictions and no limitations. There is no definition of what may or may not be a "national emergency". Only the federal cabinet on the recommendation of the federal minister will be able to understand and to know what a national emergency is, and only then and only that cabinet will be able to implement the bill. I think that is a gross deficiency in the bill.

Even the international treaty to which we are a signatory as a member of the International Energy Agency defines for international purposes what a major shortfall in energy or petroleum supplies may be. There is a 7 per cent figure there which is related to total consumption. There is no such definition, there is no such triggering mechanism, there is no such comprehension whatever in the bill of what a national emergency can or might be. As a matter of fact, there are even gross implications in the bill to the effect that it need not be a national emergency in scope, that a disordering of the petroleum, gas or energy market in only one region or area of the country may be enough to convince the government to proclaim by order in council that this bill comes into effect. Again, I think that this is merely a sweeping overreaction by the government to the problem.

● (1600)

I am not indicating that the government should not have this power. What I am saying is that it is an ill-thought out, ill-conceived piece of legislation. It is technically poorly drafted, otherwise we would not have amendments from the government before the House at this late stage of the proceedings. There is really no definition or triggering mechanism in this bill. There is no one in Canada today, including the minister, who can give us a definition of what a national emergency may be, yet we are being asked to give the minister sweeping powers in the event that he, and he alone, can make recommendations to his cabinet colleagues, whereupon the cabinet alone will then decide, in their ultimate and final wisdom, just what a national emergency should be.

Mr. Breau: Who should?

Mr. Lawrence: I am saying that in a parliamentary system or democracy the people have every right to know what a national emergency should encompass in so far as energy supplies are concerned. Other countries have done it, and it has even been done in the international arena which is far more difficult. But can the government? The other night the minister in committee indicated that he could not. I think that that is a terrible and terrifying admission for a minister to make. The minister has consistently refused to indicate to us what he would consider to be a national emergency in this country.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The government is running out of gas.

Mr. Lawrence: Again, sir, as late as last Thursday evening and again today—because he did not dwell upon the matter at all—the minister was simply not able to tell us what an emergency would be.

Mr. Gillespie: We are dealing with an amendment. Would you address yourself to the amendment?

Mr. Lawrence: The minister has said that we are dealing with an amendment and asks if I would address myself to the amendment. The answer is, bluntly, no. If the Chair is going to allow the minister to rattle on in the vague way that he did, speaking about Mr. Armstrong, about Exxon and a few other things, then the minister may not like it but he is just going to have to sit and listen.

The minister is simply not able to give us a definition of what a national emergency is. I suggest in view of these wide-sweeping, dictatorial, authoritarian, absolute and frightening powers that that is a terrible and terrifying admission for the minister to make.

Another major defect in the bill—and I refer as well to the import of these amendments—is that it will give the minister and his hand-picked board the power to do almost anything they want to do with respect to the distribution, production or importation of energy supplies in this country without any compensation or any rectifying procedure or authority whatsoever. There is no way under this bill that compensation could be given to any individual person or citizen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Lawrence: May I have the permission of the House to proceed?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): No, there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, we have before us this afternoon an amendment put forward by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) on the emergency supply allocation bill which would widen the scope and activity of Petro-Canada in acting in the interests of Canada by allowing it to be represented on the executive committee of the International Energy Agency so that it may advise and be a watchdog for Canadian interests in the event of a world-wide disruption or shortage. We in the New Democratic Party will support that amendment.

The situation that we have before us in this bill is one that I think any witness of the committee proceedings or the debate would find of extreme interest in terms of the way in which the two major parties are acting in trying to cope with the ever-increasing energy problem facing Canadians.

As we all know, this bill will not solve the long-term problem of supply and security of supply for Canadians. What it does do, however, is give the government emergency powers to allocate oil in the event of serious disruption of supply. I do not see how any reasonable Canadian can be opposed to that concept, that of giving the national government the power to deal with what would be a national emergency. After listening to the oratory and the arguments of the Conservative party, I am still at a loss to understand what they would put forward to replace the bill which we have before us. They are very quick at criticizing and using generalities about wide powers and about the minister becoming a dictator, but in terms of any concrete alternative on how the minister is to deal with an emergency situation, they are not forthcoming. The Conservative party does not seem to have a comprehensive energy policy, other than to provide more subsidies for the multinationals that got us into this mess in the first place.

As the minister moved his amendment today, he pointed out that we may face continued shortages of oil from Iran, a shortfall of perhaps as much as three million barrels a day, half of what was normally produced by that country. He also said that we would be faced with higher prices. The minister avoided the very difficult question of where we would get our supplies if we were cut off either by Iran or Venezuela, or if they were reduced by any of the normal suppliers. I would like to address myself to that matter in a few moments, especially in light of the minister's meeting this morning with Mr. Armstrong, the president of Imperial Oil.

This amendment which we have before us, as I say, we support. In fact, it is the New Democratic Party that has been continually urging a greater role for Petro-Canada, our national petroleum company. As hon. members will recall, it was during the minority parliament of 1972 to 1974 that our party, holding the balance of power, was able to convince the then Liberal government to introduce legislation for Petro-Canada in order that it could act in the interests of Canadians.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Symes: Anyone who remembers the negotiations that went on during that period will agree with me—

Mr. Roy (Timmins): Were you in on those negotiations?

Mr. Symes: The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) has asked if I was in on the negotiations. I worked on the committee that dealt with the Petro-Canada legislation and was in close liaison with our energy critic at the time, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and our party leader, who reported to us the state of ongoing developments in the negotiations with the government to set up Petro-Canada.

Anyone who knows the events of that year will recall the demand which was made publicly for Petro-Canada, as well as a number of other demands by our party, and the government's acquiescing to those demands. As I have said, we are arguing for a greater role for Petro-Canada. Therefore, I can see only advantages in putting Petro-Canada on this executive committee of the International Energy Agency.

Indeed, I was happy that the amendment which I made in committee to this bill before us to put a representative of Petro-Canada on the emergency allocation board in Canada was accepted by the government, although the Conservative opposition voted against it. I have another amendment in motion No. 5 which argues for Petro-Canada, in the event of an emergency being declared, to become the sole importer of offshore oil. I will deal with that at the appropriate time.

When I looked at the statement made by the minister yesterday in the procedural debate on the amendment, I noticed that he too shares our view that Petro-Canada should have a central and important role in development energy policy. I do wish that what he says was translated into more concrete action. Quoting from page 4052 of Hansard the minister said:

> —and it seems to me to be even more important now that Petro-Canada be included and designated as our watchdog with the other multinational corporations that will be involved in the implementation of that oil sharing arrangement. After all, all hon. members will remember it was not so very long ago when one of the international oil companies, Exxon, involved itself in the diversion of crude which was destined for Canada. It is in that kind of situation that I think it is important that Canada should be involved, in order to guard against this sort of thing.

That is a very interesting statement about the need for Petro-Canada, especially as a counterbalance to the power that the multinational oil companies have in Canada. We all know that our oil industry is about 90 per cent foreign owned, and that the multinationals have designed energy policies to benefit themselves rather than Canadian energy consumers. Of course, we are now literally paying the price for that kind of policy, and we are paying the price in terms of supply problems. It will be of interest to see what the minister actually envisions as a role for Petro-Canada in light of that larger problem, which is only partially alluded to in the amendment we have before us.

When the parent company of Imperial Oil, Exxon, announced that it would divert 100,000 barrels of Venezuelan oil destined for Canada, the minister announced that that was unacceptable, that no minister of energy or any Canadian government could accept an arbitrary decision by a multinational company to tell its Canadian subsidiary to divert oil contracted for eastern Canadian markets.

There was a great hubbub in this chamber at the time and the minister wrapped himself in the flag by saying that he was going to defend the interest of Canadians, especially eastern Canadians, who depend on that oil. He began to negotiate with

Imperial. That company announced that it had reconsidered and would not divert 100,000 barrels of oil but only 9,000 barrels of oil destined for Canada's eastern markets. But the minister did not stop there. He said that if Exxon or Imperial diverts one barrel of oil, that was still unacceptable to the Government of Canada. In an interview conducted by and reported in the Toronto Star for February 23, 1979, the minister is quoted as saying:

"If his (Armstrong's) Exxon colleagues choose to put Imperial in a disadvantageous position, then presumably they're prepared to accept the consequences".

Further on, the minister states:

—the situation will not be resolved to his satisfaction "until Mr. Armstrong has established direct contractural links with Venezuela".

In other words, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, quite rightly, to Imperial and Exxon that it is unacceptable for a Canadian subsidary to take orders to divert oil destined for Canada. He said too that he did not want Imperial Oil to divert any oil, and he gave orders to Imperial Oil to refuse directives from its parent, Exxon. He told Imperial to begin negotiations with Exxon to relieve its obligations so that it would be able to negotiate directly with Venezuela for oil destined for Canada.

The minister stood up in this House a few moments ago and said that he had had a meeting with the president of Imperial Oil this morning who told him that his position had not changed, that Imperial would still divert oil destined for Canada and that it would not continue to pursue the course of direct negotiations with Venezuela for the oil.

In light of the minister's statement that any diversion would be unacceptable, and that if Imperial did not establish direct links with Venezuela, that would also be unacceptable, it now appears to me that Imperial has given a direct slap in the face to this minister, to the Government of Canada and to the consuming Canadian public. Surely any government which has the interests of Canadians at heart, any government that has any backbone at all, will not accept that kind of dictate from a foreign multinational about the operations of its Canadian subsidary when the operations of that subsidary go against the interests of Canadians. The minister was quite bold in the House and elsewhere. He said that if Imperial does not do what he says it will have to face the consequences. I hope the minister can enlighten us as to what consequences he foresees for Imperial Oil.

Will the minister take action, legislative or otherwise, to ensure that Canadian consumers in Atlantic Canada get 100 per cent of the oil that was bound and contracted for, or will he capitulate to this multinational oil company? Will the minister go begging and thereby embarrass all Canadians, and in so doing admit the problem that we have in Canada today, namely that because of the lack of an energy policy and of the lack of public involvement in the energy sector, Exxon has held the Canadian government to ransom? Unless the minister can announce otherwise, it appears to me that Exxon and Imperial have won and the Canadian consumer has lost.

The minister says that he wants Petro-Canada to enter into direct negotiations with Venezuela. I commend him for that. But the crucial problem is, where will the 9,000 barrels of oil which Imperial says they will still divert to Exxon markets throughout the world come from? The minister has not answered that question, Mr. Speaker. Will we get all of that oil or not? If not, what action will this government take to protect Canadian consumers?

Surely it is obvious, with these high-handed, arbitrary and unfair actions of Imperial Oil, that it is time Canadians realize we cannot develop an energy policy in this country when we are held up to that kind of blackmail by multinational oil companies. The only way out is not the way of the minister of energy—to go begging cap in hand, or begging on his knees, to Imperial Oil and saying, "Please, will you give us that oil destined for us originally?" Is that any way for a minister of the Crown to be acting? Because it appears that is exactly what he is doing. He has acquiesced to Imperial's thumbing its nose at the Government of Canada and saying: "We are not going to enter into direct negotiations with our supplier, nor are we going to meet our full commitment of oil destined for eastern Canada". What a spineless government and minister we have if that is all that the minister can say in reaction to that arbitrary action by Imperial Oil.

I hope Petro-Canada can enter into direct negotiations with Venezuela or with Mexico, because we will get a much more secure supply of oil. But I do not know whether it can. I tend to doubt at the moment whether Petro-Canada can make up the shortfall caused by Imperial's arbitrary actions.

• (1620)

These recent incidents of the diversion of oil by Exxon and Imperial indicate how far this country and this government have been backed into a corner by relying on multinational oil companies for so long to develop our energy reserves. It should be obvious even to this minister that the way out of this impasse, the way to break the stranglehold of multinational oil companies on our economy, is to move more directly in terms of public ownership and public control over the industry.

We have a magnificent tool whereby we can do that, a Crown corporation, the energy company owned by Canadians, Petro-Canada. It could be a leader in terms of developing energy policy. It could be a leader in terms of developing energy policy. It could be a leader in terms of developing exploration, price systems and, above all for eastern Canadians, direct contractual links with oil supplies. We do not want again to get caught in the squeeze we now find where a multinational oil company with head office in New York says that it will determine in whose interests our policies will operate. That will not necessarily be in the interests of Canadians but in the interests of Exxon and the maximization of profits.

If it means diversion of oil from Canadian markets to somewhere else, Exxon will do it. How much longer can we in Canada tolerate that kind of situation? Surely any government worth its salt would understand that we have to move quickly and vigorously in the direction of a larger role for Petro-Canada. In the interim we must take legislative and regulatory action to stop this kind of blackmail that Exxon and Imperial are perpetrating on the Canadian people.

If the minister does not take action—and there are options available to him in terms of a swapping policy and a compensation policy for Imperial—it is obvious that this government has capitulated to the wishes of the foreign multinational oil companies. If this government does not stand for the interests of the energy-consuming public in Canada, we will continue to be ripped off and be at the mercy of these foreign oil companies. The bill before us is important and necessary. The NDP supports the amendment before us.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased today to hear the minister announce that he had asked Petro-Canada to negotiate with the government of Venezuela. It is a step that is badly needed, given the refusal of Exxon to continue contractual arrangements with regard to continuing the supply of oil to this country.

I am amazed at the response of the Tory party. They continually talk of getting rid of Petro-Canada. They believe there is some magic way that a group within Canada can be large enough to move in and do something substantial in this industry without the support of a national company. I am amazed to hear them say that we do not need this bill. They say there is no need for it because there is no energy emergency, that this is strictly an election ploy.

We had our first warning in 1973 which resulted in more than a quadrupling of the cost of oil and the worst recession in the industrial world since the thirties. It has resulted in such things as a $50 billion balance of trade deficit for the United States, it having to buy oil on the world market. This has had major efforts on the Canadian dollar.

We have now had our second warning. Iran has been one of our major suppliers, supplying 20 per cent of the oil for eastern Canada. The Iranians are now saying that they are only going to supply half the amount previously supplied and at much greater prices. Iranian workers in the oil fields are demanding that these supplies go elsewhere. The government of Iran has said it will not deal with multinational oil companies. As the minister indicated, there is great concern with regard to what could happen to other countries in the Middle East, such as Saudi Arabia.

The minister has covered the whole matter of the Exxon diversion. Suffice it to say it is important that our national oil company deal directly with the government of Venezuela so that we will not be forced into the situation where supplies that the government of Venezuela wants to send to Canada are diverted elsewhere.

There is another major reason for this discussion. According to a publication by the department, within the next 15 to 20 years we must reduce our dependence on oil. It must be reduced to 46 per cent of our energy supplies, then to 30 per cent by the end of the decade and to 25 per cent by the year 2025. Therefore, we will have a substantial reduction in the amount of oil available.

I am amazed by the attitude of the Tories that somehow or other the industry is basically Canadian-owned. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) made this statement at page 7202 of Hansard for July 2, 1975:

> The truth is that Petro-Can is a socialistic dream. They have conjured up in their minds the impression that the petroleum industry is not owned by Canadians but is owned by foreign corporations. That is not in accordance with the facts. Canadians own the petroleum in this country.

I do not know where they get the idea that Canadians own this industry in this country. There is perhaps 20 or 25 per cent Canadian ownership, but as far as control is concerned it is not there. Foreign companies in the petroleum industry control 91 per cent of the assets and 95 per cent of the sales. To say that we do not need Petro-Canada because some Canadian outfit will come along and solve the problem is to say that those facts are wrong.

Let us look at those companies. Mobil Oil of Canada is 100 per cent controlled by Mobil Oil in the United States. Chevron of Canada is 100 per cent owned by Standard Oil of California; Imperial Oil is 70 per cent owned by Exxon; Shell of Canada is 79 per cent owned by Shell Investments; Gulf Canada is 65 per cent owned by Gulf Oil Corporation; Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas is 53 per cent owned by Continental Oil. Aquitaine is 75 per cent owned offshore and controlled by the French government. BP is 69 per cent owned by BP and controlled by the British government. These are facts. These are the major oil companies in the world and, as I have said, they control 91 per cent of the assets and 95 per cent of the sales in this country.

● (1630)

The Tory solution of setting up a group to control the other 9 per cent is just ridiculous. Sure, we need support. We need Canadian independence. But we also need a Canadian company large enough and with enough muscle to do some of the things that have to be done. I find it difficult to understand this reaction.

Those of us who were on the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works back in 1974-75 when we were setting up Petro-Canada will remember the problems we had to face. There were something like 14 meetings on clause 2. We are reminded of the obstruction by some of the Tory members at that time. There is a consistency here, at least I can say that for them.

There were three reasons why Petro-Canada was set up. One was to ensure a secure supply of oil for this country. This implies that it might not necessarily be profitable to do some of the things that have to be done. For instance, Petro-Canada has in the last year initiated drilling operations offshore on the east coast. These operations might not prove to be profitable. If this were a private company whose only aim was to make a profit, they probably would not be there. But they are there because we have a problem in the Atlantic provinces and they are there to serve the Atlantic provinces.

The second point in terms of supply is that if they do achieve a breakthrough and find a substantial quantity of oil, that oil would not necessarily have to be exported. It would stay here for use by Canadians. That is one of the reasons Petro-Canada was set up. Another reason has to do with keeping an eye on the industry. There is no industry in this country or in the world, for that matter, which Canadians and other nations view with as much suspicion as they do the oil industry, and perhaps for good reason.

I believe the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) before he became Leader of the Opposition supported the notion that one of the reasons for setting up Petro-Canada was to enable the Canadian people and the government to keep an eye on the oil industry. If the oil industry is not to be suspected, then one way of making sure is to lay the facts in front of the people. If the Canadian government keeps an eye on the industry and the facts are laid before the public and there is no hanky-panky, then everybody looks better.

The third point has to do with Canadian ownership. I have already spent time on this aspect, showing the degree to which ownership is in the hands of foreign companies. Then there is the degree of control. The degree of control is even more important than the extent of ownership. Hon. members may notice that with respect to Gulf, for instance, there is a 31 per cent Canadian ownership. Nevertheless, control is still in the hands of foreign multinationals and this is something we ought to be extremely disturbed about, particularly in a world in which oil supplies can be manipulated so easily.

There was no end to the disruption in the committee. As I have indicated, we had 14 meetings on clause 2 alone. The bill was being filibustered, of course. Finally, though, we managed to get it through. In order to do so the minister at the time, Mr. Macdonald, had to make a concession to the Tory party; the government was obliged to relax control over the day to day operations of Petro-Canada.

It is interesting to note that the Tory party made a big thing out of the fact that the government was failing to exercise day to day control over various Crown corporations; this was at a later date when issues arose about certain deals with Korea and so on. But a few months earlier they had objected strongly to the government exercising some control over the day to day operations of Petro-Canada. So that was given up in exchange for agreement by the Tory party not to filibuster the bill. I think we spent 42 hours in discussion of this legislation in the House and 25 hours in committee.

The Leader of the Opposition has indicated he would dismantle Petro-Canada. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) suggested only last week that the first thing his party would do, if elected to power would be to dismantle Petro-Canada. A couple of weeks ago in Saskatoon the policy committee of the Tory party indicated they would follow through and disband Petro-Canada. So I do not think there is any doubt at all that if the Tories become the government we shall be out of the oil business as a nation and the multinationals will be back in it.

The Tories have accused us of lacking a policy. They have a simple answer, which is just to move more oil to the Atlantic provinces as quickly as possible. They have made a further suggestion that natural gas be moved to the Atlantic provinces. They have talked about supplying natural gas to Quebec and we have already seen applications from TransCanada for a line from Montreal to Quebec. The Leader of the Opposition seems to be talking about a supply line which would run from Quebec to the Atlantic provinces. The Tory government in Ontario has opposed this, saying it was ridiculous and that it would not make economic sense. They are also claiming that the Leader of the Opposition did not make that commitment.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) indicated the other night that such a commitment was not made. I thought he did make the commitment and I believe the people in the Atlantic provinces thought he had done so, but at this point there seems to be no such commitment. At this point, though, TransCanada has an application before the National Energy Board for such a line and the minister has indicated that he would favour funding the line by moving exports through the line into Bangor, Maine, and so on. So we are moving in this direction generally, though the Tories seem to be stalled at some points.

As far as oil is concerned, we ought to look very seriously at the implications of Conservative arguments in favour of moving far more oil to the east. This would be most desirable, of course, if we had the oil to move. Already we have laid a pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal which delivers 200,000 barrels a day, and an application is before the National Energy Board to enlarge the line to take an additional 100,000 barrels a day. But where is the oil coming from?

As far as I can understand the situation there are 15 billion to 20 billion barrels of oil in the western reserves ultimately recoverable. Seven or eight billion of those have already been recovered. Now we are using about three quarters of a billion barrels a year and leaving, say, 10 billion still in the western reserves. We have perhaps 12, 13 or 14 more years of oil supplies left at the rate we are using it, that is all. We have not made any significant discoveries in the north or in the north islands. There have been offshore discoveries off the east coast. They have been discoveries of gas, not oil. If we expand this particular project, we may find ourselves running out much earlier than we had thought we would.

● (1640)

The other solution is to move more rapidly on the Syncrude project. The Tories are saying that we are not giving enough concessions and that the federal government should put up more tax concessions and more money. I would like to refer to an editorial printed in the Toronto Star on March 10, last Saturday, which indicates a very strong feeling, at least from the point of view of the Ontario taxpayer, that we are already putting too much money into this project and into oil projects generally. The editorial says, and I quote:

> But does Clark not realize that existing federal tax concessions would provide almost 50 per cent of the capital needed by oil companies to build such plants?

This is a reference to the Syncrude plant. We are in this business in a big way, and Petro-Canada is our agent. This is one long-term solution we will have to employ, but the Tories say that we should give oil companies more tax concessions, turn over more money and turn on the tap. That is ridiculous. We are talking about very expensive oil and about projects which are still running into many production difficulties. We are talking about long term financing, long term production problems and so forth. There is no simple solution.

I am left to conclude that there is only one rational approach to the long-term problem and to the short-term problem, and that is to use Petro-Canada in this emergency and in future dealings. We should be sending Petro-Can to negotiate with Mexico, which we have done. We should be sending Petro-Can to negotiate with Venezuela, which the minister has done. We should be getting a substantial supply of oil from those two countries—the minister has indicated 300,000 barrels a day—which we can depend on. We should not be at the mercy of some company which has movement all over the world and which can move its oil from one place to another as it pleases.

I think this major move we are making is an important one. It is amazing that the Tory party can get so upset about the dealings of Petro-Canada and that it can get so upset because the Canadian government and the Canadian people own a national oil company. To them there is absolutely nothing wrong with companies like BP and Aquitaine, both nationally owned oil companies, moving into this country and functioning at will. However, they do not want a Canadian national company to do so, and they do not want any concessions to be given to a Canadian national company. These are some of the things which disturb me, and they should disturb the Canadian public a great deal more than I think they do.

I support this amendment. I think we are moving in the right direction. While I do not want to see Petro-Canada taking over and running everything, I think we need a strong national Canadian oil company, and I think we should let it function in terms of Venezuela and Mexico.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly agree that the hon. member who just finished speaking is disturbed. One can easily see that.

Mr. Speaker, have you ever heard such a line of malarkey that all the government has by way of an energy policy is Petro-Can? Whenever they are in trouble, they wave the magic wand, and their fairy godmother, Petro-Can, solves all our energy problems. But has Petro-Can ever found one drop of oil in Canada or gas? The only gas Petro-Canada has found we have discovered is the minister speaking in this House. He has more gas than Petro-Canada has yet discovered. There has not been a non-private oil company or gas company in Canada that has yet discovered one ounce of oil or gas.

The government here is admitting in this legislation to a complete bankruptcy of policy. The first oil crisis came in 1973. Six years later another emergency supplies allocation bill is coming in because the government has done nothing to solve our problem.

[Mr. McRae.]

What is our problem? Statistics Canada shows that in 1976 oil supplied 52 per cent of our energy needs. In Atlantic Canada the figure was 87 per cent, in Quebec, 75 per cent.

The government has done nothing to change that in the last six years, knowing our vulnerability. The figures show that we import into eastern Canada now 530,000 barrels per day, so that 60 per cent of the Quebec and the Atlantic provinces demand is met by these expensive foreign supplies. That is the problem, and the government has done nothing to cure that or suggest any cure for it. Those imports are costing us $3.5 billion in 1979. They will cost our balance of payments $3.5 billion. The government has done nothing to solve that in the last six years.

In Quebec and the eastern provinces there is an oversupply for refining capacity. Most refineries operate at less than 75 per cent capacity. The capacity was originally built to supply the American market, now closed off, and the government has done nothing to overcome that. That will bring me to the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance in a few moments. This government has failed Come-By-Chance, failed Newfoundland, failed Canada, failed eastern Canada, and it has no policy at all except to say "Petro-Can".

Here is the government's story in verse:

Alastair, Alastair, where have you gone?
"I'm out to see Hopper—I'm now just his pawn".

Everything is Hopper. What is the good of having a minister and a Department of Energy, Mines and Resources when you ask him a question and it's Petro-Can? They have to refer to Petro-Can. Petro-Can has to negotiate with Venezuela. Petro-Can has to negotiate with Mexico. Do we not have a minister and a department and a National Energy Board so that we do not have to have Petro-Can do that? What a pitiful excuse for a policy!

Now, another verse: Listen to this, gentlemen. Please do not interrupt me when I quote my poetry.

"Petro-Can, Petro-Can," that's all they shout;
The Department of Energy has no more clout.
The 1973 crisis has lasted six years
With no government action until Iran brought new fears.
The answer, we're told, is to surrender all power
To the government that failed us in our energy-short hour.

That is all we are getting with this government. Give them more power? They have had lots of power in the last six years, and they have done nothing with it. Their solution is to come to this House and ask us to vote them more and more discretionary power.

Alastair, Alastair, where else did you be?
"Off to see my superiors in the NDP".

The minister is completely subservient to the NDP. "Pierre Trubent" and "Ed Broaddeau", they are the same. Tweedledum and Tweedle-dummer, that's the NDP and the government. They are in bed with each other. We saw that from 1972 to 1974. We see it now with energy policy. Where does the minister get his energy policy? From the NDP. Trubent and Broaddeau! The government wants to centralize all the power in Canada here in Ottawa, and the NDP says, "Yes, we want that, and then we want to nationalize it too". That is the only difference between them, if there is any difference.

All the oil and gas in Canada today was produced by the private sector, and still is, except where Petro-Canada has horned in on a takeover. So this is the government which asks us to approve this bill. Well, I for one do not approve it, and I will come to another reason why I have no intention of voting for it unless the minister gets up off his duff and gets to work to help the oil refinery which has been closed in Come-By-Chance since 1976. In February, 1976 the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance went into bankruptcy. It failed, and this government has done nothing in the last three years to help it start again. Under the legislation now before this House the government is being given the power to make sure that that refinery never starts again.

If the government is no more successful in helping Canadians generally than it has been at helping Newfoundlanders get their refinery going again, get the 500 jobs back and get that $300 million asset producing, then we are in bad shape, slack shape indeed in this country. The leader of the NDP went to Newfoundland and suggested nationalizing the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance. Their answer is to nationalize it and to have Petro-Canada operate it.

• (1650)

I asked Petro-Canada in April of 1977 what they thought about the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance, because the minister had said he would ask Petro-Canada to look at it. You know what I was told by Mr. Hopper, the famous Mr. Hopper to whom the minister is surrendering? Now the minister is the complete puppet of Hoppers. "Alastair, Alastair, where have you gone? 'I'm out to see Hopper, I am now just his pawn'." Mr. Hopper said that the refinery at Come-By-Chance will not be needed to provide oil products on the east coast until at least the early 1980s. Those are dismal propects for the east coast since it went into receivership. They had consultants survey the plant, the report was confidential, but it certainly was not favourable. That is all that Petro-Canada did. I quote:

> Any operator taking it over would have to be prepared to face some very tough years.

Petro-Canada is not going to take it over. How can it take it over? It is an export refinery; it is not needed for the domestic market in Canada. That is why it will not be taken over by Petro-Canada and the suggestion of the NDP is nonsensical. It is complete economic nonsense, as their suggestions usually are.

In the fall of 1976 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) went to Come-By-Chance during the by-elections and told the oil workers there and their union that the refinery would be operating in 1977. But he has not done a thing since then. That was two and a half years ago.

On September 15, 1977, he told the Clarenville Packet, a newspaper that circulates in Come-By-Chance, that he had had meetings with three reputable companies to discuss the possible takeover of the Come-By-Chance refinery. That was two years ago. Two of these were North American based companies with large retail distribution networks. Where are they? They have not materialized since. The article in that newspaper goes on to read:

> He noted that a number of options are open to the federal government as to involvement by Come-by-Chance.
> He said in talking with the United States last week, for instance, "there was talk of using Come-By-Chance and all other surplus refining capacity in eastern Canada on a basis that would help supply the eastern seaboard of the U.S. Canada would establish Come-By-Chance as an "in bond" refinery—American crude in, American finished products out, destined for the United States."

What happened to that? It was complete and utter bluff. There is another election coming now and they will not be getting away with bluffing down in Come-by-Chance while I am the incumbent member, and I will be the incumbent member after the next election, except that we will be in the government and we will be taking some action to help that refinery. That refinery produces 100,000 barrels a day. The bankruptcy amounted to something like $600 million, and the people who owned the first mortgage are the ECGD, the English Export Credit Guarantee Department, the equivalent in England of our EDC. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that our EDC will be following the course taken by ECGD before much longer. They hold the first mortgage and they are owed $162 million under their first mortgage. It is costing them $5 million a year to keep that refinery in mothballs so that it will not deteriorate and will be ready when somebody takes it over. That amounts to over $400,000 a month. It has cost them $15 million to keep it in mothballs and it is not operating.

They have scoured the world trying to find another party who would be interested in taking it over and operating it. The Golden Eagle made a bid but they are only interested in it as a transshipment point, not in operating a refinery. The only ones they have been able to find is the First Arabian Corporation of Luxembourg headed by a man called Mr. Roger Tamrez who is connected with a group of Saudi Arabians. He has sources of crude oil, he has marketing resources, and he has made a bid to the receivers under the first mortgage, to Peat, Marwick and Company Limited, which they have accepted.

A second proposal was made by John Shaheen who was the original operator of an oil refinery in Come-By-Chance. It was his companies, Provincial Refining Company Limited and Newfoundland Refining Company Limited, which went bankrupt. He was involved in this gigantic bankruptcy. He made a proposal to the receivers under the first mortgage, and his proposal was rejected because the receivers looked at it and said that Mr. Shaheen cannot raise the money he claims he can raise, that there is nothing to his proposal but fantasy. But they accepted the proposal of First Arabian.

So there is only one proposal in play at the moment, and that is from First Arabian Corporation of Luxembourg. They have already bought a bankrupt refinery in Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth Refining Company Limited, which went bankrupt in Puerto Rico in the last three or four years. So they have substance; they have already shown they can take over a bankrupt refinery. They have supplies of crude and they say they have markets in the United States. They say that if their proposal is accepted, they can sell their product in the United States even though eastern Canadian refineries do not come under the U.S. entitlement program which this government is supposed to have asked the United States government to approve. This government has not pushed that, it has merely put it forward pro forma.

We have Point Tupper operating at 50 per cent capacity, a whole series of east coast refineries operating at only 75 per cent capacity, and yet this government has offered the United States nothing to bring us under the entitlement program so that these refineries can compete in the United States. They do not care about these refineries, they do not care about eastern Canada, they do not care about anything. All they care about is to stay in power and to hang on by their toenails, fingernails and their hangnails. But they will go out kicking and screaming because of their neglect of problems like this one.

The Newfoundland government is owed something like $50 million on the second mortgage. Local creditors are out of money. This week people from First Arabian who have to enter into a detailed written agreement with the receivers under the first mortgage were in Ottawa seeing various government agencies.

There are some things that this government will have to do if this proposal is to go forward. On April 15 there is supposed to be a final contract of sale. Local creditors have been told by Mr. Shaheen that he would see they are repaid although they are unsecured. I am referring to the local Newfoundland creditors under the original bankruptcy. That is all well and good. If the proposal of Mr. Shaheen was accepted and carried out, they might all be paid. But his proposal is not in play; it has been rejected by the first mortgagee who controls the situation, unless someone wants to pay the first mortgagee $162 million plus the $15 million they have spent.

There is only one proposal in play, and for that to go forward the Government of Canada has to take certain actions. One of those actions is this. When this legislation passes the House and the Senate, it means that the government can step in at any time they say there is an emergency and interfere with export contracts, with movements of crude oil, with the sale of refined products. They did that at Come-By-Chance in 1974 and 1975. Even if you get a term export licence from the National Energy Board to export your product, the government can interfere and order you not to export. No one, neither the First Arabian Corporation nor any other corporation that takes over the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance, can do so unless the government can guarantee that at least for a period of five to ten years they will not interfere with the sale of refined products outside Canada. Unless they can have that assurance, they cannot get the money to reopen the refinery, they cannot get the several hundreds of millions of dollars in financing which they will need. They need $50 million to repair the defective hydrogen plant and the other defective parts of the original oil refinery. They cannot get financing unless this government will guarantee them that there will be no interference in their export contracts of refined products from Come-By-Chance.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

The refined products are not needed in Canada, there is no market for them here. The crude will not come from Canada, it will come from overseas. It is an export refinery and if they cannot get this guarantee from the minister and his government, their proposal cannot go forward, the Come-By-Chance refinery cannot operate and 500 people cannot work. I would like the minister to assure me that before the legislation is passed the government will give them that guarantee. I will not support this legislation if I happen to be here when it comes before the House unless the government gives that guarantee to First Arabian or to anyone else with a successful offer to reopen that refinery.

The second point the government has to deal with is the wharf at Come-By-Chance. It was built by the government and it is owned by the government. They are out by $20 million. The wharf is of no value to the government because the refinery is not operating. They have not had a payment on the wharf in three years. The wharf is needed now and it is for the government to lease that wharf to the successful proposer who will take over the refinery at a nominal rental fee for at least ten years so that their cash flow is assisted in the early years. The government should do that because the wharf is of no value unless the refinery at Come-By-Chance is operating.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Labour Conditions—ILO recommendation that older workers should choose age of retirement; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Canadian National Railways—Name of independent auditors employed to audit pension fund account; the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott)—Urban Affairs—CMHC divesting itself of low income properties.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

HOLIDAYS ACT

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF DOMINION DAY BY CANADA DAY

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved that Bill C-232, to amend the Holidays Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Herbert moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have yet to hear the reason for attempting to change the name given to our country by the Fathers of Confederation in the year 1867. Some hon. members said in committee and in the House that the word "dominion" is divisive. If it is, in my opinion it is only so in the minds of politicians who would rather play politics than do something positive for Canada and Canadians. If any member of the House has received representations that the word "dominion" is dividing the country, I would ask that he or she explain or reveal the reasoning behind that type of thinking.

It seems to me more than strange that on the very day after the celebration of Commonwealth Day a private member's bill should be brought before the House which would tend to separate the nation from the Commonwealth of Nations, a group of 40 countries, as Mr. Speaker said, "of great diversity in terms of size, race, colour, creed and culture, and at all stages of economic development". Perhaps some members have overlooked the fact that the second Monday in March was designated Commonwealth Day at the suggestion of Canada in 1975. The Dominion of Canada is part of that Commonwealth.

According to the dictionary, a dominion is "a country under a particular government; self-governing member of the British Commonwealth of Nations". "Commonwealth" is shown as "the body politic", which is "the state or nation as an organized political entity or the people collectively". What is divisive about either word? I would say the very word "dominion" exemplifies one people: brothers and sisters in a nation whose ten provinces are members of that family.

Why switch to Canada Day from Dominion Day just because, in the words of some hon. members opposite, the former is the name generally used? I ask by whom and where are they? Sometimes even in the House four letter words have been used, but certainly the decision to be vulgar does not signify that type of language is going to be adopted. I would certainly hope not. What the country needs today are more citizens who stand up for the country, what it means, how it came about, the hard work and initiative applied by our pioneers. Canadians have not been given an opportunity to decide whether such a change should be made.

If the government is of the opinion that the name chosen for the country is not satisfactory, the government should bring in legislation in the usual way. Why try to sneak this change through parliament by a private member's bill? In addition, why tinker with this matter when the mandate of the government is running out? What is so urgent about it?

In 1976 when the bill was discussed in committee, a member of the government said the following in reference to the word "dominion":

> It does have a divisive effect because some people do interpret the word as implying a link with another country.

Everyone in Canada has a link with another country. If we were to separate our words and thoughts from every country to which our provincial brothers and sisters are connected by birth or through their forefathers, would we have a Canada at all? Let us be realistic rather than petty. Let us work to keep this country the way it should be. We are all related as a provincial and national family. We can work together retaining our culture and heritage. We do not need more political manoeuvring, even to satisfy ideas in the minds of a few politicians.

I recall the fuss about Canada having a distinctive flag of her own. Everyone remembers the time spent on the selection of that flag. Whether we like it or not, and whether or not we admit it, the fact is the flag was changed because some people thought the Red Ensign was divisive. I did not think so then, and time has proven I was right.

Under a flag which is distinctly Canadian, what we have today is a nation on the point of division. A flag loved by the majority of Canadians who fought world wars under its proud and significant Union Jack and coat of arms of Canada was removed to appease a few, and I am not certain they were not all politicians. A new flag did not further unite the country. A new name will not keep the nation together either. The nation will be one nation without question when her people realize what they have in this country, when they decide to do something for Canada, when they work and pull together instead of imagining that everything of earlier years must go.

One could liken the continual chipping away at what we have and what Canada was built upon to a child who was given everything he or she wanted just to avoid discussion, argument or a bit of noise. Of course, hon. members know the result of that type of parental behaviour; the child is never satisfied, becomes discontended, and is seeking forever something else, anything to create dissension and enable the child to control the parents instead of the parents controlling the child. In other words, the tail wags the dog.

I am not an expert on the constitution, but I believe it is only right today to quote from an address by one of Canada's best known constitutional experts to whom every resident of the country owes gratitude, respect, admiration and loyalty. I should like to read excerpts from an address on June 19, 1956 by Dr. Eugene A. Forsey. They read as follows:

Dominion Day celebrates one of the greatest feats of modern history: the making of a new nation, and a new kind of nation, by a handful of people of differing origins, differing languages, differing creeds, differing histories and differing interests, and in the face of obstacles that might well have daunted the boldest and most resolute statesmen. Everything was against them. The country was huge; most of it was empty; the Americans were pressing in upon the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, threatening to cut off the new Dominion from any expansion west or north. There was hardly any industry: manufactured goods came overwhelmingly from Britain, and to central Canada for five months of the year through American ports, so that at any moment the Americans could strangle the economic life of Ontario and Quebec.

Central Canada and the maritimes knew little of each other, and many maritimers feared "upper Canadian" domination. Communications were poor: there was no railway from the maritimes to central Canada, and, what was worse, the main central Canadian railway, the Grand Trunk, came in from the United States and went out into the United States. If the Fathers of Confederation had followed their economic interests, there would have been no Confederation. They would not have gone to Charlottetown, and from Charlottetown to Quebec. They would have gone to Washington, and asked to be let into the American union . . .

The Fathers originally wanted to call the new nation "the Kingdom of Canada". But the Americans raised such a storm that the British government took fright, and insisted on something else. The Fathers, for their part, insisted on something that would mark the new and higher status of the federation. Sir Leonard Tilley produced the solution, from the seventy-second Psalm: "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth". His colleagues agreed; the Queen consented; and "Dominion" the new nation became . . .

The title was a particularly happy one, for more reasons than one. First, and most obviously, it embodied the determination of the Fathers to bring into the Union all the British North American colonies from Newfoundland to British Columbia: . . . as our coat of arms says. It declared the "Manifest destiny" of Canada to rule from the St. Lawrence to the North Pole.

● (1710)

Second, and more important, it emphasized the religious basis of the new nation. Who was to have "dominion"? The King of Israel, the Lord's Anointed: the King, under God.

Third, it proclaimed the basic fact of our two cultures. For "Dominion" is not Anglo-Saxon. It is an old French word which dropped out of use in French but was preserved in our English Bible and our English Book of Common Prayer.

Fourth, it proclaimed, no less unmistakably, our new status. The French translation of "Dominion" is "Puissance," (Power); "Souverainete" (Sovereignty); a far cry indeed from "province" or "colony", a foreshadowing of the independence to come. And it was so recognized at the time. It was meant, Lord Carnarvon told the Queen, just before the Act was passed, "to give greater dignity to the commencement of this great scheme." "Canada", said Edward Blake in 1876, "is not a colony or a province; she is a Dominion, under an Imperial charter which expressly recites that her Constitution is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom".
