Fifth, it asserted the "lordship," the primacy of the new nation over its parts. Canada was to be "one Dominion . . . divided into four provinces." The Fathers of Confederation had an immense respect for American federalism. But they had a horror of the "States' rights" doctrine which had nearly destroyed it in the Civil War, and they were determined to have nothing of that sort here. "The Americans," said Macdonald, "commenced at the wrong end" by giving the central Government specific powers and reserving everything else "to the States and to the people." "Here," he continued, "we have adopted a different system. We have not only given the General Government all the powers which are incident to sovereignty, but we have expressly declared that all subjects of general interest not distinctly and exclusively conferred upon the local Governments and Legislatures shall be conferred upon the General Government and Legislature. We thus make the Confederation one Government and one people, not five Governments and five peoples, one united province with the local Governments and Legislatures subordinate to the General Government and Legislature."

They made assurance doubly sure by giving the Dominion paramount power over immigration and agriculture, power to appoint Senators and Judges, power to appoint, instruct and remove Lieutenant-Governors, power to disallow provincial Acts, power to protect the educational rights and privileges of Protestant and Roman Catholic minorities. They even provided for the transfer of the whole law of property and civil rights, except in Quebec, to the Dominion. Canadian federalism was our own, not an import from the United States; and we emphasized that fact by giving our central Government our own name for it, "Dominion," instead of importing the American term, "federal."

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude this part with these words:

What is the fourth thing that makes Canada unique among American nations? Our membership in the Commonwealth, that world-wide free association of free nations which we have done so much to create, which Sir John A. Macdonald foresaw and sketched as long ago as 1865, whose corner-stone he laid on the first Dominion Day, and towards whose completion he worked with unexampled skill, patience and courage. This also is part of the meaning of Dominion Day. This also we ought to celebrate with full and thankful hearts.

Canada became a nation through hard work, initiative, co-operation, pride, and brotherly love, as well as respect for the efforts of our pioneers. Canada can remain a nation in which we continue to take pride if we all, as brothers and sisters in this family of provinces, and as a sister in a group of 40 countries, work together for the betterment of all Canadians, putting politics aside. Today it would seem to me politics and politicians are creating the feeling of discontent, not the residents of any one member of our family of provinces.

To change the name of this country would not alter the people's background, would not remove their culture or their heritage, any more than a person can change the colour of eyes or hair by changing the name he or she now has.

In closing, I want to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that there is a great deal of discussion taking place among the provincial and federal governments and among the Canadian people as a whole. It would seem to me this is not the proper time for us to discuss these small details that pertain to our over-all constitutional development.

I thank you for the opportunity of allowing me to bring these thoughts to the attention of this House at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, in reading the very brief but very abrasive amendments called for in Bill C-232, entitled "a bill to amend the Holidays Act", I do not hesitate to say that I was appalled by the explanatory note that is included. The note refers to the word "dominion" in the Holidays Act as being divisive. This indicates to me that the hon. member presenting this bill, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), surely has never read the words of his fellow party member, some of which were quoted by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). I refer to the words of Senator Eugene Forsey on the term "Dominion Day".

May I just take a few more minutes to enlighten members of the House on his comments from an article written a number of years ago entitled "The Meaning of Dominion Day". I will just quote some of the excerpts which I think are particularly apropos in the discussion this afternoon. The first is as follows:

The Fathers originally wanted to call the new nation "the Kingdom of Canada." But the Americans raised such a storm that the British Government took fright, and insisted on something else. The Fathers, for their part, insisted on something that would mark the new and higher status of the federation.

Sir Leonard Tilley, a great New Brunswicker, produced a solution from the Bible, the Book of Psalms, the 72nd Psalm, verse 8. I should like to quote from that, and perhaps we should read this more often in this House. It states in part:

He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

There are other excellent quotations which I think would be very apropos in this particular debate this afternoon. The article continues by stating that Sir Leonard's colleagues agreed with him, the Queen gladly consented and "Dominion" became the new nation.

Senator Forsey continued in his article as follows:

The title was a particularly happy one, for more reasons than one. First, and most obviously, it embodied the determination of the Fathers to bring into the Union all the British North American colonies from Newfoundland to British Columbia: "a mari usque ad mare," as our coat-of-arms says. It declared the "manifest destiny" of Canada to rule from the St. Lawrence to the North Pole.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is from the Arctic to the 49th parallel and from the Pacific to the Atlantic. The article continues as follows:

Second, and more important, is emphasized the religious basis of the new nation. Who was to have "dominion"? The King of Israel, the Lord's Anointed: the King, under God.

Third, it proclaimed the basic fact of our two cultures. For "Dominion" is not Anglo-Saxon. It is an old French word which dropped out of use in French but was preserved in our English Bible and our English Book of Common Prayer.

Fourth, it proclaimed, no less unmistakably, our new status. The French translation of "Dominion" is "Puissance," (Power); "Souveraineté", (Sovereignty); a far cry indeed from "province" or "colony," a foreshadowing of the independence to come.

● (1720)

Senator Forsey continues:

We celebrate, or we ought to celebrate on Dominion Day, four things—the continuity of our history; the duality of our cultures; parliamentary responsible government; and our membership in the Commonwealth.

The term "Dominion Day" denotes our history. It denotes our strength and it denotes our freedom. What word could more represent unity than "Dominion," from sea to sea? How can such a word be divisive? The Fathers of Confederation called our birthday Dominion Day. They called our country a dominion. It was christened that name. Surely to goodness 23 million or 25 million people in this country could not just go out and change their names. That is not the purpose. Dominion Day is history and it is the birth of our nation which we celebrate on July 1. It is the birth of our nation from sea to sea that we celebrate.

The term "dominion" came into being because of the birth of our nation. The name "Canada" was already in use before confederation in 1867. Therefore, it is definitely Dominion Day that we celebrate, not Canada Day. To proclaim July 1 Canada Day would be changing our history. I realize that the present government has the power to change our future, but I would hope that it is not powerful enough to change our past. Actions such as this can only be termed disgusting, distasteful and disrespectful to the Fathers of Confederation, who obviously chose the name "dominion" realizing the duality of our cultures and the foundation on which Canada was based.

Last year the government spent approximately $3.5 million on Canada Day. This money was spent on something that will not even exist unless this bill is passed. I wonder if the government would like to see this bill pass simply to give them a reason for their very lenient spending and their madness with money.

Before this day last year I questioned the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) about the matter of funds being used for something which was not yet law. At that time I asked the Secretary of State if his department or any department of the federal government had proclaimed July 1 as Canada Day. July 1 is still Dominion Day. At that time I asked if the minister would inform the House whether the government, and in particular his department, intended to discontinue the law of this House and this nation in this connection and if it intended to introduce legislation to change Dominion Day to Canada Day. As hon. members may recall, the reply was minimal and useless, not to mention inadequate. In effect the minister stated that he believed that the Governor General may very well issue such a proclamation. He did not know on what date this would occur and he continued by saying that the government intended to celebrate Canada Day on Dominion Day again this year. It was a typical, irresponsible ministerial answer.

The government went ahead last year despite the law and misused their privileges in so far as the people of this country are concerned. How can any government ignore laws of this kind? How can the government ignore such heritage? How can the hon. member who introduced this bill ignore our history and past, of which all Canadians can and should be proud? The hon. member and the government ought to be reminded of the fact that ignorance may be bliss in the short term but to possess ignorance as one's attribute is certainly not a good thing.

The government has ignored the reality of past tradition. The hon. member presenting this bill is ignoring our past history. I quite agree that certain changes should be made in the government, hopefully very soon, and in the governing of any country, but we cannot change our valuable past. I do not see why the hon. member would wish to change our past history and to base it on what he alleges to be divisiveness. Our history is one of which we should be proud. I am sure that my ancestors are proud of the history of this nation and I hope that the hon. member is also.

What is implied by the name "Canada"? It does not imply the over-all country because that is implied only in the name "dominion". I would further remind the hon. member that the name Canada, although it is also a name of which we should be proud, was first employed in reference to provinces in the names of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, not the whole country. Therefore the term Canada Day does not apply to our over-all history.

I wonder whether the hon. member has taken the time and had the foresight to buy himself a chisel so that he might continue to change the name "dominion" where it is found on our beautiful Parliament Buildings? Does he intend to banish the gargoyles from the Peace Tower which symbolize our dominion from sea to sea and thereby give the literary meaning of "dominion" to the tower? Does the hon. member intend to restructure the arches over each entrance, especially the one over the east entrance which reads "Ye also shall have dominion from sea to sea"?

I make these statements not only to ridicule the presentation of such a bill, but to ridicule its application. The bill is nonsense and ridiculous. In taking the name dominion out of our Holidays Act, the hon. member is creating divisiveness. he is changing our history which will certainly divide the country on the ground of historian versus historian. He is changing the terms used by our forefathers and removing the word dominion, which will certainly divide the country between those who respect it and those, if any, who do not.

The hon. member would also be changing the name of the day on which we celebrate our christening from a term taken from the 72nd Psalm to one which, although meaningful, has no religious background. Surely as a nation we should be proud to have in our history and tradition a name that has religious connotation. It will certainly cause the religious persons in our country, of which there are many, to be alarmed, but I guess the hon. member likes the word "division" or "divisive", because that is exactly what the bill is.

I would guess that the hon. member is simply following government policy in his beliefs. For the event of our last celebration of Canada Day, that expensive bandwagon effort, songs were composed. The English song was named, "Canada, I want to shake your hand", while the French song was called "Canada, a beautiful country—a free country." Would the hon. member like to see two kinds of Canadas, two meanings to the day which celebrates the birth of our nationhood, two celebrations, one in French and one in English? Surely not. But that would appear to be the reasoning because the word "dominion" cannot be deleted on the excuse that it is a divisive word. It is an English word and a French word, a word which means the same in both languages and pleases everyone. Why take away this word which means the same thing in both our official languages? Is it all part of a plot to divide this country?

There can be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the word dominion was used to imply dominion from sea to sea. There is no doubt that the word dominion denotes unity and, therefore, cannot be considered to mean divisiveness. I am reminded of an incident when I was on tour with some constituents from Moncton. We were looking at the tower and I explained to my constituents that the gargoyles were like arms stretching from sea to sea and that our dominion was signified in the height, the power and strength portrayed in the tower. A constituent asked if it would not be possible to make the arm facing Quebec a little longer. Of course, this could not be done because it would mean changing a structure which stands for all to see and as a symbol of our freedom and our heritage.

[Mr. Jones.]

If the hon. member presenting this bill would like to change the name Dominion Day to Canada Day in order to please that group in Quebec which does not approve of our country or our heritage, then he would be changing our heritage just as if he were changing the gargoyles on the tower. It should not be done. It will create even more disharmony, and will make this country bend in the wrong direction. We cannot change history or tradition, nor should we wish to change something that we as Canadians should be proud of.

I close by reminding the House of what Senator Forsey said in his final words about the meaning of Dominion Day. He said:

● (1730)

> The Fathers of Confederation laboured, and we have entered into their labours not just the fruits of their labours: their labours. What they built, we must work to keep and enlarge. We can do it, but only if, in the words of Arthur Meighen, we remain conscious of our mighty heritage, proud of the imperial fountain of our freedom and of the flag that floats above us, worthy of those ideals of British liberty and justice which have sent their light forth and their truth among the races of all men.

We must build upon the works of our forefathers, upon the works of the Fathers of Confederation. We must not change their ideals. We should be proud of our heritage and our ideals. We should not condemn and change them. We should not tear asunder what our forefathers have built well for us.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, like those who have preceded me on the floor this afternoon, I am proud of the term "dominion" for my country. It is derived from worthy origins. I am at a loss to understand how any member of this House could venture into using the terminology the hon. member did in explaining why he felt moved to bring this bill forward to eliminate the divisiveness caused by this word; anything but divisive is the word "dominion."

[Translation]

I take the liberty of quoting from the Littré dictionary. I imagine that it is a derivative or another form of the word. "Dominion", which is the English equivalent, could lead to some misunderstanding or division. Perhaps it is the word "to dominate" which has led to that division but I see in Littré that the word comes from the Latin dominari, dominus, master. There is nothing objectionable about the word master. For example, they say in Quebec "master in our own house", meaning to dominate the country. But I read the meaning of the word. It is an intransitive verb which means: to rule supremely, to have supremacy over, to reign, or in wider sense, we can also read in Littré: to have influence, power, to surpass, to prevail. There is even a deprecatory meaning of the word, but I protest because there is no deprecatory meaning to the word "dominion."

[English]

Here again I turn to Littré where the word "dominion" appears as having been borrowed in 1872 from the Littré supplement.

[Translation]

I quote: "The English word meaning domination, power, applied for the first time by the British Parliament to Canada in 1867."

[English]

I see nothing objectionable about that. It is perfectly normal and perfectly respectable and something of which to be proud. Those who have preceded me have mentioned the origin of the word "dominion." They have traced it to the Psalms. It is worth citing not only the verse from the Psalms in English, but the same verse in French should be noted. I read from Psalm 72, the eighth verse. It reads:

He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

We find the French reads as follows:

[Text]

Il dominera de la mer à la mer, du fleuve jusqu'aux bouts de la terre.

[English]

What is objectionable about that? That is Canada "from sea to sea." What this proposal ventures to do is to remove the word "dominion" from our motto "from sea to sea". These words are related in that one citation from the Psalms: "dominion . . . from sea to sea". We still have "A Mari Usque ad Mare" under our coats of arms. Why are hon. members trying to remove the word "dominion"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I will come to another point. It is not just found in the Psalms. I see someone woke up on the other side. Also it is to be found in Zechariah, chapter nine, verse ten; perhaps not too many people know about this. It reads:

—and his dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth.

[Translation]

In French it reads as follows: "Son empire ira de la mer à la mer et du fleuve aux extrémités de la terre." The word "empire" is used in this case and not dominion or it will dominate, because it is a noun rather than a verb.

[English]

Surely that is really what this country is trying to do: to have its empire, its power, its strength from sea to sea. Yet we have a member on the government side proposing that that notion be destroyed.

An hon. Member: Canada, sea to sea.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I did not see Canada in any version of the Bible that I was able to find, with all due respect.

An hon. Member: You stick to the Bible and we will stick to history.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I had something to do with the making of this history too, and I hope the hon. member did.

Now I will deal with this possible origin of the divisiveness characteristic of this word. I may have found it. The word "dominion" has nothing pejorative about it at all in the English language. In the shorter Oxford I read that it is derived from the Latin dominionem from dominium, which is a concept in Roman law meaning lordship, ownership, property. That is perfectly straightforward and that is perfectly applicable to a nation which is coming together to unite and have a power in its own right. There is a further definition which is the power or right of governing or controlling. Perhaps the mover of this particular motion would be prepared to negotiate that one fifth or maybe four fifths. Dominion means there is no negotiation. It means one nation.

Perhaps, where we run into trouble is in the variant to dominion to dominate or to domineer. They are semantic differences. The origins are somewhat different but we can sense them. There is something pejorative in dominating and domineering because those words relate to arbitrary rule, despotic or imperialistic rule. That is not what we intend by the word dominion. If anyone is trying to seek a means of eliminating the division in this country, I ask him to go back to the flag debate and read the thousands of pages of Hansard to see the division that that created. It took a long time. I know there are many who are not happy with the flag which is now ours, but they accept it because the flag under which Canadians fought and died has been removed.

Why was that done? Because it had a Union Jack on it. They did not stop to think that Hawaii, the fiftieth state of the United States, still has a Union Jack on its flag, as does South Africa. Maybe if we could get the council of churches out of there we would be all right and it would stay there. If I am not mistaken, Newfoundland has the Union Jack as its flag.

Why are we seeking to eliminate the divisiveness? I think someone is trying to create it rather than eliminate it. There has been a general campaign by this government. It has been obvious since I have been in this House that the government is trying to eliminate all royal symbols and emblems. Is that in order to eliminate divisiveness?

Let us remember that there are people in this country who may venerate these symbols and emblems. Why are you going to walk over them? Why not recognize that we in this House have certain attachments to traditions and heritage? Granted, this government not long ago fostered a heritage movement. It is not a department of heritage, but a heritage commission or something like that, which will preserve that from the past which is invaluable.

Terminology, tradition, and even the flag are parts of our heritage that should be preserved. I spoke of the Post Office. "Royal Mail" no longer exists. It is now "Canada Mail, Poste Canada." Let us look at the origin of the fleur-de-lis. It had its origin in the personal flag of Louis XIV. That is a royal emblem, so what are they kicking about?

The royal escutcheon and the Canadian escutcheon were eliminated for a time from RCMP vehicles. In the Post Office there is no longer royal mail.

I read the article that Senator Forsey wrote in 1956 wherein he reminded us that our first title was Kingdom of Canada. I think a kingdom without a personal king in residence is a difficult concept to get hold of, but not dominion. That is fine. Had we stuck with Kingdom of Canada, I bet that some of the anti-royalists around here would soon move to have that name eliminated.

As my friend, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), mentioned toward the end of his speech, part of our tradition is the Commonwealth. I find it tragically ironic that the day after we celebrated Commonwealth Day as guests of the Commonwealth high commissioners we are here trying to eliminate the divisiveness caused by the word dominion which is part of the Commonwealth. I do not understand what the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) has going for him or what he thinks. I do not know where he found this divisiveness. He should move about the country to see how much divisiveness there would be if this bill should become law.

An hon. Member: Rubbish!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is not rubbish. It is absolutely true. I was born in this country and I know all about that. I represent a part of the country which is proudly in favour of dominion. It was proudly in favour of the Red Ensign because they fought under it. Let us not have any of this divisiveness nonsense. Canada is the name, dominion is our title.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I would like to review for a few moments the history of the continuing campaign to destroy the heritage and symbols of this country of which we are so proud, Canada. This has occurred over the years I have been privileged to represent the people of Palliser in this chamber.

In 1970 Mr. James Brown, then the hon. member for Brant, the great grandson of George Brown, one of the Fathers of Confederation, introduced a similar bill. When it was sent to the justice and legal affairs committee, some interesting things happened. I was a member of the committee at that time. After hearing from Dr. Eugene Forsey, now Senator Forsey, a great and learned gentleman, the committee decided it would not accept the term Canada Day. It passed an amendment to the bill calling for a change in name from Dominion Day to Confederation Day. I am not here this afternoon to promote Confederation Day. I am here to promote the maintenance of Dominion Day, a proud and glorious name for the anniversary of the birthday of this great nation.

I wish to refer to an editorial in the Calgary Herald for Saturday, March 14, 1970, nine years tomorrow, headed "Desecration". I quote from the article:

Erosion of those historic traditions which gave Canada its distinctive character continues at a rapid pace.

It is now nine years later and the prediction of the Herald on that occasion has not been as they thought. The editorial continues:

Now there are people in Ottawa's governing circles who wish to expunge the term Dominion from living memory, even though it was conferred as title upon this nation more than a century ago and was made binding by usage and custom thereafter.

● (1750)

Mr. James Brown, a Liberal MP from Brant, Ontario, has a bill before the Commons' justice committee which would change the name of Canada's national birthday from Dominion Day to Canada Day. It would further distort history and pervert it to the use of nothing more than holiday convenience by having it fall on the first Monday in July, rather than on its legitimate date of July 1.

With this sort of thing going on during the past several years, it is small wonder that many older Canadians are wondering what is happening to their country and many younger Canadians are growing up not caring about it in the least.

Dr. Eugene Forsey, a political scientist, pointed out to the committee that the title Dominion is entrenched in the British North America Act, the nation's constitution. In other words, it is law. Not that this means very much to parliamentarians any more, considering acts that they pass which are of extremely doubtful constitutional validity.

The committee, making one of those empty gestures toward public opinion which have become commonplace of late, decided to postpone further consideration of the bill until after Easter. This would allow the public to comment upon the idea.

If participatory democracy follows its established course, no one will pay the slightest attention to what the Canadian people may think and another act of vandalism against the country's honorable heritage will be perpetrated.

Canadians used to sneer at the Russian Communists for rewriting history, making the past conform to present political expediency. Canadians need laugh no longer at others when they contemplate what is being done to their own past history. They can only weep.

Those words were written nine years ago tomorrow but, as far as I am concerned, the situation could not be more aptly expressed than it was in that editorial.

The effort by the government to change the name continued. In May of 1972 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told us he hoped to have legislation passed in time for July 1 of that year. That came to naught. In 1975, another effort was made; fortunately, it too, failed. In 1977 the government again introduced legislation to change the name. The Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) stated in correspondence that he was trying to respond to the views of certain Canadians. He never told us who they were, though; there has never been an adequate explanation of the need for this change. I have to say I received many letters on that occasion in opposition to such a change, some of them from young children. I received a petition from six-year old, seven-year old, and eight-year old children attending the J. K. Malloy school in Calgary saying, "Please, Mr. Roberts, keep the name 'Dominion Day' because it means something to us."

What concerns me more than anything else is the fact that the government frequently violates the law of the land, for example, by allowing the CBC—I might even say encouraging it—to use the words "Canada Day" on every occasion upon which it refers to the birthday of this country on July 1. The CBC should be using the term "Dominion Day", the legal name for that day.

It disturbs me to find the government constantly trying to subvert the law when it lacks the gumption to change that law. I hope that if this bill receives its just desserts it will go to the bottom of the order paper and remain there until the end of this parliament. I trust there will be no move to revive it by unanimous consent, no sneaky tactics for bringing it back again, and that we shall see the end of it. For nine years this measure has encountered concerted opposition. There is no real feeling in the House in favour of passing it. I hope this business will stop and that the government will respect the law and ask the CBC to use the proper term in the future for our nation's birthday.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, because of the established strength and greatness of this country, this broad Dominion of Canada, I would not have thought it necessary that any member of the House should take up time on this or any other day in an effort to change the name of our great national holiday, Dominion Day, which was laid down by the Fathers of Confederation, to some other name. I am proud to speak on behalf of most of the citizens of the constituency of Frontenac-Lennox and Addington who prefer to maintain the name "Dominion Day".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alkenbrack: This private member's bill with its negative purpose, put forward by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), reminds me that this is a day and age in which being erratic is as common as anything. The hon. member is acting in a manner which is consistent only with the erratic legislative records of the Trudeau government. The Liberals pretend to espouse and talk of unity, but out of their perfidy comes a bill like the bill before us, described as an act respecting national unity. I would draw attention to the word "respecting". I realize time is limited, but I thought I might sum up my feelings by quoting the words of a respected man who died many years ago, a man who adopted Canada as his country. I speak of that great Scottish-Canadian poet, Robert Reid.

Many members may recall this poem from their school days, and I am glad to place some of it upon our record because it best describes the love we should bear for our country, its sublime beauty, principles, and origins. Written in 1910, the poem begins as follows:

Sing me a song of the great Dominion!
Soul-felt words for a patriot's ear!
Ring out boldly the well-turned measure,
Voicing your notes that the world may hear;
Here is no starveling—Heaven forsaken—
Shrinking aside where the Nations throng;
Proud as the proudest moves she among them—
Worthy is she of a noble song!

There are a number of stanzas but I have time only to quote the first lines. The second verse begins, "Sing me the might of the giant mountains;" the third with, "Sing me the calm of her tranquil forests." In short, Canada, a dominion it is—a dominion let it remain.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

• (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and motion No. 1 (Mr. Gillespie) (p. 4047).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At five o'clock the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) had the floor, and he had five minutes remaining.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in concluding in my final five minutes I want to tell the people of Newfoundland and of Come-By-Chance, the people who want the oil refinery there that has been inoperative for three years, to open again, that there is only one chance for Come-By-Chance to open in the near future, and that is if the proposal of the First Arabian Corporation is accepted and goes forward. It is the only proposal now in play, and for that to go forward we need some action by the Government of Canada. That is the government that has failed the people of Newfoundland so lamentably in the last three years. It has made no effort to get this refinery under way again.

The things that are necessary for that refinery to go ahead are the following: First, the Government of Canada should put a real priority on offering the United States government some inducement to open their markets in the United States to the east coast refineries that are now operating at only 75 per cent of capacity. Come-By-Chance, while the First Arabian Corporation may be able to open it without that concession, both it and eastern Canadian refineries cannot operate at full capacity without access to the U.S. markets which will only come with the extension of the U.S. entitlement program to them. The government has done nothing. It is not trying to induce the United States government to open their markets. It is offering them nothing. It is indifferent. It is guilty of gross negligence and wilful and wanton misconduct in office by taking no action in that direction.

Secondly, to reopen our refinery at Come-By-Chance we need an award to be offered to First Arabian or to the successful proposer of a deal for at least ten years at a nominal rent. It is of no value to the Government of Canada as it now is. They are getting no revenue on it. They never will unless the refinery operates again. That should go to First Arabian now at a nominal rent.

Thirdly, we need a guarantee from the Government of Canada that the powers they are taking under the legislation now before this House will not be used to interrupt exports of refined products from the Come-By-Chance oil refinery for at least a period of something like five to ten years. Otherwise, they cannot get the financing to re-open that refinery, nor can anyone else.

The fourth point is that this group now needs some assistance from DREE. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion should make assistance available to the group that wants to take over this refinery, which has to spend $50 million to put it into proper shape so that it will employ 500 people. DREE assistance should be made available to them to do that to create those jobs in Newfoundland again and the Atlantic provinces.

Fifthly, there needs to be some clarification on their tax position with respect to the companies that are going to supply oil to the refinery and market it.

If the Government of Canada does what is necessary in those directions, then the agency of the Government of Canada, FIRA, the Foreign Investment Review Agency, has to approve the application from this group for a transfer of ownership to foreign-controlled entrepreneurs. We know that there is no company in Canada, no group in Canada that wants to take over and operate this refinery, so that should be automatic, but there should be no delay or any waste of time in the application that goes to FIRA.

We also need, in that connection, quick approval by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland of the only proposal that has been put forward and found in three years' time that satisfies the receivers under the first mortgage. We need quick approval from the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, and we need the co-operation of dissident groups such as the Shaheen group, that they not try to appeal or delay any decision in this matter because of their own interest.

Mr. Shaheen has made a proposal. Mr. Shaheen had the refinery, which resulted in one of the greatest and largest bankruptcies in the history of Canada, a $600 million bankruptcy. Mr. Shaheen and his other companies took out of the Newfoundland refinery and the provincial refinery companies $50 million which was loaned to those companies by Japanese interests, and they have not repaid that sum. The trustee in the bankruptcy is now suing in the United States trying to get the $50 million back.

How can anyone take seriously a proposal from that group which has already removed $50 million and had the greatest bankruptcy in the history of Canada in Come-By-Chance, particularly when one of the aspects of it involves a commitment on behalf of Newfoundland and Labrador hydro that all their oil products should be bought from that refinery so that they can borrow money on the strength of that as part of their proposal?

To get that refinery open we need to overcome these obstacles so that in March of 1980 construction can start leading to the reopening of that refinery in 1981. If that is not done, if the Canadian government does not take these steps, if it does not do the things I am suggesting should be done, if it does not fall into line in the next several months with respect to the points I have made, then the refinery at Come-By-Chance will not open.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, did I not get unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre).

Mr. Crosbie: The Liberal party is preventing this refinery from being reopened. It is the Liberal party that people in Come-By-Chance will notice. They are preventing the case from being put before the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: We do not like clowns in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I definitely heard someone say no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: The government has said no and they have been saying no for three years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member will please resume his seat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Calgary Centre has the floor.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: There is no doubt that you are another clown.

Mr. Andre: The Liberals are not interested and indeed, in all seriousness, the fact is that one of the tragedies of this whole energy situation is the failure of the government, the failure of that group of people, to realize the opportunities in the energy sector for employment, for investment, and for economic growth that Canada has.

It is interesting to note that since the OPEC embargo in 1973 which started the whole energy fiasco, Canada has been in an unique position compared to the other nations of the industrial western world. We have been the only nation which has had significant available supplies of oil and gas. Nations like the United States import large amounts of oil and gas. Nations like Germany, Japan, Switzerland, and The Netherlands, import virtually 100 per cent of their oil and gas. Yet every single one of the countries I have just mentioned has had an economic performance far outstripping Canada's. Every single one of those countries which imports its crude oil and natural gas has trade surpluses that are growing. Every single one of those countries has a currency that is stronger than Canada's.

When you look at the opportunities, the base strength that Canada has in its oil and gas, and when you look at the performance of our economy under the direction of that group of incompetents, and compare it with the performance of countries like Japan, Germany, Switzerland and The Netherlands, you have to reach the conclusion that something is wrong. We are not doing very well, given the opportunity we have of being self-sufficient. You have to be some kind of simpleton, a little soft in the head, to believe that Petro-Canada is going to change all that, that now we will suddenly start doing very well because we have a Crown corporation. As a matter of fact we have over 400 Crown corporations, growing like dandelions in April or May. If Crown corporations are the answer to our problems—I see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) smiling—how come that all our Crown corporations in the transportation sector cannot cure our problems there?

We have a Crown corporation in the airline business, a Crown corporation in the railway business, and a Crown corporation in shipping. We have about 50 Crown corporations in the transportation sector alone. With all those wonderful Crown corporations, headed by all the brilliant people whom the Government of Canada appoints to head these operations, people like Bryce Mackasey, we should not have any problems in transportation; everything should be cured. If Crown corporations are the answer, why do we have any problems? You have to be soft in the head to believe that Petro-Canada, a Crown corporation, is going to cure our energy problems. You have to be soft in the head to think you can appoint former civil servants to be president and vice-president of this group and expect it will be a wonderful organization which will cure all our problems.

This amendment proposed by the minister to make Petro-Canada the minister's representative on the standing group on emergency questions within the International Energy Agency, is a bunch of pre-election fluff designed to create the impression that, by having this Crown corporation, the government is looking after Canada's interest in this agency in Paris, that somehow we will be better off, that somehow this will make us better off. The rationale was incredible.

The minister said we had to have Petro-Canada because there would be multinationals advising other countries who sat on this group and that, without our own multinational to advise us, we might be shortchanged by these shifty people in the alliance. Basically that was his rationale. It is interesting to note, when you go down the list of countries that have signed the IEA agreement, that Norway has a Crown corporation, but the United States does not, the United Kingdom does not, Germany does not, Belgium does not, and Denmark does not. Indeed, if you look at that list you find that none of those countries listed there have control over the multinationals about which the minister is so concerned.

This motion is absurd on the face of it. It has more to do with an upcoming general election than with trying to seek a satisfactory legislative arrangement to deal with any future energy crisis which the country might face. It is almost as absurd as the minister's statement this morning that Petro-Canada was going to purchase 100,000 barrels of oil from Venezuela. Look at the situation that Petro-Canada would face. Every western industrialized nation is a net importer of energy. Every country will have felt the pinching in one way and another in the cutback of Iranian supplies. Therefore it is logical to assume that every single one of these western industrialized nations, every single oil importing nation, will be in Venezuela now negotiating with the Venezuelan oil companies arranging some sweetheart deal to offset the oil which they lost from Iran.

In the United States alone there must be 50 companies which import crude oil from one place or another to supply their customers. Every single one of those companies will be negotiating with the Venezuelan national oil company. Right now Venezuelans are being chased and courted by scores of companies. Possibly it is 100, but certainly there are well over 50 different companies and countries wishing to purchase fuel oil to look after their needs because of the disruption from Iran. Could we be so naive as to believe that Petro-Canada will be able to go to Caracas and say, "Alastair Gillespie sent us. Could you please sell us 100,000 barrels a day indefinitely into the future?"

An hon. Member: Better going there than going to Peter Lougheed.

Mr. Andre: That is a comment, "Better going there than going to Peter Lougheed"! Will that outstanding Canadian identify himself? He would rather buy oil from Venezuela than from other Canadians. My, my, my, are we not pleased to have an outstanding Canadian like that in the House?

It is absolutely absurd to suggest Petro-Canada will get anything except a door slammed in its face when it goes to Venezuela. What possible reason could there be for Venezuela to cut off one of its other customers to deliver 100,000 extra barrels of oil to Petro-Canada? What possible reason could Venezuela have to do that? Do we have some sweetheart arrangement with Venezuela? Does Venezuela have a soft spot in its heart for Canada and Petro-Canada? If it does, I am not aware of it, and I would be surprised if any other Canadian is aware of it.

In a sellers' market, which is what we are in with oil, why would the seller bend over backward to do a special deal with Canada, one of 100 buyers knocking on its door? Venezuela is producing to capacity. It has not additional capacity to sell. In order for Venezuela to direct 100,000 barrels of oil a day to Petro-Canada it would have to be subtracted from one of its other customers. Why would they do it? Can anyone provide a possible explanation as to why that might happen?

Last Tuesday or Wednesday in committee the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) was asked by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes): why not have Petro-Canada buy all of Canada's offshore oil supplies? The minister replied quite accurately that it would be a tragedy, it would be doing damage to the national oil company, and it would destroy the national oil company if it is sent into that market place with instructions to buy all of Canada's energy. It is a sophisticated, complex market, with hundreds and hundreds of players. Given the fact that Petro-Canada is run by a couple of ex-public servants, it would get eaten alive in that market place and it would be destroyed. That was the minister's reply last Tuesday. Suddenly he said today that he thinks there is more political opportunity to have a fight with Jack Armstrong of Imperial Oil and threaten him with Petro-Canada. That is the decision the minister made. He should go back and read what he said last Tuesday because he was right.

The suggestion that Petro-Canada will be able to negotiate a sweetheart deal with Venezuela is a bunch of pre-election fluff. The only hope the minister has is that Venezuela will not say no until after the election is held. Then people will not hold the minister responsible for this piece of nonsense.

There is only one solution to Canada's problems and that is for us to become self-sufficient in energy. That is not whistling in the wind, or pie in the sky. It is absolutely possible within the near future. It is absurd for Canada to continue in the position where Canadians in eastern Canada, Atlantic Canada and Quebec are being held at ransom and are being threatened continually by unstable sources of offshore oil. It is absurd to continue that posture when we can and should be self-sufficient. We could be that way soon.

Hon. members opposite are great admirers of Petro-Canada. I should like to refer to a quote from the Calgary Herald of February 23. It was an interview with William Hopper, the President of Petro-Canada, by Garry Fairbairn of the Canadian Press. In part the article reads:

> If Ottawa and the provinces would only come up with the right tax and royalty rules he says, multibillion dollar plants would spring up in the Alberta oil sands and Canada would be self-sufficient in oil within 20 years.
> "I hope the federal and provincial governments get their acts straightened away to the point where they can make those projects viable. And they can be viable.
> "Christ, I mean we can build a dozen plants up there and become self-sufficient in the nineties if we had the political will to settle our problems and to get the tax regimes and the incentives down so that we would suck in the private sector money to make them go.
> "It's as simple as that."

That was said by the President of Petro-Canada, and he is dead right. It is as simple as that. It is about time we stopped playing the stupid political game of picking phony fights with Imperial Oil, and got on with the main problem of making the country self-sufficient. We should stop picking fights with Peter Lougheed, Bill Davis, and Imperial Oil. We should get on with the business of making the country self-sufficient. Then the government would be fulfilling its responsibilities.

Mr. Lang: It is Peter Lougheed who is picking a fight with Bill Davis.

Mr. Andre: The Minister of Transport has a very short memory. He does not recall the incident of September 8, 1973, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) unilaterally, without discussion, and after promising he would not do so, imposed a price freeze. The minister does not remember that. Perhaps he remembers the budget of May, 1974, when his former colleague, the newsletter writer from Toronto, introduced a budget which disallowed royalties from income tax deductions and brought the industry to a grinding, screeching halt. Perhaps the minister does not remember that bit of treachery. If the minister wants to look back at who caused those battles, he can look back at the facts.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stood up before the committee and made the statement that it is up to Lougheed to get the tar sands going, and the leader of the Liberal party in Alberta said, "Fire Gillespie, fire Gillespie; he is incompetent." One cannot stand back and say that the problem is coming from there.

Mr. Lang: Is the hon. member supporting the provincial leader of the Liberal party?

Mr. Andre: No, I am not supporting the Liberal leader in any province or in Canada.

Mr. Lang: It sounds like it. You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Andre: The Minister of Transport would suggest that he and his colleagues in government have been sweet reasoned. I would point out that everyone else in the country disagrees with the minister, including his own Liberal party partisans.

Mr. Lang: If the hon. member disagrees with him, then he is on our side.

Mr. Andre: Even the Liberals in Alberta are not wrong all the time; they are just misguided.

On the face of it the motion is absurd. It is absolutely unnecessary. It has nothing to do with trying to save Canada from any energy crisis. It has a lot to do with the upcoming election and what the minister and his colleagues perceive to be a good election issue.

There is one other aspect I should like to mention, the power and authority the bill grants this government and the possibility of abuse of that power and authority. The case has been made that if we face a real crisis, if our crude oil is cut off, the government needs the power to implement allocation and rationing so that Canadians do not suffer unduly and that there will be some spreading of the burden. No one disagrees with that.

I would remind the House that at one time the government introduced a bill which said that in the event of war it needed the power to implement drastic measures to protect the country from war and its consequences. The House agreed and passed the War Measures Act. At the same point in time this government said it needed the power to protect national secrets and to prevent enemies of Canada from gaining access to secrets as this might damage the security of this country. This House agreed and allowed the government to pass the Official Secrets Act. I wonder if Dr. Peter Treu or Mr. Worthington could offer any example of what happens when excessive power is put into the hands of people who sometimes wield that power irresponsibly? I wonder when we are ever going to get the facts about the implementation of the War Measures Act in 1970?

We have had examples of what happens when this government realizes it can utilize the tremendous powers it has been granted by parliament, even though the situation may not be precisely the same as parliament anticipated when it passed the acts granting that power. This measure contains within it precisely the same kinds of powers and the same kind of excessive authority contained in the War Measures Act and the Official Secrets Act. We have evidence that this government can abuse its powers. There are people over there now, there have been in the past and we can anticipate that there may be some in the future, who can and will abuse that kind of power.

We have the example of Dr. Treu and other Canadians who have been the victims of that kind of abusive use of power. When we realize that, we must stand back and take a look at what we are doing. We must ask ourselves whether we are not now experiencing the same kind of crisis election issue that might be exploited or lied about; are we not damaging our responsibilities here; and, are we not damaging the country by giving this or any government or state that kind of authority? I certainly would not and do not rest easy when allowing this government that kind of authority, given the manner in which it has abused this authority in the past, and given the possibility that people like them might come to power in the future and be tempted to abuse these powers again.

I see that my time is practically up, Mr. Speaker, and regrettably—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): First, Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment for some time on the main point or the main criticism that has just been made by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). He suggested that the proposition made by the minister to amend the bill is absurd. And to understand all its "absurdity" I shall read again an excerpt from it. It says and I quote:

> The Board shall study and keep under review all matters relevant to a full understanding of the international petroleum supply situation and shall from time to time report thereon to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources together with such recommendations as appear to the Board to be appropriate and relevant to ensuring that Canada is fully prepared to meet any petroleum supply emergency with well prepared and timely plans for action.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Calgary Centre suggests that it would be absurd to ask the board to look into the international situation for the purpose of understanding better the over-all market condition, to introduce a piece of legislation providing for a triggering mechanism for the allocation of crude supplies and, at a later stage, for the rationing of oil products. He would prefer to leave the government without sound reasons or arguments to decide that an emergency situation exists.

A number of people, including the hon. member and a few of his colleagues, have often wondered why there is no definition of an emergency situation in the bill. I even remember, Mr. Speaker, that the Ontario government representative deplored in his notes to the committee that there was no definition of an emergency situation. When we examine closely the amendment proposed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and resources (Mr. Gillespie), we realize that the purpose of the review and surveillance is precisely to obtain facts, follow a situation and see it develop, in order to be able to decide when the time comes, whether an emergency situation exists. Mr. Speaker, I fail to see—in fact, I see the contrary—how one can ask for a definition of a state of emergency in the bill and then claim that the amendment of the minister is absurd. Indeed, the amendment meets one of those objectives by asking that the board study and keep under review all matters relevant to a full understanding of the international petroleum supply situation, as well as the domestic one, to then give advice, information and recommendations to the government and so enable it to judge advisedly the situation.

Mr. Speaker I should like to make a second comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary Centre when he says that it is absolutely absurd for Petro-Canada, which belongs to all Canadians, to obtain 100,000 barrels more from Venezuela. I ask him: And why not? I feel that the hon. member does not show much faith in a company that, first of all, belongs to all Canadians, and second is headed and managed by Canadians. To my mind, Canadians have proved, in other fields of endeavour such as development, exploration and other fields of oil products activity, that they have all the talent, intelligence and resources necessary to do so. I really cannot understand why the boldness they have proved in that field and others, cannot serve them as well, as the hon. member for Calgary Centre would have us believe, in this particular instance, that of special negotiations with Venezuela.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member also showed contempt for the members of the public service of Canada, and I do not agree with him really. I do not see why being a member of the public service, someone has not got the intelligence, knowledge and imagination necessary to sit on a board of directors and to manage efficiently any company.

I hope that his colleagues do not all share his opinions because, and it is the view of hon. members on this side of the House, we have a very able public service in Canada, with the professional knowledge necessary to administer and manage properly the state property, and we are sure that civil servants can use this knowledge and those talents in other fields. If we look at the progress made by Petro-Canada, we see that those people have done a tremendous job since the establishment of that corporation.

Mr. Speaker, we must remember the objectives of the bill. Since 1973 it has become commonplace to speak of the fragility of world oil supplies. New dimensions have been added to world crude exchanges, and that is where we must look for the cause of the crises we have known from time to time. We have had another crisis recently and because of this and also because of Canada's commitments with its International Energy Agency partners, the Canadian government has seen fit to propose again to the members of this House the legislation it needs to live up to its international commitments and to ensure an equitable domestic allocation of oil products in case of a major energy crisis.

Some members have suggested that if the government had taken the proper measures we would not have to bring back this bill. In the same breath they add that the government should have this legislation, but that it is not the right time because we are not facing an emergency situation. Mr. Speaker, first I would like to comment on this last point. We are being told that the government must have this instrument or tool, but that the time is not ripe since there is no emergency. According to an old adage, Mr. Speaker, one of the government's functions is to foresee the future, to foretell the turn of events and to provide for adversities. It is really in this perspective, Mr. Speaker, that the bill was tabled. I am convinced that those hon. members opposite who are most adamant in their opposition to the bill would, if ever the country is caught in an emergency without this means to act, blame the government just as loudly for not having this legal instrument to take action in the face of an emergency.

They are obviously aware that the government's foresight will deprive them of the pleasure of blaming the government in such a situation. And we will obviously deprive them of this pleasure by giving ouselves, under this bill, the necessary means to take action should a national emergency arise.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the government has done nothing to reduce eastern Canada's dependence on imported products. We have at least reduced imports by 40 per cent, simply by extending the 315,000-barrel pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal and making supplies of Canadian crude from the producing provinces available, especially in Quebec.

Forty per cent, Mr. Speaker, is a significant reduction in eastern Canada's dependence on imported oil products.

They use this criticism to say the Progressive Conservative party has a well-established energy policy. This is something they discovered in the past fifteen days, so I was surprised indeed at their discovery. Mr. Speaker, they discovered the word "autonomy" as if that word had been put in the dictionary yesterday. Yet, several years ago the Government of Canada under the initiative of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources published a paper entitled "An Energy Strategy for Canada—Policies for Self-Reliance". Mr. Speaker, that is done, that exists, it is good, it was examined, it was considered. Furthermore they talk of a policy of autonomy as if it was a big discovery. But I am still waiting, Mr. Speaker, for them to tell me about the price we will have to pay for that policy of autonomy. What price are Canadians going to have to pay for that policy of autonomy? Well, I encourage them also to read and not only look up words in the dictionary and they will see that an excellent document about the financing of energy autonomy in Canada was published in 1977 at the request of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Mr. Speaker, those are not discoveries we have been making in the past two weeks. This government has long since been preoccupied with examining the situation and the vulnerability of Canadians in the area of energy, making Canadians aware of that situation and particularly taking aggressive and timely steps to correct the situation and making sure Canadians get the best performance in the area of energy.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but reply to certain comments made by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), I think, who spole about the refinery at Come-By-Chance. I always find it odd, Mr. Speaker, to see the great proponents, the champions of private enterprise literally come and cry in this House to plead with the government to save that endangered private enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, the only argument that the hon. member could find about Come-By-Chance was to put down Petro-Canada. By doing so, he thinks that the government will make it its duty to save Come-By-Chance. I was rather surprised to hear this, Mr. Speaker. He gave us a list of companies which are interested in re-opening Come-By-Chance. He said that these people have money and oil supplies, that there is no problem, that these companies have plenty of money.

Moreover, the hon. member said that he expected an affirmative answer from someone or another. Why do these people not take over if they can do so? Why does the hon. member, who is such a great defender of free enterprise and such a great attacker of Petro-Canada, not tell about his crying and supplications to his friends of the Newfoundland government? I imagine that he must still have a few friends in that government. If the situation—

An hon. Member: Not many!

Mr. Bussières: I am told that he does not have many left. This might well be true. It has even been said, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member did not present any serious argument. I for one quite agree with this. It is not by clowning and denigrating a government institution or a corporation which belongs to all Canadians that you can pose as a defender of private enterprise. Private enterprise does not need any cry-babies to defend itself. When the market is favourable and the private sector is sure to make money, it does not need any cry-babies to reopen refineries, and I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding the complaints of the hon. member, when the market comes back to normal, the people who are interested will put the refinery back in operation and continue to operate it.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot but repeat what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said before the members of the committee, namely that there have been and there still are ongoing meetings at the political level between the minister himself and his American colleagues, and that the officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have met their conterparts in the United States government to study this possibility to use the overcapacity of eastern Canada refineries.

As the hon. member emphasized this afternoon, Come-By-Chance is not the only place where there are problems caused by the overcapacity of eastern refineries. The situation is similar in Quebec and New Brunswick. It is highly desirable that our neighbours to the south be able to use that overcapacity of our refineries so that they can operate at full capacity.

Mr. Speaker, this bill and particularly the amendment just proposed by the minister is extremely important for all Canadians. It is important because a government cannot allow that its citizens, whose common welfare it must protect, have to suffer because of the fragility and uncertainty of a constantly changing international situation. This is precisely the purpose of this bill.

The previous bill expired automatically as it included a clause providing for the re-establishment of those measures. We shall apply them with the same discernment and determination always demonstrated by this government.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude my remarks by emphasizing once again the work accomplished by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, first of all in the field of energy conservation through various public awareness programs, through the research program aimed at finding new techniques for the utilization of renewable energy sources, and also through efforts aimed at reducing the dependency of eastern Canada and more particularly the province of Quebec on imports.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the figure I was pointing out earlier, that dependency has been reduced by 40 per cent when it became possible to direct to Montreal 315,000 barrels of crude oil from our producing provinces, from Alberta.

Those were, Mr. Speaker, the few remarks I wanted to make, and I will now give other colleagues the opportunity to speak.

● (2050)

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Question.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I notice the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) wants the question put. I do not doubt that the question will be put before the night is over, but I think it is important that first we get a few things into perspective about Petro-Canada, in particular, why the government wants to give Petro-Canada this new role with regard to the international agency.

We should consider what the rationale is behind the government being so defensive of Petro-Canada. Why has the government taken Petro-Can unto its heart and bosom to such a degree? We all know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated that his party should be on the left but no further left, whatever he means by that. Presumably the Prime Minister means that such things as Petro-Canada are not only good for what he regards as the country, but they are also very good for the Liberal party. I say this because we have something in Petro-Canada that has long been sought after by certain civil servants and by those power hungry people on the government benches who just love power for the sake of power.

When one hears the way in which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources attempts to extol the virtues of Petro-Canada, somehow one loses sight of what Petro-Canada really is. For example, if we take a look at the prospectus they were required to file at the time they offered to purchase all of the shares of Pacific Petroleums Ltd., we find they say that virtually all of Petro-Canada's operations are conducted through Petro-Canada Exploration Inc.

I draw hon. members' attention to that because it should be remembered when we were processing Petro-Canada through this House that many of us put great importance upon the actual powers granted to Petro-Can. We suggested that there be certain reservations to try to ensure that Petro-Canada would not end up as an embarrassment not only to the government but to the Canadian public. However, we find that the government has effectively taken that vehicle, established a subsidiary called Petro-Canada Exploration Inc. and through that company, a company called Petro-Canada Inc. and a company called Petro-Canada Industries, virtually carried on the entire business of what we notionally thought was Petro-Can.

When the minister or other members of the government stand up and start glorifying this great thing they call Petro-Canada, let us not forget what they have done. They have taken a vehicle that was empowered by this parliament and then passed virtually all of its assets and activities through the various subsidiaries. The prospectus tells us that those subsidiaries are run by four people. First comes William Hopper who we know is the chief executive officer, director and president of Petro-Canada; then come Joel Bell, Andrew Janisch and David O'Brien. Let us not be mystified by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he puts Petro-Canada slightly this side of a deity. Petro-Canada has had itself torn out and most of its activities are in subsidiaries run by four people.

Perhaps the most interesting thing that has happened to Petro-Canada since the government had the right to use this corporation on behalf of Canadians was the appointment of nine directors to the board of Petro-Canada. You talk about a haven for Liberals, well, there you have one. Every time we hear these Liberals stand up and wax eloquent about Petro-Canada, remember the people who are on the board of Petro-Canada. I will outline them for you.

There are three civil servants on the board of Petro-Canada. I am not suggesting that that is wrong. Obviously if the government wishes to incorporate such a company, presumably it has the right to appoint deputy ministers such as Mr. Arthur Kroeger who is deputy minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; Mr. Tom Shoyama who is now adviser on constitutional policy in the Prime Minister's office in Ottawa; and Marshall Cohen, deputy minister for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. There are three other directors who sit on the board of Petro-Canada and these three directors read like a Who's Who of Molson's industries. We find the company that Senator Molson is so closely identified with has supplied no less than three directors to Petro-Canada's board. What an interesting coincidence.

An hon. Member: Senator Molson is a Liberal, is he?

Mr. Stevens: Some say Senator Molson is a Liberal.

An hon. Member: He is well oiled.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Stevens: I know Senator Molson has been taught to sit on the Liberal benches in the other place. Then there is a former senator, the Hon. John B. Aird, who is another Liberal. As you will recall, Senator Aird retired from the senate in 1974. One might also say that the lesson here is if there is no more room in the Senate one has to go no further than to join the board of Petro-Canada. From the Molson's group alone there is Donald Harvie, who happens to be deputy chairman of the board of Petro-Can. Then there is the former senator, John B. Aird and, of course, Donald Willmot, who is the head of Molson's. All three come from the Molson group of companies. If the minister gets the opportunity I hope he will tell us what was the thought behind the Liberal government's move to select those three people from the private sector, all from Molsons, to go on to the board of Petro-Canada.

● (2100)

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Did you ever hear of success?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, old Donald Duck says have I ever heard of success.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member refer to another hon. member of this House by his constituency and not by a name.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I, for a moment, forgot the hon. member's constituency and that was why I referred to him by his more usual name.

As I was saying, we have three civil servants and three from Molsons. Here are some of the other people who sit on the board. I am sure these names will also have a familiar ring for those who know the inner charmed circles of the Liberal party. There is Claude Hebert, chairman of Bombardier, M. L. W. of Montreal, and David Mann of the law firm of Cox, Downie, Nunn and Goodfellow of Halifax.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Did he go broke?

Mr. Stevens: He certainly didn't go broke for the Liberal party, that's for sure. We know he is a pretty good friend of the party in power. What I am trying to say is, let's not call it by any other name. Petro-Canada has become an old-fashioned billion dollar pork barrel for a lot of Liberals.

Mr. Andre: Two billion.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps two billion is correct, although it may well be three billion by this time, if we only knew the facts. That is the directorate.

Something I would ask hon. members to note is that on that board of directors there is not one person other than the actual management of Petro-Canada who has any connection with the energy field or the various subjects we are discussing concerning allocations and this type of thing. However, we find the minister almost blindly coming in and saying he wants to amend his own act to permit Petro-Canada to be the nation's representative on an international body dealing with oil allocations. Why?

I have run through the board. I would like to mention one other thing. Most of us have seen the prospectus put out by Petro-Canada Exploration Inc. which is described as an indirectly wholly-owned subsidiary of Petro-Canada. Who is the first dealer manager for the offer in Canada? It is Pitfield, Mackay, Ross & Co. Ltd. Guess who happens to be one of the senior partners in Pitfield, Mackay, Ross? The brother of Michael Pitfield who sits on the right hand of the Prime Minister.

Isn't it an interesting little ball of wax that starts to unravel? We can see why the government is so defensive of Petro-Canada, why it is representing to the Canadian nation that somehow Petro-Canada is the great solution to some of our energy problems. In short, it has grown to love Petro-Canada for obvious reasons, and I think we all understand what those reasons are.

Let us look at Petro-Canada. We have been told that it is needed for various reasons. When the initial bill was introduced in this House by the then minister of energy, mines and resources, Donald Macdonald, on March 13, 1975, almost exactly four years ago, Mr. Macdonald stated as reported in Hansard at page 4037, referring to the proposal to incorporate Petro-Canada:

> This does not mean that the government finds that Canada has not been well served by private enterprise in the petroleum industry. Private companies, whether Canadian or foreign-owned, have generally worked vigorously to develop our oil and gas resources, to create transportation systems for them, and to refine and distribute efficiently oil products. The privately-owned Canadian oil industry has a good record of technical and managerial innovation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Is that Petro-Can?

Mr. Stevens: No, that is the private industry that Mr. Macdonald was in effect saying had been doing a good job. Nothwithstanding the fact it was doing a good job, he thought Petro-Canada was needed at that time largely, hon. members will recall, somehow to go out into the exploratory fields to find oil that otherwise might not be found in Canada.

I find it most strange now to hear that the very industry that the government now represents as being the villain, at the time that this act was being put through parliament was said to be virtuous, that there was nothing wrong with the private industry, be it Canadian or foreign-owned. What has gone wrong in the last four years? What caused the government now to say that not only is the industry not doing a proper job but we must start taking over sections of the industry, such as their takeover of Phillips Petroleum, and now wanting to get into this international type of activity?

Another question that we must consider when looking at this amazing evolution that is taking place with regard to Petro-Canada is why exactly have they struck out from Canada. It is one thing for Petro-Canada to hope to find oil on our east coast, in the Arctic area or some other frontier, but why did they go to China? Why did they jump to Pakistan? Why have they been in other Asian countries such as Vietnam if not signing up deals or at least looking for them? I don't know.

Is this the influence of Maurice Strong who was initially chairman of this company? Again we have one of those strange coincidences that we seem to get with Petro-Canada. Maurice Strong subsequently became a Liberal candidate in one of the Scarborough ridings. When he realized he could not win if an election had been called, he simply resigned his nomination and presumably is going into some other field.

We have a situation with Petro-Canada where, if we do not somehow call it what it is, the government will be able to foist a future tremendous cost on the Canadian public, and a future problem that no Canadian would be willing to accept if given the chance to say yes or no, does he want to invest in a company called Petro-Can which is run mainly by civil servants and Liberal directors.

Something else I found interesting about the defence of Petro-Canada by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, not just in the House but in articles he has written for such periodicals as the Financial Post, is that he tries to justify it on the grounds that this is the government's answer to foreign takeovers in this country. He suggests that somehow or other this is Canadianizing the petroleum industry in Canada.

Mr. Gillespie: Are you suggesting it is not?

Mr. Stevens: I suggest it is not so much Canadianizing the oil industry that the government is interested in but Liberalizing the oil industry. Mr. Speaker, I know you are familiar with the arrogance of those who sit on government benches. Imagine them saying that to Liberalize is the same thing as to Canadianize.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Stevens: The reason I draw this to the attention of the House is that the near socialists on the government side are actually playing the socialist tune when it comes to this question of foreign ownership. It is not so much that they believe foreign ownership to be wrong, but they see that if they can wave a Canadian flag in the name of Canadianization or nationalizing certain companies, they can increase state ownership on the pretext of bringing back foreign-owned companies to Canada.

Our position is that it would be preferable if more of the oil and gas industry were owned in Canada. If the government had not structured our taxation system in such a way that it benefited foreigners at the expense of Canadians, more of the industry would, indeed, be owned by Canadians at the present time. We on this side are still confident that if Canadians were given an opportunity they would increase their ownership in our gas and energy fields so that they would be owned not by the state but by Canadians. I am most reluctant to let the Liberals get away with the impression that somehow they are the great nationalists when the facts show this is not the truth.

After hearing the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources speak on the subject I thought it would be interesting to see what FIRA had done with regard to the petroleum industries which have been taken over by foreign firms within the last three or four years. What do we see that federal watchdog doing to make sure that foreign ownership does not increase? Here are the facts. In 1974-75 there were eight applications before FIRA with respect to Canadian petroleum companies subject to being taken over by foreign concerns. Of those eight applications, seven were approved. In the following year eight out of eight applications were approved. In the year after that, three out of three were approved. In the following year, four applications out of five were approved. Mr. Speaker, in those four years from 1974 to 1978, 22 of 24 such applications, or 92 per cent, were rubber stamped and approved by the government through its agency, FIRA. How can members opposite have the nerve to stand up in this House and pretend that Petro-Canada is somehow the great vehicle which is protecting the oil industry after such a record?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. Gillespie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether there has been an agreement but there has been discussion with a view to permitting this particular issue, motion No. 1, to come to a conclusion so that we might be able to proceed with the other motions. I am seeking your guidance. I know there are speakers on this side, as there are on the other side, but we might be able to get agreement to proceed at this point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 1 in the name of Mr. Gillespie.

All those in favour, will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75, a division on motion No. 1 stands deferred.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Lawrence: Better call in the members, sir, once you have gone as far as that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: It is obviously the clear intention of the minister that a vote should be called on the motion right now.

Mr. Lang: It is deferred.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Lawrence: Five members on the government side have risen. The bells should ring now and the vote should take place. That was the minister's intention and, in the circumstances, since there has been no agreement ahead of time, the members should be called in. Once the minister did what he did, I suggest the matter has gone beyond the discretion of the Chair in terms of deferring the vote.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I rose after you called the yeas and nays. My purpose was to ask you if you would defer the vote, as I believe is in order.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to be involved in any debate. I should like to refer hon. members to Standing Order 75(11) which reads as follows:

When a recorded division has been demanded on any amendment proposed during the report stage of a bill, Mr. Speaker may defer the calling in of the Members for the purpose of recording the "yeas" and "nays" until any or all subsequent amendments proposed to that bill have been considered. A recorded division or divisions may be so deferred from sitting to sitting.

So the practice has been that such votes are deferred. Unless the House wants to change this practice by consent, I see no reason why I should call in the members at this time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, your reading of the rule would suggest a situation in which the Speaker had determined that one side was successful and the other side had demanded a vote in order to test the decision. In this case Your Honour clearly found on the basis of a voice vote that the yeas were in predominance. It is not a question of challenging that finding. It is the people on the government side, the "yea" side, who asked for the vote, and it seems to me the only logical interpretation would be to allow those the Chair had determined not to be successful to have a standing vote. Clearly that is not the case here. The government is being mischievous. This is an attempt on the part of the government merely to delay this matter, for whatever purpose. It seems to me that we should have the vote now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member must understand that when the Chair decides on yeas and nays, it does not take sides.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know that you are completely independent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has to decide which side is winning the vote. At the same time it does not identify the five members who wish to call for a vote. I have made my decision. I have deferred the vote. Unless, by unanimous consent, there is a request for me to call in the members, I will put motion No. 2 to the House at this time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The government is afraid to vote now.

Mr. Lang: You are afraid to vote any time.

Mr. Crouse: Vote, then.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham) moved:

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be amended in Clause 11 by deleting subclause (4) at page 6 and by renumbering the subsequent subclauses accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as we travel through the labyrinth of the various stages of this bill, I must say that I am astounded at the two-faced attitude, double-faced attitude, of members of the government with respect to this matter. On the one hand they put forward the face that they need to have this bill through before an election can be called—this bill and at least one other—and yet at just about every stage of the proceedings—in the committee, at second reading, and here again following the remarkable bit of theatrics just a moment ago by the minister—measures are put in the way of the speedy passage of this bill through the House. I can only come to one of two conclusions, and I will leave it to the Chair to decide. Either the government is afraid to call an election and therefore wants to use this bill as one means of saying to the people of the country that the bill did not get through even though it was needed before an election, or the government is not really interested in seeing this legislation get through the House.

In moving this amendment I feel that there are some very basic democratic and parliamentary principles involved with respect to this matter. First, as hon. members are well aware, we have two ways by which the government of the day can choke off further discussion of a motion, a bill, or other matter in this House. One is the old and cumbersome method of closure. With respect to a measure having to do with the oil industry many years ago, the Liberal government of the day eventually was defeated by the people of this country because of its abuse of the closure provisions of the rules of the House of Commons at that time.

Since that time there has been a smoother, easier and more effective way of choking off valid, in some cases invigorating, and in other cases deadly boring discussion in this House, and that is the use of the guillotine provisions in the rules of this House. I think that provision is Standing Order 75C under which, if the government of the day really wants to choke off discussion, it can, within a minimum period of time of, I believe, about three days. It can limit debate to one or two hours on each of those three days. The government can choke off discussion and limit the total length of time to three days and only a few hours on each day.

The clause of this bill which I suggest should be deleted by virtue of my amendment provides a special closure. There is a special form of guillotine. There is a special way of limiting debate on a motion respecting an order in council proclaiming that a national emergency in the energy field exists in this country. I think that that provision is entirely needless. There seems to be a growing trend within the government to want to have, in a number of the bills which are coming forward and which have come forward in the last little while, an additional procedure by which to gag parliament. There is no other word for it. This procedure would limit free and open discussion of a very important order in council which would proclaim that a national emergency exists. Why do we need that type of limitation, that type of restriction, that type of closure or that type of guillotine in a bill such as this? There are already two other means of choking off discussion under the rules of the House.

I asked a question of the minister the other night in committee. As usual, we were dealing with a very taciturn minister who is not at all forward about giving explanations for what is going on. Certainly the other night in the committee the minister displayed that same type of attitude. There was no answer given as to why we really need the third way to gag parliament which is in this bill.

It is this specific clause which I suggest should be deleted. There is no need for it. It even extends the period of debate. If the government really wanted to stop debate, it could move under the guillotine provisions in our rules because, under the guillotine provisions, debate would be limited to three days, and only one to two hours at the most on each of the three days. Here there are three days of full and formal debate in the House of Commons on a motion of the government with respect to an order in council, and I just fail to see the need for this provision. There has been no defence put up. There has been no justification.

This bill contains very few guidelines and very few restrictions. There is very little laid down with regard to what would actually constitute a national emergency in the energy field, and I just feel that clause 11(4) is completely redundant. I therefore ask the members of the House to consider this matter seriously. We really would be stripping parliament of its right to discuss this matter if that subclause were left in the bill. If there is no question that a national emergency in the energy field exists, then surely we can leave it up to the good sense, if not of the members of this House then of the citizens of this country who eventually have to judge whether a member of parliament or a party within this House should hold up the passage of a bill or the approval of a motion validating an order in council declaring a national emergency.

We simply do not need this additional gagging procedure in a bill of this importance, especially when, for instance, there is no definition in the bill of a national emergency. There is absolutely no provision or authority in the bill for any compensation to be paid with respect to the very extradordinary measures which might be taken by the proposed allocation board in the event that a national emergency exists, or an apparent one as far as the government is concerned.

There is another matter which has not yet been raised in the House. This bill has in it an additional defect. We will not necessarily even know what the allocation system or basis is, or the system that the government has approved. There is no requirement in the bill that the actual terms of the allocation order itself be tabled, published, released or approved by members of the House. The only order that need be published under the terms of this bill is the actual order in council by the cabinet indicating that a national emergency exists or is apprehended. The board then has the power given to it under the act to allocate energy supplies in this country.

The point is that in every other jurisdiction I have been able to research in respect of domestic provisions as a result of the 1974 treaty, the allocation order itself must be released, must be published and must be debated in the national parliament, congress or legislature of the country involved. So far as I know, Canada is the only country in which the actual allocation order need not be released or published so that the people of this country know about it. I do not know if members opposite fully understand the distinction I am trying to make. I see a look of real puzzlement on the face of the parliamentary secretary to the minister.

The point is that the only order that need be laid on the table of the House, the only order that will be debated, is not the order indicating what the basis of the allocation is. The only order is the order in council of the government which indicates that a national emergency exists. In other words, no one in the industry, no one in the provinces and no one in the municipalities—do not laugh about municipal powers in regard to utilities in this country because they are fairly extensive—and no member of this House nor any member of the public at large, under the terms of this bill need have any idea whatsoever as to what the allocation order is or may be. I think that is a defect that should be rectified and, what is more important, it is another reason why there should not be a special gagging provision in this bill in the form of subclause (4) of this clause.

There are some members in the House who still have the vague idea that this bill only applies to petroleum supplies or products or, for that matter, even alternate energy supplies. If they believe that, they should take a much closer look at the bill itself, because this bill could apply to almost every field of endeavour in the energy field. Indeed, a technical interpretation of the act could carry its powers well beyond the energy field. It could apply to any field of exploration, of drilling, of development, of production, of transportation, of refining, of storage, of distribution, of consumption, of usage, of retailing, of pricing, of financing, and even into the manufacturing stage of products even remotely or dimly connected with the energy field, not just petroleum products. This bill sets up a dictatorial regime in the government. One clause of it even extends this dictatorial control to any product made even in part from a petroleum product.

I just ask you to take a look, Mr. Speaker, at what you are wearing tonight. Take a look at what you ate for dinner tonight. Take a look at the roof above you. Take a look at the textiles on your bed. In these days of synthetics, we have synthetic foods, textiles and fibres. We have synthetic building products, plastics, papers, gasses, liquids, not just fuels. It is really hard to envisage a product or a manufacturing material, or, for that matter, almost any goods today that could not be touched upon by the control powers included dn this bill.

I say this is a very bad and a very sweeping bill. On the other hand, we believe that in times of a real national emergency—I emphasize "national emergency", and there should be a definition of what that is—respecting petroleum energy supplies, the Government of Canada, in consultation and with the co-operation of the provinces and of industry, and perhaps even of the municipalities because, as I said, in some areas there is municipal supervision of utilities, should have the necessary legislative framework to take charge and to show national leadership especially when, as is the case now, the defects of our energy industry are the result of a complacency and lethargy and the lack of a national policy on energy, especially of a policy on the distribution or delivery system of our own home grown domestic energy supply.

When we have, as we now have, a lack of Canadian policy to ensure that Canadian demands are met by Canadian supply, when that is compounded by the potential or real problems in our offshore supplies such as are occurring in Iran, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Mexico or other places, when we are precariously dependent, or a large section of this country is precariously dependent on this interruptable supply of oil, then the federal government unfortunately needs the legislative framework to enable that self-imposed emergency to be met.

What is the dilemma for members of the House, and especially for the conscientious members of the House who may not be bound by the iron discipline of the government party? Should we hold up a bill such as this in the dying days of a useless parliament and a decadent government, with possibly no emergency powers therefore during an extended election period, or do we consent to give the government this bill, arbitrary, sweeping, and bad though it is? On this side of the House we have opted for the latter, secure in the knowledge that this government will not be in power long enough to harm the economy and the energy industry that much longer, and that a new government will obviously start a comprehensive review of the energy field and the jurisdictions in the industry and put into place policies which would mean that such powers are simply not needed.

In getting back to the amendment of this clause, the deletion of the clause called for in the amendment in no way harms the operation of any other clause of the bill. I suggest to you, sir, that unless the members on the government side are determined to come up with a third procedure to gag open and decent discussion in the House on such a matter, which will obviously affect everybody, they should agree tonight to the deletion of subclause (4) of this clause.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the comments of the energy critic of the opposition party I could not help but wonder whether he was dealing with the amendment which he has placed before us in his own name. Very few of his remarks dealt with the substance of the amendment or the need for it. I think it would be helpful to members to recall the particular clause he would amend. It is Clause 11 in Part I of the bill, on page 6. It sets out the basic question of declaring a national emergency. Subclause (1) states:

When the Governor in Council is of the opinion that a national emergency exists by reason of actual or anticipated shortages of petroleum or disturbances in the petroleum markets that affect or will affect the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, and that it is necessary in the national interest to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada, the Governor in Council may, by order, so declare and by that order authorize the establishment of a program for the mandatory allocation of petroleum products within Canada in accordance with this Act.

I have read the clause because the hon. member spent part of his time saying that there was no reference or no way of gauging what was a national emergency. It is quite clear from the manner in which I have read the clause that there are at least four sections: national security, and welfare, and the economic stability of Canada, and that it is necessary in the national interest to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada. Those are "ands". They are separate and additional tests in each case. They are not "ors". For example, it is not economic stability or welfare; it is not the national interest or the necessity of conserving. In each case it is "and". Clearly it places upon the government the onus to determine the nature of the emergency against those tests.

Clause 11(2) reads as follows:

A notice of motion to concur in an order made under subsection (1) shall be laid on the Table of each House of Parliament by or on behalf of a minister of the Crown within seven days after the order is made if parliament is then sitting.

Clause 11(3) reads as follows:

A notice of motion laid before the House of Commons pursuant to subsection (2) shall be set down as an order of the day for consideration as the first government order on the sitting day next following the sitting day on which the notice was laid on the Table of that House and, until it is disposed of, no other government order shall be considered.

Quite clearly there is a built-in procedure which protects the rights of parliamentarians. It gives the elected representatives of Canadians an opportunity of dealing with the order, debating it and disposing of it under a time frame which reflects the very nature of an emergency and the very nature of the reason why it would be necessary to declare a national emergency for the purposes of this bill. That must be placed before parliament within seven days after the order is made if parliament is then sitting. Subsequently parliament must deal with that particular motion, and the wording provides that parliament would have three sitting days to deal with the order, and that no other business would be before the House. Thus, parliament would be able to place its full attention on a particular emergency order.

I acknowledge that an order which declares a national emergency exists for these purposes is a very important matter which should be dealt with. The procedure provides that it would be dealt with in an expeditious manner. It sets out that parliament would devote three days, and if the Parliament of Canada had not by then dealt with it or disposed of the particular motion, it would come to a vote.

There has been a suggestion that this is stripping or gagging parliament. If the language of the bill is read, that is absolute nonsense. It is quite clear the opposition have never focused on the nature of an emergency. They seem to think an emergency is something which will never happen. In reading and listening to some of their speeches, that came through—that there never is any emergency and there is no possibility of an emergency, so why do we need an act at this time; why not wait until an emergency comes? Also that was the burden of the government of Ontario when it appeared before the committee—there was no emergency, so we do not need an emergency act at this time. That was the attitude of the government of Ontario.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker) said, "Suppose there is an emergency, suppose an emergency does come. We do not need this kind of authority. It is far too great. Why couldn't the government use the War Measures Act?" That was a serious suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Eglinton. Incidentally, it was not a particular suggestion of which the government of the province of Ontario thought very highly.

The point I am making is that opposition members have not really addressed themselves to the nature of the bill or to the need for the protections built into the bill for parliamentarians. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) in his amendment indicated that we should eliminate clause 11(4), and that in this way we would somehow reduce the gagging effect of parliament. I draw the hon. member's attention to clause 11(8). It provides that if parliament has been dissolved when it is necessary to declare an emergency, parliament would deal with the bill when it came back as the first order of business. The clause reads as follows:

Consideration of a motion of which notice has been given under subsection (7) shall commence at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the day fixed, and the House shall sit continuously until eleven o'clock in the afternoon of such day or until such earlier time as the House of Commons is ready for the question, when the Speaker shall put the question forthwith without further debate.

The hon. member has not objected to this particular provision. It would put the question within a day of parliament's return, and the hon. member is objecting to a provision which would give parliament three days for debate, seven days after the order has been made.

The energy critic, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, is confused in another important area. He made some astonishing statements a few moments ago about the fact there was no need for the government to place before parliament an order made respecting the allocation program. If the hon. member had read the bill he would have noticed clause 12(1), which reads as follows:

Where an order is made under section 11, the board shall immediately prepare a mandatory allocation program in respect of petroleum to assure sufficient supplies of that product in various parts of Canada—

It goes on. That is the subsection the hon. member would amend.

Clause 12(6) reads as follows:

An order approving or amending a mandatory allocation program or adding any product thereto—

These are the important words:

—shall be laid before parliament forthwith upon the making thereof, or, if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first 15 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

Again we see the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has not done his homework. He is far more interested in attempting to make cheap shots or political capital. He has not addressed himself to the nature of the bill. The hon. member has relied on silly, extraneous comments, some of which perhaps were picked up from the brief the Ontario government presented before the committee. The brief was far more concerned with making it a media event than informing parliamentarians. Incidentally, the brief was made public to the press before it was made public to parliamentarians.

Some hon. Members: Shame! Shame!

Mr. Gillespie: It shows complete contempt for parliamentary tradition. I would have thought the parliamentary secretary to the minister of energy for the province of Ontario could be cited for contempt by this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: The amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is badly thought out. It does not address the question. It is based on a false premise, as many of his arguments have been this evening.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before us has some interesting aspects to it. The Conservative party for almost the past two hours has been castigating the government for its failure to devise an energy policy which protects Canadians from the point of view of supply and price. In that sense I join it in agreement. Indeed, the history of the energy policy of this Liberal government has been not much short of actual disaster. Certainly consumers in eastern Canada who are facing cutbacks at the moment will know what I mean, and other Canadians who are experiencing high energy prices know the folly of some of the policies or the lack thereof of this government.

The bill before us, of course, deals with an emergency situation. We in the NDP argue that the government must have the tools at its disposal to deal with emergencies. The amendment that seems to be quite contentious at the moment deals with the closure provision within the bill. Once the government introduces a motion delineating an emergency, the debate is limited to three days and then it must automatically stop. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has moved an amendment to remove the closure provision that is built into the bill. I have some sympathy with the amendment or the motion that is before the House. I would have to ask for the reasoning behind the government for building in a closure provision when the government already has authority under our Standing Orders to impose closure at any time it deems necessary.

One wonders also at the government's need to have a closure motion built right into the bill if we are in an emergency situation, because surely any opposition that is in any way responsible would be committing gross negligence by trying to delay the implementation of emergency procedures if we did, indeed, face a genuine energy crisis. Surely it would also be almost akin to political suicide for an opposition party to continue to filibuster the implementation of emergency provisions in the face of a real emergency as perceived by the Canadian electorate. Therefore it seems to me unnecessary to have this automatic closure provision in the bill.

We have safeguards, it seems to me, in respect of both sides of the House. The opposition has to act responsibly. It cannot filibuster the implementation of emergency measures when there is a real emergency. Secondly, the government already has the power of closure. If it is to use that power arbitrarily, and it is perceived as an arbitrary measure, then not only do we have the obligation in opposition to point this out to the Canadian public, the government has to answer to the Canadian public if it has imposed closure in an irresponsible manner.

I think we already have enough safeguards in our parliamentary procedure that we should not have this automatic cut-off of debate. There may be a dispute in respect of some future declaration by the government that a real emergency exists, and we might need more than three days to debate the issue fully and draw out the actual facts and figures from the government if the government puts up speakers from its side, using up time and preventing opposition members from getting down to the bare bones of an issue. Therefore, it seems to me, that we do need safeguards, that the debate may conceivably take more than three days—not much more, maybe a couple of days—and we would want to have a thorough airing of the issue in the House of Commons before taking some of the extraordinary measures allowed for in this bill.

I reiterate that I have a great deal of sympathy for motion No. 2. I do not know what the government is afraid of in wanting to have this automatic closure. It already has powers at its disposal should it need to cut off a debate. On balance, I think the reasonableness of an opposition would prevent members from carrying out a filibuster in light of a real emergency, so I would certainly be inclined to support motion No. 2.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the remaining four minutes or so of this delightful twilight evening, when we have been hearing so much nonsense from the other side of the House, I would just take a few minutes to make some comments on this issue.

Hon. members should take into account the fact that this House has been far too weak and lax in granting authoritarian powers of this kind in the past to the government. We should look at exactly what we are doing by this bill. We are giving the power to the government to call an emergency; not parliament, but the government. That probably runs contrary to the litigation falling from the anti-inflation bill. Apart from that, we are giving the government the power to establish a mandatory allocation program, to bring in alternative fuels, to deal with the matter of electricity, to deal with imports and exports, and to deal with rationing. I suggest through you, Mr. Speaker, to members of this House, that lying like a cocoon surrounded by this bill is the germ of a perfect scheme for wage and price controls. You cannot have allocation unless you have controls, and you cannot have controls unless you control prices. As my friend, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), has said, this includes manufactured goods, and there are very few manufactured goods today which do not have some element of origin in petroleum products, in addition to the fact that fuels and energy are used as well in their manufacture.

What we are looking at or envisaging is a situation in which the government, having an obedient majority, would get its allocation order through, would then establish a rationing program, and that rationing program would inevitably lead to price controls, and price controls would lead to wage controls. This is what this bumbling, bungling, ineffective, inept government has brought us to.

The other day I was reading some old English history and ran across a name that struck a familiar chord, "Ethelred the Unready", an apt description of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and an even more apt description of the minister. I took some notes about Ethelred the Unready, a Saxon king who lived almost 1,000 years ago. Brief notes show that he got rid of his enemies by bribing them. He engaged in acts of political treachery. He was woefully weak in policy, and so incapable of governing that he left the land disorganized and without hope. In the last resort, in a series of crises, each of which demanded a concentration of the national energy, the king could neither give direction to his people nor hold his best advisers firmly to their allegiance. All he had left were the incompetents such as we see in the front benches of the government today. As a result he either left, was pushed, or he fell off the throne, and fled to France. That is what is going to happen in this parliament to this government very shortly. This is what this government has brought us to.

Some five and a half years have been lost since the fall of 1973. During those years the government should have been engaged in preparing to deal with issues of conservation, alternative fuels, and the provision of renewable energy. This government has wasted and dissipated its energies and the energies of this country, and today we are brought back to the same position we were in back in 1974 with a stupid, bumbling, stumbling, bungling government. Yet these are the people who have the unmitigated gall to say they cannot call an election because they have important things to do in this House. If that is the case, God help this country. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—ILO RECOMMENDATION THAT OLDER WORKERS SHOULD CHOOSE AGE OF RETIREMENT

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on March 1 I asked a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell). Part of the preamble to my question as it is reported at page 3713 of Hansard reads:

> The International Labour Organization meeting in Geneva has expressed very deep concern at the rapidly increasing, aging labour force which will put a severe strain on resources, social security and pension systems, and have recommended that older workers should be free to choose when to retire, depending on their health and capabilities.

I wanted to know if the Department of Labour had made any study in this regard and if they sent anybody as a labour representative to Geneva to learn what the reports were and to bring them back to this House. The minister, in his reply to me, indicated that an interdepartmental committee had been established two years ago to examine pensions both in the public and the private sector, but I believe that it was established last December.

I would like to ask a question of the minister and I do not want it answered by a long tirade of paper-filling words. I would like to know if the minister was aware of this labour organization meeting and of their great concern over retirement at age 65. There are two reasons why I want an answer, and I want only direct answers. If the minister or his parliamentary secretary cannot answer my questions tonight, then let him answer them tomorrow in the House. I want answers to these questions as to what they propose to do, because I feel that this is one of the most serious problems facing the future of the Canadian people.

I wonder if the minister knows what happens to retired people within a few years after they have retired. The individual either dies, deteriorates, or ends up in an institution. There is the odd one who escapes this fate. This is the story of what is happening to the average Canadian after retirement.

I would also like to ask the minister why, if this individual is physically or mentally fit, he or she is not allowed to go beyond the age of 65 in their work? This individual not only contributes to the economy but is happy and contented with himself. He has an incentive to get up every day because he is doing something which he feels is useful. The individual usually remains stimulated, bright, alert and happy.

In cases where the job becomes too heavy for the individual who reaches age 65, that individual should have the option to be transferred within that organization or factory to a job which is easier, but in the line of work which he has previously known.

People who have skills are needed in this country, simply because we do not have enough labour to meet the demand. Approximately three out of every four skilled workers in Canada were born outside this country. I would also like to bring to the minister's attention the fact that we are an aging population. In 1900 less than 5 per cent of the population was 65 years of age. Today it is almost 10 per cent, double the figure of 1900, and by the year 2000 it will be 12 per cent of the population which will be over 65 years of age. On the present scale, by the turn of the century there will be three workers for every retired person. Such a situation could cause a complete breakdown of our social security scales and pensions. Even the parliamentary secretary may not receive his pension.

Those who are fit and able should be allowed to work beyond age 65 into their seventies and even beyond that. They should also be given a preference in any other position that is open which may mean easier work, if they have the skills to perform that work. The United States has been wise enough to raise the retirement age to 70 years for the worker, and the white collar gentleman or professional in that country may work until he wishes to quit or is forced to quit through physical or mental illness.

The lifting of the retirement age is a must. The arbitrary age retirement cuts off many retired people at a time when the person being retired is at his most productive age. When was this nonsense of retirement at age 65 brought in? It was brought in in 1890 by Bismarck. It was all right then because Bismarck was smart enough to know the average age at death at that time was 42 years of age. The situation has changed today. Statistics show that the respective ages are 74 for men and 80 for women.

This is a situation we have to look at, and the minister must take it seriously. I want answers. I do not want a lot of paper garbage. The United States has already made this move. Canada needs something done right away if we are to save our pension scheme.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's very legitimate concerns, and the government is aware as much as he is of the aging process of the Canadian population, and it is also concerned with the future of Canadian pension plans. There is also the fact that among people 65 or over, there is a growing concern for the right to work which is almost perceived as a part of human rights. The hon. member raised a very important question in my view. I would, however, apologize to him at this point, because I am not in a position tonight to give him a clearcut answer by yes or no. But if he will allow me, I would like to review briefly the history in the International Labour Organization on this matter, and the Canadian legislation as it now stands.

During the coming annual conference of the International Labour Organization, to be held in Geneva next June, discussions will include the issue of work and older workers retirement. As a member nation, Canada has already been consulted on this by the International Labour Organization. We made our position known by answering the ILO questionnaire based on the views of a number of federal agencies. Representatives of the Canadian government will take part in the discussions in Geneva, further to which the International Labour Organization could implement in 1980 a new international instrument aimed at protecting employment and retirement opportunities for older workers anxious to retire early.

Concerning this specific issue of retirement age in Canada, first I would state that in Canada there is no statutory obligation for workers to retire at a specific age. There has always been a consensus for retirement age to coincide with the age at which workers can start receiving social security benefits, or old age security pension as commonly called. Therefore, the hon. member does not need to be remembered that starting in 1966, pensionable age has been lowered one year per year from 70 to 65 years. I would call his attention to a fact.

[English]

The increased incidence of early retirement provisions and the added cost of maintaining the real value of early pensions has placed great pressure on the private pension system, as the hon. member mentioned.

In addition to the growing pressure for early retirement, the elimination of mandatory retirement based on age has emerged in the last few years as an important human rights issue. These complex problems related to mandatory retirement age are being considered by a special Senate committee on retirement age policies, chaired by Senator Croll. The committee has already received several briefs of interest but has not yet completed its work.

In addition to the study by Senator Croll, the whole issue of retirement from the labour force has been examined by the interdepartmental task force on retirement income policy. The report is now being considered by the ministers of the participating departments.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—NAME OF INDEPENDENT AUDITORS EMPLOYED TO AUDIT PENSION FUND ACCOUNT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on May 4, 1978, I presented a motion in the House calling for a firm of independent auditors to review the CNR pension fund and to report annually to parliament. To date we have not been informed which firm of auditors has been chosen or when they will be reporting to parliament.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to inform us this evening of the name of the firm auditing the CNR pension fund and when they will report to parliament. This fund is in complete disarray at this time.

I directed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on February 14 asking him who were the auditors and when they would be reporting to parliament. He said he would check into the progress. I also asked if he would be making representations to the CNR asking them to make arrangements for a cost of living adjustment to the CN pension fund to assist their pensioners. He informed me that he would not be doing anything in this regard.

I wrote to the president of the CNR asking what he would be doing to assist CNR pensioners in 1979. He informed me he would not be doing anything. He further informed of what they had done in the past. In 1972 there was a flat monthly increase of $4.60 for pensioners and $2.30 for widows. That is almost unbelievable with an inflation rate today of 8 per cent to 9 per cent and spiralling food costs. It can only be described as inhumane treatment that there are no plans to do anything for CNR pensioners in 1979.

CN and CP pension representatives have not been idle. On March 6 they appeared before the Senate committee. Miss C. S. Wishart, president of the Toronto branch of the Canadian Railways Employees Pension Association, was the spokesman for the CPR, and Mr. Earl White the major spokesman for the CNR before the Senate committee dealing with the retirement age policy.

They went into great detail regarding the problems of trying to obtain increased pensions from both the CNR and CPR. Mr. White pointed out many of the problems regarding the mishandling of CNR pension funds. He was advised that he should apply for legal aid to challenge that mishandling. There is certainly no way the pensioners can afford to hire a law firm to deal with something as complex as a pension fund. It would cost up to a quarter million dollars for a law firm to take on the study and research into the mishandling of the CNR pension fund or, in fact, any federal government pension fund as well as many of the private schemes. It is absolutely ludicrous that the chairman of that Senate committee, Senator Croll, advised a group of pensioners involved with a Crown corporation to apply to legal aid for assistance in order to find out why they cannot get an increase in their pension.

At the present time there are committee meetings on Bill C-12 dealing with the indexing of pensions. Daily the fallacy and weaknesses are being exposed regarding all pension funds in Canada respecting this unfunded liability. This means that the government, Crown corporations and private corporations have been spending and using every single cent that goes into every pension fund for other purposes. Very little of the contributions to pension funds are being used properly, or invested in order to allow for inflation, indexing and so on. It is morally wrong for the Government of Canada to spend all superannuation contributions each year and maintain only a ledger account showing how much money would be in the superannuation fund if there were such a fund. We are talking about billions and billions of dollars, and it is just an entry figure. Only last week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said we should be investing the $30 billion held in the funds of private pension schemes so as to stimulate the economy. There is no money there, not a red cent. It just shows how ludicrous it is for the Senate committee to say pensioners should go and seek legal aid, on for the Prime Minister to try to convince people that there is $30 billion in these funds with all the Crown corporations misusing pension funds. It is just abominable what they are doing.

We hear the CNR stating recently that a $220 million profit is possible. If the CNR is working toward a profit of that kind, I suggest it start investing some of it in the pension fund, investing it properly so that it can allow for an increase in pensions paid to its retired employees. We hear continual boasting from the president of the CNR, Mr. Bandeen. He says the earnings of the company have doubled again. Also, we hear the CPR stating they are expecting a record profit for 1978. So I would suggest the CNR and the CPR appropriate some of these profits for the pension fund, begin an indexation plan immediately and start investing pension moneys properly so that we can give some assistance to these pensioners who have been so improperly treated.

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. member's first question I should like to tell him that the CN pension fund has been audited for 1978 by the accounting firm of Coopers & Lybrand. In addition, the Superintendent of Insurance has completed an audit on the Canadian National pension fund.

The second question was: when will this report be made public? I am a little surprised at the hon. member's comment in this connection. He should know that the annual report of the CNR is automatically referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. We have a tool there which we can use to put questions to the administration of Canadian National with regard to pension funds and pension plans.

I was also surprised at his reaction as a member of the Conservative party to the announcement that the CNR expected to make a profit. He seemed shocked. For my part, I am very happy that the CNR issues a balance sheet on the positive side. He should know, however, that even a profit of $200 million, when compared with the investment and assets of Canadian National, represents a return of about 4 per cent, which is not a very important return on investment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since 1956 the pensions of CNR employees are calculated on the basis of a 2 per cent formula for a period up to 35 years of service. That formula is the same as the one used for other pension plans of the civil service.

Thus an employee who, for example, would leave the CN after 30 years of service with an average annual income of say $15,000 would receive about $700 a month in addition to his old age security benefits and those paid under the Canada

Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan. Mr. Speaker, that plan can be favourably compared with any other comprehensive plan in Canada.

The benefits paid under the CN plan have been increased to compensate for the higher cost of living. In 1971, all pensions which were in effect before 1970 were cumulatively increased by 2 per cent yearly with retroactive effect from 1935. Thus someone who had retired in 1935 received a 70 per cent increase in his pension.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in 1972 all pensions begun before 1971 received a flat 4 per cent increase, and 1971 pensioners received a 2 per cent increase. All pensioners before 1973 received a 2 per cent increase in 1973, and pensioners before 1974 were given a 4 per cent increase in 1974. I could go on, because there were other pension increases for CN workers who retired in 1975, 1976, and onward.

URBAN AFFAIRS—CMHC DIVESTING ITSELF OF LOW-INCOME PROPERTIES

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask some questions this evening about a project called Cloverdale. I asked questions about this project in the House last November. The Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation owns the Cloverdale complex. The project was to be sold, and the sale was not completed. Some time has elapsed and I would like to find out what happened to the proposed sale to Grado. We on this side of the House, and parliament in general, should know what happened to the deposit and what legal costs were incurred. What has happened to the deposit? I think this is very important because this was a very strange and secret transaction about which we should know more.

The second thing I am concerned about is what has happened to the 2,000 persons who live in the 748 units in that complex. I am concerned about three questions. What has happened to those wonderful tenants? Have there been any meetings with the Cloverdale people and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as to whether this excellent complex could be broken up into co-ops? Have there been any attempts to make another sale? Have the tenants been kept informed?

The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation promised that it would have meetings with the Quebec Housing Corporation. Have there been meetings to ascertain what will happen to these people? One thing we must remember about this wonderful project is that in over 20 years a very healthy, homogeneous community has developed. The complex is part of the social fabric of the community. It is an excellent place. Many senior citizens and many people with low incomes live there. I feel that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a responsibility to maintain this housing project in some form. Perhaps it should be sold to another organization or broken up into co-ops, or perhaps some solution can be arrived at with involvement by the Quebec Housing Corporation. The minister and his officials promised to get back to us to tell us about subsequent meetings which would be held.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will clarify what happens to assets which are being disposed of by the CMHC. I have asked this question repeatedly. The newspapers today talk about the Pestalozzi Tower being sold for $3.5 million. The cost to the Canadian taxpayer is probably over $5 million. I have repeatedly asked for clarification—and I hope I can get it—as to how they dispose of the assets of CMHC.

I have very grave questions about the appraisal situation. Who does the appraisals? Under what guidelines are the appraisals made? There is a very real question as to whether an organization such as CMHC should dispose of these things. Should another Crown agency take care of this type of thing? Naturally, sometimes one might not want to disclose fully the fact that some mistaken judgments have been made in some of these areas, but we hope there will be some clarification by the minister as to what is being done about the portfolios of real estate held by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We have a great concern in this area, but the real concern is what will happen to the people in Cloverdale, what will happen to these 2,000 people, and what is their future. This is what I want to ask, and I hope the parliamentary secretary can satisfy us tonight.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's real estate portfolio has been acquired as a result of its lending programs or insured loans operation and ensuing default on mortgages by borrowers. The objective of the corporation is to sell the housing accommodation within expressed priorities. The corporation's policy of disposing of real estate in Quebec is the same as in other provinces. The first priority on sale is to provincial housing corporations. If they are not interested and, where the development is suitable, the next priority is to non-profit housing corporations. If the sale is not made under these priorities, then open market sale is considered. The sales are higher in the province of Quebec than in other provinces because the majority of the corporation's real estate portfolio is located in Quebec.

Bill 113 as enacted by the National Assembly of the province of Quebec on December 22, 1978, provides for the fractioning of a unit into smaller components for sale. This allows CMHC to break down projects and to sell to some of the tenants in a co-operative or non-profit group.

In September, 1978, CMHC accepted an offer for the Cloverdale complex in the amount of $3,600,000. Grado Developments was the highest bidder on a public tender called by CMHC for the sale of Cloverdale Park, a 748 unit residential development in Pierrefonds, Quebec. The sale did not materialize because the buyer did not come up with the funds. The security deposit of $180,000 has been retained by CMHC.

The tenants living in Cloverdale were pleased that the sale did not go through. In the case of Cloverdale, the average rent is $135 a month. The estimated loss for the next five years, not including subsidies, exceeds $2 million. A policy that came in force on January 1, 1979, provides that CMHC offers to all tenants benefiting from grants the possibility to enter a new lease for a period of one year from the date of the sale and at the same condition. I could add that subsidies to low income tenants have been granted in amounts ranging from $17,286 in 1975, to $49,166 in 1976, to $77,735 in 1977, to $91,426 in 1978.

Every investor who makes an offer must pledge that all the grants be extended for an additional period of one year.

It should be understood by all concerned that CMHC's purpose is not to manage property and it has never been the intention of the government to have CMHC as a large property owner. This is why CMHC is returning projects to the market. I should interject here that the federal government is well aware of the fact that in this case in holding these properties it is intruding on the provincial jurisdiction.

I should also advise the hon. member that I have personally offered in writing to meet the tenants of Cloverdale at a time suiting their convenience.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

CRITERIA RESPECTING EX GRATIA PAYMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, with respect to the government's policy on ex gratia payments.

Since four payments with reference to R. McGregor Travel Ltd., Olympia-York Developments, Ste. Marie Air Services and Mirabel Land Expropriations amount to approximately $3 million, and since no provision on an ex gratia payment basis appears imminent for cases such as that of Dr. Alexander Peter Treu or, for that matter, Mrs. Lucille Dubé, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the President of the Treasury Board set out clearly on motions the criteria which apparently recognized a moral obligation in the case of Olympia-York for guard services, etc., while refusing any compensation to someone like Dr. Treu, and to explain this contradiction.

What constitutes benevolence under the government's code of ethics?

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the proposed motion can be put to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMPROVED PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS—ENDORSEMENT OF BRIEF OF ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the light of an excellent brief presented this week by the Royal Canadian Legion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), I move:

That this House support the position of the Royal Canadian Legion that the government introduce without further delay the necessary legislation to provide pro rata pensions for the widows of disabled veterans where the pension rate of the veteran was below 48 per cent, and that steps be taken to improve the lot of older veterans not only in institutions but also in terms of adequate home care.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST VIA RAIL MAINTAIN PRESENT SERVICE IN MARITIMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provision of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The proposed transfer of reservation staff in the maritimes by VIA Rail, together with cutbacks in rail services have caused grave concern to those involved. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House request VIA Rail to defer the transfer of maritime reservation staff and any cutbacks in rail services for two years so that the economic and social effects can be studied and reviewed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Unanimous consent is required before the motion can be put to the House. Is there such consent?

REQUEST QUOTAS NOT BE IMPOSED ON STEEL WITH LOW CARBON CONTENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

S.O. 43

There is a shortage of building steel with low carbon content in eastern Canada at the present time. The supply difficulties related to a tendency of some companies to set quotas on their existing stocks have led suppliers to increase their prices. Since such behaviour erodes the purchasing power of consumers in the regions involved at a time when they can hardly cope with the new inflationary push, while some companies are making record profits, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House forbid those companies to set such quotas on existing stocks so that they may not take advantage of a temporarily reduced production to increase uselessly their prices without reason and boost their profits.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (1410)

That this House express the heartfelt congratulations of all Canadians to President Carter, President Sadat and Prime Minister Begin for their notable achievement in the cause of peace.

GOVERNMENT POLICY VIS-À-VIS INTERNATIONAL OIL COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to seek the unanimous consent of this House.

It is quite clear to all Canadians and to the world that Imperial Oil's and Exxon's treatment of Canada and the Canadian people places us in the role of a colony to international oil cartels. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instructs the government to give Imperial Oil an offer it cannot refuse, that being either to comply with government policy as a private corporation or to comply with government policy as a publicly-owned corporation.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented to the House for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED ACCREDITATION BY MEANS OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since we are constantly astonished at the government's use of the social insurance number as a single identifying number, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House views with alarm the directive of the Prime Minister, contained in his press release of February 28, extending the use of SIN extra-territorially by advising, through an urgent media logistic note, that for United States White House accreditation the social insurance numbers of members of the press would be needed.

In view of the fact that in a report tabled on Monday in this House the CRTC criticized the CBC for being uncompetitive and demanded that changes be made in its programming to rectify the situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery):

That this House urges the CRTC to roll back Canadian content rules sufficiently to test, on a trial basis, whether a portion of those Canadian content expenditures focused on quality Canadian programming, rather than quantity, might begin to reverse the steady erosion of Canadian audiences watching Canadian programs.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

HOLIDAYS ACT

REAFFIRMATION OF SECTION DESIGNATING DOMINION DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I sincerely believe all members will support my motion.

Whereas there are certain parts of our heritage and traditions which are steeped in history; whereas the word "dominion" is such a part of our history, based on the eighth verse of the 72nd Psalm; whereas it is essential to adhere in some respects to tradition and heritage; whereas this fact is recognized in the Holidays Act which declares that July 1 in each and every year is a national holiday and such holiday shall be observed as such; and whereas there has been a tendency for some government departments, and particularly the Department of the Secretary of State and Crown corporations including the CBC, to ignore the Holidays Act, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher):

That this House reaffirms section 2 of the Holidays Act, namely, section 2(1) "Throughout Canada, in each and every year, the first day of July, not being a Sunday, is a legal holiday, and shall be kept and observed as such under the name Dominion Day—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On reflection, I think the hon. member will realize that he is dealing with a matter which may be of considerable importance but it is a matter of ongoing concern. I am unable at this moment to find the kind of urgent and pressing necessity of which the Standing Order speaks in order to permit this motion to be put at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

MAINTENANCE OF PRICE OF OFFSHORE OIL UNDER EXISTING CONTRACTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Many Canadians are increasingly fed up and getting damned mad that government policies are forcing them to pay the highest prices in their lifetimes for everything they need, and energy costs are obviously playing a very real part in all those prices.

● (1415)

Because the minister is now forcing one Canadian company, and soon perhaps all Canadian companies, to break their existing contracts for offshore oil, can the minister give us any guarantee or assurance that the price for oil under these new, forced contracts will be the same or less than is presently being paid?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, for the first time we are seeing some interest on the part of the opposition on the subject of pricing policy. For years opposition members have ignored the important question of prices.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Even today, the Leader of the Opposition has no policy on prices. The official opposition were against the federal government having the power to set prices, and they have been consistent in that. They are still against the federal government having that power. If it were not for that power, we would not have been able to establish prices in Canada that are significantly lower than the international price.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: As a result of that power, which the opposition opposed and voted against, we have been able to provide oil to the maritimes and Atlantic Canada at substantially below the international price. What do I mean? For a six-room house, the saving this year, on an annual basis, will be $150.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gillespie: If the Tory policy had been in play with respect to pricing, those who own houses in the maritimes and heat them by oil would be paying $150 more than they are now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Lawrence: Will the hon. minister attempt to focus his mind on the actual question asked, namely, whether the price that Canadians—whether it is individual taxpayers or the nation as a whole—will have to pay for offshore oil on which, due to his policy, we are still terribly dependent, will be higher.

Can the minister also give us any indication or assurance, or has he received any assurance from the Venezuelan authorities, that there is any extra light crude oil for Canada from that country under any of these new contracts? In other words, not only am I asking whether we will have to pay more for that oil, but also if there is any extra oil available in these contracts with Venezuela.

Mr. Gillespie: If the hon. member had listened to the answers I had given before, he would realize that there are annual negotiations or renegotiations between Petroleos de Venezuela, the national oil company of Venezuela, and the customers of that oil, particularly the customer Exxon about whom he is so concerned.

The Venezuelans made it very clear to me in our discussions in January that they wanted to do business with Canadian companies on a direct basis. They were not interested in dealing with Exxon as a third party, for the very reasons we have all come to realize ourselves. The hon. member has been slow to realize that, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Yes, very slow.

Mr. Gillespie: We think that Venezuela will want, in its renegotiation with Exxon, to set aside 100,000 barrels, which perhaps otherwise Exxon would have provided to Imperial Oil, in a contract with Petro-Canada, and Petro-Canada would then be in the position of supplying Canadian refineries with 100,000 barrels a day of secured crude.

Mr. Lawrence: Does the minister have any assurance that Canada will be able to pay a lesser price, the same price, or an increased price for that oil; and actually is there any extra oil available from Venezuela apart from the existing contracts?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, 200,000 barrels a day of crude oil has been flowing from Venezuela to Canada. The Venezuelans have said they want to continue that flow of oil to Canada. Of that amount, 100,000 barrels have been purchased by Exxon and shipped, until recently, through Imperial Oil to Canada. Canada has intervened. The Venezuelans will be renegotiating that contract with Exxon. At that time, I would expect that Petro-Canada will be able—

Mr. Forrestall: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, apparently members of the official opposition are not interested in the very important question to Canada of security of supply. It is easy to understand why, because the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham as recently as a week ago said before the committee that if his party were in power, they would pass legislation—and these were his words—to get rid of Petro-Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Gillespie: All Canadians can understand why they are uncomfortable—

Mr. Chrétien: They are sending Ontario down the drain.

Mr. Gillespie: On the question of price, quite clearly the negotiations will take place around the normal commercial terms and conditions. That is exactly the same basis upon which the negotiations will take place with respect to Mexico: that is normal practice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Lawrence.]

FUTURE SUPPLY OF OIL FROM MULTINATIONAL OIL POOLS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question, also, is directed to the preposterous Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Anybody—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Any minister of energy, mines and resources who does not know that it was the hon. member for Halifax who introduced the one-price system for energy in the country obviously does not understand what is going on in the energy policy of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: The first suggestion in the House of Commons for a one-price system across the country was introduced by the hon. member for Halifax; the minister ought to know that. It had nothing to do with his party.

Mr. MacEachen: Why did you vote against it?

Mr. Gillies: A minister who has forgotten—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: We cannot get the energy we need—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member is indicating that he is coming to his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: It is very difficult to come to a question with the answers we are receiving here today. Seeing that the minister is moving into a policy which, indeed, could take Canada away from the possibility of participating in the multinational, general oil pools for the allocation of oil around the world, I ask the minister what specific leverage he is bringing against the multinational oil companies right now to assure that under no circumstances will Canada not be able to acquire oil from the multinational oil pools. The only time we hear anything about energy from that party is when there is a crisis.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gillies: Let us find out, now, what agreement he has which can be tabled in the House to ensure that under no circumstances will Canada not be able to participate and obtain supplies from the multinational energy, oil pools?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Ressources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a very short memory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Not as short as yours.

Mr. Gillespie: It was his party which voted against the one-price system for Canada. It was his party which voted against the Petroleum Administration Act—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: —which gives the Government of Canada the power to set prices below international prices. The hon. member has a very, very short memory.

Mr. Chrétien: No memory at all.

Mr. Gillespie: If the policy of the Tory party were in place right now, we would be paying the international price.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Stick to the question.

Mr. Gillies: Answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if we could set aside this interesting debate and get back to questions on one side and answers on the other.

Mr. Clark: The minister has no answers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley on a supplementary question.

Mr. Clark: Let the minister answer.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to ask a supplementary question when we cannot get an answer to any of the questions we ask.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The minister is a buffoon.

Mr. Gillies: If we want to talk about selective memories, we have seen one in operation. But my question is very simple and very important to the people of Canada. The question is simple, and I repeat what I asked: What has the minister done, what leverage is he applying against the multinational oil companies right now—not when we have another crisis, but right now—to ensure that under no circumstances will Canada be taken away from participating in the multinational oil pools?

● (1425)

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the policy of the Tory party is followed, we will all be paying the international price.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: We will all be paying international prices.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: There would be prices set by international companies and OPEC, and not by negotiation with the province of Alberta.

With regard to the multinationals, we have taken action because we have seen that one of the internationals, the Exxon Corporation, wanted to interfere with Canadian supply.

An hon. Member: You are not answering the question.

Mr. Gillespie: We have also taken action in respect of this bill because we have put through an amendment which will give Petro-Canada an opportunity to act as a watchdog for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: I have received assurances from the Shell Oil Company that it will deal directly with Venezuela; it is dealing directly and it is contracting directly. I have received assurances from two other major international corporations with refineries in Canada that they, too, will seek a direct buying relationship.

My regret is that Exxon was not prepared to allow its subsidiary in Canada, Imperial, to get the same deal and the same arrangements, for example, direct dealing as Shell has done; that is why I have asked Petro-Canada to step in and obtain for Canada a secure source of supply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ACTION TAKEN TO MAINTAIN SECURITY OF SUPPLY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology.

When Imperial Oil announced, on orders from Exxon, that it would divert oil destined for eastern Canada, the minister stated that this was unacceptable and that the matter would not be resolved to his satisfaction until Imperial had established direct contractual links with Venezuela.

Now that the minister has been rebuffed on both counts, can he tell us what concrete action he will be taking against Imperial to restore oil supplies, since Petro-Canada will not be able to get oil from Venezuela until existing contracts run out at the end of the year?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear yesterday, in answer to a similar question by the same hon. member, that because Imperial was unable or unwilling to secure a direct contractual relationship with Venezuela for 100,000 barrels a day, I had asked Petro-Canada to move in. Petro-Canada has been in discussion already with Venezuela in respect of securing a contract for the 100,000 barrels a day.

The hon. member knows that these exports are covered by contracts, and certain contracts have a period of time to run. The Exxon contract, as I understand it, has not run out, nor have some of the others, but there will come a time in the relatively near future when there will be discretionary volumes available, I have been advised, which Petro-Canada will then be able to negotiate or contract for and make available to Canadian refiners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered the question.

An hon. Member: That is right.

An hon. Member: He doesn't know.

Mr. Symes: The minister said that any such diversion would be totally unacceptable on the part of the government. The fact is that Imperial still refuses to ship 9,000 barrels of oil a day that was contracted for the eastern Canaian market. Is the minister going to let Imperial get away with that? Precisely what sanctions is he prepared to apply against Imperial in order that we get the oil that was duly contracted for us?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I believe the action I have taken with regard to swaps and, more particularly, to Petro-Canada's role in this matter is a clear indication of the federal government's commitment to a policy. I believe that most of the oil industry also regards it as a sanction, to use the hon. member's word.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I think it is becoming very clear to the Canadian public that, with all the rhetoric of the minister, it is Imperial Oil that has the tiger in the tank and that we have a pussycat in the energy portfolio.

Exxon has also announced that it will stop supplying oil next year to the Golden Eagle refinery which services most of the independent distributors in Quebec. The minister assures us that this shortfall will be made up by Petro-Canada importing oil from Venezuela. Is Petro-Canada, then, negotiating for oil in addition to Imperial Oil's 100,000 barrels a day share, or will Petro-Canada take over Imperial's share at the end of the year; or is the minister really telling us that it is just trying to obtain oil in addition to the 200,000 barrels a day already committed to Exxon and to Imperial? If it is the latter, then the ongoing problem of future diversions by Imperial will not be solved.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear that Petro-Canada will be entering into negotiations with Petroleos de Venezuela, the national oil company of Venezuela.

An hon. Member: Will be!

Mr. Gillespie: That national company will decide on its allocations to Exxon, to Petro-Canada, to Shell and to other Canadian refiners. Venezuela has clearly stated a preference for dealing with the national oil company of Canada and a preference for dealing on a direct basis.

I believe, given the fact that they have also given this commitment, that they will continue to supply us with 200,000 barrels a day, and that the 100,000 barrels a day which Petro-Canada will be obtaining will mostly come out of the hide of Exxon.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY WHETHER SURPLUS LANGUAGE TEACHERS WILL HAVE ACCESS TO CAREER COUNSELLING PROGRAM

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Last Tuesday, March 6, I asked the President of the Treasury Board whether he had finished his inquiry on the eligibility of surplus civil servants of the Public Service Commission Language Bureau for the career counselling program. He answered the following, and I quote:

> As I recall, we have decided to protect those people whom the hon. member referred to in the question he asked me. In other words, I think that those people who might want to follow a career counselling program will be protected until new funds are available.

However, during the last few days, several of those teachers were refused access to the career counselling program. Can the President of the Treasury Board tell us whether he is really responsible for the decisions he makes in his department, whether he is the boss in his department? Finally, do surplus teachers of the Public Service Commission Language Bureau have the right to avail themselves of the career counselling program, yes or no?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, it is clear. Mr. Speaker, I checked that, after which I gave that information to my hon. colleague. I checked that with the people in my department. Of course we provided funds amounting to $4.3 million but we allocated all those funds to the people who have already registered for that program. If my memory serves me well, about 100 teachers from the Language Bureau were not admitted in that program but there are something like 250 or 300 teachers who are registered. The funds which will be available by April 1 have already been earmarked for the teachers and the other people who are already registered in the career counselling program.

Mr. Laprise: On a supplementary. I understand the reply given by the President of the Treasury Board, but teachers who want to participate in this carreer counselling program are being told that funds are used only to pay public servants and allow them to travel in Canada, and that there are no funds available for them until April 1. Can the President of the Treasury Board tell us if these teachers will be eligible for funds under this program as of April 1?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, as I have just said, the additional $4.3 million allocated to this program has already been paid to teachers, about 250 of whom are already registered for this course. They will be using the $4.3 million after April 1. I think that some 100 teachers are not registered, because of insufficient funds, unfortunately.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, on another supplementary. The minister tells us there are no longer sufficient funds for those 100 teachers to register with the CCP. With a view to making up to some extent for the injustice inflicted upon those French language teachers when it was decided to cancel the program before 1983, at which time it was originally supposed to end, could the minister not find funds, somehow, somewhere, to give them the same opportunities as the other teachers?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I can look into that suggestion but last year the amount available was $1.7 million, I believe, and we have now increased those funds to $4.3 million. However, I shall see if perhaps other funds cannot be used to that end.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TREATMENT OF VIETNAMESE REFUGEES

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the truly scandalous way that Vietnam is ridding itself of its citizens of Chinese descent—reminiscent of nazi Germany's treatment of the Jews—and in view of the fact that Canada is taking more of these refugees from Vietnam than any other non-involved country, is the Canadian government making a firm protest to Hanoi of its practice of extorting money from ethnic Chinese by Vietnamese government officials and then actually putting these ethnic Chinese aboard unsafe and unsanitary freighters by means of Vietnamese government launches?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not want either to confirm or deny the various specific matters raised by the hon. member, because I am not personally aware of them.

I do know, as I am sure do all members of the House, that the plight of the Vietnamese refugees is most deplorable, and in that regard we have made repeated representations to the Vietnamese authorities. I believe that within the next few days a further representation will be made in Hanoi.

So far we have been encouraged by the reports we have had from the Vietnamese officials that they are prepared to be more forthcoming. I say that with some qualification because I do not want to raise hopes inordinately. At the moment, the Vietnamese have said that they are prepared to be more co-operative and perhaps to eliminate some of the practices to which the hon. member referred. In order to make sure that the matter is moved on as fast as possible, our representatives have been instructed to take that initiative as quickly as they can, which will be within a few days.

ENERGY

PRICE OF OIL PURCHASED THROUGH PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who so far today has evaded answering three specific and important questions about his so-called arrangement with Venezuela.

Can the minister tell the House of Commons whether he now has specific guarantees that the price of oil through Petro-Canada would be lower than or at least the same as the price we now pay? If he has those guarantees, will he tell this House today or by tabling later this week exactly what those precise guarantees are?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that they will be the normal commercial terms.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, that is another way of saying no, he has no guarantees. I wonder if I might ask the minister whether—there is a great deal of shouting on the other side, Mr. Speaker, so I will wait until they calm down.

My question to the minister now is this: Does he have any guarantees, now, that there would be oil available from Venezuela? Has he those guarantees? Will he tell us their specific nature, now, and if he cannot tell us their specific nature will he give us a specific undertaking to table later this week a document indicating their specific nature?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will guarantee one thing: I will guarantee there will be no profits paid to a third party, to a middleman. The hon. Leader of the Opposition cannot guarantee, with his policy, that that will not happen if Exxon continues. Indeed, he invites everybody to believe that he will continue with the Exxon arrangement which would cream off and guarantee third party or middleman profits. I will guarantee to the Canadian people that there will not be any third party profits of that kind.

Mr. Clark: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister is much better at accusations than he is at answers. Let me try him on a third matter. Can he tell this House of Commons what specific agreements he has now from multinationals involved in the oil business to guarantee Canada's continued access to multinational pools, so that in the next crisis Canada will not find herself cut off from multinational supplies?

What are the specific guarantees? Can he tell us what they are, now, in detail or will he give us an undertaking to table in detail later this week the nature of those specific guarantees he has with multinationals?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition were following the debate, he would realize this is one of the problems: that companies like Exxon will not guarantee to Canada continuing supplies. He would also realize that is one of the things we are trying to extract from the international companies. We have been after the internationals to give us those guarantees. We have not yet got them, but we hope to get them. He should also realize that while we cannot get them, we are prepared to instruct Petro-Canada, the company which he would destroy, he would dismantle, he would wind-up—

Mr. Whelan: Shame.

Mr. Gillespie: We intend to use Petro-Canada to provide security for Canada, which he would destroy.

CALL FOR NATIONAL INQUIRY INTO NUCLEAR ISSUES

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who did, indeed, establish quite a record with regard to third party payments on nuclear plants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: My question concerns the conference on nuclear issues held last week in Vancouver which was sponsored by the Committee on Nuclear Issues in the Community, a federally-funded body.

Since, in the words of the national co-chairman, the conference in Vancouver produced "little results"—and, sir, I have deleted the expletives—and since the committee has only managed to hold three meetings at the community level during the past year, with negligible results, is the minister finally prepared to do what we in this opposition party have been asking for a long time with regard to this issue, that is, to set up a national inquiry to examine every aspect of the risks and benefits of nuclear power?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. lady had followed the remarks of the chairman, she would realize that he was placing considerable emphasis on dialogue, as we have. She would recognize that there have been three royal commissions, and that a fourth one was appointed recently. I am referring, of course, to the Hamm royal commission in Ontario, to the Porter royal commission which is continuing its work in Ontario, to the Bayda royal commission in Saskatchewan and, more recently, the Bates royal commission in Vancouver.

There has been a large number of royal commissions: four, to be exact. Those royal commissions have been examining the very kinds of questions which the hon. member says she would like yet another inquiry to examine. We felt it would be more appropriate to place the emphasis on dialogue. The problem has been that when we have tried to create conditions for dialogue, the dialogue has not occurred; it has been used as a platform for various contending forces. Indeed, too often, unfortunately, it has turned into diatribe, not dialogue.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister happens to be relying on Ontario in this regard for a royal commission report, or on Saskatchewan, as he said, we on this side are interested in who speaks for Canada on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: Since we are the only country in the western world concerned with nuclear power that has not addressed this subject nationally and publicly, since the minister's in-house task force committee has not been able to come to grips with the public's concern, and since the Committee on Nuclear Issues in the Community did not even get down to the community level, I should like to ask the minister: since he is not prepared to set up a national inquiry to deal with this subject, how does he intend to have the national voice heard on this very important matter?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I thought I noticed that the hon. lady blushed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Iona, there is a chauvinist in your midst.

Mr. Gillespie: Who speaks for Canada?

An hon. Member: Not you.

Mr. Gillespie: I think if she were serious in her question, she would recognize that this House and the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works has an opportunity of hearing—

Miss MacDonald: You would not even give us a reference.

Mr. Gillespie: —and taking into consideration the views of Canadians wherever they may be.

An hon. Member: There is no reference.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, a report was referred to that committee. It was prepared by a group of experts. That committee has had a number of hearings. That reference is presently before the committee and, at the committee's pleasure, it can call witnesses to consider that very important question.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

CRITERIA RESPECTING EX GRATIA PAYMENTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

I come back to the subject of the government's policy on ex gratia payments which, as the government has quite properly said, are based on benevolence, public interest and no liability—although they do not seem to be following this approach with people like Dr. Peter Treu.

I ask the minister why Treasury Board emphatically rejected, on November 17, 1977, a $500,000 ex gratia payment to Ste. Marie Air Services. Can the minister explain what amazing reversal then apparently prompted Treasury Board to change its mind and pay this $500,000?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has written to me on this matter and I have replied to him, I think, on two occasions by letter. I am looking at the letter now. It seems to have had some difficulty in permeating through to the member, so I thought maybe I should take it past once more. I wrote as follows:

—in the case of the payment of $500,000 to Ste. Marie Air Services, the fact that there was at the time of consideration a bill before the House of Commons that would have entitled certain people, affected by a decision to utilize air space above their operations, to compensation.

The hon. member has written again suggesting that he is unhappy with this reply. I have requested that additional information be sought.

Mr. Stevens: You do not understand it.

Mr. Buchanan: Neither does the hon. member. I would be happy to pursue it further with him.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. For the minister's information, Bill C-4—which is the only possible one which could apply—does not apply. I want to bring to his attention a Treasury Board memorandum which I hope he has seen. It indicates that the cheque was delivered on March 23. It also refers to the fact that the release that cost the taxpayers of this country $500,000 for picking up some nebulous interest, no doubt, was not to be registered.

I want to ask the minister why this practice was not followed. Surely he is expected to show a little good management in this country. Why was this release not registered for that half million dollars after the policy was reversed?

● (1450)

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member, my understanding is that the payment that was made to Ste. Marie Air Services complied with the policy which was explained to him clearly in a letter, and that in fact the payment that was made complied with that policy of the federal government.

Oral Questions

HEALTH AND WELFARE

OHIP—DEFINITION OF "REASONABLE ACCESS TO INSURED SERVICES BY INSURED PERSONS"

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare: it deals with the matters I raised on Monday.

I point out to the minister that the Medical Care Act which was passed by parliament in 1960 provides that contributions made to a province where there are "uniform terms and conditions to all insurable residents", and I quote:

—on a basis that does not impede or preclude, either directly or indirectly, whether by charges made to insured persons or otherwise, reasonable access to insured services by insured persons.

My question to the minister is quite simple. What is the minister's definition of "reasonable access" which is set out in the Medical Care Act? Will the guidelines which she says her department is preparing include the problem of the deterrent fees as well as the problem of physical access where there are no doctors in the plan?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thought my answer on Monday was also reasonably simple. I answered every aspect of that question. I said that I had instructed my officials, further to the meeting of the deputy minister of health, to develop the guidelines defining the practical implications and barriers or what the four principles, including universality and accessibility, mean. I will have them make that known to the provinces as soon as it is done.

By this time I have forgotten the last part of the hon. member's question—which I also answered on Monday, by the way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, the Ontario minister of health, Mr. Timbrell, when asked questions apparently spoke to the minister after our discussion in the House on Monday. He said, "The minister and I are of one mind. We are both concerned that universality be maintained; however, universality could not be defined".

Nothwithstanding that when a Liberal and a Tory cabinet minister get together, they might well produce one mind, my question is this: Does the minister agree that the federal government has a responsibility to produce—and it should not be very difficult and should not require extensive discussion with officials—a definition of the concept of universality so that it is understood by the provinces? Does she not think that the federal government has a responsibility to provide insured services to people right across Canada, when we know that these insured services are not being provided at the present time?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Dennis Timbrell and I are of one mind, then the hon. member for Cochrane is in a difficult split-personality position.

I again repeat that Canadians will continue to have access to a universal system that does not have deterrent fees which prevent their getting all the health care they need. The telephone conversations I had have no relationship to this discussion. I told my colleague, the Ontario minister, that universality and accessibility are, of course, principles that we will not abandon today. We are developing those guidelines. This includes deterrent fees—which was the last part of the question—the relationship of doctors' fee schedules and the way the provinces have settled them.

I have indicated to this House that I have one question to which I want an answer. Why is it that provinces like Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario have settled for such low fees for the doctors, thus permitting extra billings on the backs of the customers?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE SEAL HUNT

PETITION SIGNED BY BRITISH MPs OPPOSING THE HUNT

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the minister of fisheries and oceans.

In view of reports in yesterday's press that 70 Labour members of parliament in Great Britain have signed a petition opposing the seal hunt and asking their government to take discriminatory action against Canada, will the minister ask the British government to advise those 70 members to address themselves to the serious problems facing their own country and cease interfering in matters of strictly Canadian jurisdiction and concern?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am sure this House would not want me to assume responsibility for what members of another House decide to do or not do. Perhaps I can quote a famous phrase from the fishermen's union leader in Newfoundland, who reminded us that the RSPCA had been created many years before legislation was passed to protect children from going down to work in the mines.

BANK ACT

LEGISLATION TO EXTEND PROVISIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It has to do with the Bank Act which expired in 1977 and was continued by action of parliament until March 31 of this year.

Does the government intend to bring in legislation between now and the end of this month concerning the Bank Act and the extension of that act?

[Miss Bégin.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows, if parliament sits for 20 days—as I recollect—in the month of March, it would be necessary to bring in a bank extension act, or in the meantime pass the major revisions to the Bank Act itself, which I regard as quite unrealistic.

I assure the right hon. member that we will take action rather than have the banks disappear in the absence of a bank extension act or an end of parliament before the expiry of the 20 days.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As always, the hon. gentleman answers questions fully and unobjectively. I point out to him that, with all the circumlocution he took in his answer, he failed to point out the fact that if an election is called between now and March 31, the Bank Act would continue automatically to be in effect. Is that what the government intends to do? Does the evasion on the part of the minister indicate that that is the plan?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to correct the right hon. gentleman—

Mr. Jamieson: Oh, go on.

Mr. MacEachen: —but I think the expiry date would be earlier than March 31. With regard to the very interesting question which he has posed, I think we will all have to wait and see.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

BROADCASTING OF WHA GAMES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State, who is responsible to this House for the CBC.

In view of the fact that I made personal representations to the minister in this chamber over nine months ago concerning the CBC's broadcasting of certain WHA games in the cities of Edmonton, Winnipeg and Quebec City, could the minister now inform the House if either he or his officials in the CBC have given authorization to broadcasting WHA games involving Canadian teams such as the Edmonton Oilers, the Winnipeg Jets and the Quebec Nordiques, thereby giving the citizens of all of Canada, particularly Edmonton, Winnipeg and Quebec City a greater sense of national involvement, and stop treating us as second-class citizens in western Canada?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it is undoubtedly true that the hon. member, as well as many members on this side, made representations to me months ago about coverage by the CBC of World Hockey Association games. I did transfer those representations to the CBC, as I am sure I told the hon. member I would. I will be glad once again to communicate with them to see if they agree with the hon. member that he has been treated like a second-class citizen in this matter.

WAGE COMPARABILITY WITH PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Two days ago, in response to a question from the hon. member for York-Simcoe, the Minister of Finance said:

That is why I am pleased to report that the public sector, both federal and provincial, by the end of 1978 was two points below the private sector.

Can the President of the Treasury Board tell me whether that statement was true or false?

● (1500)

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the federal public sector—I cannot speak for the other two levels of government—was at approximately 7 per cent after it came out of controls, and that the private sector during the period in which it was totally outside controls was at 9 per cent, which would account for that difference of 2 per cent.

Mr. Fraser: The words of the Minister of Finance were clear; he said "both federal and provincial" in terms of the public sector. I am asking the minister whether, in fact, that statement was correct, whether those figures include total compensation or whether they are limited merely to wages.

If those figures allow for total compensation, what effect might they have on the comments made by the Minister of Labour with respect to legislative comparability in Bill C-22?

Mr. Buchanan: Again, I am sorry I cannot give the exact figure for the provincial governments. I believe it is somewhat in excess of our 7 per cent; but the 7 per cent I quoted does, in fact, embrace compensation and it is my understanding that the private sector figure I used also embraces total compensation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. YEWCHUK—RESPONSE OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, in the course of discussion of a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) to which a contribution was made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), a question arose as to a possible discrepancy between various texts of Hansard and the final printed version. As has always been my practice and as I naturally would, I undertook to look into this matter on behalf of the House and determine the true sequence of events as they occurred.

The quotation by the hon. member for Athabasca was, in fact, from the press run copy, which is the first rough copy which comes from the reporter's notes. It is not verified by the reporter or by the editor; it is simply a rough copy prepared by the reporter, which has been used by the press but has never been used for purposes of quotation either by them or in the House because of its rough, unedited nature. When the reporter has an opportunity to verify the notes and the editor has examined them, a second copy is prepared. That is the copy generally referred to as "the blues" which goes to the member who is concerned in case any alterations might be required to improve the grammatical sense or the editorial accuracy of those notes before the final version is printed.

In this particular case several changes, as is always the situation, were made between the rough copy which, as I say, is not to be used for quotation, and the preliminary copy, "the blue", the one which is submitted to members for verification. The minister has said in this instance that no alterations were made by her. The alterations which were made were made by the Editor and the Chief of the Branch, Mr. Baker, who as is, thankfully, his usual practice, backs up his own floor reporters by sitting in the gallery and taking his own notes. When he examined the rough copy he made the changes which occurred and he did so because his notes indicated that those changes accurately reflected what the minister had, in fact, said.

Subsequently, since this matter had arisen, I asked him, of course, to verify his version with the sound tape and also with the television tape. He has done so and verifies that his own notes as to what the minister had said were, in fact, accurate. His notes were verified by the sound tape and the television tape. That is why the version in his notes, which appeared in "the blues" and in the final transcript of Hansard, is precisely the language used by the minister on Monday.

I think we have to say in the circumstances of the tumultuous exchanges which can take place in the House of Commons it is a mark of considerable merit to the Hansard reporters, and particularly to the Chief of Hansard that he extends this rather remarkable devotion to the accuracy of the printed word.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. McKENZIE—ANSWER GIVEN BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO MINISTER OF TRANSPORT DURING DEBATE ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to obtain clarification with regard to something which was said in the course of the debate in which I was involved in last night on the adjournment motion. I was misinformed by the parliamentary secretary—perhaps he misunderstood my question, or whoever prepared the answer he gave did not prepare it properly. I was inquiring when an independent audit would be carried out in connection with the Canadian National pension fund and when such an audit would be tabled in the House of Commons. Such a procedure was agreed to on May 4, 1978, when I presented an amendment to Bill C-17 in the House of Commons which called for:

A continuous audit of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways and the pension fund of its employees shall be made by independent auditors appointed annually by the governor in council and the auditors shall report annually to parliament in respect of their audits.

Last night the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) stated in his answer to me:

—I should like to tell him that that the CN pension fund has been audited for 1978 by the accounting firm of Coopers & Lybrand. In addition, the Superintendent of Insurance has completed an audit on the Canadian National pension fund.

The second question was: when will this report be made public? . . . he should know that the annual report of the CNR is automatically referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. We have a tool there which we can use to put questions to the administration—

Mr. Speaker, the terms of my amending motion call for this independent audit to be tabled in the House of Commons. I checked with the parliamentary returns branch and find they have received no audit whatsoever from any auditors. All they have is an auditor's report for 1977 and there is no information at all in that about pension funds. They have no annual report for 1978 and no independent audit of the pension fund for 1978. In these circumstances the statement by the parliamentary secretary that I can get all the information I want in the standing committee when CN officials are there is not correct. The annual report and audit are to be tabled in the House of Commons; it is not for me to go to the standing committee to get the information. This being the case, I should like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) or his parliamentary secretary to tell me whether they properly understood my question last night or whether whoever prepared the answer which was given prepared it correctly.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I feel the hon. member is exaggerating somewhat when he says that I may have misled the House last night. If you reread the text of my reply, it will be found more accurately that I did not give a specific answer to the also specific question of the hon. member, but that all I did say was a reflection of the truth. With regard to the more specific question, that is, when the report of the auditors will be tabled in parliament, I shall inquire about it and advise the hon. member accordingly.

[Text]

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION FUNDS

Question No. 146—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the government giving consideration to having the funds which are contributed to the western grain stabilization plan deposited in other than the consolidated revenue fund, and allowing such funds to be used for the benefit of the western economy?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The minister responsible is considering alternative means of handling the funds, particularly in relation to a request from Credit Unions.

URBAN AFFAIRS—PROJECTS IN RICHMOND

Question No. 831—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Ministry planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The Minister of State for Urban Affairs did not finance any projects in the constituency of Richmond since the formation of this ministry in June 1971. There is no plan to finance any projects in the near future because the ministry will not be functioning after March 31, 1979.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, having regard to the request of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young) to stand all notices of motions for the production of papers. I want to draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary the fact that item No. 1 under notices of motions for the production of papers has been on the order paper since the beginning of this session, and it has not been dealt with yet. I point out that subsequent notices of motions for the production of papers have been presented and dealt with by the parliamentary secretary from time to time and that mine has not been attended to.

I am moved to bring this to the attention of the House and the parliamentary secretary at this time because during the question period the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) said that in terms of nuclear policy he wanted dialogue and not diatribe. My notice of motion, to refresh the memory of the parliamentary secretary, is the following:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all documents relating to the establishment of a uranium refinery near Warman, Saskatchewan, or elsewhere in the province of Saskatchewan, by Eldorado Nuclear Limited, and copies of an agreement between the government and the province of Saskatchewan or their respective agencies.

This matter has come before the House on previous occasions and the government has not produced these very important documents. The reason it has refused to do so is that the government says it has a proprietary interest in these documents, and the government feels it is not in its interest to disclose to the people of Canada all the environmental studies it is doing in Saskatchewan and what its plans are with respect to the establishment of a refinery in that province. The people of Saskatchewan are entitled to documents and information before Eldorado Nuclear Limited moves unilaterally on its plans to create this refinery.

This is another example of this government's inability to understand that the people of Canada have certain rights regarding information. I press this matter on the basis of freedom of information. If this is the kind of "dialogue" the government thinks it can get away with, it has another thing coming. I remind the parliamentary secretary again that an election cannot be far down the road. The people of Saskatchewan will remember this slap in the face and this lack of intention on the part of the government to bring forward this information.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I sense that the hon. member has strayed from the merits of the matter of the documents alone and is on to a slightly political discussion.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, having provided the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) with at least one answer this afternoon, I thought he might have been a little bit happier. I can tell him that I had hoped to deal with notice of motion for the production of papers No. 1, but there seems to have been some foul-up in the transmission of the papers. I assure the hon. member that I will do the very best I can to deal with this motion very quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, again I would like to bring to your attention the number of questions on the order paper which were not answered today. There are approximately 82 days left for this parliament. There are 1,200 questions to be answered, and for the government to be answering three questions a day during working days is unfair. I think the government could do a much better job. I would like to see it do a much better job.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will recognize that they missed their chance to raise this subject. We have passed the item of questions on the order paper. I asked if the remaining questions should be allowed to stand, and there was agreement. After that, as we always do, we dealt with the last matter, notices of motions for the production of papers. Any further grievances about questions on the order paper will have to wait until tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF INACTION WITH RESPECT TO PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to take any steps to halt the rising cost of living, and for its failure to roll back, on a selective basis, price increases which are grossly unfair and which are causing extreme hardship for all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will remember that proceedings on this motion shall expire, in accordance with Standing Order 58(11), at the ordinary hour of adjournment later this day.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the motion put before the House today by our party reflects what I think is the number one issue among ordinary Canadians from coast to coast. That number one issue is the skyrocketing increases we have seen over the last year or so.

Today we received some further evidence of skyrocketing price increases from Statistics Canada. About an hour and a half ago Statistics Canada announced that the industry selling price for manufacturing in this country went up by 11 per cent from January of 1978 to January of 1979. Just yesterday in the House the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) assured us that a 3 per cent cut in the manufacturers' sales tax had been passed on to consumers and that that is reflected in the consumer price index. When the minister rises to respond, I hope he will explain how it is that that 3 per cent sales tax cut was passed on when the manufacturing index has gone up by 11 per cent. It is at its highest level since June of 1975. I think the government has been failing on that front as well as many other fronts.

The consumer price index has gone up by some 8.9 per cent. On the other hand, wages increased in 1978 by only 6.4 per cent. In other words, the average standard of living for workers in this country is going down, not up. It is going down largely because a few years ago the Anti-Inflation Board controlled wages but not prices or profits. One need only look at statistics from Statistics Canada on the average weekly wage in 1978 to find that the average weekly wage went up from $252 to $269, which was an increase of less than the increase in the cost of living. If we compute into that the increase in the cost of living, we find that the net loss to the average Canadian worker was some $340 in 1978. So the standard of living in this country has been going down.

This afternoon I want to speak about a number of things which we think should be done. In my opinion the government has not been doing well with regard to a number of things, and I will give the minister some specific examples. The minister is always looking into things. His department does not seem to know its left foot from its right foot. His department seems to exist only for cosmetic and public relations purposes. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is a tame pussycat who just purrs. He has yet to learn how to growl and really mean business when dealing with big companies. There have been increases in food prices, farm input costs, lumber prices, energy prices and automobile prices. I could go on and on.

What has the government's response been to the increase in the cost of living? First of all, we had the Anti-Inflation Board which studies profits and not mark-ups. Then we had CSIP which turned out to be a disastrous little institution. Then we had the announcement the other day that tariffs will be taken off some foods. That made big banner headlines across the country. When we checked with the Department of Finance we found out that the reduction of tariffs, and the removal of tariffs in some cases, will mean a saving of only $10 million to the consumers of this country. That means that if you go out and buy a pound of raisins, it will cost you 1.5 cents less than it did before. It will cost you 2 cents less for a can of tomato juice, and it will cost you 7 cents less for a cauliflower. Some policy!

Then, with great fanfare, the establishment two weeks ago of the National Commission on Inflation was announced. Again I suggest it is nothing more than a public relations effort by this government. It has the power to investigate price increases, it has the power and authority to publicize those increases, but it does not have any power to do anything about those price increases. It is an economic eunuch. At this time we need an economic policeman who could intervene in the market place. It does not have any power to control the price; it does not have any power at all to hold back a price while it is being investigated; it does not have any power to freeze a specific price where there has been some profiteering or some gouging of the public.

As I said, what we need is an agency that is strong. I want to suggest to the minister a number of things which we think must be done if we are to control, to a significant degree, the increase in the cost of living. Our party has spoken about a fair prices commission which would put some teeth into the government's national commission on inflation, which would take the shackles off its feet and which would allow it to have some power and some influence, a commission which would be a small and powerful watchdog with the power to roll back prices when they need to be rolled back. It would have the power to stall a price increase while we are investigating whether or not it is too high. It would have the power to freeze the price for a certain amount of time.

The minister has said to that, "Well, the NDP wants to bring back controls." We are not talking about across the board controls, freezes, or anything of that sort. We are talking about a small body that would have the power, on a selective basis, to stop profiteering or high price increases, and to force rollbacks where rollbacks are deemed to be necessary. I am talking about a powerful little watchdog, an economic hit team which would have the power to go to a bakery, a banking company or an oil company, and say, "Look, we have found your prices to be too high and they should not be that high. You are profiteering, roll back your prices." I suggest they may only look into one out of 500 or 1,000 price increases, but no one will know who will be hit next, and therefore we believe it would have the effect of keeping companies and the market place honest. We do not have that now.

The minister says, "There are all kinds of problems with it. What about the Constitution and prices being under provincial jurisdiction?" I suggest to him that when they brought in the AIB they did not have any problem in controlling wages and getting the provinces to agree. I am sure there is as much an emergency now as there was three years ago when they brought in AIB. We also have other controls in this country. We have a two-price system for wheat, we have a two-price system for copper, and a two-price system for energy. We also have the CTC which controls and regulates prices. What we can do through those agencies and with those commodities, I suggest we can do through the fair prices commission. We can expand our philosophy to the fair prices commission which will have the power, on a selective basis, to roll back prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I would like to give the minister seven or eight specific examples of what we would refer to a fair prices commission, if he had the guts and the courage to set one up in the country. But before I do that I want to mention briefly four other things which we believe should be done if we are going to bring down the cost of living in this country.

Second, we should reinstate the food subsidies which have been taken off by this government, subsidies which were imposed through the pressure of this party in the minority parliament from 1972 to 1974, food subsidies on fluid milk and on skim milk powder, and put back subsidies on bread and flour which were removed shortly before Christmas of last year. We found that when the subsidy was taken off skim milk powder about a year or so ago, the consumption of skim milk powder in the first six months after the subsidy went off went down by some 56 per cent. Yet the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) says she is concerned about nutrition and the health of young people.

Third, the bank rate in this country has increased by 40 per cent in the last 13 months. We have a bank rate now that is usurious, that is costing the consumers, the housebuilders, and the farmers a lot more money than it should. We are suggesting to the government that there be an immediate reduction of the bank rate by one per cent and a further gradual reduction after that.

Fourth, there is going to be a two step increase in the price of oil by $1 a barrel in the month of July and another $1 a barrel in January of 1980. We said to the government that both these increases should be rescinded. We do not need these increases and therefore we should be freezing temporarily the price of gasoline, the price of home heating fuel, and the price of other petroleum products we get from oil. I am aware that this would create some anxiety among the government's friends such as the Exxon Corporation, but if one looks at their profit figures one finds that we have played Santa Claus far too long in this country.

An hon. Member: Trust Texaco!

Mr. Lalonde: And Mr. Blakeney.

Mr. Nystrom: We are saying that the regulatory agencies in this country should be beefed up and made tougher, agencies such as the Canadian Transport Commission, in terms of the freight rates and in terms of the Bell Telephone rates that are determined by the CTC.

These are five points in summary which we think should be implemented immediately if we are to decrease the cost of living in Canada.

Now I want to give the minister a few specific examples of price increases which we think warrant investigation by an agency which has the power to roll back prices or to control a price temporarily while an investigation is being carried on. These are not very obscure items, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) says, they are items that have been mentioned to us by hundreds of people across the country, items that people buy when they go into the supermarket to purchase consumer goods.

I want to say that there is a great deal of concern across the way that there will be an increase in the cost of living or an increase in inflation because of big wage demands. I want to say to the government that the most effective way to make sure that workers demand reasonable wage increases is to make sure that the price increases which workers are faced with in supermarkets are reasonable and that those prices are kept low.

First I want to speak about food and the Anti-Inflation Board. In 1978 the price of food went up by 21 per cent. We look at our food dollar. I know that as compared to other countries we do not pay much for our food in terms of the percentage of our dollar. We pay about 16 per cent or 17 per cent and so do people in the United States; in Europe they pay about 20 per cent, in Japan about 30 per cent, and in India about 60 per cent. But when I take a look at the food dollar, I wonder where that food dollar has gone.

Back in 1951, when I was in kindergarten, the farmers got some 60 per cent of the food dollar. But last year, in 1978, the farmers' share of the food dollar has been reduced from 60 per cent to 38 per cent. It is that reduction in the farmers' share of the food dollar that concerns all of us from rural ridings, and it concerns many Canadians because most Canadians do not blame the farmers for the rapid increase in the price of food.

I should like to take a look at some of the specific price increases which I believe the minister should examine. I will start off with turkey. We all remember before Christmas when the increase in the price of turkeys was skyrocketing. We remember the minister saying that farmers were not producing enough; let us open the borders and fly some more turkeys in. That is one turkey who is an expert on turkeys. He said that we need more imports and that there is a shortage of supply. After Christmas and after the supermarkets were restricting the supply to Canadian consumers, we find instead of a shortage that in January there was 22 million pounds of turkey in supply. I believe the minister should have looked into it. He should have had an agency powerful enough to say to the supermarkets, "Look, roll back the price of turkeys. You are gouging Canadian consumers; you are doing it intentionally."

Let us have a look at the price of grade A turkey which is under ten pounds in weight. In the week ending February 9, 1979, as compared to one year earlier, the retail price of grade A turkey went up by some 36 per cent; but the price the farmer receives went up by only 12.5 per cent. The raw product rose 12.5 per cent and the retail price rose 36 per cent. Why does the minister not look into that to ensure that there is an agency to roll back that price to the consumers being gouged?

The same thing applies to the price of chicken. If we compare the same periods of time we will find that the retail price of chicken went up from 69 cents per pound to $1.18 per pound, which is an increase of 71 per cent; while the price the farmer received for producing chicken went up from 46 cents a pound to 53 cents a pound, for an increase of 15 per cent. I am sure it is not the worker processing chicken who received the extra cream. It is not the farmer, but I wonder about the retail companies, processors and people in between. Again the minister rose and talked about a shortage of supply, but the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) set him straight by saying that there were four million pounds more chicken in storage as of February 1, 1979, than a year ago. Still the price of chicken rose. It is rather suspicious, it seems to me.

I should like to refer to another example, the price of skim milk powder which is needed by younger people, and indeed by all Canadians. The 34-cent per pound subsidy was removed. The farmers received an increase of four cents per pound. The actual price of raw material went up by 38 cents, but when we look at the new price in the supermarkets it was up by 45 cents a pound. Why did it cost an extra seven cents for skim milk products?

Now I should like to deal with beef. We know farmers were being pressured and ripped off with a low price for beef for three or four years in a row, until approximately a year ago. Last year when prices finally started to rise for the farmers, lo and behold, the price started rising faster for the consumer. We can take a look at some of the margins and some of the spreads. The information I am about to refer to comes from the beef information centre. In June, 1978, the average mark-up on a pound of beef in Toronto was 66 cents, in Calgary it was 72 cents, and in Vancouver it was 94 cents, whereas the mark-up the previous year was 20 cents per pound. I am told by people in the retail business that a mark-up of approximately 25 cents to 30 cents per pound is normal and profitable for supermarkets.

Another example is the price of pork. The minister should direct his attention to this area. In the week ending June 24, 1978, compared to the week ending June 24, 1977, the price of bacon rose 22 per cent, the price of a roast of pork went up 34 per cent, and the price of sausage, which unfortunately a lot of poor people eat because it is one of the cheapest meats, went up by 75 per cent. How much did the price of pork to the farmer rise? The price of pork to the farmer rose 5.8 per cent during the same period of time. We checked out wage increases for packing-house workers and we found the annual wage increase was well within the guidelines established by the Anti-Inflation Board.

Now I should like to deal with the price of bread. Of course we had the intervention of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In a minority parliament we were able to force the minister to subsidize the price of bread for Canadian consumers. The subsidy was removed because of the so-called restraint program when government picks on the little guy. The subsidy on an average loaf of bread of 3.3 cents was removed, yet in retail stores the price of a loaf of bread rose by seven cents or more. In January the CPI indicated that the average increase in the price of bread was 13 per cent. I say to the minister why? When the price of raw material rises 3.3 cents, why does the price of the final product rise by seven cents? Between December 31 and January 1 wages and other costs did not go up. The price of raw material went up 3.3 cents, but the retail price more than doubled. The minister said he is looking into that matter. I wonder if the minister ever stops looking into anything. I wonder if he ever looks in a mirror to see whether he is being serious as the minister.

Of course the subsidy was removed on flour when it was removed on bread, the subsidy of 22 cents on 5.5 pounds of flour. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) buys flour for his wife and five children. When he went into the store in January to buy flour he did not find a price increase of 22 cents; if was 44 cents. In the city of Regina the increase in the price of flour was 42 cents. Once again I must ask, why? When the 22-cent subsidy was removed, why was the retail mark-up 44 cents? In other words, why was the retail mark-up twice that of the raw material?

I should like to turn to the other side of farm equation which makes farmers so angry. I have spoken with farmers from all parts of the country, each and every week. When they find out that the price to consumers of the food they produce is escalating while their incomes are dropping or remaining the same, they become angry. For example, the net incomes of farmers in Saskatchewan actually will drop in 1979, while the net incomes of other farmers across the land will not change. This is happening while farm input costs are escalating rapidly.

The minister and his officials should be investigating and rolling back unwarranted price increases. Repeatedly farmers have referred to price increases in parts and repairs on farm machinery. When the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was approached by farmers he was told that a little nut, bolt or part which used to cost approximately a couple of dollars now costs $10 or $12.

I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the specific example of a press drill boot. I tell the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that a press drill boot is a little metal ending which is on the end of the hose or funnel which goes between the disks when seeds are being planted in a field. The International Harvester press drill boot ten years ago cost $8 each. Approximately three years ago the same little piece of metal cost $27 each. Do hon. members know what that piece of metal costs today? It costs approximately $62. It went up by 129 per cent in three years, and in the last year it went up some 55 per cent.

Mr. Rodriguez: It must be made of nickel.

Mr. Benjamin: Or gold-plated.

Mr. Nystrom: I know the salaries of steelworkers did not rise that much. Also I know the raw price of steel did not rise that much. I look at the profits of steel companies and I wonder whether the extra dollars being paid by farmers for press drill boots went to the multinational companies in terms of profits. That particular problem was referred by the minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Do hon. members know what the minister said? He said, "I am sorry; we have no power to roll back prices since the AIB. We have set up CSIP to investigate, but there is no apparent violation under the Combines Investigation Act, and we have no power to roll back price increases since the AIB went to the promised land and was buried."

• (1540)

Let me give the minister a few more examples of farm input cost increases that anger my constituents. Let us consider the 100-horsepower tractor, which is a common thing on the farm these days. The average price of such a tractor, according to the department of agriculture in the province of Alberta, went up by some 16 per cent in the last year. That tractor now costs the farmer $28,000. Let us consider the combine which a year ago cost $32,000 and now costs $41,000 for the same model and the same size, but one year newer. That is an increase of some 30 per cent. Is it any wonder that the price of the final product in this country is going up at an alarmingly rapid rate?

Let me give the minister a couple of examples outside the food and agricultural area. The first example I would mention is textiles. I do not know if the minister noticed in the newspaper this morning the report that the price of textiles in this country has gone up by some 66 per cent in one case and 73 per cent in another. I wonder whether he is investigating to see if textile companies have been taking advantage of protective quotas, and whether they have been taking advantage of the reduced value of the Canadian dollar.

Then we have another example in relation to the cost of lumber which has gone up by 80 per cent in the last two years. It now costs about $1,200 more to build a house of 1,800 square feet than it did two years ago, strictly because the input cost of lumber has gone up by 80 per cent.

Let me use the very specific example given by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). The price of one board foot of two by four a year ago was 17 cents. The price today is six cents more, or 23 cents, an increase of roughly one third. At the same time we see that profits in the pulp and paper industry have increased almost without exception, in many cases to very high levels. At the same time this government has handed over $235 million to the pulp and paper companies.

If we are going to talk about restraint in this country we should make sure it is not practised on the backs of the ordinary citizens, the farmers, the workers, the old and the young. Restraint should be practised on the backs of those who can best carry the burden, the wealthy and the large multinational companies in this country.

I have given the minister a number of specific examples today of things that are of real concern to the average citizen right across this country. I do not want him to get up and say, "I am looking into this", or "I have looked into that". I want him to get up and tell us why he does not go to the cabinet and say, "Look, I need the power to change this National Commission on Inflation from a pussycat to a tiger. What we need in this country is a tough watchdog that can intervene and roll back prices in the market place. We need an agency with that power." I am sure the cabinet would not give the power to him because this minister has no clout.

The main function of this minister is to fulfil a public relations function for the government, making the Canadian people believe that something is being done by the government in terms of controlling prices in this country. The government is not doing that. As much as I like the minister personally, and I have known him for years, this is one minister who should be fired by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for incompetency.

In the two minutes I have left I should like to summarize for the minister. I hope he will respond in a serious way and not in the superficial, cosmetic way he has responded in the past. First of all I would like to see the government bring in a fair prices commission to act as a tough watchdog, or a little economic "hit" team with the power to hold back price increases while they are being investigated, to roll back price increases that are unwarranted, and with the power to freeze and control prices on a selective basis for a specific period of time.

Secondly, I want the minister to tell us why the government has ended subsidies on fluid milk, skim milk, bread and flour, those basic nutritious foods needed by each and every one of us, while at the same time it has offered millions of dollars to wealthy hockey team owners for the construction of rinks in many cities of this country, and another $200 million to the pulp and paper industry across the land.

Thirdly, I wonder if this toothless tiger, the minister from Montreal, can tell us why the government does not reduce the bank rate by at least 1 per cent in order to stimulate the economy, reduce the cost of house building and the cost of consumer and farm loans. Can he forcefully tell us whether the government is considering rescinding the $2 increase in the price of oil, that is, the $1 due July 1, 1979, and the second $1 on January 1, 1980?

Finally, will the minister tell us whether the government is going to toughen up the regulatory agencies in this country, like the CTC, in order that they can have some effective control of freight rates, telephone rates and other rates that consumers have to pay? Those are five specific things we believe the government can do. To supplement that, I have given him another ten or 12 specific items that could be referred to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure you and, through you, the people of this country, that the government is extremely concerned about increasing prices, and places a high priority on finding solutions both in the short and long-term.

I should like to make clear, however, that the problem is one principally caused by rising food prices. If one looks at the recent consumer price index one will see that the large increase month over month was not caused by non-food items but, rather, by food items. They in turn are principally affected by the beef cycle and the cost of imported food.

What has this government done about that, and what more can be done? I want to make clear that there are no magic solutions to reduce prices dramatically but that with the right programs some price increases can be moderated and others can be stabilized.

Let me give some of the measures that have been introduced by this government to combat inflation. I will list them first and give the details later. From 1975 to 1978 we had the Anti-Inflation Board which did have the power to roll back and control prices, wages and profits. This was followed by the monitoring agency CSIP, the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, followed by the National Commission on Inflation.

Last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) announced two sales tax cuts, one in the spring and one in November, which again had a serious influence on curtailing the rate of inflation. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) toward the end of last year announced an increase in the guaranteed income supplement and the family tax credit program to help Canadians of medium and lower incomes.

Another major initiative taken by the government to deal with inflation is our program to curtail our expenses and size dramatically, and I will say a bit more about that later. We also had measures to increase production and supply quotas both in the farm and fisheries areas.

● (1550)

Last week the Minister of Finance announced a reduction in import tariffs on food. I notice in today's Citizen on the front page a headline which states that 39 cent lettuce is on the way. It starts by saying:

> After three months of paying budget-breaking lettuce prices, consumers should get a dramatic break this week as most stores lower prices nearly 50 per cent.

Mr. Rodriguez: Loss leaders.

Mr. Allmand: This is a general lowering of lettuce prices whereas loss leaders are usually found in one store or another. In addition to these reduced import tariffs, as was mentioned earlier in the day by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) we have had a program to help consumers of oil in the eastern part of Canada with subsidies which have kept prices down for the last few years.

As I pointed out, the AIB was in place for three years. It ended its mandate on December 31, 1978, and it had powers to control prices, wages and profits. While the NDP voted against that measure in 1975, they are now proposing controls with roll-back powers. It is difficult to understand, and they have not explained that position today.

They did the same thing last week when they put forward their other motion with respect to a commission to control and roll back prices. I will ask them now, as I did last week, how can they suggest powers to roll back prices without also granting powers to roll back costs, including wages which are very dear to them? If costs are the cause of the increased price then certainly we cannot control the price without controlling the costs, but the NDP have not explained this or said how they can do one without the other.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You did it.

Mr. Allmand: I was listening, and the NDP failed to explain that question on occasion after occasion. Again the New Democratic Party is continually stating and, I would submit, using the big lie technique, that while the AIB controlled wages they did not control prices or profits.

Mr. Rae: That is what the conference board said.

Mr. Allmand: This statement, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely false, and I would like to refer to a few examples. Both wages and prices were controlled by the AIB between the three-year period from October, 1975, to December, 1978. With respect to prices, in 1975 at the beginning of the program the CP Index, excluding food, rose 10.1 per cent.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Why exclude food?

Mr. Allmand: I will deal with food later. But excluding food, it rose 10.1 per cent. In January, 1979, at the end of the program the comparable figure was 6 per cent. Profit margins of industrial corporations declined from 7.19 per cent at the beginning of the program to 5.2 per cent in the first half of 1978, the last year of the program. By October, 1978, over $264 million in excess corporate revenue had been returned to consumers as a result of action by the AIB. As of August, 1978, the AIB received 377 requests for dividend increases. Of these, 117 cases representing $407 million were refused or amended.

With respect to wages during the period of controls, real disposable income per person employed in Canada grew by 7 per cent in the last three years. In the United States in a comparable period, real disposable income declined 2 per cent. The average weekly wage for Canadian workers rose from $203.32 in 1975 to over $272 in 1978, an increase of 33 per cent.

Mr. Rae: How much has food gone up since 1975?

Mr. Allmand: On the whole, Mr. Speaker, the anti-inflation program of the government was successful. It certainly moderated the rate of inflation, and we will never know what the rate would have been without the AIB. We do know that our record over the last five years has been much better than most countries. In any case, the AIB controls are now terminated. All sectors of the Canadian economy agreed that this should be done, including the then NDP government of Saskatchewan and the former NDP government of Manitoba.

Following our discussions with the provinces, we found no support for a post-control monitoring body with investigative powers, although the Minister of Finance proposed such a body. Consequently, following the consensus of the provincial ministers at the conference, we established the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity at the beginning of 1979. While CSIP did some worth-while work and published some informative reports, it did not have the power to compel information. Consequently, last week the government established the National Commission on Inflation which will have powers under the Inquiries Act and will be able to monitor price movement properly and other phenomena which cause inflation.

The commission will not only have a deterrent effect on unconscionable price increases, but it can highlight them publicly and recommend action to the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A lot of good that will do.

Mr. Allmand: Earlier I referred to two tax cuts initiated by the Minister of Finance last year. The first, which related to the provincial sales tax, certainly had a deflationary effect and was considered a success. The second, which is still in force, relates to the federal excise tax and applies to several consumer products. While the inventory subject to this tax cut only came on the market in January, the most recent consumer price index indicates that this tax cut is being passed on. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the non-food part of the CPI for last month increased moderately, and some products, such as furniture and clothing, actually declined. The federal sales tax cut will continue to have its impact on the economy.

I also mentioned the increases in the Guaranteed Income Supplement and the new family tax credit. Both will provide additional purchasing power to lower and middle income families and retired Canadians to help them deal with increased prices. This is in addition to the government indexing program for pensions and the guaranteed income supplement.

I also want to repeat again that the government has programs to adjust supply and production in food products when increasing prices are due to short supply. In response to my honourable colleague's remarks with respect to my statements on supply before Christmas and after Christmas, I would refer him to bulletins put out by the marketing boards and by the Department of Agriculture which confirm the statements I made in the House at that time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Were they wrong?

Mr. Allmand: No, they confirmed that I was correct. The government recently announced new guidelines for the National Farm Products Marketing Council, which is the governing body for our marketing boards. These new guidelines, among other things, directed the council to consider not only the producers' interests but also the consumers' interests. At the same time we appointed a new chairman who was experienced in both farming and the consumer movement and who has the confidence of both groups. Many of our marketing boards had already announced increased production quotas for 1979, but it is yet too early to know their effect and whether they are adequate. In any case, the boards and the council are continually reviewing these matters and can adjust their production quotas when necessary.

I had mentioned the government's program to control inflation by controlling its own size and spending. Hon. members will recall that a year or two ago the opposition was alleging that the cause of inflation was the size of the government's budget and the size of the government's deficit. As the House now knows, for the last few years the government has had a program to keep spending increases below increases in the gross national product and to curtail public employee increases to less than 1 per cent. In the month of August we announced an additional program to curtail our expenses and to keep our government program within reasonable size. Last week the Minister of Finance announced certain cuts in import tariffs on selected foods. A little earlier I referred to an article in today's Citizen which confirms that prices are already being reduced for many of these products. This action is an important measure to help moderate inflation for Canadians.

I get a kick out of the NDP's continual allegation that I am "looking into things". On two or three different occasions during his speech the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) asked me if I would look into this, look into that. Because I am a very co-operative minister I always like to oblige him, and when he asks me to look into something, of course I do so. Today I have outlined a large number of measures which are measures for action.

As I said earlier in my remarks, the causes of the recent and spectacular price increases in food are principally due to the beef cycle and imported foods. As hon. members know, many of our beef producers suffered low prices a couple of years ago with the result that they sold off their herds. We now have very low supplies of beef with a continuing high demand and resultant high prices. It takes about three years to reproduce a herd of beef and we cannot correct that problem immediately. It will take time, and confidence in the beef producing areas of the country.

With respect to imported foods, it is true they cost more because our dollar declined in comparison to the American dollar. During the winter months, if we want fresh fruit and vegetables we must import them from the United States and other countries. Consequently we must pay the extra 17 or 18 cents because of the difference in the dollar. People may ask why we do not do something about this. I suppose we could have pegged our currency and stored it in many ways but that would cost taxpayers a lot of money and would have repercussions in many other areas of the economy.

It is easy to observe that while the lower dollar has had some serious effects on the price of imported food products it has also allowed us to sell a great deal of our production abroad. It has helped us with foreign trade deficits and is helping to produce the many jobs that were needed in this country.

If the allegation is made—and it has been made—that the recent price increases are due to profiteering or gouging by many of the companies in the food industries, there is just no evidence to support that at this time. There have been inquiries at all levels of the food industry and none have proved that any one level was ripping off, gouging, or profiteering at the expense of another.

The recent AIB report on profit margins in the food industry pointed out that while profits were increasing at the end of 1978, they were not out of line with historical norms. According to this report, over the first nine months of 1978 profit margins in Canada's food processing and food retailing industries varied little from the historical norms. For food processors the profit margin as a percentage of sales has declined significantly since 1973. For the first nine months of 1978 it was 3.3 per cent, equal to the 1974 low. Profit margins of food wholesalers for the first nine months of 1978 average 1.3 per cent compared to 1.21 per cent in the corresponding period of 1977 and the 1971-77 average of 1.67 per cent.

Mr. Lalonde: These are facts.

Mr. Nystrom: What about return on investment?

Mr. Allmand: If we look at the statistics of return on investment we see there has been no spectacular increase, but there have been increases. Generally, the increases in profits in business which have occurred during the last year are a sign that the economy is improving. I think that is a good thing for this country.

A year or so ago members of the opposition were criticizing the government because business was bad. Now that we see reports of increased profits they seem to be criticizing that as well. I say increased profits are a sign that business is on the way up. That will mean more money for government through taxes, and thus more money for social programs and other things.

Of course there will always be bad actors in the business community, and individual companies that will try to rig the market and fix prices. We have had recent examples of this. All hon. members are aware of the action my department took against the sugar companies. We lost that in the trial court but won a record judgment in the Quebec Court of Appeal which condemned those companies for fixing prices, and levied a record fine of $2.5 million.

We recently had a judgment of the court against one of the leading jeans manufacturers when they tried to practise resale price maintenance. They would only distribute jeans to retail concerns and outlets if they sold them at a fixed price, which was against the law. A large judgment was made against that company.

While there has not been profiteering or gouging generally, there have been examples, and there will continue to be examples, of companies that act improperly in the market place.

What else has the government done to help consumers with high prices?

Mr. McGrath: Change the government.

Mr. Allmand: That is the only solution the Conservative party has. Last week when the NDP put their motion before the House to deal with inflation and high prices, the spokesmen for the Conservative party had only one suggestion—change the government. They did not say what their solutions would be. As a matter of fact they have criticized the solutions we have put forward.

One thing that can be done to help consumers cope with high prices is to give them good information about food, and especially lower priced foods that are nutritious. Each week we issue information called "Food Backgrounders" which are sent to weekly and daily newspapers. These are used in the "Shop Wisely" and "Best Buy" columns, which are helpful in picking out the best buys from week to week. Where there is price competition in the food retail business it is helpful to have information on where the best buys are available. Despite the high price of beef, for example, pork and poultry have been good buys in eastern Canada in recent weeks. These newspaper columns using our background information encourage Canadians to look at these foods as good alternative sources of protein.

I recently congratulated a group of women in Ontario who set up a program called "Women Against Rising Prices." They are doing what we suggest—being selective in their shopping, refusing to buy products that are too high in price, and they are shopping wisely. We intend to continue with our programs and upgrade them to provide useful information.

Two other programs that can help save money for consumers, which we have supported strongly—as a matter of fact I made a speech to businessmen suggesting these programs before they came into operation—are the "no-name" foods and "no frills" stores. When you compare the price of a shopping basket of "no name" food products purchased in a "no fills" store, you will see considerable savings.

Another program of a similar nature that has been operating for the last two years, and which will operate again this year, is the "Food Talk" program. Last year we sent 40 or 50 teams into lower income areas, immigration areas, native peoples areas, and different areas which require information, to show them how to make the best buys in the supermarket. This helped them considerably to improve their food purchasing and to deal with their food budgets.

When the NDP presented their motion on this subject last week I stated in my speech that one of the measures I hoped to bring forward soon is the competition reform bill. When I said that, I did not intend it to be a solution to the short-term problem of rising prices in February and March, 1979. It should be obvious to the many commentators and critics that reform in competition laws could only help in the long run. None the less, it is an important reform. As I said last week, if you really want fair prices in the marketplace, your best guarantee is an open and competitive marketplace. I cannot understand how many people misunderstood my putting that forward as a short-term solution. That was never my intention.

I should also like to remind the House that even under the present law the competition bureau in my department has been taking many actions and has been successful in many prosecutions. I mentioned a moment ago our actions with regard to the sugar industry and the jeans and clothing industry. For example, since the beginning of 1978 the department has had 19 prosecutions covering conspiracy, merger and monopoly, and 112 convictions in the areas of deceptive trade practices and resale price maintenance. We have also had prosecutions in many other areas of fraud and price fixing, the weights and measures program, the electricity and gas program, and so on.

I still intend to come forward with the competition reform bill. I hope it will soon be ready for the House. However, it will be a measure to deal with fair prices in the long run and not in the short run.

My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), recently released some interesting information with regard to food and food prices. In a very useful little booklet that was published, he pointed out that from 1971 to 1977 the average hourly earnings in manufacturing in Canada increased 94.5 per cent. Over the same period the price of food increased 80.1 per cent. On average, one hour of work in manufacturing would buy approximately 8 per cent more food in 1977 than in 1971.

Other interesting information that the Minister of Agriculture has provided is that in 1949 it was necessary to work 20 hours to feed a family of four for one week. In 1959, one had to work 14 hours to feed a family that size. In 1977 one only had to work eight hours to buy the same amount of food. Even though food prices were higher in 1977, it took less than half as long in 1979 to buy food for a family of four for one week.

The Minister of Agriculture is extremely proud of this government's record in helping farmers become more productive, and increasing supply in this country. I support him 100 per cent on that. Critics in the opposition pretend there is some difference of opinion between the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Fisheries, and myself. They are completely wrong. We believe that in the long run the best guarantee of a good source of food is a sound and satisfied production community, whether it be in farming or in fisheries.

I wish to point out a few other matters that should be brought to the attention of Canadians when talking about high food prices. When we go into a supermarket and look at the full and long shelves of products, we note that many of the shelves are not filled with food at all but with cigarettes, tobacco products, and pet food.

I understand that the pet food business in this country, as well as the cigarette and alcohol industries, is a billion dollar industry. These industries are certainly not declining. It is hard to understand criticism from the opposition about how poor Canadians are when we continue to increase our spending for pet food, alcohol, restaurants, cosmetics, entertainment and so on.

Again referring to some of the remarks of my good colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, I note that he is very quick to point out the great waste of food in this country, the amount of food thrown out each day from our restaurants, homes, and banquets. When we look at these kinds of things we find some of the criticism by the opposition a bit hypocritical.

The NDP motion before us today is just another political gimmick. As I said before, when they had a chance to vote for price controls and roll-back powers, they criticized them severely and voted against them. This is not a serious measure they have put before us, but merely a hypocritical con game. As for the Conservatives, their only solution to the cost of food and consumer goods is to have an election. They have no policy at all.

In conclusion, I assure the House and the country that the government will take every reasonable step to combat inflation. However, we have no intention of bringing back controls or introducing measures which might bring short-term relief but result in more serious damage to the economy in other areas, especially with regard to employment and production. Now that those things are improving considerably, we want to see that improvement continue.

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the New Democratic Party quite properly addresses attention to an increasing concern on the part of Canadians about increases in the cost of living. As the hon. member who moved the motion properly noted, one of those components is the increase in the cost of food.

It was fascinating to listen to the minister criticize the Conservatives who want an election, and to describe his own program. He started off by saying he was concerned. That is a detailed program of the government—they are concerned when something is wrong. He said that another part of their program was that they wanted more information. They have had ten years of more and more information. There has been no action, but all kinds of information. The government has just appointed a new agency which will provide more information.

The minister said that another part of his program was to encourage consumers to shop wisely. I point out to him that shopping wisely is not a solution to increases in the cost of living. It is a defence by people whose budgets are being wasted away by soaring prices. It is not a government program. It is a necessary defence by consumers across Canada.

The minister said part of his program was to welcome and encourage no name and no frills stores. Finally he mentioned "Food Talk". That is a program that completely describes not only the program but the record of this government for the past ten years. All they have done is talk about it. We have food talk from the minister, "Mr. Alltalk."

The minister mentioned 112 prosecutions. He talked about prosecutions in the area of weights and measures. A few weeks ago I raised the question of prosecutions over delivery meters on home oil heating trucks. The minister still has not explained why out of all those 500 meters that were rejected so totally by his department that the people owning those trucks were put out of business until the meters were corrected, that out of that total they found during an eight-month investigation, they prosecuted exactly five people. The fines for those who were prosecuted were enormous. The biggest one was $600. The minister has been avoiding the issue. Now he seems to be avoiding the debate by leaving the chamber. It is at least consistent. A driver or operator of a home heating oil truck being fined $600 is like getting a licence. He could steal $600 by noon without half trying.

The specific proposal that the New Democratic Party has made in this motion, as is not untypical of the NDP, deals only with the symptoms. It proposes a band aid to deal with an amputation. While the consumers of Canada are bleeding to death the NDP has a band-aid to propose. Nevertheless, they do identify a real concern on the part of Canadians—soaring prices. The talk we have heard from the minister this afternoon is typical of a long line of talk and empty promises, and non-performance which has persisted ever since this government took office. Canadians were promised a food strategy in the speech from the Throne of the 1974. That promise has not been kept.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was going to "wrestle inflation to the ground". That was in 1974. That promise has not been kept. That was four years after he had told us inflation no longer exists. First, it no longer existed, then he was going to wrestle it to the ground and presumably, now, Canadians are expected to live with it.

An hon. Member: He is wrestling the economy to the ground.

Mr. Parker: There have been five government bodies established since 1969 to study inflation. In 1969 there was the Prices and Incomes Commission. There was a rate of inflation of 4.6 per cent in that year. In 1973 along came the Food Prices Review Board—inflation was running at 7½ per cent. In 1975, the Anti-Inflation Board was set up. Inflation was 10.8 per cent. In 1978, three years later, we were presented with the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity. Inflation was running at 9 per cent. This year we have the National Commission on Inflation. The forecast range of inflation this year is from 7½ per cent to 9 per cent. We have the NCI and before that we had the CSIP, the AIB, the FPRB and the PIC. And I suggest that we should go to the POLLS so that we could throw this government OUT.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: It is clear that monitoring inflation has done nothing to moderate it. Indeed, the cost of administering these bodies may actually have added to the problem. For example, the AIB which was supposed to have 200 employees ended up with a staff of more than 600. The government spent more than $70 million dollars on running that agency in the three years of its lifespan.

There were a couple of important paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne of February 1974:

> The government is developing a policy on food based on the following objectives: an adequate and dependable supply of quality food for a growing population in Canada enjoying a rising standard of living: reasonable food prices for the consumer, in not requiring an undue proportion of income for Canadians to secure a sufficient and balanced diet, and for the producer in providing a return adequate to encourage production of food items which can be produced economically and efficiently in Canada.

Since that promise was made, food prices have risen by nearly 60 per cent and they are expected to rise a further 20 per cent this year—that is the figure the minister himself has used. Instead of devising a food strategy, the government has held a food conference to give the appearance of doing something. Over the last six years since 1973, while inflation rates have continued between a minimum of 7½ per cent and a maximum of almost 11 per cent, in only one of those years was the rate of increase in the food prices below the general increase. In all the other five years increases in food prices led increases in the cost of living. Food prices in Canada have more than doubled since 1971. They will have tripled by 1981.

If these general figures are horrifying, selected figures published by Statistics Canada about individual items are even worse. In the last two years beef has gone up by 82 per cent, that is, between January of 1977 and January of this year. Ground beef has gone up by 116 per cent; powdered skim milk by 76 per cent; grapefruit by 58 per cent; oranges by 96 per cent; canned orange juice by 55 per cent; celery by 57 per cent; lettuce by 161 per cent; tomatoes by 55 per cent. The list is endless. The price increases are horrifying. And what do we get from the government? More rhetoric, more agencies to study the problem, more information.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the information does not have to come from government agencies; Canadians do not need another agency to enable them to find out what is happening to food prices. Those prices are published in the newspaper every single week. Every supermarket in the country takes advertisements like the one I hold in my hand to tell people what is happening to prices. And here is the bad news: instant coffee $4.88 a jar, iceberg lettuce, on special, 49 cents a head. Every newspaper tells the same story. That one is from Ottawa; this one is from Montreal. Spaghetti and macaroni, two 500 grams boxes $1.00; bananas, 4 pounds for a dollar; bread, 3 loaves for $1.29; sirloin tip roast, $2.88 a pound. Those prices are from the Montreal paper.

Here is another page. In this case the supermarket has the gall to head the advertisement "low prices". These are loss leaders, by the way, but even so the prices are horrifying; tomatoes, two pounds for $1, lettuce, 2 heads for a $1. Over here we read: bacon, $1.69, round steak, $2.58 a pound, tomato juice, 59 cents for a 48 oz. fluid tin. But the worst thing about this advertisement is that it shows right there just what those prices were last week before certain goods became "specials" and what they will be next week after these special offers are over. That tin of tomato juice was, and will be, 76 cents instead of 59 cents; the steak was $3.08 not $2.58, the bacon was, and will be, $2.08, not $1.69; the lettuce was, and will be, 99 cents a head, not 50 cents a piece. Tomatoes were, and will be, $1.49 for two pounds instead of $1.

And here is the solution, Mr. Speaker; the minister has been quoted as saying Canadians may have to buy more nutritious and less expensive alternatives. He talked about some of the items other than food which are available on the shelves of the supermarkets. Well, here are some of them, here is what Canadians who find that the price of people-food is too high can buy: cat food is only $1 for five tins, dog food is two tins for 89 cents. Now if you stop drinking milk, for instance, if you stop wasting money on that and drink water and eat dog food, you can cut yow food bill way down.

The minister talks about carping criticisms from this side of the House. He cited an article in the newspaper—it was the only one he mentioned—praising what he had done. I should like to read a selection of clippings from newspapers across the country published not only in the last couple of weeks but over the last couple of years and dealing with this department and this problem. The Ottawa Citizen, for example, calls the NCI a "cynical election ploy". The Toronto Sun calls it a "pre-election gimmick". It says the whole concept reeks with cynicism. Again, from the Toronto Sun:

> The finance minister said as long as some companies would not co-operate we had to assure the public we could find out what was going on. In other words, the minister does not know what is going on.

The Ottawa Journal called it "a mitigated disaster", whatever that means. There was John Gray writing in the Ottawa Journal—"Let Commission No. 5 Wrestle Inflation to the Ground". He went on: "The Liberals have latched on to the obvious; it is easier to monitor inflation that try to control it". Don McGillivray, writing in the Montreal Gazette, said the new selection body is just an election ploy. In his opinion the NCI has as much hope of stopping inflation "as a walnut has of stopping a steam roller." George Bain in a column headed "The Eleven Years War on Prices" had this to say:

> There are married couples buying groceries today who had not reached puberty when this government first started talking about new competition legislation six consumer and corporate affairs ministers ago.

● (1630)

The following appears in The Globe and Mail:

> Warren Allmand's rhetorical rage at rising prices is as pretty a piece of political hypocrisy as has come out of the Liberal government so far this election campaign.

The Montreal Star said, and I quote:

> There is only one thing certain about Warren Allmand's proposed three-pronged attack on rising prices—it won't do anything to stop prices from rising.

The Winnipeg Free Press said:

> —the inflation which has been primarily the cause of depleted financial reserves originated almost exclusively with government.

Talking about the serpent of inflation, the Hamilton Spectator said:

> —the commission was empowered to say "tsk, tsk" unto the people and shame the serpent.

Price Increases

The Globe and Mail said:

Canada's consumer price index advanced by 9 per cent last year—a bigger increase than in most other industrialized countries.

It is not just the current press which is critical. Here is something from the middle of last year in the Financial Post:

The most striking feature of the Economic Council of Canada's inflation-analysis group is the care that has gone into ensuring its role and impact will be limited.

On March 1, 1974, the Montreal Star printed the following:

Prime Minister Trudeau said yesterday the government is considering measures to help protect savings from erosion by inflation.

The criticism does not come just from the press and this side of the House. Some of it comes from the other side of the House. A member sitting on the Liberal side told anyone outside the House who would listen that he felt the government was jeopardizing its election prospects by failing to act decisively to provide clear protection against rising prices. The member to whom I refer is the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), a former member of the cabinet. Although he objects to rising prices, what he really objects to with regard to government inaction is not that it does not do anything to help the consumer but that it is jeopardizing the government's re-election chances. Here are some headlines about the minister himself. In 1979: "Allmand Talks Tough on Inflation". "Talks" is the operative word. In 1978 in the Star Phoenix: "Whelan, Allmand Disagree Over Higher Meat Imports".

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is quoted as saying:

And don't blame us if the price tag is further inflated because of currency conditions.

That is the same minister who removed the subsidy on powdered milk and drove the price up 50 per cent and sales down by 50 per cent.

Here is another headline from last year: "Allmand Orders Investigation". "Allmand May Probe High Business Profits". "Allmand's Strategy on Rising Prices Includes a Stronger Inflation Agency". "Allmand Aims to Curb Food Prices". "Consumer in the Boardroom". "Allmand Promises Close Watch". "Improve Machine Food". "Consumer Minister Has Been Consumed". The minister deserves an award for understatements for saying, "I'm not an expert in agricultural economics."

We have had many agencies and much talk. We have had eight ministers of consumer and corporate affairs since this government took power almost 11 years ago. Four of those ministers were in office one year or less, seven of them for under two years. By all counts the present minister is the least competent. He is the one who most often claims that he is misquoted, misunderstood or misinterpreted. He did it again this afternoon in his speech. While he refuses to accept responsibility, he points at processors and distributors. Are they to blame? Perhaps just a few of them. The minister points at producers. Are they to blame? Well, maybe some, but certainly not the bulk of them. He points at consumers. Are they to blame for rising prices? Have they been shopping unwisely? Have they been eating too much? When the minister points a finger at someone else, he should realize that three fingers are pointing at himself.

This government has done nothing for the past ten years to deal with rising costs of living and, in particular, food prices. The government has made noise. A hen makes a noise when she lays an egg. This government has laid and egg, but it is cackling as if it laid an astroid. We have had five agencies, eight ministers, hundreds of promises and thousand of occasions on which to act, but we have had zero performance. We have had dithering indecisiveness. This government and this minister have been as organized in their approach to the problem as a kitten with diarrhoea. Just as prices are soaring again, this government, which has consistently postponed an election which would be a real test of its record and its so-called policies, gives us more rhetoric, more promises, and another agency. The only area in which it is not consistent is that the Prime Minister has not appointed another new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is about time. This one has been minister for a year and a half.

The government also has the gall to tell the Canadian people there is a light at the end of the tunnel. We have news for the government. The light it sees is a train. A national food policy is overdue. If this government refuses to grasp the nettle and to work on a co-ordinated national food policy which would mean fair prices for consumers, an equitable and efficient distribution system and adequate returns for producers, then let it resign and go to the people, and they will elect a government which can do that. There are five government departments and agencies which presumably have some responsibility in this area, the Canadian Wheat Board, The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, the Department of National Health and Welfare and others. One or two of the ministers responsible drifted in and out of the House earlier in the debate, but none of them are here at the present time. If they had any real concern or any real policies, surely they would be here to respond in person to this motion presented by the New Democratic Party.

In 1972 there was an all-party committee of this House which reported a year later recommending a ten-year national food strategy. The Food Prices Review Board recommended a food strategy. The Consumers Association of Canada has recommended a food strategy, and this party, as well as our companions to my left, have recommended a food strategy. We are past the point where the problem needs looking into. We are past the point of talk. I challenge the government to do one of two things, either produce concrete proposals which it has the guts to put into effect now, or resign and let the people of Canada elect a government which will do those things.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the motion put forth by my colleague the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). It is quite obvious that for the last ten years inflation has become a real psychosis and remains a major hurdle in our attempts to reach our collective and individual goals. In 1975, while we were debating Bill C-73 on anti-inflation, I stated that the austerity measures contemplated by the government did not really go to the heart of the problem. I also added that the efforts that were to be made over the next three years would not solve the problem. The government is now clutching at straws as far as inflation, unemployment and the economy in general are concerned. It is almost recognizing its inability to overcome fantastic price increases such as we have witnessed.

When the prices and wages control program was proposed, the aim of the Anti-Inflation Board was to bring inflation down to 6 per cent over a two-year period. Yet, our rate of inflation remains between 8 and 9 per cent.

This situation is as unacceptable as our unemployment rate and the present economic situation. Mr. Speaker, recently an Ottawa newspaper reported these words of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In 1970, the Prime Minister said that inflation was no longer a problem in Canada. Some time later, in 1974, he stated: We are going to wrestle inflation to the ground.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately it is inflation which has wrestled our bank accounts to the ground and robbed the savings of Canadian taxpayers. Since the Liberal government came to power in 1968, inflation has taken fantastic proportions. To contain inflation, the government has offered us a multitude of great promises and a series of five boards which were all supposed to defeat inflation once and for all.

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that the measures taken up to now, that is, government expenditure restrictions, wages controls and the review of consumer price increases, are only measures. It is about time that someone in the government show some leadership and not be afraid to take the action required.

Food price increases affect a large proportion of family budgets. For many Canadian families, housing and food account for up to 70 per cent of total expenses. The Canadian Senate established the poverty line according to this criterion. Only the families whose income is lower than the average family wages are considered poor. In 1977, 882,000 single people and 1,288,000 families of two or more people were placed in this category. This is an unfortunate situation, Mr. Speaker.

A multitude of organizations have been established to remedy to this situation, including control boards, study commissions, review boards, the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, and the latest, the National Commission on Inflation announced on March 2 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). What can we expect from this new commission? Certainly not fairer prices! Will it do more than all the others before it? I would like to say yes, but I would be deceiving myself. This commission will only be another smokescreen to hide the ineptitude and indecision of the government. It will be responsible for supervising changes in prices like all its predecessors, but with a little something added. I refer to the press release of March 2 published by the minister for the duties of this commission. In addition to supervising price changes, the inflation commission will inform the public about the inflationary process.

I guess Canadians need to learn or to learn over again that inflation has been gnawing at them for nearly 10, 15 years. I think every good Canadian is aware of that cancer that keeps gnawing at him. On the other hand, it is really interesting to know that Canadians are not informed about inflation. If they do not know yet what the inflation which is eroding every pay cheque is all about, the commission is going to show them. We are really lucky. We are faced with excessive inflation particularly in food prices but now we will know why our cheque is not big enough to meet the daily needs of our families and households. Then the mandate of the commission will be to identify price increases. It will be a very understandable task for a commission on inflation to carry out, and if it considers it appropriate, it will report to the government and its report will undoubtedly go and join all the others somewhere on a shelf until the government decides to disband it and create another one. Mr. Speaker, I took a couple of pokes at the new commission because it seems to me the establishment of these countless commissions on inflation has become a real joke. It creates false expectations every time, and in spite of that, inflation continues unabated.

If it turns out the government cannot come up with a real energy policy to bring inflation down, must one conclude that it gave in to the financial power of banks and big business? It is often said in government quarters that our inflation comes from abroad, that it is an international phenomenon. That may be true but only in part and it is not a valid reason not to do anything. I would like to remind you that industrialized countries like Switzerland and Germany are doing very well at this time. The ever increasing costs of energy and food we have been experiencing will only be aggravated by the fall of the dollar because those products are imported in large quantities. I think the fall of the dollar is due to a lack of confidence in financial and international banking quarters in our economic situation and the total lack of leadership to straighten it out.

The inflation that continues and will continue to affect us is due for a large part to the past mistakes of monetary and fiscal authorities. Unfortunately, the longer the inflation problem lasts, the more complex the contributing factors become. That is why we should not wait any longer to act. We cannot eternally rely on just our simple measures to counter the reduction in purchasing power. To get to the causes of the disease we will need a round table of management, labour and government representatives to draft a plan of action. I believe that procedure would not benefit one group to the detriment of others.

Price Increases

[English]

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the member for parliament for Wellington I am responsible for a constituency that is primarily made up of the city of Guelph, which makes up 85 per cent of that constituency and yet is surrounded by a very rural, agricultural area. There are four townships in the riding which make up the balance, the other 15 per cent of the riding. One hundred per cent of my riding, whether it be the city urban or the rural people, are consumers, but the 15 per cent in the rural townships, which are situated on primarily class one and class two agricultural land, are also largely producers. So I have in my riding both consumers and producers whom I represent, and I try to represent both groups responsibly. I am not a consumer or producer advocate. I like to think of myself as a constituent advocate.

● (1650)

I was born in the United Kingdom and lived there during World War II. As many hon. members will realize and appreciate, during World War II energy, food and many other materials in the United Kingdom were in very short supply. Thus we had to learn to live, or some may say, exist on the essentials of life. Therefore, one can imagine how amazed I was when I came to Canada in 1947 and saw the phenomenal amount of waste in energy and food. It was absolutely extraordinary the temperature at which buildings were kept, with windows open letting all the heat escape. Also, the amount of food left on plates at the end of a meal and the amount thrown into the garbage before reaching the table were extraordinary. It was prime food, food the people in the United Kingdom could not afford during the war.

At very long last we are coming to our senses, certainly in the area of energy. We realize we cannot continue to be wasteful, that energy is much more important in our economy. This was brought primarily to our attention by the OPEC actions of 1973. The message of conservation finally sunk in, and we are seeing tremendous decreases in the rate of energy consumption. The increases of the past have been lowered by a substantial amount, a little over half the rate of increase in the past. The same should happen in the area of food.

The cost of food in Canada is among the cheapest in the world. Even though it is cheaper, there is no excuse to waste it. We should conserve it. It will be a big job educating the public on the value of nutrition. I am pleased the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and her department have issued booklets which do an excellent job in the area of nutrition. Also I am glad the University of Guelph in my riding has a department which is very concerned with nutrition. That department is helping to educate the public on the importance of nutrition and good value for their food dollar.

Recently I made a suggestion to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to help in the education process of the general public. My suggestion was to adopt a system somewhat similar to the one brought into being by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in the area of labelling clothes for washing and drying. All items of wearing apparel have recomendations as to how they can be washed and dried; what temperatures should be used; what detergents and bleaches can be used; and what articles can or cannot withstand.

Keeping in mind the expense involved, perhaps it would be a good idea to implement a similar type of labelling as far as food is concerned. Thus, when a person goes through a supermarket, he or she would see what produce was high in vitamins, protein, carbohydrates and other important ingredients for a nutritionally balanced diet.

Also the situation would be helped if consumers paid more attention to buying Canadian. As well as maintaining nutrition, we could assist in the area of imported inflation where we are bringing goods into the country over which we have no control of the prices and therefore the inflationary tendency they promote. For example, as far as vitamin C is concerned, we do not have to drink orange juice every morning. We grow an awful lot of apples in Canada and make an awful lot of apple juice. There is just as much vitamin C in Canadian apple juice as in orange imported from Florida. Many people enjoy apple juice as much as orange juice. How many people think, every time they drink a glass of orange juice, that they are not buying Canadian and that they could help their costs and the economy by switching to apple juice? How many people drink tea and coffee in Canada, but we produce an awful lot of milk. Today we must advertise milk so that it can compete with all other available drinks in the market place, whether they be soft drinks or alcoholic beverages.

I am glad to see the Department of Agriculture is looking into other areas of imported products which can be displaced by growing them in Canada and therefore cutting down on imported inflation. I was pleased to hear about the experiment of growing peanuts in the agricultural land of southwestern Ontario which previously was used to grow tobacco. That experiment is now reaching the commercial stage. We import $50 million worth of peanuts every year. With the devaluation of the dollar which has taken place in the last few months, the price of our imported peanut butter or our imported peanuts which go into peanut butter has increased by that amount of money. If peanuts are grown in southwestern Ontario, which now is economically viable, Canada would not have that inflationary tendency because of the imported product.

There are other areas in which we are still behaving like fat cats. I am very ashamed that we have to bring into the country 8,000 agricultural workers a year to harvest our crops. We cannot find Canadians who are willing to pick crops at harvest time. The farmers must get their crops off the fields within a very short period of time if they are to reap the nutritional benefits of freshly-ripened crops. We cannot find Canadians to do this job, so we must bring in people from the Caribbean or Mexico do do it. With record high unemployment we bring in approximately 8,000 people from outside the country.

When I was going through my teenage years, I made money every summer. My sole source of income as a student was from going into fields and harvesting agricultural crops. There was no shame in that. It was a good experience. That is the free enterprise system of work. By taking positive action to replace imports over which we have no control of price increases, we can tackle inflation caused externally. Recently the National Commission on Inflation was brought into being to pinpoint these problems and to separate external inflation from internal causes of inflation. But the consumer is still the key player in this game; he or she has a choice to exercise. He or she does not have to buy a product in the supermarket. Consumer boycott is one of the most effective weapons of the free enterprise system.

There are other choices. We can grow our own food. We can use it while it is fresh during the harvesting season, and we can freeze the balance to use during the rest of the year.

Approximately 40 per cent of the population of Wellington riding is of ethnic origin. A number of my constituents have very large gardens. Quite frequently they grow tomatoes and peppers of varieties foreign to Canada. They use these unique vegetables in the preparation of their national dishes. I am amazed at the size and the frequency of these gardens. I am amazed at the amount of crops grown to supplement their year-round food consumption and not just during the peak season.

Consumers have another choice. If they do not want to grow their own food, they can go out and pick it. Many farmers have systems whereby people can pick their own food. They can use the food when it is fresh during harvest season, or it can be frozen and used during the balance of the year. For example, my family goes out and picks strawberries in June, corn in August, and apples in September or October. We have the produce fresh when it is in season, and freeze it for use during the rest of the year. Techniques are readily available. If a person does not have such information available, he or she can obtain it from the Department of Agriculture. That department produces booklets containing helpful advice on freezing produce.

There are various manners in which consumers can help in fighting the battle of inflation. The last thing we need is another layer of government bureaucracy. I would not want to see another group looking into the details in order to find out what should or should not be done. There are too many people interfering in the free enterprise system. We should keep government involvement to an absolute minimum. It would keep the cost of government down and it would give the free enterprise system a chance to work. The free enterprise system will work if we use all the tools available, and that includes consumer choice.

I should like to make a few comments concerning some of the facts dealing with immediate food price increases. Food price increases are expected for the first part of 1979, with price increases declining later in the year to keep 1979 price increases to the 12 per cent-14 per cent range, compared to 12.8 per cent for 1978, 8.4 per cent for 1977, and 2.7 per cent for 1976. The 1979 AIB retail survey for February shows higher retail prices for beef, bread, bakery products, fresh fruit and vegetables. Price increases in these areas can be expected for a few more weeks.

What are the causes for these price increases? Canadians are dependent upon foreign supplies for 35 per cent of all fruit and vegetables they purchase. In the wintertime they are dependent for about 75 per cent of their produce on foreign sources. About one third of all price increases is created by agricultural conditions that are unavoidable, whether they be weather conditions, crop failures or cyclical shortages. About one third of all price increases reflect devaluation of the dollar, reductions in subsidies, or marketing arrangements to ensure supply. These are policies necessary for economic growth, increasing employment, and ensuring the consumer food at reasonable prices.

The cost of food to Canadians is a story of which we can be very proud, indeed. In 1978 a U.S. study showed that 13.8 per cent of disposable income was spent for food in Canada. In most countries people spent at least 20 per cent of their budget on food, with people in some countries spending up to 50 per cent. Are we spending more and more every year in real terms on food? No, Mr. Speaker, we are spending less and less every year in real terms of work for the family food basket. The number of hours work required to buy food for a family of four for one week has gone from 20 hours in 1949 to 14 hours in 1959, to 11 hours in 1969, and to eight hours in 1977.

The percentage of disposable income spent on food at home has gone from 20 per cent in 1949 down to 18 per cent in 1959, to 14.6 per cent in 1969, and in the first three quarters of 1978 it was 12.9 per cent.

An hon. Member: All under Liberal government.

Mr. Maine: Yes, the whole lot, just about.

Have food prices increased too quickly? Let us examine some statistics for the 1968-78 period, the last ten years. Gross national product per capita in current dollars has increased from $3,506 in 1968 to $9,873 in 1978, an increase of 182 per cent. Personal disposable income per capita in current dollars has risen from $2,262 in 1968 to $6,629 in 1978, an increase of 193 per cent. Labour income per person employed has gone from $5,063 in 1968 to $13,236 in 1978, an increase of 161 per cent. However, food, according to the consumer price index, has gone from $92.8 in 1968 to $208 in 1978, an increase of 124 per cent, compared to the 161 per cent, 193 per cent and 182 per cent for the other indicators I have given. Food increases, by any measure, have lagged substantially behind income increases.

What about the recent increases in food prices? Available statistics show that in the first three quarters of 1978 food prices increased 11.3 per cent for food at home, while per capita disposable income increased 23 per cent in the same period. During 1976 and 1977 food price increases were almost the lowest of all price increases in consumer purchases. In the same period the cost of energy increased almost four times.

How does Canada compare internationally? Numerous international food surveys have found Canadian food prices among the world's lowest. For example, a January 3, 1979,

United States department of agriculture survey found that Ottawa stores charged 21 per cent less than Washington stores for a representative 21-item food basket. In the same survey Canada is shown to have the lowest food prices in terms of average hourly industrial wages of any of the 16 national capitals surveyed. The survey reveals that in Ottawa we pay $3.36 per kilogram of boneless chuck roast while in Washington the cost is $4.01, in Paris it is $5.03, and in London it is $4.38. We have similar statistics here in respect of a dozen eggs, a kilogram of butter, a kilogram of bread, and a kilogram of potatoes.

How long do we have to work here as compared to those in these other places in order to purchase the same amount of these articles? Again, for a kilogram of boneless chuck roast in Ottawa we must work 37 minutes whereas in Washington the figure is 33 minutes, in Paris it is one hour and 32 minutes, and in London it is one hour and 39 minutes. The figures for a kilogram of potatoes in the same comparison are: five minutes in Ottawa, six minutes in Washington, six minutes in Paris, and seven minutes in London. For a dozen eggs the work time figures are: eight minutes in Ottawa, seven minutes in Washington, 27 minutes in Paris, and 24 minutes in London. The figures in respect of a kilogram of butter are: 26 minutes in Ottawa, 34 minutes in Washington, one hour and 23 minutes in Paris, and 46 minutes in London. By any international standards one wants to use, and this is from the United States department of agriculture, foreign agriculture figures, we have a very good record.

How are we dealing with food price increases? Although food price increases are largely unavoidable, the Liberal government recognized the disproportionate burden placed on the poor and the aged and has acted to help these groups through the Child Tax Credit Program and increases in the Guaranteed Income Supplement. The Liberal government has also been indexing pensions and other benefits since 1974.

To monitor further the making of excessive profits at the expense of the consumer, the government has recently established the National Commission on Inflation.

Mr. Speaker, that is our record, and I think we can be proud of it.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this motion today although I am not impressed by its content or intent. It is good in theory but simply impossible to implement. It does, however, provide us with an opportunity to discuss the issue and to place the blame for these dramatic price increases where it rightfully belongs. If hon. members on the other side of the House do not agree with me, I am certain the Canadian people will when I indicate that the blame belongs squarely on the shoulders of the present government.

Prices have increased dramatically in respect of most, if not all, goods and services. The reason for these price increases is not unknown. There is nothing mysterious about this, it is obvious. They can be related almost entirely to failures on the part of this government.

[Mr. Maine.]

What are some of these failures that have resulted in these price increases throughout the whole Canadian system? Let me list some of them as follows: this government's continuing failure to manage the Canadian economy with any degree of success or competence; this government's failure to control inflation; this government's failure to do anything about record high interst rates; this government's failure to produce the kinds of programs and policies that will encourage a greater degree of self-sufficiency in domestically produced agricultural commodities; and this government's failure to produce the kinds of programs and policies that would reduce the reliance of the Canadian consumer on foreign food supplies. Those are some of the major ones. This government's failure to develop a national food strategy or a national food policy has to be one of its major failures.

When we consider the record of this government and its lack of appropriate programs and policies, is it any wonder that prices have escalated in the manner in which they have over the past few years? This government is completely incompetent in all areas within its jurisdiction and its responsibility. Its record clearly indicates that short-term, stop-gap measures, tinkering and political posturing will not relieve the problem in respect of rising prices or in respect of increasing food prices.

The latest example occurred on Monday with a tabling of the ways and means motion relating to the tariff changes. This government had the recommendations of the Canadian Horticultural Council, the producers of fruit and vegetables in this country, and the report of the tariff board for five years, since 1974. Now, five years later, and in the dying days of this parliament and of this government, we finally have those tariff changes trotted out by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) with great pride and great fanfare, trotted out to be the answer to food price increases and to bring great savings to Canadian consumers.

I say that it is complete nonsense. These savings when applied translate into savings which amount to from one cent to seven cents on each item purchased. There are many examples, some of which were cited earlier today. Let us look at cauliflower which is currently selling at $1.50 a head. It would now sell for about four cents of five cents less. The prime example is orange juice. A 28-ounce can will be reduced from 70 cents to 69 cents, a total saving of one cent. We must remember though that that same can of orange juice increased in price by 250 per cent in a relatively short period under the programs of this government.

These tariff changes are nothing but political posturing and mislead the Canadian consumer into believing that it is a solution to the food price problems. Canadian consumers will soon realize that it is simply another futile attempt on the part of this government to avoid the real culprit which, of course, is the government itself and its actions. These tariff changes provide no significant benefit to those in domestic sectors of the food chain. They provide no assurance to producers that Canadian farmers will be able to remain in business, let alone grow and expand their production. In fact many of them are left without protection.

These tariff changes provide no real encouragement to the Canadian food processing sector so that they can grow and expand their operations. In fact the Canadian processing industry will be lucky if it can maintain its present status. If government programs do not ensure the growth and development of Canadians and Canadian businesses, whatever they might be, the results are bound to be disastrous.

We have approximately one million people unemployed in Canada today. The cost to Canadians of this unemployed sector is tremendous, particularly in terms of lost potential and lost opportunity. With the right kind of leadership we could employ well over 100,000 more Canadians in our Canadian food system alone. Let me illustrate my comments by referring to a recent study done by the Canadian Fruit and Vegetable Processors Association. In that study they selected 21 fruit and vegetable items, all of which could be grown in Canada. The total imported value amounted to $92.5 million. The total man hours lost by the Canadian production and processing industries was over 13 million man hours, and the total wages lost was recorded at $51.5 million. It was estimated that the cost to Canadians and to the imbalance of trade would be approximately $110 million. It should be noted that these figures were based on the Canadian dollar when it was at or close to par with the U.S. dollar. These figures are far more significant in terms of 85 cent dollars.

Had these 21 fruit and vegetable products been grown, processed and moved through our Canadian food chain, the additional per capita cost to the Canadian consumer would be a grand total of 48 cents a year. Considering the volume of food imports and the 85 cent dollar, this 48 cents annual per capita cost to consumers would be reduced to an even more insignificant figure today.

When one considers these factors, the loss in jobs, wages and productivity, and the cost in terms of unemployment insurance, the 85 cent dollar, the degree of our dependency on imported foods and the cost to the Canadian consumer, one realizes that the total approach to this problem has been fragmented and not in the best interests of the Canadian farmer, food processor or consumer. Clearly, policies of this government have led to an underutilization of Canadian resources, Canadian facilities, and Canadian labour.

Agricultural exports increased by a mere 7 per cent in 1977 figures over 1976 figures. Agricultural imports, however, increased almost twice as much, up by 13.7 per cent from 1976. Our agricultural trade surplus decreased by 15 per cent. Surely the message is clear. If we continue this trend, we continue to travel the road to disaster. We are in need of a comprehensive and well co-ordinated national food policy. There are dozens of policies at all levels of government which affect food production, processing, distribution and consumption. In fact if one wants a good example of non co-operative federalism or non co-ordinated policies, it would be hard to beat the array of legislation and regulations affecting the food system in this country.

I do not believe that it would be an exaggeration to say that there are more than 20 separate federal departments, not to mention the various divisions within those departments, with regulatory authority over some aspect or another of the food system. With this kind of confusion of responsibility, jealous empire guarding remains a major deterrent to the development of a national food policy. It is with regard to this background that I have a fundamental concern, and it is questionable that we can afford to leave the food sector any longer without an over-all direction or framework within which activities and planning of all governments and the private sector can be based. We, as Canadians, have been blessed with a variety and an abundance of highly nutritional food, but our potential remains almost unlimited. However, drastic cost increases place in question the continuation of this long enjoyed or taken for granted fact.

Taken collectively, the various elements of the Canadian food industry constitute a very large portion of our total national economy and, in addition, a significant contribution to our balance of trade. Unfortunately, as a result of the policies of this government in recent years, Canada has a lesser share of the domestic market and a greater dependency on outside sources for food supplies. We see the serious pressures and lost potential that affect most, if not all, members of the food chain, and that would include consumers as well.

Over-all, when we disregard dollar values, agricultural output has seriously declined in absolute terms over recent years. The gap between achievement and potential for agricultural and food production is widening. Statistics reveal that we had the same level of productivity in the period 1972 to 1974 that existed ten years earlier. This slow growth in food production relative to demand has also shown up in a decline of food exports, to which I referred earlier, in volume terms, and an increase in volume of imports.

The old theory, still very much in practice by the government, of consumer savings by price regulations controlled by food imports, just does not bear up under close scrutiny and examination. Mr. Speaker, if it does not bear up now, where would we be if totally dependent on imports and totally at the mercy of outside suppliers of food?

To be successful, Canada's agriculture and food policy must be enconomically based. It should stimulate development and growth in production, processing and marketing. Emphasis on the latter should apply both at home and abroad. Senior levels of government must agree that the object should be to maximize the development of agriculture and food industries, thus strengthening the whole Canadian economy. It must ensure that not only fair and equitable returns are secured for the primary producers but also to all sectors of the total food chain. It must ensure as well a safe and adequate supply of nutritional food for Canadian consumers at acceptable prices. Mr. Speaker, this goal cannot be achieved by the kinds and types of programs pursued by this government.

The confusion and conflicts within this government have served no useful purpose whatsoever. This government has pitted producers against consumers and vice versa. It has polarized these two sectors of our society. It has prompted and promoted distrust among Canadians. Producers need consumers; it is they who purchase the produce. Consumers need producers; it is they who provide the required food and food products. We must narrow the gap and promote a better understanding between producers and consumers. We must work in concert, not in conflict with these two sectors of our society. I am confident that producers, processors and consumers will accept their responsibilities and rise to the challenges that face them.

What is needed is a government with the will, a government with the desire and ability to manage our economy, to control inflation, to lower the rate of unemployment, to encourage a greater degree of self-sufficiency in the agricultural and food industries, and to reduce dependency on foreign food supplies.

Canadians know that the major culprit in the whole food price issue is the government. "You can fool some of the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time." Canadians are not going to be fooled any longer. This government will get that message, hopefully in the not too distant future when someone over there shows some leadership and musters enough courage to pull the plug and go to the country.

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity of participating in the debate today, on the motion presented by the hon. member of the New Democratic Party for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) who, on behalf of his party, criticizes the policies of the government which he finds inadequate to control inflation, specially where foods are concerned.

That subject is of particular interest to me, Mr. Speaker, as I know it quite well, having had the privilege of sitting, in 1974 and 1975, on the parliamentary commission whose mandate it was to look into the cause of the inflation which was affecting our economy, and namely food prices. In 1975, after anti-inflation measures were adopted, I participated, in the House of Commons, in the debates on decontrol measures, an exercise considered as extremely complex, which was applied from April 1975 till very recently, the end of December I believe, when the Anti-Inflation Board was dissolved.

Mr. Speaker, for quite some time our policy has been aimed at slowing down and even at controlling inflation while avoiding other types of adjustments in our economy. Those are always difficult steps to take to maintain a very precarious balance. I will not suggest today that we have completely succeeded in reaching our aim which is to reduce the rate of inflation, but I think that if we objectively consider the situation, there is evidence that we will obtain better results at the price level, and that anyhow they are better in Canada than in most other industrialized countries.

[Mr. Wise.]

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that there were a few failures in the process. They are essentially beyond our control. But even in that case we are trying to respond and to get over them. We still have much to do as is the case in other countries, but I would like to insist on the necessity of keeping confidence in our economy, because if we consider the conditions, such confidence is warranted. Moreover, I notice a more optimistic attitude toward our economy even if it does not show among members opposite or among some economists.

Let us examine briefly what happened inflationwise. About five years ago, Canada, like other countries, was hit by galloping inflation which forced prices up by almost 11 per cent in 1974 and 1975. This situation forced the government to launch its anti-inflation program in the fall and to establish regulations which contributed to the slowing down of rising prices and gradually bring the situation back to normal. But we all recognize that such a control program is mostly a psychological weapon that works well within a free market economy only if it is enforced for a limited period. For this reason we started the decontrol process about a year ago, last April.

That same month the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said in his spring budget speech that in his opinion the consumer price index would rise some 7 per cent in 1978. In fact, the rise was 9 per cent, and the difference is mainly due to higher than predicted rise in the food prices and to a new decline of the dollar which has raised the price of all imported goods. Save for an unexpected surprise, we believe the CPI will go up by 7 or 7.5 per cent this year, and again, for the most part, this rise will be attributable to food prices and imported goods. I am not for a minute suggesting such a rise is acceptable, but it will be lower than the inflation rate we have known these past years.

Following the lifting of controls, it was decided in a conference of the first ministers to ask the Economic Council of Canada to continue analysing the situation in terms of prices and costs. This request has led us to the establishment of the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity. This agency was given the task of watching for prices and costs changes so as to inform Canadians of any tendency which could possibly thwart our chances to fight inflation. Its terms of reference also included studying structural problems, likely to cause rising costs and prices, thus making the economy more vulnerable to inflationary pressures. Very recently, Mr. Speaker, the CSIP management wrote to major corporations to ask them for information relating to their costs and prices, in order to be able to make more extensive analyses.

This is covered by its terms of reference. I must emphasize however that the first proposal submitted by the federal government to the various premiers at the federal-provincial conference of February 1978 was to grant larger powers to that body in order, not to roll prices back, but to investigate, obtain information, and so on. Quite frankly, it was the provincial premiers who rejected the idea, they asked that we do not proceed with this. New Brunswick's premier suggested he would favour a less powerful agency. Because of changes that were made, there should be more reference to control boards because that term had a coercive connotation. He wished an organization would be established that would operate on a voluntary basis.

There is dissension, Mr. Speaker. Provincial governments do not want us to establish an organization that would be more powerful than the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity. I would point out that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and cabinet are seriously scrutinizing the centre's role, as to whether in particular it should be given certain powers of control to determine in the eyes of Canadians whether some firms are making excessive profits. Whatever the decision, there certainly will be no roll-back powers. We have no intention to go along that road, because we have reasons to believe this would be wrong. In the final analysis, the only way to wrestle inflation is to have a strong and dynamic economy, and to implement a sound fiscal and monetary policy. This is the only way to ensure total recovery and growth in the private sector.

In agreement with the provinces, the government undertook some years ago to control its expenditures, to maintain them below the growth rate of the gross national product. This is what we have been doing. Monetary policy reflects our concern with inflation. A great number of other strong influences are acting to stimulate business in the private sector. We are in a position, Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate that our competitivity has improved at the international level. Our production costs have decreased at a time when the value of our dollar declined on foreign markets. There has been a spectacular increase in the number of jobs—more than 440,000 jobs created during the last 12 months—and in 1978 we recorded an unprecedented surplus of $3.5 billion in our trade balance. The manufacturing sector strongly recovered last year with a production growth of 9 per cent and a job creation growth of 7 per cent.

We are confident that this year the real growth will reach the 3.5 per cent mark and the known intentions of prospective investors allow us to believe that the rate of real investments will go up by 4.5 per cent for the economy as a whole. Frankly speaking, I see nothing wrong with profits, a word which someone dared pronounce. I think it is a very important aspect of the economic crisis our country has gone through namely the fact that profits are increasing. It is the main source of capital and investment required to create jobs, preserve them and generate the growth so badly needed in our country. All sectors in our economy, workers and businesses alike, should feel happy that there have been profits because without them there would not be enough money available for the workers to earn decent wages and keep their jobs.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that everything needed is there to ensure a steady expansion in our economy. We are indeed worried about the price escalation of imported food products which contribute to the lowering of available income of workers. We do not deny either the fact that because of the increase it will be more difficult to reduce inflation. Yet we must ask ourselves seriously if we can actually protect the Canadian people from all the elements of inflation which find their origin abroad. Any overzealous attempt to intervene in the operation of the market when there is nothing to substantiate allegations of price rigging, as here in the case of food products, would indeed be a step in the wrong direction. We would stand the risk of losing the advantage which we painfully acquired in recent years.

The federal government has been subsidizing oil supply in eastern Canada for the last three years in order to maintain an equitable price across the country for this product which represents over $1 million per subsidized day for consumers in eastern Canada. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the reasons which motivated the hon. member of the NDP to propose this motion to the House today. I myself, as well as the consumers whose interests I defend, have had enough of unending price increases. All of us on the government side want to do something to help consumers, both collectively and individually, and in the last few years we have indeed done much to ease the burden of soaring prices.

Only recently, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has increased the guaranteed income supplement and instituted a $200 child tax credit aimed at helping poor and middle income Canadians. We reduced the sales tax and personal income tax, directly or through indexation. The latest consumer price index figures demonstrate that the federal sales tax reduction announced in the November budget is in fact felt at the consumer level, and that because of this measure, non-food products in the index have shown only a slight increase. In some cases, there has even been a reduction in the price index of clothing and furniture.

The first and most important measure taken this year to stop inflation was the establishment of the Anti-Inflation Board in the fall of 1975.

The government recently appointed a new president to the National Food Products Marketing Board. He has experience not only in agriculture but also in consumer products. It gives a chance to all food producers to be better heard. The board has received new directions and has been asked to listen attentively to the representations and to consider each case with flexibility.

The government has taken measures to show the food product consumer how to get more for his money. We have sent to daily and weekly papers, news releases showing the better food buys. Last week, for instance, we had a long article about the price of pork which was advantageous in many areas of the country. At other times, we recommend the substitution of other protein foods like eggs, poultry, and fish. This information is helpful to consumers.

Inflation is certainly a serious matter of concern for the government, but it should not be to the extent that the flexibility and adaptability of the Canadian economy might be comprised. The government is confident that businesses and unions also want to protect the gains made during the three year fight against inflation.

The government has full control over its spending; wages demands and agreements are more realistic, and our export prospects are excellent. Quite possibly food price increases will come down with time. In those circumstances we would be wrong to revert to confrontation, as the motion before the House today suggests, rather than insisting on moderation and seriousness. Canadians know they could not improve their capacity to meet competition and their standard of living just by increasing prices. The government will certainly not tolerate an irresponsible attitude about price and salary increases nor will it resort to control on monetary policy to discourage those inflationary surges. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the inflation we have all been experiencing, it is unfair to say that the average family is helpless against those temporary increases. If we look at the statistics of the past three years, we see that in 1975 an average family of four needed 24 hours of work to buy its grocery basket, 14 hours in 1976 and 8 hours in 1977. So you see that family income went up during those years and the government as a result of the indexing of social benefit payments like old age security pensions, family allowances, welfare, veterans pensions and others has maintained the purchasing power, as the Prime Minister suggested recently, of those who can least cope with inflation. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I will say that among industrialized nations Canada is still the country which is best coping with the economic difficulties facing industrialized nations today.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks this afternoon I want to take members through an average day in the life of a constituent of mine and compare that average day in 1973-74 in terms of what that person is going to be spending in 1979.

Let us start with him waking up in the morning and finding himself in his house. His house in 1973 in the city of Toronto cost $40,605. That was the average selling price of a home. In 1979 that same person wakes up and, if he wants to buy a house and is not fortunate enough to live in one, he finds that the price of the average house in Toronto is $68,500. That is an increase of $28,000 in the average selling price of a home in the past five and a half years.

He is heating himself either by fuel oil or natural gas. Look at the price of fuel oil. In 1973 it was 25.9 cents a gallon. In 1978-79 it is 60 cents a gallon, an increase of more than 100 per cent. The price of natural gas would have been $1.23 per thousand cubic feet. Now we are looking at $3.09, an increase of nearly three hundred per cent.

He gets out of bed and makes himself some breakfast. If he has not got cholesterol like the government he might cook himself some eggs. In early 1973 he would have spent 71 cents for a dozen eggs. In February of 1979 he would be spending a $1.05 for the same dozen eggs.

An hon. Member: They would be a little old by then.

Mr. Rae: That is true. They would not taste as good, but they would be more expensive. If he has some coffee it cost him 99 cents for a pound of ground in 1973 and the price has risen, now, to $3.27. If he decides to splurge and have some cornflakes, in 1973 it would have cost him 42 cents. In 1979 he has to pay 93 cents for exactly the same cornflakes.

An hon. Member: A little stale!

Mr. Rae: A little staler and more expensive. If he gets into his car, if he can afford to buy a car, in 1973-74 it would have cost him between $3,000 and $4,000, that same car would be selling now for $5,000 or $6,000. He would be paying, in 1973, 56 cents per gallon. In 1978 he would be spending 93 cents a gallon, and we predict that next year he will be paying over $1.00 a gallon for that gasoline.

If he was taking public transport in the city of Toronto in 1974 he would have spent 30 cents cash fare, or four tickets for a dollar. In 1979, thanks to the policies of the federal and provincial governments and the subsidies for urban transport which were supposed to come according to a promise in 1974 and never came, that same person would be spending 60 cents cash fare. That is double the price, or six tickets for three dollars.

Now what has happened to wages as he gets to his place of work? When he arrives at his place of work does he find that his wages have in any way kept up with the rise in the cost of living? No, Mr. Speaker, they have not. That person would have gone into controls in 1975, he would have been zapped by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), but he did not see his food prices being zapped. And when he finally comes out of controls three years later not only has he not managed to keep up with inflation but he has fallen behind.

We also note that as we come out of controls we have not seen a wage explosion in Canada. There has not been the kind of explosion that the Prime Minister has said he was worrying about. But there has been a price explosion and a profit explosion as we come out of controls, and there is no protection for the Canadian consumer when that happens. None whatsoever.

That individual may then decide to have some lunch, let us say a tin of salmon. Let us go back to the shopping List. In 1973 a tin of salmon would have cost him 72 cents, now it costs him $1.59. If he has a hot dog it was 92 cents a pound in 1973, and $1.72 in 1979. If he decides to be healthy and have some vegetables, tomatoes cost him 49 cents in 1973, and 89 cents in 1979. It is very easy for the Minister of Justice (Mr.

Lalonde) to laugh. But let me say this to members on the government side. Take a walk down the streets, visit the supermarkets and talk to the people who are in those stores. Talk to the pensioners who have to buy single fish fingers because they cannot afford to buy the entire package, finding it is too expensive and uneconomical to do it that way. We are not simply talking about the cheaper cuts of beef.

There are times in my riding when I know that people are buying food which is not intended for human consumption. Yet the government has removed the subsidies from bread, skim milk, flour and milk which would provide the kind of protection and the kind of subsidy which would guarantee lower prices to those Canadians. Ask those people how they feel. They are terrified. They know they have no control over what is happening to food prices. They know they have no control over what is happening to house programs. They do not have a government in Ontario which is prepared to listen to them or do anything about the cost of public transport. There is a price explosion in the city of Toronto right now and this government has no policies to deal with it.

If you are not feeling too well and decide to go to a doctor in Toronto, look at what OHIP fees would have been in 1973—the chances are your doctor would have been in OHIP in 1973. If you are single person you would have been paying $11.00 a month; it was $22.00 for a family. In 1979 the OHIP charge for the single person has risen to $19.00, and for a family it has gone up to $38.00. In May of 1978 a charitable organization known as the Ontario Medical Association set its own fee schedule for doctors, 30 per cent higher than the OHIP fee schedule. In January of 1979 that same charitable organization increased its schedule by 6.94 per cent. In the city of Toronto a quarter of the doctors are no longer in OHIP and are charging the OMA schedule. So health costs are skyrocketing.

If people are not elderly and are forced into a hospital and have to stay longer than 60 days, in the city of Toronto they will be spending $9 a day for the pleasure of living in one of those luxury hotels which we call hospitals. That is the attitude of this government and of the provincial government of Ontario. That is exactly what is happening, and if there is a common agreement between these two parties it is that in an atmosphere of cutting back government expenditures it is respectable to allow doctors to go back into the private sector. This government has made that kind of attitude respectable because of the cutbacks which have taken place.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I cannot quite let that pass. I think a mistake was made. The federal government has not allowed anything like that to happen. Doctors are opting out voluntarily because fees have not been raised for ten years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can raise points of procedure, but if he disagrees with the hon. member who is speaking, he can seek the floor in due time and make his own remarks.

Price Increases

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, the point is that when we look at what has been controlled over the past five years and what this government has done to the ability of people to protect themselves on the private market, it has taken protection away.

The government has controlled wages.

An hon. Member: Come on!

Mr. Rae: The Conference Board in Canada said this, not the New Democratic Party. The Conference Board in Canada has pointed out that the government managed to control wages in the period between 1975 and 1978, but not prices. Now that we are coming out of controls we can see that the Canadian public is being subjected to a price and profit explosion. That is why the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) moved this motion today. The people of Canada are beginning to recognize that it is not good to move from one impotent commission to another. It is no good to set up a series of institutions, none of which is effective in dealing with the problem of controlling prices. It is far more important to introduce a government institution which has policing powers and roll-back powers to enable the people of Canada to have the sense of protection and security they need.

Mr. Railton: Dreamer.

Mr. Rae: If the Government of Canada is saying that it is dreaming on the part of the Canadian people to expect to have reasonable prices and not to have gouging and profiteering, I say that the hon. member is in for a nasty surprise. The people of Canada are not dreaming when they expect that kind of treatment. They expect decent treatment. If the hon. member is saying that it is dreaming to expect security, I say he is sadly mistaken because it is not dreaming to expect security. That is something the people of Canada expect and dearly want to have. They are looking for a government and a group of people who are prepared to provide that.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville pointed out that instead of having a toothless watchdog which does not even bark any more, we should have a commission which has these policing and investigative powers and also the power to roll back. The people of Canada are looking for an Elliott Ness to protect them at this time, but they have been given an Inspector Clousseau in the person of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand). The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not even responsible for the National Commission on Inflation. The minister is not even a member of the Board of Economic Development Ministers. His only role is to come into this House on the eve of an election and announce that he will present a competition policy.

The Liberal party has had 16 years to present a competition policy. Every time the government prints up and sends to the business community a competition policy and it gets on the order paper, it is withdrawn. Each time the minister says that the government cannot make up its mind and that each policy is not good enough. He says we need another one which is different. Mr. Basford, who has left this House, proposed a competition policy which was supposed to make the Canadian economy competitive, give some protection to the Canadian consumer, and provide some work. He had to withdraw that policy because of the attacks of the business community.

Mr. Lalonde: The NDP fought that too.

Mr. Rae: Then the government set up the Bryce commission on corporate concentration. That commission said that corporate concentration is good for the Canadian people and that we should have more of it. That is the direction in which this government is moving. One day it says one thing, and the next day something different. The government cannot make up its mind about any policy, and the minister has the nerve and the gall to come into this House and say that we need a long-term strategy to deal with prices and that that involves a competition policy. We do not have a bill. The government does not have any ideas. For all we know, such a policy has not even been approved by the cabinet. Once it is approved by the cabinet it probably will not be approved by the business community, to which this government is so beholden.

A shopping basket of 15 items cost $10 in 1973. In 1979 that same shopping basket costs $20.87. That is an increase of over 100 per cent. Unfortunately for this government, the Canadian people buy food every day and every week, and every time they buy food, this government is indicted because it has not had a food policy, a food strategy, a price policy or a price strategy for the past 16 years. This government has gone from pillar to post, and the only controls it ever introduced were controls which got at the so-called villain, wages. Wages were controlled, but nothing really happened to inflation. We had three years of wage controls which did nothing to protect the average consumer, and they certainly did nothing to protect the average wage earner. I say that the people of Canada expect a fair prices commission which would provide them with security, protection, and guarantees against gouging, profiteering and price increases. Hopefully there will be an election soon which will allow the Canadian people to have that institution.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have only a couple of minutes, but I was very disappointed in the last speech. I was amazed at some of the figures the hon. member used. He picked a price for one food item but missed other food items. Everyone knows, for instance, that if a hot dog cost 78 cents in 1973, one could probably buy one for $1.78 in one store but perhaps $1.40 in another, as I did a week ago. Some of these things do not really count. I think I should point out that increases in prices and increases in wages even themselves out.

I will defend the wage and profit control program which we had because it did control both. It did involve price rollbacks. That is an important point which we must remember. I would like to know how, in this day and age, and with millions of commodities on food shelves and other shelves, one could actually control prices. There is only one way I see that that could be done in any intelligent way, and that is by controlling wages and profits because they are manageable. Those things are manageable, but prices are not so manageable because of bureaucracy, our relationship with the provinces, constitutional considerations, and so forth.

I have just a few seconds left, and I cannot say very much, but I think the motion before us is very impractical.

The present monitoring body at least has the power to subpoena, to obtain information and so forth, and with proper advertising and proper information to the public the squeeze can be put on those who are profiteering.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

MR. WHITEWAY—PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS—WITHDRAWAL OF BILL C-351

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw a private members' bill standing in my name, namely, Bill C-351, to amend the Canada Labour Code (right to work). Upon close scrutiny of the bill I have determined that the bill would challenge the Rand formula. This was not my intention in the bill, so I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) be authorized to withdraw order No. 151 from the order paper respecting Bill C-351, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (right to work)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FUNDS TO COMPLETE RAIL LOCATION STUDY IN WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Recently, in Winnipeg, the regional executive assistant to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), Mr. Jim Weir, accused the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid) of being confused as to government policy with regard to rail relocation study funds. He said: "I dare say an awful lot of people are very confused after John Reid said what he said". Mr. Weir also said: "I don't think the minister fully understood the government's financing programs".

Due to the continuing conflicting statements coming from the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the Minister of Transport forthwith make a statement clarifying the position of the federal government on the provision of funds to complete the rail relocation study in Winnipeg.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST THAT STUDENT EXCHANGE PROGRAMS BE RE-EXAMINED WITH VIEW TO RESTORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the contribution that the Open House Canada program, if properly administered, can make to improving cross-cultural understanding in this country of ours, so deeply riven today as a result of this government's misguided policies, and given the fact that great expectations have been built up among many students as a result of the early promise of funds to carry out a student exchange, only to be dashed when programs are cancelled at the eleventh hour, and considering the recently announced last-minute cancellation of several exchange programs, more likely than not for schools in ridings of opposition members, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare):

That this House deplores these last-minute cancellations, urges the Secretary of State to re-examine them case by case with a view to their restoration, as well as to require his officials in future, on pain of heavy penalty, to refrain from building up expectations until there is absolute certainty that the necessary funds are available and, finally, calls on him to table in this House the list of exchange programs which have just been cancelled, along with the constituencies affected.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION BANK OF CANADA TAKE STEPS TO IMPROVE THE ECONOMY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that the daily newspaper La Presse reported this morning that our country is experiencing serious problems about its borrowings abroad; considering that the main purpose of the Bank of Canada is to control credit in the interests of the economic life of the country; considering that the policy of that institution is laid down by the Government of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the House direct the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to take all necessary steps so that the Bank of Canada will alter its policy concerning issuance of credit for the economic development of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NUMBER OF COMPLIMENTARY COPIES OF "HANSARD" DISTRIBUTED TO MPs—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The matter is one which was dealt with in a general way by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) last week, and it deals with the distribution of Hansard to those Canadians who find the $65 annual subscription cost prohibitive, such as students and academics.

I have discussed this matter with members on both sides of the House, and therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

That members of this House be accorded an increased number of complimentary Hansard subscriptions to be made available to constituents who require Hansard and who would otherwise find the cost prohibitive; and that the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services suggest the criteria to be used in selecting the recipients of such subscriptions.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it touches on the industrial selling index being up 1.5—

• (1415)

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, did I understand you to say that the last motion presented, in regard to Hansard, was carried? I very loudly said "No.". If we are to distribute Hansard, let us distribute it properly and not through a motion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I have done on many occasions in the past, I indicated to the House that pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. In calling for unanimous consent, perhaps there were members who indicated that that consent was not forthcoming, which I did not hear.

As I have always done in the past when corrected in this regard—because sometimes conditions make it difficult to hear—I would have to indicate that, unanimous consent not having been given, the motion would have been put improperly and, therefore, the question ought not to have been in the hands of the House at the time and ought to be considered as though it had not been put with the unanimous consent of the House.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR RISE IN INDUSTRIAL SELLING INDEX

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance: it deals with the alarming inflation we are still experiencing in the country. For example, the industrial selling index is revealed to have gone up 1.5 per cent last month and up 11 per cent in the year, including leather being up 3.2 per cent, textile prices up 1.9 per cent, and paper up 2.6 per cent.

Would the Minister of Finance level with the House? How does he explain such sensational price increases when he has been telling us that the underlying rate of inflation in the country now is controlled?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have said many times that the underlying rate of inflation in Canada in 1978 was between 6.5 per cent and 7 per cent. That is the story as determined by the statistics. Of course, we are always preoccupied with the level of inflation. As I have said many times, it is still the number one problem in Canada.

We are taking all possible steps in order to help control the problem, but of course some elements of inflation are not within the control of the government. About a year and a half ago we decided that we would get out of controls and let the marketplace operate. The marketplace is operating and we are not planning to reimpose controls.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, how can the Minister of Finance say they are taking all steps when they have allowed the dollar to fall to its present level, and when they are continuing to print money at the rate of 11.5 per cent per year?

My follow-up question to the Minister of Finance is: In view of the fact the manufacturing sales tax reduction should now be felt in the price of products in Canada, can he explain why there was a 1.5 per cent increase last month? Does the minister know if the manufacturing sales tax reduction was, in fact, passed on to the consumer; or has it simply been caught up in the general price mechanism of the country?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that we are printing money to the tune of 11 per cent in Canada. It is not true. The M-1 increase in the money supply year over year has been around 6 per cent.

In my budget of November 16 I wanted to ensure that the tax cuts were passed on, but of course we have to rely on the marketplace to see that they are passed on. We are monitoring these developments and have received no indication that the tax cuts have not been passed on. Of course, there are other factors included in the pricing of products: some of those increased, and consequently prices went up.

Mr. Stevens: Obviously, the Minister of Finance does not even read the releases from the Bank of Canada. Yesterday's release showed that the M-1 was up 11.5 per cent, not 6 per cent to which the minister referred.

Would the minister indicate what he is doing to protect the Canadian consumer, in view of the fact that leather prices in the country have doubled over the past year and were up over 3 per cent last month alone, bearing in mind that the price difficulties are due largely to the cheap dollar triggering very, very heavy buying of our raw hides by foreign countries?

• (1420)

Mr. Chrétien: One of the difficulties in respect of leather is that the shoe industry in Canada is now operating at a much higher utilization of capacity. Measures taken some years ago in order to protect Canadian manufacturing have increased the utilization of capacity in many sectors. This is one of the problems with which we have to cope. When your capacity is utilized above 90 per cent of its potential, then this is a problem you have to face at least once in a while. When your economy is growing, you face some shortage of supply and that tends to increase prices.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for St. John's East on a supplementary question, I want to inform the House that there has been a technical difficulty in the preparation of Hansard, but we hope to be in a position to distribute it in a very few minutes.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF AUTOMOBILES DESPITE REDUCTION IN SALES TAX—TARIFF REDUCTIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, since he suggested in reply to my colleague that they are monitoring to see that the federal sales tax reduction is being passed on to the consumer, whether he can explain to the House and the country why prices of automobiles to the consumer went up by 11.5 per cent and that increase started at about the same time that the reduction in sales tax became operative.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a few days after November 16, when we announced the 3 per cent sales tax cut, car manufacturers announced in turn that they would reduce their prices accordingly. With the coming of the new year, either late in 1978 or early in 1979, they came up with new prices which reflect the increase in their production costs. At the time of the budget announcement, car manufacturers had ads published in newspapers to the effect that they would reduce their sale prices by 3 per cent, and they did reduce them at the time.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I find the minister's reply hard to reconcile with the fact that in November the price of automobiles went up by 5.8 per cent, and that was the month the sales tax reduction became operative.

Can he tell the House how he intends to monitor the tariff reductions on imported produce, given the fact that these tariff reductions are so small; for example, in the case of orange juice it is one cent, and in the case of a head of lettuce it is less than one cent? How does the government intend to monitor these tariff reductions to see that they are being passed on to the consumer and do not, in fact, constitute a windfall for the middlemen?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in respect of a reduction in that type of tax, of course, you have to rely on the marketplace. If their cost is lower, normally they pass on the reduction in cost. We cannot monitor to make sure that every store in Canada will pass on these benefits to the consumer. If you want to have that system, you will be back to controlling every aspect of the economy—and that is not the philosophy of our party.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PASSING ON OF SALES TAX CUTS TO CONSUMERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On Tuesday, he told the House that the latest consumer index "shows that the sales tax cut brought forward by the Minister of Finance is being passed on." He referred to clothing as an example. The manufacturing sales tax did not exist in respect of clothing, in the first place.

I should like to ask the minister how he can rationalize to the House, now, that the sales tax cut is being passed on when the industrial price index for manufacturing went up by 11 per cent; in other words, the highest increase since June 1975? How can he reconcile these two conflicting facts?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our analysis of the last CPI—not the one that came out just today—showed that there was a very moderate increase in the non-food section of the CPI and that, in fact, there had been reductions in respect of clothing and furniture. In addition, our analysis of the CPI at that time indicated that the sales tax cut was being passed on and that this was reflected in the non-food segment of the CPI.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, because he obviously does not know, that there is no manufacturing sales tax on clothing, and therefore that does not come into the statistics at all. If it is being passed on, why has the index gone up? What assurance can the minister give us that the sales tax reduction is being passed on; or is this just plain, simple rhetoric on his part?

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker, we are watching that very closely. When I gave that answer, it was based on our analysis of the CPI at that time. I think I mentioned to the hon. member and other hon. members of the House that we would be watching it closely as time went on. It may be that things will change. We are continually analysing the situation and we will report any changes when we have them.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—INVESTIGATION OF PROFIT INCREASES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. Things are changing for the worse. On March 5, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands asked the Minister of Finance about the high profits in the steel industry, which had increased by some 45 per cent, and the high profits in the banking fraternity, which had increased by 34 per cent, or $1 billion last year.

The minister assured the House that the new National Commission on Inflation would make sure that abuses would not occur in the marketplace. Would the minister tell the House whether the NCI has any plans to investigate these profit increases and, if it has, what action are they planning to take?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, the commission is not yet completely set up. They are now getting organized and have not had time to make that survey. But as soon as they are well settled in—I hope to be able to appoint the other members of the commission within the next few days—they will give priority to that type of problem.

FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER STUDY CONDUCTED INTO PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

As a result of the publication of a study commissioned by the Economic Council of Canada on the profits and losses of chartered banks, profits which would appear to have gone up to $500 million over the period from 1968 to 1973, and also of the last financial report of chartered banks for the financial year ending October 31, 1968, which indicates, among other things, profits of as much as 58 per cent, does the minister intend to set up an inquiry into that situation which is, to say the least, unacceptable?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member studies the reports of the banks he will realize that their profits increased in proportion with their turnover, and that in many cases benefits were made especially in their foreign operations and not in Canada. The main chartered banks in Canada have a third of their assets in banking operations abroad. That factor must be taken into account in analyzing their profits. Consideration must also be given to the fact that, because of greater internal liquidity in the Canadian economy, the banks have increased their turnover considerably, very often to the detriment of their competitors. Profits must therefore be compared with the level of banking activity and, personally, I see no great cause for alarm at this time.

REQUEST THAT BANKS REDUCE INTEREST RATES ON LOANS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Since excessive profits have been made, especially on the backs of small borrowers who have to pay consistently high interest rates on their loans and so guarantee our banks profits, will the minister pressure the banks into reducing the interest rates on loans since he said himself, on February 6, 1979, according to Hansard, page 915, that they would be well advised to use those excess profits to reduce interest rates?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the market forces are beginning to show their effect. For example, I read this morning in the newspaper, as the hon. member probably has done too, that one of the major banks in Canada has lowered its interest rates for mortgages because of the reduced demand. Supply and demand and other pressures that bear on the marketplace are such that interest rates on mortgage loans have a tendency to go down at this time. Of course one must take into account the context in which we are living, when the Bank of Canada has to maintain interest rates which attract capital into Canada if we do not want to see a further lowering of the Canadian dollar value. However, in that context, I think competition has helped maintain interest rates as low as possible.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS WILL NOT BE REIMPOSED

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I also have a very important and straightforward question for the Minister of Finance.

Can the minister tell the House if he intends, now or during the next election campaign, to promise that the government has no intention of imposing a wage and price control program, as the right hon. Prime Minister promised during the last election campaign?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we recently appointed a commission on inflation and we said, at that point, that the government was adverse to re-establishing controls in Canada.

We trust that the controls which were in place from 1975 to mid-1978 taught Canadians a lesson, namely that if they did not behave reasonably and responsibly, inflation was going to take over our economy and everybody was going to lose out on it. I can certainly say to the hon. member that since we have come out of controls, that is since April 15 last, management and labour have been very reasonable. I think we can indeed say that present production costs have returned to normal, that is they are increasing at a slower rate than those of our major competitors, the United States.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think the Minister of Finance has not replied to my question.

Will he, yes or no, make the same promise that was made during the last electoral campaign? I think this question is equally clear.

Can the minister inform us here and now why the present government, while so successful in controlling wages, has had relatively little success up to now in controlling prices? This is of major importance to our Canadian workers.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the government is highly concerned about rising prices. Unfortunately, in an economy such as ours it is not possible to control prices without controlling the other sectors of the economy. I think everyone in this House agreed, when we lifted the controls, that we should let the marketplace operate normally, and if such is the situation, we can only do what we are doing now, monitor abuses and denounce them publicly. But we have no intention of introducing partial or full controls.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ENSURE INDUSTRY VIABILITY DURING TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister stated yesterday in Windsor that "the Canadian automotive industry is facing rapid technological change, and the government will take steps to ensure industry viability through this period of change", would the minister advise the House what steps the government plans to take to bring this about?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, basically, the House is fully aware of the steps we took to ensure that the Ford engine plant came to Canada, with an expenditure by them of something over $500 million, which will see the manufacturing of a tremendous percentage of the Ford engines used within Canada.

General Motors are enlarging their transmission plant in Windsor and expending upwards of $400 million on that. Yesterday, I announced that we would make available to the parts industry grants for innovative, new methods of production and innovative, new designs for production in that industry, so that we could ensure growth of the parts industry similar to our encouragement of the Big Three automobile companies.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the government's program relies heavily on increased research and development, does the minister not consider that allowing the industry to write off 200 per cent of all increases in capital and current expenditures on research and development would be a significant improvement to the government's present incentives plan which was originally introduced by the Conservative government in 1961, cancelled by the Liberal government in 1965 and reintroduced by the government last year without change?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government of 1961 exported something like $500 million worth of cars. Today we are exporting something over $10 billion worth. If we used their efforts as a guide, I am sure it would be a dismal failure today.

We are encouraging a tremendous amount of R and D to be undertaken in Canada. We have taken steps already, and I announced additional steps yesterday, to encourage the Big Three to spend more money on R and D. We will continue to pressure them to spend more money on R and D in the automobile industry in Canada.

HEALTH

REDUCTIONS IN FUNDING—EFFECT ON HEALTH CARE

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

While looking into the possible misuse of medicare funds, will the minister also look into such items as the cutback in hospital beds, which will seriously affect health care in places like Thunder Bay, and the elimination of insurance for catastrophic illness by reason of a $9.80 per day fee for long-term illness, which could seriously erode lifetime savings?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that no cuts to health care were made by the federal government. I read a reference to that in speeches given in Ontario by provincial ministers. Ontario received over $2 billion for health care in 1978-79.

I shall ask my officials to obtain information on the reduction of beds, to which the hon. member referred, and the problem at Thunder Bay. Of course, the additional fee that chronic care patients are being asked to pay is part of the total program that worries us a great deal. We are studying it right now. I can only repeat that we want fair treatment for providers and for users of health care in Canada.

TRADE

REQUEST THAT WHEAT SHIPMENTS BE SPEEDED UP

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. When he was recently in China, was he not given to understand that one of the most serious problems connected with the purchase of wheat under the new agreement would be the promptness of delivery?

We have not been able to get any satisfaction from the Minister of Transport in connection with this matter. I ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce what he is doing about assuring that cargoes of wheat are delivered on time and the pile-up of demurrage shall be reduced to a minimum.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when I was in China, the Chinese expressed deep interest in signing a long-term wheat agreement. I am pleased to be able to say to the House that since I came back to Canada, the Chinese have been over and signed the largest wheat agreement ever.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: They did suggest to me that this winter, wheat shipments to China have been very good and they had encountered no difficulty in receiving them. They said that a year ago they had run into difficulty.

I can say to the House that in their trip to Canada not so long ago, they spent some time looking at Vancouver harbour. We made them aware of our intentions with regard to improving the deliverability of wheat through Prince Rupert. I might say that I was in Vancouver recently, and counted very, very few ships in the harbour waiting for grain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that since the minister's conversion he makes Saul's look like an amateur performance. He seems to have forgotten that the contract made with China was made by the government of which I had the honour to be the head and of which at one time he was a valiant supporter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him simply this: How many ships did he count waiting in Vancouver harbour, and on what dates?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, let me assure the right hon. gentleman that at the time he was leading the government of Canada, I strongly supported it; but when the Conservative party rudely dumped him, I began to lose interest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: How about Ralph Stewart?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Jack, smile.

Mr. Horner: I might also say, at that time the present leader of the party was very active in getting rid of him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1440)

Mr. Horner: With regard to the number of ships I counted in Vancouver, I think I was in Vancouver about a week ago and I counted seven ships. I do not know for certain whether they were waiting for grain, sulphur or potash.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Little Jack Horner.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PATENT GRANTED TO CHINESE BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On December 14, 1978, the hon. member for Vancouver East wrote to the minister on behalf of one Andrew Joe. He asked the minister to strike the federal patent granted to the Chinese Benevolent Association of Canada. Part of the letter reads:

> The people who applied for the federal patent must have been aware of the B.C. society and I submit have in all likelihood filed a false affidavit when they declared no knowledge of a similar-named provincial society.

My question to the minister is: Was there any evidence of likelihood of criminal activities in that society, as the hon. member for Vancouver East alleged, or was it just a case of besmirching the reputation of good citizens and good organizations across Canada?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I recall the exchange of letters, but unfortunately I do not have them with me and cannot recall the details. However, I know that I replied to the hon. member who was referred to in the question. I would be quite willing to seek the information required and provide it to the hon. member.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The same letter goes on to say:

> It would be appreciated if you would permit me, in the presence of your officials, to examine all documents filed pursuant to the federal patent.

Did the minister give the hon. member for Vancouver East permission to snoop through all the files; and in what way did he protect the reputation and privacy of all those people?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I sign hundreds of letters each week, and it is difficult for me to recall immediately the details of all those answers. However I would be pleased to pursue the question and provide an answer.

It would be helpful if hon. members gave me notice of a question such as that, so I would be better prepared to answer him when I come into the House.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

STEPS TO IMPROVE CAPE BRETON COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in his capacity as minister in charge of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

On April 11, 1978, the Deputy Prime Minister made an announcement in Glace Bay that the federal cabinet had approved in principle an expenditure of $265 million for improvement of the Cape Breton coal industry. The first, and major, component of this spending was to open a new mine outside Glace Bay called the Donkin mine.

Can the minister tell me if the final feasibility study that was supposed to be originally completed at the end of February is now ready, or if a preliminary synopsis of it is ready; and can the minister say if there is any truth in the allegations made that the minister is reputed to have said that such a study and its conclusions would not go before the cabinet until after the next federal election?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the exact date will be of the next election, but if we listen to rumours it seems the election is not that far away.

To return to the main point of the question, yes, it is true that we have an agreement in principle made by cabinet last year that we will launch that kind of feasibility study on opening a new mine at Donkin, having discovered and tested the reserves following drilling, which was undertaken with the province under a joint agreement. The study has been ongoing. In answer to my last inquiry, there was an indication that we should receive the consultants' report within a few weeks; however, I cannot say whether I will have it in two or three weeks' time.

I am sure the hon. gentleman understands the importance of the decision that we must make: it will involve hundreds of millions of dollars of investment. Pending that decision, there is also a decision to be taken in the case of Prince Mine. Work is developing there, and a decision has to be made with regard to further investment in that mine also. Obviously, those major decisions will command serious investigation by myself and my colleagues in cabinet. As they involve an investment of a large sum of money, I will have to consult my seatmate, the President of the Treasury Board, on that.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister received on Monday, as I did, a telegram from Mr. William Marsh, president of the United Mine Workers of America, district 26, in it is said:

[Mr. Allmand.]

Full district executive board United Mine Workers of America, district 26, at a meeting today passed resolution to open new mine in Donkin-Morien area recently promised by Deputy Prime Minister Allan MacEachen. Request immediate action before federal election.

Will the minister give an answer in writing to president Marsh, who is naturally very concerned about the start-up date of the Donkin mine since some 4,000 men are looking for jobs in the Cape Breton coalfields?

Mr. Lessard: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will obviously answer president Marsh's telegram that was received yesterday in my office. In so far as being able to indicate on what date we will see work starting on the putting in place and developing of a new mine, I am obviously not in a position to do so.

If we base that question on our former performance in Devco on this side of the House, with this government, I think the people in Cape Breton should rest assured that if there is a decision to be taken, it will be taken by this government and it should be a positive one.

TRANSPORT

USE OF ARTHUR LAING BRIDGE, VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR IMPROVED FACILITIES

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It concerns the Arthur Laing bridge between Vancouver and Richmond, B.C. The minister will recall that general commuter traffic is prevented from using this bridge, by MOT policy.

In view of the fact that this $23 million structure is operating at only one-tenth of its design capacity in service to Vancouver international airport, while the adjacent Oak Street bridge chokes on peak traffic volume of almost 3,600 vehicles per hour, will the minister consider the present irrational situation and take steps that will allow commuter traffic to use this strategically located bridge for travel between Vancouver and Richmond?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to tell the hon. member that it is not Ministry of Transport policy which prevents the bridge from being used in ways different from its present use but, rather, it is my view that it is very much up to the decision of the city of Vancouver and other local councils to deal with this issue. If they address a request to us for a different use of the bridge, we will oblige immediately.

The past position of the city of Vancouver has been against allowing extra traffic across this bridge into that particular section of streets, but if the hon. member knows of any change in that regard, I would be pleased to hear about it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST PEACE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is related to the historic achievements and peace negotiations that have taken place in the Middle East in recent days. I ask the Secretary of State whether he has any comments to make to this House on these developments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: That is an abuse of the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY INTO DEATHS RELATED TO HELICOPTER SKIING—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can he indicate the nature of the inquiry being held or whether any broader inquiry will be held into the recent deaths in avalanches related to helicopter skiing in British Columbia? It is some weeks since I first raised this question.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not have anything new to add to my previous answers.

SAFETY MEASURES IN HELICOPTER SKIING

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. I would like to know what action the minister is prepared to take on the suggestion made by the Canadian ski patrol system for a meeting of all groups involved in helicopter skiing—I believe that would include at least four federal departments—to discuss safety measures in this sport?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, provided all of the sport governing boards are also in tune, I will look at it very seriously.

TRADE

USE OF METRIC SYSTEM

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for metric measurement, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Does the minister subscribe to the suggestions put forward by some people in his department, that the words "kilometrage" and "metrage" replace the common usage of "mileage", "footage" and "yardage?"

• (1450)

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in going metric, the yard and the foot are terms which would no longer be used. Mileage could still be used, in western Canada particularly, because the land is surveyed by the mile. People can use footage and yardage if they like in their own personal conversations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: But I see no real advantage in their being retained as government terms.

Mr. Brisco: May I ask the minister how he feels about adding to the metric terminology one other word—"outrageous"?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

LOTO CANADA

STUDY ON SOCIOECONOMIC EFFECTS OF LOTTERIES IN CANADA—INSTITUTION OF LUXURY LOTO

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). Can the hon. lady confirm that Loto Canada is presently investigating the feasibility of instituting Luxury Loto and, if so, why is she not prepared to wait until she has received the report which was requested by her hon. friend for York West for a study of the socioeconomic effects of lotteries in Canada?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Loto Canada have informed me that they are, indeed, considering a higher priced ticket.

As to the other part of the hon. member's question, Loto Canada has repeatedly, on a two-month basis, kept close track of who is purchasing the $10 ticket and the socioeconomic area in which they are located. We have every reason to believe that the bulk of those who are puchasing these $10 tickets are in the $15,000 a year and up bracket.

Mr. Halliday: My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. What steps has the minister taken to follow up the request of the hon. member for York West to investigate the socioeconomic effects of lotteries, and what can he tell the House about his earlier commitment to report to the House the extent to which advertising such lotteries may be misleading?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I referred the question put to me by the hon. member for York West to a number of experts in my department, who are conducting an analysis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: We are looking into it because we do not want to talk without knowing what we are talking about—unlike many members opposite.

We were asked to look into this matter, and that is what we are doing. It has been referred to a group of experts, and as soon as a report is available I shall make it known to the House.

With respect to misleading advertising, that matter has been placed in the hands of the director of investigations under the combines act. He enjoys independence of action under the law and will take whatever measures are appropriate.

SPORTS

ALTERNATE HOST CITY FOR PAN AMERICAN GAMES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). In view of increased speculation that Venezuela will withdraw as host country for the 1983 Pan American Games, can the hon. lady bring the House up to date on the situation, and does she still see the city of Hamilton as the automatically designated alternate host city to Caracas?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to thank the hon. member, along with the hon. members for Hamilton East and Hamilton West who have consistently brought this matter to my attention over the last several weeks.

There has been no information on this subject from Caracas, Venezuela. President Herrera is supposed to be making a statement concerning the future of the Pan American Games in 1983 in that country, but we are not yet in possession of any hard facts. I can reassure hon. members who are interested, however, that according to my information, Hamilton is the designated alternate city and, further, the federal government is prepared to confirm the support which was given at the time of the original bid by Hamilton.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES GOVERNMENT WILL TAKE TO SUPPLY GOLDEN EAGLE WITH GASOLINE

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which deals with the now well-known refusal of the multinational corporation Exxon to renew its contract with the Golden Eagle refinery in Saint-Romuald, in Quebec. Can the minister tell us whether the representations already made by Petro-Canada will be effective enough to enable the Crown corporation to ensure supplies to the Golden Eagle Corporation? If not, can he tell us what alternative he contemplates to maintain supplies to the Golden Eagle Corporation?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): This is another example of the situation we have been discussing in the last few days—the diversion of Venezuelan oil intended for Canada.

The Golden Eagle refinery, very close to Quebec City, has been sourcing from Venezuela through two middlemen, the Ultramar Corporation and Exxon Corporation. I believe the refinery has received information that its supplies will continue under that contract until the end of the year, though this is not certain at the present time: we are trying to find out. However, the situation is a good example of the way in which Petro-Canada, making a direct deal with the national oil company of Venezuela, will be able to secure for the Golden Eagle refinery and other refineries, including Imperial Oil, a source of secure oil from Venezuela.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

FUTURE OF KITIMAT, B.C., OIL PORT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Environment). It concerns the Kitimat oil port which the minister said a year ago was a dead proposition. Since then, Canada and the United States have announced a joint decision-making process to consider ways of moving Alaskan oil from Canada to the United States, and one of the options is through the Kitimat oil port.

Can the minister tell us why this is still an option in terms of Canadian decision-making as it affects west coast oil ports?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Kitimat is not an option; it is as dead as dead can be.

FORESTRY

CATALOGUING OF FOREST RESERVES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): My question is for the Minister of State (Environment). I should like to ask whether he is aware of a program in his department—which has jurisdiction over forestry—which, through remote sensing, catalogues and maps forest reserves in this country and in other parts of the world.

Is he also aware that this program cannot function in Petawawa, for obvious reasons, and that the program will die unless he intervenes before the end of this month?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): There was a good deal of chattering around about me when the member was asking his question and I did not hear the first part. I will look at the record later and consider the hon. member's question.

IMMIGRATION

SECURITY DEPOSITS FOR FOREIGN VISITORS

Mr. Yuri Shymko (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. According to the recent caseload, almost 90 per cent of all visitors from Poland are requested to see that their Canadian hosts place with the deputy minister up to $5,000 as a security deposit.

Could the minister tell the House whether this section of the Immigration Act—which ought to be used sparingly but which is being applied almost universally—is used in the same proportion with respect to visitors from other countries as it is with respect to visitors from eastern Europe?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will have to make sure that its application is universal, across the board.

PENITENTIARIES

STAFFING OF PSYCHIATRIC CENTRE IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General. As he knows, there has recently been opened near Saskatoon a western region psychiatric centre, at a cost of $10 million. At night, with the lights on, it is sometimes confused with the Saskatoon airport. I should like to ask the minister why this institution, which has only eight inmates, has engaged 77 guards and only one psychiatrist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: When will the situation be rectified? What is wrong with this institution?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): There is nothing wrong with this institution, Mr. Speaker. I am glad the hon. member is once again drawing attention to the program of psychiatric services which we have established within the Correctional Service of Canada. He no doubt noticed that last week I issued a press release in which it was pointed out that the psychiatric centre in Matsqui, British Columbia, is receiving international acclaim.

● (1500)

I would be very pleased to provide the hon. member with additional information about the Saskatoon institution. When dealing with a new institution, there are problems in terms of finding staff of the excellence which is required by the Correctional Service of Canada. If the hon. gentleman is interested in providing assistance, we would appreciate receiving it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, if the minister carries on, people in Saskatoon will think that the Parliament Buildings, rather than a psychiatric centre, have been moved there.

Has the minister given serious consideration to recommendation No. 58 of the subcommittee of a committee of this House with respect to transferring psychiatric services for prisons and penitentiaries to the Deparment of National Health and Welfare, as recommended by that committee and supported by all parties?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, that recommendation is being very seriously considered. I point out, however, that we are also providing adequate facilities for provincial inmates in Saskatoon. There is an allotted number of beds within that institution for provincial inmates. We are receiving excellent co-operation from the province of Saskatchewan, and I hope the hon. gentleman will give us the same co-operation that we are receiving from the University of Saskatchewan so that the institution will continue to provide excellent service in coming generations.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ALEXANDER—PAN-AM GAMES—REPLY OF MINISTER OF STATE (FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT) DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in connection with remarks made by the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo), who left the impression that no one but the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) was concerned about the Pan-Am Games.

The minister has a selective memory because when the hon. members to whom I have referred went to Hamilton the first time in order to make a press announcement with respect to the Pan-Am Games, they would not have dared to go unless they had the support of the hon. member for Hamilton West, who was at the press conference at that time and who gave support. Without my support they would not even have gone to Hamilton. The minister should stop misleading the Canadian people.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I do not deny in any respect the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) regarding the matter of obtaining the games for Hamilton originally. However, I have not heard one word from the hon. member for Hamilton West about the matter raised by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott).

Business of the House

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if I may return to the game of the House of Commons, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) if, in terms of the business for the next couple of weeks, he would designate March 26 as the last allotted day on the list of allotted days. Perhaps he could also tell us the business for the balance of today and tomorrow. If he would also project himself into next week for the purposes of House business, that would be helpful.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, my plan is to continue with the debate on the energy supplies bill today and hope to have it completed, including third reading. If not, we would continue with that bill tomorrow. If there is any additional time tomorrow, I will call the excise tax bill. I had in mind to call the referendum bill, but I will delay that until Monday. That will be followed by the Excise Tax Act.

I cannot be certain about designating March 26 as an allotted day. I may want to allot an earlier date, but I will certainly give the hon. member sufficient advance notice.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, some hon. members have expressed some interest in the bill on the order paper affecting Loto Canada; the number escapes me. Is that among the government's priorities? Does the government have any intention of calling that piece of legislation?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the minister has been urging me to put it on my list at an early date, but I do not propose to call it before the bills I have mentioned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in a sense my question is supplementary to the one asked yesterday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) having to do with the chartered banks of this country. In view of the fact that Wednesday, March 28, if we are still here, will be the twentieth sitting day in this month, and in view of the relevance of that to the present provisions of the Bank Act, can the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) say whether it is the intention before March 28 to bring down a bill to extend the life of the chartered banks?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member is losing his confidence about the continued existence of the Parliament of Canada because he has been convinced up until this moment that an election would not be held until his birthday. I wonder what has shaken that confidence. However, I want to tell him that it is my intention to give notice today or tomorrow about a bill extending the Bank Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as often happens, the Deputy Prime Minister has completely misinterpreted what was said. It was because I still think the election will not be held until my birthday, June 18, that I was concerned that the banks of this country not die. However, I am glad to have notice that their life will be extended.

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

PRIVILEGE

MR. LEGGATT—KITIMAT B.C., OIL PIPELINE—REPLY OF MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I appreciate that a minister is not obligated to answer a question, but I think he is obligated not to mislead the House in terms of his answer. In this particular instance, the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) inadvertently misled the House. I asked him about the Kitimat oil pipeline proposal. His answer was—and I am paraphrasing—that the proposal was clearly dead. The question was why the proposal was still being considered by the Canadian government with the United States. It seems to me that there was misleading since it is clearly alive, based upon the announcement by the Canadian government that it is in the process of making a decision regarding the option of a Kitimat oil pipeline.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might throw some light on this. As the hon. member who asked the question knows, in law a consortium or a company has the right to apply to the National Energy Board and to make a submission to the National Energy Board regarding the building of a pipeline from Kitimat to whatever other point might be proposed. The hon. member also knows that through a number of policy statements the government has made it quite clear that it does not favour an oil pipeline through that route.

Mr. Benjamin: That doesn't mean you won't do it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT FIXING PERIOD BETWEEN VACANCY AND BY-ELECTION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-468, to amend the House of Commons Act (vacancies).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, this bill would fix a time limit which is shorter than at present for a seat to be vacant. I came into this House after a vacancy created by decease. There had been a lengthy vacancy. I present this bill in order to prevent long vacancies.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF MOTION

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) wishes to table a document. Perhaps we could revert to tabling of documents for that purpose.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 60 I wish to table a notice of a ways and means motion, and I ask Your Honour to designate the required order of the day for consideration thereof.

Question No. 1,110—Mr. Crosbie:

1. Did the government spend $1.5 million or any amount at all in acquiring a detailed engineering design of a floating dock for the Port of Vancouver as announced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on January 4, 1978 and, if so (a) what was the total amount spent to date (b) what is the remaining amount to be spent if the project is not yet completed?

3. Were the amounts spent by the government to acquire the detailed engineering design direct expenditures or grants and, if not, were they by way of a loan and, if so, to whom was the loan made and under what terms and conditions?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

1. The Crown has entered into a contract with Swan Wooster Engineering Co. Ltd., for a detailed engineering design for a floating dry dock for the Port of Vancouver. The amount spent to date is $209,640 and the remaining amount to be spent is $1,187,972.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McKENZIE—DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make inquiries of the parliamentary secretary with regard to the very lengthy delay in answering two questions which are on the order paper in my name. One dates back to October 13, question No. 179, which reads as follows:

Are members of parliament entitled to use DOT telex "Comcen" facilities for the purpose of sending political messages to their constituency—

That question goes back to October 13, 1978 and the government has refused to answer it. I have asked the RCMP to investigate and they have informed me that there is no illegality or infrigement of the Criminal Code in the use of telex facilities. So I think we in the House of Commons, including yourself, Mr. Speaker, are entitled to know whether all MPs will be entitled to use DOT telex to send out political messages. If there is no illegality or infringement of the Criminal Code with regard to the use of the DOT telex, we should get an answer from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), and the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) should provide us with an answer as to whether all parliamentarians will be able to send out political messages over government telex facilities.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I placed a question on the order paper on October 27, question No. 414, which reads as follows:

Was Mr. Tony Merchant, barrister and solicitor of Regina, retained by the Department of Justice in the fiscal year (a) 1975-76 (b) 1976-77 (c) 1977-78—

I know this could be an embarrassment to the Minister of Transport and the government with regard to the handing out of special agreements and contracts to the Minister of Transport's brother-in-law, but we are entitled, and I am entitled, to an answer and there is no reason why it should take six months to gather this type of information together. This is another example of government secrecy, covering up and refusing to give information to the official opposition, which means also refusing to give information to the Canadian public. I would like some kind of answer today from the parliamentary secretary as to why he is refusing to answer these two questions which date back to last October.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I did not want to let that excitement subside without replying, Mr. Speaker. I merely want to point out to the House, since some hon. members apparently delight in reading order paper questions now and again, the provisions of Standing Order 39(1)—

[English]

It reads as follows:

39(1) Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs; and from other members, relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the House, in which such members may be concerned; but in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same; and in answering any such question the matter to which the same refers shall not be debated.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the point I want to make is this: Instead of simply reading the order paper, which we on this side of the House can do and do very well indeed since on the average we reply to 90 per cent of the questions on the order paper every session, certain members often take advantage of a point of order to make petty politics in this House, and I find this unfair.

The hon. member who has just risen read question No. 414—this is the best example that I could give—but he did not read it exactly as it is written. Nothing in this question says that the lawyer involved is the brother-in-law of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). By mentioning in this House that the person referred to in his question is related with a minister of the government, the hon. member is making petty politics. He has used a point of order to read incorrectly a question on the order paper and to comment on it, which is prohibited by Standing Order 39(1), Mr. Speaker.

I have too often been very patient. I have been content to tell about the fantastic work by the government in replying to questions on the order paper by enumerating the great many questions which have been answered very fully and at great cost to the taxpayers and about which the government has found the time to make the necessary research and provide answers.

Mr. Speaker, I can no longer tolerate to hear only about government delays, which are quite exceptional since it is a fantastic average to have been able to reply to 90 per cent of all questions, Mr. Speaker, especially when we consider that in the last few years, thousands of questions have been asked. I find it unacceptable to use a point of order and to abuse deliberately Standing Order 39(1) in this way.

If every day after the oral question period, each hon. member read three, four, five or six questions on the order paper, there would be no end to it. But what is even worse is to comment on such a question, which is strictly forbidden by the standing orders. This is petty politics. It is a fact that we reply to 90 per cent of all questions asked. Very often the insinuations contained in these questions are shown to be completely unfounded, and members on this side of the House do not have the opportunity and the privilege to read the replies which deny completely the insinuations made by opposition members.

Mr. Speaker, it is an injustice resulting from an abuse of our rules when some hon. members complain that questions on the order paper have not been answered. They know perfectly well that during the session, in spite of the large number of questions we manage to answer, on the average to 40 per cent of the questions. It is exactly the average number of questions that have been answered until now in the present session, and it compares favourably with the average in previous sessions.

Hon. members also know that during the summer recess we can do more work, and we succeed in answering an additional 45 to 50 per cent, which allows us to answer 90 per cent of the questions on the order paper. Then, I consider that Standing Order 39(1) has been seriously abused, and the intervention of the hon. member is a perfect example of this, and I want first to ensure hon. members that we shall continue to work seriously in order to answer in the most comprehensive way possible the largest number of questions in the shortest possible time but, on the other hand, I expect them to co-operate so that they do not unduly criticize the work done on this side of the House, and particularly that they be fair and not abusively comment on facts that often are not included in the questions, by giving explanations that are purely political, and have nothing to do with the facts.

[English]

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to rise until the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) made his remarks with respect to the tardiness of the government and of the parliamentary secretary who has the responsibility for answering these questions. I know the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young) who has been filling in has indicated that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council has been quite ill, so I do not want to be too hard on him. On the other hand, I take strong exception to the parliamentary secretary's suggesting what individual members of parliament may or may not do in terms of bringing to the attention of the government very serious delays in answering questions which on the face of them can be answered simply, immediately and in a straightforward way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The point I want to raise is that 81 days from today will be the last day on which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can call an election. He has a maximum of 81 days, unless he wants to break all traditions and precedents. I want to point out to the parliamentary secretary that his performance during the course of the last week when only three questions a day were answered, when there are hundreds of questions on the order paper, legitimate, straightforward, non-argumentative questions requiring factual information from the government, only lends credence to the arguments of those who are suspicious that this government is trying to hold back information because it is not in the interest of the government to bring this information forward.

• (1520)

Rather than indulging in rhetoric, the parliamentary secretary should spend more time convincing the various departments of the necessity of bringing forward these answers within a reasonable period of time. That is his function; that is his role. He would do a greater service to the parliamentary institution, and this particular practice could be utilized by members of parliament in the performance of their duties.

Sometimes members of parliament are discouraged from using this procedure because they know any time they put a question down that the prospect is not that 90 per cent of the time they will receive an answer; the prospect is that 90 per cent of the time they will not receive an answer at all, or the answer will be delayed to such an extent the statistics become irrelevant for them to use.

The parliamentary secretary was not here yesterday, so I brought questions Nos. 207 and 208 to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young). Those are examples of answers which could be given virtually the day after the occurrence of these particular events. The questions are straightforward. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is now leaving the House. The minister knows that he has this information within his own department available on a daily catalogue basis. He could tell us whether government aircraft were used by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or members of cabinet in connection with the by-elections. The minister could tell us how many times JetStars were used by cabinet ministers and the Prime Minister during the two-month period before the by-elections, but he refuses to do so.

In conclusion, if the parliamentary secretary wants to remain credible in the performance of his duties, in the next few days he should demonstrate it by bringing forward many more answers than he has to this point in time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 13, consideration of Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and Motion No. 2 (Mr. Lawrence).

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned this debate at ten o'clock on March 13, my colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) had the floor. Unfortunately, he was unable to be in the House today. But since we come from the same region, I think I will develop the argument he himself had in mind.

[English]

Since the attempt back in 1974 to bring in the Petroleum Administration Act, we have never been so badly served by the Government of Canada regarding a national energy policy. I come from a region which is concerned primarily with the production and distribution of petroleum resources in Canada and with the developing petro-chemical industry of this country. Also, the area from which I come contains the biggest coal reserve region of the country.

As I said in 1970, never have we seen such a bunch of quail flailing before a discharge from the smallest shotgun at this administration in bringing in this act. This act is nothing but a War Measures Act with regard to energy and resources, not only petroleum, natural gas and coal. All the members from the province of Quebec supinely sit in the House while we are considering the powers of the Government of Canada regarding electrical energy. They sit there flatulently because presumably some other part of the country is the concern.

Mr. Gillespie: Has the hon. member read the bill?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I certainly have read the bill. I read it the first morning it was published.

Mr. Gillespie: It does not sound like it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was as a result of telephone calls I placed that people were alerted as to the contents of this bill. Frankly, the bill is merely a reflection of the international oil marketing agreements to which the country has been privy for many years and to which the country was privy when it signed the agreement with the International Energy Agency in 1974.

The day before yesterday I saw the minister stand in the House and bravely defend the position of the government. At least, he attempted to defend the position of the government with respect to dealing through a third party and alleged profits. At that time the minister did not answer the argument implicit in the question put by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). Of course, the minister has not answered and cannot answer whether the government, in dealing with atomic energy, has been far too ready to deal through third parties, to pay secret profits and commissions, and then attempt to hide them from the rest of the Canadian public——as we say, there is a law for one's friends and another for one's foes. What can you do! You understand what I said. The same thing happens when from time to time you have to speak in English, we know what you mean, this is why it is so easy to express oneself in Canada. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, if you believe for one moment that Canadians approve this bill, I wonder why there has been no claim, especially from the Quebec government about electricity. We have seen the report submitted by the Ontario government and it was quite surprising in a way and then again not so because Ontario along with all the other provinces is affected under that bill. British Columbia has coal, oil and natural gas, Alberta has the largest resources of oil, natural gas and coal, Saskatchewan has coal, oil and natural gas, Ontario and Quebec have hydroelectric power and the Maritimes have electricity and other resources, not only past or present resources but also future resources, because the government does not consider that the bill would be applicable only to present conditions. Oh, no, it would also be applicable in the future.

[English]

I have known the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) for over 30 years. I know him as a very personable fellow, and I hope he thinks of me as a very personable fellow. But leaving those personal feelings aside, I should like to point out that he is attempting to promote the wrong thing in this House. He wants to set himself up as the super czar of energy. Talk about trying to plug a leaky boat full of holes. In addition, this government had no damned business being involved in most of these things.

• (1530)

My colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), has advanced an amendment dealing with clause 11. When we look at clause 11 we see that subclause (1) really gives us difficulty. It states that "when the governor in council is of the opinion"—and that is good or bad, founded or ill-founded—"that a national emergency exists by reason of actual or anticipated shortages", the governor in council can use the provisions of this measure. I can recall when we had apprehended insurrections. What on earth is going to determine an anticipated shortage of petroleum? The other day when Imperial announced that Exxon was diverting 25,000 barrels a day of Canadian supply pursuant to an agreement that was in existence, the minister came in here shaking with anticipated chills.

This bill is nothing but a lot of window dressing, and very dangerous window dressing indeed. This clause goes on "anticipated shortages of petroleum or disturbances in the petroleum markets". If the minister wants to talk about disturbances in petroleum markets let me tell him about one. He was a member of this House and will recall the income tax proposals put forward by Mr. Benson in a so-called white paper. Those proposals did more to disturb and disrupt the production of petroleum in Canada than any other act has since, and the minister knows that. The research programs of the petroleum industry were set back at that time by years.

These super chiefs, the super intellects from central Canada who are light years away from the oil industry, have no conception whatsoever of the degree of confidence that is required in order for investment to be made in the petroleum industry. The tax proposals of 1968-69 in respect of resource development in this country set back research and development programs of the petroleum industry in Canada by light years. Before the bill was actually in position it had been changed greatly. Some of the experts who had been advising the then minister of finance regarding resource development taxation had been thoroughly discredited, and only after a great deal of time did we get the industry back on the road.

Premier Lougheed expressed the situation very well the other day. He said that having set down the rules of the game to which the provinces had agreed, now that the provinces were able to make a few scoring points and some progress the Government of Canada wants to change the rules. I suggest this bill is part of that change of the rules.

During the conference in February the minister advanced the same propositions that are contained in this bill. The government wants these changes for anticipated and compelling reasons. This government wants to take control, and it wants to do that when a certain situation exists in its opinion. That must not be allowed.

This bill is a total repudiation of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said on television in his very notorious statement of August 1. He said that it is high time the Government of Canada got its nose out of private business affairs. He said it was time the government pulled out. We know that he said some time before that the marketplace had missed out on its obligations and, therefore, the government had to jump in. Having seen how the Canadian public reacted to that idea, the Prime Minister said last August that it was highly incumbent on the Government of Canada to get out. That was a full 180 degree about-turn.

What the government is proposing in this bill is absolutely dictatorial. It amounts to full control of energy resources in this country. If the measure was aimed only at petroleum and natural gas, then I would be sure of its targets. The targets are not only petroleum and natural gas but include also petroleum feed stocks and coal.

I know the reason behind this facade of the government. I know what lies behind the arrangements this administration wants to put into effect. This is a thinly veiled move by this government to curry favour before an election. What I do not know is which segment of the population it is directed toward. Is it directed toward the Atlantic provinces or Ontario? If it is directed toward Ontario, then I suggest the brief filed on behalf of the Ontario government last week should be a sufficient answer. I think that is a devastating argument that should counter a bill of this nature.

The same may be said of an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail last Saturday. Where does this minister think he gets his support for this particular bill, except from those backbenchers who are desperately striving to get a handle on something that might give them support during the election campaign? As a result of this particular bill and the statements made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology, the leader of the Liberal party in Alberta has called for his resignation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister may laugh and he may want to dismiss Nick Taylor as a clown, but let him do that within his own party. My own Liberal opponent resigned as a candidate because, as he said quite openly to the Prime Minister in his letter of resignation, he could in no way support the Liberal party's policy in respect of energy, but had to support the position taken by Premier Lougheed. If a province with some 1,900,000 people and over 85 per cent of the petroleum and natural gas production and potential in this country, with possibly 50 per cent of the petrochemical industry in this country, and with, at a rough guess, 65 per cent to 75 per cent of the coal resources of this country, thoroughly rejects the position of this government, hon. members opposite must pause, if they think——they will take over the resources of other areas of the country. If it is Alberta, Saskatchewan, or British Columbia today, it may well be Quebec tomorrow. We Albertans know very well what reply we could expect if we were to ask for a special deal on paper, asbestos and on any other thing: "You will have to pay the market rate". We are paying the market rate on textiles and other products bought from central Canada and Quebec in particular. I know that the main purpose of this bill is to influence hon. members from Quebec. What do they care if tomorrow, under the provisions of this bill, the governor in council decides that there are market disturbances not only for oil, but also in the use of electricity, if the board created under this bill is not authorized, without appeal, to allocate resources completely disproportionate to the needs and without consulting Quebec. They must examine . . . But agreements will be signed, they say. I know what that means. Anyone who reads the bill will see what powers it gives.

A Caesar is appointed without providing any means of control because, not only do we have vague principles, but it is also recognized that shortages or market disturbances will affect the security and welfare of Canadians as well as the economic stability of Canada. What rot! Will the hon. member be able to determine the standards on which this will be based? And in clause 11—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to say a few words on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). First of all, I should like to refer to the earlier remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) about Hydro-Quebec or the hydroelectric resources of the provinces. The hon. member pointed out to the House that, should this bill become law, the Allocation Board could at one fell swoop take over all the hydroelectric resources of the provinces. I do not wish to say that the hon. member cannot read, Mr. Speaker, but I shall read, if you will allow me, for the information of the hon. members, clause 15 of the bill which deals specifically with this problem. I quote:

The Board may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into arrangements with provincial authorities for the regulation and pricing by such provincial authorities—

Clause 15, Mr. Speaker, does not say "by the Board" but "by such provincial authorities." In the case of electric power resources, this means Hydro-Quebec in Quebec and Ontario Hydro in Ontario. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is making the same error of interpretation as the witnesses from the government of Ontario who appeared before the committee. There is absolutely no doubt about the meaning of the terms used in clause 15. The hon. member keeps saying no. If I may read again:

—enter into arrangements with provincial authorities for the regulation and pricing by such provincial authorities—

Which authorities? Provincial authorities—so Hydro-Quebec. Listen, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Read on.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Bussières: Reading on:

—by such provincial authorities of the supplies of electric power produced or used within a province for the purpose of reducing the demands upon the available supplies—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Right there.

Mr. Bussières: Yes, but reducing supplies does not imply a change in authorities, it implies that the reduction will be made by the provincial authorities when they recognize that reduction is necessary to balance energy resources within their province.

Mr. Speaker, if I understand the hon. member correctly, he is suggesting that role or decision would be made by the central government or the board established under this bill, and that is completely wrong. Clause 15 is very clear and specific. The hon. member seems scandalized that the government of Quebec did not echo the ill-timed and unfounded criticisms of the government of Ontario but that is because the government of Quebec took the time to read the bill and the authorities of the government of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, understood what the hon. member is not even taking the trouble to understand. It is quite clear, it is very simple, everything is there and it is quite easy to understand. The hon. member understands nothing and blames the Quebec government for having understood. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the Quebec energy minister took the time to read the bill and to understand it and if he believes that it is good, necessary and well conceived because he can still act within his field of responsibility, I believe that we should congratulate him and criticize the hon. member for suggesting that he has understood everything when, in fact, he understands nothing at all. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the truth must be told.

Mr. Speaker, I have been dealing long enough with a false problem caused by someone who understood nothing. I would now like to come back to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. This amendment aims at deleting subclause (4) from clause 11 of the bill. Subclause (4) provides that there will be a three-day debate when the order made by the governor in council is tabled in the House for discussion by members of parliament. By deleting this provision, we would come back to our normal procedure, which means that once the order is tabled the House would have as much time as it wants to debate it under our standing orders. How long could this debate go on? Perhaps 15 days and even more, according to the time that the House will want to take to discuss it. Mr. Speaker, we all know that such a procedure can last a long time, as may be quite normal in certain cases.

Morever, if we study this bill and look only at its title, it is quite obvious that we are not discussing just any bill; we are discussing an act "to provide a means to conserve supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency". This legislation cannot be enacted at any time according to the whims of the governor in council or board officials. This legislation will be enacted and implemented only in a case of national emergency.

Mr. Speaker, we are in a national emergency, the order is before the House, it has been discussed for two or three weeks. In the meantime the emergency worsens, conditions can deteriorate and we are still talking. The public often remark that politicians talk and talk but there is never any action. The legislation provides for practical actions. The board will be in a position and will have powers to take those actions at two levels: first the allocation of oil for refining, and second the allocation if needed, through rationing, of refined products.

Mr. Speaker, when faced with an emergency, when the crisis looms, it is too late to ponder whether this is urgent or not. Hon. members will have three days to put their arguments forward as to how they assess this period, this emergency, whether they perceive it as acute or not nonexistent. And after three days of debates, the question will be put automatically.

This means both sides of the House and every party will have ample time to find the most qualified people—and we know there will be a number of them—to state their positions and their party's positions on the emergency we will be facing. And when evidence will have been adduced by hon. members, the House will be called upon to dispose of the motion, to state whether or not it believes there is indeed an emergency and whether the government can or must proceed with the board's work, the implementation of the measures for the allocation of petroleum products. Mr. Speaker, this in my view provides a reasonable time frame. I am convinced that during those three days both sides will have an opportunity to make their views known as to whether there is an emergency. In my opinion suppressing this clause would make us run the risk of getting bogged down in a procedural debate. So, in the middle of a crisis, we could have politicians bickering and arguing at the very moment when there would be a risk and not only a risk but an actual state of emergency, when Canadians would suffer from a shortage of petroleum products. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is our duty as a government to provide for such an eventuality and to do so we have subclause 4 of clause 11 of the bill which sets a time limit to the debates on a given subject after the government has tabled the order.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to point out to hon. members that when we have changes to propose at a future stage, another order is issued by the Governor in Council. You will find further down in the other clauses of this bill that it provides for this obligation of tabling those orders before the House of Commons. So Mr. Speaker, I think it is judicious and wise to have thought of such a measure, given the very nature of this bill and the situation in which Canadians would find themselves once a state of emergency or crisis in Canada would have been declared. The mechanism will then be triggered following the decisions made by the Governor in Council. Mr. Speaker, I think I have pointed out those main aspects of this bill on which I particularly wanted to draw your attention.

[English]

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the vital provisions of Bill C-42 and in particular to consider the amendments and the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). The pith and substance of the energy supplies emergency bill is that, in the event of a national emergency by reason of petroleum shortages, the mandatory allocation and rationing provisions can be invoked and made operative.

We must consider the provisions of the bill in relation to this eventuality and ask what constitutes a national emergency of the kind described. We are not without experience in this regard. Most hon. members will recall the difficult time experienced in 1973-74, particularly on the east coast of Canada and the United States. The picture I remember so well is that of a closed service station postered with "no gas" signs. But is that indeed the view of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie)? Does he really believe that we will experience consumer gas shortages and a shortfall in oil supplies to oil refineries?

Throughout February of this year the minister on several occasions gave assurances to this House that, in terms of oil supplies, we were in great shape. The minister spoke of trade-offs of western Canadian oil for a greater share of east coast imported oil. He told this House that we had a tremendous deal with the Venezuelan government: not only did the arrangement guarantee the source of supply, but the oil supplied would be purchased at a pre-emergency price.

He told us about Mexico and the negotiations for their new-found oil supplies. We can dismiss this source of oil supply forthwith because it will not even be on stream for several years. I shall not even ask the minister how he proposed to compete with the United States in purchasing these supplies with our 80-cent dollar as against their 100-cent dollar. Hon. members can be assured of one thing: when the minister speaks of new sources of foreign oil, we will pay for it and we will pay dearly. There is every reason to believe that east coast gas—now well over $1 per gallon—will rise to $2 per gallon if it is refined from foreign imported oil.

Let us consider what constitutes an emergency under the bill. In mid-February the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said in this House and elsewhere that the situation is serious but not critical. We should consider why the minister thought the situation was not critical at that point. The minister gave us the reason and it was a very simple one—production in Alberta of Canadian oil was increased to a rate sufficient to feed the swaps for foreign oil delivered to the east coast. This was the device that defused the oil bomb. There was no explosion; eastern service stations did not close down, nor did easterners freeze in our coldest month.

What role did the minister play in this defusion process? Mr. Speaker, I suggest he played no part at all. The producing oil companies and their distribution system went into operation and the situation was remedied by the private sector of the oil industry. When we have an oil emergency it will be because the private sector does not come to the aid of consumers. This means that the government cannot step in and supply the oil that the consuming public requires.

Does this mean there is no role for government in an oil crisis? No, Mr. Speaker; government definitely has a role and a grave and important one. But it must be remembered and carefully considered and realized that the private sector in the oil industry has an equally important role. The private sector must continue to have a voice in coping with an emergency situation, because it is this group that has access to world oil supplies and has the transportation and transmission system to deliver oil products to Canadian consumers and users.

Let us consider the national aspect of an oil emergency. We must remember that the energy problem is not, in a territorial sense, truly national. Alberta and parts of western Canada are rich in energy resources; through the medium of the "west to east" transmission pipeline much of central and eastern Canada west of the Ottawa valley line get the benefit of those energy supplies.

The minister said in this House that one third of Canada is affected by the world oil crisis; now he wakes up and says, "Let us extend the oil pipeline eastward. Let us deliver western energy in the form of oil and natural gas to the east coast." He acts like a person who has just made an important discovery—and indeed he has made a discovery, namely, that the east coast has a special energy problem. It is not national but is related to the geography of world oil supplies; it is only national because it is compounded by national government inaction.

We may well have a national emergency caused by oil shortages, but it is only a national emergency because the east coast energy problem has not been recognized heretofore. Only foreign revolutions and empty refineries and "no oil" signs awaken the government and prompt action.

We ought to look at the action that is possible in the light of the provisions of Bill C-42 and especially the proposed amendments concerning Petro-Canada. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that on the east coast of Canada oil is energy. Over 80 per cent of the electricity generated in Nova Scotia is fueled by oil, and all of the oil is imported. When you cut off foreign oil supplies to Nova Scotia you do not just close the oil refineries and lose jobs. You do not just cut off gas supplies to service stations and shut down motor vehicle traffic. You turn off the electric power, and then activity grinds to a halt. In Nova Scotia foreign oil is energy!

What must a national government do? First, the government must make absolutely certain that oil continues to flow to the east coast and to Nova Scotia refineries. Second, it must make sure that the refined oil products are so distributed that the economy of the region continues to function. To do this involves a third responsibility, namely, to see that the price of petroleum products must not exceed Canadian prices. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is, surely, Mr. Speaker, aware of all this. But what does he propose? First, Bill C-42 and its oil allocation and rationing, and second the involvement of Petro-Can, or what he likes to call our national oil company.

I am reminded of the remark that was made about the Pope—though I do not wish to be facetious about so serious a matter—when a belligerent party mentioned his intervention. The other party asked "... and how many legions has the Pope? I ask: How much oil does Petro-Can have? How many tankers does it command? What transmission lines does it have in place? Petro-Can has no oil. It has no tankers, it has no transmission lines, and, unlike the Pope, its prayers and good intentions go unheeded by the world powers.

We do not want or need another government agency; we need oil supply contracts, oil tankers, transmission lines, new sources of oil supply and alternative energy resources. If the minister was realistic he would call this national oil agency "Petro-Can't", because it cannot supply petroleum, it cannot produce gas and, if it could, it could not deliver its products.

I would like to speak briefly on alternative sources of energy. What are the alternatives? First, let me trace the more recent energy history in Nova Scotia. Prior to the 1970s a decision was taken by the Canadian government to restrict the importation of foreign oil to the Ottawa valley line. At the same time Canadian oil was made available to central Canada, west of the Ottawa valley line through the TransCanada pipeline. This left Quebec and Atlantic Canada dependent on foreign oil. When the 1970s oil crisis struck, the government moved to extend the availability of Canadian oil to Montreal through the Sarnia pipeline. Again, the east coast was left dependent on foreign oil.

In Nova Scotia during the mid-seventies the cost of oil-fueled electric energy increased dramatically with the escalating price of world oil so that charges for electricity doubled in a short time period. Today Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have the highest electric energy and home heating costs in Canada.

While this result was entirely foreseeable, no action was taken. It is important to note that during this period both Canada and Nova Scotia had the benefit of Liberal governments. It may surprise the House to know that this government that brags of its superior attitude toward the provinces was no different with the next to last Liberal administration in Nova Scotia which was headed by ex-premier Gerald Regan.

Fisheries is not the only area in which the Grit government in Nova Scotia fought the federal Grits; they were also in total disagreement on energy policy. Ex-premier Regan refused to co-operate with New Brunswick and the other maritime provinces on energy. The federal government would have backed a maritime energy corporation and would have helped finance important projects in the nuclear energy field. It would have constructed transmission lines to permit maritime provinces to plug into cheaper hydro power. Also coal mine development and thermal projects might have been accelerated, but the governments argued and a stalemate resulted.

Ex-premier Regan watched expectantly and forlornly for offshore oil discoveries but nothing worthwhile was found. As so often happens, the pie did not fall from the sky and offshore oil did not materialize. It is interesting to note that Petro-Can has jumped into offshore exploration and is apparently rekindling the dream of offshore oil finds. Let us hope it does not become a financial nightmare for Canadians. Now there is a new government in Nova Scotia. It is a more co-operative one, one that has some insight into the energy situation.

We may have reached a new period in the energy history of the maritimes because we now have an energy agreement between Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in which the federal government is participating. As well we have the Maritime Energy Corporation which involves these three provinces and the federal government. And do you know, Mr. Speaker, who the chief critic is of this provincial-federal co-operation, this new Maritime Energy Corporation? It is none other than the minister's old political friend, the ex-premier of Nova Scotia. He says the energy agreement forces Nova Scotia to assume the mistakes of New Brunswick and the federal government in nuclear energy. He says: "Don't extend the pipeline eastward; it will interfere with coal development." I say the minister better straighten him out.

Coal is now more competitive with the cost of oil approaching a price of $20 a barrel. If coal is viable as a source of energy it means a labour intensive industry which is not subject to foreign control. If the minister wants a national energy company he should promote the Cape Breton Development Corporation as "Coal-Can" and pour some of the billions of dollars being used to buy shares in viable private oil companies into coal development.

I have mentioned coal and I should underline the fact that the solution to the world oil crisis and the national oil emergency contemplated by this bill is the establishment of alternative sources of energy. What is meant by that? First, as I have mentioned, there is coal. In the maritimes we have one of the most fantastic potentials, namely Fundy tidal power. Hydro development in Newfoundland and Labrador is also a possibility, but we will have to have the transmission lines in place to carry whatever power is generated through a hydro system. Gas is another possibility the minister has mentioned many times in the House but there is an indication that gas brought to the east coast would cost twice as much as the gas utilized in places such as Toronto.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me deliver this message to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As always, the real answer is: an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. In energy terms, ounces of money spent on alternative energy sources will yield pounds of savings in dollars which would otherwise be spent on foreign oil.

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax—East Hants (Mr. Crosby) drew earlier an analogy between the Pope's legions and the powers of Petro-Canada or the services it might offer. I remember it was Stalin who asked: "How many legions does the Pope have?" It was an attempt to ignore the importance of the Pope in the world. I think his analogy was ill-chosen because everybody knows that even if the Pope has no army he has considerable influence over the whole of humanity. It is demonstrated by the fact that all countries in the world have representatives in Rome to benefit from his services and extensive knowledge.

If Petro-Canada still has no pipeline, liquefied gas tanker or oil resources, obviously it is a tool that the government wants to have at its disposal to ensure a better distribution of our resources and wealth. Had it been left to the party represented by the hon. member, Petro-Canada would never have seen the light. I also noticed that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) referred continually to provincial powers over resources.

Rather than launching a debate between the powers of the central government and those of the provinces, I would prefer to consider the interest of the individual, wherever he is living, and his right to equal opportunities and to his fair share of our wealth and resources. If we consider the interest of the individual, we have to conclude that no one would dispute the need for equalization, social measures like family allowances, old age security and others, and the need to share our wealth on some basis.

If we consider this principle from the individual point of view, I do not see why we should not reach the same conclusion when it comes to sharing our vast country's resources. Everybody knows that the individual as such does not necessarily trip over constitutional commas. If he were to freeze in the dark, he would not care if it was under federal or provincial jurisdiction, but would rather ask the governments to act. And I must commend the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and his parliamentary secretary. I think they did a wonderful job in promoting this aspect. However, I am shocked that measures which for all practical purposes seem rather timid to me should give rise to such long debates and so many objections. So what is it all about? The idea is to make sure that the Canadian who lives in the east can afford as much heating and as many other services as the one who lives in the west. I think both would benefit. Nobody is questioning the general policy the government has come up with in order to ensure our self-sufficiency. It is of the utmost importance, and step by step we will put into place everything we need to succeed. We have here two opposing concepts. Some say we should leave it to private enterprise to reach that goal. Fine. I for one do not belittle the usefulness of private enterprise. But I find it is quite ill-advised to ignore the complementing role the government must play in serving the interest of Canadians instead of struggling solely for corporate profits, however legitimate they may be, but which may not necessarily meet the aspirations of Canadians. It was on the basis of that principle that the government got involved in the tar sands and created Syncrude to encourage the development of immeasurable resources which, because of the high cost, had not been developed. Similarly, the government is becoming involved in the north through Panarctic and Petro-Canada. Especially for those coming from eastern Canada it might be well to recognize the great potential of those endeavours in order to remedy an unfair and extremely difficult situation of dependence for that area.

Let us dwell one moment on the fact that 15 trillion cubic feet of natural gas have been discovered in the Arctic on Melville Island at Ray Point and on King Christian Island which can be transported south where there is a pipeline; or let us think of the very interesting proposal of Petro-Canada that Crown corporation—should it only be for that—that these resources should be taken south by methane tankers. I should like to deal with methane tankers, and I have made remarks before in the House concerning them. It would be possible to balance supply and demand. It would be possible not only to bring in resources which are indispensable to eastern Canada which, like Quebec, is 80 per cent dependent on foreign oil, and to the maritimes, which are even more dependent, and thus compensate for the absence of natural resources in the east, but also to develop a new technology, cause industrial developments, create jobs on shipbuilding yards and thus eliminate not only the lack of resources but also the unemployment which is extensive.

We must not disregard these possibilities, and were it not for Petro-Canada, such a project would never come true. There comes a time when we must decide whether we want to argue over constitutional issues or serve the public better. And why make such a fuss about a legislation such as this whose only purpose is to reserve larger amounts of supplies in emergency crises for those areas which need them most? Some may say that it is to please Quebec or the Maritimes, but I say that it is to please all those Canadians who have at heart the sharing of resources. Selfishness exists on a collective basis just as it exists on an individual basis, and some Canadians who possess resources feel that they should be the only ones to benefit from them. On the contrary, because there is already a sharing of wealth among the provinces, we say that the state has the duty to ensure our self-sufficiency as well as a better distribution of our resources among the provinces and individuals.

That is not saying we ought to question the very existence of private enterprise. We are aware of the fact that throughout the world, these corporations have resources, assets and contacts which are useful to us as far as our supplies are concerned, but we cannot rely only on their initiative because we have proof that this can run counter to our interests. That is why we must have Petro-Canada and the Energy Supplies Allocation Board in case of emergency. I will not deny that I am flabbergasted that these principles are questioned again, and I cannot see why the House cannot expedite passage of such a sound piece of legislation.

[English]

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I want to surprise you by letting you know at the outset that, unlike many of the speakers on the government side, I am going to try to restrict myself to the amendment before us. I know Your Honour will be pleased about that attitude because in the course of this discussion on the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), subjects of a wide ranging nature have been dealt with. Granted, they are of some importance. I listened with great interest to the comments of the hon. member for Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron) with respect to his concept of self-sufficiency and about how Petro-Canada should operate within our country, but what we are really dealing with is an aspect of a particular bill with respect to allocation of petroleum resources in Canada in a time of apprehended or actual crisis.

I want to bring the attention of the House back to precisely what the terms of this bill mean to our parliamentary system and what they mean as far as we as representatives of the people of Canada are concerned in carrying out, as we should—and the vast majority of us do—the responsibility we have to articulate on behalf of our constituents their concerns with respect to government policies.

If parliament is to be relevant, it must be given the opportunity to deal with important issues. I wonder whether the government is serious about this bill. I refer to clause 11(4). I want to remind Your Honour, if Your Honour needs reminding, of what this clause does. Clause 11(1) reads:

> When the Governor in Council is of the opinion that a national emergency exists by reason of actual or anticipated shortages of petroleum or disturbances in the petroleum markets that affect or will affect the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, and that it is necessary in the national interest to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada, the Governor in Council may, by order, so declare and by that order authorize the establishment of a program for the mandatory allocation of petroleum products within Canada in accordance with this Act.

That actually means "in the opinion of the government". If at any time there is some deficiency in terms of petroleum supply, the government can make a decision and pass an order in council. The moment it passes an order in council the provisions of this allocation bill come into force. Let there be no question about that. This is not an innocent bill dealing with some small aspect of our society. It is a bill dealing with a very important part of our society, that is, energy and petroleum products. There are very far-reaching powers in this bill.

The word "opinion" stands out in my mind, and we as parliamentarians should be very leery about approving legislation giving a large amount of discretion to any cabinet, executive or government because we as parliamentarians have a responsibility in this chamber to act as a counterbalance to unlimited power being given to the executive of our country. I say that regardless of what political party makes up the cabinet. It is the basis and tradition of our system that parliament and individual members of parliament should have the opportunity to scrutinize government proposals and legislation. Governments should not go unchallenged and do just what they want to do, especially when they bring forward legislation like this in which there are absolutely no guidelines on what constitutes an emergency.

From time to time there have been circumstances in our country which have been deemed by spokesmen of one party or another to be emergency situations. The Chair is called upon with some frequency to rule upon whether from time to time a particular set of circumstances could be deemed to be an emergency for the purpose of setting aside the business of the House. In the course of your activities Your Honour knows how difficult it is to determine exactly what constitutes an emergency, because you are left alone to make that decision. However, in that determination Your Honour at least has the benefit of points of view and arguments from each side of the House as to whether certain circumstances constitute emergencies.

In this bill the government brings forward the proposition that if, in its opinion alone, there is an emergency with respect to petroleum supply and marketing of petroleum, it simply makes a decision and deems an order to be in effect from the moment it brings down an order in council. The government does that with the other reality in mind that its decision will be sustained—because of the nature of our parliamentary system—by its confreres in the governing party.

That is the reality, so where does that leave us? The minister suggests, for example, that somehow this bill allows parliament to consider an order. What do we find in clause 11(4), the subject of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham? Clause 11(4) provides the following:

> At fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the third sitting day following the commencement of consideration of a motion of which notice was given under subsection (2), or at such earlier time as the House of Commons is ready for the question, the Speaker shall put the question forthwith without further debate.

Mr. Speaker, on a matter of national importance, a matter of national emergency, members on the government side sit mute with regard to a provision which would in effect allow only three days' debate in this parliament by representatives of the people of Canada. What is happening to our concept of parliamentary democracy? I know the minister has a long history in the House of Commons. Up until now I have always considered him to be a supporter of the House of Commons and of parliament.

Mr. Bussières: He is.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I thought the minister did not share the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is contemptuous of parliament and whose every act since he has been in power has been to limit the powers of parliament and to increase his own executive power and that of the office of the Prime Minister in the presidential tradition. I thought that as a member of parliament of some standing, one who came here as a backbencher and worked his way up to an appointment to the cabinet, the minister would have some appreciation of the tradition of upholding the rights of parliament and the right of people to be heard through their representatives in the course of debates dealing with national emergencies.

As I say the bill provides for three days' debate. After the coming election when there will be 282 members in this House, and when a matter of extreme importance from the point of view of a particular member's constituents is raised, do hon. members understand the limited opportunity a member who is not a front bench member will have to articulate in the House of Commons the concerns of his constituents? He will have no chance at all. If you divide three days of five hours each, or whatever it is—on a Wednesday it is only two hours—by 282, we will not even have an opportunity to rise in our place, if everybody wishes to be recognized, because it would take three days simply to go through that process.

Also what the minister does not address himself to is that we are, in effect, being placed in the position of having the normal parliamentary procedures stripped away from us. What rights do we have in terms of parliament being able to assess whether or not there is a national emergency and whether or not proposals set forth by the government are needed or are legitimate, or indeed whether they are adequate? Where is the right in this bill for the motion to go before a standing committee of the House where independent witnesses can be brought forward, or indeed where the minister or a spokesman for the government can be brought forward to be questioned in detail with respect to the need and requirement for such legislation?

I am not arguing against the general principle of this bill in its broadest sense—that in certain circumstances of national emergency with respect to the energy supply the government of the day should be able to take direct steps in terms of the allocation of petroleum and petroleum products across this country. What I am saying is that I have become more and more concerned since I came to parliament about the tendency of this government to build into its legislation, regardless of the subject matter, a kind of automatic guillotine provision, as this legislation has. Hon. members opposite tell me that this is an emergency kind of legislation, unique legislation, and therefore we should go along with a limitation of the debate to three days since this legislation will only be used at a time of emergency. If there is any time when a bill should not prejudge the length of time parliament should be allowed to debate a matter, it is precisely in times of emergency.

I think all of us sitting in the House will recall that either tomorrow or on the next sitting day we will be debating a bill regarding national referenda. The one reason I mention this is that it will be another bill which has the effect of allowing for referenda affecting the very constitution of our country in which again this government has demonstrated its suspicion of parliament and of the parliamentary process by severely limiting the amount of time that parliamentarians, members representing the people of Canada, will have to debate the fundamental and important issues of our country.

What is this government trying to do? Is it trying to make parliament irrelevant? Is it trying to prejudge every circumstance and saying that from now on "Big Brother is going to look after you"? Is that the mentality of this particular group of people who now govern our country?

I know the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) will have an opportunity to speak because he is always brought in. He is a parliamentarian, I will say that. He is here in the House of Commons and he has heard us. I would be interested in hearing what he has to say about this restriction because I know that in his heart of hearts he will not be able to stand in his place with any amount of seriousness and support the provision in clause 11 restricting the right of parliamentarians to deal with this legislation or with this order under the legislation. Under this legislation, before we know the nature of the problem, all of a sudden we will be told we can only debate it for three days. Is this a wise decision?

I want to point out, in case there is any doubt in the minds of anyone hearing or reading this debate, or in fact looking in on us this afternoon, that there is a provision within our rules allowing the government to impose closure on any debate in the House. In case anyone in the House or anyone reading or listening to the debate is uncertain of this provision in our rules, I want to point out that we have Standing Order 75 under which any minister of the Crown may stand in his place and move a motion to the effect that there will be a limitation placed on debate of any business in the House. After a couple of preliminary steps have been taken, that motion to limit and curtail debate in the House in accordance with the amount of time specified by the minister is then considered for two hours and a vote is taken.

In other words, to all intents and purposes the government of the day has the ability, if it thinks it is politically expedient to do so, to limit and curtail debate under our rules. So why does the government now find it necessary to bring in this provision under subclause (4) of the bill, which is the subject of the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, which prejudges every issue that will come before us? The government now have the power to curtail debate, so why are they so anxious to prejudge all issues? Is this the mentality of the government? I will not suggest that this is their program, but why, I ask you, is the government prejudging every issue we are going to have in terms of national emergencies in this country relating to energy; and why do they give parliament only three days in which to debate this matter? What is the explanation and where is the minister who should explain to us that provision in the bill? I can only suggest that it is the mentality of the government now—

Mr. Paproski: And of the minister.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am very disappointed that the minister takes this attitude on a matter of such importance. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the minister really wanted to come to terms with this legislation he would have a different provision in this clause. He would have guidelines to define a national emergency in the most specific terms possible.

Second, I want to bring to the attention of the House another element of the bill which causes me a great deal of concern. One of the complaints that one hears in terms of legislation is against the growing tendency of this government to bring in legislation that has a very arbitrary element. What concerns me about this bill, and about this clause which is the subject of the amendment, is that it gives the government wide arbitrary powers in terms of the allocation of petroleum and petroleum products in our country for an unlimited period of time. Because while clause 34 of the bill provides that the order under clause 11 gives the power of allocation to the board set up by the federal government, if it wants to extend that power at the end of the 11 months period, all it has to do to keep it on an indefinite and ongoing basis is to reissue an order in council at the end of the three months period, put it before parliament for three days, and they are back in business again.

That is a very legitimate objection to this particular procedure in the bill, and it is why I support wholeheartedly the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

The restriction we put in this bill now has no relevance to what might happen in the future. Perhaps a debate will come forward on a national energy emergency which will require only one day of debate, no debate or unanimous consent. On the other hand, perhaps there will be circumstances in terms of a national energy emergency which will require, in the interests of the government of the day, the fullest possible discussion. Why is this arbitrary three-day period being put in the bill now? Does the government not understand in terms of this kind of legislation that we, as parliamentarians and representatives of different parts of Canada, might be able to assist the government to deal better with a national energy emergency? Does the government not see that alternative? What type of help will the government receive under this procedure, as arbitrary as it is? What type of assistance will the government receive from parliament? That tells the lie of this particular piece of legislation. It demonstrates as much as anything the fact that the government reflects its fear of parliament in this piece of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, when we look at the world scene and at the implications of Bill C-42, we must reflect upon the past in Canada. As we look at our past, starting in 1947 Canada had no oil and gas industry. In February of 1947 Imperial Oil, of which we have heard so much in the last few days, brought in the discovery while at Leduc, Alberta, and set in motion one of the greatest industrial supplies of oil which the country has ever had.

It has served very well our needs for development and for crude oil and energy in this period of time. In fact, the industry moved so successfully during the course of those years that pipelines were built to bring oil to market. Also natural gas lines were built to bring Canadian natural gas to markets. We arrived at a point in the middle seventies where Canada was somewhat more than self-sufficient in oil and gas. We were able to export volumes which at that time made an important contribution to our balance of payments, to our exports, and at the same time make a very important contribution to our neighbour, the United States.

In the middle seventies we reached a point where we had something in the order of 1,800,000 barrels a day of production. This included natural gas liquids, pentanes and other petroleum liquids. But now we have cut back to something in the order 1,600,000 barrels a day, and we will come down a great deal further. If we project into the very early part of the 1980s, we are told by the National Energy Board, and by most of those who make these projections, that the country will face imports in the order of 50 per cent of its crude oil supply.

I do not think anyone in the House, or in Canada for that matter, would disagree that a very serious situation is facing us in the future. It is not a problem which does not have solutions. There are some solutions, to which I will direct my remarks a little later. However, as I reflect on the events in the House in the last few days during oral question period and this debate, I must ask: What is the minister trying to do? I know hon. members on this side of the House are asking the same question. I maintain the minister is deliberately misleading Canadians. I do not know why. Is it deliberate? The minister is crying wolf. He is attacking everyone in sight, which is his style and that of his predecessor. But these problems will not be solved by attacking people. He attacked the industry, the provinces, the premiers and a lot of people who made a contribution. He took a swipe at the province of Alberta.

It is interesting to note in this particular year, if there is any question about what that province is contributing to the rest of Canada, just what Alberta is contributing. I do not think the citizens of the province of Alberta are complaining about this. In fact, they are happy to make this contribution. But it must be recognized that the export tax at the present time on crude oil, which picks up the difference between what the province and the producers of Alberta receive and the international price, is yielding something in the order of $5 a barrel to the federal treasury. That money is being taken from the federal treasury to subsidize Canadians in the eastern part of the country. If that total is calculated over the period of a year, in 1979 the province of Alberta through this particular amount will lose some $2 billion which will be distributed in the form of subsidies to the rest of Canada. Because this has been going on for a number of years, we can look at the past and see that the total up until now is something in the order of $14 billion to $15 billion. I think that kind of contribution should be recognized by a minister who goes on the attack.

Perhaps the minister can tell us why he is taking this approach to things. If the minister was constructive, he would be giving us some of the solutions. Perhaps his problem relates back to the constitutency in which he was last elected. I understand that perhaps he is concerned about his chances of re-election there.

The other aspect of the minister's approach which concerns me is his escalation of Petro-Canada into the solution. Petro-Canada is a reality; it is in place. All Canadians hope to goodness that Petro-Can finds some oil. Everyone is pulling for them because we need the oil. Petro-Canada has huge resources. The government has backed them to the hilt. Presumably Petro-Canada has a chance to find some oil and gas. I think everyone here would agree that if Petro-Canada finds oil, it would be for the good of all. I think the minister is misleading Canadians by leaving the impression that Petro-Canada will solve the problem. Petro-Canada is only one of many, many companies. If the minister overlooks the private sector, which he seems to be doing, he is telling people that the problem will be solved by this government oil company. Petro-Canada may or may not be the solution. Many people would say that Petro-Canada is the problem. In any event, if Petro-Canada is part of the solution, it is a very modest part of the solution, even if and when the company is successful.

Why is the minister escalating this whole question? I think it is for political purposes. Perhaps the government wants to go into an election and be able to blame Exxon and Alberta. The government wants to point to this energy question and place itself in the position where it is everybody else's fault. The government is trying to be on the side of motherhood at the same time as prejudicing future supplies.

I do not intend to say much about Venezuela, but I think the minister owes us an explanation. The fact of the matter is that there is no surplus light oil in Venezuela. The contracts Exxon has there are ongoing ones which are called "evergreen"; they are renewed year after year. If the minister buys oil in Venezuela, it will be heavy oil. Heavy oil is not too desirable because it does not suit Canadian refineries. The minister has an obligation to explain to the House what oil he will buy. Certainly we can reflect upon the fact that the last time the government bought oil, Mr. Goyer bought it overseas at twice the price. Also the minister has an obligation to tell us what price he will pay. These are two questions which require answers.

We have security of supply, we have supply, and we have price. One of the facts about security of supply is this, and I hope the minister will take the opportunity of answering, if he will listen for a minute. The fact is that if all the oil companies are directed to buy their supplies from Venezuela, then it seems to me we have cancelled our insurance. We have an opportunity through the pools that large oil companies in the world will have to do some switching of supplies. We have some opportunity of benefiting when in fact our principal sources are cut off.

The minister seems to be tearing up that insurance contract. I want to know what happens in the future if the Venezuelan supply collapses. Nobody today can give us a very confident picture of Venezuela continuing to export its volumes. In fact, there is no doubt that Venezuela has cut off probably one third of its production in the last three or four years, and there is every reason to think it is going to cut it in the future. Why is the minister trying to give us the impression that he is going to buy oil from a country that has cut back and is unlikely to have any supplies available for him?

I do not think anybody cares if Petro-Canada can buy oil somewhere else from a new source, perhaps Mexico or China. I would say, good for it. If it can turn up some new supplies I do not think we would be anything but pleased. But to tell the House and to let us think that he is going to do something in Venezuela certainly requires a great deal of explanation by the minister. In fact, all he is talking about is the shortfall on the part of Imperial Oil amounting to 8,000 barrels a day, and the minister knows that is not a drop in the bucket.

The other reality in the world oil industry today relates to price. OPEC countries have, because of shortages, increased prices. Just a year ago Iran was considered a very stable source of supply. Who is to know what Venezuela, Kuwait and even Saudi Arabia could do next? Saudi Arabia has been considered a moderate in the oil producing world. It has played an important role in keeping price escalations reasonable. What is more, today it is producing something in the order of 8.5 million barrels a day and has a capability of probably 11.5 million barrels a day. With more drilling it could probably produce 13 million or 14 million barrels a day. That country today has the power to control the world's oil supply, and in that sense its stability is far more vital than the stability of any other oil producing country in the world. However, even Saudi Arabia, and Kuwait as well, moderates in the oil producing world, are raising their prices. Today the spot price of oil is up anywhere from $1.50 to $3 a barrel. Our landed price of OPEC oil in Canada now exceeds $17 a barrel, and some spot shipments are selling around the world at $25 a barrel.

The other reality is that the price is going to continue to go up. I recently had the opportunity of chatting with some of the world's leading petroleum economists who told me we had to think in terms of an 8 per cent to 10 per cent a year increase in oil prices. There will not be any more freezes. The OPEC countries did have a freeze for a while. If we take the $17 barrel price today and add on 10 per cent a year through 1985, which is not very far off, my calculation is that the price will be in the order of $30 a barrel. That is a very serious consideration, not only to us but to all the developing countries in the world which in fact are suffering much more from this situation than are we.

We must recognize that we are going to have to share some of our oil. We have made some strides in cutting back on our consumption, but we have this minister running around and putting the arm on somebody in order to recover the 8,000 barrels a day which have been cut off. I do not know where that oil went, but we have signed an agreement with Denmark, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg and many more countries to co-operate when it comes to shortages. Suddenly 8,000 barrels a day, and it was a little higher to begin with—

An hon. Member: A great deal higher.

Mr. Bawden: —is going to some other country, probably one of those I have mentioned, and the minister is now saying: "To hell with those other countries, we do not care what they get". I think the approach of this government is entirely wrong.

This bill contains a lot of powers. I think my colleagues on this side of the House have all said we recognize that some reasonable powers are good. Without getting into the reasonableness of the powers, I would like to get into the question about the reasonableness of the man who is going to exercise these powers. He is the minister sitting across the way in the government of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and history has proven that we cannot trust those people with powers, any more than we can trust them with a gun. History has proven this, Mr. Speaker, and has proven that the industrial people in Canada do not have confidence in this government or this minister. We have much less confidence when we look at the powers he is asking for now.

Until this government, the former minister and the present minister, got into the act we were self-sufficient. Since they got into the act everything has gone downhill, everything has become worse. Everything will continue to get worse if they do not change their attitude. This government is bringing in negative legislation. Everything we hear from the minister is negative; he is going to take control, he wants more power, and everything in those powers is negative.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is also a problem in the United States. Just two years ago Mr. Carter came in with his great tax programs, but they had nothing to do with supply. They all had to do with consumption. That is good because we have to conserve, but there has been no regard for supply.

If this minister is really serious about what he is saying, he should jump to his feet and tell us about the northern regulations. We have some of our greatest reserves in the Arctic frontier. As of February 13 there were five drilling rigs working in the Canadian Arctic north of 60. A year ago there were 11 working, more than twice as many, and the year before that there were something in the neighbourhood of 20. We now have 25 per cent of that former activity in the Arctic today. I hope the minister will respond to that fact because that is an indication that this government is playing politics with a very important commodity in this country. This is a cold country and our entire economic development depends on energy. If we do not have energy our economy slides.

As for exporting energy or giving some to our friends in the United States, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that is very important. We must remember that we are exporting something like 70 per cent to our best customer, the United States. If the U.S. economy is starved because of energy or fuel, their economy will not be healthy and they will not be in a position to buy our manufactured goods. We in turn will lose more jobs.

I suggest that this question of energy is very much a question that is interrelated among nations. We on this continent cannot get along if we do not interrelate our activities and our security of supply. Most of the countries in the western world who are part of the International Energy Agencies feel the same way.

In the past few years we have experienced a situation during which the rules have become confused and taxation has been confusing. The whole matter has been so disorganized that there has not been any progress. This government has been dealing with the United States and with Alberta. I say that the government should get on with this job, bring in the legislation and let us get the northern regulations into place. There are some guidelines and the people have a rough idea of what is going to happen, but there are no regulations.

This is much like the budget situation. We have had a budget but where is the budget legislation? All of the tax provisions encouraging Canadians to invest in the oil and gas industry expire some time in June. Are we going to have a budget bill put before us before then? These are the kind of positive things to which this minister has to respond, instead of giving us all this gobbledygook about what he is going to do to control this and that, to chase Exxon and chase the rest. This is a red flag before a bull. I was brought up on the farm and I can tell you that when you want to operate on a horse you bite its ear. This minister is biting everybody's ears in this country. I wish he would get on with the job.

I have one or two other things to say. The world's oil supply is declining. The fact of the matter is that as we reach the middle part of the 1980s supply will be shorter and shorter each year. The question is, what do we do about this? We in Canada have probably some of the greatest reserves in the world. We have the Alberta oil sands, which is a fantastic reserve. I guess we have a couple of hundred billion barrels that we can develop there. I suggest that is equal probably to the reserves of Saudi Arabia, which are about 180 billion barrels. What are we doing about those reserves? This consideration has been going on for years and years and years and we do not yet have any answers. We do not have the oil plants coming on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired. If he needs only a few seconds to complete his remarks, I could perhaps not see the clock.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, if I could have another 60 seconds, I will conclude by saying that we need leadership today. I know all the political sides to this question, but we must drop them. The time is now. Canadians should know, as does the minister, that it takes five years to 15 years, probably an average of ten years, for any major energy project to get on stream. That ten-year projection means that we must act now. The future of our country is at stake. Our survival is at stake. We must stop playing politics and get on with finding and producing energy and putting the rules in place. Let us have leadership, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain)—Transport—Arbitrary withdrawal of rail service for certain commodities; the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack)—Energy—Cash incentives program to promote development of alternate sources of energy; the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare)—The Canadian Economy—Findings by CSIP—Government action thereon.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa

March 15, 1979

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 15th day of March, at 5:30 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions (papers), public bills. There being no items under private bills on the order paper, the House will proceed to notices of motions (papers).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITH FIRMS AND INDIVIDUALS OTHER THAN CROWN CORPORATIONS AND AGENCIES

The House resumed consideration from Thursday, December 14, 1978 of the motion of Mr. McKenzie:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all government contracts, excluding Crown corporations and agencies, with Canadian firms and individuals in the years 1976 and 1977.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the House previously considered this motion, the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) had the floor.

An hon. Member: Mr. Speaker, he is not here.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the continuation of debate on this motion permits me to speak about the openness of the Department of Supply and Services' contract system. It is vital that hon. members of the House and all Canadians are made fully aware of the underlying principles of fairness and equity which guide the operations of the supply administration in carrying out its prime objective of providing or obtaining the goods and services essential to government programs at a fair and reasonable price.

In the achievement of this objective, the supply administration ensures prudence and probity in the expenditure of public funds and an equal opportunity for Canadian small business and industry to do business with the federal government. The openness with the supply administration contracting systems guarantees that full information on all contracting is available to potential suppliers on each procurement action.

How do we ensure that there is an equal chance at getting these contracts for all people in Canada who have the supplies and can give us the services we need in this particular department? To ensure consistency and equity in the contracting process, the supply administration generally uses three methods to solicit bids from the suppliers. I will name the three methods and then give an explanation of what they mean. First of all, there are the invitations to tender, secondly, requests for proposal, and requests for quotation.

An invitation to tender is employed to solicit bids from two or more suppliers where specified criteria were known and adequately defined. In other words, when we know the specific type of material or service that we need—and we know this from past experience or from studies made in advance—we then put out an invitation to tender. A request for proposal is employed in competitive situations where requirements cannot be adequately defined and, as a result, the selection of a supplier cannot be made solely on the basis of the lowest priced responsive bid and in single or sole source procurements with an estimated value over $5,000. A request for quotation is intended to provide a fast efficient method for the processing of lower dollar value requirements; that is to say, those requirements of a value not exceeding $5,000.

The last two basic approaches are modified slightly to achieve necessary efficiencies in the area of low dollar value contracting. Once bids or proposals have been received, the work of evaluation and, in many cases, negotiation begins and then the ultimate contract is awarded. The policy of the department is to have public openings on all invitations to tender for which a competitive bid solicitation has been issued. This action prevents the consideration that there is anything illegal or underhanded. The bids are opened publicly and any interested parties, such as the people who are bidding or their attorneys, may attend to assure that everything is in order.

However, the work does not stop there. Once the contract has been awarded, the supply administration is responsible for contract administration which involves ensuring that the terms and conditions of the contract are strictly followed. The information on bids solicitations and responses is recorded and made available to suppliers in various forms which I will now describe.

The Department of Supply and Services regularly publishes two bulletins, "The Weekly Bulletin of Business Opportunities" and "The Research and Development Bulletin". In "The Weekly Bulletin of Business Opportunities" is contained all the contracts awarded to Canadian firms on behalf of federal departments or agencies in the amount of $10,000 or more for the week preceding its publication. The bulletin gives the commodity and file number, the contractor, the customer, department or agency and the value of the contract. In addition, the total value of contracts awarded is given along with a list of the top suppliers.

What could be more forthcoming? What could be more above board? Contracts classified for security reasons are not included in the list of contracts awarded, for obvious reasons. This bulletin is distributed to suppliers on the mailing list, to the media and to all members of parliament who have indicated, after receiving an offer to subscribe, that they wish to be on the mailing list. In other words, the information is public and is freely and widely distributed to any interested party.

It is still incredible that, in spite of the availability of such information, hon. members of the opposition continue to distort the facts concerning government contracting activities. I refer here not only to these facts but to others that hon. members alluded to in a note sent to me a short while ago which was not exactly in accordance with the facts as I understood them when I rose to speak. When these particular things are alluded to, I think we should have more warning so that we can take steps to have the necessary information available to counteract such statements.

I will give two recent examples of government contracting activities. In the House of Commons on November 16, 1978, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) alleged that a purchase of 460,000 boxes of paper clips at a cost of $44,000 was a weekly order for government consumption. In fact, this purchase of paper clips was for the total federal government's requirements, nationwide, for a 12-month period. The order was distributed in varying amounts to supply centres in the Atlantic region, Quebec region, national capital region, Ontario region, western region and Pacific region, for subsequent issue to federal government offices and agencies as required. What could be more of a distortion of the facts than to allege we would spend this money for this type of material for such a short time?

The second example concerns the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) who on March 12, 1979, in the House of Commons wrongly accused the government of charging a $292,440 award to Decision Dynamics Corporation, for an evaluation study of gun control legislation to the science budget of the Department of Supply and Services and not to the Department of the Solicitor General. In fact, the "Weekly Bulletin of Business Opportunities" of February 23, 1979, clearly states that the Department of the Solicitor General is the customer for this contract, and therefore pays the bill, not the Department of Supply and Services.

Another public and freely distributed document available from the Department of the Solicitor General and pertaining to contracting activities is the "Research and Development Bulletin" which appears in the second week of each month and contains four main sections. The first is the "Science Procurement Update" which covers developments in science procurement and other science topics of interest; and second, projects for which proposals are expected to be invited. This section describes selected research and development requirements for which the science centre of the Department of Supply and Services expects to solicit proposals.

I hear the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) interjecting that he does not get this bulletin. I will see to it that it is delivered to him in both official languages so that he can keep up with things.

Mr. Paproski: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member wishes to refer to me, I wish he would do so as the hon. member for Edmonton Centre instead of Edmonton West. My colleague is from Edmonton West. I would appreciate it if he would change that reference and make sure I am referred to as representing Edmonton Centre. Next year it will be Edmonton North.

Mr. Parent: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. I thought the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) was moving to Edmonton West, so I stand corrected; it is Edmonton North. I would not want anyone to refer to my hon. colleague as not being where he should be, wherever that is.

The third section to which I am alluding is a statistical summary which lists contracts awarded by quantity and amount, their distribution by organization type, location and client department; and, finally, contracts awarded during the previous month. For each contract there is a short description of the work, the value, the name of the client department and the name of the contractor or principal investigator.

Periodically, the "Research and Development Bulletin" will carry a section of unsolicited proposals which are unique proposals from the private sector in support of government science missions. It will contain aggregate statistics on the number, type and status of unsolicited proposals received by the science centre during a certain period. Also, this section will have a summary of all contracts awarded during that period as a result of unsolicited proposals.

Incidentally, this bulletin is printed commercially under contract. This also went out on tender when we were first beginning to do it.

The "Research and Development Bulletin" receives wide distribution to universities, private and public research bodies and individuals, and customer departments. I can testify to this personally because in my riding of St. Catharines, where Brock University is situated, professors have written to me on many occasions about specific contracts which were let as a result of this policy. They told me they were satisfied that it was done on a fair and equitable basis for all universities across the country.

In addition to the two valuable regular publications I have just described, the supply administration has a well established supplier relations activity to ensure that all relevant information on contracting is provided to businessmen. In addition, the supplier relations function ensures the provision of information on contracts awarded to the House, other government departments, other governments, political party research offices and the public. In carrying out this function, supply administration officials interview representatives of companies visiting or corresponding with the department, make presentations to businessmen at industrial seminars, and organize visits of representatives from other countries and trade missions of suppliers from provinces.

In the last two months one of the seminars was conducted in the city of Calgary, in the latter part of February. One of our colleagues from Quebec attended it.

Mr. Paproski: And did a great job.

M. Parent: The hon. member for Edmonton West I presume was there because he acknowledges the member who was sent, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Dupont), who did a great job. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton West knows what he is talking about—I am sorry, I mean the hon. member for Edmonton Centre—when he recognizes the quality of the hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

Supplier relations is an internal responsibility of each line organization and, in addition, the executive secretary of the supply administration has an over-all responsibility in this regard and carries out liaison with the small business secretariat for the supply administration's involvement in the small business program. This liaison also includes other organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and discussions with industry on subcontracting activities particularly related to small business.

The supply administration attempts to give all business—big or small—the same chance at government contracts while getting the best value for Canadian taxpayers' dollars. This is one of the basic premises with which we must operate. The basic idea behind this is that all qualified businesses in Canada should have equal opportunities to win government contracts. Generally, large and medium-sized firms have learned to do business with government through experience. However, many smaller Canadian firms are often unaware of how to become government suppliers. With this in mind the supply administration has launched a continuing program to generate awareness of government contract opportunities. This clearly shows our intent and success in providing relevant contracting information to the public.

Now I will deal briefly with the second possible area of concern which may arise from recent comments by the Auditor General on contracting in government. On this issue let me simply quote the Auditor General's statement in section 9.112 of his 1978 report. He says:

> In general, contracting arrangements in Supply Administration are entered into with due regard for economy.

The contracting tradition of this department and its record regarding prudence and probity, fairness and equity to suppliers and due regard to economy is well established within the business community of this nation. I refer to big and small business right across Canada.

While I am on the subject of the Auditor General's report, I would like to take this opportunity to reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty), as reported in Hansard at pages 2142-2143 for December 14, 1978 pertaining to the use of competitive and non-competitive tendering.

From the statistics presented in section 9.4 of the Auditor General's report it has been widely interpreted that approximately 50 per cent of the contracts, both in quantity and in value, in the Department of Supply and Services are awarded without competition because many DSS contracts are designated in our statistical reporting system as "sole source", "selected source" or "no substitute". This misinterpretation stems from a lack of explanation provided in the Auditor

General's report about the various selection methods used by the supply administration in its contracting procedures.

For example, under the government contracts regulations, section 8(b) permits entry into contract without inviting tenders under $15,000. The supply administration, however, has a much stricter interpretation of this regulation and has always followed a policy of either inviting tenders or insisting on a competitive quotation which can be equally as competitive or rigorous as the formal tendering process. As evidence of the success of this approach for 1976-77, in the contract range from $0 to $2,500, 70.6 per cent of the documents were other than "sole source", "selected source" or "no substitute" and in this range a total of 226,022 contracts were awarded. This represents 80.2 per cent of the total number of contractual documents issued by the supply administration. This shows that we take great care to award these contracts on a fair basis.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

If the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If I understand your comments correctly, Your Honour has just indicated to the House that, in accordance with the proceedings under this motion, we would have five minutes of reply from our side and then the hon. member would have five minutes to address himself to the motion and that would terminate the debate. If I may I would like to make a contribution at this time, following up what my friend, the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent), has talked about at great length.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: First I should clarify the point of order raised by the parliamentary secretary. Standing Order 48(2) provides that a minister of the Crown be allowed to speak for five minutes at the termination of the 90 minutes allowed for the debate, following which the mover of the motion may speak for not more than five minutes.

I have looked through the precedents and found that this point has never been contested in the past. The only time it was brought to the attention of the House was on April 17, 1975 when the then Acting Speaker mentioned that the only way the parliamentary secretary could speak after the 90 minutes allowed was with unanimous consent. The House gave unanimous consent to the then parliamentary secretary to the minister of justice, which did not create a precedent.

In my opinion, a minister of the Crown is entitled to speak under this provision. I might add that if a parliamentary secretary is allowed to speak for his minister, it is not mentioned in Standing Order 48(2), in general at least. In this instance the Standing Order is precise. But there is nothing to prevent the parliamentary secretary from speaking at this time to refute whatever he wants to refute because we still have a further eight minutes of debating time left. This would allow the mover of the motion five minutes upon conclusion.

[Translation]

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to that. In view of the few minutes left, I might not be able to go into as much detail as I would have liked. As I will be referring to notes that were prepared for me in English I will be speaking mainly in English about the cost of the documents.

[English]

The cost of tabling the contract documents as requested by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) would be excessive. In our view, the existing process of disseminating contracting information to the public has significant benefits in terms of prudence and probity in the use of taxpayers' funds and equity of opportunity for interested suppliers. For example, the supply administration's contracting system encourages government agencies to take advantage of the DSS policy to buy if something can be bought more effectively and cheaply in the private sector than it can be "made" within government. By wide dissemination of contracting information and opportunities, business is encouraged to increase its share of activity in providing goods or services which the government may have provided in the past. I will describe a number of examples of make or buy initiatives that are well known to Canadian suppliers.

Take printing for example. Printing encompasses the two distinct modes, the "make" manufacturing printing performed in the main plant, Hull—

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat confused by your ruling. I understand we are awaiting a call from the Senate. Will I be allowed my five minutes of debate this afternoon? Will a vote be called? If there is a call from the Senate, does that stop the debate and therefore preclude me from having my five minutes of debating time?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I cannot tell the hon. member when the messenger will come to the House. If a messenger were to come now, the debate would have to be stopped and whatever number of minutes there are left—and it is some six minutes, I believe—would have to be allowed after we return from the Senate, giving another five minutes to the hon. member. If that brings us past six o'clock, this debate would have to be continued at another time. So I cannot give a clear answer to the hon. member until I know exactly when the messenger is coming.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I have not researched this point, Mr. Speaker, but it would seem to me that, in accordance with the historical traditions of this House, if the messenger comes at a time that is inconvenient to us, we have no obligation to accept the message. It seems to me the business of the country should take priority, that the rights of commoners should take priority over any message which comes prematurely. In my view, this debate should be allowed to proceed to its logical conclusion, which would be reached before 5.45 p.m. If the messenger happens to be listening, I would think that that is the time at which he should come here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If I were to follow the suggestion made by the hon. member, I am sure the House would find itself in very difficult situations, because there would always be one member who would not be ready to open the door to the messenger, so it has been the practice that when the messenger comes we open the door.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Paproski: Still on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know how many more minutes are left for the debate, and how much time is left to the member who has the floor.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mercier has the floor and he is entitled to 20 minutes. I see the hon. parliamentary secretary is rising on another point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I will be rising in due course to answer the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton North but I would like my hon. colleague to have the opportunity to conclude his speech in the four minutes he has left. I would remind the Chair that the hon. member who rose from this side started at 5.04 because an hon. member, an oil magnate was extended the courtesy of speaking longer than his time. In the circumstances I am surprised by the attitude of the opposition which wants to prevent the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) from continuing his speech. So, Mr. Speaker, I reserve my right to rise on the point of order after the hon. member for Mercier concludes his remarks.

[English]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to comment on the point of order, but that would be one of my arguments: we have already spent four minutes on question of procedure and I do not see why further time should be taken away from me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I do not mind if hon. members wish to continue raising points of order until six o'clock. I am adding to the time available for this debate. I have already given instructions to add four minutes, so this debate is prolonged until 5.40. If members wish to continue to raise points of order I will extend the time because the motion is entitled to be debated for 90 minutes. When we are on points of order we do not debate the motion.

Mr. Paproski: All I want to say, Mr. Speaker, is this: I want to thank you. I wanted to know. I am not concerned about what the hon. parliamentary secretary has to say or about what the hon. member has to say. We should like to know how much more time is left in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My interpretation of the rule allowing for interventions and points of order is that the debate should conclude at 5.40, plus an extra five minutes allowed for the minister and five minutes for the mover.

The hon. member for Mercier.

Mr. Boulanger: I turn, now, to printing. Printing encompasses two distinct modes, the manufacturing printing performed in the main plant, Hull, and in over 100 plants and copy centres across the country; and the purchasing function which, through a consolidated purchasing capability, distributes federal printing requirements to the industry in Canada on a competitive basis. This year, over $130 million worth of government printing requirements will be handled by the supply administration. Some years ago, over 60 per cent of the printing business was made in government facilities with 40 per cent going to the private sector. Through a concerted effort by the supply administration's printing products centre—

I guess I have to stop, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Nobody was listening to you anyway.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Four minutes left. You are using the Crown to avoid a vote.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1740)

[English]

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-35, An act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Chapter No. 13.

Bill C-28, An act to amend the Northwest Territories Act—Chapter No. 14.

Bill S-6, An act to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act—Chapter No. 15.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITH FIRMS AND INDIVIDUALS OTHER THAN CROWN CORPORATIONS AND AGENCIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McKenzie:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all government contracts, excluding Crown corporations and agencies, with Canadian firms and individuals for the years 1976 and 1977.

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, before we went up to the Senate chamber I referred to the fact that my colleague, the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent), mentioned the introduction of bulletin board bidding for government printing requirements. This new technique provides a unique opportunity for local printers right across the country to bid on government requirements. In the past they were hindered by the need to get bids in from remote locations. That was with regard to printing.

With regard to publishing, the publishing centre was integrated with the department when Information Canada was disbanded in April, 1976. Its objective is to supply effectively priced publications of various departments and agencies to the Canadian public.

The "make or buy" policy was an element in the decision to close the six Canadian government bookstores. The government run bookstores were providing relatively few Canadians with a costly service that could not be self-supporting on the basis of sales revenues. With the closing of the bookstores more members of the Canadian bookselling community are being encouraged to become government sales agents, and annual savings in excess of $1 million are being achieved.

• (1750)

Mr. Speaker, the government rightly believes that all qualified businesses in Canada have the right to know the requirements of the state. The DSS has allowed everyone to have access to public contracts. Whatever their size or field of endeavour, all Canadian businesses are entitled to do business with the federal government.

Our policy is guided first of all by the principle of equal opportunities for all suppliers. This principle is foremost in our daily activities and ensures the impartiality of our negotiations. By using objective business practices and recognizing equal opportunities for potential suppliers in all regions of the country, the department applies this principle to its publicity methods as well as its information and advertising programs.

In the field of contract negotiation, the department sees to it that the contractors have equal opportunities to do business with the government, because we are convinced that it is a right and not a privilege for any businessman to be able to deal with the Canadian government. It is quite easy to do business with the Department of Supply and Services. Our procurement methods ensure real integrity and accessibility guarantees for our department. These principles are reflected by the following initiatives, which are as follows—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but according to Standing Order 48(2), the time provided for consideration of this motion has expired.

[English]

If there is no minister—as I can see—who desires to participate at this time, the Chair will call upon the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) who will close the debate.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my understanding that parliamentary secretaries standing in for ministers—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I already ruled on that point of order, so I cannot allow the hon. member to raise it again.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I certainly do not intend to appeal your decision, but I think that the point raised by the hon. parliamentary secretary is not the one he raised earlier when you made your remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the formula used in Standing Order 48(2). It reads as follows and I quote:

When debate on a motion for the production of papers . . . has taken place for a total time of one hour and thirty minutes—

This is what is happening now, you have just interrupted the debate. The problem could not exist earlier, Mr. Speaker, as you have just interrupted the debate. And further we can read:

—Mr. Speaker shall at that point interrupt the debate,

And it is only after, Mr. Speaker, that you recognize the mover of the motion for the production of papers, not before.

You shall certainly ask: But why is it that a parliamentary secretary can take the floor instead of a minister? On that subject I wish to refer you to Standing Order 15 concerning the oral questions period. Standing Order 15(2) reads, and I quote:

(2) Not more than two minutes after the reading of prayers, the business of the House members, other than ministers of the Crown, may propose motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 at this time. Not later than 2.15 p.m., or 11.15 a.m., as the case may be, all questions shall be taken up.

Indeed on oral questions, it is stated that any member other than ministers of the Crown, before oral questions, may propose motions pursuant to Standing Order 43, and on oral questions we know parliamentary secretaries answer on behalf of ministers. I therefore wonder on what basis the parliamentary secretary, who could not properly raise his point of order before the end of the debate on the motion before the House, that is only a few seconds ago, cannot when acting for a minister be recognized for the five-minute speech provided for by Standing Order 48(2).

Since in the case of motions proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, members other than ministers may propose motions, and since on oral questions parliamentary secretaries may answer questions on behalf of ministers, for what reason the five-minute speech provision under Standing Order 48(2) may not at this stage be extended to parliamentary secretaries, since under the Parliamentary Secretaries Act they are supposed to help their respective ministers? If making a speech on behalf of a minister as provided in the standing order is not helping a minister, I wonder what is. All this of course is submitted with all due respect. I have no intention whatsoever to appeal a decision you may have made, but I do not feel that in effect you made a decision on this, because this point could not be properly raised before the end of the debate just concluded.

The basis you used for your decision, Mr. Speaker, is not a Standing Order, it is a half-precedent two or three years old. I say it is a half-precedent without any derogatory intention, however it does not quite apply here, because as you stated there was unanimous consent, which is not or does not appear to be the case here. It is premature to assume there would be unanimous consent. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I submit it would be important that this House have a formal, clear and precise decision to guide us in the future, so we may know whether a parliamentary secretary may make the five-minute speech referred to in Standing Order 48(2).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have no intention of stopping the hon. parliamentary secretary, but I must confess the point he is discussing is exactly that on which I have already made a decision. Whether I did so on a wrong or half-precedent, it has been rendered and has not been taken exception to at that time. I am not here to change the rules. I read the Standing Order and I did interpret it as I saw it. And if there is no minister wishing to be recognized at this point, I have to recognize the hon. member—

[English]

Mr. Cafik: I will take the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have no objections. I am ready to recognize the minister, but I wish he had made up his mind earlier. We would not have lost all this time.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think it is appropriate for anyone to cast any reflection of the timing when I wish to seek the floor. In any event, I want to say that the motion which is before the House that an order of the House do issue for a copy of all government contracts, excluding Crown corporations and agencies, with Canadian firms and individuals for the years 1976 and 1977, is totally irresponsible—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: —when one bears in mind the volume of these contracts, the millions of sheets of paper which would be required to meet such a request.

I think it is a clear indication to all members of the House and, I am sure, to the public at large—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McKenzie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McKenzie: The minister is misleading the House and trying to give the impression that there is only one copy of government contracts. There is no such thing as only one copy and they do not have to spend $18 million to produce copies. They can give us the second or third copy. There is no cost involved to the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have the opportunity to say what he wishes when he speaks in the five minutes allowed to him. I have to say—

Mr. Paproski: Can we not see the clock?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is a suggestion—

[Translation]

Would the House agree that I do not see it is six o'clock?

[English]

Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

Some hon. Members: Cowards.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and Motion No. 2 (Mr. Lawrence).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau).

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I rise in order to clarify the proceedings. Are we still dealing with the second amendment? I should like to put forward a suggestion. I realize Your Honour recognized the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) on this particular amendment, but if there was disposition at this time to move on to the second set of amendments, the amendments of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), it might be a way to expedite the proceedings in respect of this bill. I believe my colleague would be agreeable to that, as long as he is recognized.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is no way I can decide this except to say that the House is still considering motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). The next scheduled motions are motions Nos. 3, 4 and 6 which are to be debated together. A vote on motion No. 3 would dispose of motions Nos. 4 and 6. After that we would move to the consideration of motion No. 5. I am ready to receive any direction from the House.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, other hon. members want to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is indicating that other hon. members want to speak.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, perhaps we can hear from a spokesman on the other side. That might help to settle this qestion. If there is disposition to move on to the next group of amendments at this time, we should attempt to determine whether that would be agreeable to other parties. If it is not, clearly we should continue with the consideration of motion No. 2.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I find it difficult to be in the middle of negotiations, but the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham indicated that other members wanted to speak on motion No. 2.

• (2010)

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, when there are a number of amendments I suppose it is really immaterial who speaks on what. My impression was that there were at least two other members who wanted to speak on motion No. 2. Certainly I do not wish to, and I do not think anyone else in our group does.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is because they have already spoken.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can only ask the question again, is the House ready for the question on motion No. 2?

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, if the House agreed to dispose of amendment No. 2, I would have accepted that, but since we are carrying on the consideration of amendment No. 2 moved by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), the critic of the Progressive Conservative party on energy matters, I am glad to take part in the debate. It is evident, as pointed out by previous speakers, that the amendment strikes at the very principle of the bill. It therefore leads us to refer to the bill generally and to its substance.

Even if some spokesmen for the Progressive Conservative party state that they really approve the substance of the bill I think it is difficult to say that they approve the substance if they are not prepared to provide all necessary means to make it effective. If we consider amendment No. 2 moved by the member for Northumberland-Durham, we note that it would make that legislation entirely ineffective. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because he could cripple Bill C-42, an act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking here about national emergency measures. Not of ordinary situations, not of legal structure for ordinary occurrences in a society such as ours, of situations that can occur and which the government must face every day. We are talking about measures required in times of emergency. The bill provides that, in such cases, according to clause 11, the governor in council, that is the government, would declare a national emergency. The government would then introduce that measure in parliament where it would be debated for three days. What the amendment would achieve is to remove the time limit on that debate. Let us not delude ourselves, Mr. Speaker. What the Progressive Conservatives are proposing is really that we do without an efficient way of facing emergency situations when control or regulated distribution of oil supplies is needed.

Mr. Speaker, when there is a crisis, when there is a national emergency, let us admit that we do not have weeks or months to decide. A decision has to be made immediately. When the Progressive Conservatives claim that the government wants dictatorial or totalitarian powers, under such circumstances, they are really going too far.

Mr. Speaker, in an emergency situation or in any situation at all, nobody relying on the common sense inherent in Canadian politics would expect a government to come to parliament, proclaim that there is a national emergency in a situation like that and try to use a measure like Bill C-42, when it is adopted, unless there actually exists an emergency situation. I listened to the Conservatives this afternoon. I read most of their speeches and I heard some of them say during second reading that the government could use this bill unfairly and inordinately to acquire overwhelming powers in the field of resources. Mr. Speaker, we have to reach a decision and the Conservatives have to make up their minds and decide whether or not they want the Statutes of Canada to contain an act like Bill C-42 which would give the government power to act swiftly in emergency situations because in such cases there is no time for lengthy debates. The government must be quick to react.

Mr. Speaker, the situation which erupted a few weeks ago, and which could reappear any time, required such measures. Why? Because some oil companies, some multinationals decided to divert elsewhere oil supplies destined for Canada. Because they wanted to allocate oil supplies themselves between various countries. To counter such a situation, a government must give itself the necessary powers to allocate these supplies.

To suggest, in such a situation, that the act should not set a time limit on debate is tantamount to objecting to the government's need for firm measures to deal with a situation such as this. So instead of merely saying that they are against limiting debate, the Progressive Conservatives should admit that what they are in fact trying to do is to support Alberta's and now Ontario's opinion that this bill is really not necessary. If in principle they are against the bill, they should say so. They should not say that they are for it and then propose an amendment which would make the legislation a totally inefficient measure. To say that in such a situation, the government should not have enough freedom to declare a national emergency and then come to parliament to have it approved, if parliament cannot decide this within three days, Mr. Speaker, then parliament is really not up to date, it could not react to an emergency. I repeat that what we are talking about is an emergency.

I would like to make a few more comments on this matter. The government could possibly declare an emergency even though there was no emergency. However, Mr Speaker, there are other means to question the government in the Canadian parliament. The government is before the House every day, ready to answer questions from the opposition, from hon. members from all parties, to be accountable for all its actions, whether they are routine measures, declaration of emergency, or whatever. So to say that the government should come before parliament to be examined in a three-day debate is really to have no knowledge of how the parliamentary system works, because in fact, if the government did not have the support of parliament, then parliament could defeat the government. If the government were to declare an emergency for no reason, then parliament could introduce a motion of non-confidence and defeat the government.

[English]

Really it is obvious what the Tories are doing with this amendment. Again they want to be on both sides of the fence. They want to say that they are in favour of the principle of the bill, yet they are proposing an amendment that would completely emasculate it. We are dealing with a bill that proposes to put in the statutes of Canada a legal system by which the government could declare that there was a national emergency.

● (2020)

We know that members of the Conservative party when it comes time to talk about energy, have a very hard time making up their minds. They have shown this fact in this debate and in the debate on second reading. I would like to know what the Conservative party would have done about the problem of energy if they had been in power for the last three or four years. They say now that they support a one-price system, but in debating the Petroleum Administration Act a few years ago they were against it. However, when they realized that the Ontario government was supporting the federal government to a certain extent, the shoe was suddenly on the other foot. When Alberta agreed with the federal government that the price of oil in Canada should be increased, this Conservative party stopped their filibuster of the petroleum administration bill.

The Tory party has said time and again, in this debate, and over the last two or three weeks, that the government does not have an energy policy. Where have they been? This government does have an energy policy.

Mr. Symes: Not a very good one.

Mr. Nystrom: It is too conservative.

Mr. Breau: This government adopted the policy that we would have a one-price system at the wellhead for crude oil. What does this mean? In the present circumstances with the price of crude oil in the world rising, because of the Iranian political crisis which has reduced their production, the five eastern provinces, or the area east of the Ottawa Valley, which is dependent on imported oil, is shielded from the recent price increases in crude oil. Since the Iranian crisis the increase in the price of crude oil would have meant to eastern Canada—if it were not for the one-price system implemented by this government and opposed by the Tories because the premier of Alberta at one point did not agree with the one-price system—an increase in heating oil of $150 per householder for this year alone.

[Mr. Breau.]

As if the price of gasoline is not high enough right now, the increases in world crude oil prices would mean an increase of 25 cents per gallon of gasoline. The present national energy policy of a one-price system has protected eastern Canada from that increase. It seems to me that that is a pretty good policy.

Other elements of the energy policy of this government include an extension of the oil pipeline from Montreal to Sarnia which has decreased our dependence on imported oil by 40 per cent. Because of this government's energy policy, Petro-Canada supports the concept of a gas pipeline from Montreal to eastern Canada, the Q and M line, which would reduce our dependence on imported oil in eastern Canada and ensure security of supply as it is ensured in western Canada. Another element of the government energy policy has been to help in the development and diversification of other modes of energy.

[Translation]

In my own constituency, Mr. Speaker, the federal government is funding a power generation research project where a peat-burning pilot plant is now in its design stage. This program include many other projects in solar energy and in alternative forms of energy, such as attempts to burn forest waste, for instance, to produce electricity. There are many aspects of the government's energy policy which give Canadians a greater feeling of security concerning oil and energy supplies for the present, in emergencies, and in the long term.

Mr. Speaker, I hear the Progressive Conservatives say that the government should get rid of the only important oil company Canadians have, Petro-Canada. One really wonders, Mr. Speaker, if the members of that party really understand what makes Canada great.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the Progressive Conservative party could decide by itself, without asking the Premier of Alberta or someone else outside the House what would be a good energy policy.

[English]

I would very much like to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) answer the real question of energy. I am sure that most Canadians would also like to know where he stands. Would he approve or disapprove of the policies of Premier Lougheed on the pricing and production of oil? Does the Leader of the Opposition agree or disagree with the position of Premier Lougheed that only in cases of emergency should the Government of Canada, in accordance with the constitution, have the right to regulate interprovincial trade and prices? I would like to hear the Leader of the Opposition answer, one of these days, those very real, crucial questions.

Does the Tory leader accept the position of Premier Lougheed on the whole question of energy? The position of the Premier of Alberta at the last constitutional conference on national energy control was that even in cases of compelling national interest, however broad those terms might be, he does not accept that the federal government should be able to regulate prices and the supply of oil interprovincially. The premier said that it should only be done in cases of emergency. Where does the Tory party stand on this issue, because the people of Canada would like to know? When the Conservative party suggests that we do not have an energy policy, I wonder what their policy is, if they have one at all.

Mr. Friesen: What have you done?

Mr. Breau: The hon. member asks what have we done. I just explained that this government adopted an energy policy in 1973. I see hon. members opposite laughing. They can laugh, Mr. Speaker. I should like to remind them that the compensation program for imported oil is really the cornerstone of the one-price policy in this country which means that the Atlantic provinces and Quebec have received compensation in payments, or reductions in the price of oil, up to $2 billion. That is the equivalent of $1,000 per person, Mr. Speaker.

• (2030)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why are we in such a mess then?

Mr. Breau: Only this year the one-price policy shielded us from the increased costs imposed by the Iranian situation and an increase of 25 cents per gallon at the pump will not occur this spring. That is what the energy policy of this government means.

An hon. Member: Why are you attacking Lougheed then?

Mr. Breau: I do not attack Lougheed. I can understand him. He is the premier of Alberta.

An hon. Member: Hurray!

Mr. Breau: The Leader of the Opposition is the leader of the Conservative party and he is a member of this parliament. I do not mind Lougheed.

An hon. Member: Blakeney is the premier of Saskatchewan. You have got one province right.

Mr. Breau: If hon. members opposite would keep quiet I would finish my remarks.

I do not mind Premier Lougheed defending the position of his province. That is what he is elected for.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Clermont): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Clermont): In that case, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) whose name appears on the list has the floor. Maybe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would like to have the floor.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you very much.

An hon. Member: Go on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are very nice.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I give full credit to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) for persuading me—perhaps I should wait until he listens.

I give full credit to the hon. member for Gloucester for persuading me to enter this debate, even though it will be a very brief contribution.

In his speech the hon. member ranged over the oil field from one end to the other but he did speak for a moment or two about the essence of the amendment that is now before us in the name of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). It is what he said about this amendment that made me feel I wanted to say a few words. Let me make it clear that when I come to the defence of a motion put down by a Conservative member, that does not mean I am defending the Conservative party's position with respect to oil or energy. Far from it. Indeed, everyone knows that we are prepared to accept this bill when we get to the final stage. However, my good friend from New Brunswick really must think that we are simple minded in this House when he tries to tell us that the proposed amendment now before us would emasculate the bill.

The bill provides for certain things to be done in case of an emergency. We accept that. But it goes what to my mind is a step too far when it builds into the bill something that should be a matter of the procedures of this House, namely, a statutory form of closure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All this amendment now does is that it seeks to take out that element of closure that is in the bill. The hon. member for Gloucester says that if the government does not have that element it cannot act, that it would be hamstrung, or whatever phrase he used. I point out to the hon. member that, much as I dislike them, the ordinary rules of closure are still on the books. I suggest that if the government really has an emergency and is not able to persuade members of this House that it is a sufficiently serious emergency, that its resolution should be dealt with quickly, it has the right to fall back on either of the closure rules that are in the Standing Orders of this House.

What I do not like about the clause that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is trying to take out of the bill is that it robs the House of the right to control its own procedures; it builds into the statute a form of closure.

The hon. member may tell me that there are already several instances in our statutes where that is the case, and I know that is true. The first time it happened speeches were made in the House about the impropriety of writing rules for the House into the statutes, but after we had done it two, three, four or five times, the government goes on doing it quite freely. I believe it is a mistake and that is the reason why we in this party are prepared to support this amendment. As I say, we do not agree with the Conservative party policy on energy.

Mr. Dawson: What policy?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Somebody asks, what policy? I would be happier if I knew what the Liberal policy is too.

Mr. Dawson: Read the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At least some of us who are grown up are aware of the fact that emergencies can take place in this area, and we accept the fact that there needs to be a piece of emergency legislation on the statute books. But it is not necessary to go to the extent of building another rule of closure right into the statute, interfering as it does with the right of the House to establish its own procedures. If this bill goes through the way it is—it is three days, and that is it! This amendment would take that clause out of the bill but it would still be within the power of the government to impose closure on the House. It is my view that if the emergency was clear, the government would not have that kind of trouble.

I said my remarks would be brief, Mr. Speaker, and that is the extent of them. I am dealing not with the whole broad energy question but with what I think is wrong in principle, namely, to write another closure rule into the statute. That is the reason my colleagues and I will be voting for this amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take too long to make my remarks. I have made them already as part of the second reading debate, I have made them in committee, and I made them part of the argument in the discussion on motion No. 1.

What is amazing to me, and it is, I think, probably one of the most frightening things about this bill, is the attitude the government is taking with regard to this amendment. This bill has been described by outside observers, not by members of this party, as a kind of "energy war measures act". It puts a tremendous amount of power in the hands of the government to take a great deal of arbitrary action in virtually running all aspects of a tremendous sector of the Canadian economy. Any member of parliament who feels some sort of responsibility toward democracy should think long and hard about putting that kind of power into the hands of the state. Dr. Peter Treu could give us a story about what happens when the state has excessive powers of the kind granted in the Official Secrets Act. And, of course, we have had the experience of the War Measures Act and the kind of abuse that is possible by a state that is unrestricted by a vigilant legislature.

The only check on that tremendous power that this bill grants to the government—which I must repeat at least for the benefit of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) who apparently has not heard of it—we agree that the government should have the ability to take action in the event of an emergency but we think the government has that ability now, but if it will be added through the establishment of a new board, we think the National Energy Board could probably do that. We recognize the government has to be in a position to handle an emergency. Let there be no mistake about our position in that regard. But the powers asked for here go beyond anything necessary to handle any conceivable emergency.

Motion No. 2 in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), would give parliament an opportunity to bring public will to bear on this government or any future government that might seek to abuse that power. The motion seeks to amend clause 11 of the bill. Clause 11(1) states:

> When the governor in council is of the opinion that a national emergency exists by reason of actual or anticipated shortages of petroleum or disturbances in the petroleum markets that affect or will affect the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, and that it is necessary in the national interest to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada, the governor in council may, by order, so declare and by that order authorize the establishment of a program for the mandatory allocation of petroleum products within Canada in accordance with this act.

This clause allows the government to take action immediately in a crisis. It does not even have to be a real crisis, which is one of the frightening things about it. I repeat, the governor in council can take action immediately. Any claim that this amendment would prevent the government from taking action is silly. A claim like that can only be made by someone who cannot read or by someone who has not read the bill. The hon. member for Gloucester probably falls into both categories.

This bill goes on in clause 11(3) to outline a procedure for laying before the House of Commons a motion to concur in government action. Remember that government action is started because it is trying to deal with a real emergency. It does not have to wait for the approval of the House; it can be done without, but a motion must be put before the House. The government does not have to tell us what it is doing. It does not have to tell the House the nature of the crisis nor does it have to tell the House what sort of allocation procedure it is putting into effect. The government does not have to tell the House or the country a thing. All that is required is a motion to be put before this House. Then after three days, by closure, that motion must be put to a vote and the government with its majority can force it through. The fact that we have members on the other side willing to agree to vote closure into the statutes indicates that the government backbenchers cannot be trusted to be vigilant watch dogs of the government. Their role in life as they see it is to say, "Aye, sir, aye".

An hon. Member: They are vigilantes.

Mr. Andre: To trust government backbenchers, at least that crop, to see there is no abuse of power, is a trust that is simply not justified.

One of the ministers over there for whom that groups says "Aye, sir, aye" used to reside over here. I am referring to the hon. member for Crowfoot, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner).

An hon. Member: A good man.

Mr. Andre: A good man, he says. The hon. member for Crowfoot when he was over on this side used to say that no motion should get through this House in less than seven days. The reason is quite simple. He told us that because this is a large country it takes two days for information that arises from debate to get across the nation so the people can hear about it.

Mr. Forrestall: That was the old days. It takes a week now.

Mr. Andre: And it takes two days for that information to be digested and two more days for any feedback to reach here to influence anything that is going on. That was in the old days before he got his 30 pieces of silver.

Mr. Forrestall: And indexed.

Mr. Andre: That may well have affected his thought process, although I do not know; but that is a fact.

Three days' debate is not enough for this House to check that kind of abuse if the government was not faced with a real crisis. If this House is not a check on government, what is the purpose of parliament? Why do we not just pass a one-clause bill which says that the government can do whatever it wants? If this House cannot exercise any real authority in terms of checking the government, why are we here? Why are we here, if not to represent our constituents on an ongoing basis checking the authority of the state? After all that was the reason for Magna Carta and the creation of parliament in the first place. Parliaments were created to check any abuse of powers by the state. Forcing closure on parliament by way of legislation is totally foreign to what parliament stands for. Any member of parliament who goes along with this is failing in his duties and responsibilities to the nation. Maybe he is being responsible to his party, but he is not being responsible to the nation.

All this motion does is to eliminate closure; that is all. The government has all the power it needs to act. If there is a genuine emergency that is well known to Canadians, Mr. Speaker, you can be sure that the motion would be passed and passed quickly. I have a lot more confidence in the collective responsibility of the House of Commons than I do in the responsibility of those with the power which this bill gives to them. All this amendment does is let parliament have the freedom to decide what to do. After all, that is the role of parliament, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated. To write closure into legislation means to hamstring future parliaments or to put a gag on parliament by way of legislation. This can only be done by a group of people who have nothing but contempt for this House, as their leader has demonstrated so many times.

I would ask members on the other side to take their responsibilities a little more seriously as members of parliament. I would hope the hon. member for Gloucester has read the act now and has realized his admonition that this would gut the act and render it totally worthless is an absurdity of the first order. It can only be made by somebody who has not even glanced at the act. Maybe it is too much to hope that Liberals can be responsible, but possibly they might feel the pressure of the public who are being vigilant.

An hon. Member: Tell us about Nick Taylor.

Mr. Andre: The public will bring this to the attention of those who desire to be re-elected. As members of parliament they are expected to be concerned about traditions in this House and about our parliamentary democracy. On occasion they are expected to be more than trained seals, and to think a little bit before they vote.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief. I listened to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) misinterpret completely the purport of the amendment put forth by my hon. friend. The hon. member has indicated that the amendment would emasculate the bill. I think he is wrong. I hope he realizes the position taken by the opposition parties with respect to this amendment generally.

No one in this House will dispute that there may come a time when an emergency arises with respect to energy. The bill before us clearly gives the government the power to declare such an emergency by order in council; it envisages that the appropriate measure will be placed before parliament. I do not believe there is anyone on either side of the House who would react negatively to a statement by the government that a real emergency existed or fail to accept it, providing opportunity were afforded for due examination for a reasonable length of time. That is the issue which concerns us.

I must say I was amazed by the position taken by the hon. member for Gloucester. He took the view that the amendment would render the government powerless. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been in the House long enough to know that when it wants to do so the government manages to get its bills through, right or wrong. To this end the government has at its disposal rule 75C; it can apply that rule whenever it feels like doing so. Of course the opposition also exercises its judgment when it decides to move in such a way as to require the government to use rule 75C. These are all political judgments, they all have their perils, but it is absolutely inappropriate to add to that power the power to conclude debate in the face of an opposition which might, conceivably, be silly in dealing with an emergency, by overriding the rules of this House to the extent of enshrining in law something that transcends the rules which govern parliament. After all, these Standing Orders do mean something.

Surely there are certain principles which ought to govern ministers opposite when they consider this matter, and surely it is not too much to ask that members of parliament on all sides of the House, who are no less Canadian than any other group of people who will be considering this matter when it arises, should be relied upon to review the evidence presented by the government in an appropriate way, and be prepared to accept the judgment of the government, after due examination.

Under the proposal which has been made to us we would be limited to three days of debate. Moreover, we would not have the right to question the government about what was taking place; we would have no right to direct questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, if he were the appropriate minister at the time, or to the officials who presumably advise him. The hon. member for Gloucester interjects that we could use the question period. He is correct. There is a rather limited right, during the question period—

Mr. Breau: Consideration of supply.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —and during consideration of supply, though that might take place four or five weeks beyond the point at which the crisis developed. The hon. member knows this to be the case, and the measure would not be before the House even under the bill as it stands unless a situation of urgency had arisen. For these reasons I think it is improper for the government to have the right to run roughshod over parliament.

I repeat, no member of this party denies the government's right to appropriate powers to deal with an emergency situation. It would, to say the least, be inappropriate and contrary to the best interests of the country for anybody to advocate such a course. But it is equally contrary to the best interests of this country to develop the habit of coming to parliament and asking repeatedly for more power than is required. It is acknowledged that this has happened in the case of the referendum bill—it has been acknowledged by dispassionate observers of the political scene. And we find it happening again in this bill. The government is seeking not only appropriate powers to deal with an emergency, but powers which are improper in the kind of society in which we live. I hope the hon. member for Gloucester, bearing this in mind, will reconsider the remarks he made, and I hope the government will reconsider its approach to the amendment.

Again, I say no one in this House who is right-thinking at all would deny any government the powers it needs in these circumstances, but the power which is sought here is too wide. The amendment, which I invite hon. members to support, would not diminish the government's ability to deal with an emergency, and by approving it members opposite would be doing this institution a great service, perhaps a greater service than they realize—it may be they are beyond realizing it, Mr. Speaker. I hope not. Nevertheless, I think this is important.

The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) talking from his seat again describes an emergency. Obviously, he has not read the bill.

Mr. Cullen: Cheap!

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If the hon. member continues to make speeches from his seat he must expect retorts from me while I have the floor. We are friends, and he knows what I mean. The bill describes an emergency in clause 11. It states:

> When the governor in council is of the opinion that a national emergency exists by reason of actual or anticipated shortages of petroleum or disturbances in the petroleum markets that affect or will affect the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, and that it is necessary in the national interest to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada—

When that situation exists in the judgment of the government, it may do certain things. All we are asking with this amendment is that when the government makes that judgment—and I assume it would do that in good faith—it consult all of us in parliament who represent the people of the country, and submit its case to parliament. In the unlikely event that parliament should become obstreperous in the absence of the three-day limitation—and I doubt that would happen in the case of an emergency properly found by the government—the minister knows, and the hon. member for Welland knows, that there are extraordinary powers under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons to do under the rules of this House that which the government now seeks to augment by a statute.

I would not want in any way to interfere with the rights of members on the government side who are not in the cabinet to exercise their duty with respect to the matter. I just do not want parliament to put its imprimatur, its approval, on a piece of legislative machinery which is inappropriate to a free parliament. I think the minister should understand that, but perhaps he suffers from the same disease suffered by some of his colleagues. I think it is a sad day for parliament when this is so.

I have nothing more to say with respect to the matter, but I hope there are some hon. members on the government side who would be prepared—

Mr. Railton: We are for the government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member says he is for the government. If he continues to exhibit this attitude, he will not be supporting a government for long. I hope the hon. member for Welland will consider the position he intends to take with respect to this matter and have regard for what he is prepared to support in damaging the institution which he has served rather well since 1974.

Mr. Railton: That is very nice of you.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would accept a question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I will try to answer.

Mr. Breau: Does the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) at least admit that this kind of motion placed before the House would not be placed before the House at the discretion of the government? Normally the government has control over orders of the day. The hon. member says it is terrible to have in a statute this kind of closure. Does he not realize that in the case of a proclamation the statute would also provide that the government does not have a choice? I have read the bill; the hon. member knows that. Subclause (2) says that a notice of motion to concur shall be laid on the table within seven days. Subclause (3) says that a notice of motion laid before the House pursuant to subclause (2) shall be set down as an order of the day. Does the hon. member not realize that this would not be an ordinary order, but that once a proclamation has been made by the government, it has to come before the House? Flexibility on the part of the government to withdraw an order is not provided for, and that is why this kind of limitation has to be provided.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite right with respect to what the subclauses say, but all they provide is that when the government acts upon its finding that there is an emergency, the matter will be brought before parliament promptly. I recognize that the three days' debate is to ensure that parliament deals with the matter promptly. What I am saying is that when the government already has the power to allocate time under Standing Order 75, it is inappropriate to put that into a statute. I think it is particularly inappropriate when there is nothing in the procedure with respect to this matter which would allow members of parliament to examine the minister and his officials in any way except during the question period, which is an examination of the minister only.

It may very well be that it would be extremely helpful to parliament if we had the right to examine the minister and his officials, but we would not have that right under this bill. Debate ought not to be limited to three days when there is already sufficient power under the Standing Orders to limit debate. That is my whole point. I am glad the hon. member for Gloucester raised this matter. It is not the position of the official opposition—I am sure it is not the position of the New Democratic Party, and I do not think it is the position of anyone in this House—that the government ought not to have the power to declare an emergency with respect to the matter set forth in this bill.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief but I cannot help comment at this stage on the question of procedure which was referred to in the last speeches.

I listened very attentively to the remarks of the parliamentary leader of the Progressive Conservative party, and I wonder to what extent his comments reflect our rules. In short, he is suggesting that under the bill when a situation of crisis, a situation of emergency arises in Canada, according to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), parliament would have to be given a reasonable opportunity to study, consider and discuss the declaration of an emergency resulting from the order made by the governor in council as set out at the beginning of clause 11.

Mr. Speaker, the clause provides later on for a minimum of three full days of debate on that very order or that very declaration of a national emergency. Even taking the argument of my colleague from Grenville-Carleton, those three full days of debate would give the House more time to discuss the order or the declaration of an emergency than the present provisions of our rules would allow if the government applied them from the beginning of the debate in view of the urgency, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton suggests. Let me explain, Mr. Speaker. There are two possible ways to limit the debate under our rules. There is S.O. 33 which is rarely used and commonly referred to in parliamentary terms as the real guillotine. There is also S.O. 75A, 75B and 75C which are often but wrongly called the "guillotine" by members of the opposition but which in fact amount to a limitation of debate.

Now, in both cases, if, in view of the emergency we were to resort to those weopons provided by the Standing Orders as they now stand instead of stipulating in this legislation a full three days of debate, something to which the opposition is objecting, we could in theory get away with a maximum of two days of debate on the declaration of national emergency.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Pinard: We could within two days—and I see my colleague for Grenville-Carleton is acknowledging the accuracy of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, that is just why we wanted to limit the debate to three days, to allow for still more time than is allowed by the strict application of S.O. 33 and S.O. 75A, 75B and 75C.

As for Standing Order 33, it provides that the government simply has to give a day's notice to limit the debate to one more day. If we were to use Standing Order 33 as the member of the opposition has suggested, when the government at any given time judges that there is a crisis or a national emergency, the governor in council would declare a national emergency and table a notice of motion within seven days. At that stage, if instead of doing what is provided in the bill we were to do what the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) wants and use Standing Order 33, we would simply have on the first day to give the notice required under Standing Order 33 and, on the very next day, limit the debate to that one day and conclude it in two days. This would mean that, to discuss in the House the order or the decision of the governor in council or the cabinet concerning a national emergency, members of parliament would only have two days instead of three.

If we refer to the other rule that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton or his colleagues would have us use in a real crisis or national emergency, the only thing that the government would have to do, in my opinion, within seven days after the order is given by the cabinet and the notice of the motion is given in the House, would be to give notice on the very first day of debate. The minister would simply have to rise in his place and say: I advise hon. members that tomorrow I shall move a motion to limit the length of the debate to one day. That would be the whole extent of the discussion on that day concerning the crisis or national emergency.

The next day, the minister would rise in accordance with his notice. He would move the motion asking the House to limit the debate to one day, and there would then be a debate of two hours, not on the substance of the order, but on the reasons why the government wants to limit the length of the debate to one day. These two hours would be used to make petty politics rather than to discuss the national emergency or crisis in the House. The next day, we would have the second real day of debate on the motion or emergency order of the cabinet, and the debate would then be over. To sum it up, by resorting to this second weapon or, if you prefer, this last resort available under the Standing Orders as some members of the opposition want for all practical purposes the House would have only two full days to debate the motion, to discuss the emergency order passed by cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, this is a specious argument in my opinion. The indignation or this show of indignation on the part of some members of the opposition does not impress me. I can hardly find any good faith in this argument. I think that if truly, in the sense it is provided for at subclause 1 of clause 11, there is a national emergency with regard to the supply of petroleum, if the population of the maritimes or Quebec, in the middle of February, because of Siberian temperatures, find themselves freezing and if there is a shortage of petroleum, if there is a shortage of heating oil, it seems to me that this would constitute a matter of emergency and a state of national crisis. The government, the cabinet, must use its political judgment to decide whether it should pass the order or declare a state of national emergency. So within seven days, the cabinet, and remember that it can be very cold during these seven days, Mr. Speaker, the cabinet I repeat will table before the House its order which will have to be debated here for a period of three full days not just three days of procedural debate, not just three days during which it will be decided whether the government is right or wrong to limit the duration of the debate, because that will have been settled by this bill, but during three full days of debate to allow the members to express themselves on the statement of national emergency.

So, Mr. Speaker, once again this procedural argument does not hold water. If we were to go strictly by the suggestions of those who take offence at the fact that a bill attempts to bypass the Standing Orders of the House, to those I therefore want to say that this bill is more generous than the Standing Orders if there is really a state of emergency because, as I have just shown under Standing Orders 33, 75A, 75B and 75C, the maximum provided for is two days. Once again I can see that my hon. colleague from Grenville-Carleton agrees. It is a maximum period of two full debating days and even if he had not acknowledged that, it is a matter of fact that it could be a maximum period of two debating days that we could have over this order because under this bill what we are suggesting is a period of three full debating days, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the circumstances, to anyone who truly wants our policy to have national scope and benefit without discrimination to all parts of our country, I say it is ridiculous to oppose or delay passage of a bill because it contains provisions that take the place of the Standing Orders of the House which, if applied to the letter, would be even more strict, and would limit even more the debates of the House. So, Mr. Speaker, that is the short intervention I wanted to make. I want to specify, using the very argument of my colleagues of the opposition, that the bill allows, to all practical purposes, a full day more of debate on the order of national urgency than would the Standing Orders of the House if they were applied strictly in a case of crisis, as suggested by hon. members of the opposition.

[English]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is pretty obvious—

Mr. Gillespie: Filibuster.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCain: —in view of the logic that can be associated with the last two speeches made by the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) and the hon. member member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), it is the government filibustering its own bill. It is just as simple as that. Take a look—

Mr. Gillespie: Not when you consider the number of speakers you have put on. Are you ready for the question?

Mr. McCain: And yours have not followed, man for man? You have not been sitting docilely in your seats? You are filibustering your own bill.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCain: The logic of the last two speakers escapes me, absolutely and completely. There is an old statement that there are those so deaf that they will not hear. I have to say to you that that applies, because if you read the bill you find it authorizes the government to take the necessary emergency measures as soon as the emergency occurs. We are therefore discussing the period of time which, after the fact, we would be discussing it if the emergency measures were put in place. The emergency measures—and the minister knows this—do not have to await the debate.

Mr. Gillespie: But approval certainly does in an emergency, and that is very important. That is what we are talking about.

We are dealing with an emergency, a crisis. You are talking as if it were business as usual.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

An hon. Member: You do not know what to do.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will give me extra time at the end because I am certainly losing it at the beginning.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCain: Could I try again, sir? The government has taken the measures and they will be discussed. If they find themselves in a minority government, what they are citing is perhaps correct, but the approval will not be dependent necessarily upon the time of the debate. If you are in a minority government, there may be some problem with the approval, and I do not argue that. But if you are a majority government and as pigheaded as is this government, with a bunch of lap dogs to vote for you, then there is no problem in getting the approval.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McCain: I say to you that the only subject which is under discussion in this amendment is how long the democratic system will prevail and the opportunities exist to discuss a situation which may be at hand as decreed and defined by the government. That is all that is at hand, that is all we are discussing. To say anything more and to try to distract everyone by the reading of the rules and to suggest that you might put in the closure motion, as you submit, and therefore we could have even fewer debating days than this bill permits, is drawing a red herring along the trail.

Mr. Gillespie: You are talking about parliamentary approval for executive action. That is very different from discussion.

Mr. McCain: Are you afraid of the decision which parliament might make? Are you so incompetent in your decision-making that you do not trust parliament to back you? You can rest assured, sir, that there are people in the House who will not back you if they find fault with your decision, and there is no reason why the people of Canada or the House of Commons should be expected to take at face value the government's definition of any particular situation.

Mr. Gillespie: Talk, talk, during an emergency.

Mr. McCain: We are not in an emergency now and you certainly are in no hurry to get this through, otherwise the last two speakers would never had risen, so do not hand us that. Let us be consistent.

● (2120)

The hon. member for Gloucester made a few remarks this evening. It bothers me that he did not express any concern about the lack of planning for emergency supplies for eastern Canada. He applauded the government because it provided equal pricing across Canada at the expense of taxpayers, the users of petroleum products. The people of Canada supported that generously. It is appreciated by those who need that equalization money, as eastern Canada does. Let us understand what we are referring to by eastern Canada. We are not referring to anything except that part of Canada which lies beyond the end of the Montreal pipeline. The Montreal pipeline was built to capacity to supply Montreal area needs and nothing beyond. The hon. member for Gloucester did not express any concern about the fact that after five years there is no plan in place which will look after the needs of eastern Canada and a large portion of Quebec. The energy policy is lacking. It has been fuzzy for a long while.

Mr. Gillespie: Tell us a few things about your policy.

Mr. McCain: I will tell the minister a few things in a minute. The energy policy has been fuzzy for too long.

Mr. Gillespie: Tell us about your pricing policy.

Mr. McCain: I did not criticize the government's pricing policy. Canadian taxpayers are not criticizing the government's pricing policy. The government had to bail itself out of its pricing policy and make peace with the provinces because it wanted a favourable situation on which to win an election. The government preached its promise to Canada respecting its pricing policy. I can assure you, Mr. Minister, that we could not do any worse.

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. McCain: Those who suggest that I address the Chair might remind other members—

Mr. Gillespie: Tell us about your pricing policy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) has the floor, and I remind the hon. member to address the Chair.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker is right on. Perhaps Your Honour would speak to those on your right in the same tone.

The past policy of the government has inhibited exploration. It retarded the development of reserves. It is only in the last year that the government began to recognize by budget measures that it had been excessive in its control of exploration money. The government has recanted and admitted the error of its ways. Canada might not be in a position of worrying about how long its present resources will last if the government had not fought with the maritime provinces over who had jurisdiction over what. We in eastern Canada do not know what we have because the present minister, his predecessor, and the government inhibited exploration in fields which were considered fertile by geologists. Our policy includes generous opportunity for exploration in eastern Canada. That is more than the government can say for itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: Our policy will not leave eastern Canada hung out to dry if a real emergency happens. I assure the minister that our policy will not be a major reflex reaction to something which could have been anticipated. It is fair to say the western world has not been on the best relations with the Middle East. Since the days of the Crusades they have looked upon each other with an element of mistrust. Perhaps we could say that earlier we used the Middle East in our turn, and they are using us today.

Canada is dangling at the end of the string because there has been no policy to permit exploration of the potential resources of this nation. This motion would not be before the House now if they had not quibbled over resource opportunities with the provinces and with those who would have explored. There will be exploration in our policy, and if the resource is there it will not be short and for just ten years down the road as it is presently.

The government has had options open to it for the last five or six years. I do not know which one would be more practical because we are operating in a vacuum of knowledge. We cannot get answers to questions. We cannot get beyond the secret veil or the iron curtain of secrecy which shrouds and protects the government. We cannot find out what are the authentic reserves of gas and oil. Therefore, until such time as we have access to the knowledge in the hands of the minister, it is somewhat difficult to define precisely what might have been the best plan to follow in the last six years. There are five options, any one of which might have been practical and none of which has been discussed by government members in the House as of today.

The first option, the one for which there is obvious capacity to provide, is that the government might have considered for a short emergency situation the movement of oil from the west coast of Canada to the east coast by water transit. Apparently there was adequate pipeline capacity to deliver oil to the west coast. It could be loaded on boats, and perhaps there are boats to bring it around. That is one option the government might have considered. Perhaps it would have been rejected out of hand for reasons which are still behind the iron curtain of secrecy.

It would not have been inconceivable to establish pipeline capacity to reach the head of the Great Lakes, and transport the necessary oil requirements from there to eastern Canada in an emergency. Perhaps it would have been difficult to transport the oil in February or March, but rarely is the supply so low in eastern Canada that one could not have survived by one means or another for 30 days or 60 days until such time as the lakes and the Seaway would be open to bring the oil out of Thunder Bay.

The third option is that the Montreal pipeline could have been built with excess capacity. Petroleum energy might have been ready for emergency delivery by rail, truck or water to eastern Canada if the Montreal pipeline had been built with a little foresight. All we can go by is what we hear through the grapevine. We have been advised that the Montreal pipeline was built with barely enough capacity to supply the area which it now serves, and that it does not have the capacity to deliver to the rest of Quebec and all of Atlantic Canada.

The fourth option the government might have had is that it could have built the pipeline from Montreal into some point in Atlantic Canada from which the oil might have reached the rest of Atlantic Canada by truck, ferry, or other means.

The fifth opinion is perhaps the most economically practical. There is a possibility of massive storage in some of the capacities which exist in Atlantic Canada or perhaps exist in Quebec. I am not aware of the capacities which exist in Quebec. This subject has been a matter of international discussion. The capacity of that storage has not been defined, but I have been advised that these possible storages could accommodate one, two or three billion barrels. Also I have been advised that the storage capacity is already there, and that it is merely a matter of planning to get the oil into storage. Perhaps this was a course the government could have followed in co-operation with the United States which is as concerned about the possibility of an energy crisis and has planned a little better than we have. Probably this is not the last crisis we will see, but none of these five options has been given any serious consideration by the government or, if so, it has never been made public.

Eastern Canada has been hung out to dry if by any chance an emergency should arise. I submit to you that it was incumbent upon the hon. member for Gloucester to have mentioned the very naked position in which government policy has left that part of Canada. I can assure you that the policy of the Conservative party when it becomes the government will not leave any part of Canada hanging out to dry in an emergency which may occur abroad as far as energy is concerned. That is our policy, Mr. Minister, and you cannot claim it because you have neglected it. Your performance has denied a sense of responsibility to that part of Canada which is dependent for its oil on other sources.

Mr. Gillespie: Be serious.

Mr. McCain: I am deadly serious.

Mr. Forrestall: Talk to us about light and heavy crude and security of supply.

Mr. McCain: Half of the problem we are now faced with in Atlantic Canada from the arbitrary, high-handed, inconsiderate, and improper way in which the last crisis was handled, because when the government foresaw 48 hours in advance an element of a crisis the taps were turned on these pipelines which lead to our neighbour to the south, and they were turned from east to west, and all the contracts which were in place with state or private enterprise were cancelled. New prices were negotiated and supplies were placed on a limited basis only. That is one of the reasons why there is now a 750,000-barrel additional refining capacity in Canada left idle, and it stretches from Sarnia to the harbour of Come-By-Chance, Newfoundland.

That refining capacity was established all the way from Sarnia east, with the idea that that part of United States which they could properly reach required refined products. In my constituency during the last crisis the tap was turned by the predecessor of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie). The tap was turned overnight on the pulp mills, the universities and the hospitals which were dependent upon refined products coming from refineries in Canada. That is the way it was done. The full consequence of that was not realized until such time as there was the possibility of an l.n.g. operation at Saint John, New Brunswick. When the proponents of that operation went to Washington to seek support for its establishment, what message did they bring back? They brought back the message that islands in the Caribbean had been able to be incorporated into the petroleum pricing structure of the United States. Though they are not part of the United States they were considered as part of it for the purpose of petroleum pricing structures.

Venezuela and islands in the Caribbean which are not protectorates of the United States shared that market. Since they turned the tap without any consideration for the consequences to our neighbours, no Canadian refinery can be placed in the pool of energy or the pooling price system of the United States, from Sarnia to Come-By-Chance, and these refineries are now operating at less than capacity and at the expense of the eastern Canadian consumer.

That is the kind of planning we have by this government, and that is why these refineries are idle or closed. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the performance of the Canadian ministry and this government, the answer from our neighbour to the south was that we are not a reliable source of energy and the United States would be ill advised to put such a large dependence for its source of energy on the l.n.g. proposal for New Brunswick.

This was not because of the lack of a buyer in the United States, a large corporation that wanted the energy, and it was not because of a lack of effort by New Brunswick in support of that project. This was the result of the government of the United States stating that Canada was not a reliable source of energy.

An hon. Member: Just listen to this.

Mr. McCain: The minister can mock that statement, but he knows it to be true. He knows that a minister from Newfoundland has tried his best to work the Come-By-Chance product into the price mix in the United States. He went as high as the vice president of the United States and was rejected out of hand. We know that the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) has tried in vain to have the Port Tupper refinery again accepted into the United States pricing structure so that it could again operate to capacity as it did prior to the breach of contract and the dishonourable behaviour of this government in respect of supplies which were going south before the last emergency. It is not for lack of trying by cabinet ministers in the cabinet of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology that the situation remains the same, but because they have run into a blank wall.

Venezuela did not run into a blank wall and the islands in the Caribbean did not run into a blank wall. They are mixing their refined products in with pricing in the United States, and the minister knows that. The minister knows that, and his mockery and his delirious laughter will never remove that from the record. This is the message that was brought back. Eastern Canada has been neglected and this bill is a charade.

The discussion on this amendment by those who will not understand is a filibuster by representatives of the government, and it cannot be interpreted in any other way. Whether it is discussed three days, five days, or for whatever number of days it may be discussed, no government which exerts sound and proper judgment would have trouble with the House of Commons when Canada is in an emergency. The House will respond. I suggest there is now a lack of trust for the responsibility of the House of Commons. Most of the time of this House has been spent in debating irresponsible, blank cheque legislation. It is a request for unreasonable, unnecessary, and unacceptable powers that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time, to which I have added two extra minutes, has expired.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have just one or two observations and they will have very little to do with that snake pit opposite, as a colleague of mine used to refer to the arrogance that is shown on the other side when serious points are being made. We hear hissing, and witness a downright disregard for these serious points. This makes it easy to understand the way people react. That sort of action on the part of the government contributes to nothing. In fact it has a negative effect upon the government's intentions and aims.

Closure, which is what this is tantamount to, is repugnant and always has been to any democratic system. As has been mentioned very clearly by members on this side, there are ample provisions in the existing law to deal with any emergency that is perceived by the government. Indeed, in my experience I know of no situation at any point in time which could be perceived as an emergency when the government did not in fact act, and debate the matter afterwards. In a situation such as this the people of Canada would expect the government to act. Had the government in fact acted years ago when it should have, we would not be here this evening debating what my friend, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), describes as a charade.

I support this amendment, and I would like to make one or two points of a different nature. One of them relates to comments by the minister himself in the House yesterday.

I regret that I do not have the Hansard, but it is because of some technical difficulty as I understand the situation. I can always make it up. My impressions are, I think, fairly accurate, and they have to do with your comments that there will be no third party intervening or taking profits—I believe that that was your inference—out of the secure supply of oil to eastern refineries. I think that that is what you said and that that is a fair recollection. If I am wrong you can correct me, and I know that you will.

I wonder if the minister is at all aware of the difference between heavy and light crude. I wonder why today in this debate nobody has stood and made reference to this, "secure supply", of oils that we have from Venezuela for our eastern refineries. I would ask the minister just where, in the name of God, he expects us to handle and treat heavy crude, because that is what he is talking about and he knows it. The minister knows that Venezuela will be short of light crude within the next two or three years. Stand up and tell me that you were not told that by the Venezuelan government, or get some of your noisy backbenchers to tell me.

My first point was, what are we going to do with the heavy crude? My second point is, how in God's name are we going to move it? The third question I would put to you—and get up and answer this question or have one of your backbencher lackeys get up and answer it—is what was the going price of non-pool oil this afternoon at four o'clock, on the four principal markets in the world? What was the purchase price and what was the going price in the marketplace? I would like the minister to get up and tell us that, and then tell us in eastern Canada.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, eastern Canada, for the edification of this House, when I refer to it is the Atlantic provinces and eastern Quebec; not Ontario and western Canada, but the maritimes, Newfoundland, Labrador and eastern Quebec. How are you going to move the oil and what are we going to pay for it? Why has the minister, with all his rhetoric and damned nonsense, not had the courage of his own convictions and stood up in the House of Commons and told the people in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Labrador and eastern Quebec what the cost increase to the consumer will be next fall because of this, "secure", supply of oil? Where are you going to refine it? What refinery process in what country are you going to put it through before we can use it? I do not know why the minister takes this so lightly.

Mr. Andre: He's from Ontario.

Mr. Forrestall: Even the people from Ontario know what we have been doing with heavy crude in Canada for the last 30 or 40 years. We have had to send it out of the country for processing. Give me some kind of indication. If you think that I am way out in left field, nod and say so and I will sit down, or get on your feet and demonstrate the difference. Do we have secure light crude without swapping or changing?

Mr. Gillespie: You weren't listening.

Mr. Forrestall: And for how long? You are so full of it that you are right up to the crest. Those are just two or three questions which nobody over there has had the courtesy to eastern Canadian consumers to get up and answer. My colleague from Carleton-Charlotte laid a very serious charge tonight, and all the minister could do was sit there and guffaw, which is what he is doing now, laughing.

What the minister knew about oil six months ago, two years after he had become minister, could be written on the back of a postage stamp.

An hon. Member: Tell him what Gerry Regan said.

Mr. Forrestall: That is right. What did Gerry Regan have to say about you? You do not have to take my word for it. Gerry Regan is one of your former colleagues, the last of the bastion. As a matter of fact, the minister used another word.

My colleague from Carleton-Charlotte made a very serious charge a few moments ago about the failure on the part of this government with respect to the mix of eastern Canadian refinery capacity in the U.S. market, the mix of supply and the mix of cost. The islands in the Caribbean and a dozen other countries around this world enjoy this situation, but not Canada, and particularly not eastern Canada. I wonder when the minister was last in eastern Canada, except to go out and toot the government horn on some political spree at the taxpayers' expense.

The minister said, when speaking in the House yesterday, that we were well off in the east. I would like him to get up and tell me what it is that my industrial users pay for energy and what he is paying for energy in his backyard. Tell my people in Ecum Secum what they pay, and at the same time tell them what your people pay, and then tell us again that we are well off. We are in serious trouble. The actions of this government have brought about our difficulties, with its equalization and stabilization. How much longer do you think that we will be able to play games, with the world price of oil what it is? How much longer do you think we will be able to go on with an unreliable source of oil for our refineries? How much longer do you think that our refineries can continue to operate, unless they have access markets for the disposal of their production capacity?

Mr. Gillespie: Is this about the amendment?

Mr. Forrestall: Speaking to the amendment? What the hell has the amendment got to do with the nonsense you have been perpetrating for the last three or four days?

Mr. Gillespie: Filibuster.

Mr. Forrestall: Filibuster, be damned. You are the filibuster of your own argument and you know that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he must address the Chair. I have been very tolerant, and he should address himself to me.

Mr. Forrestall: You are right, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize to you. It is just that the total ignorance of a situation lends to provocation which in fact is justifiable. It is a good thing that it is not Saturday and St. Patrick's Day or I would teach the minister a lesson the proper way. The eleventh hour attempts by this government to correct what is one of the most serious situations facing eastern Canada are not good enough. When are we going to get our oil refineries back into production so that we can enjoy some of the benefits? When are we going to get the security of Canadian oil? When are we going to learn about the reversal of one of the Portland pipelines which is touted in C-42? When are we going to get it?

Mr. Gillespie: What is the amendment you are speaking to?

Mr. Forrestall: The amendment that I am speaking to is the balderdash and the damned nonsense that you perpetrated in this bill, saying that you need a three-day closure motion. That is what you are talking about. It is not worth the time of day, and you know it.

Mr. Gillespie: You are quite right; the amendment was balderdash.

Mr. Forrestall: This bill is repugnant to our system and to our democratic society. There are three things which concern us in eastern Canada. I do not care whether the matter is debated on the floor of the House of Commons or not. The procedures of this House provide for it. There is an old, old rule in this House that the members will be heard, so we do not need this war measures type of security.

● (2150)

I wonder if the minister understands what the word "closure" means. I wonder if he has bothered to look up the word "emergency" or the word "comedy" in the political sense? I will send the Concise Oxford Dictionary, sixth edition, over to him so that he can look them up, but for now I will read the definitions to him. Emergency is defined as a sudden state of danger, a condition needing immediate treatment. Politically, it is a condition approximating to that of war. That is what emergency means. Comedy is defined as a stage play of life, of amusing and often satirical character. With this measure the minister has perpetrated a comedy on this House—light, farcical, not dealing with the subject in depth.

The minister should be condemned for this. His failure to treat the question of oil security in eastern Canada seriously and the matter of our refineries to function at or near their levels of production, his failure to secure a mix of supply and costs for them in the United States market, his failure to secure light crude oils for eastern Canada, his failure to conclude adequately with the Norwegians, for example, the type of industrial mix they would like if we are to participate in their production supplies—for all of these reasons the amendment should be supported and the minister's motion should be defeated. It is not necessary. He already has adequate authority to take action when he decides there is an emergency, and it does not need to be an emergency immediately prior to a state of war.

Mr. Gillespie: Are you voting against it?

Mr. Forrestall: Bring the election on.

An hon. Member: Any time.

Mr. Forrestall: I will give the minister his emergency authority. Nobody is denying him that. I just say that he has overstepped his boundaries substantially. He is arrogant, and uncaring about eastern Canadians. It is the same with the whole government. By God, they will the finished when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has the guts to call the general election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) for the education they have given us on the needs of eastern Canada and the maritimes. I must confess that I was resting rather easy about this bill until I read the editorial in the Globe and Mail last Saturday.

An hon. Member: You cannot make up your mind, you have to read the Globe.

Mr. Friesen: At least I can read. I know Liberal members do not want to hear this but I think it is worth putting on the record. Referring to this bill the editorial had this to say:

> It is a bill which will put everybody having anything to do with energy under the control of a minister of energy become a czar. It is a piece of tyranny, with the tyranny handled by amateurs and all the professionals shoved aside.

When I look at the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) I cannot help but believe that the editorial is correct. It did not take a great deal of insight but at least the editorial said it.

The second thing that made me take notice of the bill is the indecent haste with which the government wanted to see it passed. They twitched nervously as soon as another member rose to speak. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is wont to say—if you have nothing to hide, why hide it? Why not let it see the light of day? Why not expose it?

I look at some of the reasons there might be for an emergency. When I came to this House five years ago we were assured that Canada had an unlimited supply of energy and oil reserves. A year later, we were doomed to a kind of 1984 freeze-up. All of a sudden we are told we have a 25-year supply and I ask myself if this government has any kind of policy at all. When will we get a table and dependable analysis of our reserves?

I can imagine that prior to the North Sea discoveries, countries like Holland, France or Italy would have emergency allocations because their own supplies of petroleum were inadequate. I can understand why they would want legislation like this, but why should Canada, a country supposedly rich in petroleum reserves, ever come to the point of needing an emergency allocation of petroleum? The legislation shows that the minister is not content simply for petroleum to be allocated but provides that he can expand his powers. Clause 12(5) of the bill reads as follows:

The governor in council may, by order, add any product that is manufactured wholly or in part from petroleum to the mandatory allocation program and thereupon that product becomes a controlled product for the purpose of the allocation of the supplies thereof in Canada.

So it is not simply petroleum that the bill deals with. What this energy czar wants to do is control all the products that deal with energy, not just petroleum. When is he going to add hydro and coal?

The minister asks if I looked at those clauses that I just read. If he can understand English, surely he sees it is not the intent simply to talk about petroleum but to add other measures to it? The record of this government of predicting the needs of this country for petroleum resources does anything but encourage confidence.

There was a time before this Liberal government came into office when the word "liberal" had some good connotations. It meant generosity. When I read clause 16, however, I do not think it equates with generosity but rather with dictatorship. They want to control every aspect of the energy system in Canada—supplying wholesalers, allocating the marketplace, allocating the prices—everything is supposed to be under the control of this minister whom the newspaper called an amateur. Are we supposed to give him these unlimited powers after three days of debate? It is no wonder that the editorial says we have a responsibility to bring this to light and debate it as long as possible. Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—ARBITRARY WITHDRAWAL OF RAIL SERVICE FOR CERTAIN COMMODITIES

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, on November 2 last, I asked a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) which pertained to a problem in eastern Canada arising as a result of the railroad structure of Canada, saying it was going to withdraw the type of equipment which is necessary to transport potatoes to the markets of Canada and to export markets as well. I asked the minister at that time if he had any control, or if the Canadian Transport Commission had any control over the behaviour of the railroads in such a circumstance.

Is the railroad at liberty to withdraw a particular type of service upon which an area has been historically dependent, without any consideration being given to the necessity of that service, without any advice to the minister or to the Canadian Transport Commission? Is there in fact any authority in the hands of the minister or the agencies of his department which can say to a railroad that it must continue to render this service to an area because it is dependent on the service? It may be dependent on it because there is absolutely no other source of transportation to the destination. It may be dependent on it because it is the only means of transportation which fully fills the market area, fully in which the product has been sold. It may be dependent upon it because of all the capital investment which has been made to ship by this means, and the changes which would be incumbent upon the shipping industry to change.

I am concerned that there has been no response to my question. The minister said in reply to me that if he had the question in written form he would obtain an answer. Because it has been said many times in this House: "I will take your question under advisement and reply," I assumed this would be adequate written notice to the minister concerned and that I could anticipate a reply. I have waited patiently through November, December, January, and February and now I have to bring it to the attention of this House that I have had no reply. I submit that there is no excuse to hide behind the idea that he had no written question. The written record of my question is not only here for him to read but it is here for the public to read.

This is a very serious problem on a national scale and not on a particularly local or colloquial scale. There is a fixed cost in the operation of any business. There is a fixed cost in the operation of a branch line of a railroad. That fixed cost will be there and it will be distributed over the total amount of traffic that travels over that particular branch line. I interpret this withdrawal railroad equipment to haul potatoes as advance notice that they will be applying next for branch line abandonment. I base my case upon the fact that the first application which reduced the use of the lines concerned was for the elimination of passenger service. When these applications for the elimination of passenger service were presented they included the cost of its operation. But two particular items were included in those costs. One was management and the other was maintenance.

Because one took a passenger car—a Budd car—off the railroad line that in no way would decrease the amount of maintenance required on that line nor would it probably take a single employee out of the administrative structure. Simply put, this means the administrative costs of that particular line now had to be distributed upon less traffic than before. It was quite significant that the loss incurred by one of those passenger services was less than the total of the maintenance costs and the administrative charges to the line, both of which were to continue after the passenger service had been discontinued. It would therefore have been cheaper to operate the passenger service than to discontinue it.

Now we are faced with the idea that one of the items which is moved in the largest quantities over that line will no longer be carried because the railway will no longer choose to present equipment to the shipper suitable for carrying it. So, there were these stages: first, withdrawal of the passenger service; second, the raising of the rates for the movement of wood products to such a level that producers could no longer afford to move their material on the railroads of New Brunswick. That is the second stage. When you couple the withdrawal of the transportation of wood products with the withdrawal of passenger service and, now, withdrawal from the movement of potatoes, it is not hard to foresee that the next application will be for branch line abandonment.

I want to know this: is there any authority vested in the minister or any agency of the Department of Transport which would permit him to intervene and request that the railroads provide services which are historically necessary for the economic viability of the area? That is precisely what is necessary—competitive transportation for the province. It has now become subject to truck rates without competition, whatever they may be, and that is not healthy.

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) is outraged because he did not receive an answer to his question of November 2. In the interim answer he gave him on that date, the minister quite clearly invited the hon. member to put his question on the order paper, or to write the minister stating the precise details he wanted to have. Mr. Speaker, I checked on this earlier today, and the hon. member never raised that question again. He could very well have contacted the minister or myself, orally or in writing, and we would have been quite happy to supply him with the details or answers requested.

It is further my view, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member could also have looked up the Railway Act. Section 262 compels railways to supply adequate and suitable equipment to accommodate all traffic offered for carriage; it also empowers the Canadian Transport Commission to order a company to discharge that obligation. Further in the same act, he could have found that section 276 calls for compensatory freight rates, which is freight rates exceeding the variable cost of the movement of the traffic concerned as determined by the commission. Still further, the hon. member could have read in section 277 that the Railway Act empowers the commission to conduct an investigation on any rate and disallow any rate it finds not compensatory.

Mr. Speaker, railways in some cases are the most cost-efficient ways of shipping or moving large volumes of goods over long distances, when shipments are made on regular basis. Now the transport of potatoes in New Brunswick is characterized by irregular shipments distributed over a seven-month period and covering only a few hundreds miles. The companies must also dispatch cars at various loading points here and there and bring them back. Under such circumstances, the railways' operating costs are high and it becomes difficult to make available a satisfactory service to shippers. This is why for the past few years we have noted a constantly increasing use of trucking companies which are in a position to provide a more flexible and quicker service at attractive rates.

The Canadian National which carry potatoes on long hauls in New Brunswick can compete with the trucking industry because its large traffic to the maritimes enable them to provide good service and make available enough equipment to producers. On the other hand, the Canadian Pacific carry less goods, except potatoes in northwestern New Brunswick, and they can provide steady service to potato shippers only at very high rates. Canadian Pacific have realized that they cannot cut out the losses incurred on those goods.

ENERGY—CASH INCENTIVES PROGRAM TO PROMOTE DEVELOPMENT OF ALTERNATE SOURCES OF ENERGY

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight pursuant to my motion of February 22 and my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) on March 1 as reported in Hansard at page 3712, which reads as follows:

> In view of the apparent sustained energy problems in motive power that now exist in this country, will the minister and the government devise some form of cash incentives program which could offer national prizes to encourage our inventors and scientists to develop and attain more efficient uses of fossil fuels as motive power and also to develop alternate sources of energy for the same purpose?

The minister's answer that day was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to take that representation under consideration and to discuss the specifics of it with the hon. member.

I am glad that the minister indicated his willingness to pursue this proposition further, and I am pleased and proud to be the prime mover of this action, provided something is done about it soon. As I stand in my place tonight in this House, I am confident that what I propose will be done, if not by this government then by the next one.

The pockets and basins of petroleum in our old mother earth are certainly limited and are of an unrenewable nature. To depend on petroleum with a protracted attitude into the twenty-first century would be a foolhardy policy. Indeed, we are told by those we hire to inform us that we are close to a crisis in supply vis-à-vis consumption. We now talk of rationing petroleum fuel, six-day weeks for automobiles, and laws forbidding Sunday driving. I believe in self-reliance in individuals as well as nations, and I believe we can rely on Canadians to come up with solutions to our fuel problems, if we adopt the right policies nationally. For these reasons I propose that we do what was proposed in my question, that we set up a generous fund, with guidelines, rules and provisions included, which would give certain national cash prizes and cash awards for the accomplishment of certain fuel saving and fuel inventive goals. We would ask our young and old Canadian inventors, entrepreneurs and scientists to work together toward the goals the nation would set up.

My proposition would pay dividends ad infinitum to Canada, and it could be paid for with lottery funds. I feel that this amounts to public incentive to private enterprise, and no policy could be more sound. We have undeniable proof of the worth of this type of incentive. I have looked up a couple of very good references. The first is Lady Houston, who lived from 1857 to 1936. She was a wealthy philanthropist and eccentric. She was referred to in England as the woman who won the Second World War. She donated huge cash prizes to aviation in its infancy at a time when the British government would not do so. The record I have here says the following:

Lady Houston, however, deserves to be remembered for her gift of £100,000 to enable a British team to compete for the Schneider trophy in 1931, when the government had refused the funds. The trophy was won by Flight-Lieutenant George Hedley Stainforth, flying a supermarine Rolls-Royce S6, the direct predecessor of the Spitfires and Hurricanes of the Battle of Britain.

That is why she was referred to as the woman who won the war. The Spitfire with the Rolls-Royce supermarine engine was the greatest aeroplane of its time and was the deciding factor in the Battle of Britain. That is what incentive will do for a nation.

Another example of incentives provided which redounded to the nation's benefit was the work of Lord Northcliffe, born Alfred Harmsworth, who lived from 1865 to 1922. He was a Fleet Street newspaper tycoon. He made many donations, principally to British aviation, the best known being the Harmsworth Trophy for speed records in aviation which made Britain a world leader. When I looked him up, the reference to him says that rewards given—came to be offered later for the first great feats of aviation which followed M. Blériot's first crossing of the Channel in 1909—

He was a famous French aviator.

—£10,000 was won in 1910 by Mr. Paulhan for his flight from London to Manchester and £10,000 in 1919 by Sir John William Alcock (q.v.) and Sir Arthur Whitten Brown for their non-stop flight across the Atlantic—

● (2215)

That shows you what incentive will do when the "carrot" is put out there in front of ambitious people who want to compete and win. I do not see any Lady Houstons or Alfred Harmsworths stepping up here to help with the present problem which confronts us.

We need incentives for inventors to give us more miles or kilometres to the gallon or litre in motor cars. We need more advanced experimentation on carburetion and carburettors. We need to come up with an electric car which, I suggest in my layman's way, will go from Ottawa to Montreal non-stop, or Ottawa to Toronto with only one stop to change batteries.

The field is open for someone to invent a car or truck that burns hydrogen for motive power and that will operate efficiently, safely and economically. We need more experimentation in, and perfection of, the use of methane as motor power energy. We need more attention paid to the fuel cell energy factor, and there are more potential examples of need that can be quoted to you by Canadians who know more about the needs and methods of solution than I do.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

I simply say here tonight on March 15, 1979, that the time is ripe and right for Canada to take the constructive actions I now recommend and to give our young intelligent and scientifically ambitious, aggressive young men and women an incentive to show us what they can do. If we do this, I know that the present generation and those to follow will say that we acted wisely and well. I say to this parliament that keeping this country operating and keeping it together entails many factors, and objectivity is one of the most important of these.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) for his remarks. However, I was surprised to see him bring up that matter in the House of Commons. It is obvious that steps encouraging people to discover new ways of developing the energy required fo mechanical drive, whether it be for driving cars or use in sawmills and other places, is extremely important. The hon. member suggests that a special fund be set up and that considerable amounts of money be awarded those who make discoveries or suggestions for reducing our dependence, as a society and as individuals, on the hydrocarbons whose reserves are limited and will soon run out. The idea is interesting and gives me a chance, Mr. Speaker, to indicate some of the measures which we have already taken in that respect. First of all, the federal government has projects encouraging research varying from the use of the methanol produced when sawdust is burned, the use, its reprocessing of the gas resulting when coal is burned, to the recent subsidies paid the Hydro-Quebec Research Institute at Varennes to encourage the use of a special reactor in nuclear fusion.

Between this first example I gave and the last one in a highly advanced field of power generation technology, there is a whole spectrum of programs funded jointly by the National Research Council of Canada and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in an effort precisely to find new sources of renewable energy and reduce our dependency on oil.

Regarding the reduction of our needs, which is really an effort to avoid waste, incredible efforts were also noted. We should first make people aware of their responsibility as elements of society, in ensuring a more rational use of oil. In a recent experience undertaken in Ontario, it was found that by combining reduced speeds and optimal carburettor adjustments, gas consumption can be reduced by 20 per cent.

These are a few of the concrete measures taken by our government. I would like to add a whole string of them, Mr. Speaker, but I see you are impatient to give the floor to someone else, so I thank you for the time you allowed me.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—FINDINGS BY CSIP—GOVERNMENT ACTION THEREON

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, March 9, I asked a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) regarding the new toothless watchdog which he created, the National Commission on Inflation. Here we have another in the long line of task forces to "study and monitor" inflation but having at the same time either no independence or no power. The government's answer to every discomforting problem which arises seems to be the same: appoint another commission. It either cannot deal with the problems directly, or it is afraid to take action for which it might later be held responsible. The government would rather pass the buck to a commission, hoping that it will take the heat off. Well, it will not take the heat off because Canadian people are not so stupid as to be deceived by this kind of buck passing, this throwing of commissions at problems. Canadians know that with a good government the buck stops on the Prime Minister's desk, and that is what the government will see after the next election.

Since 1969 we have seen five commissions appear, and four of them disappear. First we were given the Prices and Incomes Commission. Then it grew tired and had to be replaced by the Food Prices Review Board. The Food Prices Review Board begat the Anti-Inflation Board which was to impose those controls which the Prime Minister had said would never be. The controls ended after three years, but the government had grown so accustomed to its commissions that it had to create another one. So, the Prime Minister went to Dr. Sylvia Ostry and instructed her to build CSIP, the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, within her Economic Council of Canada. But it seems the Prime Minister made an error in judgment, for CSIP proved not to be the uncritical handmaiden the other task forces had been. Because it was brought into being under the auspices of the Economic Council of Canada, CSIP operated in the same independent, uncompromising way which had characterized the economic council. It would not be an apologist for government policy; it chose to be outspoken and often critical.

Soon after it was created, CSIP proved its refusal to be manipulated. It issued a criticism of the government's wage settlement with letter carriers, attacking it as being excessive and inflationary. Then in October, 1978, it ruffled the government's feathers by its critical assessment of federal dairy policy. CSIP argued, and many agreed, that it did not make economic sense to use taxpayers' dollars to subsidize the overproduction of industrial milk, especially when the milk had to be sold at a loss on the international market. CSIP was being insubordinate to the government. It was behaving like a delinquent child and, like a delinquent child, it had to be disciplined. After all, the government could not have its own commission criticizing the government as aiding and abetting inflation. Thus the government destroyed this troublesome CSIP with its annoying penchant for public criticism, and created another commission, NCI, the National Commission on Inflation.

Why did the government decide to replace CSIP with this new agency? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) claims it was because some firms refused to disclose information CSIP had requested. He did not mention how many, but I will. There were two out of 190, just under 1 per cent. It is clear that, by and large, the companies have nothing to hide in so far as prices, profits and wages are concerned. But can we say the same for this government?

When the disbanding of CSIP was intimated shortly before the announcement on March 2 of the creation of the NCI it was reported that some staffers expressed dismay over the closing of CSIP. Let me quote from the Montreal Gazette of March 6 in which a CSIP spokesman was reported to have said:

> We were on the edge of some really super stuff. Our program was just starting to take shape and in the next three to six months, we would have broken out with some important results.

I would like to ask the minister what will happen to those incipient findings? What will happen to the CSIP studies that were in progress, the studies dealing with structural aspects of inflation and labour force mechanisms, and the study on the Crowsnest pass freight rates? What will happen to the $500,000 in research contracts that CSIP has outstanding? Will they be muzzled and aborted in the same way that CSIP was?

I would also like to ask the minister to explain the mandate of the NCI. On March 9 the Prime Minister told the House that CSIP was not reporting directly to parliament but that it was reporting directly to the Prime Minister. The truth of it is that CSIP was reporting to parliament and the public through the Prime Minister, but he had no control over the content of its reports. Can we say the same for the NCI? Where is the provision in the order in council creating the NCI which specifies that it will report to parliament, unimpeded, in the same way that CSIP did? It is not there; instead we are told that the national commission will be reporting to the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance said in his March 2 press release that the NCI would be making its reports public "when it was deemed advisable". What does this mean? Does it mean that the public release of some reports of the NCI will be deemed "inadvisable" and that these reports will then be kept secret?

My objection to this is twofold, Mr. Speaker. First it is that the appointment of commissions, studies, task forces and review boards has been proven over the last ten years to be a hopelessly inadequate way to deal with inflation. The government must take responsibility for inflation, and the problem should not be dumped on the shoulders of commissions.

The second is the fact that this government kills the commissions it creates before they have a chance to get off the ground. As Mrs. Ostry was quoted in the March 9 edition of the Montreal Star, "What saddens me is that we've been killed just when we were gaining momentum."

The NCI will be done away with in the same way. Its term expires in 1980, just over a year from now. Will the government appoint another commission on inflation then? I am happy to say it will not because the government will be a Progressive Conservative one, and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in initially responding to the comments of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare) regarding the next election let me just say that he should keep a close watch over his own shoulder as the people of St. Boniface rush to restore membership in this House to the Liberal stronghold where it so traditionally belongs.

The hon. member asked what action will be taken to follow up on CSIP's findings in a number of areas. He specifically mentioned CSIP's public statements with regard to food industry profits, dairy industry costs, and CSIP's criticism of the wage settlement with the letter carriers.

In reply I would like to note that the government has replaced CSIP with the National Commission on Inflation in order to monitor prices and incomes more effectively. The NCI will be better able to monitor because it will have powers under the Inquiries Act to require the submission of information.

CSIP had requested the voluntary submission of information from 190 of the largest companies and some of them had expressed their reluctance to co-operate. The government could not give CSIP Inquiries Act powers because such powers were judged to be inconsistent with the mandate of CSIP's parent organization, the Economic Council of Canada. As the new agency responsible for prices and incomes monitoring, the National Commission can be expected to follow up on many CSIP's findings.

Concerning a follow-up on CSIP's comments on food industry profits, I would like to remind the hon. member that Mr. Renouf, the head of the NCI, has already been involved in the question of food industry profits as chairman of the AIB. The AIB has done two studies of food industry profits, the second of which could be seen as a follow-up on the CSIP's comments. The AIB studies have been supported by the more complete information on food industry profits contained in the release of Statistics Canada data on non-financial corporation profits for the first three quarters of 1978. CSIP itself has noted that its original comment on food industry profits had to be revised in the light of the more complete data. Given Mr. Renouf's involvement to date, I am sure that the NCI will have a continuing interest in the profit performance of the food industry.

As far as other studies that CSIP was undertaking are concerned, final decisions have not been made. Some of them may be taken over by the NCI. The terms of reference of the NCI instruct it "through publication of reports . . . to promote understanding of the inflationary process and its implications for the economy". It will be up to the NCI in consultation with CSIP and the economic council to decide which studies should be continued under NCI's auspices. Some other research studies with a much less immediate relation to monitoring may be continued by the Economic Council itself and could eventually result in council publications. Finally, it is possible that some studies could be discontinued if they do not fit in with the research priorities of NCI and the Economic Council.

The hon. member also asked why the NCI is not directly responsible to parliament, as he suggested CSIP was, and why the NCI is reporting to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and not to parliament and the people of Canada. I should first remind the hon. member that CSIP was set up under the direction of the Economic Council at the request of the First Ministers' Conference in February, 1978. As such, CSIP reported through the Economic Council to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and not directly to parliament. The NCI will report to the governor in council, with the Minister of Finance providing the liaison between the two.

According to its terms of reference, the NCI has been instructed to report to the public when it deems it appropriate to do so. It is authorized to publish its reports and the results of its studies and investigation under its own authority. The Minister of Finance has no veto power over what it can make public. The NCI is expected to report publicly on many of the cases it examines, and on more general issues as part of its effort to promote public understanding of the inflationary process.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR DETAILED EXAMINATION OF OPERATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the fact that the federal government undertook five years ago to invest almost $6 million of taxpayers' money on the development and operation of a commercial restaurant, tavern and theatre at 10-12-18 York Street, Ottawa, and in light of the fact that thousands of dollars worth of imported antiques are deteriorating in the basement, together with $50,000 worth of imported wine, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott):

That this House direct the Auditor General to undertake a detailed examination of the management, control and financial accounting practices of the National Capital Commission, with particular reference to the tendering procedures and the development of 10-12-18 York Street, Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That this House notes the tremendous increases that have taken place in the cost of food and clothing, which have a particular effect on Canada's senior citizens, and this House therefore calls on the government to establish a special consumer price index for senior citizens related to the things they have to buy, and also to add a special supplement to the April pension cheques to help cover the severe increases in food and clothing costs announced today by Statistics Canada.

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an urgent and important matter.

As the grants of the National Film Board have been allocated in a punitive fashion with regard to the production of French films at St. Boniface and other Francophone centres outside Quebec, and as the production of films locally is an essential contribution to the cultural development of French minorities outside Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert):

REQUEST THAT BAN ON SACCHARIN BE RECONSIDERED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Of late, the government has taken to flagrant and blatant violation of the operation of our free market economy and has adopted a paternalistic attitude toward the populace. A case in point is the ban on the use of saccharin, Canada being the only country to have done so. This has resulted in the near demise of a number of small businesses providing a livelihood for a large number of communities across Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt):

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR HIGH LEVEL OF INFLATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, the President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. My question centres on the unfortunate 9.2 per cent level of inflation in this country this year as compared to last year.

● (1115)

Would the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council give the House the official government excuse for inflation being so high? Is it because of a foreign problem or a provincial problem? Is it because of the fact that anchovies are not being found off the coast of South America, as Mr. Turner used to say, or is it because the American satellite is very close to Jupiter? Can he give us the official excuse?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in giving excuses with regard to the increases in prices that have been made public today. The hon. member could examine the situation, and he ought to know that the year to year increase is marginally greater than for the previous 12-month period. As the hon. member knows, if he wishes to read the material that has been made available, the principal cause for the increase in the CPI lies in the area of food prices.

He ought to know, as well, that the major component of that food price increase is the very substantial increase during the month in the price of beef. Hon. members spoke in the House on this subject earlier this week and they understand fully that this upward trend in beef prices arises from the normal beef cycle and the decision of producers to withhold sales in order to build up their herds. That is a fact. I have had the opportunity on previous occasions to mention the necessity of this development taking place. That is a fact; it is not an excuse. If the hon. member wants to read a little further, he will understand that the other major component of the increase in food prices relates to fresh vegetables which are imported from other countries.

Those are facts. The hon. member may want to deal in excuses, but I do not. Those are the facts that account for the situation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council, who I think has in fact put the blame for rising prices on the backs of the farmers, which is contemptible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Will he confirm that, in fact, part of the cause of the rise in beef prices in this country is that this government has adopted a cheap dollar policy, which means that Canadians are now paying, on average, about 30 cents a pound more for their beef compared to American prices simply because this government determined it was in Canada's best interest to have an 80-cent dollar?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about an 80-cent dollar.

An hon. Member: Eighty-five cents.

Mr. MacEachen: He must have information that is unknown to the rest of us. Obviously, the price of beef at this time in our market is basically determined by its supply and demand. There is no intention of placing the blame on the backs of Canadian producers who went through a period of low prices, and as a result of that period of low prices we are faced with a decrease in supply. That is the main reason.

As the hon. member knows, as herds are built up, prices will decrease and we will go through, in a sense, a cycle in beef prices with which we are familiar.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I again direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council. Now that the government, through faulty fiscal and monetary steps has saddled us with this type of inflation, will the minister indicate if he thinks it is generally a good idea that grocery chains now propose to sell their goods through the use of credit cards, as is being suggested in Toronto?

● (1120)

Does the minister think that it is a good idea, or does he think it is unfortunate that, notwithstanding the high cost of food, people perhaps are being enticed to use credit cards which may cost them as much as 20 per cent in interest costs alone per year?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, one wonders about the seriousness of the hon. member's approach to questions of this kind in this House of Commons, when he attempts to relate the beef cycle to faulty fiscal and monetary policy.

Mr. Stevens: It is.

Mr. MacEachen: He is drawing a very long bow, and only in his own hallucinatory imagination could that become a reality, because the beef cycle has nothing to do with monetary or fiscal policy.

Mr. Dick: Answer the question.

Mr. MacEachen: It has to do with the forces of supply and demand in the cattle market. The hon. member also asked about credit cards in supermarkets and what I think of the matter. What does he think? I have not formed any opinion on the subject.

PASSING ON OF SALES TAX CUTS TO CONSUMERS

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the super minister and in the absence of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Pigott: —I would like to ask a question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, we are not running the country yet, but we will be here when we are.

Mr. Paproski: In our seats.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton on a question.

Mrs. Pigott: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. They are not running the country, either. My question is to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Industry selling prices for the months of January and February show that the sales tax cut has not been passed on. It is now at 11 per cent. Could the minister explain why the tax cut has not been passed on, because with all his watchdogs he should know?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that the full effect of the reduction in the federal sales tax has not yet fully reached the retail level. It will, and when it does it will moderate the type of price increase which is of concern to the hon. member.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about the 11 per cent increase. Could the Deputy Prime Minister tell us how he feels this 11 per cent increase will affect the goods which will go on the shelves of the supermarkets and department stores? Could he tell us what the effect will be on the index over the next few months?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has referred to an 11 per cent increase. I must say I do not understand to which increase she is referring. I am not aware of an 11 per cent increase in the cost of living either for this month or for year to year.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF CLOTHING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the government, this morning, has been evasive in general about its responsibilities with regard to prices. I have a particular item which was brought to the government's attention three weeks ago. My question is to the Minister of National Revenue.

Considering that price increases in clothing for men, women and children are now at an annual rate of 13 per cent, and considering that more than three weeks ago a group of Canadian clothing manufacturers submitted a brief to the minister which specifically pointed out that Canadian textile companies, "are taking advantage of their tariff and quota protection by pricing up to landed import prices", could the minister tell the House, since he was informed of this matter—I have a copy of the submission which was more than three weeks ago—if he brought this reprehensible practice of the textile companies to the attention of his cabinet colleagues? If so, what action has been taken?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct that a meeting was held with that group. A number of points were discussed with me at that meeting on the whole problem of the potential increase in clothing prices. I am very much concerned that there not be any exploitation of the circumstances surrounding the clothing quotas, or the lower value of the dollar, to impose higher prices on the public.

• (1125)

The point the hon. member raised is not one that we are unfamiliar with—the question has been raised before—but it is a matter of evidence, a matter of inquiry and a matter of investigation. I can assure him that we took the representations very seriously and we are continuing to look into the question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Another "looking into" minister.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, we have another minister who wants to look into the causes of increased prices. The other minister who is out of the House has been doing that for months and we have not had any action. Considering that almost every textile company in the country in the last quarter of 1978 had substantial increases in profits, specifically the Dominion Textile Limited which increased its sales by only 14 per cent in the last quarter of 1978 but increased its profits by 34 per cent, and considering that Canadian clothing manufacturers want something done to bring the price of women's and children's clothing down to a reasonable level, when is the minister going to take some action to bring about rollbacks in unjustified price increases in these areas which have been brought to his attention?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member says that we are "looking into" something, I would point out that he makes many unsupported allegations in this House. If we were to take them all at face value without any investigation, it would be ridiculous.

Mr. Broadbent: Name one.

Mr. Abbott: I could not begin to name them all. His misuse of the improvement in profits figures is another way that he misrepresents the facts. He does not give any background on what the profit picture was at Dominion Textiles a year earlier; whether there was an adequate return on investment or whether they had serious unemployment problems in places like Magog and Sherbrooke. He does not refer to any of that, but they are problems of very real interest to people working in those plants.

The question of whether foreign textiles are being purchased by Canadian manufacturers at a higher price than should be the case, and whether this is imposing on consumers higher prices than they should have to pay cannot be dealt with in the usual superficial manner of the hon. member. We have to examine the facts and ascertain whether a change of legislation or policy will be required. It is not simply a matter of profiteering by other countries; it is a matter of investigating to see whether the circumstances justify a change.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We are simply interested in dealing with unfair increases in prices. For example, other companies in the business sector have brought to the minister's attention the fact that textile companies in Canada have increased their prices to correspond with increases in the prices of Japanese imports because of the declining value of the Canadian dollar. That makes sense for imported textiles, but it makes no sense for Canadian-produced textiles.

According to Canadian manufacturers of clothing, the textile companies are making rip-off profits. Will the minister take some action so that the Canadian consumer may receive some benefit?

Mr. Abbott: Again, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member offers any substantiation for his point that there have been rip-off profits by Canadian manufacturers of clothing.

Mr. Broadbent: Textiles, not clothing.

Mr. Abbott: He spoke of a 34 per cent increase for Dominion Textile, without any reference to their profits a year earlier and whether they were adequate. I simply state that this is a complex question. In 1978, our departmental officials initiated an investigation. Japan, South Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong were notified of the proper, fair market value. As to the Japanese portion of the review, our officials have carried out further investigations but a decision has not yet been made.

The hon. member should realize that these are not easy problems to deal with. The whole pricing apparatus in respect of goods from these countries is extremely complex. For us to act arbitrarily, just because a brief has been brought in, without having the facts would be as irresponsible as some of the statements the hon. member repeatedly makes in this House about increased profits.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST THAT SINGLE PERSONS BECOME ELIGIBLE FOR OLD AGE PENSION AT 60—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When it held its 8th annual convention, the Fédération de l'Âge d'Or du Québec drafted a resolution calling on the minister and the Canadian government to provide old age security pension payments to all single senior citizens between the ages of 60 and 65. Could the minister indicate to us what her position is concerning this resolution and these senior citizens who I feel should be paid this pension?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not see why the hon. member is asking such a question at this time, in this pre-election period, unless he wants me to say that funds are available, when in fact none are. He is aware that I took part in this convention which was held in late September, that several of the resolutions made by FADOQ have been accepted, that the federation supported Bill C-5, which increased considerably income supplement payments for 60 per cent of older Quebeckers, which represents $82 million more for senior citizens in Quebec. But lowering the age of entitlement for needy Canadians from 65 to 60 is unthinkable, at this time anyway.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. I would like to know why they are trying to ignore the issue since that seems to be the general consensus not only among people between 60 and 65 but among all Canadians as well. And I would like to know whether rejection of that demand is due to a lack of money or the fact that the minister did not believe the goods and services industry in Canada can meet the needs of those people?

Miss Bégin: I do not know exactly what the hon. member means by the goods and services industry. If he is referring to private pensions, it is clear those pensions of Canadians are unfortunately very disappointing in most cases. Nearly all of them have no form of indexing to reflect the value of the dollar, and they are not even universal. Of course, there are still many that discriminate against women. They are not portable when the employee leaves his job. From that point of view, there are many things the private sector could be doing to update those pensions. On the government side, as the economic resources of the country are always limited, we are concentrating our efforts on helping most disadvantaged senior Canadians. Such are our first priorities. So I have not rejected the FADOQ recommendation, as the hon. member is suggesting, I simply said that our efforts are going to go where they are most urgently needed. It is very urgent to improve even more than we have done the lot of older people getting the supplement because some of them are still below the poverty level. I will look after those over 65 first.

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON DOMESTIC BEEF PRICES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Is it the position of the Deputy Prime Minister that because the Canadian dollar is selling at a discount, this has no effect on domestic beef prices?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not my position at all. The commodity about which we exchanged questions and answers has a history and a life of its own that may be influenced by the exchange rate, but the main influence comes from the forces of supply and demand.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that beef today is selling at $70 per hundredweight in Omaha and $84 per hundredweight in Toronto, the difference is exactly the difference in the exchange rate. Surely the minister must understand that the depreciation of the dollar is one of the major reasons for the increase in the price of beef in Canada today. It is exactly the differential.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, and I ask him in terms of his previous reincarnation as an economist, is it the position of the government that we can get inflation under control in this country as long as we have a stance on monetary and fiscal policy—I notice the increase in the money supply is 10 per cent, year over year, with real growth at 3 per cent—that leaves us with an exchange rate at 85 cents? I am not talking about pegging the dollar; I am talking about a change in the structure of monetary and fiscal policy to get the dollar up in order to control inflation. Is it the government's position that they need do nothing about that?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked me quite a number of questions—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Answer any one of them.

Mr. MacEachen: —in his statement. I want to tell him that the recent strength of the Canadian dollar, which I am sure the hon. member applauds, will to some extent moderate the force on inflation that arises from imports. It is clear that it will have its effect on Canadian prices. I should advise the hon. member that whatever differential exists between the price of Canadian beef and American beef, that price differential has been registered in an increased movement of American beef into the Canadian market.

With respect to his question on inflation, was it the position of the government that one could contend with inflation entirely through fiscal and monetary policy, it is certainly not my position or that of the government that, in itself, fiscal and monetary policy can counter the forces of inflation. I believe the experience of this country and other countries shows that the harsh application of fiscal and monetary policy in the battle against inflation can be quite counterproductive as a sole weapon; that there are other instruments required as well.

REQUEST FOR PREDICTION OF FUTURE RATE OF INFLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who said he was interested in facts relating to inflation. One fact is, of course, that two or three years ago the government predicted that the rate of inflation by last October would be down some 4 per cent. Unfortunately, it is not.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister indicate what the rate of inflation will be in the coming months? Is it still his position that the rate of inflation is going to settle down, that it is going to reduce, and what does he think will bring this about? Can he give us something firm to go on, in view of the unfortunate predictions and assurances that have been given in the past?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Over the next three months, for example.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would say, first of all, that there are some positive signs. I do not for a moment believe that in the next several months, as the hon. member has requested, the price of beef, for example, will show a noticeable decrease.

We have noted in the past week that the price of fresh vegetables has decreased, according to newspaper advertisements. I know that the price of coffee in the commodity markets has decreased, and that will have some effect on the consumer index. I believe, also, that the strength of the Canadian dollar gives us some reason to believe that inflation may ease a bit. I believe a change in consumer buying and the reaction of consumers to the price and supply situation will have some effect as well. I believe there are some positive signs showing for the next few months, but I certainly cannot give the hon. members any precise indication as to what the rate will be three or four months from now.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I must compliment the Deputy Prime Minister in one respect at least. I think he is being honest: he is not predicting any reduction in the rate of inflation, although he sees some hopeful signs. I do not want to misinterpret him, but in view of the policy of the government which is, as far as one can see, the establishment of a Mickey Mouse surveillance operation, and in view of the position of the Deputy Prime Minister today that while he sees some hopeful signs, he is not able to give the Canadian people any assurance, is it not fair to assume that we have to expect, under this government, the continuation of a rate of inflation around 8.5, 9, 10 or 11 per cent?

Can the Deputy Prime Minister give us any reason to believe that with the policies of this government, or the policies he has described this morning, we can look forward to the return of a sensible degree of stability?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, may I add to the very positive signs I mentioned to the hon. member the fact that the government did, through a ways and means motion tabled by the Minister of Finance, affect the prices of a wide range of imported fruits and vegetables. That will have some effect.

I believe the hon. member is more pessimistic than I would be when he talks about a range of inflation for 1979 of 9, 10, 11 and 12 per cent. That is much too pessimistic in my view. I think our performance will be better than that, because it is better now than the United States. The hon. member will be pleased to note that the year to year, 12-month performance of Canada with respect to the United States is somewhat better, and the performance of the Canadian index is considerably better than the United States in the non-food component. However, we are faced with strong pressures on the food component of the cost of living index for reasons which I have described, which in my view will be moderate for reasons I have also described.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED MOVE OF AIR CANADA FROM HEATHROW TO GATWICK AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many honourable members and many other Canadians are very concerned about the negative impact that the proposed move of Air Canada from Heathrow to Gatwick, in London, will have.

I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs: in addition to the strong and welcome statement made recently by Mr. Martin, the Canadian High Commissioner, will the government back Air Canada and its president, Mr. Taylor, should they decide to deny tendering privileges to United Kingdom suppliers of their intended purchases and any other actions they might be able to take to resolve this issue in favour of Air Canada retaining landing rights at Heathrow?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have said on previous occasions in the House and I have conveyed to the British authorities our wish to keep the issue of Heathrow versus Gatwick separate from any negotiations that might be going on or any other relationship we might have in air matters.

However, I am quite prepared to agree with the conclusions drawn, I gather, by Mr. Taylor and by others who have spoken on this matter, including some members opposite, that if we find there is no willingness on the part of the British government to renegotiate this matter, then obviously it is going to have an effect on the over-all relationship in air matters between ourselves and the United Kingdom.

I want to make it perfectly clear that we are not at this moment threatening one against the other. In other workds, what Mr. Taylor was saying in his speech—and I have no ground for argument with what he said—was that there is a wide range of alternatives open to the government and to Air Canada in the event the British government refuses to co-operate. However, he did not link the two. Consequently, I do not propose to do so formally at this point. I think it is perfectly clear that if there is a failure on the part of the British government to accommodate Canadian interests in this matter, obviously it will have a spillover effect on other matters involving both countries.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The president of Air Canada said that the main leverage the Canadian government has in the Gatwick airport dispute lies in the right of British Airways to operate in Canada. Is this a matter presently under active consideration by the federal government of Canada? Are any contingency plans being considered by the Ministry of Transport in relation to this matter?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the honourable member will appreciate, because he has been very co-operative on this issue, that I have chosen my words this morning quite carefully. We are not formally negotiating and saying that either we stay in Heathrow or such and such a thing will happen. I am most anxious, in the interests of good relations between Canada and the United Kingdom, to deal with the Heathrow issue on its own merits. Consequently, we have not in a sense imposed any threats or any hints of sanctions of that nature in a formal way.

I reiterate the point that if there is no response to this quite reasonable and, I think, fair representation made by our High Commissioner and now by the president of Air Canada, clearly we will have to look at alternatives. That should make it clear to the hon. member that an examination has been made of what are those alternatives. He can be assured that Canadian interests in this matter are being very, very carefully looked at.

I emphasize once again that I still have confidence the British government will recognize that Air Canada was one of the first airlines to use Heathrow, that there is a strong, centuries-long relationship between us and that consequently, as a senior member of the Commonwealth, we deserve better treatment than to be tossed out of Heathrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate the answer of the minister. However, the diplomatic exchange method seems to have failed. Is the Canadian government now considering ways and means to beef up the Canadian arsenal in support of Air Canada in this very important matter?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to acknowledge that efforts have failed. I told the House some time ago, in response to a question by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, that representations had been made at the highest level and that I had obtained an interim response from the foreign secretary, Mr. Owen, which did not slam the door, in effect. It indicated that further negotiations and discussions were going to take place. I hope I will have an opportunity to talk to Mr. Owen in New York when we proceed there for the Namibia talks over the weekend and that I can, indeed, keep this matter under negotiation. In that context, it certainly has not been a total rejection or even a partial rejection of the Canadian representations to this point in time.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—EXPLANATION THEREFOR

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I will direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the CPI increase of 13 per cent in the price of bread over the last few months.

A letter we have from the minister of consumer affairs states that the price of flour is up by 25 per cent. When the wheat subsidy was taken off bread, which amounted to about 3.2 cents per loaf, the price of a loaf of bread went up by seven cents. The subsidy on flour was 22 cents for 5½ pounds. The price went up by 44 cents. Can the minister explain why the market at the retail level went up twice as high as the actual increase in the cost of the raw material, which was flour?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I am almost speechless. This is the first time we have had an honest answer and a short answer from the Minister of Agriculture. He has lost his bull.

In view of the tremendous increase in the price of bread and flour in this country, will the minister try to persuade the cabinet to inquire why the retail price has gone up so much when the price of the raw material was much lower? At the same time, will he try to persuade the cabinet to reinstate the subsidy on bread, milk and flour, which commodities are so vital to Canadians?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I would say, even before the day that tomorrow is going to be, maybe we can have the little people help us, because the hon. member certainly is not helping us. We should have full information on this. The hon. member wants a simple answer to a very detailed question. We know, for example, that if we give our wheat away it will only lower the price of a 32-ounce loaf of bread by 11 cents. All the other costs involved are in relation to production, transportation, distribution and so forth.

We do not hear very much about waste, but I am told that in the large metropolitan Toronto area, well over 100,000 loaves of bread which are not consumed and which become stale are thrown away. They go into either incinerators or the garbage. That is part of the cost involved. If the hon. member wants a more detailed answer, there is enough information that I could go on even until tomorrow.

NATIONAL SECURITY

METHODS AND PROCEDURES FOLLOWED BY SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. As a result of a specific government direction in 1969, certain political groups, including the Parti Québécois and others, became the objects of security service investigation. The first report as a result of that investigation which identified these groups and described them in some detail was described by the Prime Minister as, and I quote, "a damn good piece of work".

Given that specific direction, given government knowledge as to which groups were involved and their nature, did no solicitor general, minister of justice, prime minister or any member of the cabinet committee on security and intelligence ever ask the security service what methods and procedures it was using to fulfil the mandate the government had given it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I cannot really answer the latter part of the question because I do not agree with the premise of the question.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, obviously the Deputy Prime Minister does not agree with sworn testimony before a royal commission established by the government. Giving the benefit of any doubt as to lack of government knowledge—and one would give the benefit of that doubt only because of a series of incompetent solicitors general—what is government policy with respect to senior public servants and their continued employment when such public servants withhold deliberately vital information from the ministers to whom they are responsible?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, more than once in the House the Prime Minister and I have had occasion to express the opinion that it is unwise at this stage to comment upon sworn testimony, even before the McDonald commission. The last time we debated this question we spent a day debating the testimony of a particular witness whose testimony had not even been completed and who had not been cross-examined by any of the other solicitors. It seems to me that that is a very unwise procedure in the House of Commons, and certainly it would be unwise for me to comment upon what the hon. member describes as sworn testimony which to my knowledge may not yet be completed.

The hon. member's first question was based upon the premise that an investigation, as I understood it, had been ordered by the government into political parties of this country, or a political party. I want to assure the hon. member that that is not the case and never has been.

REASON FOR NOT LEASING BUILDING ON YORK STREET

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for the National Capital Commission I would like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board, since he controls the purse-strings.

In light of the fact that the government's $6 million investment on York Street, in Ottawa, is costing Canadian taxpayers approximately $60,000 a month in carrying charges, can the minister explain whether there has been any progress in the move toward leasing this building, a building which has been sitting empty for at least two years? If so, are the terms of the lease now contemplated in any manner different from the terms of the public tender which was let over a year ago?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that is a question to which I do not have a detailed response. I suggest the hon. member should wait and direct it to the appropriate minister.

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I will ask a more general question about the basic principle here. Can the minister give assurances to this House that the full cost of the development at 10-12-18 York Street, in Ottawa, including not only development costs, the cost of rare wines and tapestries and other imported antiques, but also those of interest and other carrying charges will be fully recovered and that no public moneys will be used to subsidize in any way the planned commercial development of that property? That is a question of principle and basic policy.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, again that question should be addressed to the appropriate minister. I am not sure whether this falls under the program of Demonstration Projects which comes within the ambit of Urban Affairs. I know there are certain programs across this nation under which heritage buildings and buildings of that nature are preserved. Under such programs it is not always possible to secure full economic rent. For this and other purposes it is judged that certain buildings should be preserved. Whether that pertains in this case, I do not know, but I reiterate that the question should be addressed to the appropriate minister.

Oral Questions

REQUEST THAT BAN ON SACCHARIN BE RECONSIDERED

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. No other country in the world except Holland has considered rat tests to be sufficient to warrant a ban on saccharin. Smoking and coffee consumption are also suspected causes of bladder cancer, and both are practised more than saccharin use. Saccharin poses no known hazard to human health and, in fact, provides relief to the diabetic.

Will the minister explain why the decision of a handful of bureaucrats has successfully created an aura of suspicion and mistrust to convince the minister to take the harsh decision to ban saccharin, and is the minister willing to review the decision and make an announcement in the near future?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. The premise of the hon. member's question is erroneous and misleading to the public. A handful of Canadian bureaucrats did not make a decision out of the blue sky. The decision was made after a thorough study of scientific reports available to the western world. That was the basis of the Canadian decision close to two years ago. A commission of European communities recently confirmed that the way Canada handled the saccharin question to protect the Canadian public was the best way, given the state of knowledge at that time.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I just want to confirm that Canada is still the only country which has banned saccharin. While the minister is reconsidering her decision, which I presume has already been made, would she take into consideration the fact that a large number of Canadians living in rural areas are inconvenienced by having to travel to distant drug stores to obtain products containing saccharin?

Does the minister not agree that the policy should be to label the contents of products, and not ban saccharin, thereby leaving the ultimate choice of product and price to the Canadian people? The so-called protective benevolence of the government has reached an aggressive level.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, the only answer I will give to that convoluted question is that saccharin is known to cause cancer. Studies of other products which may eventually replace saccharin will continue. Incidentally, saccharin has not been banned; it has been restricted to pharmaceuticals. It is available in pharmacies and is controlled. That is what we have done in Canada. The purpose of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Food and Drugs Act is, surely, to protect Canadians from suspected hazards and risks, and that is what we have done.

Oral Questions

VANCOUVER—TELEVISION RECEPTION OF PROCEEDINGS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. As the minister will know, this House authorized the broadcasting, on a live basis, of the proceedings of the House to be transmitted by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I would like to ask the minister why it is that the CBC was unable, as of three-quarters of an hour ago, to bring this service to the city of Vancouver, and when he might expect that to begin.

● (1200)

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the arrangements which have been made. Of course, arrangements have been made in conjunction with cable companies across the country, and it may be that there is some difficulty in the Vancouver area with finding a cable company interested in availing itself of the services which the CBC is offering. I will look into the matter and report back to the hon. member.

SMALL BUSINESS

LOANS UNDER SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State for Small Business, and it has to do with loans made under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Statistics issued by the minister's department last week tell of drastic increases in the number of loans made in 1978. However, many small businesses in southern Ontario still find that bankers will not make loans under the act. Can the minister say when he will take steps to put teeth into the legislation so that more small businesses can take advantage of this program?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, unquestionably the banks have in the past shown a lack of enthusiasm for the Small Businesses Loans Act, but the statistics last year, considering that the changes were only implemented in March or April, indicate that well over twice the number of loans were made under the act in 1978 compared with the previous year.

A good many more Canadian businesses are applying and qualifying for loans under the act, and I feel sure that if the hon. member encourages bankers in his own area, as I do, to offer the benefits under the act, more businessmen will be able to take advantage of it. The fact is that it is a useful act and that more businessmen and bankers are taking advantage of it every day.

[Miss Bégin.]

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Departmental statistics show an increase last year of over 750 loans in Quebec and over 500 in British Columbia. Yet in Ontario the increase was only 275 loans. Can the minister explain why action is not taken to make these loans equally available to Ontario businessmen who find their applications rejected by bankers who would rather make loans at higher interest rates than those provided by the act?

Mr. Abbott: I do not doubt that when the hon. member offers some numbers, he is drawing them from some source, but I would like to check those figures. I question the figure stated by the hon. member when he says that only 275 loans were made in Ontario under that act; I cannot believe that that is accurate.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—DISALLOWANCE OF STANDING ORDER 43 MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which stems from my motion under Standing Order 43 which I attempted to raise in the House a short while ago, and I do so with all due respect to the Chair. I should like to make, if I may, the following points. First, in dealing with the preamble to the motion which I was not permitted to read, I would say that it was short and could not be ruled out on the basis of being lengthy. It is probably one of the shortest preambles—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member goes any further I have to call to his attention a ruling which I made in the House about a month ago, on February 13, which was, as he knows, a ruling made after a prolonged discussion of motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 and the entire procedure in respect of that. That discussion took place before Christmas and I reserved my judgment on it for a very long time.

As I indicated in the ruling—and I want to quote the specific language which appears at page 3164 of Hansard—there was a consensus on all sides of the House that enforcement of that order should be a little more rigid in order to rule out a number of applications of a certain nature which might be of interest to the House but do not appear to be urgent. On that day I said the following:

> Drawing upon this consensus, I hope members have noticed that since the day of this discussion I have intervened on several occasions to reject applications from both sides of the House which contained inflammatory preambles which are of a purely partisan nature, which lack urgency, and which are frivolous; and even today I set aside one of those applications which came from the government side of the House.

On that day, the hon. member may recall, the application which I set aside was made by a member on the government side to introduce a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43, and the preamble was critical of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and about some speech he had made. I did not permit him to go even so far as to put the motion because, drawing, as I had indicated, on the consensus which appeared from all sides of the House, applications for motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 which relate to some speech made by a member of the House and seek to be critical of it in some way fall on several grounds. In the first place, they are of a purely partisan nature; and in the second place, in my opinion, they totally lack the urgency and the pressing necessity required under the rule. With the consensus of members of the House I intervened on that occasion and on several other occasions.

Later this morning, after the hon. member's application, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) sought to put a motion the preamble to which had to do with the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand). In that particular case it may very well have been that the hon. member's motion would relate to food prices, in which case I would have been obliged to put it to the House. In fact, I listened to the motion and found that it did not, that it related to the absence of the minister on this day. Therefore, I did not put the question to the House, but I had to hear it in order to make that determination.

In the case of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), he referred to a speech made in Vancouver yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to some reports that the Prime Minister, during the course of that speech, had lost his temper. I do not have to go any further to tell him that that is not the proper use of Standing Order 43 and I do not have to hear the motion.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to finish my question of privilege. I think you used the words, sir, that there has been a consensus that motions under Standing Order 43 can be ruled out in some cases if they are inflammatory. May I say with all respect, sir, that in no way was the preamble to my motion inflammatory. I quoted three words from the news services which were widely circulated throughout the country. They were not my words and they were in quotes, but I will not read them at this time. I realize that at one time there was a rule in Beauchesne which stated that members should not quote from newspapers, but I am also given to understand that the latest edition of Beauchesne's rules states that, if former rules were adhered to the fullest extent, it would become impossible to ask almost any question in the House. I do not believe that my preamble could be considered inflammatory.

With regard to the motion itself, as it was not read—I do not think it is possible to judge whether or not it was of urgent and pressing necessity. Had the Chair heard the motion, I could then well understand that the Chair could make a ruling as to whether or not it was indeed of urgent and pressing necessity. In the seven years that I have been in the House—and maybe it has happened on a day when I have not been here—I do not recall a member being cut off before he was at least allowed the privilege of beginning to read his motion to indicate whether or not there is something about it that is out of order.

I only wish to refer, sir, in substance, to what I intended to do, and that was simply to reaffirm, not just that the Prime Minister but that the leaders of all political parties in Canada should be prepared to listen to the youth of this country, to their suggestions and their questions on national issues, without being called "creeps", without being held up to ridicule, and without threats to walk off the stage. That happened yesterday, and I think it is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I would say the same if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had indulged in similar tactics, which I know of course he would not.

May I conclude by saying these few words. We sit in the House for various reasons, not the least of them being to set an example to the Canadian people, and particularly to the younger Canadian people who will follow us and sit here. Therefore, when something is very much out of order in the opinion of one member, regardless whether he is right or wrong, at least he deserves the right to be heard and to express his opinion on the actions of a political leader. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that usually with most members of the House you have a willingness at least to hear the motion before a motion is made—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no need to carry this any further. I have indicated to the hon. member—and I have invited him to check the record—that on several occasions I have done exactly what I did with him this morning. If the hon. member wishes, I can cite specifically the day on which I made that ruling. If the hon. member would like to check the record for February 13, he will see that I did so to a government member who sought, by way of a preamble, to introduce a motion which I believe would have been critical of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I did not regard that as a proper use of the rules; I did not regard his preamble as a proper use of the rules, and I took precisely the same action and the same decision on both occasions. The hon. member has no point of order or question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski).

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, on a further question of privilege—a further question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, on a further question of privilege, which is my right.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, how can you prejudge me?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Point of Order—Mr. Pinard

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, you are prejudiced against the hon. member for Leeds and certain other members of this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre has the floor.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Cossitt: I do not feel I have to sit down, sir.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PINARD—BILL C-42—POSSIBLE LIMITATION OF DEBATE

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct an error.

In yesterday's Hansard page 4215, I am reported as saying:

Let me explain, Mr. Speaker. There are two possible ways to limit the debate under our rules.

Standing Order 33, and a little further on I mentioned S.O. 75A, 75B and 75C and, Mr. Speaker, on the same page, my hon. colleague from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said in English, and I quote:

[English]

What I am saying is that when the government already has the power to allocate time under Standing Order 75, it is inappropriate to put that into a statute.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my point is that we both referred inadvertently to Standing Order 75, which does not apply to the kind of motion for which three days of debate are reserved under Bill C-42. Only Standing Order 33 could apply, because Standing Order 75 with its provision for limits on speeches, only covers public bills, as it is clear from the standing orders.

Therefore, I did not want to mislead the House and I am sure the Conservative House leader had no such intention either when he opposed the three-day limit provided for in clause 11 of Bill C-42, suggesting that such a limit be deleted and reference made to the standing orders. Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 75 does not apply because what is involved in the legislation is "a motion to adopt order" that can be debated for three days.

Because we are dealing with a motion rather than a public bill, there can be no limits to speeches under Standing Orders 75A, 75B or 75C. The only way open to the government, failing that three-day statutory provision would be a formal closure under Standing Order 33. The opposition are asking in advance the government for something quite unusual. They are saying: "Do not set a time limit that would allow us to debate the motion to adopt order in case of emergency. Use closure!"

I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker, that clearly the opposition do not have a serious point when opposing the three-day limit in the legislation. All they want is delaying unduly the legislation, and the only possible way—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am glad Your Honour interrupted the parliamentary secretary because obviously and clearly that is not a point of order. It is an attempt to smuggle in, during the course of a point of order, a question of debate on a matter now before the House.

Mr. Pinard: No, no.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The parliamentary secretary raised objection with respect to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Northumberland- Durham (Mr. Lawrence) which would do away with the arbitrary closure imposed in the terms of that legislation.

Mr. Pinard: The hon. member did not understand.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The parliamentary secretary can participate in the debate, but the fact of the matter is that this is an infringement of traditional parliamentary rights, and he knows it. To smuggle this in, in terms of a point of order, is reprehensible.

Mr. Pinard: It was the correction of an error.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Certainly the correction of an error in Hansard should be confined entirely to that. In the circumstances I must say that today the parliamentary secretary went a great deal further than he needed to correct Hansard.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the question to the House, I might say that I have examined the bill. I have found in some clauses a possibility of an infringement upon the prerogatives of the Crown respecting public expenses. There may be other curative provisions in the bill, but I want simply to file a caveat with the House at this time that I have observed these procedural problems. We have addressed ourselves to them in a preliminary way. While the bill will be read a first time, it is done with the caution, at the time the bill comes forward for actual consideration by the House, that first these procedural matters will have to be examined. They will have to be addressed and a ruling will have to be made by the Chair.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Send it back to the Senate.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia) moved the first reading of Bill S-12 (from the Senate), to amend the National Energy Board Act.

2. Is the Department planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. Departmental budgets and records are not maintained by electoral districts but rather by program or by region. However, officials undertook a special review of all departmental individual grant files by federal constituency for fiscal year 1977-78 and for the current fiscal year up to January 24, 1979. The breakdown of groups funded in the Constituency of Richmond is as follows: 1977-78 Nil.

1978-79 (Up to January 24, 1979)

Name and Address of Organization	Program	Amount	Date Approved
École Tournesol 14 Jeanne Mance Windsor, Quebec J1S 1A3	Open House Canada	$ 1,773	April 5/78
Les Tournesols de Windsor Windsor, Quebec J1S 1A3	Open House Canada	13,383	April 28/78
Richmond High School P.O. Box 1100 Richmond, Quebec J0B 2H0	Open House Canada	5,054	July 18/78
Asbestos Midget Modern Moving Hockey Club 446 St. Roch St. Asbestos, Quebec	Open House Canada	5,510	Nov. 20/78

2. The amounts granted to any region depend on the number and nature of projects submitted from the region which are evaluated according to the objectives and criteria of the Departmental programs concerned, the need of the applicant and the available resources. It is not possible to indicate in advance which projects will be financed in any given area.

DVA—CLIENT SATISFACTION SURVEY

Question No. 1,187—Mr. Herbert:

Is the Department of Veterans Affairs conducting a client satisfaction survey and, if so (a) how many persons are being questioned and how are they selected (b) what is the objective of the survey?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, the Department of Veterans Affairs is conducting a Client Satisfaction Survey.

(a) A questionnaire is being mailed to some 6,400 recipients of War Veterans Allowance and Civilian War Allowance, who are a representative sample of the total recipient population of some 94,000. Clients to be sampled are selected at random from the lists of those who receive the allowance.

(b) The objective of this survey is to obtain the views of clients on how well they are being served by the department. An analysis of the results will enable DVA to concentrate its efforts to improve services on those areas of greatest concern to veterans and their dependants.

MR. McKINNON—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 649

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to enter one of the usual objections at this time. I placed a simple question on the order paper on November 27, 1978, question No. 649. It is almost a one-liner. It reads as follows:

Which department is responsible for granting end user certificates on Canadian arms exports?

It is completely beyond my comprehension that the government does not know what department does this task. If the government does not know, perhaps it could answer the question by saying that they are incapable of answering the question; that the question should not have been put; or they could answer the question by telling me which department it is. Procrastinating for some four or five months on a question as simple as that one indicates a total lack of attention to the job by either the parliamentary secretary or the department.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the only logical explanation is that all questions are treated the same way and that so many questions require some research that it is often impossible to reply to questions which may be simpler than others, and we do so as soon as we receive the answers. I can assure the hon. member that his question will be treated very seriously, but that he can expect certain very normal delays on occasion because, as I have said, there are a lot of questions to answer.

[English]

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the basis of the remarks made by the parliamentary secretary in response to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). His remarks have to be in the category of simply being termed laughable. The fact of the matter is that we only have 80 days left. That is the maximum amount of time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has, unless he wants to break all tradition and precedents in calling the election. He will probably wait as long as he can.

● (1220)

Even on that assumption, on the basis of the performance of the parliamentary secretary regarding questions he has now answered, today amounting to the magnificent total of five or six, with the hundreds and hundreds of questions of a simple nature that are still on the order paper today, they will never be answered. As the hon. member for Victoria has pointed out, many of these questions are straightforward, unassuming and simple enough for the parliamentary secretary to get his mind around. If he continues to proceed in this particular way the people of Canada will have a deep suspicion about the intention of this government to answer legitimate questions, the answers to which the people of Canada have a right to know.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, this unexpected attack is surprising because the hon. member is repeating exactly what he said yesterday. I will simply say that as of March 14, 1979, 538 questions out of a total of 1,318 had been answered for an excellent average of 40.9 per cent, which is quite normal at this stage of a session.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WAYS AND MEANS

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of a ways and means motion to amend the Petroleum Administration Act.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology) moved:

That it is expedient to amend the Petroleum Administration Act to provide that, effective April 1, 1979, the maximum amount of the charge to be imposed, levied and collected on each barrel of oil exported from Canada, in any month be in such amount, not exceeding $15.00, as may be prescribed in a tariff of charges for that month made by order of the Governor in Council.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING INCREASE IN EXPORT CHARGE

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology) moved that Bill C-48, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act, be read the first time and printed.

Mr. Speaker: Since this follows upon passage by the House of a ways and means motion, I presume that the presentation of the bill at this time is with the consent of the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion for first reading can be taken at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed from Thursday, March 15, consideration of Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and motion No. 2 (Mr. Lawrence).

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I had not in any way anticipated taking part in this debate, but I find it necessary, having regard to the way the rights of parliament are being tramped on, to speak and to speak very definitely and clearly. I am very concerned about the way things are going here. Indeed, I will deal with this on Monday. I find it difficult to understand why within the last couple of weeks a motion I made was not referred to in Hansard but was deleted. It was a motion I moved, seconded by my friend, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), which now is a complete deletion from Hansard. If we get to the point where motions made in this House can be deleted because they do not meet with the finer sensibility of those in authority, then this parliament ceases to exist.

I am going to deal with that very clearly and definitely because what is happening here today is further evidence of the way in which parliament is being emasculated by this government. I am referring, of course, to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) in which he asks for the deletion of clause 11(4), which provides that there can be a mandatory allocation of supplies as a result of anticipated shortages, and that there can be an objection raised thereto. Then subclause (4) says:

> At fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the third sitting day following the commencement of consideration of a motion of which notice was given under subsection (2), or at such earlier time as the House of Commons is ready for the question, the Speaker, shall put the question forthwith without further debate.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

What is the reason for that? Yesterday when speaking in Vancouver the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke of creeps. I did not intend to speak today, but when I looked up the meaning of the word "creep', I thought that it aptly described the kind of creeping thing that is creeping into parliament so that more and more this institution is being undermined by a government that has no regard for it.

I was interested in finding the meaning of "creep". I looked it up and found that it is "nervous shrinking or shiver of dread". Certainly the way this government is postponing the calling of an election would indicate that the creeps are over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister why he needs this clause and who produced it. What about the rules as they are now? I am going to refer to them. I have quite a bit of respect for this minister. He was at sea during the days of war, and he is still there in the House of Commons today.

An hon. Member: This is still a war.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to go into particulars of that nature. Is this clause another attempt to trample on the rights of parliament by gagging the members? What is its purpose? The government already has the power to prevent unnecessary discussion. Why does the minister want this additional power? The government has the closure method and used it during the pipeline debate. In addition the government has the guillotine rule, 75C. Why does it need another power? I have been in this House a long time and in the last few months I have seen the greatest degradation of the rights of this institution that I have seen in all those years. What does the Prime Minister think of parliament? We now have identification badges so members can show themselves as belonging to parliament. After all, we remember what he said about us, that members of parliament were so insignificant that when they got 50 feet away from the House of Commons they were nonentities and non-existent.

An hon. Member: Nobodies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the aid of these wonderful badges they will at least be able to show that they are members of parliament.

Now what is this government attempting to do? Should I believe the government when it says: Of course, we just want this power, we are not going to use it? I think of the promises that have been made. During the question period I sent out to get some of the reports of promises that we have had from this government. I think of the questions this morning about inflation and rising prices. I just do not know how it came about that we have inflation, because in a speech of the Prime Minister on May 20, 1968, I find that he said:

> The government is not broke, but the government—if it wants to have a sound dollar—must sustain a balanced budget.

Then he said:

We have a balanced budget and it's going to stay that way—

It is in ways like this that we in the House and the country have been deceived, and this is what causes me to be very suspicious of the explanation concerning this particular subclause.

● (1230)

I could go on and read another promise of the Prime Minister. I have one of his press releases here and this is what he promised:

The government intends to hold down federal government spending and to keep our expenditures in line with our tax revenues. In other words, our aim is to achieve a balanced budget.

The people of Canada were deceived in the last election because they believed the Prime Minister when he said something to this effect: "We will not bring in price and wage controls." The then leader of the Conservative party said that they were necessary. We went down to defeat because the hon. member Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) said what he believed to be the fact. This government lied to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this government any more truthful today when they say that, as far as this clause is concerned, they really do not intend to use it? This parliament is an emasculated parliament. Why is there this rush in these dying days to bring in this particular section? What is the purpose? What is the means? I look across the floor and see the whip of the Liberal party, an intelligent man, and he smiles.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad that his colleagues agree with him because what he is doing is smiling while parliament is being trampled on.

Mr. Railton: I laugh when I hear that from you. I do not smile, I laugh, John.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will be glad to receive any interruptions. I do not see the hon. gentleman here for York East (Mr. Collenette) who was here just a while ago. I was hoping that he would be here, because he spends most of his time in this House saying no to everything we bring in by way of Standing Order 43. I intended to say some very kind words to him. I was raised in York East and I have a very high regard for the people of that constituency. I just hope that they will rectify the mistake which they made when the opportunity comes.

If we give the Government of Canada the power for which they are asking in this bill and the power contained in the referendum bill, we might as well close this institution now. The opposition will cease to exist.

Mr. Railton: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the hon. gentleman saying? I would like to get those precious words.

An hon. Member: He is just mumbling.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the record of the promises which were made in 1974 and 1968 by the Prime Minister, the Liberal party and the members of the government, I can only conclude that anyone who trusts them when they say they are not going to rule in the House of Commons of parliament can only be suspicious and more than suspicious.

Just in passing I would like to mention that I am concerned about something which happened in the last couple of weeks when a motion of mine—

Mr. Gillespie: I think that that is just terrible. I have been watching you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. minister makes his finest contribution with a wave of his marshal hand. That is the most intelligent thing that he does. As a matter of fact, if we were in committee and called an adjournment we would be out, because we would not be able to hang around for a couple of hours until we got the necessary majority.

I am concerned about what is happening. I will go into some detail next week on this matter, but a motion which I had made was deleted from Hansard. It was deleted from the blues because it did not meet with the pleasure of those in charge. Once we reach the point where things which are said in this House and a motion which is made can be removed, then we are in a serious position in so far as this parliamentary system is concerned.

When I see this particular section, I simply ask one question. I am not going to speak at length at all. This parliament is a farce today, held over and over and over. Why? Because, to use the Prime Minister's expression—what is the word he used?

Mr. Mazankowski: Creep.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Creep. This government is afraid of an election. The Prime Minister travels and faces university audiences. I can understand that because there is some intelligence there, and they proved it by their reaction yesterday. Creep, that is what this government is doing. It is bringing forth major matters of legislation at a time when it is expected an election will take place, which has been postponed from time to time by the Prime Minister because he is afraid to bring in a section such as this. It simply places parliament in the position of being a pawn under the control of a majority government. I would have more to say about that were we not waiting to vote on this amendment by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has stood and pointed out the danger. If the minister wanted to establish for himself a reputation for preserving parliament, he would ask those surrounding him to vote for this amendment. For if it is defeated, it is all over. The government can do what it will and pass whatever regulations it chooses, because at the end of three days a vote will take place regardless of the merits or demerits. Already having this power, why does the government want to repeat it? It is this kind of thing which is causing people concern, and they are learning a great deal as a result of TV. They are finding it difficult to understand some of the frivolities. After all, we are always serious in the House of Commons or we would not last very long. A sense of humour one must have, but across this country today people are asking themselves: "What is the attitude of this government? They give us answers that are not true."

I have had questions on the order paper since November 12 and November 22, I believe, which have not been answered. They are perfectly simple questions. The only reason that they are not answered is that the government is afraid of what the answers will be and that they will as a consequence be embarrassed. Trust cannot be built in this House of Commons that way. Parliamentary underlings cannot be deciding what questions shall or shall not be asked.

I asked another question, I believe around February 15 or February 20, which will be of interest to hon. members from Quebec, about how Levesque got the Legion of Honour. It is just a question because I see a nice relationship between Levesque and his former pal, the Prime Minister. Why do we not get an answer? I asked the Speaker in a letter to do something, and he said that there was nothing he could do. Yet the other day in the House I found out in consequence of an admission that he had informed the CBC that only certain selective things can be placed before parliament.

Another example is the Treu case. Treu was treated like a reprobate. What about "Go-go-Goyer"? We paid out $10,000 for that matter without any justification whatever. I am simply pointing out—and it is as disturbing to me as it is to all Canadians—that we have come to the point where we cannot believe anything which this government says. It either refuses to answer when it will be embarrassed, or the answers which it gives are given with a total disregard for the facts.

I simply ask of the minister that he establish for himself a record of an appreciation of parliament not by wave of the hand but by simply saying, "We do not need the power, we are not going to push it through and we will simply permit this subsection (4) in the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham to be accepted." If he does that he will do more for parliament than anything else he could possibly do. He could at least show that he has a respect and an appreciation for parliament and that he does not intend to ride rough-shod over an opposition that produces an amendment to a provision which he does not need. If he does not need it, why does he ask for it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would allow a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no objection to questions, but we are trying to get questions answered by the government now. I hope she will be more successful in any that she asks.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The right hon. member did not accept the question.

An hon. Member: Yes, he did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I will.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, a few seconds ago I was watching the electronic Hansard and I thought I heard a few references made by the right hon. gentleman to some deletions from the blues of Hansard of a motion he had purportedly made some time last week. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would elucidate and tell us exactly which motion was eliminated from the blues of Hansard.

The right hon. gentleman has been around for a very long time and has been most welcome in this House, but what he is imputing and the impression he could give to the voters of Canada, as I know he will understand, is very, very serious. I wish he would elucidate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the question is a reasonable one and a responsible one. It had to do with a motion that was made in this House, moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

The proper procedure in connection with motions under Standing Order 43 as I understand it is this: it does not require a seconder when it is made but once it is accepted by the Speaker then the motion takes place. I said that the Speaker, without giving me any opportunity at all, announced that it had been moved by me and seconded by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). I rose and said it was not seconded by him, that it was seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville. When that did not appear on Hansard, on the blues, I wrote underneath what had happened, clearly and definitely. The motion, I said, was moved by me and seconded by my hon. friend.

That is the point that I strongly object to, because if we get to a point where motions that are made here can be deleted because they do not meet the finer sensibilities of those who today are in office, then we have ruined parliament. I have to answer the question.

Mr. Pinard: Who are you accusing?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pinard: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like the right hon. gentleman to state clearly, if he has a little courage, who he is accusing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the hon. member grows older and more intelligent, he will realize the answer to that question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Disrespect.

Mr. Pinard: You want us to respect that?

Some hon. Members: Chicken.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would invite hon. members to give me a chance to speak. Taking into account the previous remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker); the question put by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and the answer, I think the only conclusion I can come to is that Mr. Speaker will himself look at the transcript of what was said today and will be in a position to judge whether or not there was any reflection on the Chair. I am not at this moment ready to pass judgment.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The House will now consider motions Nos. 3, 4 and 6. As suggested by Mr. Speaker, these three motions are to be debated together. It was suggested that a vote on motion No. 3 dispose of motions No. 4 and 6. If there is agreement I shall put these motions in front of the House, starting with motion No. 3.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham) (for Mr. Baldwin) moved motion No. 3:

That Bill C-42, an act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be amended in Clause 12 by adding immediately after line 35 at page 9 the following new subclauses:

"(7) If any order is not laid before parliament in accordance with the provisions of subsection (6) of this section, it shall be void and of no effect as if it had not been made.

(8) Notice of a motion to disallow an order may be given in the Senate, and shall be debated in the Senate on the next sitting day as the first order of the day and brought to a vote before the next two sitting days if not earlier disposed of.

(9) If the House of Commons, in pursuance of a motion of which notice has been given within twenty-five sitting days after any order has been laid before that House, passes a resolution disallowing that order or any part thereof, any order or part thereof so disallowed shall thereupon cease to have effect.

(10) If at the expiration of fifteen sitting days after notice of motion to disallow any order or part thereof has been given in the House of Commons, being notice given within twenty-five sitting days after the order has been laid before that House

(a) the notice has not been withdrawn and the motion has not been called on; or

(b) the motion has been called on, moved and seconded and has not been withdrawn or otherwise disposed of the order or part thereof specified in the motion shall thereupon be deemed to have been disallowed.

(11) If, before the expiration of fifteen sitting days after notice of a motion to disallow any order or part thereof has been given in the House of Commons

(a) the Parliament prorogues or dissolves; and

(b) at the time of the dissolution, or prorogation, as the case may be

(i) the notice has not been withdrawn and the motion has not been called on; or

(ii) the motion has been called on, moved and seconded and has not been withdrawn or otherwise disposed of the order shall, for the purpose of subsections (9) and (10) of this section, be deemed to have been laid before that House on the first sitting day of that House after the dissolution, expiry or prorogation, as the case may be.

(12) Where an order or any part thereof is disallowed, or is deemed to have been disallowed, under this section, the disallowance of the order or that part thereof shall have the same effect as a revocation of that order or part thereof."

Mr. Lawrence (for Mr. Baldwin) moved motion No. 4:

That Bill C-42, an act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be amended in Clause 13 by adding immediately after line 7 at page 10 the following new subclauses:

"(4) Any Order of the Governor in Council adding any alternative fuel and establishing mandatory allocation thereof shall be laid before parliament forthwith upon the making thereof, or if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the next fifteen days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

(5) Subsections 12(7), (8), (9), (10), (11) and (12) apply with such modifications as the circumstances require to an order made under subsection (1)."

Mr. Lawrence (for Mr. Baldwin) moved motion No. 6:

That Bill C-42, an act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be amended in Clause 19 by adding immediately after line 13 at page 15 the following new subclause:

"(3) Subsections 12(7), (8), (9), (10), (11) and (12) apply with such modifications as the circumstances require to an order made under subsection (1)."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I crave the indulgence of the House in speaking on behalf of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who is absent on House business. I appreciate the tolerance and patience of members in permitting me to move these motions in his name and in his place. We all know the very just reputation the hon. member for Peace River has established in and out of this House as a prime mover and promoter of more open government. He is one who has devoted a great deal of his public life to the attempt to ensure that accurate information is available not only to members of the House but also to the public at large. He strives to ensure that when this House passes bills or motions or resolutions, it knows what it is talking about. Quite frequently he has made the argument, and it has been a just argument, that on many occasions the information is simply not readily available.

Another crusade he has had in his public lifetime is to make sure that orders in council and other policy directives and measures of the government are presented and made public so that they can be debated in this House. On many occasions there are parliamentary manoeuvres, sometimes based upon the rules and sometimes not, which simply do not permit this.

In this particular case the hon. member for Peace River is perfectly justified in proposing this series of amendments. His purpose is based on the fact that he believes, and I agree with him, that this particular bill gives very dangerous powers to the executive which ought to be subject to parliamentary scrutiny. This is the purpose of the government, in some small measure in any event, in relation to the whole series of clauses within the bill which require that the order in council declaring the national emergency be tabled and released for there to be a debate in this House, even though it will be a severely limited and truncated debate, the maximum time of which can only be three days under the provisions of the bill itself.

I think we all agree with the hon. member for Peace River who has said in the past that parliament has been too sloppy and too lax in giving authority away without any recourse. Clause 11 of this particular bill deals with the declaration of an emergency by cabinet. Clause 12 deals with the development of the controls programs. Clause 13 deals with the method of amending the program of controls and clause 19 deals with the rationing program of controlled products.

The amendments before the House for discussion would not prevent the government from passing its orders or acting on controls, but it would compel the government to be far more particular and careful in developing these programs which it would deem to be essential and acceptable. Under these amendments the government would have to be prepared for a possible motion of disallowance.

The thrust of these amendments is to turn the onus around so that the program, the allocation order, the order in council, is not valid unless it is presented to the House within certain times as specified. If it is not presented to the House and if it is not passed by the House, then it is disallowed. This is a complete change from the provisions now before the House. Under such a motion, if these amendments carry, the government would have to be prepared to justify and explain to the House why they are making these orders.

It would also make good sense, if there was a motion for disallowance, to refer the order to the energy committee, which should be given the time, even if the government deems it be limited, to dig up the facts and to shift through the information, and also possibly to call witnesses in respect to a matter which could be fairly technical. All regulations made under clause 16 and clause 20 will appear before the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments so that they will be scrutinized.

I would like to refer to one other matter briefly. Motion No. 4 deals with a particular amendment. There is a potential problem area relating to the definition of "alternative fuel".

[Mr. Lawrence.]

Although clause 13(2) states that the act applies when an alternative fuel has been added to the compulsory allocation scheme, it also declares in the next phrase that the act applies——with such modifications as the circumstances require—

This factor, combined with the provision relating to alternative fuels coming after the tabling requirements of sub-clause 12(6), quite possibly allows an interpretation of the bill by the government whereby an amendment to the allocation program by the governor in council relating to natural gas or other alternative fuels may be exempt from presentation in parliament.

I suggest to the House that, taken as a whole, this is probably not the intent of the minister or of the government, or indeed the intent of Bill C-42, but it might be open to such a legal interpretation. Therefore, I suggest that a re-examination of this whole provision is desirable by the government. That is why I am moving motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River. I do this especially in view of a similar provision in the old 1974 Energy Supplies Emergency Act, which in section 13(2) specifically stated that the provisions of the act applied mutatis mutandis to alternative fuels, designated controlled products. I suggest the wording of the old act is far more precise and less subject to argumentative interpretation.

To sum up, subclause 12(6) requires regulations made pursuant to the legislation to be tabled forthwith in parliament. There is no such requirement that regulations of a similar scope made pursuant to clauses 13, 14 or 15 be laid before the House, and these amendments in part will rectify what I and the hon. member for Peace River consider to be a very serious omission. I am sure they fall within the intent of the minister and of the government. I am sure they fall within the intent of the drafters of the bill. In my opinion, it is a serious omission which should be rectified, and these amendments attempt to do just that.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to the statements made by the hon. member opposite in some detail. This is a complicated area. There are three amendments that are interrelated, and indeed they relate as well to the previous amendment, motion No. 2. In view of the hour, I would ask Your Honour's indulgence to call it one o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and motions Nos. 3, 4 and 6 (Mr. Lawrence, for Mr. Baldwin).

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like briefly to address myself to the three amendments standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). There has been lengthy discussion on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), and in that discussion the concern expressed by the opposition was that parliament would not have a sufficient opportunity to consider the declaration of an emergency for the purpose of this legislation, nor would it have an opportunity to approve such a declaration, which declaration would call upon the energy supplies allocation board to establish a mandatory allocation program.

I think it has been shown that the measures taken by the government in providing three days for debate are better than the alternative of using Standing Order 33 suggested by the opposition House leader, which would require two days. There was some reference by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the possibility of using Standing Order 75C. The advice I have received is that that particular measure would not be available to us and that Standing Order 33 would have to be used, which in an emergency one would anticipate would provide only two days of debate, not three.

Throughout this debate with respect to these amendments and the rights of parliament there has been a very obvious misunderstanding on the part of the opposition with respect to the nature of an emergency and the ways by which parliament and, indeed, the government of the day, must deal with such an emergency. There has been little recognition that in an emergency a government must deal and must be able to deal with a sure hand. It cannot contemplate weeks of uncertainty. That would be the effect of these three amendments. If adopted, they would introduce weeks of uncertainty at a time when an emergency had been declared and when a mandatory allocation program was being established.

Amendments to that mandatory allocation program would be approved by order of the governor in council. The review process which the hon. member for Peace River wants to put in place would introduce an extraordinary element of inflexibility in amendments to the mandatory allocation program described in clause 12(4) on page 9 of the bill. It would have the effect of introducing uncertainty at the very time when we would want to introduce certainty into an extremely complicated administrative process. It would be a complicated process because it would be dealing with energy which includes crude oil products and the energies associated with that which pervade the basis of our economy. It would deal with the production and consumption parts of the process.

Hon. members will realize that a mandatory allocation program which the energy supplies allocation board would have to produce would deal with such things as designating the regions in which the program would operate. I am referring now to clause 12(2) of the bill. A mandatory allocation program would designate the regions in which the program would operate, if it was not to operate in the whole of Canada. The program would specify the petroleum products, the supplies of which would be controlled under the program. It would set out the priorities of use of the controlled product.

Clause 13 deals with the allocation of alternative fuels. The mandatory allocation program would deal with a number of basic elements, regions, geographical areas, products, alternative fuels and priorities. There are three levels of priorities, and those priorities have been established through discussions with the provinces, but it is quite possible that there could be a large number of amendments to the mandatory allocation program as a result of representations by, for example, the provinces, consumer groups, producer groups or transportation groups.

If these amendments were to be adopted, their effect would be to hamstring significantly the ability of the energy supplies allocation board to deal with amending orders in a way which would introduce a degree of certainty and a sense of urgency and speed in dealing with the whole question of a highly complicated area in which literally thousands of individuals, businesses, institutions, corporations and separate legal personalities would be involved. I would have thought that hon. members would be anxious to reduce uncertainty and to confine as much as possible the time frame in which decisions could be upset, delayed, postponed or interpreted. It is for these reasons that the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Peace River fail to move me.

There is one point I might just add, and it has to do with the first part of motion No. 3. Motion No. 3 would add a seventh subclause dealing with an order approving or amending a mandatory allocation program. The proposed subclause reads as follows:

If any order is not laid before parliament in accordance with the provisions of subsection (6) of this section, it shall be void and of no effect as if it had not been made.

The force of that proposed subclause is that it would require action by the government within several days to table before parliament the particular amending motion or amending order. If the government did not do so, the order would have no legal effect. I cannot complain about that particular provision, and I would not object to it if that were the nature of the whole amendment, but it goes much further than that and introduces, as I have said, a whole series of measures and provisions which could delay the certainty of a decision by many weeks. Clearly, in an emergency—and it would be a national emergency, as defined in the legislation, related to energy and security of supply—it would not be in the public interest to accept an amendment which could have the effect of hamstringing the administration of an emergency program. For that reason I will vote against the amendment.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendments in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and I want to thank the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) for presenting these motions on behalf of the hon. member for Peace River.

The minister has pointed out that the effect of these amendments would be to create uncertainty and, to use his words, an element of extraordinary inflexibility and to hamstring the board. I think the minister failed to back up his statement. He made the statement and left it at that.

As has been pointed out by other hon. members who have participated in this debate, if there is a real emergency and not a phony one, parliament in its wisdom would surely act decisively. There would be no reason for it to do otherwise. What these amendments do is insert a check and a balance in the system which really are very fundamental to our system of parliamentary democracy. I think we would do well to take heed of the significance of these amendments.

As my colleague the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has pointed out, the hon. member for Peace River has had a long and distinguished career in this House. He has provided a long and distinguished service to Canadians and he has been a watchdog of parliament. He has been constantly vigilant of the importance of our system of parliamentary democracy—and we know that there have been erosions. It is only natural that majority governments, in their wish to pursue certain pieces of legislation with vigour and enthusiasm, tend to ignore and to trample upon the rights and traditions of parliament.

In this particular case, albeit we are dealing here with an emergency, I think it is incumbent upon us all to recognize the fact that we should not be too eager to ignore the traditions of parliament and the requirement to be constantly vigilant in dealing with matters of autocratic governments or governments which wish to superimpose their wishes upon the Canadian people. This really is a protective device.

The debate that has been going on here centres around the measure wich incorporates legislative closure. I think that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham deserves to be highly commended for his concern in this matter. The amendment we have been dealing with here has provided some stimulating debate and given incentive to stimulating thoughts in terms of the preservation of our system of parliamentary democracy. At any time use is made of the guillotine rule to stifle debate, our liberties and freedoms are weakened and trampled upon.

The important thing for us to remember when we are dealing with an emergency such as this is that although there is a role for the government, there is also a fundamental role for parliament, and parliament must be supreme in the final analysis. What has concerned many members in this debate is that the government's record vis-à-vis its policy of rule by edict is pretty dramatic. When we look at the record of orders in council which have been passed in the last three years—we all know that orders in council are a necessary and important part of our system of government—and when we look at the number that have been published, we find that an inadequate safeguard has been provided for parliament and for the Canadian people.

For example, in 1976 there were 3,326 government orders in council passed, of which only 653 were published or made known to the Canadian public. In 1977 there were 3,746 government orders in council passed, of which only 860 were made public; and in 1978, almost 4,000, or 3,973 government orders in council, were passed and only some 812 were published. What we are saying here is that we have been subject in this country to being governed by government orders in council.

This is a very important debate and I am sorry the government sees it as one needing to be rushed through. We know that this is legislation to deal with an emergency, but the implications of this bill are very important from the standpoint of the energy resource industry and are very important from the standpoint of its impact upon the traditions of parliamentary procedure. The spirit of this debate has centred around those two points.

Government members have attempted, during the course of this debate, to pay more attention to justifying the existence of Petro-Canada than to dealing with the central part of this legislation. Hon. members opposite must be really nervous because at every opportunity they try, in an inadequate fashion, to make a case for Petro-Canada, to make Petro-Canada the central issue, and in so doing are likening themselves to the NDP. If this had come from the corner of the House to my left, I would not be surprised, but to see government members so preoccupied with their favourite state enterprise, namely Petro-Canada, really overwhelms me.

I see present the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) who hails from the city of Sarnia. I am surprised that he and his community, which has survived and contributed to Canada through its industry and petrochemical plants without the existence of Petro-Can, has to be such an ardent supporter of this.

As I said, in taking that position they prove they are no different from the NDP. It also confirms that they believe in government ownership as the first resort rather than as the last resort. They have also demonstrated throughout this process that when they speak of ownership, what they really mean is government ownership. They believe that Canadian ownership can be best achieved through government ownership. That is the central issue here and the cut and thrust of the debate which has emanated from that side of the House.

I think, as has been pointed out, that there is no crisis here. It is a fabricated crisis, sparked by a cutback of 100,000 barrels of oil from Iran, an amount which is equal to the production of one heavy oil upgrading plant or one additional tar sands plant in this country, an amount which could be met by the availability of the shut-in surplus which is presently available in the province of Alberta if we had an adequate delivery system. But such is not the case, thanks to the inadequacy of, and lack of leadership from, this government and successive ministers of energy.

This bill was ostensibly brought in to meet an emergency situation, but what we have here is the opportunity for government members to do some flag waving in favour of their most favourite state enterprise, Petro-Can. In the course of this, they set out to mislead Canadians into believing that all is well and secure so long as Petro-Canada is here.

As I said earlier, the authoritarian powers contained in this bill are of concern to us all. What I think is of concern as well is that it puts the federal government in a position to lasso provincial energy resources, if this can be done, in a real or imaginary crisis, because the powers are so broad.

Third, the presentation of this bill at this time is, in my view, a blatantly political move. The tactics which are now being used by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by other leading spokesmen of the Liberal party are spreading fear and division in this country as a result of this so-called energy crisis. Clearly it is not in accordance with the facts to suggest that it is not a political gesture or move. It was even suggested in an article that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) agreed with this statement:

It is a bill which the Liberals intend to flourish during the election as a substitute for the energy policy they failed to develop in the seven years since the Arab boycott.

The article continues as follows:

Justice Minister Marc Lalonde admitted as much—for the Montreal media which he perhaps thought would not penetrate to the rest of Canada—when he described it as a good election plank.

We have a government which is using energy to promote its own political advantage. That is shameful and disgusting.

An hon. Member: From what are you quoting?

Mr. Mazankowski: The quotation came from the Globe and Mail article entitled: "Tyrant in Ottawa". It began as follows:

The Energy Supplies Emergency Act is a bill produced by the federal government under false pretences.

Mr. Cullen: Who is the author?

Mr. Mazankowski: The article appeared in the Saturday, March 10 edition of the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Cullen: What is the author's name?

Mr. Mazankowski: I am sorry but the article does not show the author.

An hon. Member: The Globe and Mail is afraid to put a name to it.

Mr. Mazankowski: Hon. members opposite quite frequently refer to the Globe and Mail when it is to their advantage.

An hon. Member: It is a Tory paper.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am not sure it is a Tory paper. I always thought it was a Liberal paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I think there is a clear provision in the rules of the House that when a member quotes from a newspaper he has to accept responsibility for what he is quoting. I think the traditions of the House are very clear on that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, certainly I am glad to acknowledge the point made by the hon. member. The document from which I am quoting appeared in the Saturday, March 10 edition of the Globe and Mail. It is entitled: "Tyrant in Ottawa." I am not sure what else the hon. member wants. Whether I am taking responsibility for it or whether the Globe and Mail is taking responsibility for it, when a member quotes from a newspaper article in the House he must identify simply the source. The source in this instance is the Globe and Mail. If Your Honour has a different ruling, certainly I will accede to it.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, could we hear the view of the Chair to see if it is correct that when a member quotes from a newspaper article, he has to accept responsibility for what he quotes?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Breau: I do not have Beauchesne's in front of me, but clearly that is a tradition of the House.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am not sure whether Your Honour will rule on this matter, and I am not sure what the hon. member is implying when he suggested that I should take responsibility for this article. It is an article which has been published widely. I think it is worthwhile repeating. I am doing that for the obvious benefit of the hon. member who perhaps may find the statement will broaden his intelligence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not in a position to answer the point raised by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau). I have attempted to identify some citations, but my first impression is that the point made by the hon. member is more related to an unidentified document than an identified one. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has identified the document. Unless I find another interpretation, the impression I have given at this time is adequate.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to table the entire article and newspaper; it could be appended to Hansard. It does not make much difference to me, but I think what Your Honour really said in handing down your decision is that the intervention by the hon. member for Gloucester was very silly. He should know better; he has been in the House since 1968. I am surprised at his very frivolous point of order.

Another point I should like to make flowed from the mouth of the honourable member for Gloucester last night. The bill has given members opposite an opportunity to attack the premier of the province of Alberta. That is really unjustified. The one-price system for petroleum products has been referred to by the honourable Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). It is a system for which the government takes credit, but I should like to point out that the one-price system in effect takes away from revenues which normally would accrue to the province of Alberta. Whether we like it or not, something in the order of $14 billion to $15 billion has been relinquished by the citizens of Alberta as a result of the one-price system. That generous approach was referred to by the honourable member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) when he spoke yesterday.

It is important to recognize that this measure has been condemned by the producing and consuming provinces. The province of Ontario referred to it as a form of War Measures Act. In his attempts to divide and conquer, the Prime Minister suggested that Alberta and Ontario cannot agree on anything. But one matter which the two provinces have agreed upon is the position they take respecting this particular bill. Once again the Prime Minister is resorting to the same old tactics: divide, conquer and confrontation. The Prime Minister has made a career out of his policy of confrontation, dividing and attempting to conquer. As a result Canada has been victimized by those actions. In effect, the bill gives the government an opportunity to use that device once again. It sums up the total substance of the government's energy policy over the last 11 years. This bill will further the confrontational tactics within the country. At the present time there is confrontation with the private industry and the provinces. If it was not Exxon, some other company would have been involved.

The problem is that the premiers of the provinces simply do not trust the government or the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. They did not trust the minister's predecessors either. Really that is what is wrong. Certainly spirited leadership has been lacking from the minister and the government. Through some spirited leadership I think it is possible that we could bring together the producing and consuming provinces. We would lay the groundwork for a sensible and rational method of resolving our energy problems. There seems to be a pathological envy for the resources which lie under the ground in Saskatchewan and Alberta in the minds of the government, particularly in the mind of the Prime Minister. The government is prepared to forgo Canada's ability to have a secure and adequate supply of energy because of the envy it holds for the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The government is concerned about the growth of the heritage trust fund. I should like to tell the House something about the fund. It is being used for the benefit of Canadians and for the building of Canada. There is evidence of this in terms of the loans which have been made to other provinces and the agreement of the government of Alberta to go ahead with the development of a port facility in Prince Rupert. Also there is evidence of this in terms of the fund's leadership in the area of medical research.

I could go on and on, but I simply implore the Prime Minister not to deny Canadians an adequate and secure energy supply simply because of his envy and dislike for one province. What is wrong is that there has been a lack of leadership, policy direction and action. The reason there is an inadequacy today is the government's ineptness and incompetence. Petro-Canada will not turn the situation around.

● (1440)

If we look at a document entitled "An Energy Strategy for Canada", under the "Chronological Listing of Policy Initiatives, 1973-1976" we find for January 1974 the following:

> The federal government announced a policy of an all-Canadian coast-to-coast pipeline network to develop self-reliance in oil and details of the Interprovincial Pipeline extension to Montreal.

That was the announcement back in January 1974, but we are no further ahead in the development of that Canadian coast-to-coast pipeline today that we were then, over five years ago. That quotation is from page 152 of that document, Mr. Speaker.

We know that the interprovincial pipeline connection to Montreal has been completed, but there has been a constant campaign by IPEC, starting in June 1966, with more pleas in 1969 and representations by provincial governments in the 1970s in this regard; but the government's response has been nil.

I mentioned earlier that one heavy oil upgrading plant would meet the deficiency we are now dealing with which really triggered the introduction of this piece of legislation. We are talking about a vast quantity of energy resources regarding heavy oil supplies. It has been estimated that there is something in the order of 30 billion to 40 billion barrels of heavy oil in place in the province of Alberta, with perhaps an equal amount in the province of Saskatchewan, and that does not take into account the tar sands.

Since the OPEC crisis in 1973 we have had one tar sands plant put in place, we have had the pipeline extension and we have had Petro-Canada. I congratulate the minister for his interest in heavy oils. He did come out to Lloydminster to see this at first hand, but until that visit I am sure he never really realized the potential of heavy oil.

This is really where we stand: we do not have the kind of imaginative and challenging leadership we need. That was really evident, and it is still evident because there really has been no progress made to upgrade heavy oils in order that they can be fed into our light crude refining facilities.

I see that my time is up, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae).

An hon. Member: Oh no.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to make two or three very short comments. I want to deal with some of the questions the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) posed in the last few minutes but will do so later at the third reading stage. I would like to comment now on two or three things mentioned by the last two or three speakers, particularly by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). That hon. member asked the minister a long series of questions, most of which were dealt with in the committee. They were the kinds of questions that should be dealt with at that stage.

However, it is very interesting to note that when this bill was at the committee, as far as I can discover, having attended most of the meetings and read the transcripts of the proceedings, there was not a single Atlantic provinces Tory member present to put forward the concerns of the Atlantic provinces. Basically speaking, we were dealing with the interests of the west, Alberta and British Columbia, represented by members on the Tory side at the committee, and Ontario. There may have been someone who crept in at some particular point—

Mr. Lawrence: We were there speaking for Canada.

Mr. McRae: I am concerned with the kinds of comments made by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think this is a very genuine point, Mr. Speaker. First of all, by tradition of this House we do not permit members of this House to reflect upon the motives or lack thereof of members, or whether or not they were at the committee. I should point out to the hon. member, who really was not that constant in his own attendance at the committee, that there was at least one member from Halifax, and one member from Newfoundland, both Conservative members, who were in constant attendance at these committee meetings. I think the hon. member should withdraw the implication of what he has just said.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. McRae: I will not withdraw until I see the names in print. I was at most of the meetings, certainly last week and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member will just allow me to make a comment. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has made a valid point with which I agree. Hon. members are prevented by the rules from reflecting on the motives or conduct of their colleagues in proceedings of the House. I am not in a position to decide about something that happened in committee. I am sure the hon. member did not intend to do that for which he has been reproached by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. Perhaps he will explain his comment or modify it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No, this is another point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have invited the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) to perhaps modify his remark, and that maybe would solve the difficulty.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this may have occurred during a fuss that was taking place in the House, but in defence of the hon. member I wanted to point out that I thought he had said that he withdrew the remark.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, he said he would not.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I will accept the ruling of the Chair and withdraw the remarks if I am not allowed to discuss or make comment in the House about whether members, collectively and generally rather than as individuals, were at committee meetings. If that is the case then I withdraw the remark. I would not withdraw the remark on the basis of its being inaccurate, but rather on the basis that I was not in order in making that kind of a statement.

I should like to comment on one aspect of the remarks of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East having to do with the difference between heavy and light crudes. He made a fair comment, a reasonable objection and expressed fair concern. I do not know whether it has been mentioned by the minister, but the dealings with Venezuela are in respect of light crude. I understand that as a government we are looking, along with the Mexicans and Venezuelans, at problems in respect of heavy crude, but certainly in terms of the Exxon loss and making up that loss we are talking in terms of light crude that we can handle in our refineries.

Perhaps I should leave the rest of my comments until third reading. At that point I would like to take exception to the announced policy of the Tory party to move an additional large quantity, perhaps 300,000 barrels, of crude to the east via a reinforced pipeline between Manitoba and Sarnia.

Let me conclude by saying that, as I understand reserve figures, at our present rate of 315,000 barrels a day we can sustain that movement until 1983, and that after 1983 there will be a decline. That being the case, this announced policy would have very little effect, particularly if we do not get a number of Syncrude plants in operation.

I can understand the policy in respect of Syncrude plants. I would like to deal with this in much more detail, but already we are, in effect, through tax breaks and so on, turning back about 50 per cent of the capital required for those projects without equity to the companies. This, plus the assistance of the Alberta government, may run back close to 75 per cent of the capital without equity.

I do not think that the Canadian public would like to see that kind of flow increased without equity. This is one of the reasons we need Petro-Can. However, I would like to deal with this in more detail at a later date.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McRae: Yes.

Mr. Stanfield: Do I undertand, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is opposing or, at least, expressing reservations about the east being served more adequately by the enlargement of the pipeline to Montreal and the east?

Mr. McRae: What I am saying is that in the long run, and I think that we are talking about the long run, I am concerned about the value of increasing that pipeline if it will only move 315,000 barrels per day until 1983, whereupon it will begin to decline. There does not seem to be much reason for increasing the flow through that pipeline.

I think that one of the things which we are going to have to do in the long run, since I am asked the question, is to start substituting gas, coal and other things for oil, which would mean perhaps that the Q and M pipeline and the Montreal-Quebec gas pipeline may be a much better answer than enlargement of the oil pipelines. Such substitution will eventually be necessary. The figures which were put out by the department in a document called "Our Energy Future" indicate very strongly that we are going to have to get from 46 per cent dependence on oil down to about a 30 per cent dependence within the next 22 years. That is a fairly short period and a fairly significant cut in the amount of oil.

For this reason I think that we have to question how much we should expand. I think that there is some expansion expected, in the area of about 50,000 barrels. If we expand, however, then we have to take the consequences of the system declining in the early part of the next decade.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member asking a supplementary question?

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the hon. member whether he is expressing the views of the government and whether, when one analyses all the words he has used, he is not really expressing grave reservations about the wisdom of increasing the pipeline capacity for oil going east.

Mr. McRae: I think that in the long run this is one of the real problems we will face. Unless there are larger reserves found out west, unless we can develop more tar sand plants—and I do not think that it can be done by tax concessions; I think it has to be done by a company like Petro-Can—then I am just wondering if this is a feasible answer, certainly if there is no oil there. That is all I am saying. I am not expressing government policy. I am just asking the question that, if there is not enough oil in the west, what is the point of expanding the size of the line?

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on record the position of the New Democratic Party with regard to motions Nos. 3, 4 and 6 of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). As you know, Mr. Speaker, we support in principle the need for any federal government, no matter what its political stripe, to have the power to act effectively in terms of a national emergency pertaining to energy supply. We supported a similar bill back in 1974, and we support this bill before us today.

We have some reservations about parts of the bill. We have indicated that we support the Conservative motion No. 2 to remove the closure aspect allowing for only three days of debate once the government had decided that a crisis does exist. We feel that the government has at its disposal the normal provisions to impose closure and that the opposition would not act irresponsibly if a genuine crisis did in fact exist.

However, we cannot support the amendments standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River because, in effect, what they do is, through the back door, subvert any active measures the government may take in dealing with an energy emergency. The bill provides, of course, that the government institute a mandatory allocation program, that this would be debated under the normal provisions and that it would then be tabled. The Conservative amendment would allow for a motion to disallow the allocation program to be made within 25 days and disposed of within 15 days.

However, the real catch—and this is why we say that it subverts in a roundabout way—is that if the motion is not disposed of one way or another within the 15-day period, the mandatory allocation program announced by the government would automatically die. It seems to me that no government, in wanting to act responsibly, could allow this kind of cut-off to take place, this automatic undermining of a policy.

Surely if we have the debate when the government announces that an emergency is in existence, and if the House of Commons approves that there is an emergency, then we should accept the fact and not do as these three amendments suggest, that is, subvert the decision made by the majority in the House of Commons. Surely that is a normal and accepted practice. If we have a full debate and air the issues, we then accept the consequences of the vote of the day and the subsequent decision.

It seems to me that to go along with the idea of these amendments, which say that if we cannot resolve the matter either in the affirmative or the negative after 15 days any action the government may take to allocate supplies must immediately terminate, we are right back at square one and in the position of going through the whole process again. This will only cause chaos and confusion in terms of energy supplies throughout the country. It would prevent the government from acting quickly and effectively to ensure that Canadians receive their energy supplies by means of rationing or whatever form of allocation would take place.

As I say, in a way these amendments are a ploy and almost a subterfuge to undermine responsible action by government. We may disagree, as the opposition does on many occasions, with the policies of the government, but in the end we must allow that government, duly elected, to make decisions and take action. Otherwise parliament will degenerate into an ineffective operation and Canadian consumers will suffer the consequences.

I would have preferred the Conservative party to develop a more rational approach to energy in Canada and the problem of supply.

I cannot for the life of me see why they are wedded to this absurd proposal to dismantle Petro-Canada, the only option that gives us a chance to combat the arbitrary decision-making of the multinational oil companies in Canada as witnessed so recently by the Imperial-Exxon affair. If we do not have a publicly owned corporation to take effective measures, we will be forever at the mercy of these foreign oil companies which already own 90 per cent of our oil production.

We have to take steps to establish an alternative. Surely, in light of our past energy situation, that has to be a Crown corporation such as Petro-Canada. I wish the government were more serious about how it uses Petro-Canada. The minister likes to wrap himself in the flag and tell us how he is going to use Petro-Canada to get at the big bad boys, Exxon and Imperial. He can go a lot further in terms of having Petro-Canada take over the 100,000 barrels a day allocation that Imperial gives to eastern Canada so that we do not face the charges of a middleman called Exxon, or face the interruption of supply in the future.

So far, I understand from the minister that he has authorized Petro-Canada to negotiate for 100,000 barrels in addition to the 200,000 barrels already committed to Exxon and Imperial by Venezuela. I do not think that is good enough, nor do I think it good enough that the minister has not vociferously insisted that Imperial make up the 9,000 barrels per day shortfall that still exists in supplies to our eastern Canadian refineries.

The only way to counterbalance the power of companies like Imperial and Exxon is to have an effective and fully operational Crown corporation such as Petro-Canada. We in this party see a much enlarged role for Petro-Canada in our energy future.

To reiterate, Mr. Speaker, we in this party will have to vote against the three amendments standing in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) for the reasons I have outlined. I hope that we may move on to the other amendments that are before the House this afternoon without too much delay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 3 in the name of Mr. Baldwin.

All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I declare the motion lost on division.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Baldwin) negatived on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): This motion also disposes of motions No. 4 and No. 6.

Motions No. 4 and No. 6 (Mr. Baldwin) negatived on division.

Energy Supplies

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie) moved:

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-42, An Act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be amended in Clause 17 by

(a) striking out line 23 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

(b) striking out line 28 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"for the controlled product; and"

(c) adding immediately after line 28 at page 13 the following new paragraph:

"(d) designating Petro Canada as the sole importer of petroleum and petroleum products into Canada."

Mr. Gillespie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, could you just clarify for me the procedure right now. As I understand it, we are dealing with the last amendment before the House of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, motion No. 5 standing in my name seeks to amend clause 17 of Bill C-42. Perhaps for the benefit of the House I should read it to put it in context and then explain the reason behind the amendment. The relevant part of clause 17 reads as follows:

17. (1) Where the Governor in Council considers it expedient to do so, he may order the Board to regulate the importation of any controlled product into Canada indefinitely of for such period as may be specified in the order.

(2) For the purpose of carrying out an order under subsection (1), the Board may make regulations

(a) respecting the quantities and qualities of any controlled product imported or to be imported during such periods as may be prescribed by the Board;

(b) respecting the storage of imported supplies of any controlled product in market areas; and

(c) respecting such other matters or things in relation to the importation of the controlled product as may be necessary to support a mandatory allocation program for the controlled product.

My amendment would add paragraph (d) as follows:

(d) designating Petro-Canada as the sole importer of petroleum and petroleum products into Canada.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that my amendment still allows discretion to the board to designate Petro-Canada as the sole importer of offshore oil. It is a discretionary provision in clause 17. The reasoning behind it is quite clear.

● (1510)

We could conceivably be faced with another interruption in supply of offshore oil to eastern Canada. The situation in Iran could worsen and production may not reach the level it was originally. As a result, Exxon or any of the other multinationals that supply other parts of the world aside from Canada may once again divert oil contracted for and bound for Canada. We will not be out of this predicament until we move toward a concept of self-sufficiency. It seems to me, if we are to be faced with this problem of multinational companies diverting oil destined for Canada that a way around the situation in an emergency is to designate Petro-Canada as the sole importer.

There are a number of advantages in doing this. First, we know that governments such as the Venezuelan government which currently supply 40 per cent of our imported oil are quite anxious to deal on a government to government basis. In that context Venezuela is quite anxious to deal with our state owned petroleum company Petro-Canada. In the event of an emergency it would seem to me to be much easier to contract for new supplies from some of these OPEC countries, if we were dealing through a sole importing agency such as Petro-Canada. Such a company could state to a government; "This is the emergency situation we have; we know what the allocation plans of the government are, and here is what we would like to contract for in terms of additional supplies." The government would not need to go to an intermediary, such as a parent company of multinational subsidiaries located in Canada, to ask for more oil from the parent company, and it would not need to ask the parent company to get more oil from the host country producing it. By having one agency, rather than a multiplicity of subsidiaries of multinational companies doing the contracting and arranging, it would facilitate things in times of an emergency instead of working under the traditional patterns of subsidiaries of multinationals which, as we have seen already, do not have a commitment to Canadian needs and priorities.

The second advantage of designating Petro-Canada as the sole importer would result in Canada having an effective window on the industry. It would know what is happening in terms of price and supply. One of the reasons we in the New Democratic Party, during a minority parliament, pressed so hard for the government to set up Petro-Canada was this very fact that we must always rely on the oil industry for statistics in terms of what oil is available and at what cost.

With a Crown owned agency responsible to the Government of Canada operating as the importer, we would be able to get an accurate assessment of what oil was actually available from host countries, and we would not have to rely on the middleman which the minister said in the House the other day skims off some of the money for arranging to bring this oil to us. Our own publicly owned corporation would be able to negotiate and would be able to tell us directly the cost of oil that we would need in an emergency situation.

Obviously we will have to get some oil on the spot market, but it is very important that we get oil at the cheapest price possible. When you are out wheeling and dealing in the international market and having to buy oil on the spot market, we know that the bidding and prices go up very quickly. If we have to rely on multinational oil companies to do that kind of bidding and arranging, especially in an emergency situation, past history has indicated—and indeed the minister's own comments in the House the other day have indicated—that the likelihood is that we will be charged more for oil imported during an emergency.

The middleman, the multinational oil company, and often its paper transacting corporations, or even the shipping lines that it owns in terms of oil tankers, will be jacking up the price all the way along because of the vertical integration and the way these corporations operate. If Canada had one sole importing agency responsible to the Government of Canada, namely, Petro-Canada, we could get an accurate idea of supply and of what the real cost is. In that way we would protect the Canadian consumer.

It seems to me the lessons of the past few weeks and the lessons of the oil crisis of 1973 indicate that as long as we rely on the multinational oil companies, we, as Canadian consumers, will be jeopardized. We have been ripped off in terms of price and supply problems in the past. Anyone who remembers the famous lineups of cars at gasoline pumps in the United States during 1973 will recognize that much of that situation was contrived. The oil companies had the capacities in their oil refineries but deliberately kept production down to create an artificial shortage which created not only panic in the United States but helped to drive up the price as well. In light of that kind of history of manipulation, surely it becomes imperative that we give a bigger role to our own publicly owned national petroleum company.

To paraphrase the minister that he would like to eliminate the middleman, Exxon, in Imperial's deals with Venezuela in contracting oil for Canada, I would like to eliminate the other middleman eventually, namely, Imperial Oil itself, and use Petro-Canada as the importing agency to buy, and then in turn sell, oil to the refineries in Canada. It is not an impractical suggestion. It could be worked almost in the sense of a marketing board as we have in other product areas in Canada. It could almost be a paper transaction kind of situation. I would hope eventually we could move into the actual physical aspect of the operation that Petro-Canada could contract for tankers to move the oil. There is excessive tanker capacity in the world today, so that should not be any problem.

It seems to me that my amendment makes sense in that it gives the government an option in terms of the legislation. I stress this is not a compulsory amendment, but an option. It gives the government some authority if it wants to move in the direction of giving a greater role to Petro-Canada. I know the Liberals only move toward enhancing Crown corporations and the government's role in these areas when they are pushed right to the wall. I would hope that the government would take the initiative and try to prepare for crises, rather than having to react so rapidly when a crisis develops.

In the sense of propping up and giving the government some courage that there will not be any challenges to the role of Petro-Canada, I have moved this amendment to incorporate in the legislation the clear option that it can make Petro-Canada, in an emergency, the sole importer of offshore oil.

I think the arguments I have put forward in the context of our energy history, and the most recent developments, indicate we must have this very viable opinion, a full utilization of Petro-Canada. Otherwise we could not solve this recurring crisis facing Canadians in terms of manipulation of the oil market by multinational oil companies. Those companies do not have loyalty to any one country or to the populace of any country, only to themselves and their maximization of profit.

I commend my amendment to the House. I know in committee the minister was not favourably disposed toward it. That was before Mr. Armstrong of Imperial Oil announced that he would ignore the demands of the minister with regard to having Imperial act directly with Venezuela rather than through Exxon. The minister has been given a slap in the face by Imperial on two counts. First, he said that Imperial must deal directly with Venezuela. He has been turned down. Second, the minister said that any diversion of oil by Imperial was unacceptable. He has been turned down on that ground as well because Imperial is still diverting about 9,000 barrels a day.

In light of this most recent history I think the minister will see the wisdom of my amendment, change his opinion, and accept it. I therefore commend it to the House.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, because this is the minister's bill I thought he might want to reply to the mover of the amendment. In the event that he does not, I would like to take a few short minutes of the time of the House.

What the NDP amendment does is suggest, as usual, one of two crutches that a socialist party anywhere has. First, if they do not like what is going on, they want it nationalized. This was even the attitude a few weeks ago of some NDP members of the House when we were discussing Air Canada and CNR. They almost forgot themselves and cried out that if we nationalized both of those, it would be the answer to everything. That is their answer on the post office problem—nationalize the Post Office and that will cure everything.

The other cure that they come up with is some sort of statement on organization. If anything is going wrong and if you cannot nationalize it, or if it is against the popular will, their simplistic view is to set up a state run organization of some type or other to cure all the little ailments. It is very depressing to see a minister of the Crown in what used to be a Liberal party, parrot and mimic that type of approach all down the line. Certainly Canada has a crude oil or energy problem. It is as a result of a lack of a decent policy. In desperation the government reaches over and starts to parrot and mimic socialists by saying that the answer to all our prayers has to be Petro-Can.

I wish to point something out to the House. This amendment calls for Petro-Canada to be the sole, only, and exclusive importer of offshore oil in times of an emergency. The idea is that Petro-Can would apparently be in a better position than anyone in government or industry to ensure that we get our continuing share of crude oil from offshore. Presumably because the minister has now agreed to insert Petro-Can into the allocations basis, Petro-Can will have an immense part to play in regard to the allocation of that crude oil domestically to refineries. I merely point out one conflict of interest of Petro-Can in that event. If Petro-Can is merely a state oil trading company, that might be possible. Of course it is far more than that. It is in the distribution business, the refining business, and the retail business as well. There would be immense conflict of interest in attempting to have a state trading concern import and allocate oil to the industry, including itself. We would have to look upon that with some suspicion.

Getting back to the emergency situation, there is no need for Petro-Can or any other single state agency to be inserted into the offshore situation in times of an international emergency. There is already an international agency which does that, the International Energy Agency. It was set up by treaty with 19 signatories, including this country, which will operate and run it.

Under the international treaty that Canada belongs to, the IEA has set down an allocation formula. It will oversee, supervise, and correct any inequities and imbalances with regard to that type of international solution. Therefore, there is no need for Petro-Can to be inserted into the international offshore crude oil market in the event of an international emergency. The control agency is already there. It is not a Canadian one, it is international.

I have to believe that the purpose of our socialist colleagues in the House goes far beyond the international emergency situation. I feel they want Petro-Canada to be given the power, the foot in the door, so that it can gain experience in the international field, a situation in which it has little experience at the moment. It could eventually be the sole and exclusive importer of offshore oil in all circumstances, both in times of emergency and non-emergency. That would be a disaster, for many reasons.

First, in an emergency situation at the very time that experience, storage facilities and international knowledge are needed, when there is an impending shortfall of crude oil on the international scene, that is not an advisable time to insert an inexperienced management group. It would not have the international knowledge of where the crude oil may be on the spot markets. It would be the very worst time to set up Petro-Can or any inexperienced, amateurish, state run agency in the international field.

I certainly do not want to defend in any manner, shape or form the present or past history of the multinational oil companies of the world in the world market. On many occasions they certainly have not acted in Canada's best interest. They may not even be acting in Canada's best interest right now. They are obviously acting in their own best interests. That is what they are there for. There is no question about that, but I suggest that at times of shortage or impending shortage the one and only asset we can use in the national interest as far as multinationals are concerned is their knowledge and experience and their access to these international pools, especially if they have binding contractual agreements with Canadian companies. The very time when there is an impending shortage in the international field is certainly not the best time to change horses.

It is a shame, and one of the tragedies of this government and this country that we have to rely on multinationals at any time for any amount of crude oil. However, that is another story for perhaps another debate on another series of amendments. Perhaps that could be debated at third reading, but this is certainly not the time for that. I think this is not the moment to allow Petro-Canada a foot in the door. A time of emergency is not a good time for Petro-Canada to be leading up to being the sole and exclusive importer of all offshore oil for all time. I would be interested in hearing the minister's views on whether that is the way we should be proceeding with Petro Canada. I do not believe we should.

Let us consider what would have happened, for instance, if Petro-Canada had been the sole importer of Iranian oil at the time of the Iranian revolution or, to coin an Irish phrase, the "troubles" in Iran of last December and January. Canada receives supplies, as I understand it, from Iran through a number of companies, BP, Petrofina and Gulf. In addition, my understanding is that other multinationals such as Mobil, Exxon, Shell, and perhaps Texaco, also receive Iranian supplies, but those companies certainly did not ship Iranian oil to this country. It was shipped mainly through BP, Petrofina, and Gulf. There may have been a few small independents as well, but if instead of all those multinationals we had had only Petro-Canada, I wonder what different sources Petro-Canada would have had to make up for any deficiencies which would have hit us. They would have hit us very hard if we had been solely dependent on Petro-Canada at that time.

Petro-Canada is to be the only wholesaler or buyer of Mexican crude oil, which we all hope some day will come on stream so that we can utilize it here in Canada, at least in the short interval before we are solely dependent on our own.

Mr. Paproski: We are not sure about that either.

Mr. Lawrence: It has been suggested to me by people in the industry that having Petro-Can officials inserting themselves into the Mexican situation at the request of the minister set back some very serious negotiations which were already under way between such Canadian companies as Gulf Canada and Mexico. For years Exxon bought Mexican crude. Gulf Canada, for instance—and there are other examples as well—was at the point of finalizing very serious negotiations with Mexico. Access by this country to Mexican crude has been delayed by a number of months—

Mr. Gillespie: Nonsense.

Mr. Lawrence: —solely and simply because Petro-Canada people have no experience and no negotiating expertise in this field whatsoever. Again it is an example of the heavy hand of government. People in the industry and even some in the minister's department were not consulted. They did not have advance knowledge of what the minister was going to do.

At the moment Exxon receives 600,000 barrels per day of Venezuelan light crude. I understand that the contracts between the Venezuelan producers and Exxon are fairly binding. The minister is now attempting to get people to break contracts which they have with Exxon. He is attempting to have some of that oil diverted to Petro-Canada so that Petro-Canada can supply people on the Canadian scene. That is a bit of a contradictory policy. The minister is obviously pushing Petro-Canada for all it is worth as a middleman instead of multinationals. I am not sure that this is the time for that type of intervention, but are we to believe that Petro-Canada is doing what it is doing out of charity?

The other day the minister made a dramatic scene in the House about middlemen's profits. That was nonsense. If Petro-Can is to be the middleman, it will charge fees and commissions. In some cases those fees and commissions will be greater than the present ones. There are some Canadian companies which deal directly with the producers in Venezuela. For instance, Shell buys its Venezuelan crude directly from Petro-Ven of Venezuela. As I understand the minister's policy now, he is telling Imperial Oil to deal directly, but on the other hand he is telling Petro-Canada to make sure it is the only one to buy Venezuelan crude and to sell it to Imperial Oil. I say that is contradictory. Apparently it all depends on what day of the week it is, because this minister can certainly speak out of both sides of his mouth on this matter. Such intervention might have been acceptable a year ago when there was a glut on the international market, but there should be no intervention now of Petro-Canada in the international trade picture.

This is positively the worst time to be upsetting complex negotiations. I suggest that for three reasons. First, in no way can the minister or Petro-Canada guarantee that they will get the quality of light crude which Canadian refineries need. The minister can evade all the questions in the House about this he wants, but there is no way he can guarantee that, and neither can Petro-Canada. Neither can the Venezuelans because they are not too sure yet whether they can break their contractual agreement with Exxon.

We know that there is no other light crude available. As a matter of fact Venezuela is running out of light crude. It will run out of that immensely valuable crude by 1981 or 1982. Neither the minister nor Petro-Canada can guarantee the quality of oil we will get, if we get any.

Second, the minister cannot guarantee quantity. There may not be a sufficient quantity of Venezuelan oil unless there is some reduction under the Exxon contract.

To hold Petro-Canada up as the answer to a maiden's prayer with respect to this problem we are in is ridiculous. I excuse the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) because he does not know any better, but the minister should know better, and it is the minister who is leading the Canadian public down the garden path by making the statements he makes.

● (1540)

The third and final point is the question of price. There is no way that Petro-Can is going to get the oil at a cheaper price or even at the same price that Exxon and Imperial are paying for it now. The reason for that is very simple. That is the reason why the Venezuelans themselves have been leading the minister on, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has walked into their trap. Let me just tell you why.

I have talked with Venezuelans in Venezuela and with Venezuelans in Canada; I have talked with Canadians in Venezuela and with Canadians here who have had many years of experience down there. At one time, before the nationalization process down there, a huge number of Canadians technicians and officials were there, very good Canadian citizens who were of great benefit to Venezuela. We have an immense pool of knowledgeable people in this country and I can tell you exactly what the situation there is.

The Venezuelans are as fed up as many of the other producing countries are of the squeezing near-cartel of these multinationals that has existed for 50 years in the international market place. At present they feel they are squeezed by Exxon which takes at least 600,000 barrels a day from them. When you have a single large buyer like that, obviously you do not have all the levers at hand in order to up the price. What the Venezuelans would like to see—and I contradict the minister—is a number of smaller, amateurish buyers coming in to buy that 600,000 barrels a day output from Venezuela rather than just Exxon. They do not care whether they are state oil companies or private oil companies. Their only purpose is to break up that near cartel. Why? So that they can play one of these small buyers off against another.

If they can sucker Canada and Canada's Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources into putting enough pressure onto Imperial and onto Exxon to get part of that daily output from Venezuela—and it will only be a part—they will have felt they might well break the near monopoly of Exxon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Lawrence: May I finish in 30 seconds, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is there unanimous consent for that?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lawrence: I will merely repeat once more that by inserting Petro-Canada into this deal the minister cannot guarantee the quality of oil we need for our refineries because they need a particular type of light crude; second, he cannot guarantee the quantity of oil that we may be needing because Exxon may not have the contract broken; and finally, by inserting Petro-Canada into the Venezuelan deal, the Canadian consumer or taxpayer, one or the other, will pay a great deal more for his gasoline and fuel oil at the pumps and from the trucks than he has ever paid before, thanks to the actions of this minister and this government.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the observations of my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), in terms of the situation in Venezuela are absolutely true and, if anything, incomplete in terms of a description of the kind of market place to which this minister is sending Petro-Canada.

Mr. Gillespie: Leave it all to Exxon.

Mr. Andre: Every importing nation, all of the European Common Market nations which import, and that includes all of them, countries like Japan and other western industrialized nations, will have felt the pinch of Iran. Every one of them will be down in Venezuela and Mexico and other places trying to negotiate a deal for their countries. Under such circumstances, we saw in today's paper that Venezuela intends to raise the price on a barrel of oil by 25 per cent. They are in a beautiful situation. This minister and this government are sending down a novice group to negotiate, with instructions to get 100,000 barrels a day, we do not know at what price. They can pay any price they want. Also, there is no question of quality. Quality is not something that the minister is bothered about, nor is price. The group is just told to go down there and buy 100,000 barrels of oil a day. Anybody can do that with a blank cheque.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, Goyer did it.

Mr. Andre: Yes, we had that experience in 1974 when the government paid $45 for a barrel of oil, the highest price we ever paid for oil. It was the last time this government went out to buy oil and it was the highest price ever paid for heating oil. It worked out to $45 a barrel, and it was not good heating oil because the sulphur content was so high that it had to be blended.

Mr. Paproski: The minister said he sent it back.

Mr. Andre: So now we are going to send the same group down to Venezuela with a blank cheque and tell them to buy us 100,000 barrels a day. It is the sincere hope of that minister that when the bill comes in for that little exercise, the election will have been over and in the meantime he will have stood up and said: "I stood up to Exxon". My, what a tough fellow he is.

The motion moved by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) of the NDP is to be expected. It is their doctrine and their dogma that the government should do everything, that Big Brother knows better than you or I, that Big Brother should run everything, not just the oil industry but the Post Office, and so on, that Big Brother is the one who knows all, and that Big Brother in the form of state ownership should run the entire country. I understand that, but I do not agree with it.

I think that socialism is a political philosophy and an economic system which have not worked anywhere in the world. I cannot understand how it is that people continue to advocate an economic system that has a proven record of failure everywhere it has been tried. Nonetheless, I respect that party's right to carry on advocating such silly economics. But what really got me was the rationalization of this dogma when the hon. member said that by putting Petro-Can in the international oil markets and by having Petro-Can buy all of Canada's oil, we will have a trusted Crown corporation to give us a window on the world market.

Obviously the hon. member believes, for dogmatic reasons, that Crown corporations are good and can be trusted. Does he feel the same about Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and their little deal with Argentina? I wonder perhaps if he would explain to me sometime how he can be so absolutely certain that a Crown corporation with the name of Petro-Canada can be trusted to be honest, efficient, and effective, when we have had the experience with a Crown corporation whose name is Atomic Energy of Canada Limited which sold a reactor to Argentina. First we lent Argentina the money to buy the reactor and the contract will cost us millions of dollars, and then we had to pay under the table bribes to get the contract. Here is a classic case of what is wrong with Crown corporations.

When that deal was first signed, the predecessor of this minister, Donald Macdonald—who, incidentally, is now a director of Shell, one of the big, ugly multinationals, and he was fighting multinationals in the 1974 election but now he is their director—stood up and said that AECL is a classic example of the wonderful things that Crown corporations can do for us. He said that because he was pushing through the Petro-Canada bill at that time. He said that we should look at how wonderfully Atomic Energy of Canada had done in selling this reactor; that it was at the forefront of world technology; that it was doing great things which would be tremendous for Canada; and that we should see Crown corporations as wonderful and marvellous vehicles.

When the Auditor General looked at the books we found out the truth about the deal. It was after the election when we found out the truth. One could not find a minister who would admit ever having heard of the name "Atomic Energy of Canada, Ltd." One could not find a minister who would come forward and take responsibility for its actions. This should have been done by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). That was all forgotten, and a new Crown corporation came along. It is called Petro-Canada and it will save us. The onus is upon the government to prove that nonsense before attempting to persuade the Canadian public to accept it. The public is faced with the record of Crown corporations, particularly Crown corporations under the responsibility of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Those corporations are the ones with the most dismal record.

As I indicated, I respect the right of the NDP to be wrong. They advocate a socialist economy and state ownership, for dogmatic reasons. Also for dogmatic reasons they proposed this amendment. It behooves us to think carefully about the consequences of doing this. If Petro-Canada were the sole purchaser of all Canada's offshore supplies of energy, all our eggs would be in one basket. An enormously important sector of the economy would be in the hands of the chief oil buyer of Petro-Canada. If he made a mistake, the entire country would suffer devastatingly.

I ask the House to consider for a moment the threat of the multinationals. When one takes away all the hyperbole surrounding multinationals, one realizes that they are a threat to our sovereignty. They can do and say things which offend us as a sovereign nation. We feel offended that companies headquartered elsewhere could have such a profound effect on the country and we can merely react. We in this party found that offensive, and the country finds it offensive as well.

Mr. Pinard: Prove it.

Mr. Andre: I am getting to that. If we proceed with this motion and Petro-Canada is our sole purchaser abroad, one must think about the restrictions on our sovereignty and on our freedom to act in foreign affairs. Last week the president of OPEC made a suggestion that they should require that all purchasers of OPEC oil and gas must adhere to and support the Palistinian position in the Middle East. Can one imagine what would happen if our state-owned oil company purchased all our offshore oil from the Middle East, from Arab countries?

An hon. Member: Why would they do that?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member should rethink that comment.

Mr. Andre: Again the minister is showing that his intelligence level is below average. If we are to have an oil purchaser, presumably he will buy from all of the selling nations. Is the minister in all honesty suggesting that we should deal with one country only, and be totally at risk in terms of the policies of that country? Of course not. It will be spread around.

Mr. Gillespie: You suggested that we should buy all our oil from the Middle East.

Mr. Andre: No. We would buy it from the Middle East, Nigeria, Mexico, Venezuela and so on.

Mr. Gillespie: Now you are changing your comments.

Mr. Andre: If the minister would listen and perhaps read the newspapers, he would have seen the quote from the president of OPEC suggesting the OPEC nations require that the nations purchasing OPEC oil support the Palestinian cause. Is the minister prepared to stand in Etobicoke and say, "We will sacrifice sovereignty in terms of an independent foreign policy. We are quite prepared to say we are sorry to Israel but we cannot support you any more because our national petroleum company will be cut off from its supply of OPEC oil, and that will be too devastating to the country"? Is the minister prepared to say that in all honesty?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Andre: I will answer the hon. member's question in a moment. The member refers to the threat of the multinationals in terms of our sovereignty. I recognize and agree with the threat, except this very important fact cannot be defended: we know what motivates the multinationals. Profits motivate the multinationals, as they motivate Canadian companies or anyone in business. We know the rules under which they will operate. Therefore our regulations, laws and procedures can accommodate this known behaviour. Would some member in the House like to predict how Ayatollah Khomeini will behave? Can some hon. member say with absolute certainty how future governments of Venezuela will behave? Can some member predict how Saudi Arabia will behave?

Some hon. Members: And Exxon?

Mr. Andre: Exxon and the multinationals, which hon. members opposite speak about, will seek to maximize their profits. Did they not hear that? Did they not understand that? I am not surprised.

My second point is that all these companies have assets in the country over which the government can exercise authority. The government has a lever which it does not have in terms of offshore countries.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Andre: Because the minister has not exercised the lever.

An hon. Member: How?

Mr. Andre: If he wanted to he could. It is wrong for the minister to suggest that Petro-Canada will bail us out through Venezuela and Mexico. When we get down to the bottom line, it is offensive to think of the Department of External Affairs in its new building on Sussex Drive with hundreds of high-priced very capable people. I am led to believe this, but I do not have much to do with them. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has trade commissioners all over the world. There is an ambassador in Venezuela. The Canadian Commercial Corporation was created for the purpose of state-to-state business deals of the kind being talked about. Why does the Department of External Affairs not do its job and negotiate with the Venezuelan government? Why do our trade commissioners not sign a trade agreement with Venezuela if that is what we want? Why do we not use the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Every time we find out the government has not been doing its job, why is a new department, agency, Crown corporation or layer of bureaucracy created? It is given a fancy name; and the government says that it will cure the problem. These lads must be tripping over each other. What is the trade commissioner in Venezuela doing? If he is not negotiating in Caracas in terms of oil then we should get him out of there and put someone in who knows how to do the job. What is our ambassador doing in Venezuela? Why do we need another layer of bureaucracy? Canadian taxpayers are paying handsome salaries to these people. Why do they not do their jobs? Why do we need another layer of bureaucracy?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 9, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon). Shall the item stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent. The hon. member for Vaudreuil on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I notice Your Honour called item No. 9 as the first order of business under private member's business according to today's order paper. I am rising at this time because it is the first opportunity to question why the order paper was printed in this fashion. There is item No. 32 which is to be called for third reading and which, in my opinion, should be at the top of the list of private members' business.

● (1600)

In a few words I am going to explain why I believe there has been a wrong order of business printed in the order paper today.

Standing Order 18(1) states quite clearly that:

All items standing on the orders of the day, except government orders, shall be taken up according to the precedence assigned to each on the order paper.

That is quite clear. In other words, the order of business is predetermined and is not something that can be changed except by consent of this House.

I want to read Standing Order 20(2) as that is possibly where the difficulty arises. It states:

After any bill or other order in the name of a private member has been considered in the House or in any committee of the whole and any proceeding thereon has been adjourned or interrupted, the said bill or order shall be placed on the order paper for the next sitting at the foot of the list under the respective heading for such bills or orders.

Apparently, from what I have been able to look at today, it has been the practice in the past in this connection to drop a bill such as No. 32 to the bottom of the list of public bills. I find that this has not been contested and, though it may be establishing some sort of precedent, I question that this is the intent of the standing order.

I want to turn to the first part of Standing Order No. 20(1) which states clearly:

The day to day precedence on the Order Paper of Private Members' Business, except as otherwise provided, shall be as follows:—

Again, there is no option or choice. The Standing Order then lists paragraphs (a) to (f), (a) being third reading and passage of bills; (b) being the consideration at the report stage of any bill reported from a standing or special committee. I would at this moment only mention paragraph (f) which says "other orders", and I assume that must refer to items such as notices of motions, notices of motions for the production of papers, and notices of motions (papers).

The point I want to make is that the bill in question, item No. 32 on the list, was brought into this House from committee at report stage and was listed in Tuesday's order paper as the first item of business. It was listed as the first item of business because there were no public bills at third reading that had precedence, and there were no bills that were at the report stage, so it appeared on the order paper in first position and was debated.

That bill is now at third reading stage and I suggest that it should be at the bottom of the list of bills which are at third reading stage in the list of private members' business. Of course it is the only bill which is at that particular point, third reading, so it should be the first item of business called today.

I will make one more point. On Tuesday of this week the bill was at report stage on the order paper. Today the bill is at third reading stage, and that is another reason it should not be considered in the same category, perhaps, even as on Tuesday of last week. I therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you call as the first item of business today item No. 32, a bill which is standing in my name.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I followed with interest and some curiosity the line of argument being advanced by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who has had the temerity to bring forward a bill that he believes is designed to eliminate certain divisiveness in this country but which, instead, of course, is producing divisiveness, and pretending that he can bend the rules of this House in the way he is trying at the present time to have his particular divisive bill put at the top of the list when, as he alleges, it has passed report stage. If I remember correctly, the last person on—

Mr. Herbert: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paproski: Let him finish.

Mr. Herbert: This is on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is seeking the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on a point of order and—

Mr. Herbert: This is a question of privilege.

Mr. Paproski: Let him finish his point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I recognize the hon. member for Vaudreuil on a question of privilege.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, my reason for rising on a question of privilege is that I very carefully discussed a point of order. I have been discussing an order of this House, and the member has now introduced into his argument on the point of order some points concerning the bill which I did not introduce and do not want to introduce at this time. I am discussing only a point of order and I respectfully suggest that you do not allow any discussion of the bill itself, the implications of the bill or any points in connection with it, but that we deal solely with the point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. After listening to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) I think he is quite right. He has raised a point of order which concerns a matter of great importance to him since this is his bill. Perhaps with the indulgence of the House I would suggest that the Chair take this point of order under consideration and render a decision at a later date. I will recognize the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) for the purpose of discussing the point of order, without any reference to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order itself, it does seem to me that the argument advanced is to the effect that the bill, which was at report stage at the conclusion of Tuesday, as it appears at page 4119 of Hansard, ceased to be at report stage just because the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) who had the floor at the time, called it five o'clock. I feel the argument he is using is phony because the bill could still be at report stage. There is no evidence as I see it that it has ceased to be at report stage. The hon. member argues that it is now at third reading stage and should go to the head of the list of private member's bills which are at third reading, this being the only one. That is a completely specious argument, and these matters ought to be taken into account when you are making your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder why the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) wishes to prevent me from speaking. He says: "No more". It seems to me that I have the right to rise in the House on such a serious point of order.

Some hon. Members: You are wasting time.

Mr. Pinard: I will be brief, Mr. Speaker, but I would have liked the preceding speaker to put more meat on the point he was trying to make. He claims, without explaining why, that the reasons given by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) are ridiculous and unfounded. Anyone who reads Standing Order 20(1) and (2) with serious intent and an intelligent mind will see that a distinction must be made between a bill at the third reading stage and a bill still in second reading or at any other stage mentioned in sub-paragraphs (b), (c), (d) and (e) of Standing Order 20. If we, as legislators, had not wished to give bills at the third reading stage priority, we would have remained silent on the subject, Mr. Speaker, and all we would have required is that once a bill had been dealt with at one stage and time had lapsed, it goes to the bottom of the list without exception.

But if we have deemed it necessary to provide all the distinctions set out in Standing Order 20, it must be because we wished to give priority to some bills on the basis of the stage to which each had progressed. So it seems to me, offhand, that the point raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil is a valid one. I know you are about to reserve this matter. I do not wish to force the House to adopt my view, since it is not in my power today to give priority to the bill introduced by the hon. member for Vaudreuil over the one sponsored by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson). If you are about to reserve this important matter, Mr. Speaker, I would urge you to read carefully Standing Order 20(1) and (2); I am convinced you will find there the reason why we deemed it necessary to give bills at the third reading stage priority over those, for instance, still on second reading. And if we follow the logic expounded by the hon. member for Vaudreuil, I think it will be found to be more convincing than the groundless argument expressed by the follow-up speaker.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) are taking up the time allotted to the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) in this private members' hour. Every time the hon. member has a private members' bill before the House, the government side seems to want to filibuster it. I am surprised.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There have been contributions to the point of order by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). All three contributions will be taken into consideration and a decision will be rendered at a later date.

Order No. 9, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent.

Order No. 13, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent.

Order No. 16, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand by unanimous consent.

Order No. 17, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen). Shall the order stand?

ABANDONED RAILWAY LINES CONSERVATION ADVISORY AUTHORITY ACT

MEASURES TO CONSERVE ABANDONED RAILWAY LINES

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie) moved that Bill C-221, to provide for the establishment of an authority to conserve abandoned railway lines in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transportation and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-221 provides for the establishment of an authority to conserve abandoned railway lines in Canada. Canadians are becoming increasingly aware of the possibilities offered by abandoned railway lines and unused rights-of-way in the field of rapid urban transport and recreation. Too often in the past, buildings were erected on portions of lines sold by the railway companies, which virtually prevented the establishment of urban transportation, bicycle paths, foot paths, or snowmobile trails. In the long run this bill will protect the interests of the people in urban transportation and recreation by conserving the use of lines and rights-of-way of abandoned railway lines.

[English]

Increasing numbers of people in Canada have come to realize what a fantastic, unused resource are these lines running out from cities which provide a linkage between our urban areas and the countryside, these lines of open space which have a potential as linear parks not only for bicycle paths and hiking trails, but for other imaginative recreational uses. These strips in most cases link urban centres with the countryside and have the potential to form the basis for a network of trails and bicycle paths which would provide a recreational opportunity for people that, up to now, has not been available to either citizens of the city or the countryside.

The CNR offers these lines to the provinces and has indicated that henceforth it will offer any such abandoned railway lines to the provinces if they are prepared to pay the market price for them. The CPR has taken the position that it will simply sell the lines back to the contiguous line owners.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Sell them back! They were given the lines in the first place.

Mr. Watson: Right. When these lines were originally built, the railway companies benefited from government assistance.

It seems to me that this resource has the great potential of improving the quality of life which we enjoy in our cities and towns. Under no condition should we be allowing the railway companies to turn back this land to the neighbouring owners at prices which usually do not provide a productive return to the railway companies. Even if a small portion of a line is sold, it ruins the potential of that line being used. Such a network would enhance the ability of people within its area, and even of people living between cities which are a considerable distance apart, to communicate with each other by means other than highways and existing railway lines.

The bill which I have proposed would set up a committee that would be empowered to advise the government in so far as these railway lines are concerned. It would advise the government on, for example, the best way of taking an inventory of the existing abandoned railway rights of way in Canada, which would include a determination of just who owns what as far as these lines are concerned, because there is a great deal of confusion about who in fact does own some of the rights of way.

I believe that at the moment the CPR is in litigation which could be extremely expensive from its point of view, resulting from such a situation where it has found that one of its main lines belongs to somebody other than the body to whom they thought it belonged. Another thing which this advisory committee could do is assess and determine the potential use of such a right of way for rapid transit. We passed a bill on April 30, 1974, which allowed the re-use of railway shunting yards for other purposes within city cores. That bill, the Railway Relocation Bill, also provided for the upgrading of existing railway lines for urban transit purposes.

Mr. Paproski: And the government promised a lot of money for it too, remember?

Mr. Watson: Yes. Unfortunately this government has ignored this bill recently, but the lines are still there and the potential is still there. In my view, we will have to make use of those lines sooner or later. If we follow what I propose in Bill C-221 we would be more adequately prepared for that potential use of the lines for rapid transit purposes. The committee which I am suggesting would advise the government on whether it would be wise to use such a line for a bicycle path, a nature trail, a hiking trail, snowmobiles in the wintertime—these things would have to be ironed out with local authorities. In my view they are matters which also would have to be decided primarily by the provinces or the local municipal authorities in the area through which the line might run.

If we at the federal level do not take the steps at least to slow down the process of throwing these abandoned lines on the open market after a very short period where, if they are not literally given away, they are sold off in a manner which further spoils forever their potential, then we are not taking our responsibilities seriously. The cost of preserving the lines would not be too great. I feel that if this bill is not going to pass there are two or three things we should do. Mr. Speaker, I think I am about to be interrupted.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, His Excellency the Governor General of Canada had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bill:

Bill C-29, an Act to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and to make other related amendments—Chapter No. 16.

ABANDONED RAILWAY LINES CONSERVATION ADVISORY AUTHORITY ACT

MEASURE TO CONSERVE ABANDONED RAILWAY LINES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Watson that Bill C-221 respecting the establishement of an authority to conserve abandoned railway lines in Canada be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I was in the process of giving some reasons why, in the event—

Some hon. Members: Can we call it five o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When we were summoned to the Senate we were in private members' hour. The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) had the floor. Private members' hour is scheduled to continue until five o'clock, so the hon. member for Laprairie should continue.

Mr. Watson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When we were interrupted I was in the process of indicating that if this bill which I have proposed today and which deals with abandoned railway lines is not going to be passed by the House, there is nevertheless a necessity for the government to act now and I want to take this opportunity to urge certain action upon the government.

CNR is the only one of the two national railways that takes a reasonable attitude toward railway lines. They at least offer these abandoned railway lines to the provinces; the CPR does not even bother to do that, but I should point out the CNR's position. This is a position they indicated was their policy two or three years ago. It reads:

> Once abandonment of a line has been approved by the Canadian Transport Commission, salvageable materials are removed, such as bridges, tracks and ties, and steps taken to dispose of the land and remaining improvements. Attempts are made to dispose of the property en bloc to government bodies or agencies, such as provincial or local municipal governments and provincial hydro commissions. In the absence of interest on their part and on the part of public utilities, such as Bell Telephone, steps are then taken to dispose of the land to adjoining owners. In every case we endeavour to get market value for the lands involved.

Experience has shown that even the one year notice the authority would receive from the railway before the railway would be able to divest itself of any section of an abandoned railway, which my proposed bill suggests, is not adequate. Upon reflection, we will need a period of up to about five year before a railway should be allowed to dispose of such an abandoned right of way. This is not an excessive period when one considers the length of time we take to iron out conflicts between different levels of government. If one is caught in a situation where the land is offered to a province and one provincial department cannot make up its mind and the matter is referred back to some federal department, and so it goes to a second federal department, two or three years can be used up very quickly.

If we cannot pass a bill like this quickly what should be done in the interval is for the government to initiate a new procedure for dealing with abandonment of railway lines or rights of way with the railway committee of the Canadian Transport Commission.

Without being totally specific with my recommendation as to what they should do, the principle would be that they make sure no section is alienated or sold, or in any way disposed of without allowing for an exhaustive examination of alternative public uses. I have already gone over these alternative uses. Whether it is rapid transit or various forms of imaginative recreational uses, and more and more of them are being suggested all the time, we should give the public—whether it is through the provincial government, through the federal government, through the municipal governments or through local societies or clubs—plenty of time to decide what they can do with this land usefully and inexpensively.

I would hope that if we cannot come to any conclusion on this bill today, at the very least the member of parliament who will be responding on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) will be able to indicate in a positive way that the government will give consideration to making such a suggestion to the railway committee of the Canadian Transport Commission.

● (1640)

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like also to contribute a few remarks concerning Bill C-221, an Act to provide for the establishment of an authority to conserve abandoned railway lines in Canada. This bill suggests a number of objectives which are indeed commendable and worthwhile, but I am not sure that the means it proposes to reach them are the most effective.

In a number of cases, I am sure that the rights-of-way of railway lines which will be abandoned have great potential as rapid transit or recreational areas. I am sure also that other railway lines would not be appropriate at all. In my opinion, many different groups should look into alternative uses for the rights-of-way of railway lines which will be abandoned. Mr. Speaker, I feel any organization would have difficulty dealing with all the groups which would like to buy these tracts of land made available through the suspension of railway service.

Think about who should have priority on the choice, who should get that land? Should it go to recreational agencies in rural municipalities, to service clubs? For example, one could think that an optimist club might want to acquire land, one could think about any organization except municipalities which would want to acquire land. I think it would be very difficult for the Authority, as is being suggested in this bill, to make a decision on applications that would be made. Its seems, Mr. Speaker, the advisory authority set up under this bill would be dealing with this problem but with no indication as to how it should weigh the various interests. Nothing provides for the participation of the provinces or municipalities in the decision-making process. Nor is there any list of criteria to assess the proposed uses. The bill does not even recognize that it might be necessary to treat railway lines differently whether they are located in town or in the country.

I wonder whether, instead of dealing in this bill with abandoned railway lines, it would not be more desirable or more useful to think about further improving the commuter train system even if for some reason railway companies should abandon certain routes. I think that in a bill like this we should rather be urging the railways to maintain the services they are now providing in terms of commuter trains. And I might also point out that many projects have been considered on the south shore of Montreal as well as in the area of Deux-Montagnes and the area of Valleyfield with respect to providing fast commuter trains. Among those projects, one went from the city of St. Hyacinthe, the riding I have the honour to represent in the House of Commons, and one which called upon the government to pay some $62 million, of course, under agreements with the government of the province of Quebec.

I quote a resolution from the city council of Mont-Saint-Hilaire asking the government of Quebec whether it intends to join the commuter trains with the public transit system of the Montreal area, second, asking for an immediate meeting between the provincial and federal departments concerned by that problem to discuss and solve as rapidly as possible the jurisdictional problem facing them; and third, asking the railway company to maintain commuter trains and to suspend or to defer the 50 per cent increase in its rates until such a meeting has taken place between the various levels of government.

Mr. Speaker, I shall deal a moment with the problems faced by towns and municipalities on the south shore in the suburbs of Montreal. Of course, there are dormitory towns such as Mont Saint-Bruno, Belœil, Mont Saint-Hilaire, Otterburn Park and I go as far as the town of Saint-Hyacinthe, with a population of close to 200,000, half of which must go to Montreal each morning and come back each evening, and where it has become almost unthinkable to go by normal ways, namely the road network, given the bridge system we have to cross over to Montreal island. I think it would be really time to establish a rapid transit system.

I listened recently to a report on the operations of the GO Transit train in the Toronto suburbs. In passing, the Quebec government and its transport minister should note that it would be a good idea for them to go and see what is going on in Toronto and the suburbs. It would be a good idea for them to send a team of experts to study the services available to those who want to travel to the Queen City. According to this report, the federal government does not subsidize the deficits of Toronto commuter trains. They are financed by the Ontario government, and the system is so advanced that deficits have been virtually eliminated.

I believe that if the Quebec government went to the trouble of studying the system available to Toronto suburbanites, and since the federal government is always prepared to grant $60 or $62 million for such services, it would have every advantage in trying to instal such a system on existing lines instead of abandoning them and perhaps transferring them, as suggested in Bill C-221, to the responsibility of the province, the municipalities or non-profit organizations.

Mr. Speaker, as stated in this bill, the advisory board is not empowered to apply any of the decisions that it makes. It is also not empowered to take possession of land or to hand it over. I can only advise the government about railway matters, and it seems to me that ordinary citizens have other means to express their opinion besides this bill which I find ineffective. The provinces have the powers required to take over, by expropriation if need be, any line that they want to use as a transportation corridor. Under the authority of the municipal affairs department of each province, the municipalities can also expropriate if required.

According to our experience of line abandonment in the prairie provinces, we believe that in most cases, the best alternative would be to offer the land to the owner of the adjacent property. The procedure used is therefore generally to make the first offer to such people. However, to protect the public interest, provincial and municipal authorities hold priority if they have concrete projects for using railway rights-of-way. With regard to rights-of-way on Indian reserves, their priority interest is also considered. Maybe we will also have to decide to abandon railways lines but we must undertake studies before, as I said earlier, with a view to determining whether the province or railway companies with the support of the federal government could use those railways for rapid commuter trains.

In order to facilitate the transfer of land to the last landlords, the federal government has concluded an agreement with the railway companies for the transfer of most road beds which will be abandoned in the prairie provinces. So provincial committees have been set up to select the lines which local and provincial governments want and whose transfer they are prepared to facilitate. The federal government intends to transfer immediately the lands to the municipalities concerned or to the landowners of their choice. But on that point, Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the transfer to the Crown of all lands belonging to the federal government or to provincial governments. I believe that those lands should go back to the municipalities which are most able to use them and which best know the needs of their citizens and also the best ways to use those lands and those very old buildings. The proceeds of the sale of those lands will help compensate municipalities for any fiscal income they stand to lose.

Of course, municipalities have certainly lost tax revenues, and if we ever decided to use these buildings or railroads for other purposes, municipalities might then levy taxes on those buildings. The objects of that bill, Mr. Speaker, are perfectly in keeping with this approach to the issue. If a province considers that the site of a railroad might be used as a transportation corridor or for electric lines, it may submit a proposal to the special ad hoc provincial committee and be willing to pay a reasonable price for the land.

Likewise, groups interested to use abandoned road beds for recreative purposes can submit their proposal to the municipalities concerned. When two or more proposals are submitted for using the same road bed the municipality should have the last word. The residents directly concerned by the project will have a say in the decision through municipal representatives, rather than some remote organization in Ottawa. Mr. Speaker, we might also use organizations already in place like the union of municipaiities and the union of district councils. Those organizations might certainly study the use of those railroads or lands abandoned as a result of technological developments.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, again I wish to congratulate the hon. member for having presented this bill. Of course, we share his concerns as regards the problems he has raised. However, we approach them in a different way, and the government considers that the provisions of this bill will not really meet its objectives. It recommends what it considers the most efficient and sensible approach, the one I just mentioned. Mr. Speaker, this is about all I had to say concerning this bill, my remarks were very short, but I wanted to emphasize the importance of the implementation of a railway system that would be really efficient and really beneficial to the residents of the Saint-Hyacinthe riding, and all south shore.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak about Bill C-221 as I consider it an extremely interesting measure. I must thank its sponsor, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) as it deals to a certain extent with public transport. I fail to see why, in as modern a society as ours, which for years has been struggling with rapid transit problems, especially in densely and moderately populated cities, such means as are suggested in this bill cannot be used to improve the transit system. To my mind, that is extremely important. A few years ago, though I do not know much about transportation, I spent some time looking into the problem in urban areas. And in medicine, one often makes a rather quick diagnosis when a patient comes to the office.

I soon found out that transportation in our cities, whether it be Calgary, Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal or even Ottawa-Hull, is really sick. So, I shall prescribe one means of rapid public transit, a sort of monorail. A monorail of about a mile and a half should have been built, on a trial basis, in this area since this is the national capital; the Department of Transport and the government are here; so money should have been available to those who wanted to carry out that project.

[English]

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—I am incorrectly advised. I apologize.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Hull has the floor.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, this is a false alarm. As I said, the Canadian government, through its agencies, should have made money available to the promoters of rapid transit between downtown Hull and Ottawa. I remember at the time a number of experts, even international ones, came to the area to brief me on the development of such a system. The proposal was to use former CNR and CPR tracks, since they were already available, would entail no expropriation, but rather would allow experimenting on a new transit system. I am referring to the Safège system, the overhead monorail operating somewhat like an inverted Hovercraft. It is protected from the elements, very fast, very light and can move thousands of people every day for the cost of a single nickel or dime. But I cannot understand as I said that in an area like Canada's National Capital, the heart and soul of the whole Canadian nation, a few cents cannot be spent on experiments in public transit. Certainly, in Ottawa and Hull, the downtown areas in both cases are ideally suited for that type of transport. Indeed, mention was made of that possibility, back in 1968 I believe, but apparently no one in the Department of Transport did anything about it. I do not remember who was there at the time, all I know is that the suggestion was dropped. So I would like once more to commend the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) for putting forward this bill to provide for the establishment of a commission to preserve abandoned railway lines in Canada. I feel they could be used in Canadian towns to do what I just referred to, rapid transit for medium to high density urban centres.

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I regret I have only a few minutes left to speak to such an important bill, namely Bill C-221 introduced by my distinguished and hon. colleague for Laprairie who, in the process of drafting this bill, must certainly have carried out very extensive research and studies in order to come up with such a well substantiated and well explained bill. This is what leads me to draw your attention to the explanatory note.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that there is an increasing awareness in Canada of the potential for rapid transit or recreational use of abandoned railway lines or unused railway rights-of-way. As a matter of fact, in Montreal a few weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, we attended a meeting of the mayors of the municipalities of the Montreal area and the president of that organization, Mayor Jean Corbeil of the city of Anjou, was referring to the serious problems of public transportation and in particular railway transportation on the north and south shore into and out of Montreal, and also between Mirabel and Montreal. At that time, I recall the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) said that we had over $60 million set aside for the Montreal island municipalities to be used for upgrading the public transportation system. So the issue is not then the removal of rails but rather the improvement of the service, of the cars and transportation in general so that the fares will be lower. We had agreed, that is to say the government in the person of the Minister of Justice, to contribute up to an amount of—

PROTECTION AGAINST OIL SPILL FROM TANKER "KURDISTAN"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the usual Standing Order respecting a matter of considerable urgency to the east coast of Canada.

The continuing presence of the stern section of the oil tanker Kurdistan off the Nova Scotia coast in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, coupled with continued delays in making final disposition plans, and in light of the apparent dangers posed by this continued delay in the final disposition process, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the responsible authorities take the earliest decision possible to resolve the situation either by removal from coastal areas for sinking purposes, or to arrange for its towing into a suitable and safe port for the discharge of the residual oil in the tanker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the introduction of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROTEST AGAINST REMOVAL OF ABORTION CLINIC FROM WINNIPEG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In consideration of the recent announcement by the Health Sciences Centre in Winnipeg that the abortion clinic will be moved to a separate location and operated by a private group for the expressed purposes of making a profit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Minister of Justice consult today with his provincial counterpart to discuss concrete proposals that would prevent an American interest from investing over $100,000 in an abortion clinic which, in effect, will offer abortions on demand. Such a clinic would be both a violation of the right to life and the Criminal Code of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House direct the government to take immediately such measures as the establishment of the guaranteed annual income to provide the bare necessities to Canadians.

AGRICULTURE

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON TARIFFS

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture; it relates to the government's recent announcement on tariff changes. In light of the fact tariff reductions were instituted, to use the minister's words, "only after extremely complex negotiations with the United States", I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture, what reciprocal concessions has the government been able to obtain from our United States competitors?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member surely knows that there is a long list. I will send him a complete briefing on it so that he can understand in complete detail just what was done, because the Tariff Board recommendations are shown. It shows what the present tariffs are between our two countries; it shows the harmonization between our two countries; it shows the gains we made in respect of some of our products and some of the products they have in their country as well. It is a lengthy list, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wise: I have a supplementary question for the same minister, Mr. Speaker. I will be looking forward to that long list. I only hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Agriculture does not send it by Canada Post.

In view of the minister's recent statements to the horticultural seminar held recently in Ottawa, urging Canadians to drink Canadian apple juice and Canadian grape juice, why has he allowed the tariff on apple juice to be slashed by one-half, and why has he allowed the tariff on grape juice to be removed completely? Is this another example of the Minister of Agriculture saying one thing and taking one position, with his cabinet colleagues doing something the very opposite?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member sees the document I talked about, he will learn also that this is beneficial to the Canadian producer because on many occasions we have had surplus grape products and we were unable to ship them to the United States. When the member says one-half, certainly he could be a little bit more liberal than that, in that I believe the amount he was talking about was one cent a quart on apple juice. The Canadian apple producers are well aware of this and well aware of the discussions. That is within the realm of the Tariff Board report also.

I am just saying this, that the hon. member seems to be trying to get the point across that this may not be beneficial to the Canadian horticultural industry. I cannot think of one delegate who understood the total package on tariff gains and tariff reductions who would not say that this is probably the most beneficial package to the Canadian horticultural industry ever presented on behalf of the Canadian horticultural industry, and I might say it is beneficial to this country too, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, I will be waiting for the minister's written response to my second question. My final supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the very insignificant impact these reductions will have on the retail prices of fresh fruits and vegetables, does the minister not agree that the best way to lower food costs would be to lower farm input costs? Has the minister considered lowering the tariffs on imported agricultural commodities and chemicals, in view of the fact that with increases estimated as high as 30 per cent, the Canadian producer will have no protection whatsoever with regard to the 1979 crop season?

Mr. Whelan: Again, Mr. Speaker, I can show the hon. member a whole list in this regard. We have a review board, or a committee of producers, farmers and government people who investigate the prices of commodities. Many of the commodities here are quite reasonably priced. They have been subject to the nominal increases, in just the same as any other business in Canada.

We can show the hon. member that the costs in respect of many of the commodities that are volume items, such as the product to control wild oats, are much lower than they were last year. That cost is 10 per cent lower than it was last year, which I suggest is significant in these inflationary times.

SURTAX REQUESTED BY HORTICULTURAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Having regard to the negotiations that have been conducted both bilaterally and multilaterally, will the minister explain why the concession asked for by the horticultural industry, namely, the ability to add additional duties in times of emergency, was not negotiated successfully for the Canadian farmer and his production, which is often badly affected by the importation of unreasonably low-priced goods from countries all over the world? What became of the surtax they asked for?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, again we announced that the surtax was not finalized at this time. We hope to have it finalized in the not too distant future. This is, again, a recommendation by the Tariff Board that we act in respect of the surcharge so that we can act immediately. Past history indicates that the system we have used is too slow. I agree with the hon. member in this regard. This is something we have to finalize with our trading partners.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, do we, or do we not, have the opportunity to charge surtax against unreasonably low-priced products brought into Canada in competition with our own food producers and processors? "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we still have the same system. We are using the system we have always used but, as the hon. member knows—or, I am sure, should be aware—the recommendation was that the new system should be one that would allow us to react much quicker than we could under the old system. By the time we go through the procedures and give them 48 hours' notice, sometimes the damage is done. What they wanted was what the Tariff Board recommended, that we react immediately to that kind of dumping of that kind of product into Canada.

• (1415)

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, one final supplementary. Were we, or were we not, successful in negotiating with our foreign trade partners the right, without expense to other commodities, to impose surtax on imports at unreasonably low prices into this country? "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, it seems strange to me, after the hon. member rambles on in his question, that he can expect a short "Yes" or "No" answer from me. The hon. member knows full well, and I know that he knows, the present system which we use with regard to using a surtax. We have not at this time been successful in negotiating a proper system of surtax, but we offer them more protection under the new system than they have ever had in the history of any government in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FUNDING OF MEDICAL CARE PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Given that the Established Programs Financing Act, which was passed by parliament with the support of the Liberal party and the Conservative party, limited the financial commitment of the federal government to medical care by restricting its contributions to the size of the gross national product, regardless of the increases in health care costs throughout the country, can the President of the Treasury Board tell us whether or not the federal government is now prepared to fund increases in the medicare program that are required to meet the concerns of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the universal nature of our health care program is being eroded and that some provinces are not paying their doctors enough?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that question does not fall within the bailiwick of the President of the Treasury Board. It should have been directed to my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this has been a long-standing problem. When medicare was introduced, it was understood that after a certain period of time the costs would be shared in a different fashion. When the new arrangement was negotiated, the formula that we proposed at that time was totally acceptable to the provinces and now they have to cope with the responsibility. The hon. member should make sure that the Ontario government maintains the principle of medicare which they agreed to support all along.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, again to the Minister of Finance. Seeing that the government is a partner in restraint with the provincial governments in this matter of medicare, could the Minister of Finance tell us what the legal authority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare was when she said that she would be cutting off funding under the Established Programs Financing Act?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is not the practice in this House to comment on legal opinions; I think the hon. member should know that. When we signed the agreement for the new formula, it was understood that medicare would be maintained in the spirit in which the program was established. Some of the provinces—by the way, most of the provinces which are getting out of medicare in this manner have Conservative governments—are not, in my judgment, respecting the spirit and the letter of the agreement.

An hon. Member: There is only one Liberal government.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO MAINTAIN MEDICAL CARE PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. In the debate on the Established Programs Financing Act, the then minister of national health and welfare, now the Minister of Justice, said "these universal health insurance programs have become so deeply ingrained in the Canadian fabric that any retrograde step in the form of halting or even reducing these programs is absolutely unthinkable." In that same debate, the Prime Minister said that the elimination of an active federal role in medicare was "a gamble."

Now that the unthinkable has happened and the gamble has been lost at the expense of many Canadians, and this government has tied itself into a program which restricts its ability to administer the medicare program, can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what he intends to do and what his government intends to do within its powers, granted the fact that it has locked itself into a straitjacket, to protect the medicare program?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have already responded to questions on this subject.

● (1420)

As the hon. member knows, the understanding with respect to medicare was founded on cornerstones which were accepted, certainly, by the Parliament of Canada and by the provinces. It is still the view of the Government of Canada that those basic principles are still to be the essence of the medicare plan.

The hon. member asks what we are going to do about it, in the circumstances. The matter is one that is quite serious. Obviously, the government will have to consider in detail what steps it could take in order to ensure that these fundamental principles will be observed.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY THAT EXXON SUPPLIED BIASED INFORMATION TO NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology.

The minister stated recently in the House that 90 per cent of the petroleum industry in Canada is under foreign control. In view of this assessment and the recent events involving Exxon which clearly indicated where the loyalty of these multinationals lies, could the minister assure the House that these corporations had not deliberately supplied biased information to the National Energy Board, information which served as a basis for its most recent report?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I wish that it were as low as 80 per cent. Unfortunately, the industry is controlled to a greater extent than 80 per cent by foreign corporations in this country.

As to the question the hon. member asks with respect to the information provided to the National Energy Board, I can assure him that the National Energy Board is very much aware of the concern he has expressed, the possibility that information could be slanted. That is the reason the National Energy Board exists, and they have experts who are competent to assess the information they are provided with from the point of view of the Canadian interest.

[Mr. Rae.]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Could he explain to the House, without being unduly evasive, how he could be in favour of exporting our surplus of gas, as he was two weeks ago in the House, while knowing that we risk facing a shortage before 1992? Is this not a policy which would greatly benefit the multinationals at the expense of Canadians?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the findings of the National Energy Board with respect to increases in gas reserves are, on the whole, probably conservative. That seems to be the view of many who have knowledge of the situation. I believe that by introducing two additional deliverability tests, the National Energy Board has protected Canada against any premature or excessive export of gas which has been found surplus to domestic needs.

I have also stated that I believe exportable surplus can be used for the benefit of Canada in making economically viable a gas pipeline and the movement of gas to eastern Canada and markets not now served by Canadian gas, and by so doing reduce our dependence on foreign oil.

LOTO CANADA

TICKET SALES IN DRAW NO. 12

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) who is responsible for reporting to parliament on the activities of Loto Canada.

Could the minister confirm to the House that ticket sales in the present draw of Loto Canada, draw No. 12, are likely to be the lowest in its history, and that even if Loto Canada meets its target for draw No. 12, $20 million worth of tickets will remain unsold?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I have the assurance of Loto Canada that it will meet its goal of 3.5 million tickets for draw No. 12.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the minister has confirmed that this will be the worst draw ever and that two million tickets, worth $20 million, will be returned unsold.

● (1425)

Last week, in an attempt to boost lagging sales of tickets for draw No. 12, Loto Canada signed a special arrangement with the merchandising giant, Miracle Mart, to deliver directly to Miracle Mart 5,000 tickets, worth $50,000, as a result bypassing Loto Canada's own wholesalers. I ask the minister why a decision was made to do this, in defiance of Loto Canada's own wholesalers, when the same arrangement is not available to local, small retailers across Canada? Why has a special deal been given to this merchandising giant?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will feel, as I do, that that is a question for the corporation to answer. I will undertake to have them do so.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the minister is responsible to parliament for the activities of this corporation, and she cannot evade that responsibility. Is the minister aware of the fact that the special arrangement signed with Miracle Mart to deliver $50,000 worth of tickets to them in a special deal is very similar to an arrangement with the food industry which resulted in the Ontario government setting up a judicial inquiry into practices in the food industry in Canada? If so, can the minister indicate why it is that Loto Canada would go ahead with a measure which discriminates against small retailers and which clearly is detrimental to the best interests of consumers in Canada?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, as several members on this side have acquainted me with this matter today, I will be happy to ask the corporation to give the hon. member the same report that I give to them.

PROTECTION AGAINST OIL SPILL FROM TANKER "KURDISTAN"

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to gamble, so my question will be for the Minister of the Environment: it concerns the oil pullution situation created by the Kurdistan. Could the minister advise the House—it has now been five days since the accident—whether or not a final decision has been taken in this respect? Will the ship be towed out to sea and sunk or, alternatively, will it be brought into port? If so, which port and when?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the final decision has not been taken. Some proposals are being put forward with regard to the vessel and these are being examined. Coastguard officials, in close conjunction with officials from the Department of the Environment, will look at any proposal before a final decision is made.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I should remind the minister, who comes from the heartland of this country, the prairies, that the Gulf of St. Lawrence is not the most friendly stretch of water in the world. The longer he delays the decision, the greater the danger to the contiguous land mass.

Might I ask the minister, more directly, what is the nature and level of third party liability protection that his department would insist upon with respect to salvage operations? Have we set a dollar level, or do we have a clear understanding of what protection will be afforded with respect to third party liability?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is because we are so very conscious of the importance of the coastal areas and the fisheries concerned that we will take time to be sure that any proposal put forward will be examined and adjudged in the light of Canada's over-all interest.

The question of how to handle the stern portion of the vessel will involve, if it is a question of approaching the Canadian shoreline with it, an issue of potential liability. We are really concerned about the safety of the action more than the question of liability. However, the liability question is important in terms of the judgment by persons in charge of the salvage operations. That remains a part of the negotiations and discussions which are going on right now. On the other hand, the bow part of the vessel is being towed toward deeper portions of the ocean for disposal.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, in all honesty, we are getting nowhere with the Minister of Transport—perhaps he is not properly advised—so may I direct my question back to the Minister of State (Environment)? I understand he was in Nova Scotia over the weekend, taking a look at the situation. Can the minister give us his best guess as to where the missing 3,500 tons of oil are, and does it pose any environmental threat to our lobster and other ground fisheries?

● (1430)

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, on the looks so far by my officials and officials of the Department of Transport, we have not been able to get a good handle on where the 3,500 tons of bunker C might be. There are a number of possibilities. If it was in a slick at some point, we feel we would have found it. A slick has been found in the last little while near the present location of the stern portion of the vessel, but it is a very small one.

The best indications we have as of now are that we do not foresee any environmental damage. Some of the guesses are that the bunker C that has escaped has possibly all been broken up and dissipated, or that it has sunk to the bottom of the ocean. As time goes on, we will be monitoring the situation. I will be pleased to give the hon. member any information I have as it becomes available.

PAYMENT OF DAMAGES FOR OIL POLLUTION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister is considering amendments to existing legislation which would permit parties injured by offshore spills, such as lobster fishermen, to initiate legal action and obtain compensation for damage arising from oil pollution, or are Canadians going to have to wait until the damage is done on the shoreline?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, wherever there is a possibility of obtaining compensation for any damage done, obviously we will be zealous to pursue that. However, that obviously relates to establishing the facts of the law in relation to a specific instance.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It would seem the minister is satisfied with the law under which compensation for oil pollution damage is sought by Canadians as injured parties. Is Canada prepared to take action under IMCO to ensure that pollution accidents such as that which occurred involving the Kurdistan recently are not repeated, and that offences committed within the 200-mile limit will be tried before Canadian courts and not left to courts of the flag?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that Canada has been in the forefront of discussions in IMCO to try to secure worldwide standards that are satisfactory. We will continue to do that. Of course, that will not necessarily avoid certain incidents from occurring. I think it would be wrong to prejudge the facts at this point in time.

REDUCED INSURANCE PREMIUMS FOR NON-SMOKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of state responsible for fitness and amateur sport. In light of a recent study which was carried out in the United States revealing that the accident rate for non-smoking drivers is half that of smokers and, further, that some U.S. insurance companies are now offering discounts on life insurance premiums to non-smokers who exercise regularly, what steps or studies has the minister taken or what action will she take to persuade the Canadian insurance industry that this low-risk group should get some special consideration on their automobile and life insurance premiums?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is a good time to inform the House of the divisions of lifestyle between my ministry and that of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has responsibility for such matters as nutrition, alcohol, drug abuse, tobacco abuse and obesity. In my department, we have responsibility for fitness. Therefore, we have the one positive in the lifestyle area.

The best thing that has been done in my department's operation is to inspire people, through Participaction, to a healthier lifestyle. That has been done at very little cost to the Canadian people. I take this opportunity to commend them. At $500,000 a year there is $8 million in return from the public media of this country which is free of charge. I believe statistics show that Canadians are improving enormously in fitness. The hon. member's question has given me a chance to say that Canadians are now becoming fit.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

FINANCE

RATE OF BANKRUPTCIES VIS-À-VIS UNITED STATES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. The reputable firm of Dun and Bradstreet of New York recorded 7,919 commercial failures in 1977. In Canada, in 1978, however, the rate of such failures amounted to close to 6,000. On a month to month basis, Canada suffered from 458 bankruptcies last month, compared to 559 in February, 1978, in the U.S. With heavily disproportionate scales of economies, the rate of business failures seems to be the same. This is regrettable, though it is a correct reflection of the policies of economic mismanagement pursued by the government.

Does the Minister of Finance have any explanation for this alarming and dismal rate of business bankruptcies in Canada, and what action does he plan to take to reverse this disastrous trend?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is part of the gloom and doom approach to the problem. In a market economy there are some people who try and do not succeed. In Canada, the rate of tax for small businesses is much lower than it is in the United States. I suggest the hon. member look at the document I tabled the night of the budget, November 16. Despite the fact that many more social services are available to citizens of Canada, the rate of tax for both citizens and corporations is not higher than in the United States.

Mr. Darling: In the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I will direct my question to the same minister. Of the business failures indicated in my earlier question, the manufacturing component in the February total of 1978 represented 4 per cent, compared to the present 11 per cent in February, 1979.

Considering the importance of manufacturing in our economy, and taking note that failures in the manufacturing sector are taking place at an increasing rate, what assurances can the minister advance to instil some form of confidence in our manufacturing sector, and can he now take concrete steps to stimulate investment in this vital sector of our economy?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not looked at the situation. For example, two weeks ago Statistics Canada released the fact that the rate of utilization of the capacity of production in Canada increased to almost 90 per cent in the last quarter of 1978, the highest since 1973. In addition, in the last 12 months the manufacturing sector of the Canadian economy created 159,000 new jobs in that sector alone, a record over previous years. The hon. member does not want to look at the positive aspects of the Canadian economy.

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—PRICE OF TEXTILES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance: it concerns prices as they relate to the falling Canadian dollar.

On Friday, the Minister of National Revenue said that he was investigating the charge made by clothing manufacturers that textile companies were taking advantage of the falling Canadian dollar to increase the price of their materials so that they are competitive with foreign prices and foreign textile manufacturers. I ask whether this inquiry is now complete. If it is complete, what are the results and what is the government going to do to make sure that domestic firms are not taking advantage of the low Canadian dollar to increase their products to the level of prices of their foreign competitors?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course the question was put Friday. The hon. member must know whether or not the inquiry has been completed. To my mind, he is exaggerating somewhat. We are very efficient but not quite that much.

I should like to tell the hon. member that, naturally, if the situation is indeed what the hon. member says, I should be very sorry indeed because in the fall of 1976 we imposed quotas in Canada to give a chance to the textile industry to recapture that part of the Canadian market it lost to importers in years past. Now that they have the benefit of the devalued Canadian dollar, I hope they will not waste that opportunity of taking advantage of the situation by, instead of increasing their prices, taking over an even larger share of the Canadian market, increasing their investments and creating more jobs in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: It is also my understanding that the Department of Finance has launched a similar investigation into lumber prices in this country, in view of the fact there are some charges that lumber prices here are being tailored to competition from abroad or the export price. We have also been told that Dow Chemical and Uniroyal Chemical are going to increase the wholesale price of herbicides by about 15 per cent, again because of the export price. Can the minister confirm whether there are investigations into lumber prices and chemical prices? If, indeed, they do find that these companies are taking advantage of the falling Canadian dollar, what kind of action is the government contemplating to make sure those prices are rolled back?

● (1440)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we do not have the intention of controlling prices in Canada. I have said on many occasions since I became Minister of Finance in 1977 that we must move away from a controlled economy, get back to a market economy and let market forces operate. But I do hope people will not abuse the fact that we have a more competitive dollar which has opened up more opportunities for Canadians.

Oral Questions

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ADVERTISEMENTS RESPECTING CREATION OF WESTERN ARM OF CTC

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the acting minister. It arises from the full-page advertisements on grain transportation placed by Transport Canada and being carried in western newspapers. I presume this is an attempt to bolster the image of the Minister of Transport. The advertisements make a great issue of the creation of the western arm of the Canadian Transport Commission. They give the impression that the western arm of the CTC can almost perform miracles in preserving branch lines scheduled for abandonment by the minister's own selected Prairie Rail Action Committee.

Could the minister investigate these blatantly misleading advertisements? I ask this because today, on contacting the information department of the Canadian Transport Commission and requesting an address and a telephone number for the western arm of the Canadian Transport Commission, I was informed that they had never heard of that institution; the only thing they knew was what they read in the newspapers.

Hon. Len Marchand (Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to direct the hon. member's question to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs later today. He will be back in the House tomorrow. Judging from the content of the question, though, perhaps the hon. member should direct it to the Minister of Transport who, I am sure, can explain the situation to the satisfaction of the hon. member and of the House.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the reason we are not directing questions to the Minister of Transport is that we are fed up with his non-answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: However, since the Minister of Transport is so willing to reply, may I ask him how much of the taxpayers' money he has authorized to make possible this exercise in blatant political partisanship?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to give the hon. member the exact figure—I do not have it with me today. I hope he will understand that when farmers and communities are as concerned as they naturally are about the process of making application in connection with the abandonment of branch lines it is important they should have a clear understanding of that process and the way in which they can make their views known to the CTC. In my view it is very desirable this information should be brought to their attention in every possible way.

Mr. Mazankowski: What is the phone number and the address of the western arm of the CTC?

Mr. Lang: The hon. member asks what is the phone number. He should know that we have just announced the creation of this western arm.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: He might also be interested to know that the western farmers and municipal representatives with whom I have met in the last few days are delighted at the prospect of this western arm being set up in Saskatoon, and delighted it is the western arm which will be conducting most of the hearings with respect to these applications. It will be located as quickly as we can find the space in which to house it. It is true, of course, that as a result of the booming economy in western Canada it is not always easy to find office space these days.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. The reply just given by the Minister of Transport is nothing but a joke. I do not think farmers in western Canada or, for that matter, anybody in western Canada, are going to believe a word of what he says.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister investigate these misleading and slanted, political articles which have appeared in western newspapers to determine whether they ought not more properly to be paid for by the Liberal party rather than by the taxpayers through the Department of Transport?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there are others in the House more capable of investigating politics than I am.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POST OFFICE

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Now that the hon. gentleman, on the eve of an election, has capitulated to complaints from all parts of Canada over the deterioration of mail service in urban centres resulting from the freeze on door-to-door delivery, will he respond positively to the long-standing complaints about the freeze on rural mail delivery contracts which has existed since 1974 and has resulted in serious deterioration in rural mail delivery service in all parts of the country?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have capitulated. I simply listen to the people and do whatever gives them better service. That is why I have decided, along with my colleagues in the cabinet, to give home delivery to most areas where there is such a disparity in the service. I think this was a good move, and I hope some members of the opposition who have been writing to me and complaining about it are happy because this is a government which does not promise, but acts.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

As far as the question about the $10,000 limit on rural letter carriers is concerned, this is a very difficult subject and I shall explain why. The Post Office is the only service which has authority to award a $10,000 contract without public tender. We have increased from time to time the value of the contract to reach $10,000 within the limits permitted by the Post Office Act. When the amount goes above $10,000, we are obliged to go to public tender. That is the law.

The hon. member asks me why we do not change the act. We intend to discuss this matter when the Post Office Act comes up for review. But I would like to ask him this: to what limits should we go without calling for public tenders? Should it be $15,000? Should it be $30,000? I imagine we would then be getting complaints perhaps from people in his own riding that they do not have occasion to take part in the tendering process. Such extension of the limit might be unjust to those who wanted to obtain contracts and wanted to put forward public tenders. This is a matter we shall have to discuss in committee or when the Post Office Act is amended.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, successive postmasters general have undertaken to resolve this rapid deterioration in rural service, but the excuse for not doing so—as in the case of the letter carrier freeze—has always been lack of sufficient funds. Now that funds have been made available for restoring service to citizens in urban areas, would the Postmaster General not agree to delay costly implementation of the metric system in the Post Office, commonly known as metric madness, so that funds could be made available to provide for the fair compensation of rural mail carriers?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, every time the hon. member asks questions it is really depressing, because they are always about deteriorating services. He has been in the House for a long time. I know it has been depressing for him to be on that side for so long, but I would ask him to be more optimistic, more objective. A lot of good work is being done in the Post Office. We are moving ahead against competition and even against depressing remarks from the opposition. I will be able to give the hon. member an answer to his question tomorrow when we go into the transport committee.

● (1450)

REQUEST FOR INCREASED SERVICE IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. In view of the increased service by the letter carriers, is there any guarantee that the faster growing areas in western Canada will receive their proportionate share of increased service?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this is proof of the fact that it is not only because of the reactions that we change the policy of the Post Office. I would say that, perhaps more than the Liberal members, the Conservatives would profit by this move, considering this is a very fair government which gives to all Canadians the service they deserve, even in Conservative areas. I can tell the hon. member that western areas such as Edmonton, Saskatoon and Calgary will get as good a service. Toronto, too, will be an area where that service is very much needed.

PACKAGING OF MEDICINES IN CHILD-RESISTANT CONTAINERS

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Considering the dramatic results achieved in recent years in reducing cases of ASA poisoning in children, including no deaths in the last four years, thanks to voluntary action by manufacturers, will the minister soon be making an announcement requiring that at least one size of certain medicines be in child-resistant packaging and that there will be enough flexibility in this regulation to provide for regular, convenient containers for those who need them, such as the elderly, those with seeing problems, arthritis and other handicaps?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I intend to continue the procedure of consultation regarding child-resistant containers in the way in which the hon. member described it, keeping in mind the problems of people suffering from arthritis or other physical handicaps. If I remember correctly, the plan of action was proposed and published for the first time in the Canada Gazette, but my second publication is not yet ready.

FUNDING OF MEDICAL CARE PROGRAM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and in putting it to her I am returning to one of the most serious issues facing Canada today, namely, the possible erosion of the provisions of the medicare act.

In view of the fact that contributions which the federal government may wish to make to the provinces for medical care are limited by the provisions of the Established Programs Financing Act, which puts the contributions on a gross national product basis rather than on the basis of the actual cost of medical care, will the minister, in addition to the information that she is collecting and in addition to the appeals she is making to her colleagues in the provinces, discuss with her colleagues in cabinet the possibility of amending the Established Programs Financing Act or taking any other steps that will enable the federal government to make sure that the medical care program is saved?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the question implies that under the new block funding legislation the provinces are not receiving sufficient funds for health costs to offer adequate fee schedules to their doctors and comply with the basic conditions of medicare in Canada, I assure the hon. member that such is not the case. Ontario, for instance, received a 13.7 per cent increase in 1979-80 over 1978-79 under the legislation referred to by the hon. member. Manitoba, his own province, got an increase of 14.4 per cent, a higher percentage rate of increase than some other provinces.

If, on the other hand, the hon. member is attempting to make me say, as his colleague from Broadview (Mr. Rae) suggested a bit earlier, that we cannot control medicare payments, I can only disagree with him, since the established programs legislation remains subject to the provisions of the 1968-69 medicare act, and in particular to section 7.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was trying very carefully to put my question in a way that did not call for confrontation but rather on the basis that all of us share, which is that the Medical Care Act is one of the most important programs we have in Canada.

In view of the seriousness of the situation and of arguments and discussions on both sides, will the minister take up with the Prime Minister the possibility of there being held a federal-provincial conference of the ministers concerned so that this matter can be thoroughly gone into and the Medical Care Act can be saved before it is eroded any further, no matter who is to blame?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as a representation. A conference could be the best tool whenever we are ready to discuss the matter with the provinces and to make known the concrete guidelines defining acceptable universality, accessibility, and so on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The time is now.

DOCTORS OPTING OUT OF MEDICAL CARE PROGRAM

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's concern over the number of physicians opting out of medical care and the possible erosion of the universality principle, and in view of the fact that the widely accepted principle of opting out by provincial Conservative, Liberal, NDP and Social Credit jurisdictions—particularly the NDP in Saskatchewan, one of the most liberal—does the minister consider that this long-standing opting out principle should be terminated or restricted?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier, and now I would like to remind the hon. member, that I have tried to prevent undue escalation of that problem—in this House or outside the lobby. I have said that we are defining guidelines which would translate into concrete definitions of the cornerstones of medical care in Canada. I have no opinion to express at this point on the cancelling of the opting-out formula which, if I am not mistaken, was also quite important in the negotiations throughout the decade that led to universal medical care in the country.

Oral Questions

YOUNG CANADA WORKS

METHOD USED TO DELIVER APPLICATIONS FOR GRANTS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): My question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The applications for Young Canada Works grants were delivered to the 11 members of the minister's advisory board in the riding of Capilano by courier, at a cost of $7.50. For the Capilano riding alone, this is a cost of $82.50 over and above the minister's frank or the official government envelope. If this were repeated in other ridings in Canada, the cost would be about $22,000.

I should like to ask the minister if this use of the expensive courier service in a period of restraint is an official departmental condemnation of the Canadian postal system.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my answer to the latter question is no; I think we have one of the finest postal systems in the world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Then why don't you use it?

Mr. Cullen: I guess we could fill this room with letters about mail delivered on time, but hon. members opposite are always ready to criticize the postal workers and the outside workers. They refer to "kangaroo courts" when they conduct their in-house operations. I do not think that does the postal service much good. If the hon. member had really been interested in an answer, he could have given me notice of his question and I would have checked it out. However, I will do so.

Mr. Huntington: The only thing you can fill this room with is letters of complaint which all hon. members in this room get about the condition of the postal service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: For the minister and his department to be spending $7.50 to deliver these brown, government envelopes does not require prepared notice of the question: all it needs is an answer—

Some hon. Members: Order.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INVESTIGATIONS BY SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, who is aware that on Friday the Deputy Prime Minister was unable to answer this particular question accurately. In 1969, the government delivered a mandate to our security service to conduct certain investigations into groups that might support or advocate separatism. The following year, in 1970, the government received a 23-page report identifying by name those groups and a description of their activities, including the Parti Québécois.

● (1500)

Having given that mandate, having received the report, and knowing the continuation of the investigation was foremost in the minds of the security service, did no predecessor of the minister or any other minister, including a justice minister, a prime minister or a member of the cabinet committee on security and intelligence ever ask, in the period subsequent to 1970, what methods and procedures were being used by the security service to fulfil the mandate the government had given it?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to read the question asked by the hon. member and the answer given by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council. I have nothing to add to what was said except that some of the conclusions drawn by the hon. member, which are reflected in the preamble of his question, obviously demonstrate the accuracy of the answer by the President of the Privy Council, namely that we should not jump to conclusions before the proceedings of the McDonald commission are over.

[English]

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, again my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I have read the answer of the Deputy Prime Minister, who said no investigation was ordered into a political party. That was not the question at all. The question was that the government had ordered an investigation into various groups and their activities respecting certain political activities, not political parties. A political party happened to be one of the objects of surveillance.

Is the minister saying that the terms of reference of the McDonald commission are so encompassing as to exclude from the House of Commons its right to judge ministerial competence and responsibility and, specifically, that of previous solicitors general? Is that the position of the minister?

Mr. Blais: Of course not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have a notice from the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), but there is an outstanding matter of order from Friday in respect of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—ALLEGED OMISSION FROM "HANSARD" OF STANDING ORDER 43 MOTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I discussed this matter fully with Your Honour this morning, and I will review something of what actually took place. I moved a motion on March 7 commending what was being done by President Carter in his courageous initiative in going personally to Egypt and Israel in his continuing endeavour to bring about peace. So that my motion would receive the unanimous support of the House, I called up the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), who has done exceptionally well in that position. I am one who knows something about the difficulties of the position. I read to him what motion I had in mind. He said that he did not think he could second it. I had not asked him to, but I would have welcomed it.

I made the motion, or at least generalized what the motion would be. Mr. Speaker asked the House whether it would accept it, and it did. Then before I had the opportunity of saying in the regular course that I move, seconded by whoever it was, Mr. Speaker said that it was moved by me and seconded by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who apparently bowed his head when the question arose as to who was seconding the motion. Your Honour accepted that, as naturally you would. However, being concerned on the basis of what the minister had said, that he could not second my motion because of international responsibilities—and I can understand that—I knew there was a change in that regard. By the time the House met ten minutes later, he indicated to Your Honour by his motion of the head that he seconded it. I was concerned about that because I felt he would be embarrassed by having been placed in the position of doing that, which he advised me or informed me he would have difficulty doing within the ambit of his position. I immediately rose and said I should point out that I moved the motion and it was seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

When the blues came out that afternoon, and as soon as I noticed that there was no reference to what I had said in this regard, I pencilled the blues. I underline the fact that I have not seen them since, but no doubt Your Honour has seen them. But a mistake had been made because this motion of mine did not appear in Hansard. Time goes on and nothing whatever is done to clarify a situation which could have been explained very clearly and succinctly, as it was by Your Honour this morning in our discussion.

I betray no uncertainty in my stand when I say that through the years I have had the views of various Speakers. In 1957, when I became prime minister, I endeavoured to bring about the achievement of a Speaker who would be dissociated totally from any political party. I suggested to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that if he would permit me to nominate him, I was sure it would be acceptable, but he decided otherwise.

As to yourself, sir, I have no hesitation in repeating what I have said on two occasions out of the House and publicly two or three months ago, that Your Honour has discharged your responsibilities as Speaker in so acceptable a manner that I hoped Your Honour could be induced to become the permanent Speaker. Now, that was my attitude and it is unchanged.

Having had no word at all concerning the reason my motion did not appear in Hansard—and in particular I emphasize that in the blues I set out the exact wording—I could conclude only that something had taken place which would not be in keeping with parliamentary tradition as I understand it. Now, I claim always to be right and sometimes wrong, but never on the side of wrongness. When there was nothing said about this and no answer given by anyone to the wording clearly set out in the blues, naturally I wondered what had happened.

I raised this matter on Friday in the course of dealing with some matters which concern me very deeply, the erosion of parliament. It is no longer the institution as I have known it through the years, with its ups and downs. But, sir, what has been happening in the last few months is that questions remain unanswered and questions run over a period of months simply because ministers of the government realize that if they answer those questions it will not put the government in good light. I have put two or three questions on the order paper, and I am not going to refer to them again. Then, sir, I raised this question.

If I had had the very comprehensive answer which you gave me this morning at any time in that period of nine days, there would have been no reference to this matter. If anyone who interprets what I said as in any way unjust to you, I can only say I never had such a probability or possibility in mind.

I love this institution of parliament, and when I see it being derogated from day after day, and ridiculed, I begin to wonder. The last few days have been an example. I was not present when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) allegedly made this statement, but on Saturday night—and by that time I had gone home because at my age one does not stay out until 1.30 in the morning—a report came over the radio that he had said that the House would be dissolved. Well, now, either he meant that or he was kidding the Canadian people. Sir, I mentioned parliament. There is no more lonesome position for anyone to occupy than being the only living former prime minister of Canada, but on the basis of things like that people across the country are beginning to point out to me that I will have company.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no hesitation in saying that there was nothing said in derogation of yourself. That stand I take. There is no other stand I could take when I did not have any word for seven, eight or nine days, having pointed out that there was no reference to this motion of mine. I made it here from my seat. It was heard and it was known of. It did not appear in Hansard. Why, it is not for me to say. Whatever takes place of that kind in the House of Commons must appear in Hansard.

I can understand the incongruity of the position, a motion having been passed and bringing in the Secretary of State for External Affairs as the seconder. I, foolishly, decided I did not want to embarrass him and that is why I immediately announced that it was moved by me and seconded by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Vegreville. Anyone who interprets what I said as any derogation of yourself is simply not stating the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I welcome very much the intervention of the right hon. member now as I welcomed the extensive conversation we had about this question this morning. I say it is typical of him that when differences have arisen there has always been this avenue of direct conversation about them. I think that stands the institution of parliament in the best of stead.

In the circumstances, the right hon. member and I did discuss the facts that he has referred to in respect of his motion. I remember the events very well.He had made a preamble in reference to his earlier conversation on that day with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), and he introduced the motion in that way. When he introduced the motion he did not at the time indicate a seconder. I looked in the direction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which was, of course, entirely a voluntary movement on my part. Obviously I had no advance notice of the motion by the very nature of it. The Secretary of State for External Affairs perhaps felt put upon in the circumstances to nod in the affirmative, which he did, and I therefore announced that he was the seconder of the motion. That was, as I say, an action entirely of mine because the right hon. member did not mention a seconder at that time.

After the question was accepted by the House, put and carried, the right hon. member did, indeed, get to his feet to indicate that the seconder he had in mind was the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). However, at that point I had moved to the next person who was in the House ready to make an application and, therefore, the right hon. member's later intervention became a non-proceeding and was not in fact recorded in Hansard. Even now going back over it, I do not know in what way it could. However, it does point out a serious dilemma in that there are events of this sort, and unless given some formal recognition by the Chair they cannot be inscribed in Hansard. That is a very delicate situation.

I think the right hon. member has very fully explained that both he and the Chair were caught in a situation in the circumstances, which can happen in the quickness of the moment, particularly during the putting of these motions under Standing Order 43. I am pleased, as I am sure the House is, that the matter is entirely resolved.

MR. STEWART (COCHRANE)—STATEMENTS MADE BY HON. MEMBERS FOR THUNDER BAY AND TIMMINS CONCERNING REPRESENTATION OF CONSTITUENTS

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, it pains me to have to present this question of privilege today because it arises out of remarks made publicly and on television by two colleagues of this House. The matter goes, in my view, to the very heart of our representative democracy in parliament, and it questions the ability of a member of this House to represent his constituency based on his party affiliation.

The crux of the matter is that the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) and the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) have advised my constituents in the riding of Cochrane publicly that since I changed my caucus affiliation I can no longer represent them properly here. Furthermore, the population in the northern part of the riding was instructed that representations should be made to the hon. member for Thunder Bay, and the population in the southern part of the riding was instructed to address their problems and so on to the hon. member for Timmins.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Both those hon. members have now alleged they now have responsibility for the Cochrane riding.

This has served to confuse my people further. First, the redistribution of ridings had confused many of the people. This was complicated further by the postponement of the election. Finally, when I crossed the floor of this House and indicated my intention to continue representing the people of Cochrane constituency in the future, they at least knew then where matters stood. But immediately thereafter, when my two northern colleagues chose to make their statements, one can imagine the kind of confusion that was created in the minds of my constituents.

The danger of the remarks made is in the fact that they question the value of our system of government. According to these gentlemen, if followed logically, all the members sitting to the left of Your Honour represent no one. In other words, caucus affiliation alone would determine whether or not an MP represents his constituents.

On many occasions I have pointed out to my people that I did not believe in partisan politics once an election campaign is over, but rather that, once elected, I represent all my constituents whether they happen to be Liberal, Conservative, NDP, Social Credit or of no political affiliation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): I believe that is of the essence of our democratic system. The hon. member for Timmins was not elected by anyone in Cochrane riding, nor was the hon. member for Thunder Bay. I am their sole representative and I will continue to be until the next election and hopefully for many years to come. Neither of these gentlemen should be too concerned with the way the constituents in Cochrane will be looked after and represented, because for 11 years they have been quite happy with the service they have received from me. I do not need any help from them.

My argument is reinforced by precedents. I should like to cite a quotation from May's Nineteenth Edition at page 151 as follows:

Conduct not amounting to a direct attempt to influence a Member in the discharge of his duties, but having a tendency to impair his independence in the future performance of his duty, will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

● (1520)

Further concerning the nature and consequences of my actions, in Beauchesne's fourth edition, Citation 111(l) reads:

Wilful misrepresentation of the proceedings of members is an offence of the same character as a libel.

Not only were the statements referred to contemptuous of me personally, but they are even more contemptuous of parliament because they first of all cast disrepute on the House as a whole by implying that only those elected on the government side can represent their constituencies.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Secondly, they attempt to obstruct me in my duties as a member of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) has referred several times to statements made by other members of the House, but to this point I do not have any such statements before me. It would be helpful if I could have such statements so that I could better judge the question of privilege.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I have given the essence of the statements. The statements were made on more than one occasion and particularly on television. They are a matter of record. They were to the effect that from now on the two members in question would be looking after and having the obligation to look after the matters of my constituents, and that the hon. member for Cochrane would no longer be looking after their affairs. That essentially is the matter.

In order to complete my remarks and, indeed, if you judge, Mr. Speaker, that this is a question of privilege, I would like to place on the record a motion. The essence of my argument is that not only are my privileges affected here, but also the privileges of any member who does not happen to have an affiliation with the caucus of the government party. I have cited two citations which I think reinforce that argument. If it is found that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That the attempts by the hon. member for Thunder Bay and the hon. member for Timmins to interfere with the duty of the hon. member for Cochrane to represent and act for the people of his constituency be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to see the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), but I do hope that the point which I just made is appreciated by the hon. member for Cochrane. He has in the circumstances made reference to certain statements, and in order to judge, since those statements form the very basis of the hon. member's question of privilege, the Chair cannot be left in the position of relying on an interpretation of the statements. I would have to have something in the nature of a precise example or reference before I could begin to judge. I do not know whether I can come to a conclusion or not, but this fact certainly leaves me in very great difficulty.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, at the very outset, what you have indicated to the House is the point that I intended to make. The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) has entered this House with these scurrilous charges based on nothing more than hearsay, and they are not substantiated with any kind of written record or tapes.

Mr. Andre: Are you denying them?

Mr. Penner: You, Mr. Speaker, must obviously look at what he has to offer to make the matter something much more than mere hearsay.

Let me now deal with what the hon. member has said. First of all, I can understand why he is so very sensitive. Naturally, any member of parliament with a record of service as poor as this member's would certainly be sensitive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Penner: The hon. member enters this House—

Mr. Nystrom: Seldom.

Mr. Penner: —telling us that the constituents of Cochrane have a right to be served by him and by him alone. Any constituent in Canada, no matter where he or she lives, if not adequately served because the member of parliament is unavailable or because the member is in some other part of the world when he ought to be in his own riding or here in the House of Commons, has the natural right to turn to some other hon. member, such as the member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) or the hon. member for Thunder Bay, to get the service to which he has a right as a Canadian citizen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: As I indicated to you, Mr. Speaker, these comments by the hon. member are not worthy of extensive comment because they are unsubstantiated and totally wrong. Now that the hon. member has decided to leave the party of which he was a member—and he went out to the satisfaction of all members on this side of the House—the constituents of Cochrane know that if they want someone who is on the government side to provide effective action, they can come to a government member, and that is myself or the hon. member for Timmins.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: That is a lot of baloney.

Mr. Penner: I conclude by saying, Mr. Speaker, that I hope you will use your authority at the earliest possible moment to collect all the evidence that the hon. member for Cochrane believes he has. I would be delighted to appear before any committee of this House to talk about the things which he claims I have said. I think that the whole matter should be aired. I would welcome it, and when it is I think that the hon. member who made those charges will be seen once again for what he really is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) come dangerously close to the allegation made just a few moments ago by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart). He seemed to imply in his remarks in this House that there are two kinds of members, those who are in and those who are out, in terms of what he said. That is precisely the point that has been made by the hon. member for Cochrane.

Given that state of mind and given the fact that there has been no denial whatever by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) or any other member who is alleged to be involved in this matter that these remarks were made in the context indicated by the hon. member for Cochrane, then I think that the hon. member for Thunder Bay is quite right, and we had just better wait for that evidence. I hope that you, sir, will see fit to reserve judgment on this matter so that the evidence can be collected and the House itself can look into the matter and settle it once and for all. Clearly, in view of what the hon. member for Thunder Bay said today, there is at least a hint of suspicion.

Mr. Alexander: No hint; he said it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I will put it on that very, very generous and open scale. There is at least a hint that perhaps the hon. member for Cochrane is not so wrong, that there has been a concerted effort to create the feeling in the northern part of Ontario that there are two kinds of members. You come from that area, Mr. Speaker, and you would not want that suspicion to exist, would you?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy), who is absent today because he is attending—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Excuse me, I should correct myself. I recognize the hat of the hon. member for Timmins!

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out two things only. The first I bring up on behalf of the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) who is absent because he is attending the funeral of his brother. I should like to ask that he be reserved the privilege of answering the accusations made against him. The second point is one of procedure. Mr. Speaker, I find it rather preposterous for you to be asked to find that there is a prima facie question of privilege when the hon. member, who presented the motion, limits himself to quoting his doctrine or principles without any specific incident or detail which could justify, as you yourself mentioned, a ruling on whether or not there is at first glance a question of privilege. When the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) says that a "hint" would be sufficient, to my mind he is not being fair, Mr. Speaker. The House does not base its decisions on whether or not there is a question of privilege on "hints". The hon. member who rises on a question of privilege, which procedure must not be abused and must be seldom used according to Beauchesne, the hon. member, I say again, must quote a newspaper article, a television broadcast, or mention the person who is alleged to have made the statement on which his claims are based, to give you something specific on which to base your ruling on whether or not the beautiful principles he mentions are applicable or not.

The second point on my intervention, Mr. Speaker, is intended merely to draw your attention to the fact that the hon. member who presented the motion today completely omitted referring to any specific incident. He limited himself to saying that the hon. members for Timmins (Mr. Roy) and Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), according to what he heard, had claimed that. I say that is a gross abuse of our Standing Orders which allow hon. members to rise on questions of privilege, and that you need not wait for the hon. member for Thunder Bay or even the hon. member for Timmins to deny it officially: you can simply find the motion out of order because its allegation is not supported by any specific incidents.

In any event, out of consideration for the hon. member for Timmins, who should have the right to deny accusations that at first glance seem ill-founded, I should like him to be reserved the right to make his views known and to deny formally the allegations founded on the rumour reported by the hon. member who presented the motion.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as another member involved in this question of privilege but not named, and taking over part of the riding of Cochrane when an election is called, and also having always believed that anyone who had a problem in northern Ontario and felt that I could be of help knew I was always willing to do what I could, I do not object to the matter being made public although my mail is sufficiently heavy that I am certainly not asking for that kind of publicity.

In conjunction with what was said by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on the second point of order arising out of this issue, perhaps if Your Honour finds there is a prima facie case you could also look at what I consider to be the undemocratic and certainly dishonest statement made by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner). He indicated that the only way people in Cochrane are going to be serviced is by having a member who can speak for the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Nielsen: Divine right.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As is so often the case, as we get further away from the core of these procedural questions we get into greater danger. If I am not mistaken, I thought I heard the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) say that a statement made earlier this afternoon by another member was dishonest. Obviously we are complicating this matter very greatly and I think we have to be very careful.

I wonder if the House would not realize that in the circumstances it would be a very dangerous practice for the Chair, as a matter of practice, to indicate in some preliminary way that there may be some question here but the parties ought to go out and gather more evidence in support of their relative positions. That, as a matter of practice, is a matter of great danger.

I think we have to recognize the rather fundamental point that the burden of proving an allegation at the time it is made is upon the person making it. If you produce the material at that particular time, that is fine. If an unanswered point arises in the discussion and a member claims he was not prepared for it and would like to make some answer at a later time or asks the Chair to reserve and give a chance for further argument, that I can understand.

I think it would be dangerous for the Chair to make a preliminary finding of some sort now on the basis of evidence that may be produced. What I have to say now is that there has been a suggestion of sorts but obviously it has not been made with precision because I have no language in front of me that I can look upon and say it constitutes something upon which I can make a decision. If that language does in fact exist, I think I would be acting fairly; our procedures ought not to be too rigid in this regard. I think it would be safer to say that in the present circumstances, and in view of the arguments presented up to the present time, I cannot, in the absence of any precise language, make a finding. For the moment, therefore, I think I ought to set this matter aside.

I do this with leave to the hon. member, if he so wishes, to raise it at some time with something that may not have yet come to his attention but does in the interval, or something of that sort. I ought not to put procedural bars in his way that would at that time at least prevent him from raising it. At this time the sensible course is not for me to say, "Yes, I have some difficulty here because there is a lack of precision, a lack of evidence; what I will do is hold it open for the evidence to arrive." I think that is a dangerous procedure. Therefore I have to say, since I have no specific language in front of me at the moment, that I cannot make a finding and I have to set this matter aside on that basis at the present time.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. McKENZIE—DELAY IN ANSWERING STARRED QUESTION 355

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I see the parliamentary secretary is not going to answer any starred questions today. On October 24, 1978, I placed starred question No. 355 on the order paper. It has been explained to me that starred questions are supposed to be answered within approximately two weeks, not five months. I placed a legitimate question on the order paper which reads as follows:

Did Canadian Aviation Electronics purchase hangars at the Winnipeg International Airport formerly owned by Air Canada and, if so (a) how many (b) at what cost in each case (c) did the Company pay the total agreed purchase price in each case (d) does the Company own the hangars fully, completely and outright (e) does the purchase agreement allow the Company to resell any of the hangars?

This is a legitimate question dealing with public buildings and I have a legitimate reason for asking it. The parliamentary secretary takes issue with this because we get up repeatedly and make remarks additional to the wording of our questions. It is no wonder we do that if we cannot get these questions answered properly, especially starred questions. I would ask him to look into starred question No. 355 and tell me tomorrow why he could not give me the information that I asked for last year.

● (1540)

MR. LAMBERT (EDMONTON WEST)—DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, some three weeks ago I placed some very straightforward questions on the order paper to be answered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). These matters are of notorious knowledge and they are within the competence of the department to answer within a week.

I cannot protest loudly enough on behalf of all members of this House regarding this situation. In most cases answers could be given in a week or ten days, yet we are kept waiting weeks and months. It is not the fault of the parliamentary secretary; he funnels the questions into the House. The fault lies with the ministers and their staff who do not take parliament seriously enough. It is parliament which asks for this information and it is not for the bureaucracy to say no. I say there must be a change. There has to be a change in attitude with regard to answering questions.

Many of us place questions on the order paper but infrequently. We do not do it for a joke, but bureaucrats backing ministers consider that it is a joke. They take all the time in the world to defuse or to try to obfuscate or cover up. Frankly, when I was in your position I would not accept that stand from departmental ministers who told me they could not answer questions. The Speaker of the House is there on behalf of members. I would suggest, sir, that a cluttered order paper is not something of which one should be proud.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this applies to both questions. When there are 2,000-odd questions per session, it is rather difficult to guarantee a reply for each one within one or two weeks, as hon. members suggest. With 2,000 questions on the order paper, each department obviously has more than one question to deal with, and I have always made sure that no question was deliberately put aside and that all necessary action was taken to try and offer, as quickly as possible, the best and most complete answers as possible. All I ask hon. members is to realize that we must consider roughly 2,000 questions per session. Several of them refer to 40-odd departments or agencies, and it is impossible to reply consistently within one or two weeks, as hon. members request.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the parliamentary secretary that there are persons whose sole employment is parliamentary returns. They are either incompetent or the most underemployed people in certain departments. I will agree with the parliamentary secretary that there are some questions which are complicated and of the multi-agency type. But those questions which are straightforward within the department and within reasonable, competent knowledge should not be taking a week or ten days to be answered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question regarding the two items which have just gone through. It pertains to any radical departure which may occur in agreements which Canada has concluded with the countries in question. I have found our relations with Australia far less extensive than what I would like. It is the same thing in the case of South Africa, regardless of what some of the bleeding hearts—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is launching into a debate on the motions. They are not debatable motions. I have to put the question without debate. It is a ways and means motion. When the bill follows, which I assume will be shortly, I will certainly recognize the hon. member.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-51, to amend the Customs Tariff and to make certain amendments to the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Australian Trade Agreement Act, 1960, and the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932, be now read the first time and printed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed from Friday, March 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and motion No. 5 (Mr. Symes).

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I called it four o'clock on Friday I was nearing the completion of my remarks. However, today I was preceded by a motion put by the minister. I find it almost beyond belief that the government would institute closure at this point in time. I do not think I am giving away a confidence when I inform the House that we were quite prepared to pass this bill last Tuesday had the government co-operated on one item, that of not insisting upon closure. Now we have closure to institute closure on a bill which, according to the government of Ontario, would, and I quote:

—convert the modestly endowed Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources into a king of energy. It would grant him absolute and dictatorial powers that are wholly foreign to Canadian practice . . . in times of war. And these dictatorial powers and managerial responsibilities will be exercised by a minister and a board who have no background in such management.

That is the nature of the legislation. We ask one thing, that closure not be put in the bill which would prevent a future parliament from debating the order of the governor in council should these dictatorial powers be assumed. That is all we ask. We ask no closure in the legislation. The minister could have had the bill last Tuesday. We now have closure to implement closure, which is a despicable act by a minister who, besides being modestly endowed, has no respect for democracy and our democratic procedures.

Before closing off this portion of my remarks, I wish to put on the record of this House some comments made in the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works on March 1, as recorded in issue No. 5 of the proceedings of that committee. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) was questioning the minister. I quote from the final part of his question which I think catches the essence of it. The hon. member suggested:

—that Petro-Canada should make the direct contractual link with countries such as Venezuela in terms of oil supply rather than a subsidiary who has to take orders from a parent outside of Canadian control.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) replied as follows:

To suggest—as you may be suggesting or as some of your colleagues have suggested—that Petro-Canada should be the exclusive and sole importing agency for all crude oil would be, it seems to me, to bring about an impossible situation for the Canadian national oil company. I cannot think of a way which would at the present time, at any rate, probably discredit the national oil company of Canada more than asking it to do something which is technically beyond its competence at the present time.

I am not at all sure that in the longer period one should look towards an exclusive importing arrangement. I think it would be far too complicated. I think we should recognize that there are some situations, particularly where crude from the eastern hemisphere is involved, where the international pooling arrangements are to Canada's advantage as long as the Canadian subsidiary and Canadian companies have an access to that, because they can hedge the insecurities associated with middle eastern, eastern hemisphere crude.

On March 1 the minister said to the committee that Petro-Canada lacks the competence to negotiate deals with foreign companies. The minister said it would be a mistake to cut us off from these international pools since it gives us a hedge that is to Canada's benefit. That was the minister's view on March 1. That is the view this party has been talking about throughout this debate.

Somehow between March 1 and a week later the minister said that may be the fact, that maybe in reality Petro-Canada does lack the competence and that we would be putting ourselves in jeopardy in cutting ourselves off from these international pooling arrangements, but in terms of politics it looks good. He said he was going to forget all of the logic, reason and wisdom and pursue the political path. If that damaged the country in the long run, it would not matter to him because we would have an election under our belts by that time.

That was basically the position of the minister in that regard. The fact that it is an irresponsible position is hardly surprising since we are dealing with an irresponsible minister who demonstrated his irresponsibility by moving closure, rule 75C, a few minutes ago. It was a despicable act by a despicable minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the minister?

Mr. Gillespie: I intend to participate on this particular amendment, but not at this point.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing that, an amendment having been moved by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) on behalf of the New Democratic Party, the official opposition having stated their position on it in two speeches, the minister, who would be expected to express the government's point of view, remains in his seat. I know the minister wants to hurry the legislation through and we certainly have no intention of prolonging the debate, but surely this House and the country have a right to know where the minister stands with regard to this amendment. The minister knows perfectly well that if he stays seated long enough and lets everyone else speak, he will be able to close the debate with no opportunity provided for members on this side to answer him without appearing to obstruct the debate, the very thing he is trying to avoid by moving a motion of closure.

The purpose of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie is quite clear and specific. Under this legislation it is proposed that the government in an emergency situation will have the authority to set up an allocation board. By an amendment moved by the minister, which our party will support, it is proposed that Petro-Canada can be named by the governor in council as a member of the allocation board. We think that is a good idea. However, we have gone one step further and said that, in our opinion, Petro-Canada should not only be a member of the allocation board but should be the sole importer of oil into this country. We say that in order to ensure two things. First, it would ensure security of supply. There has been a great deal of talk by members of the official opposition to the effect that only the multinationals with their pools of oil will be able to meet the needs of the Canadian people. That is myth. It is a hangover from a day that is long gone.

There was a day when the multinational corporations had pools of oil because they were the operating companies in the Middle East, Africa and Venezuela. That is no longer true. With the exception of Canada and the United States, in almost every country the great pools of oil have been nationalized. Today they are being developed by government-owned oil companies. That is true today for Mexico, Venezuela, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Iraq, Nigeria and practically all of the oil producing countries.

The oil companies which once controlled the supply of oil have been reduced today to being middlemen and transporters of oil. Exxon, Gulf, Shell, British Petroleum and all these other companies simply buy from these state trading corporations the oil which they need for their subsidiaries. They have the tankers, they ship it and then sell that oil to their subsidiaries and sometimes to other independent companies. They do not have any pools of oil.

For a number of years the trend for the producing countries through their state oil companies has been to insist that they want to deal with oil companies owned by the importing countries. That has been said again and again. When the Shah of Iran was still sitting on the Peacock Throne four or five years ago, he visited Washington where he was interviewed by the press. He said that they would prefer to deal on a government to government basis. The reason he gave was that every time they raised the price of oil at the wellhead by $1 a barrel, the multinational companies, which are the middlemen, raised the price $2 a barrel. Therefore, they were not only blamed for the $1 barrel increase for which they were responsible but for the $1 a barrel which the oil companies added as part of their mark-up.

This has been said by the governments of Mexico, Venezuela and many Middle Eastern countries. I think it can be demonstrated that security of supply is much greater on the basis of having Petro-Canada, with all the prestige that goes with representing the government and the people of Canada, secure our oil supplies. There would be much greater advantage and a greater degree of certainty than if this were done by a multinational company, particularly a multinational company which has incurred the hostility of many of these oil producing countries.

● (1600)

The other benefit of making Petro-Canada the sole importing agency has to do with price. I have heard a good deal of talk from the representative of the Progressive Conservative party to the effect that having Petro-Canada act as the sole importing agent would increase the price. Exactly the opposite would be the case. A government agency buying oil directly from government oil agencies in various part of the world and selling it in Canada to the oil companies which have refineries and facilities for distributing it would ensure that the price charged to the ultimate consumer would be the actual cost of purchasing, shipping it and refining it, with a mark-up for the oil companies which render those services.

One thing the Canadian people would be sure of—and they cannot be sure of it now—is that a multinational company purchasing oil in any part of the world, ostensibly for one of its subsidiaries, say, in Canada, could not under pressure from its own government divert that oil to its own country.

That is what happened in the case of Exxon. Exxon, under an obligation to deliver 100,000 barrels to its subsidiary Imperial Oil, decided unilaterally to divert 25,000 barrels a day to the United States. We cannot complain about that, I suppose, if we look at the situation from the point of view of Exxon. After all, Exxon is incorporated in the United States. It wants to get along with that government; it wants to keep the good will of the people of that country. I suppose the decision it took is one which most of us would take if we were members of the board of directors of Exxon. But by using Petro-Canada to make these oil purchases, we would know that oil contracted for delivery to Canadian oil companies would reach Canadian oil companies and would not be diverted. We cannot be sure of that under the legislation before us.

That is why I had hoped the minister would rise to take part in this debate. As we know, Exxon has thumbed its corporate nose at him twice. First, the hon. gentleman said to Imperial Oil: "We want you to deal directly with the state-owned company in Venezuela, the source of supply". But it did not take Exxon very long to tell Imperial Oil what to do. After all, Exxon owns Imperial Oil, or 70 per cent of its shares. They said, in effect: "You tell Gillespie to forget it".

The second occasion was when the minister demanded restoration of the 25,000 barrels which has been taken away from them. It is true some adjustment was made. They cut the 25,000 to 9,000 as a gesture, but in principle they told him to mind his own business. This was their business, they estimated, and they could distribute oil wherever they wished.

The government has made a lot of fuss. The minister has beat his breast here in the House. He was standing up to Exxon, he told us; he was not going to allow the Canadian consumer to be dependent on what the multinationals did. But what is the role laid out for Petro-Can in this bill? It is merely that it can be a member of the allocation board should the government so decide and be given the right to import oil from Venezuela if it can get agreement from Venezuela to do so after the present agreement with Imperial Oil expires.

If Petro-Canada can do what the minister has said he would like it to and become the importer of oil from Venezuela on a straight government to government trading basis, why could Petro-Canada not do the same thing vis-à-vis the other oil exporting companies in Mexico, Iraq, Iran, Nigeria and so on? There is no reason at all why this should not be the case. Why does the Liberal party always fail to carry through? It makes a cosmetic gesture but never does anything which is meaningful and effective.

I hope the minister will tell us why he feels Petro-Canada should not be authorized to deal with state oil companies other than those of Venezuela. There is nothing mandatory about the amendment in the name of my hon. friend. It simply gives the government power to take action should the occasion arise and should the occasion warrant it. The government would then have the power to make Petro-Canada the sole importer.

I do not intend to take up much time dealing with the comments which have been made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) or the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). The hon. member for Calgary Centre said, if I remember correctly, that this legislation gave dictatorial power to a minister and to a board which had no experience of dealing with these matters. Would the official opposition prefer to continue to put these powers in the hands of the multinational oil companies which have deceived us and exploited the people of this country down through the years?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Come, now! You are not speaking in the Alberta election. You are speaking this week, not last week.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Is that the position of the Ontario government and of the official opposition?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Your record in Saskatchewan on oil is a great example. That is just old party dialectics.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) should not allow himself to generate more indignation than he can handle. He is going to burst one of these days.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am just confused by the hon. member's statement.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I know the hon. member is confused and I am trying to straighten him out.

How have these multinational oil companies been described? They have been described very adequately during the last few days. Let me give just one description which hon. members who are interested in the subject may find at page 4256 of Hansard for last Friday. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is reported as saying:

> I certainly do not want to defend in any manner the present or past history of the multinational oil companies of the world in the world market. On many occasions they certainly have not acted in Canada's best interest. They may not even be acting in Canada's best interest right now. They are obviously acting in their own best interests. That is what they are there for.

● (1610)

He went on to say:

> It is a shame, and one of the tragedies of this government and this country that we have to rely on multinationals at any time for any amount of crude oil.

In my wildest moments I have never made a more excoriating attack on the multinational corporations than those two quotations. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has put the problem in very clear and concise terms. As he describes it, these multinational corporations are not acting in Canada's best interests, have not in the past nor are they now. He points out that it is a shame and a tragedy that we have to rely on them for any amount of crude oil.

If he believes that, then how can he in the same breath oppose this legislation and this amendment and suggest that we should turn over to the multinational corporations, as we have done for decades, the whole question of the distribution of oil? He makes the point in one place that we do not really need to worry about that because the International Energy Agency is now setting up such an organization.

Of course, that is complete nonsense. The International Energy Agency has an agreement which has brought together some 19 countries, of which Canada is a member, and they will from time to time have the authority to agree among themselves as to what amount of reduction they will impose with reference to the importation of oil. In other words, they will try to agree among themselves to reduce the demand so that it will come somewhere close to equating with the supply. But they have no machinery for distributing oil and they will not decide how much Iranian oil will go to Canada, how much to the United States or how much to Japan. Unless we set up our own machinery under this act, unless we give to Petro-Canada the power to be the importing agent with respect to the purchase of oil for Canadian oil companies, that decision will be made by the seven "Big Sisters", by the big oil majors. They will decide, as the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has already stated, what is in their own interest, what is to their best advantage and what will best please the countries where they are incorporated, and that is not Canada.

I shall listen with interest to what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has to say. I do not want him to tell us that he is against the multinational oil companies controlling the distribution of oil but he proposes to leave Petro-Canada without any power other than what the government has already given it to negotiate for sales with Mexico. The minister has so far given a good deal of lip service to strengthening the powers and the capacity of Petro-Canada, and for that I give him credit. I think that Petro-Canada needed more clout, and I think the minister has given it that. It has become a much more effective instrument during the time that he has been minister, and for that I commend him.

I have also noticed, of course, that my friends in the Progressive Conservative party have become more vehement every day about destroying Petro-Canada, and that is going to be a confrontation in this country. But I want to say to the minister that we do not want any pretence about supporting Petro-Canada. The Conservatives want to strangle the baby in its cradle, but I want to make sure that the minister and the Liberal government do not want to starve it in the cradle. Because Petro-Canada might as well be wiped out unless it is going to be given an effective role, and the only way it can have an effective role is to be the sole importer of oil in Canada so as to make sure of security of supply, to make sure that those supplies cannot be diverted to some subsidiary, and to make sure that the price which the Canadian consumer pays is a fair and reasonable price, not a marked up price that takes advantage of the world situation, such as we have today.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the last speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), as I did to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre).

First, I should like to deal with some of the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary Centre. He seemed to resent the fact that I introduced a motion of time allocation prior to his concluding remarks. There was a very simple reason why I introduced that motion. It was because we had been confronted in the House with delaying tactics on the part of the opposition which we on the government side could no longer accept.

If hon. members look at the record, they will see exactly what I mean. We spent four days last week on the report stage. That is an unusually long period of time. Indeed, we have spent the whole week on report stage and we are still on the report stage. There is one reason alone why we are still on the report stage. It is because hon. members opposite have talked and talked and talked. They have kept the debate running and they have not been interested in bringing it to a conclusion. That comes after three days on second reading and another eight meetings in committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Today notice was given of a motion under Standing Order 75c. I believe the time to debate that is tomorrow when the motion is put. It is not before the House today.

An hon. Member: The minister should talk about his bill and about the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The point of order is well taken.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I addressed myself to these points because the hon. member for Calgary Centre specifically raised them in his opening remarks and I think the House would expect me to respond to his comments. I think it is also of some interest since most of us know that this is not a new bill in the sense that its provisions have been before the House once before. I am referring to the bill which was introduced in 1973 and reported out in 1974. There is no substantial difference in the provisions here. This bill has been considered by parliament on a previous occasion, so that to suggest that we needed an extra amount of time when we had already dealt with the bill and there was much on the record, I think is just playing politics with the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands raised the question as to my position on this bill and asked why I had not registered my position. If he were to read the transcript of the committee hearings, he would discover, as did his colleague from Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), that I stated my position with respect to the amendment in committee and it is on the record. This amendment, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands knows, was introduced, not for the first time, at the report stage. Again we are going over the ground. The amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham was dealt with and voted down in committee. Similarly, the amendment of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie was introduced in the committee, considered by the members and voted down. But here again we are going over the same old ground. I made my position very clear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The House has a right to do that.

Mr. Gillespie: I made my position very clear, that this amendment was not needed. I believe the hon. member for Calgary Centre quoted from some of my comments at the committee indicating why I did not believe this amendment is needed at this time. I believe that if hon. members would look at the record and consider the facts, they would realize that the government now has the power to use Petro-Canada in an importing way through the Petro-Canada Act, if it is needed.

● (1620)

I listened very carefully to the remarks of the New Democratic Party member to find out whether he was arguing that this particular amendment was essential to give government the power to have or cause Petro-Canada to move into an importing situation. That has not been the argument of the New Democratic Party. The argument of the proposer of the amendment was that this would feature or advertise an option, or words to that effect. We do not have to put into legislation words which would feature or advertise an option Canada has when we have already that power in existing legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising on a point of order. I am wondering whether the hon. minister would permit a question.

Mr. Gillespie: I would be pleased to answer the hon. member's question at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The minister said that we already have the power. Under the legislation setting up Petro-Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the hon. minister has stated already that he will accept the question at the end of his remarks.

Mr. Gillespie: I would be very pleased to take questions at the end of my remarks, but I should like to deal with the issues raised in the debate on this particular amendment. I have indicated that the power already exists, and therefore I can see no reason why we should put into this bill a particular provision which does not provide any additional power. I think the proposer of the amendment would acknowledge that. That is what I took from his remarks, that it gives the government an option. The government has that option without putting this in.

Mr. Symes: Not true.

Mr. Gillespie: Yes, the government has that option. The events of the last few weeks indicate that the government has that power. It can exercise that option by causing Petro-Canada to enter into negotiations with Petroleos de Venezuela, the national oil company of Venezuela. Let it be understood that that is an initiative the government is taking, an initiative for which the official opposition criticized the government, specifically the energy critic, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

Mr. Lawrence: You are right.

Mr. Gillespie: As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said in his remarks a moment ago, the position of the Conservative party on the functions and place of Petro-Canada at this time are absolutely incredible. I think that is a generous remark; I think it is absolutely ludicrous. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham noted in this debate that the multinational oil companies probably had not always served Canada's best interests. I should like to quote from page 4256 of Hansard dated March 16. When the hon. member was referring to multinational corporations, he said the following:

> On many occasions they certainly have not acted in Canada's best interest. They may not even be acting in Canada's best interest right now. They are obviously acting in their own best interest. That is what they are there for. There is no question about that, but I suggest that at times of shortage or impending shortage the one and only asset we can use in the national interest as far as multinationals are concerned is their knowledge and experience and their access to these international pools—

He went on to say:

> The very time when there is an impending shortage in the international field is certainly not the best time to change horses.

That is an incredible position for a responsible opposition party to take at the very moment when we are faced with shortages, serious international shortages and additional shortages created by the actions of one of the multinational corporations. The official opposition argued that we can place more of our confidence in the multinational corporations, and that we should not use Petro-Canada, the national oil company of Canada, to protect and preserve Canadian interests. That is what the hon. member said—that this is not the time for Petro-Canada to act in Canada's interests. He is willing to accept the multinationals even though he may suspect that they are not behaving in Canada's interests.

Of course, this is the same view expressed by the Conservative party when we discussed the first amendment, the one which would place Petro-Canada as one of the representatives of the federal government on the standing group for emergency questions in the International Energy Agency. At that time in the debate they put on the record that, if they were the government, they would not see any reason to use Petro-Canada to protect and guard Canadian interests when the international allocation system will be implemented by multinational corporations. It is quite clear that the official opposition is consistent. It has been against Petro-Canada from the day it was created. Members of the Conservative party voted against it in the House. They have been consistent ever since in damning it, attacking it and arguing that, if they were to form the government, they would destroy it and get rid of it as a policy instrument.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham had more to say. At page 4256 he indicated that he would effectively let other countries get in ahead as far as Mexican supplies are concerned. He argued that this was the wrong time for Petro-Canada to be negotiating with Pemex, the national oil company of Mexico, because this would be against the Canadian national interest in some way. The hon. member does not seem to realize that most other countries are lined up trying to get a piece of the Mexican action. He does not seem to realize that Exxon Corporation, acting in its own interests and perhaps to some extent in the interests of the United States, has been lined up trying to get a piece of Mexican production. The hon. member does not seem to realize that the French government has sent over trade missions because it wants to get several hundreds of thousands of barrels a day of Mexican oil. The French government regards Mexican oil as a secure source. The hon. member does not seem to realize that the Spanish government, the German government, the Israeli government, or the Japanese government, are interested. The Japanese government is after 300,000 barrels a day. The negotiations between these other countries and Mexico would have taken place without a Canadian negotiator at the table if the Conservative party had had its way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: The Conservative party has not been following the international energy situation. It is without policies in this area; it is blinded by its pathological opposition to, even hate for, Petro-Canada. The Conservative party has yet to find a way of putting Canada first. If the official opposition had thought a little more about Canada, had relied less on others and had not been prepared to take the lead of the province of Alberta, it might have developed its own energy policy. But it has not; it has no policy on price. Its policy respecting Petro-Canada, the national policy instrument, is to destroy it, to get rid of it, wind it up, sell it, carve it up in pieces and dish it out.

The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) gave an interview to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the weekend. I have the transcript in front of me. Once again it is quite clear that the Conservative party has never seen and does not now see Petro-Canada as a policy instrument, an instrument for energy policy in Canada.

Mr. Lawrence: Yes, you are right.

Mr. Gillespie: Again the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham confirms that the Conservative party does not see and has not seen that Canada needs an instrument for energy policy.

Mr. Lawrence: No, no.

Mr. Gillespie: The official opposition has failed to recognize that our industry is largely foreign-controlled, something in the order of 90 per cent or more; that the decisions respecting exploration and development are made by corporations with head offices outside of Canada, with priorities set by those outside of Canada, for very good reason but not always for Canadians.

• (1630)

I am not arguing that multinational corporations and foreign-controlled companies in Canada have never operated to the benefit of Canada, because I think quite clearly they have; and I think that as a result of the Foreign Investment Review Act they are doing so even more because they now have to meet the test of significant benefit to Canada. If more of them will recognize the importance of the principles of international business conduct, particularly those who are not screened by the Foreign Investment Review Agency but who are living in Canada seeking to be good Canadian corporate citizens, and will follow these particular guidelines, Canada will be better served.

However, we are not prepared to base our case just on those particular principles or the protestations of those companies who claim they are following them. We believe that in respect of an industry of this kind, with the degree of foreign control that exists, with an industry that is so strategic—and I emphasize that word "strategic"—in every sense of the word as the oil industry in Canada is, we need a significant policy instrument and a corporation which can give effect to Canadian priorities.

We believe Canada needs an instrument which can be used when a multinational corporation intervenes in an arbitrary way against the best interest of Canada, as the Exxon Corporation did the other day when it diverted oil destined for Canada. We believe we need an instrument of policy that will show that the heavy oils of western Canada represent a priority for Canada.

While we might be able to provide an incentive to the corporate sector, and indeed we have, we are not prepared to believe that tax incentives alone will do the things which are needed for Canada. We do not believe they alone will provide the degree of urgency attached to priorities in Canada. Yet the Leader of the Opposition has said tax policy is the key. He has made it quite clear that he would place all his emphasis on tax policy, and that he would be prepared to give more incentives to the oil companies.

Those are questions we will be debating in weeks to come, but clearly they divide the official opposition and the government party. As I go through statements by the Leader of the Opposition I find that he has said that "Petro-Canada has cost Canadians a great deal of money, and it has given us virtually no advantages that we would want that we did not have earlier". Those are words he has used and put on the public record—that "Petro-Canada has given us virtually no advantages that we would want that we did not have earlier".

What an incredible admission; what an incredible confession for a man who would be the leader of this country! He made that statement obviously out of ignorance. He is a man who comes from an energy-producing part of the country, yet he has so little interest himself in Canadian energy questions that he would make such a statement as "Petro-Canada has given us virtually no advantages that we would want that we did not have earlier."

Has the Leader of the Opposition or opposition members thought about the Exxon situation and how they would have dealt with it? Have they thought about what vehicle or policy instrument they would have used to work out arrangements with Venezuela? I have not heard from them on that, or on what policy instrument they would have used. I have heard very little from them on the way multinationals have established a particular priority in respect of the development of heavy oils in western Canada. That has been clear. At no time has the Leader of the Opposition indicated that heavy oils in western Canada are important, or that we need a policy instrument through which we can escalate their development for Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure you must realize what my point of order is going to be. A little while ago the minister, who has just been speaking, gave notice of a closure motion, indicating that the government wants to get on with this legislation. We now have before us a very precise report stage amendment dealing with the proposal that Petro-Canada should be designated as the sole importer of petroleum and petroleum products in an emergency situation. Surely it is out of order for the minister to wander over the whole question, to revive the second reading debate or to anticipate the third reading debate. If he is anxious to get this debate finished, why does he not deal with that which is before us; in other words, why does he not speak to the motion?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have just about concluded my remarks. I think it is important that we discuss the role of Petro-Canada as that is the subject of the particular amendment before us. As the hon. member has noted, the amendment would make Petro-Canada the sole importer of foreign oil. I think anyone who has been following the debate would recognize that Petro-Can represents a very important policy instrument for any government. I believe that one of its functions should be the importation of foreign oil. That has been very clear in view of the actions we have already taken to ensure that Petro-Canada will in fact become a significant importer and, therefore, provide a greater degree of energy security for Canada.

It is important to recognize that we are dealing with a question of sovereignty here. The Leader of the Opposition has not recognized that. These two sovereign nations, Venezuela and Canada, have stated they want to do business together. We are prepared to provide a market for their oil and they are prepared to guarantee that oil to us. When an international company like the Exxon Corporation intervenes, that international company is interfering with the sovereign rights of, for example, Venezuela and Canada. I think that is important and that is why I have dealt with it.

I indicated at the beginning of my remarks that I felt I had made it clear before the committee why this particular amendment was not needed. We have powers in respect of importing, as I have already indicated, but I do not feel we should hold out the expectation that overnight—and I think this can be read into the amendment—Petro-Canada would take over all imports. Because this would mean arranging all the transportation, determining all the qualities and quantities, establishing contacts with all suppliers, and acquiring a degree of knowledge about the refining industry in this country; and that may not be possible overnight as some of the refiners themselves may want to keep that information to themselves, for good reason.

Others, let us face it, might wish to place Petro-Canada in a position in which it was not able to deliver, particularly in view of the complexity of the job that might be given to it if we were to go the sole importer route. That could have the effect of discrediting Petro-Canada at a very important time when Petro-Canada's competence and its achievements are becoming better known on a week by week basis. Petro-Canada has shown that it can attract management, that it can think imaginatively and well in advance, and that it can put Canadian priorities first. It has shown that it does not have to worry about the views and priorities of those who might make decisions for Canadian subsidiaries operating in Canada, putting their interest before Canadian national interests.

There is a suggestion at times—I think it has been put forward by the Leader of the Opposition—that more Canadian companies—I presume that he means more Canadian controlled companies, although he has not said it because Imperial Oil itself is a Canadian company—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, he has.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Gillespie: I am reading from the text of the remarks he made on Sunday, and he does not make that point.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You can't read.

Mr. Gillespie: Even if the industry were different in terms of Canadian control—and that is obviously some way off into the future, however one may wish that it was sooner rather than later—it does not necessarily follow that the decisions of those companies will always ensure that the risky, far off, and imaginative projects will be undertaken for Canada's good. I am referring to the high Arctic, and I am sure that hon. members realize that there will not be an immediate cash flow from the high Arctic. We know that the Panarctic people, those in the private sector and Canadian companies, have been—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, can he not stay on the point?

Mr. Gillespie: I am dealing with Petro-Canada's future and what this particular amendment would do to it. I think that that is an important point. I understand that the hon. member shares his leader's view, that he would dismantle Petro-Canada; or to quote his leader—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The view that I share with many Canadians is that this is the most incompetent minister that we have ever had in that important portfolio.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member sometimes demonstrates the distinction in this House of being an able parliamentarian, but every so often when he finds himself on the defensive, unfortunately, he loses that distinctiveness and becomes very personal. He seems to feel that by becoming personal he can somehow blur the issue and divert people's attention. What he does not realize is that he somehow diminishes himself. I suggest that the hon. member and some of his colleagues think about what I have said.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): How did we get on to this high level? What about the amendment?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the diminished leader of the Conservative party—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are delaying the bill.

Mr. Gillespie: I have noticed that the hon. member is very uncomfortable—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I would suggest that the minister get back to the clause under discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Thank you for your assistance, Mr. Speaker. I recognize, as we all have in this House, that when we deal with the really gut issues involving Petro-Canada the official opposition squirms and gets very uncomfortable. I suppose the reason they heckle is that it takes their minds off their discomfort. We saw another example of that a moment ago when I accused the House leader for the opposition of sharing the view of the Leader of the Official Opposition. I can understand his discomfort because the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday that they were going to be moving out of Petro-Canada as an instrument.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is right. He said that.

Mr. Gillespie: That is clearly the position of the opposition party. They do not recognize the need for a policy instrument for Canadian energy security.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We do, though, Alastair.

Mr. Gillespie: They would destroy the one significant policy instrument. I believe that Petro-Canada has a very important role to play from the point of view of importing foreign crude, whether it be Venezuelan, Mexican, or perhaps in the not too distant future, Norwegian. Petro-Canada has also been involved in discussions with Statoil, which is the Norwegian national oil company. This makes sense because Norway is a producing nation with a national oil company and is also a NATO ally of ours. My colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) has discussed this aspect, this dimension of security with the Norwegians.

I believe that a Canadian national oil company working with the Norwegian oil company can help to develop and preserve Canadian energy security. I believe that there are a number of other opportunities where the Canadian national oil company can become effective as an importer of crude for Canadian refiners in providing Canadian energy security. However, I do not believe that the particular amendment which has been placed on the table by the New Democratic Party will advance this particular important dimension of Petro-Canada, for the reasons which I have already stated.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated his willingness to answer questions before he concluded his speech. I want to ask him about his statement that Petro-Canada has the power to do the things which have been proposed in the amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. That proposal calls for Petro-Canada to be the sole importer of oil. In view of the fact that the national petroleum corporation act under which Petro-Canada was set up gives Petro-Canada the power to be an importer of oil but not the sole importer of oil, what is the basis for the minister's contention that the power to make Petro-Canada the sole importer of oil already exists on the statute books of this country?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the legislation creating Petro-Canada gives it the right, as the hon. member has said, to import foreign crude into Canada. I am not sure if we are talking about the same act, but the hon. member nods and I gather that he was referring to the same one. If the hon. member would read that act he would see that the powers are there to import foreign crude into Canada. I believe that those powers may increasingly be used. It will depend a great deal on the international situation and the degree to which the refiners in Canada establish a direct buying relationship with western hemisphere crude sources.

I did make it quite clear in my remarks before the committee that I did not see at the present time that it would be particularly useful to contemplate Petro-Canada—

Mr. Symes: Answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: —negotiating for all the oil—and I made reference to that in my remarks a few moments ago—from, let us say, Middle Eastern sources, because I believe that there is an advantage in being able to pool and therefore to hedge our bets with respect to a very unstable part of the world. I am not sure whether we are on exactly the same point, but I think it is quite clear that Petro-Canada does have substantial powers, that it can be directed by the minister to enter into the importing of crude for use in Canada and by Canadian refineries.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask one more question. The minister has now conceded that Petro-Canada only has the authority, under the legislation which set it up, to import oil if the government so decides and, if the legislation which is now before the House passes, if the allocation board so decides. Could the minister tell the House where the authority to make Petro-Canada the sole importer of oil is contained in any legislation, if the minister insists on rejecting this amendment proposed by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It isn't; that is the point.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to debate the fine print with the hon. member. Perhaps this involves a legal opinion. I would draw his attention to the fact that under the heading "Objects, Powers and Duties," section 6(c) of the Petro-Canada Act reads as follows:

—(c) to import, produce, transport, distribute, refine and market hydrocarbons of all descriptions;—

● (1650)

I would underline the word "import". Section 7(1), which deals with powers, reads as follows:

The corporation may do such things as it deems expedient for or conducive to the furtherance of the objects of the corporation, within and outside Canada, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the corporation may,—

Then I would draw the attention of hon. members specifically to subsection (f):

—(f) enter into any arrangements with any government or authority that seem conducive to the attainment of the objects of the corporation and obtain from any such government or authority any rights, privileges and concessions, and carry out, exercise and comply with any such arrangements, rights, privileges and concessions;—

I think it is clear that there are very substantial powers vested in the corporation, but I would want to seek a legal opinion on whether the fine legal point that the hon. member makes is a valid one.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the last submission of the minister, I think he should indeed seek an opinion. He did not answer the question put by the hon. member. I think the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has a point here.

I want to deal with one matter raised by the minister, namely his view that our party is opposed to Petro-Can, which he called "a significant policy instrument in Canadian imports". What is the meaning of the word "significant"? How is this instrument, Petro-Can, more significant than any other instrument available to the Canadian government?

For years and years the Canadian Commercial Corporation has been available to the government for the purpose of acquiring—acquiring supplies of oil, acquiring this, acquiring that.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Take supply and services for instance.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Canadian Commercial Corporation has been in existence for years. I would ask hon. members to look at the objects of that corporation and see whether it does not allow it to do things that the government wishes done by Petro-Can. That power has existed for a long time. I would assume that the Canadian Commercial Corporation is a very "significant" corporation with respect to purchases.

In an aside, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) mentioned the action taken by Mr. Goyer when he was minister of supply and services. Without the benefit of a corporation he managed to import a large amount of oil. Of course, he suffered from a congenital inability to distinguish between good oil and bad oil, but that is not the issue. The issue is that he did without the benefit of a corporation like Petro-Can; Petro-Can did not even exist at that time, of course. The point is that the Government of Canada is the ultimate authority, or should be, not some Crown agency.

It occurs to us to wonder why it is necessary to put all the cards on the Petro-Can table when in fact the Government of Canada has the ultimate power. If it is important to Venezuela, if it is important to Mexico, if it is important to other countries in the world to deal on a government to government basis, why not deal on a government to government oil company basis with those countries? If the minister is trying to argue that the government of Venezuela will deal only with Petro-Can, I cannot accept that; I believe the government of Venezuela would be delighted to deal with the Government of Canada.

When the minister says that this is only an instrument but an instrument which we must have or the country suffers, then I say he has strayed far from the facts. This may be because he lacks the knowledge or sees a little politics in the issue.

There is another matter which I want to deal with very quickly. With or without Petro-Can, in the absence of a system that can lead us to self-sufficiency in this country, can the minister make any guarantees that we will be free from break-up or interruption of importation? The answer is no. With or without Petro-Can, is the government prepared to say, as I asked in the course of the debate on Petro-Can, that those in this country who depend on imported oil can rely on an appropriate price? The government has not said that. The question was asked recently by the Leader of the Opposition but it was evaded. The minister cannot give that kind of assurance and, if he did, he would be misleading the House.

The situation is the same whether we are dealing with or without Petro-Can. From what I have heard in this House from the minister and others, competition for supply governs price. Who in this House, including the minister, is prepared to say that there will be a certain price or a certain supply with or without Petro-Can? Certainly not the minister; he knows that much.

It is important that we understand and that the minister understand that Petro-Can certainly can be an instrument to import, but to put it ahead, in terms of its resources, of the Government of Canada, to put it ahead of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, or to put it ahead of the minister, is, I suggest, stretching credibility to the utmost.

Mr. Gillespie: Are you dealing with the amendment?

Mr. Danson: This is the worst House leader we have ever had.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): As the minister knows, last Friday we were prepared to have this matter completed but the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) got into the act and extended the debate, much to the chagrin of the minister. I ask the minister to examine the course of the debate in order to ensure that he does not mislead himself, and therefore mislead the House, on the number of speakers. I think it is important that the House and the country know that this bill was held up in committee for two full days.

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

ADVISABILITY OF AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF SERVICE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act so that former Canadian armed forces personnel who must accept a release date calculated by the department and who find they are one, two or three days short of a completed full year of service, and therefore ineligible for benefits under the SRBA for that year and also do not benefit from compounding of the indexing factor for subsequent years, could complete the year in question by being credited one extra day for every leap-year of service.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which has at one time or another been before all members of parliament who have Canadian armed forces bases in their ridings and who have a number of retired servicemen living in their constituencies.

When a member of the Canadian armed forces nears retirement, particularly when he is in his last year of service, he gives some thought to the date of his release. Frequently that date of release is calculated by the member in question in consultation with departmental officials on the basis of his having completed a full number of years; for instance, 25, 26, 27 and so on. However, there is a situation that occurs more often than is necessary. When a member of the Canadian armed forces retires and commences drawing his retirement allowance, both his pension and his entitlement with respect to indexing, if that is applicable, he can find that whereas he thought he had served 27 years, he has served only 26 years and 364 days. In other words, he is one day short of 27 years. I have eight or ten examples but there are two examples I wish to put on the record. By the department's own admission there are "numerous" incidents of this nature.

In the calculation of a member's entitlement, there is some conflict as to whether the Julian calendar count is the appropriate method. Where it is used, the actual number of days served is calculated. In the case of its being an unacceptable method of calculation, the years are counted as they appear normally, disregarding additional days picked up during leap years. There are not a lot of these situations but there are some. The cost of rectifying this situation would be negligible, but in terms of the moral injustice we do to members of the Canadian armed forces by causing them the loss of one full year because they have missed one day, the cost is great.

This injustice is difficult to understand, particularly when it is in the competence of this House to correct. What I suggest is a way to restore the benefit of a full year's service to these servicemen when they have 364, 363 or 362 days' service. One might even include service of 361 days, assuming that most members of the Canadian armed forces to whom this would be important served more than 24 years. Indeed, all cases that have come to my attention are matters in excess of 25 years.

In each case the individual has given me permission to cite his case. First is the case of R. C. Howell. He is a constituent of mine and lives in the city of Dartmouth. He retired from the Canadian armed forces in 1966, if my memory serves me correctly. To determine when he would retire, I quote from his certificate of service in the Royal Canadian Navy. This is form C.N.S. 1243. Mr. Howell's service is quite clear. He is a veteran. It shows the heading: "All engagements, including N.C.S., to be noted in these columns". The various columns read: "Date of actually volunteering; Commencement of time; Period volunteered for". Then I come to a column headed "Commencement of time" relating to his last year's service. It reads "6 May 1965"; under the heading "period volunteered for" it says "one year". In other words, to and including 6 May 1966. After having considered very carefully where he stood, and believing he had 27 years of service, Mr. Howell was advised on that date that he only had 26 years and 364 days.

I now quote from a letter written by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson):

As stated in previous correspondence there is no legal way whereby authority could be obtained to change the date of a person's release as to extend the duration of service in the regular force by one day.

When computing total years of service, partial years are calculated by days and each full year by year. Leap-years are not taken into consideration by providing extra days.

The letter goes on to deal with Chief Petty Officer Howell's leave and his entitlements. Before continuing to read from the letter, I remind hon. members that the "commencement of time" was May 6, 1965, "period of time" was one year, and "date of release" was May 6, 1966. Further on the minister's letter reads:

It is unfortunate that the release date of May 4, 1967 resulted in his total service being only 26 years 364 days. CPO Howell was aware of his release date and years of service but had no reason at that time to question it.

● (1710)

Of course he had no reason to question it. After consultation with the appropriate authorities, national defence, he believed that he had served a full 27 years. I again quote:

The requirement for full completed years of service could not be foreseen and the loss of one day's service at that time had no effect on his financial benefits.

Once a release date has been established, it cannot be adjusted within existing regulations. Any change would require legislation which particularly would not be acceptable in today's climate concerning escalation of pensions generally.

In view of this, unfortunately, your constituent's date of release will remain as May 4, 1967 and he will qualify for benefits under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act in 1980 on reaching age 59.

For the sake of one day, my constituent would have been receiving his supplementary benefits in 1979 at age 58. That was the basis of his calculations. The minister shot it down.

There is the very similar case of Chief Petty Officer (retired) S. J. King, another constituent of mine in Dartmouth. The circumstances are almost identical. He sought assurance with regard to a date which would have given him a full 27 years. He was given that assurance and on that basis made his plans to retire. He was subsequently advised, on having signed his release, that he did not have 27 years but 26 years, 364 days. He too was rejected by the ministry, this time for different reasons. As personalities change, you get different interpretations and approaches. The consequences were the same.

In both these cases and in other cases I have sought departmental opinions and other opinions as to whether retired members of the Canadian armed forces could elect to serve one, two or three days in the reserve forces, whatever was required for them to qualify for that one extra day. I was shot down on those grounds. I was also shot down on grounds of sheer compassion, understanding and good will.

I bring this matter before the House in the form of a notice of motion to seek guidance and assistance. Surely this fund can treat retired members of the Canadian armed forces with every advantage. In the case of Mr. Howell and Mr. King, they served with distinction during World War II and in the years following the war. Both had excellent careers yet this is the way they are being rewarded.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

I can suggest a simple remedy. For the purpose of calculating pension entitlement we should use the Julian calendar, which I understand counts the extra day during leap year. When calculating both these careers with that method, you find they have served an extra four or five days. However, they are still being denied this benefit. I admit this is technically correct. I can find no way around it. Nevertheless, losing that one day which would entitle them to full benefits means they will not get their full entitlement one year earlier. It is as a result of this stumbling block.

This is not an earth shattering matter. However, it would give to the Canadian armed forces the perspective that we in this chamber are not callous or indifferent to individual needs. Sometimes with a little care, effort and concern for the welfare of members of the Canadian armed forces, a matter like this can be corrected.

I hope that in bringing this forward members who have had similar experiences will take up the cudgel, privately or otherwise, to the end that if present situations cannot be redressed to the satisfaction of individuals concerned, at least in the future we can devise a scheme that does not seem to be in conflict.

I have heard of sufficient cases to wonder whether the choice is not deliberate. Possibly someone on a Friday afternoon could unthinkingly decide that an effective date of release would be March 29, for example, because the Monday would be April 1, when in fact a March 30 release date was required in order to complete the full year. There are at least two or three documented cases like that. I sometimes wonder whether it is accidental, just a bit of laziness somewhere along the line, or whether in fact it is deliberate.

On examination, I find that this does not constitute a substantial saving to the fund, but it is a major irritant to those directly concerned. It undermines the confidence that members of the Canadian armed forces have in their departmental authorities, in government and in parliament when they consistently see situations like this with no corrective action being taken.

I hope hon. members will give serious consideration to this matter. I look forward to hearing the views not only of my colleague from Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) but of those on the government side as to whether this or some other method of correcting this anomaly and injustice can be found.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, this is a knotty problem before us this afternoon, one where a person lacks one, two or three days of service in order to qualify for a benefit.

● (1720)

This motion proposes that Canadian armed forces personnel who fall short by a few days of the minimum completed years of service required to permit them to receive pension indexing payments under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act at a date earlier than the normal age of 60, be permitted, where necessary, to have included in their service extra days of service from previous leap years.

Before discussing the substance of the motion I would like to explain that under the present legislation, indexing payments for forces personnel normally begin at age 60; however, in the case of persons who have completed 30 years of service, indexing begins at age 55; for persons with 29 complete years of service, indexing commences at age 56; with 28 complete years at age 57, and so on until age 60.

An exception is made in the case of persons who can no longer serve because of disability; in these cases the indexing payments begin right away, and the age and service requirement just described is not applicable. There is also an exception, of course, for the pensions paid to the survivors of the members of the military. Here again the indexation is not governed by the age and service formula but begins right away.

Hon. members will recall that these provisions came into effect as a result of legislation enacted in the fall of 1973. At that time there was substantial agreement that similar contributions and similar benefits should apply for retired members of the forces, the RCMP, the public service and former members of the House of Commons.

The determination of the age at which payment of annuity increases would begin for retired members of the forces and RCMP who had reached 55 with 30 or more years of pensionable service was designed to remove the anomaly created by earlier amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act, which permitted public servants to retire on unreduced annuities after reaching age 55 with 30 or more years of pensionable service. Because under the armed forces plan an individual can retire generally between age 44 and 55 and receive an unreduced annuity, it was considered equitable to begin payment of cost of living increases to the military, the RCMP and former members of the House of Commons at the same age as the public servant can receive an unreduced annuity.

It is my understanding that the members of the Canadian armed forces pay $1.80 into the Canadian forces superannuation fund for every dollar the government puts into the fund. This is done in order to finance the earlier retirement of a considerable number of armed forces personnel, for example; those who retire in their forties or early fifties. This was done several years ago in order to make the Canadian forces superannuation fund financially viable and capable of supporting pensions that start at this earlier date instead of at a later date, say, for people in the public service of Canada, the RCMP etc., and it has worked out to be a financially workable plan.

Turning to the motion itself, it is, of course, true that a statutory change would be necessary to allow the arrangement which is proposed. The Interpretation Act provides the instructions generally necessary to reckon periods of time. Under the existing terms of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, to permit the extra days which a person provided service during a number of previous leap-years to count as service for this purpose would be contrary to the act; rulings under the various federal pension statutes over the years have confirmed that the extra day in a leap-year is only countable when the person retires during a leap-year and has to his or her credit less than a complete year's service for that year. To permit the counting of a number of leap-year days for purposes of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act would be inconsistent with the methods for calculating total service under the various pension statutes for purposes of determining the amount of the individual's basic pension.

While such an amendment would have limited application to a particular group of individuals, it would really be establishing a new "qualifying" date for these people and a different group of individuals would undoubtedly be concerned that they had missed qualifying by two or three more days.

Finally, the effects of falling short of a complete year by a few days are not as severe as the motion indicates. As an example, an individual with 30 complete years of service would receive his or her first indexing adjustment on his fifty-fifth birthday and the amount payable would reflect the cumulative total of all increases authorized since retirement. The individual with slightly less than 30 years would have to wait until his or her fifty-sixth birthday for the first adjustment, but it also would include all increases authorized since retirement, including the amount that would have been payable on the fifty-fifth birthday had the person had 30 years of service.

The foregoing, of course, relates only to the application of the present terms of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. I would point out that the day preceding the tabling of this motion the House gave first reading to Bill C-12, an act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. Statute Law (Superannuation) Amendment Act, 1978 proposes amendments which defer the commencement of indexing payments to all retiring persons other than those retiring on grounds of disability, in the forces, RCMP or the public service to age 60. Therefore, if the proposals in Bill C-12 are enacted, the question of counting leap year days will be removed for future retirements.

Again, the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act currently provides for indexing of the basic annuity based on the consumer price index. As I have said, the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act applies not only to Canadian forces annuitants but also to former public service employees, the RCMP, MPs, etc. Currently, indexing commences when the annuitant's age, added to complete years of service, totals 85. All annuitants age 60 and over receive indexing. Bill C-12 amending the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act will defer indexing to age 60 for future retirees.

In view of the government's intention to defer indexing to age 60, the Department of National Defence feels that a special provision to give indexing a year early to a select few annuitants who will receive indexing prior to age 60 in any case cannot be supported.

The proposal of counting extra days for each leap year served is not without its problems. It would create complaints from people under other pension provisions. A calendar year includes the number of days in the period commencing January 1 and ending December 31. Everyone lives and works through the same number of days whether it happens to be 365 or 366. To make a special provision to count an extra day for those who did not complete the full calendar year would not be fair to those who did complete the full calendar year. Moreover, by implementing this scheme, all that would be achieved is removing one group that is now one, two or three days short of qualifying under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act and creating another group one, two or three days short.

There is no loss of the compounding of the indexing factor in any case. When a person becomes eligible for indexing, the indexing factor applied is the compounded indexing from the year of retirement. This can be illustrated quite easily. For example, take a person who retired in 1973 and who becomes eligible for indexing in 1978. The consumer price index which has been applied during the period is as follows: January 1, 1974, 6.7 per cent; January 1, 1975, 10.1 per cent; January 1, 1976, 11.3 per cent; January 1, 1977, 8.6 per cent, January 1, 1978, 7.2 per cent; for a simple total of 43.9 per cent. While the simple total of the indexing factor is 43.9 per cent, the indexing factor actually applied is the compounded indexing factor of 52.2 per cent.

The Department of National Defence contends that as the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act provided for benefits to those already retired, these annuitants received a benefit they could not have anticipated. There is no loss of withholding of a benefit involved in these cases. Rather, there is an entitlement to a new benefit within the provisions of the legislation passed by parliament.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to contribute to this debate because I too have a constituent who finds himself in this anomalous, difficult position of having served for 27 years and 364 days and finding therefore that the application for indexing to his pension has been delayed by the extra year, although he is in default by only one day. It does strike me as being more than strange that this should have occurred in such a large number of instances.

The particular person who brought this to my attention is a Major Lloyd Fox whose regimental number is 612104307, retired in 1971. Prior to his retirement, since there was a certain flexibility allowed to him which was made known to him under the DROs of February 5, 1969, published in routine orders at Cold Lake, Alberta, where he was then serving, in paragraph 19 on the whole business of terminal leave, people are asked to bring it to the attention of the orderly room with sufficient notice so that the calculations can be made.

It is not just a coincidence, it is a fortunate coincidence that Major Fox retained this particular order because on it he made the calculation which he and the orderly room clerk had made to decide when he should go off on leave so as to determine the actual 28 years that he had planned, and was within his rights to plan, for his retirement. On that particular page of the routine orders of February 5, 1969, are the calculations that were made by Major Fox and the orderly room clerk of the day. They decided between them, having looked at the man's record, that there would be 149 days of rehabilitation leave, 30 days of annual leave, and 30 days of special leave, to which he would be entitled. Calculating back from that, it would mean that his leave should start on August 15, 1970, and the final date of his service, after having exhausted these leave entitlements, would be March 11, 1971.

Those figures appear quite clearly, not just August 15, 1970, but the final date of March 11, 1971, and it is ringed. All the little calculations that were made at the time by the member of the force, Major Fox, and the orderly room clerk, are here.

When the leave authorization was drawn up, two changes were made in the typing which are absolutely unaccountable, unless one were to look perhaps at the Saturdays and Sundays that might have intervened. But the calculations that Major Fox made on this form brought it to an exact figure of 28 years, which is a simple calculation and which would have entitled him, at the age of 57, because of the application of the 85 formula to members of the armed services, to receive the indexation. However, the change was made from March 11 as the final date to March 10. There was no explanation at all as to why that change was made, and while this leave authorization was approved by the captain—presumably he must have been the adjutant at the time—there was no indication that Major Fox himself had to sign the document. He must have seen it because he probably went off the base with it in his pocket, but there is no undertaking, so far as I can see, on the copy of the document I have that he went through it with a fine tooth comb and detected at the time these discrepancies between the calculations he made and the dates that were eventually used.

I notice that my friend, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), has suggested that we might be able to introduce that lost day or that gained day in leap-year into the calculations in order to make up that day for those who are short by one, two or three days but who have served either four, eight or 12 years and would therefore have gained an extra day because of the leap year. That is a device that might have been used, and the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) made quite a case for it being impossible to use this particular formula. But it is not that which worries me in this case; it is the fact that there were dates, presumably agreed upon on one day and then which appeared on the standard form of leave authorization granted to Major Fox a few days later. Those little errors, and they must have been errors, appear. The calculation was made that it would amount to exactly 28 years of service, but then it turns out to be one day short.

It was a couple of years later, so far as I know, that Major Fox raised this matter with the Department of National Defence because of the pension aspect. He exchanged several letters between that time and now without getting any satisfaction at all, the department relying wholly on the leave authorization certificate and allowing no credence whatsoever to the calculations which were made on the routine orders, a copy of which, as I said, he managed to have kept where it can be seen how the calculations were made and where the actual dates appear which were used for leave starting on August 15, 1970 and the final date of the man's service on March 11, 1971. Yet those dates were not transferred to the leave form, with the result that the man is one day short. We might even look at this as a breach of trust. I do not know where to lay the blame, but it seems to me that it is more than just a coincidence this should have happened.

One should consider the facility available to public servants. They are still allowed to retire one day before the end of a calendar year. For example, their retirement date can be set on December 30, 1978, so that they are one day in retirement and may enjoy, two days later, the full indexing which would come on their pensions in 1979. When one considers that, one realizes it is playing with the intent and the letter of the law so that an advantage can be taken. I cannot see why that same one-day leniency should not be available to Major Fox and the CPO's we have heard about from the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Not only are members of the public service allowed to retire on December 30 so that they will be on retirement on December 31, and thereby two days later on January 1 have a pension which is indexed the following year, but there are some members who are deemed to have retired, for example on December 30, 1978, and continue as fully paid members of the public service on into 1979 because they are engaged in a particular work or study which should not be interrupted. This deeming to have retired aspect of the matter also is an argument in favour of allowing a certain amount of latitude, a greater amount of latitude, or even some latitude of one, two or three days in the calculations which have occurred in the case of Major Fox and these other instances. When it can be done for public servants, I fail to see why it should not be done for members of the armed forces.

One should consider the deliberate attempt made by members to find out what day they can go on leave or whether they have that even number. The 28-year service record makes life easier for every one all round. It enables members of the forces to draw their indexed pensions at the age of 57. At the present time, with only 27 years and 364 days of service, they must wait until they are 58 years of age. This is verging on cruel and unusual punishment. I wonder, as did the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, whether there is something deliberate here in recalculating so as to deprive some members of the entitlement. They would have been prepared to spend another day, two days or three days in service so as to be absolutely certain they would draw the entitlement to which they were due when the time came.

I feel there is a case to be made. I have not done a calculation myself. Perhaps I should have done a little more homework on this, but I wonder, in the calculation of the rehabilitation, annual and special leave, whether due allowance was made for the Labour Day holiday, Thanksgiving in October, Christmas in December, New Year's in January, and if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had his way, there might have been even a February 15 holiday in there which should have been entered and might not have been calculated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are glad to have your support.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Just as an aside, I would have argued in favour of June 15 as Magna Carta Day, a day to celebrate a great occasion in the constitutional history of our country. However, Major Fox would not have been able to benefit from June 15 because he thought his term of service ended on March 11, yet the date on the papers turned out to be March 10. Matters which are that close in their calculations, particularly when deliberate and conscientious efforts were made by conscientious people to calculate things properly, and then to be done out of an entitlement which might have been regulated easily by another day or two of service on the base before setting off on leave, deserve much more attention than has been given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) and his staff.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) for his concern about these marginal cases. His proposal is one which certainly is imaginative. But whether or not that particular proposal is accepted, I hope a way can be found so that these cases of obvious injustice can be corrected.

I hope the House will not mind it if I say that this reference to counting leap year days reminds me of something which happened here some years ago. I do not want to rob the member of being the originator of the use of leap year days, but I recall an incident back in 1947 when Mr. King was still prime minister. He was a great person for celebrating anniversaries and getting everything noted about his place in history.

It was announced one day that there would be an occasion to celebrate his having been prime minister for 20 years. It occurred in 1947. Just by chance, President Truman was here that day. We gathered out in the rotunda, and the portraits of Mr. Borden and Mr. King, which now hang on either side of the front door of this chamber, were hung that day in the rotunda. But some of us were curious as to how Mr. King could determine that that was the twentieth anniversary of his becoming prime minister, since he had been in and out of office. Of course we got from the prime minister's office the answer that he had counted the days. He had counted 20 times 365 which was 7,300, but he added five days for the five leap years which would occur in the 20-year period. So, on that day he had been prime minister for 7,305 days. I am sure the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East will be pleased to know that he has an idea which was used in the first place by Mr. Mackenzie King.

The other thought which occurred to me as a way to get extra days of service would be to send some of these people around the world, but make sure they go from west to east all the time, and every time they cross the international date-line they will get in an extra day. Maybe that would do it. The levity with which I suggested that is not to be charged against my support of the proposition that a way should be found to correct these cases, and I am with the hon. member in that respect. However, time is going on and I must not use it up.

I rise mainly to say, as the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East and as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) know, since we are all members of the same committee, we are now dealing with Bill C-12 in which something far more serious faces us, namely, the loss of indexing of pensions for anyone between the ages of 55 and 60. The case has been made very well before us in the committee by representatives of the armed forces, of the RCMP, of the air traffic controllers and so on, that people who are forced to retire by the nature of their contracts or for health reasons, should not be denied the right of the early indexing of their pensions.

It has also been drawn to our attention, or we got this by asking questions, that the amount of money to be saved by cutting out this indexation is very small compared with the amount of money to be saved, for example, by cutting out the indexing that is possible on January 1 for persons who retire late in the year.

However, I am stretching the rule a bit by discussing here what we were discussing out in the committee, but it is relevant, and I think this is an opportunity for us to show to those who are concerned about this that some of us believe the whole question of denying indexing to persons who have to leave their employment because of the nature of a contract is unfair and should be reviewed. Even if it is difficult for the hon. member to sell his precise formula I hope he is winning support, and I hope the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is winning support for the reconsideration of this bill in respect of unfair cases. I hope that among all of us we can do something to save this principle for those who are called upon to leave their positions early.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief as I do not want to be the one to talk out this motion, and I certainly hope the government gives it serious consideration. I have noticed lately that there has been a downgrading of veterans' and servicemen's rights under this government. There have been many examples lately of delays in respect of veterans' appeals and applications for disability pension increases, many of which have to wait for six months to a year to be heard. In addition there has been an easing out of veterans from the civil service at age 55. There have been many sad cases of paraplegics, amputee veterans, being eased out of their jobs. This is an indication of the double standard of this government in dealing with veterans and servicemen.

If you are a retired general you will likely be given an exhaulted position in the government. The chief of staff who retired recently has been made the chairman of the CNR. He is probably drawing a $35,000 a year pension and has now been given a $75,000 a year job. I know of a lieutenant-general who retired recently and was given an executive position with Canada Air. I know of many colonels, generals and so forth, who are being taken back after retirement, as consultants. On the other hand the government is easing out paraplegics and fooling around with a couple of days when looking at some servicemen's pensions. This government very definitely has a double standard when dealing with veterans and servicemen. I hope it will give this motion very serious consideration. Let us get it to the committee, or wherever it has to go. Let the government give some evidence here that it is not out to downgrade veterans' and servicemen's rights.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to join with those who have congratulated the mover of the motion on his general intent in focusing on some difficult cases under the administrative and escalation provisions of military pensions.

I want to make one fundamental point that has not been made. In reading the motion of the hon. member I find one part to be incomprehensible, and I question whether it is factually correct. The motion states in part:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act so that former Canadian armed forces personnel who must accept a release date calculated by the department and who find they are one, two or three days short of a completed full year of service, and therefore ineligible for benefits under the S.R.B.A. for that year and also do not benefit from compounding of the indexing factor for subsequent years—

That is the point on which I am in fundamental disagreement with the hon. member. As I understand it, if his provision were adopted, exactly the same amount would be paid one year later on the man's birthday, and what is at stake is the timing of the initial payment; whether it should be made in advance or later. I have conferred with people responsible for administering the act and I understand there is no loss in escalation over a period of time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But the compounding makes a difference.

Mr. Francis: With all due respect to the hon. member, I understand it is exactly the same amount. If a man were to retire on his 55th birthday with 30 years' service short of one day, under the hon. member's proposition it would be granted to him, whereas under the existing legislation on his 56th birthday exactly the same amount would be paid. In other words, the same amount would be paid in the two cases.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Francis: With all respect to the hon. member, I have talked with administrators of the plan and this is what I am told. Nevertheless, whether I am right or the hon. member is right really does not make a difference. There are inequities which always result from an application of a rule. If we adopt a rule now to take care of a man with 364 days' service, then what about the man with 363 days? If we adopt a rule to protect a man with 363 days, or 362 days, what about the man with 361 days? There is always a problem.

An hon. Member: It's incredible the way hon. members talk these bills out.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member did a fair amount of talking. He talked for a little over 20 minutes. He seems to have some difficulty in accepting the idea that I should express my thoughts in the two and a half minutes which remain to me.

An hon. Member: You people are incredible.

Mr. Francis: I would welcome the hon. member's participation at the committee. I know he has attended, but we are now looking at Bill C-12. We looked at indexing in the bill before us at the committee.

If the motion in its present form were passed it would, by the year 1983, make the entire provision that is the subject of this motion irrelevant, because age, and age alone, would be the consideration. Years of service would not be a consideration in eligibility for escalation. We do have a problem as pointed out by those who testified before the committee. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed this out very well, particularly in respect of members of the RCMP or air traffic controllers who are compulsorily retired prior to age 60. The representations made before the committee for continuation of indexing were strong, and I believe we will have to look hard at this aspect of the problem.

The fact remains that what is before us is a provision dealing with indexing as a general principle, and a means of financing it. The problem of particular groups who are compulsorily retired before age 60 is only in part answered by a pension. What really is involved is a program by the Government of Canada to provide alternative employment, and to make sure that employment in the public service of Canada, as an example, is available to such persons on equal terms, which is not always the case in present circumstances. The problem—

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and motion No. 5 (Mr. Symes).

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Just before the dinner hour, Mr. Speaker, the House was dealing with this amendment following a speech by the minister which seemed to imply that, in his view, the only way the Government of Canada could appropriately deal with foreign governments involving the supply of imported petroleum into our country was through the instrument of Petro-Canada, Petro-Can, or whatever it is called.

In the course of his remarks the minister attempted to leave the impression with the House of Commons that he, as minister, the Government of Canada, and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) as part of the apparatus of the government, on the one hand was unable to deal effectively with foreign countries, and that there was no agency other than Petro-Canada by which Canada could assure itself of a supply of imported petroleum products, aside from exploration, drilling, and all the other things outlined in the statute dealing with Petro-Canada.

I advanced the theory as respectfully as I could, in the face of the opinion advanced by the minister, that the minister was wrong. During the dinner hour I went to the library to assure myself that indeed he was wrong. Had the minister been right, then I would have had some information upon which I could withdraw my submission. This followed an interesting conversation in the lobby with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichin-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) in which we discussed this problem. I did not want to accuse the minister of being wrong if he is right.

I looked into the statute books and found the statute which established the Canadian Commercial Corporation a considerable time ago. For the information of the House, this is in the Revised Statutes of Canada, Chapter 35. This parliament established a corporation, an acquisition corporation because that is its basic thrust, which has the power to import and export goods and services. The statute indicates how broad and powerful the corporation is in terms of importing everything, including petroleum. Section 3(3) of the bill reads as follows:

> The corporation is for all its purposes an agent of Her Majesty and its powers may be exercised only as an agent of Her Majesty.

That is not for any commercial purpose but as an agent of Her Majesty. The board of directors is appointed by the governor in council and the purposes for which the corporation was established are set out, one of which is to obtain goods and commodities outside Canada. I do not see how that can exclude petroleum.

Section 4(1)(c) reads as follows:

—to exercise on behalf and under the direction of the minister any powers or functions vested in the minister by any other act that authorizes the minister to employ the corporation to exercise them;

In Section 3(2) it states:

The corporation shall comply with any general or special direction given by the governor in council—

An order in council issued by the minister can cause the corporation to do things on behalf of the government with reference to carrying out its purposes. I realize that since the terms and conditions of the act which established Petro-Canada have escaped the minister, this may also have escaped his attention. The point is that for the purpose of securing a supply of imported petroleum from Venezuela, Mexico or wherever, the government has had for a considerable time an ample source of power in the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

The minister comes close to misleading this House of Commons, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillespie: Oh, no. What a long bow!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He did not quite mislead the House but he comes close when he advances the theory that it is only through or under the auspices of this corporation that security of supply of imported petroleum can be achieved. If that is the position of the government, then I say the minister is misleading the House because there is ample authority and ample power elsewhere.

The question that Canadians are asking themselves—aside from the existence of an acquisition company of the government—the issue is how, for ten or 12 years, and in the face of an emergency which occurred in 1973, this government has failed to act, so that just prior to a time when we are going to be facing the people of the country they ask for these extraordinary powers to face an emergency which even its most constructive critics indicate does not exist. I would call the attention of the minister to the column in the Ottawa Journal this evening by Mr. W. A. Wilson.

We do not deny the government the right to power to allocate in emergencies. We have indicated our position in relation to this bill. We do not like what the government is attempting to do. That is the situation, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to be sure that I was not in any way misinterpreting the thrust of the minister's remarks. If I do, I apologize to him. The minister has come awfully close to misleading the House with reference to these powers to ensure that the oil is there.

Given that situation, where there is authority in the Canadian Commercial Corporation to do this kind of importing, what ought parliament to do about the amendment of the New Democratic Party, which they advanced in accordance with their principles, that Petro-Canada ought to become the sole implement for dealing with the situation. That is the purport of the amendment. I suggest a good case has to be advanced, and it has not been advanced thus far, on the question of why the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which has power to act, should be stripped of its power in favour of another corporation. That is a very simple proposition.

The minister dealt with the question of delay. He has an unusually short memory, but it is shorter in regard to this bill than it has ever been before. I think he has forgotten that it was he who called a vote last week on Tuesday, on the first amendment. Had he not done so, he would have paved the way for the consideration of this bill by the end of the week. The minister will recall that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) spoke on this amendment on Friday, continuing the debate. I am advised that, in committee, members of the government wasted two days of the proceedings. I have the feeling that there is something about this bill that they want to keep before the House. I would be the last to suggest that it had anything to do with a general election.

The minister said the amendments had been dealt with in committee. He was quite right. I am sure he knows that while a small group of members deal with amendments in committee, under the rules it has always been the right of the House to deal with amendments here, so that members not on the committee can speak to them.

We have the sorry spectacle of a minister at the end of the reign of this government, a government that has neglected the problems of supplying this country with its own fuel, now crying out for help from sources which the minister knows—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support the amendment of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) in view of the fact that we are going to face difficulties in the oil industry. We cannot anticipate what those difficulties will be, but they will come about.

It is appropriate that in this bill Petro-Canada be given the powers for allocation that are suggested. In the interests of the Canadian public, I see no reason for the minister not to agree that Petro-Canada should be given the power to be the sole importer if conditions demand.

● (2020)

This bill has been asked for, in the event of an emergency. The general pattern of our importations should also be considered. There are seven major oil companies that operate in this country.

We have seen Exxon telling Canadian branch plants that because the need in the United States is greater, there will be a shortage of oil for Imperial's customers in Canada. I was surprised to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) defending Exxon's position against Imperial Oil. To defend Exxon against the Canadian company which is diverting some of the oil to the United States which was allocated to Canada, and for Canadians to support that position is simply beyond me. I am sure all of us can see the difficulties ahead. We can all see that it will be absolutely necessary for the government to have the power to designate Petro-Canada as its sole importer.

In Canada we have been fairly well treated with regard to prices in recent years. In many ways Canadians have been treated more fairly than citizens south of the border.

A week or so ago I was in Georgia, and I learned that 23 flights were cancelled. It was not because companies wanted to drop flights, as has been suggested, it was because there was a shortage of gasoline. Eastern Airlines, American Airlines and National Airlines cancelled numerous flights, and Delta followed suit shortly after. That situation has not happened in Canada.

In 1973 when there was a shortage of gasoline in the United States, cars were lined up everywhere. That problem did not exist in Canada. We did not have that situation because we have a number of shyster companies, independent companies, and companies not directly connected to the big seven. In looking at world prices we see that we have enjoyed some reasonable prices in this part of the country because of that fact. Independent companies, such as the Golden Eagle company, were buying on the spot market when there was a surplus. They had obtained sizeable amounts of gasoline which they made available to the public in competition with the major oil companies.

During a taxi ride which I took in Georgia the taxi driver informed me that the price of gasoline had gone up 17 cents that day. Even if one looks at the price of a U.S. gallon in comparison to the price of a Canadian gallon, we are not that badly off. I suggest we are not that badly off because of competition from some independent operators. There are cut rate gas stations which have only a pump and a little shack, and there are the Seven Sisters service stations where there are more extensive facilities. There is no competition in effect among the major oil companies in this country.

As I drive to work there are self service stations on one side of the street selling gasoline one cent less than the station on the other side of the street where you can get your windshield cleaned, tires pumped up, and other services such as checking the oil, battery, and other things. There is no competition, but the minister will find one of these days that those small service stations will not be serviced because there will not be any gasoline available to them. This will result in an immediate increase in price. These oil companies are very close to a cartel operation.

If Petro-Canada were in a position of being declared the sole importer of crude oil to Canada, the argument which the Conservatives have made in this debate that there may be an undercapacity of refineries, obviously will be a factor. It will not be too difficult for Shell to say that their refineries are working to capacity, that they cannot take in any more crude oil than they are using for their own operations, and every company will be able to say the same thing. It is not hard to imagine if Petro-Canada wished it could take over Come-By-Chance, that white elephant on the east coast, and put it into operation so that gas would be distributed uniformly to customers, on the basis of the sunset arrangements. These things will happen.

Undoubtedly there will be difficulties in other oil producing countries. There may be trouble in Venezuela. There may be trouble in the Persian Gulf. In fact there may be trouble in any country supplying oil to the major countries of the world. This government has not thought the problem through. It has only reached the stage of protecting the oil company, the customer has been forgotten. The government is more interested in getting the 9,000 barrels of crude oil for Imperial Oil. Some customers will be left out. It is my guess that it will not be the regular Esso pumps on the street that will be left out. It will be some of the cut-rate gas stations that have kept my price and your price down and have protected the price to customers in eastern Canada. If it had not been for the cut-rate service stations, prices would have risen a long time ago.

The people at the Shell stations, Texaco stations or Imperial Oil stations have always been offended when their company sells to other operators who are buying in bulk on a first come first serve basis on surplus stocks. They have objected to not being given an opportunity to integrate prices so that the advantage will flow not only to the cut-rate operators but to themselves. The government will have to ensure that gas will be made available to those companies if they are to operate on behalf of the Canadian public, and maintain some competition in the industry.

I am not sure how the minister thinks he can go to Venezuela and compete on the market via Petro-Canada or through any agency we may send there. It is true that if the government wishes to make deals directly with those countries, it may be able to do so. However, I am surprised at what I hear from the minister concerning his arrangements with Mexico. A week or so ago I talked with some of the top officials in Mexico. My impression was that Mexico did not want to sell oil to us or to the United States. In fact it just did not want to sell oil. What they were interested in doing was making deals with other countries, Canada in particular, for services rather than cash.

In talking with some of their officials, my impression was that they were interested in an exchange program with Canada whereby we would provide them with agricultural know-how, implements and equipment. In return, they would give us oil on a barter basis. If that is to be the case, it is necessary that we look at oil arrangements with other oil companies.

It would be far better if Petro-Canada were the sole importer of oil into Canada rather than taking the word of the international corporations as to what they are paying in Iran, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, or wherever they may do their buying. If we are going to work on a trade arrangement with countries interested in going into the open market to sell their oil, we must know the latest arrangements of the various companies involved in the purchase of oil.

The minister said that we are protected with FIRA. I would like him to indicate one company we have been protected against by FIRA. That has not worked very well. It is almost like giving a permit to bootleggers to bootleg on a temporary basis in every outlet in town, and refusing to give them a permanent licence.

There is no question but that we must establish Petro-Can as the sole distributor of oil in eastern Canada. As has been pointed out already, it may be necessary to integrate western oil. Money should be poured into developing alternate sources within Canada. That is where the expenditures should be made. We may have to pool our resources both offshore and domestic, and have a price for this blend that will be set in the interests of consumers.

Earlier someone talked about shirts. A good shirt today costs $22. We still import shirts from Taiwan, Korea and Japan. These have a relatively low labour cost. Even with the increase in the value of their money against the Canadian dollar, they can still sell their shirts to Canadian distributors for $5 or $6. We have suggested that the tariff should be removed on shirts.

Any relationship to the price the consumer pays for a shirt and the cost of importing it is purely accidental. We have no knowledge of that as we are not able to supervise it in any way. The same is true of oil. In many cases the companies not only market the oil, but haul it in their own ships. If they increase the shipping cost, obviously that affects the end price. Any such arrangement is detrimental to Canadian consumers.

In the United States there is rationing as far as many of the industrial producers are concerned. Aeroplane gas is rationed. It is likely that on the eastern seaboard, gas for automobiles will be rationed. This does not mean there is a real scarcity, only a contrived scarcity. The free enterprise system in the United States allows the corporations to skin everyone as long as they get away with it. As Mr. McLean used to say, pay as little as possible, get as much as you can, and that is free enterprise. That is what the oil companies do. Over the years the Seven Sisters have grown fat and incompetent because of the way they skinned the public.

Our energy minister is going to expose us to these problems unless he is willing to get into the oil business, not only on an emergency basis, and do this through the aegis of Petro-Canada.

There could be a shortage. Anything is apt to happen with the major producers of oil. If it does, it will reflect on those multinational corporations in the oil business. It was pointed out earlier that, if you are incorporated in the United States, you have an obligation to that country because they might take away your incorporation or do something else that is nasty, such as increase your taxes. The same could happen to a branch plant operating in Canada.

[Mr. Peters.]

What happened with Imperial Oil was not because it did not want to import 100 per cent of its commitment from Exxon. It had a market for that oil in Canada. They could not tell Exxon, the parent corporation, to supply them with this or that amount. Originally the amount was to be reduced by 25,000 barrels a day and this has now been cut to 9,000 barrels a day. Someone will have to suffer. If Canada wishes to take on the multinational corporations, it can do it in no better way than through Petro-Can. No other agency has the same clout. They can do no better than assure eastern Canada that the shortfall can be made up by imported oil which will be equitably distributed to all outlets in Canada.

As far as refining capacity is concerned, let us look at Come-By-Chance. In that installation Canada will have a ready-made refinery with a large capacity which could be used to ensure that Canadians no longer get hosed by the multinational corporations. There would be competitive enterprise in the oil industry—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster).

Some hon. Members: Filibuster!

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of points I should like to make. The amendment before us is designed so that when there is an emergency oil allocation situation, Petro-Canada could move in and become the sole purchaser of oil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Foster: It seems to me the value of Petro-Canada lies, really, in doing exactly what it is presently doing in the case of Mexico and what is proposed in the case of Venezuela. This was one of the purposes of the corporation when the bill was put through the House some years ago, that is, to allow Petro-Canada to deal state by state with oil supplies. At the time we did not know these provisions would be needed so soon but at present they are greatly to our advantage. Oil requirements from abroad have been drawn down from about 800,000 barrels a day to about 500,000. During the Christmas recess the minister negotiated with Mexico for the purchase of 100,000 barrels a day to come on stream, and recently the decision was taken to instruct the corporation to go ahead and negotiate with Venezuela for a direct contract to provide 100,000 barrels a day from that source. It seems to me this is the best way in which Petro-Canada could function.

The amendment proposes that the governor in council should empower Petro-Canada to become the sole purchasing agency. In my view, if we were in an emergency situation we would want all available supplies to come on stream from offshore. Further paper transactions would only complicate the process. Rather than follow such a course, I believe we should be setting up long-term arrangements along the lines of those with Mexico and contemplated with Venezuela. If we look around the world we find that most of the OPEC countries operate through state-controlled oil companies. Rather than inject Petro-Canada into a situation of shortage, which would only cause confusion, we should be using the corporation along the lines already envisaged, that is, to negotiate for long-term supply contracts. If the multinationals want to enter into back-to-back contracts for transporting the oil, that is perhaps acceptable as long as we have the long-term contracts, state by state, to ensure supplies to Canada.

In the circumstances, I do not see the advantage of this amendment. It would be bringing in confusing factors at a time when supplies were already threatened.

The Conservative party, as we know, has stated its intention to destroy Petro-Canada and utilize the services of the Canadian Commercial Corporation or some similar agency to arrange supplies of oil. Such a system would have at least one obvious disadvantage inasmuch as the Canadian Commercial Corporation has no expertise in the field of transportation of oil or, indeed, for the negotiation of long-term supplies. On the other hand, Petro-Canada has already entered into arrangements with Petro-Ven, the Venezuelan national petroleum company, with regard to the supply of oil, and will be putting together long-term supply contracts.

If this were strictly a question of putting out tenders for supplies, the Department of Supply and Services could do the job, but there is obviously a great deal more involved. At this point, Petro-Canada, even though it is a new corporation, is building up expertise in negotiating these long-term contracts and it would obviously be to our disadvantage to place the Canadian Commercial Corporation in the position of trying to deal with a commodity with which they had no experience. On the other hand, as I say, Petro-Canada would have a representative on the energy supply allocation board and on the standing committee set up under the International Energy Agency. Canada would have good representation on these agencies and international bodies, placing it in a good position to know what action should be taken in the event of an emergency. So we have these two points to consider.

We are, of course, aware of the naive and lackadaisical attitude taken by the government of Ontario. A few nights ago in the committee they were saying there was no real need for this bill. They never complained while the former bill was in position during the past several years; they never complained about the preparations which were going on during those years. They certainly put before the committee a very naive suggestion that the bill was not needed and that we could carry out exchanges with the United States. Mr. Speaker, if we look at the situation in the United States we find they are importing about half of their crude oil requirement, something like eight million barrels a day out of the 16 million barrels they use. It is not hard to imagine a scenario in which U.S. stocks would be run down very quickly and none would be available for swaps with Canada.

The policy advocated by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is to build a larger pipeline without ensuring supplies from the tar sands deposits or elsewhere so that adequate use might be made of the line.

I see the official opposition are suggesting they are ready, now, to vote on this amendment. I would not want to delay our progress by any further remarks so I shall be pleased to sit down and allow the amendment to come to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: Sault Ste. Marie is beautiful but Yorkton is more beautiful.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Come, come!

Mr. Nystrom: I was certainly referring to the town, not the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, after that enthusiastic speech by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) I just want to make one or two comments.

Mr. Benjamin: It was a real barnstormer.

An hon. Member: A funeral dirge!

• (2050)

Mr. Nystrom: Anyway, I am very surprised at the minister, at his parliamentary secretary, and at the government opposite. One would think from their rhetoric in the House that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) has moved a motion that is radical and revolutionary and that will turn the world upside down, but I remind them that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie has moved a motion which just adds another option to what the government can do. It says that Petro-Can can be the sole purchaser of oil in an emergency. There is nothing obligatory about that, it just says they can be. Judging from some of the comments that were made by the hon. member for Algoma one would think that this motion is a radical motion which would tie the hands of the government.

I would like to make one or two other comments about what the minister himself said. He criticized members on this side of the House for moving a motion which had already been put forward in committee, and he said it is repetitive. If all we did in the House was original and new, perhaps the House would be a lot further ahead, but that is not the case. There are many things we discuss in the House which are repetitive. I think the point made by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie is a damn good point which should be repeated over and over again until the government finally accepts it.

The minister hangs his hat on the word "may". He said that Petro-Can under the Petro-Canada Act may go into negotiations with other countries to purchase oil and crude directly from offshore, and he said that was good enough. I do not think "may" is good enough. I think Petro-Can needs the power in an emergency to be the sole purchaser for this country because other companies have contracts. This time we are in trouble with Exxon, but next time we might have trouble with one of the other seven Big Sisters, and if the government does not have the power under this emergency act to make Petro-Can the sole purchaser of oil from offshore, we may have the same problem with some of the other companies that we are having with Exxon this time around. I think that is why the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie was very wise and had a lot of foresight when he moved this amendment to the bill.

The other thing I find passing strange is that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), who has spent a great deal of time talking about these multinational companies, about what great things Petro-Can will do, about the very progressive policy of the government, will not accept the reasonable and moderate amendment put to the House by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. I wonder whether or not the Liberal party is just interested in appearing to be the great nationalist party, just appearing to be a party that is fighting multinational oil companies, just trying to appear as the great progressive party. I can see one of the members opposite nodding his head in the affirmative, a member from the back benches opposite. I suspect that they are doing this because the election is coming in a few weeks time and they want to appear to be the party that is interested in protecting the Canadian people against the multinational corporations.

Then, of course, we have the Conservative party. The House leader of that party said that the Canadian Commercial Corporation can purchase the oil in case of an emergency. I ask him: if we have an emergency, why should we not give Petro-Can the power to do the purchasing? Because it is Petro-Can that will have the expertise and the people who know the energy and oil business, not the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and it is Petro-Can which will be in a position to move fast. So if they grant the possibility that this might have to be done, why do they not concede the point that the best agency to do it is Petro-Can? The thinking of the Conservative party does not make sense.

The other point I want to make about the Progressive Conservative party is that they seem to have fits any time you mention Petro-Can. They are on the record as wanting to get rid of Petro-Can. That is the only little tool we have to fight for Canada as a country in the world scene when it comes to oil, but they want to get rid of it. They want to kill the baby before it is properly matured. I see that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) said the following last Friday when criticizing Petro-Can. He said he is against it:

—solely and simply because Petro-Canada people have no experience and no negotiating expertise in this field whatsoever.

What kind of faith do they have in our country? Do they not have any faith in Canada or in Canadians?

[Mr. Nystrom.]

I remember when the provincial government in Saskatchewan decided three years ago to nationalize the major part of the potash industry. The Conservative and Liberal parties in my province said we do not have the expertise, we do not know how to do it. They said that if you tried to nationalize potash, the purchaser of potash would go elsewhere to buy the product. They did not recognize, of course, that the other biggest source of potash is Soviet Russia.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that over 40 per cent of the potash in Saskatchewan is now publicly owned, and it is not someone in the United States who is president of the company. It is a farm boy from south Regina who is president of that company. The headquarters of the company are in Saskatoon. The vice-president is also from Saskatchewan. The management is from our own province, the profits we are making are staying in our province, and the head office jobs are in our province. That company is already, after less than three years, the largest potash company in the world, with the exception of Soviet Russia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: So I say to the Conservatives: do you not have any faith in Canada? Do you not have any faith in Canadians? You only seem to have faith in Exxon and in the seven Big Sisters in the oil world. I know that is the answer of the Conservatives from Alberta and I am afraid it is the answer of the Conservative party from one part of this country to the other.

I want to say in conclusion that I hope the tame, small pussycat sitting across the way with the big Cheshire cat grin will sharpen his teeth, turn into a tiger and start practising the things he is talking about. I hope he will move to strengthen Petro-Can so as to make Petro-Can into the largest oil company in this country. I hope that, in co-operation with the provinces, he will make sure that the oil and gas industries in Canada are taken under public ownership where they belong.

For the life of me I do not see why non-renewable resources should be in the hands of private interests, particularly of companies which are not even Canadian. But I do not think it is much use substituting the decisions made in a foreign corporate boardroom and placing them in a Canadian corporate boardroom. If the minister wants to show real leadership, he should negotiate with the provinces with the objective of making sure that the majority of gas and oil in this country is taken under public ownership. I assure him that at least one province in this country, namely, Saskatchewan, would be only too happy to join him in ensuring that gas and oil are owned by Canadians and are owned collectively by society as a whole.

For these reasons I urge the government to accept the motion put forward by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. It is moderate and reasonable, and in time of emergency Petro-Can would be the sole purchasing agency for gas and oil in this country.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this amendment. I think perhaps we have not looked at all at the problems that are associated with the shortage of oil and with the problems in Iran. We have to remember that Iran, which most western countries had considered to be a stable country, turned out not to be very stable but a real pushover. There are those who consider Iran is in for much more turmoil down the road before things settle there. The facts are that Imperial Oil, which was buying oil directly from Venezuela, had lost its share to its parent company, Exxon, and the force majeure applied by Exxon was against Canadian interests. But we benefited from other aspects, and this is not something that Petro-Can would be able to do.

● (2100)

There were a number of Canadian subsidiaries of international oil companies which were dependent on Iranian oil, and curtailment of crude supplies since the Khomeini revolt began has caused most of them serious dislocations and logistical problems. British Petroleum Ltd., which got about 30 per cent of its crude supplies from Iran, was forced to impose force majeure, rationing on deliveries to affiliates, including BP Canada Ltd. Petrofina Canada Ltd., thought to use 100 per cent Iranian crude for its refinery feedstock, also has had a problem in obtaining crude supplies because its parent, Petrofina Belgium, buys 25 per cent of its crude supplies from British Petroleum. Gulf Canada, Ltd. depended entirely on Iranian oil for its Point Tupper, Nova Scotia, refinery. But once production slowed in Iran, Gulf, through its parent, Gulf Oil Corporation, managed to load an ultra large crude carrier in Kuwait with 2.3 million barrels of crude, enough to keep Point Tupper going for six weeks. Last week another half-loaded ultra large carrier left Kuwait also headed for Point Tupper. Had we had direct-to-direct dealings, this oil would not have been available for Canadian use and certainly we would have lost. Presumably the minister is intending to make all or nearly all deals directly with Venezuela. All the indications are that Mexico will not be a major producer of oil for some years down the road.

When President Carter went looking for oil and gas on his visit to Mexico, he pretty well got the cold shoulder. The Mexicans said that they were not likely to give much oil to the United States, and in fact they berated the Americans for not taking their overflow in surplus population which they have in much greater quantity than oil.

What about the value of oil swaps directly or direct contracts from one government company to another? Should we take and put our eggs in the Venezuelan basket? We must remember that Venezuela has cut back its oil production 50 per cent since 1970. So the question arises as to whether there will be further cuts in Venezuelan oil because Venezuelans are worried about their supplies. Is Venezuela any more of a stable country than Iran was? On the surface it is not nearly as stable.

I should like to refer to the Euromoney Currency Report wherein it refers to Venezuela. It reads as follows:

> President Carlos Andreas Perez, elected in 1973 to preside over the OPEC bonanza, leaves office on March 12. He is succeeded by the Christian Democrats of Luis Herrara Campins. Retrenchment and austerity are certain. Exchange controls and import restrictions will be the first line of defence for the bolivar but no Venezuelan expects them to work. Devaluation is necessary to cut the import bill. Political necessity dictates it should be soon, while the blame can be put on Perez. Expect a significant depreciation, say 15 per cent, perhaps in March. Where possible, local borrowing should be increased.
> The ambitious industrial plans are running late and massively over budget. The trade account was in the red by almost $3 billion last year—the first deficit for 50 years.

It is relatively greater than ours. This is with all the Venezuelan oil to sell. It continues:

> The Central Bank estimates the current account shortfall was $6 billion, and foreign exchange reserves have fallen despite an orgy of foreign borrowing. Import growth remains around 25 per cent. Inflation is widely reckoned at 20 per cent although officially suppressed by price controls and subsidies, which Herrera is pledged to reduce. The money supply is only just being brought under control, decelerating to a 15 per cent growth rate. The largest commercial bank, BND, has become a spectacular casualty, nationalized to prevent a liquidity crisis turning into a widespread banking collapse.

That is the state of Venezuela. It does not have a particularly strong economy. As we realize, in South American countries there are frequent changes in government of a military type. To load on Petro-Canada all of the responsibilities of buying oil offshore seems to be putting all our eggs in one basket. It is not necessarily the best way out. That is all I should like to say about this amendment before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, certainly we have no objection to a vote being held tonight if it is the wish of the House that we should. Quite frankly it was not our wish in the first place that we have recorded votes or that the whole question of this be delayed. This was the insistence of the minister that this matter be delayed by recorded votes. As far as we are concerned, I see no difficulty if the House wishes to move the matter along. Certainly this is in accordance with our wishes. We have no desire to see the matter delayed. This has been more the machinations of the minister which have delayed the matter to this point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), may I say there was an understanding reached today among the House leaders or representatives of the House leaders that at this point which we have now reached we would defer the votes until three o'clock tomorrow. I do not make anything out of it, but the person who was there representing the House leader of the official opposition was party to that agreement. I realize it was not made into a House order, but it was discussed. There was a discussion as to whether the vote would be at eight o'clock tomorrow night or at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon. We agreed among the four of us to support the holding of votes at three o'clock tomorrow. Unless there is an awfully good reason for altering that understanding, I believe we should stay with it.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, although I was not personally party to the earlier discussion among the House leaders, it is my understanding that this matter of a deferred vote was discussed. We on the government side are quite prepared to vote after orders of the day are called tomorrow if it is agreed by members of the House. If in fact the House would prefer to have the vote now, we are prepared to do that. However, we do not want to be accused of not living up to the agreement reached by the party leaders. It is a difficult position for us to be in. We are extremely anxious to deal with this bill and to have the vote as soon as possible. But it was discussed by the House leaders earlier, and we think, in order to keep the integrity of those discussions intact, that it may be better to have the vote tomorrow after orders of the day are called.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, certainly if the government, in line with what it has been doing with this bill, wants the matter delayed until tomorrow, and if the New Democratic Party wants it delayed until tomorrow—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —we would be very happy to accede, but I think it should go on the record that it has not been the opposition which has been delaying passage of this bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that all of us are ready for the vote tonight, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has indicated there were some discussions at a House leaders' meeting which I did not attend. All of us are ready, as we have been since Tuesday of last week to complete the report stage of this bill. However, with this understanding of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think it might be appropriate, given the readiness of all of us, to leave the matter until tomorrow.

● (2110)

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I too attended the meeting of House leaders and can confirm that indeed all the House leaders of every party, the New Democratic Party, the Progressive Conservative party and the government, agreed that should this situation occur the votes should be deferred and be made the first item on the order of the day tomorrow.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

However, I want to remind the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that the report stage was not completed last Tuesday, in fact, last Friday afternoon we heard only the speakers of the Progressive Conservative party and the New Democratic Party so that, if we are still at the report stage this evening, that is today and not last Tuesday as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton maintains, it certainly is not the fault of the government.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to just say another word, and I shall do so in the lowest key I can. I did not like the suggestion of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) that the Liberals or the NDP were trying to put this vote off. The suggestion was made at a House leaders' meeting today that the vote be at eight o'clock tomorrow night, and it was not made by me. I suggest that we reached an agreement that it be at three, and some members have made their plans accordingly. I just think that the agreement that was reached should stand.

Mr. Cafik: In light of the discussion that has taken place, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it would be agreeable to all parties that the vote be deferred until tomorrow after orders of the day have been called, and that it will be the first item of business after that. I think we can proceed to other items presently before the House.

An hon. Member: Call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will understand that whatever negotiations or agreements are reached among House leaders, unless they are made orders of the House they are not binding on all members. At this time I would have to inquire whether there is unanimous consent in respect of deferring the vote until tomorrow at three o'clock. If there is unanimous consent we can make that an order. The best way to do this, if there is a consensus, is to defer the vote on motion No. 5.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had indicated that from the point of view of this party that was agreeable to us. From the statements that have been made it is apparent that we are all prepared to vote tonight, but we are agreeable to deferring the vote until tomorrow. I hope that helps you in respect of what you have to do, Mr. Speaker. I just want to indicate that I understand that the next piece of legislation the government intends to bring forward is the excise tax legislation. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is here and prepared to proceed with that bill when it is called.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent, pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), that a recorded division on motion No. 5 be deferred, and that the recorded division on report stage amendments to Bill C-42 be taken after the calling of orders of the day tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed, and so ordered.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-38, to amend the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this bill contains the necessary legislative amendments to implement the excise tax changes the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) proposed in his budget of November 16, 1978, and in the ways and means motion of January 25, 1979. The most important of these is the proposal to reduce the present 12 per cent federal sales tax to 9 per cent. The new rate will apply to all goods now taxable at the 12 per cent rate, other than alcohol and tobacco products. The 5 per cent rate on building materials and the specific taxes on gasoline and diesel fuel will not be affected by the reduction in the general rate. This measure will reduce federal sales taxes by approximately $1 billion in fiscal year 1979-80.

It is estimated that the cut in the federal sales tax rate will reduce the increase in the consumer price index by one half of 1 per cent. This measure, along with other federal initiatives, will have a direct impact on wage costs through cost of living clauses, and a moderating effect on new settlements. The reduction in the sales tax rate from 12 per cent to 9 per cent will increase the real purchasing power of Canadians by about $1 billion. It will do this in a way that will lead to reduced inflation.

A number of measures contained in this bill are technical provisions which are intended to aid administration or to correct minor anomalies. These include a provision which requires manufacturers of petroleum products to pay taxes on gasoline and diesel fuel at the time of delivery to retail outlets and the conversion of these taxes to metric units.

I should mention, Mr. Speaker, that one of the technical provisions pertains to the time of payment of the sales tax on goods produced by a taxpayer for his own use. Traditionally, the tax on such goods has been paid at the time when the goods were appropriated for his own use. In a recent Federal Court case at the trial division it became apparent that there is a technical deficiency in the law in that it does not specify the time when the tax becomes payable. This particular provision will codify what the government and the business community have believed to be the law for the past 55 years.

Hon. members will recall the comments made by the Minister of Finance during his budget address on the need to modify tax measures which have failed to achieve their objective.

Certain of the energy conservation measures introduced in the Excise Tax Act have not achieved the desired effect. Others have caused unacceptable competitive distortions. In particular, the special levies on marine engines, motorcycles, and aircraft have had a minimal impact on energy conservation, but have weighed heavily upon persons who market these goods in Canada.

On the other side, the exemption from the 5 per cent sales tax for storm doors and windows has exempted most glass used in new construction even though glass is less energy efficient than materials used in solid wall construction, which are taxable. The amendments proposed in Bill C-38 will rationalize the application of the tax to all of these goods.

There are other energy conservation measures in this bill. The exemption for thermal insulation is clarified by specifying a minimum thermal resistance or "R" value. Solar water heaters are added to the list of goods which qualify for exemption from federal sales tax. The government supports the general view that the use of solar heat is one of the more promising areas of energy conservation. It is hoped that this exemption will stimulate the sale and development of this product. Finally, the seven cents per gallon special excise tax on gasoline is being extended to apply to aviation gasoline.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance also announced changes in the air transportation tax imposed on the transportation of persons by air. The proceeds from this tax are allocated to the Department of Transport for financing the air transportation program. The present tax on transportation of a person by air within the taxation area, that is, Canada, the United States and the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, will be increased from 8 per cent with a maximum of $8, to 15 per cent with a maximum of $15. For international flights, the tax will be increased from $8 to $12, with provision in the legislation for a maximum tax of $15.

The proposed increases in the air transportation tax rates will be effective on April 1, 1979, for tickets purchased in Canada, and on July 1, 1979, for tickets purchased outside of Canada. These increases will reduce the public costs of financing the air transportation program by an estimated $72 million in fiscal year 1979-80. This change is a major step in the program to shift the cost of financing the air program from all taxpayers to users of the air system.

It is proposed that the air transportation tax be converted to a user charge levied on the carriers under the Aeronautics Act at some future time. The date of conversion and the structure of the user charge will be determined by consultation between the Department of Transport and the air industry. In order to facilitate that conversion, Bill C-38 will amend the Excise Tax Act to provide authority to repeal the air transportation tax on a date to be fixed by order of the governor in council, subject to negative resolution of parliament.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this bill provides a significant reduction in the general rate of manufacturers' sales tax. It reaffirms the government's commitment to energy conservation, and it provides for increased cost recovery in the provision of services to the air transportation industry. In addition, the bill includes a number of technical amendments which will eliminate anomalies and facilitate administration.

The proposals contained in this bill have received a wide degree of support from the general public as well as the professional community. Since most of the proposed changes are effective as of the budget night, they have already been fully incorporated in the administration of the Excise Tax Act by Revenue Canada. Individual Canadians have seen the prices of many of their household products and automobiles reduced as a result of the general sales tax cut. In order to give these changes the force of law, and in order to remove any public uncertainty about their continuation, I urge hon. members to approve this bill as soon as possible.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on November 16, 1978, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the government, backed by row upon serried row of government supporters, were applauding themselves, but to me it sounded more like two or three boys whistling their way past the graveyard at midnight. After all, it was one month after the byelections across Canada when the government got thoroughly whipped. Then we saw changes in the budget. We will get to the income tax in Bill C-37 in due course, but we are going to talk about Bill C-38 now.

Here, we saw in a half-hearted way the government engaging in a tax cut through a 3 per cent rebate in the manufacturers' sales tax on a certain number of items. These items did not include building materials which are kept at 5 per cent. I must say that if the government had been in any way interested in stimulating industry and employment in this country, it would have gone after a tax cut of 5 per cent on building materials. We all know that outside of a limited number of centres in Canada, house building and residential construction have taken a nose dive.

House building is at an absolute standstill except for places like Edmonton and Calgary in Alberta, and perhaps some expansion in Saskatchewan and some in Toronto, but not a great deal. The industry is ill, and this should have provided an incentive to the government to take away the 5 per cent sales tax on building materials. However, it chose not to do that.

Let us go through the ways and means motion and see just what is provided. First of all, it imposes 12 per cent on alcohol and wines, even including wines produced in Canada. Considering what the government of Ontario has done to wine and spirit prices right now, I think that it is absolutely scandalous the way our governments are performing, particularly with regard to wine. And, incidentally, the provincial governments are doing this without the sanction of their Houses.

I am not saying anything new as far as I am concerned. I think that it has been a monstrous performance by the provincial governments for 50 years in so far as they impose the increases in prices on products which are essentially being taxed without a word of consent or otherwise by the consumers and the people of the country. Never has there been such a flagrant example of the principle of taxation without representation as in the case of alcoholic spirits and wines in this country.

Then there is a confession. Item No. 2 in the ways and means motion is an abject confession of failure. However, the hon. gentleman who is responsible for this particular tax is no longer here. He sits in the wings in Toronto and is known as that "blue eyed" man. I think that this is a legacy of the 1973-1974 era when there was a 5 per cent special excise tax on large motorcycles and 10 per cent special excise tax on boat motors exceeding 20 horsepower. I believe that there is one new government minister who, I am sure, would remember that incident very much, because at that time there was a question of a leak when there was a change in the budgetary proposal with regard to the size of the motors.

At the time it was ecologically right to impose these taxes because we were facing an energy crisis, and the object was to cut down on the consumption of gasoline. Therefore it was decided that the government would cut out large motorcycles, outboard motors in excess of 20 horsepower, and all but the smallest of aircraft used perhaps in the north where there was a special circumstance. The then minister of finance had to be kicked all around this House by members on both sides in order to amend this proposal. Now, according to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) with regard to Bill C-42, we face an even greater shortage of energy. But the government proposes to repeal this tax, thereby confessing that it had nothing to do with the conservation of energy outside of the fact that it was a special tax which raised incidental revenue. It was a worthless exercise, but now it enables the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to claim that he is a jolly good fellow for removing it. It was an empty gesture, ill-conceived, and now is quite readily being removed.

The third item of the ways and means motion deals with the metrification of gasoline and it delimits the tax per litre. That is nothing new and is simply a technical amendment. We now know that gasoline shall be sold as "gasoline, premium, no lead", "gasoline, grade 1", "gasoline, grade 2" and "gasoline, no lead" and "diesel fuel". Then we have the metrification of aviation gasoline which I do not think should concern us too much.

Section 5 delimits specifically the authority to impose a penalty on default of payment of tax due within the time limit specified in the regulations. A person who files a false or defective tax refund claim in regard to gasoline will be liable to a jail sentence. I have not read what the penalty will be but I am sure there will be a provision for a jail sentence. This government loves to put people in jail.

Next we have the technical amendments. The most interesting is paragraph 10 of the ways and means motion which is an amendment to part XVIII or schedule III, dealing with building materials. I remember when a former minister of finance, Mr. Turner, brought in an amendment with regard to thermal insulation materials designed exclusively for the insulation of buildings. That is what was inserted in the act, but we had trouble with the definition. It took two years to convince the government, on behalf of a manufacturer in Edmonton and one elsewhere, that wheat straw compressed under high pressure steam, a form of insulation board manufactured for the last 30 years, was in fact an insulating material. Because it stood up and could be used between the joists in steel buildings and in roofs as purely an insulating material, the department decided that while it was originally an insulating product, it was also designed to give strength to the building. It therefore did not qualify.

I made two direct appeals, going up the scale through officials in the department, through the deputy minister, to the minister. I provided samples of the material and descriptive literature and won a part concession, but the final answer was no. My constituents had to pay thousands and thousands of dollars which, of course, they in turn collected from their customers. Eventually, someone in the province of Quebec took a case to court. The court agreed with us, and then the department had to refund to my client and a number of other manufacturers of the same type of materials, the tax they had paid.

Strangely enough, Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to find any record of how much the department had to refund as a result of that errant interpretation, nor under what item the tax was refunded. When we reach this particular point in committee of the whole I trust that the parliamentary secretary will alert the minister and see that he is provided with the information I want.

We now have a much more precise definition. It may make sense. It would be interesting to know what types of insulating materials will now be excluded from this definition as it is worded.

There is one measure that is to the advantage of everybody. I do not suppose anyone had thought about how high the excise tax was on trailers that are used as homes. We have a very mobile population today, Mr. Speaker. People working in the oil fields, and on construction sites removed from major urban centres, live in these trailers year round. I suppose at one time they were deemed to be pleasure vehicles—something you took to the lake in summer. They were deemed to be a luxury item and as such attracted a 25 per cent tax on the sale or duty paid value.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) will speak about the increase in the user tax and sales tax for people using Department of Transport installations. The parliamentary secretary had a lot to say at the beginning. I think he said there was going to be a cut of half of 1 per cent in the cost of living as a result of the reduction from 12 per cent to 9 per cent in the manufacturers sale tax. He then did not say how much the increase in the user tax at the airports will increase the cost of living by the increase in the cost of travel. Considering that the majority of travel in this country is by air, how much does he think the Ministry of Transport will collect as a result of that increase in tax? That is rather a substantial amount. Let us read paragraph 17:

● (2140)

The ad valorem tax imposed on the amount paid or payable for transportation of a person by air within the taxation area,—

That is Canada. The paragraph continues:

—as defined for purposes of part II of the said act, be increased to the lesser of 15 per cent and such amount as may be prescribed by order of the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport.

Paragraph 18 of the ways and means motion reads:

The specific tax imposed on the amount paid or payable for transportation of a person by air from a point within the taxation area, as defined for purposes of part II of the said act, to a point outside of the taxation area—

That is from Canada to the United States. The paragraph continues:

—be increased to the lesser of $15.00 and such amount as may be prescribed by order of the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport.

That is a substantial increase. In some of our airports in Canada this is downright taxation. It is not a user fee, it is downright confiscation. Take the Edmonton International Airport, for example. The daily passenger use of that terminal is far in excess of anything even estimated for 1985. Incoming passengers from abroad going through customs, for over a year and a half, until last June when some minor amendments were made, were handled just like cattle. We unload hogs and beef cattle at packing plants with greater respect than we handle passengers coming off planes late at night. We are told that people will have to put up with this situation until 1982 when the new facilities are expected to be in place. The traffic is increasing all the time and the conditions get worse. But what is happening? It is just like the Post Office, the service goes down but the fees go up.

If I say this applies in Edmonton, I say it applies in other air terminals as well. For example, the situation in Ottawa is terrible. For a national capital to have an air terminal with such poor facilities is ludicrous. There is insufficient parking for the public. In so far as the passengers are concerned they do not have proper facilities. Checking in is a mad scramble, and yet we are all to pay the same fees.

It is a pleasure to go into the Mirabel of the west at Calgary. This air terminal was supposed to cost something between $30 million and $40 million and came in at $138 million or $148 million. A good part of that was sheer incompetence and procrastination on the part of the Ministry of Transport because it took so long to build. With escalating costs, this business of stretch-out is a losing game in so far as government is concerned.

The government thinks it can stretch projects. This is what it has done in the city of Edmonton. The government says, "Defer for a year, stretch it out." But by doing this, in the end it costs maybe twice or three times as much. This is the shortsightedness of some government policies. This short sightedness not only applies to the federal government, it also applies to municipalities where some city councils have decided, for one reason or another, that they will push off certain needed improvements by reason of the fact that they say, "We will save a few mills", or they may think they can save half a mill on the municipal tax for the year in question. The only thing is that it will cost a mill or a mill and a half the following year, or two years later. This is total false economy. That is one of the worst practices that government at all levels in this country inflicts upon Canadian citizens. It is a shortsighted view, and in my opinion should not apply.

I come now to another area that has been drawn to my attention. It is unfortunate the government has not brought forward the appropriate measure for the finance committee to consider, the commodities tax, the whole of the manufacturers sales tax, not only the philosophy of it but its definition; the rigidity with which rulings are applied, and the horse and buggy age for which the Sales Tax Act schedules are usually applicable.

In another context, dealing with the Bank Act, I have always felt that we were not legislating for the future but were trying to legislate for the year of the quill pen. It is precisely that which we are doing with this particular act. As a matter of administration, under sales tax, clauses are split. One gets the most fantastic interpretations of the English language with the actual position of the words. If the Department of Finance drafters and the Department of Justice people who put together the legislative amendments to the schedules of the act do not carry out precisely with the language the intention of the Minister of Finance, then the whole purpose of any tax change proposed by the Minister of Finance, accepted, amended or rejected by this House, or part of it, still gets a different interpretation and a different application than that given by the Minister of Finance. Once we have interpretation bulletins filling the books, like the one I have here for the Department of National Revenue, Excise Department, nothing short of dynamite, total repeal of the act or anything based on it will change those interpretations.

I was given a classic example this afternoon by a dentist who now runs a dental supply firm. I have not been able to find the example in the myriads of definitions of the act, but if we go to dental materials it says: "impression materials". In other words, anything used to take an impression of a tooth, gums or of the mouth for the purpose of dentures or various tooth repairs, are exempt. They come under the general exemptions for health items. At page 390 of whatever book it was in—I have not found it yet—is what is called dental materials extension. These items are precisely the same as the impression materials. They are subject to tax. One classification is coeflex, a material for taking an impression in the mouth. That is deemed to be taxable. Another is jel-cone, a silicone based rubber type material. It is taxable. Another item is called jel-trate, made of sodium alginate. It is taxable. Another is methyl-methacycrilate which is taxable. Another item, orthocryl, is taxable, while microlon is non-taxable. The chemical base and composition of both of them are the same. One is taxable, the other is not. Both are used for the same purpose, but there is a difference in treatment.

I cite this as rather a minor item, but it shows the jungle that small businessmen have to go through and the sheer frustration they suffer. When they look through the schedules and the excise bulletins, as do the officials who have to explain them, these people suffer utter frustration. They see one item that is composed of certain materials and is of a particular use which is taxable, and another item composed of the same materials for basically the same purpose which is non-taxable.

The last item I want to draw to the attention of the House is another incident which applies in Bill C-42. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and others have protested against making rules for this House by statute. The provision for closure in C-42 is totally unacceptable to this House. It should be. By statute we are getting different modes of closure and different modes of procedure.

Let us look at what happens in this bill. Clause 16 deals with an order made under clause 15. Subclause (3) of clause 16 determines how the motion shall be dealt with by a parliament. Clause 16(1) and (2) reads:

(1) An order under section 15 shall be laid before parliament not later than the fifteenth sitting day of parliament after it is issued.

(2) An order referred to in subsection (1) shall come into force on the thirtieth sitting day of parliament after it has been laid before parliament pursuant to that subsection unless before the twentieth sitting day of parliament after the order has been laid before parliament a motion for the consideration of either House, to the effect that the order be revoked, signed by not less than fifty members of the House of Commons in the case of a motion for the consideration of that House and by not less than twenty members of the Senate in the case of a motion for the consideration of the Senate, is filed with the Speaker of the appropriate House.

Then it determines how those motions shall be debated and for how long. There will be a five hour debate. I quote from subclause (4):

—on the conclusion of such debate or at the expiry of the fifth such hour, the Speaker of the House of Commons or the Senate, as the case may be, shall forthwith, without further debate or amendment, put every question necessary for the disposal of the motion.

Here is another closure motion. Are we going to get this as a regular practice in every bill, that it will be provided that there shall be a motion for some consideration by parliament, that parliament will be able to debate that motion for three, five, ten or 20 hours, and then it will be brought to an end? What an easy way out for a government to take. We will be told ahead of time, by statute, how long parliament shall debate any question.

After the next election parliament will be composed of 280 members. Following the next census, it may be over 300 if the stupid act we have on the record continues to prevail and we simply expand the numbers in this House beyond reason. The hours of debate will remain the same and the closure will be even tighter. This is one provision of which we do not approve.

We will not approve closure by statute. If it was wrong in Bill C-42, the petroleum application bill, it is wrong in this bill and will be wrong in any other bill, if we are going to be consistent. I recommend to my colleagues that we be consistent in that regard. There is nothing worse than saying at this time when there is no question before the House that in three, four or five years we will have a debate that will take five hours and no more. The time of the House cannot be extended merely by unanimous consent. The House is powerless because it is a statute that is binding on this House. The Chair has absolutely no discretion. It cannot even ask whether the debate will be extended or not, even though the House be desirous of it.

I am amazed that government leadership would attempt to put such features into statutes. They are going to be sitting over here too. What is healthy for parliament is the ability to discuss, not under a statutory limitation of debate. That is not good for democracy. It is not good for parliament. That is the jackboot of the temporary majority. Temporary majorities have been wrong more than they have been right, and they have imposed more abuses than they have cured.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the acting House leader to tell us what the business is to be for tomorrow and Wednesday if at all possible—we do not want to get into more confusion as we did today. Perhaps the hon. member might give some direction to the minister and to the House.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any need to give directions to any of my colleagues in the cabinet, but it might be useful to give some to the hon. member. In any event, in response to his question, the energy bill, C-42, will be voted on tomorrow at report stage and, if there is unanimous agreement, we would proceed to third reading. Following that it is the intention to call the Bank Act extension bill for third reading. That is an urgent priority and I presume it could be dealt with rather quickly—it is a very short bill. We could then continue with Bill C-38, presently under consideration, and after its rapid passage I presume we could deal with Bill C-37, the income tax bill.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, will the energy bill be called?

Mr. Cafik: The energy bill will be dealt with tomorrow at report stage. When amendments are dealt with, rule 74(13) indicates that the third reading stage would be taken at the next sitting of the House if there were not unanimous consent.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION—REPRESENTATION ON COMMISSION

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on March 6, I questioned the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) with regard to a published admission by her departmental officials that six of the nine members of the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission came from Quebec, two from the prairies, and one from Belfast, Ireland. I asked her whether she would replace this member from overseas with one from the Canadian province of British Columbia which has no representation. The minister's answer was no answer. She said:

> The Commissioners of the CRTC are not nominated to represent regions. They are nominated for their knowledge of the matters with which they have to deal.

A remarkable answer, Mr. Speaker. British Columbians, who have watched the insensitive, if not vindictive actions of the CRTC in British Columbia, did not need to be told the CRTC is not only unrepresentative of the region but it imposes its narrow nationalism, its own preferences, on our province. Seven times they have improvised vindictive policies, virtually bullying lower mainland citizens and totally ignoring their wishes.

Every Canadian, especially one who, like myself, has worked in the journalistic, creative and broadcasting professions, wants to nurture Canadian stations, Canadian content, and Canadian culture. So concerned was I with helping western Canadian talent grow that shortly before I came here I created a registered B.C. company with two divisions called "Contemporary Content" and "Canadian Content". But no good creative person wants to wallow in the mediocrity that follows when competition is shut out and we are so protected that we work in sheltered cultural workshops.

In Vancouver and the lower mainland we have six Canadian stations on the primary dial—three Canadian network stations, one joint network, one private station, and the community station. We have four American stations including two unimpaired channels and one engaged in "public broadcasting". Now the CRTC has authorized an expenditure of $6 million 20 miles away in Victoria for a second, redundant, CBC station and a second, redundant, CTV outlet, CHEK TV, which carries both CBC and CTV, Victoria.

The minister admits the CRTC commissioners do not represent the region. One has to ask if the "expertise" and knowledge she discusses, from Belfast, Ireland, is better for Canadians and Canadiana than would be the case if the commissioners came from nine regions of Canada rather than two-thirds from one province and one from Ireland.

One must also ask if the commissioner, who said her original home was Ireland—no one asked for her birthplace—was seeking the same thing as a member of parliament in the late nineteenth century, that is, General Laurie, the member for Shelbourne, Nova Scotia, from 1888 to 1891, who returned to the Isle of Wight upon retirement but demanded that his passage between the British Isles and Ottawa be paid by the Government of Canada. When one looks at these expenses of the CRTC, one wonders whether she, the commissioner, got her travel expenses. I do not think she did, but it is a good question, one that I have not asked yet.

Whether the designation of original home as Belfast, Ireland, was the actual home before she came to Ottawa, or whether this was an attempt to be cute, this response to a question from a member of parliament is good reason why she should be replaced by someone from British Columbia, or even from the maritimes which have no representation. No doubt the replacement of her colleague, Roy Faibish, whose record is well known in the House and was reported by me on October 31, would enhance rather than diminish the CRTC.

Both the east and west coast regions have an absolute right to membership in this exclusive club, a club which, in the past two and a half years, has spent more than $350,000 in tax dollars that we can trace on travel to B.C. hotels and that does not include the salaries which range from a minimum of $35,000 to $67,700, also paid by the taxpayers who earn one sixth of the salary for which they pay.

Members of the regulatory board of communications should be broad in intellectual and communication experience, should have competence, a sense of justice and wisdom to serve the diverse and complex needs of this great land. They must possess the highest level of experience and a reputation for success in communication and contemporary technology. They should not be disabled intellectually, or warped to the extent of the male member who demonstrated his great prowess in Vancouver on October 24 in a rather perverse way, with an expertise which seemed to concentrate on the nether regions of the human anatomy.

There is an intellectual disability which has manifested itself, in at least the lower mainland of British Columbia, in the form of a nationalistic bigotry, a bigotry and narrowness which would impose their centre-Canada ego and consequent mediocrity on the rest of this nation, which demands and yearns for richness and understanding of the whole colour and pageantry of the real Canada. Lower mainland British Columbia has had to accept—for too long—the output of cliques in Toronto and Montreal.

In saying that the commissioners are not nominated to represent regions but are nominated for their knowledge, the minister begs the question: What knowledge? What were the criteria on which these people were selected, if not on a representative basis? The chairman is a geographer from Montreal who earns between $51,900 and $67,700. The deputy chairman is a lawyer from Montreal. That is hardly a necessary qualification for communications. The other deputy chairman is a mathematician. Mr. Faibish, to whom reference has been made, was a broadcasting executive. There are lawyers, law professors and engineers. These are hardly qualifications that enhance this important assignment.

In conclusion I would just like to paraphrase Arnold Toynbee, in reference to the non-reply by the minister to my question, when the former said before the UN in 1979, "We will not accept annihilation of freedom of choice without representation."

● (2210)

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to direct my comments to my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). Many times I find I agree with what she says in this venerable House, and there are times I do not. This happens to be one of the times that I do not, but I do not think the hon. member will hold me in any less esteem for that particular expression this evening.

Apparently the hon. member suggested that the CRTC has neglected or is not fully capable of understanding the concerns of the citizens of British Columbia because none of the commissioners was born in British Columbia. There are several points to be made in response to this suggestion. As the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) said in the House, and I tend to agree with her, CRTC commissioners are chosen primarily because of their knowledge and experience, not because of their birthplaces and not as representatives of regions.

It is appropriate that it is just after St. Patrick's Day because sometimes I have called the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway a bit of a leprechaun. Perhaps we can look upon the hon. member this evening as being somewhat impish in her presentation to us and in making suggestions. Of course impish is not the same as being leprechaunish. Impish because, as I am sure the hon. member was aware when she made her suggestion, the CRTC commissioner in question indicated some time ago that she intended to retire from the CRTC in April. Impish also because, as I suspect the hon. member is aware, a CRTC commissioner can be removed only for cause.

I would hope the hon. member does not mean to suggest that being born in Ireland is just or sufficient cause to disqualify a person from serving in the Canadian government as an elected or appointed official. If this were the case, I can think of at least one member of the House of Commons who certainly would not qualify. In fact there are quite a few of our colleagues who certainly would not qualify. I am thinking of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette), the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni), the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), and the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). Certainly they were not born in this country, but they are fine, upstanding, and very capable members of the House of Commons.

It is the duty of CRTC commissioners to ensure that the policies made by the House of Commons are applied equally in all provinces. For example, this means that the French service of the CBC must be carried on cable television in Ontario, Saskatchewan and Alberta, just as it must be in Vancouver. If parliament no longer wishes its national policies to apply nationally, then it will be up to parliament to change those policies for the CRTC and for the country. If it wants to make exceptions for certain provinces, then parliament must do so. But the hon. member should be under no illusion that parliament's will can be evaded simply by adding or subtracting members from regulatory bodies such as the CRTC.

Perhaps the hon. member is being somewhat impish tonight. This theory may have merits and may have a certain logic which is being expounded tonight. However, I find it somewhat strange that the hon. member should espouse this theory since, if the parliamentary guide is correct, she was born in Alberta, educated in Manitoba, and also appears to be a late arrival in British Columbia.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—ALLEGED IMPROPER DESIGNATION OF "BILINGUAL"

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, on December 22 I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) a question regarding Mr. Yalden's report. The question arises over an item in which Mr. Yalden stated that there are many people who are classified officially bilingual but who are not in fact. We have heard a great deal about this problem, and the debate on bilingualism increases. I do not think that this increase in the level of discussion is meant with any malice, but it is a very serious matter, is very divisive, at least in the eyes of most, and it is not getting at the real cause of the problem.

The Commissioner of Official Languages in his statement was critical especially of English-speaking public servants who were declared bilingual and who were receiving salaries commensurate with this classification. It was suggested that some of these people could not discuss last night's hockey game in the second official language.

The news item implied that most offenders were something that they really were not, and they were English-speaking public servants. In fact, anyone who deals with government realizes that many French-speaking civil servants are unable to perform adequately in the second official language. This is not meant on my part as an indictment of any particular person. It is always difficult to work in a second language without long practice and repeated use of that second language. This is perhaps only an illustration of the emotion with which this problem is posed to Canadians.

It is perhaps easy for national politicians to come forward with some solutions, and it is easy to say that if only certain concessions are made to the citizens of Quebec all would be well. The fundamental problem is not one of bilingualism, but what the relationship of Quebec with the rest of Canada might be. When one observes what has happened in the last ten to 12 years in Quebec I think one can get some indication of how the people in that province feel. Whether they were Union Nationale, Liberals, or now of the Parti Québécois, in the last dozen years they have wanted to preserve their own cultural identity, their customs and language, and to make what they consider is a better place for themselves in their own province. I would not want to disregard their aspirations, but all of these efforts are at the expense of Canada. There is little difference between Bill 22 and Bill 101. While Quebeckers wished to have a uniquely French language and culture, they have complained that in the rest of Canada the French language and culture should be maintained for their benefit.

A prominent person on the Ontario educational TV network made it clear that he was talking about language and culture. He wanted to have a language and culture that was French in nature wherever he went in the rest of Canada. For him this was not wrong in itself, and it is understandable, but it creates problems for the rest of Canada which may never be resolved. Indeed, to accede to this person's point of view would mean that other languages and cultures would take a back seat—in effect, a type of melting pot culture.

We have borrowed much from Britain which, over the centuries, has absorbed waves of refugees from Europe. In fact this makes the present British culture. In the last two centuries we have had the American tradition, which again has meant the assimilation of many peoples of different languages and cultures, with a type of English language with its own distinctive Americanism. I think this is an important facet of Canadianism outside the province of Quebec, where the melting-pot function is at work with the fusion of many peoples into one Canadian identity.

Therefore, the aspirations of the people of Quebec in the language and culture idea are diametrically opposed to the assimilation and melding of various peoples. Few of the various races that make up the Canadian mosaic outside the province of Quebec are interested in maintaining their own language and culture to the exclusion of the Canadian identity. Looked at in this light, it seems hardly likely that the present system of bilingualism, which was of necessity present in the civil service long before this legislation was conceived, is the best basis on which the Québécois and the rest of Canada can continue and have a lasting arrangement. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's first original question, let me say that I think the use of the term "bilingual" by him is as unfortunate as the use of the word "phony" by the Commissioner of Official Languages when describing public servants occupying positions requiring the use of both official languages. Some public servants are very fluent in both languages, others are not. The point is that no definition exists as to what is a true bilingual and what is not.

Official languages policies speak of languages proficiency requirements, but these are not so universal as to represent a definition of what is bilingual. Employees occupying "bilingual positions" must, unless otherwise exempted, meet the specific proficiency requirements of a given position. If they so meet those requirements, they are referred to as being bilingual when, in fact, it really means that they are proficient to the level required for that particular position. When the commissioner speaks of "phony bilinguals", he is basing his assumptions on his own personal definition of the term "bilingual": one which, however, does not exist in the public service.

In 1972 the then president of the treasury board explained that "bilingualism" means different things in different jobs. In some positions it means only the ability to deal with simple and straightforward questions in the two languages. In others, it means an ability to understand the other language well, but to speak it only passably well. Again in others it means an ability to speak and understand both languages as commonly used, whereas in still other positions it means a greater capacity to speak and understand both common and technical language.

● (2220)

Take for example two hypothetical positions requiring the use of both official languages: an elevator operator and a government negotiator. Obviously the language proficiency requirements for these two jobs will be different. If the occupants meet the language requirements they are said to be bilingual, according to the public service use of the word. According to Mr. Yalden's definition, however, the elevator operator whose job requires a very limited vocabulary to perform his duties could be a phony bilingual, although he or she meets the criteria for the job.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—FUNDING OF MEDICAL CARE PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have raised several questions in this House concerning the medicare program, and I want to ask certain further questions with respect to that program. The fact of the matter is that the medicare program is one of the critical foundations and keystones of Canadian society at the present time. When it was introduced in 1966 it quickly became clear that it was something which the Canadian people not only wanted but expected.

We ought to look very carefully at the assumptions which underlie the Medical Care Act. There is the assumption that there would be universal medical insurance and that medical care and hospital care would no longer be dependent on one's economic strength in order to be able to survive and to have access to decent medical care. Since that time there has not been a clear commitment from either the provincial or federal governments or, I am sad to say, from parts of the medical community itself, to the principles that were established in the 1960s and that, indeed, go back to the experiences of the CCF in Saskatchewan in the 1940s and the 1950s.

The first watering down of this program came from the federal government. It is one of the ironies that the federal government convinced the provinces to go into the plan on the basis that there would be 50-50 funding, and then it turned around, when it became apparent to them that this was not going to be a free proposition and that it would cost certain amounts of money, and reduced their long-term financial commitment by passing the Established Programs Financing Act in 1977.

I might point out that we were the only party to warn the government at that time that the effect of introducing this program would be to reduce in the long run the commitment of our federal government to maintain the principles of universality and accessibility, which are the principles behind the plan. The federal government abandoned its role of being responsible in some way for the administration of the program and left that to the provinces.

In the course of the debate in 1976 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that he was taking a gamble, and the then minister of national health and welfare said at that time that it would be unthinkable for the provinces or for the federal government to move away from the principle of universal medical care. As I said earlier today, however, the unthinkable has happened and is happening, and the gamble has not paid off. The government now finds itself in the position of being faced with the erosion of a plan—and I am using the words of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin)—and of not having the means and the capacity to deal with the problems in the plan.

The fact of the matter is that there are several problems in the plan at the present time. There are doctors leaving the plan and charging a surcharge of up to and over 30 per cent. People were coming into members' offices and showing us doctors' bills, wanting to know if they were forced to pay them. They wanted to know why their doctors were not in the plan. Those were reasonable questions and gave rise to very real fears for people who cannot afford high medical fees.

● (2225)

The second practice which concerns us is double billing and the provinces that allow it. In this case doctors are not only billing the medical insurance plan but are also billing the patients individually. This gets away from the principle which should have been protected by the federal government, that medical care does not depend on income. Citizens are insured either by the provincial program without premiums or the provincial program with premiums.

Finally, there is the question of deterrent fees. Some provinces have introduced fees for long term stays in hospital. In September, 1976, in Vancouver, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said:

> Health insurance today encourages people to abuse the system by making unnecessary trips to doctors—

He suggested that all or a portion of the cost of a doctor's visit should be shown as taxable income for the patient, and that something like a T-4 form could be issued. His solution was to make the patient pay for the visit in another way. It is just a deterrent fee by the backdoor and moves away from the principle of universality. It puts fear into the hearts and minds of people who feel their medical care system belongs to them. They do not want it taken away.

The basic problem is the illusion adopted by the government and by many of the provincial governments. The illusion is that medical care services can be limited, that you can get something for nothing. The doctors of this country are telling us that we cannot get something for nothing—if we want a medicare program we have to pay for it. I think the Canadian people are prepared to pay a reasonable price, Mr. Speaker.

It is this new conservatism, this ideology which has seized the minds of the Liberal party and the Conservative party—that the government which governs least governs best, and that all government spending is bad while all private spending is good. The government has limited itself, it has restricted itself, and it does not now have the means or the ability to deal with the provinces in a way that would enable them—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General (Mr. Collenette).

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) brought this subject to the attention of the House last week as I think it should be debated publicly. It is a very serious topic.

Before I answer, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the Liberal party is certainly not seized with a new conservatism. If it were I would not be standing here, nor would I be running in the next election under the Liberal party banner. I should like to put the hon. member at ease in that aspect.

The medicare program has been fundamental to the Liberal party's platform since the early 1960s.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since 1919.

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is right—since the convention of 1919 when Mackenzie King became leader. It was finally implemented in the 1960s, and it is something to which members of this party are unequivocally committed.

I do not see any need to increase the federal contribution to the financing of medicare services in order that the provinces may meet the basic program condition of accessibility as required by the act.

The hon. member for Broadview referred to the established programs financing arrangements. These have been quite generous to the provinces, but I should point out that it was the provinces that felt they were closer to the people and should have some say in the administration of the medical plan. The federal government took a gamble, perhaps, in instituting this somewhat decentralized system of government. I think one of the election issues in the next few weeks will be whether we will continue with this kind of arrangement whereby the federal government agrees that if the provinces want greater administrative control over certain programs they can have it.

The hon. member for Broadview is correct in drawing our attention to what has happened. The basic tenets of the medicare program, the universality with respect to population covered, the accessibility without excessive user charges, the portability of benefits—all of these could be in jeopardy. I think I need only repeat the reply given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during question period on March 9 to the Leader of the New Democratic Party when as reported at page 3990 of Hansard he said:

> If anything is done by any province to depart from that principle, we would have to review the very high payment the federal government is making to the province in respect of half the cost of medicare.

It is quite clear; there is no equivocation. The hon. member for Broadview asked in question period this afternoon what legal authority the government has to withdraw funding from the provinces. I would think that the effective determination by the governor in council that a provincial plan had ceased to meet any of the conditions or the five basic points would mean there is no longer authority to make contributions. In other words, if they reneged on any of the basic commitments to medicare, then the federal government would have the moral and perhaps the legal authority to review the money advanced under the established programs financing arrangements. Again, I say, there must be no retrenchment, no equivocation on the basic medicare scheme of this country to which Canadians are entitled, which they want, and which they certainly deserve.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Physician, heal thyself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the unjustifiable failure of the government to answer the following questions asked by me: No. 576, of November 14, 1978; No. 611, of November 22, 1978; and No. 1,032, of February 6, 1979.

Without there being prompt replies to questions asked in parliament, authorities on parliamentary procedure without exception have concluded that the institution would be detrimentally eroded and ultimately destroyed. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

To prevent the truth being denied by the government to the Canadian people by government roadblocks of silence, that the government forthwith be directed to provide prompt answers to these questions, otherwise with dissolution they will remain unanswered.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion at this time would require unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR WINNIPEG SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, considering the delightful concert that was given today in the rotunda by the National Arts Centre Orchestra, perhaps I might be permitted to say that one good orchestra deserves another. Accordingly, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), I move:

That this House expresses its concern over the loss that Canada would suffer if the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra were to fold and, therefore, notwithstanding the primary responsibility of the government of Manitoba as well as of individual and corporate donors in Manitoba, calls on the federal government to make an appropriate grant so that the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra may be enabled to continue to enrich the cultural life of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION THAT PENSION COMMISSION EXPEDITE CONSIDERATION OF CASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that throughout the country the Canadian Pension Commission has experienced unacceptable delays in reviewing the files of veterans; considering that conditions in Quebec are just as deplorable for our veterans; considering that cases were brought to my attention by veterans who are told by the Canadian Pension Commission: "It is impossible to specify when we will proceed with the consideration of your case" or still "We will not receive the medical data for your appeal before a year or more" I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Veterans Affairs give the necessary instructions to the Canadian Pension Commission, so that the review process of those cases can be speeded up in a spirit of brotherhood for those who gave much of themselves for our country.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the introduction of such motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

SOCIAL INSURANCE

SUGGESTION THAT FEDERAL AID BE REPLACED BY SURRENDER OF PROPORTIONATE NUMBER OF TAX POINTS TO PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that doctors in several provinces are increasingly disillusioned with the universal medicare plan, that many of them are gradually opting out of the various provincial medicare plans, and that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has stated that the federal government will withdraw financial support to the provinces in this field if they fail to solve the problem, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle):

That, so as not to put in greater jeopardy the access of Canadians to medical care, the federal government commit itself to solve the current problem by substituting for the present federal assistance a proportionate number of tax points to the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The introduction of such a motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CALL FOR CONVENING OF CONFERENCE OF HEALTH MINISTERS ON MEDICAL CARE PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the indication yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) that she might be prepared to meet with her provincial counterparts to discuss the viability of the current medicare arrangements in Canada, arrangements which involve much more than fee structures and transfer payments, and taking into consideration the fact that since the introduction of the Medical Care Act 12 years ago, the medicare programs in all provinces have undergone substantial revision and change, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare give immediate priority to the convening of a conference of health ministers to discuss the basic national criteria of accessibility, universality and portability in medicare with a view to determining whether the provincial programs are meeting those criteria, whether the funding is adequate at both the federal and provincial levels to allow proper implementation of those criteria, and to review the role and responsibility of both levels of government in ensuring the maintenance of a sound medicare program.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

PROVISION OF ROLLING STOCK FOR MOVEMENT OF LUMBER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it may not come as a surprise to you that I have a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding boxcars, but this time it has to do with lumber.

Since the matter is of urgent and pressing necessity, and in view of reports today that the lumber industry in British Columbia is in serious difficulty because of the shortage of railway equipment to move that commodity, most of which is for export, and since this is nothing new in that there has been an ongoing and chronic shortage of railway cars not only for lumber but for other commodities such as potatoes and grain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the Minister of Transport require the railways to live up to their obligations under section 262 of the Railway Act to supply suitable accommodation for all traffic offered and, further, that the government require immediate action be taken to lease rolling stock from other countries and allocate railway equipment from other parts of Canada that is suitable for lumber transportation.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AIR TRANSPORT

UNITED STATES OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED AIR CANADA BARGAIN RATE FLIGHTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not present.

Since the flight plans of 147,000 Canadians could be in jeopardy because of a threat by the United States to block Air Canada's proposed bargain rate flights to the United States, what action is the government taking to ensure that Canadians will be allowed to benefit from the bargain rate flights? I ask this question in view of the fact that within the next few days these flights will start and that there is some question as to their viability at all.

● (1415)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we hope that that action will not be taken by the United States at this point. They have registered some concern, but have not taken formal action to disallow the flights. This may be part of a larger discussion between Canada and the United States about fares.

It should be known that we are in a position to allow similar or matching U.S. fares by U.S. airlines as well. Perhaps that may alleviate somewhat the concern of the United States at this point. I would, therefore, take the view that we do not expect that action to be taken by the United States, and that the fares will be allowed.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, that is somewhat cold comfort for people who are anticipating travelling in the United States. The government is still at the point of assuming that things will work out all right.

Since the government has rejected several proposals from the United States for cheaper cross-border flights, does the minister anticipate changes to the 1974 air services agreement which allows one country to block the other's cross-border fare proposals? This seems to be the crux of the present problem. The United States seems to be approaching the pending negotiations in the same way Canada did some time ago. I understand these negotiations will take place between the two countries in the first part of April. Will this particular question be discussed then, and can we hope that the question will be resolved?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, resolution of that particular issue is exactly the point of the discussions proposed for April. Following some filings by U.S. carriers, we did ask for these consultations and it took some months before we received a positive response. Discussions are now set for April and will cover specifically the issue of lower fares and how they are handled between the two countries.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, because every country needs contingency plans, can the minister indicate to the House whether there is the possibility of an agreement between the two countries allowing selected United States airline carriers to fly into Canadian cities in return for rights for Air Canada's proposed cheap fares to United States cities? In other words, are Canadian officials prepared to meet the United States halfway on their demands, in order to alleviate this situation?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must have missed that aspect of my very first answer. The Canadian Transport Commission, I understand, did allow some of the lower fares filed by United States carriers where they were parallel to the fares filed by Air Canada for service between Canadian points and the United States. To that extent, therefore, some accord has been arrived at if the United States allows these Canadian fares to be upheld.

CANADA-UNITED STATES CONSULTATIONS ON AIR FARES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport? It specifically concerns the air fares which are to come into effect next Tuesday.

Under the terms of the bilateral agreement, I understand that the countries have 15 days in which to negotiate or to consult after a notice of dissatisfaction has been filed. Can the minister indicate whether that initiative has been taken by Canada? Will consultations take place relative to these particular air fares so that the matter may be resolved before next Tuesday?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure at this moment whether there will be discussions in advance of the April discussions on the main issue.

Mr. Mazankowski: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What assurances can the minister give the House that this matter of the notice of dissatisfaction will not, in effect, turn into a notice of suspension so far as United States authorities are concerned?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, obviously, only the United States government could give a clear indication at this time of whether they intend to take that action. The best I can do is indicate that I do not expect that action; but it is very definitely in their hands, under the bilateral arrangements between us.

Mr. Mazankowski: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House why Canada is not exercising its right, under the bilaterals, to initiate consultation and negotiations with the United States to resolve this matter, rather than just sitting around playing tweedle-dee-dum and tweedle-dee-dee.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is being rather silly in his approach. Discussions are coming up on this whole question very soon.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CORPORATE PROFITS—MEASURES TO ROLL BACK

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the House yesterday, the minister expressed concern that some profit-making might have taken place on the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. In this morning's papers, figures were released showing that corporate profits were up 46 per cent in the last quarter of 1978. This is the highest since 1974, and a large part of that profiteering took place as a result of foreign exchange gains.

• (1420)

I ask the Minister of Finance, since his fears now seem to be borne out in large part, what action is the government contemplating to make sure these profits are rolled back? The most important point is: if there are high profits, Canadians have very high prices.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to tell the hon. member that I do not consider profit is a sin as long as it is a normal profit. Having read the article that he referred to, the hon. member will realize that some of those profits occurred in some companies which were in a deficit position last year and lost money. If a company continues to lose money year after year, it will not last long in our society.

I think we have to look at the average level of profits in the Canadian economy. At the moment we realize that the level of profits in Canada is not above the average of the last 15 years, so there is no cause for alarm. When there is a better picture of profits that generate cash, that cash in turn can be reinvested to create jobs. I think it is a sign that the economy is picking up.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

ACTION AGAINST COMPANIES GUILTY OF PROFITEERING

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that profit gains are the highest since 1974, and that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Prime Minister both said in February that companies which do not use their profits to further the national economic goals of the country could lose some federal government contracts, in view of the fact the minister said that he was looking into this possibility my question to him is: Has he decided yet whether the government will be levelling sanctions against some of these large companies with high profits? Will the government be withdrawing government contracts from some of these companies?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, we have not found that any companies are profiteering at the expense of consumers.

MONITORING TO ENSURE SALES TAX CUTS PASSED ON TO CONSUMERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has said many times that he believes the 3 per cent tax cut to manufacturers which was introduced last November has been passed on to consumers. I ask the minister, has he completed the monitoring of those tax cuts? Can the minister tell us what evidence he has that those tax cuts indeed have been passed on? Can he tell us who he has been surveying, and can he table the evidence in the House?

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all the evidence that we have so far indicates that the tax cuts are being passed on. Plans were sent forward to the AIB toward the end of the year indicating how those would be passed on. The work is not yet finished; it is carrying on and we will continue to watch the situation very closely.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO REVISE ROYALTIES LEGISLATION

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and concerns the Copyright Act.

Considering that the rates of royalties mentioned in subsection 19(5) of the act has not been amended since 1921, can the minister tell the House if he intends to revise these rates, and if so, when?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the copyright legislation is presently under review. It is our intention to present a bill to this House in the near future to bring up to date and reform our copyright laws.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON POSSIBLE SALVAGING OF OIL TANKER "KURDISTAN"

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of State (Environment)? Could he give us an up to date report on the status of the stern section of the Kurdistan and whether or not there is any validity to the apparent conflict between assurance given in the House yesterday by the minister and reports alleged to emanate from the Minister of Fisheries that, in fact, the stern section is leaking oil?

Can the minister give us an up to date report—either he or the Minister of Transport—with respect to this section and whether or not there has been a decision to bite the bullet and either salvage or sink it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence at all of any leaking of oil from the stern section. I believe there was such a press report yesterday, but there is no evidence of that at all. We do have a coastguard vessel immediately near it to watch out for that and other matters. The actual solution has not yet been determined as proposals are still to be put forward by the salvor in relation to the stern section. It is, of course, under tow by the salvor.

● (1425)

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my other questions to the minister of the environment, whom I presume has the fundamental responsibility. First, where are the 3,500 tons of missing oil? Does the minister have any evidence to suggest that that oil is some distance below the surface but not deep enough to have jelled? Have his officials alerted him to the possibility of this oil slick being submerged, as it apparently is, and creating environmental damage to the fishery or the shoreline of Cape Breton?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, we really have not been able to find where the spilled oil has gone. I can assure the hon. member that no oil has drifted on to shore. The best information I have is that there is not likely to be any environmental damage from the oil that has been spilled.

I mentioned yesterday that a small patch had been found in the vicinity of where the stern was then positioned. I should have said that patch was seen near where the bow was located at that point. I have had other reports today indicating that there have been a further few, very small patches found but nothing to be concerned about. As I said before, we still do not know where the bulk of the bunker C has gone.

Mr. Forrestall: Is the minister suggesting that his environmental officials, including those on the scene, have briefed him to the effect that the missing 3,500 tons of oil does not pose a potential threat? If that is not the case, what action is being taken today, either by surface or aerial means, to locate and identify the missing 3,500 tons? Can he, further, advise where the bow section is at present, who has it under tow and whether it is, in fact, leaking oil?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, according to my information to bow section is not leaking oil. It is located about 97 miles east of the entrance to Chedabucto Bay. Perhaps that kind of question should more properly be addressed to the Minister of Transport. It is in a holding pattern. There are very difficult weather conditions now, but hopefully action will be taken in the next couple of days to move it into deeper water where we can probably sink it.

The surveillance action now being taken is really only by coastguard vessels in the area. The weather has been too difficult to get into the area our aircraft which is equipped with remote sensing equipment. As soon as weather conditions permit, the DC-3 will again be out and with its various kinds of sensing equipment will try to locate any oil that might be on the high seas.

LOTO CANADA

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF OPERATIONS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). In view of the continuing problems with Loto Canada, can she tell the House if and when she plans to seek a reference of Loto Canada to the appropriate standing committee in order that its officials may appear and be questioned by members of the House respecting the whole operation of the corporation?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any continuing problems with Loto Canada. The hon. member and his steering committee have the same rights as any members of this House to call the annual report when it comes through. My officials will be very pleased to appear before the committee, which they were not called upon to do last year.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. In view of the unusual financial losses recently experienced by Loto Canada and the predicted drop in ticket sales for the twelfth draw, will the Deputy Prime Minister use his influence and try to obtain the appropriate reference to a standing committee of the House in order that the entire financial affairs of Loto Canada may be subjected to scrutiny in the usual parliamentary fashion?

● (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, without accepting any of the allegations to be found in the hon. member's question, I will take his representation under consideration and decide whether at the present time we can add a further burden to the already very busy House committees.

EMPLOYMENT

OVERPAYMENTS IN CERTAIN JOB CREATION PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON COLLECTION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. As reported in Hansard at page 4093, the Minister of Employment and Immigration confirmed in an answer to me that overpayments had taken place in connection with LIP, The Canada Works scheme and the Young Canada Works scheme. Subsequently, I asked the President of the Treasury Board what position was being taken by his department with regard to these overpayments.

Has the minister been able to check into this situation as he promised to do, and does his department regard these overpayments as debts due to the Crown?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of Treasury Board): Government policy with regard to this matter is quite clear. It is our intention to pursue any of these outstanding obligations which are in the category of legal obligations due to the Crown. We shall pursue those that fall within this category as far as we can through the various processes open to us.

Mr. Epp: From the answer the minister has just given, I do not believe he has checked into the matter as he promised he would. A memorandum we have received indicates that the Deputy Minister of Employment and Immigration feels these overpayments should be pursued, yet officials in Treasury Board feel these are not debts due to the Crown because the contracts are not legally binding.

Would the minister check into this, because there is a strong debate going on as to whether these contracts are legally binding or not? It is his own department which is now questioning whether these overpayments can be recovered. He is the protector of the taxpayers' money, so what is he doing about it?

Mr. Buchanan: As I have said, the policy is quite clear. If these are legal obligations, the matter will be legally pursued and we shall endeavour to collect the amounts due. If there is a dispute as to the legal status of these obligations, that is something upon which we seek the opinion of the Department of Justice. But, I repeat, if they are legal obligations it is our intent to pursue them.

SHIPPING

REGULATIONS RESPECTING SAFE OPERATION OF SMALL BOATS

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. His ministry has put into effect new regulations for the safe operation of small boats in Canada which, among other things, require every boat over 5.5 metres in length to carry at least six approved flares.

In view of the fact that the minister is demanding a minimum expenditure of $50 with respect to every boat of this size or more, can he resolve the conflict between the statement in the Boating Safety Guide, which contains the regulations, that "the red flares used on railroads are efficient and inexpensive", and the statement made in a letter from one of his officials to the Ontario Marina Operators' Association that "road flares and rail flares . . . are totally unsuitable, inadequate and, in fact, frequently hazardous in a marine environment".

Can the minister reconcile these conflicting statements, bearing in mind the large number of boat owners involved and the short period remaining before the boating season opens?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): It is the latter statement which really reflects the judgment of today. Flares which are not waterproof or weatherproof are not adequate for boating situations; they might be unusable, and unless they are safe in an operational sense they might cause additional problems to boat owners in distress. That is the basis for our intervention.

Having required the presence of these flares, it seemed important to us that they should be safe and that they would operate when required without adding to the hazard. Hence, we have introduced specific regulations.

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Mr. Parker: I accept the minister's explanation, of course, but I should like to ask him what steps he is taking to explain to everyone in Canada who reads his department's Boating Safety Guide why it should contain a statement saying exactly the opposite of what he is telling the House.

One further supplementary: In view of the fact that stocks of these flares seem to be in short supply in Canada, would the hon. gentleman issue a go-slow order to law enforcement officers so that boat owners might have a chance to equip themselves with approved flares?

Mr. Lang: I understand there has been some discussion about enforcement of the regulations when there is any real problem about obtaining the flares. Enforcement will be arranged progressively rather than in a manner unfair to boat owners.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING PLIGHT OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Westmount): Mr. Speaker, would the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that representations have recently been made on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Shcharansky with respect to the plight of Mrs. Shcharansky's husband, Anatoly Shcharansky? I understand such representations have been made recently to the Prime Minister. Have representations, in fact, been made, and what is or will be the response of the Canadian government with respect to them?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I understand the solicitor for Mrs. Shcharansky in Canada has made certain representations, or made certain views known, to the Prime Minister and that the Prime Minister replied to Mrs. Shcharansky as of March 19 in particular deploring the treatment of her husband and expressing the hope that the Soviet Union would take action soon to release him to come to Canada. Also, the Prime Minister reiterated that the offer made earlier to receive Mr. Shcharansky is still open.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

REPORTED DIVERSION TO UNITED STATES OF OIL DESTINED FOR CANADA

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of somewhat disturbing reports in the press recently that Congressman Albert Gore of the United States has charged that early in February Exxon diverted several tankers intended for Imperial Oil's Canadian market to a New England group of buyers, for a substantial profit, has the minister investigated this charge and will he report to the House what he has found out with regard to it? Further, would he comment on the implications this would have with respect to the security of Canada's oil supplies?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): We have taken steps to find out whether that report is correct, but we have been unable to confirm that Congressman Gore made such a statement.

Mr. Symes: I hope, then, that the minister will track down the source of this report; I think it bears further investigation and calls for a report to the House.

One supplementary: When Mr. Armstrong, president of Imperial Oil, appeared before the committee on National Resources and Public Works this morning, he stated, with regard to the issue of buying crude oil for Canada from Venezuela:

> We would expect Petro-Canada to supply the equivalent of our current contract for Venezuelan crude in terms of quality and flexibility as to volumes at competitive prices including the necessary tanker transportation.

These are the demands Imperial will be placing on Petro-Canada. Is the government prepared to acquiesce in those demands, or will it be making certain demands of Imperial in terms of providing the Canadian market with Venezuelan crude?

● (1440)

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, those matters are presently under negotiation between Petro-Canada and Petroleos de Venezuela. The hon. member knows that a supplier refinery in Canada would want to specify certain terms and conditions in any commercial contract. It is anticipated that Petro-Canada will be supplying other than the Imperial refineries in Canada. Indeed, it has been made quite clear quite recently that the Golden Eagle refinery near Quebec City is likely to be a potential customer for Venezuelan crude handled through Petro-Canada.

NUCLEAR FUSION ENERGY PROPOSAL—WHEREABOUTS OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question about an important nuclear fusion energy proposal which was published here in Canada on Saturday, and the Prime Minister's conversations with President Carter about it which, of course, would be exclusively within the knowledge of the Prime Minister. However, the Prime Minister has not been seen in these buildings since Saturday night, so I have not been able to ask the question.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is, where is the Prime Minister? Does he feel he has better things to do than appear in these parliament buildings or in the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

POSSIBILITY OF LAYING OFF 100 LANGUAGE TEACHERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Last Friday the Public Service Alliance of Canada put out a news release asking for a meeting with the President of the Treasury Board to discuss the problems which budgetary restrictions have created for a number of language teachers. Has the minister received an invitation from the representatives of the Public Service Alliance for such a meeting? If so, does he intend to meet them and will he discuss the case of the 100-odd language teachers who are to be laid off at the end of the month?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I received the invitation last Friday. Yesterday, we discussed the possibilities we have and we will meet again tomorrow afternoon. But the problem is much broader than its implications with regard to the language teachers; it hinges on the bilingualism premium in the public service generally. That problem will be discussed tomorrow afternoon.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT CAN ASSIGN LAID-OFF TEACHERS TO NEW POSITIONS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. The minister knows that his government made commitments to those teachers until 1983. Last week the minister spoke of trying to scrape up some money somewhere which could at least enable him to assign those emplyees to new positions. Can the minister tell us today whether or not he has found any money, and if he will be in a position tomorrow to offer the union some guarantee that those hundred or so teachers will not find themselves without employment on April 1, especially in view of the commitment of the government with regard to that program?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of Treasury Board): No, not yet, Mr. Speaker. I indicated that we had already increased the funds by $4.3 million. So, I am not sure additional funds can be found. As I indicated to our colleague, I shall see if it is possible or not.

NATIONAL REVENUE

COMPLEXITY OF CHILD TAX CREDIT APPLICATION FORM

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In a letter I received from her colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, the minister informed me that next year he anticipates having a much simpler form for those who will be filing only to obtain the child tax credit. He went on to point out in that letter to me that it should also be possible to develop more efficient processing routines and thus reduce the costs of administration.

I wonder if the minister would indicate whether she shares her colleague's point of view that the application form for the child tax credit has been unnecessarily complex this year and has cost the Canadian taxpayer a great deal of money in terms of additional administration?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if we are lacking questions in the House this afternoon, but this one surely is unnecessary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: I said several times in the debate on Bill C-10 back in November—the hon. member probably did not follow that debate—that we regretted having to ask the Canadian public to fill in schedule 10, which is complicated as are all tax forms, I must admit. I indicated that programs, training manuals and seminars for additional staff of Revenue Canada for the present fiscal period were already under way. That was explained very often, so the answer to the question of the hon. member is that I agree with my colleague that next year we will have a single, simple and shorter form for mothers.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING OF CHILD TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the minister certainly cut up her colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, with that answer.

I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. There have been complaints from all parts of Canada and from members of this House with respect to misleading advertising about the child tax credit which has been perpetrated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister or his department had an opportunity to investigate this advertising? Has he any report to make to the House? Is he going to do anything about it? Is the allegation that a department never acts against another department founded?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The question was to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROTECTION AGAINST OIL SPILL FROM TANKER "KURDISTAN"

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Environment). With reference to the missing oil slick and the potential of a further oil leak, can the minister assure this House that should the situation get worse, he will remain in charge of the situation and carry it through to solution instead of transferring the matter to the Minister of Transport, provincial governments and municipal governments?

Should there be the problem of an oil slick working toward the shoreline and endangering the marine environment, will he assure us that what happened in British Columbia, where governments, argued about a solution to the problem, will not happen again? Will the minister assure the House that the procedure will not be followed and that he will take care of the problem instead of transferring jurisdiction?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly carry out my responsibility. But the hon. member is just being mischievous in this case because he knows very well that in the case of this particular oil spill, the coast-guard and the Ministry of Transport are the lead agencies. I have no comments about that, but I want to assure the hon. member that all concerned departments of both the provincial and federal governments are working very closely together.

AIRPORTS

CASTLEGAR—JOB SECURITY OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact that the city of Castlegar terminates its control and operation of the Castlegar airport on March 31, and that the firm which will be assuming the third party contract may not be ready to participate in a very real sense on April 1, it has been suggested that employees from the Ministry of Transport at Penticton be moved into Castlegar in the interval. This would have a very disastrous effect on the employees currently in place at Castlegar who are very concerned about job security. Can the minister offer some remarks which may bring about a solution to that problem and reassure the employees at Castlegar?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that my officials did not bring to my attention any problem with regard to the switch from one management to the other. I will take note of the hon. member's representation and look into the matter immediately.

COMMUNICATIONS

EXPECTED RECEIPT OF CLYNE COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Communications. I wonder whether the minister has received a report from the Clyne commission, and when is it going to be tabled in the House?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the report will be delivered to me this week, and I will see that it is properly tabled.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, there has been a persistent rumour for the last year or so that there might be an election. In fact, one minister wondered about the necessity of questions. Many people are wondering if there is a necessity for this House to stay in operation.

I wonder if the minister would undertake, in the event this House somehow expires before next week, the minister has the report and it is translated, to make sure that during any period that this House is not sitting the public will at least have the benefit of that report so that the debate on telecommunications, which was the reason for the report, could be stimulated regardless of anything else that might happen.

● (1450)

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, if this House expires, it will only be to be reconfirmed in a new mandate. So I am not worried about the kind of debate which will take place when I table this report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

TESTS TO DETERMINE WHETHER ALUMINUM WIRING IS A HAZARDOUS PRODUCT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. After extensive testing by the Safety Products Commission of the United States, the United States government has commenced court action to have aluminum wiring declared a hazardous product. Can the minister indicate if the federal government has ordered similar tests in Canada and if similar steps will be taken by the government?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, because the whole question of wiring comes under the provincial governments of Canada. When this matter was first brought to our attention, we were in touch with them. Different provinces are examining their building codes and other regulations respecting it, but I have no jurisdiction.

HOUSING

STEPS TO ENSURE SAFE WIRING INSTALLED IN CANADIAN HOMES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question was prompted to the minister by the jurisdiction he has under the Hazardous Products Act. Since this minister does not seem to be concerned about it, perhaps I could redirect my question to the minister responsible for the National Housing Act, the Minister of Public Works.

Has the minister taken any steps within his administration of the National Housing Act and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to conduct tests to determine whether aluminum wiring constitutes a fire hazard? If so, what steps does the minister propose to take to ensure that Canadians will have not only safe wiring in their homes but can, in fact, be reassured of that?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that matter was looked into very closely by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials. The subject is not new. It has been considered for several years already. The Ontario government has just carried out an investigation on that matter and of course the recommendations made following that investigation were studied very closely by all those who are involved in residential construction in Canada.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME BE PAID IMMEDIATELY APPLICATION IS FILED

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Considering that, according to the media today, almost half of the pensioners who received the guaranteed income supplement did not complete and return the forms which make them eligible for the program, can the minister assure the House that it is not too late to file an application and confirm that her department can send their cheques in the course of the following month to those pensioners who hurry?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I imagine the hon. member is referring to the old age security pension supplement. As economic circumstances of families can change, an application should be made on a special form at the beginning of each year. As a matter of fact, I can assure the hon. member that to date only a few pensioners have not received their cheques regularly. If the forms are returned as soon as possible, the deliveries of supplementary cheques should proceed in the usual way.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR WINNIPEG SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State with respect to the financial crisis being confronted by the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra.

May I readily admit that the primary responsibility in this case rests with the government of Manitoba and the corporate donors in my province. But in view of the fact there are times when Ottawa has to speak and act for all of Canada, and in view of the importance to Canada of this orchestra being continued, will the Secretary of State consider seriously finding some way in which Ottawa can join with the government of Manitoba to keep this orchestra alive?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the importance of this orchestra and share the hon. member's concern over it. Indeed, I attended one of its performances in New York city a few weeks ago, a gala occasion which both President Carter and our Prime Minister originally had agreed to attend.

There is no program within my department which would enable me to assist in terms of offering support for the orchestra. At the federal level, the only means by which we could provide support would be through the Canada Council. I should be very happy to draw to the attention of the Canada Council the representations which the hon. member has made today and with which I very strongly sympathize.

LOTO CANADA

LOSS INCURRED IN WITHDRAWING LOTO SELECT PROGRAM

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). The report tabled in the House of Commons some time ago, in February, dealing with Loto Select indicated at page 11 the following:

> Furthermore, in early August, Loto concluded that prudence required it to recognize a resolution to the federal provincial discussions and the possible withdrawal of Loto Canada from the $1 loto game. Thus, as early as mid-August, Loto, where it was feasible to do so, postponed a number of decisions—

Considering that on ten occasions in the House of Commons the minister has not denied that it was a $23 million contract, and that on the December 10 CBC program, Sunday Morning, she called it a $23 million contract, how in that eight-week period did the contract escalate from $23 million to $47 million, which is the figure used in the report as the amount they were trying to do away with?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the first figure was for one year and the full figure was for a three-year possible contract. When the hon. member brings up that there was a potential agreement with the provinces, he does not take into account that that was not a full agreement by all of the provinces involved. It took us until October 5 to resolve it finally.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, another good reason why this report should go to committee is that it seems to be misleading in indicating, on one hand, $23 million and now $47 million. However, the minister indicated in the House, as reported at page 1979 of Hansard, that the contract with General Instrument was one of lease. Yet in the report at page 6 it is noted that the contract allowed for a purchase arrangement during this period. Was the contract, in fact, one of lease, one of purchase, or was it perhaps one of purchase at the end of the lease arrangement?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, "leased" is the correct term.

IMMIGRATION

PROTEST AGAINST TREATMENT OF TWO CHILEAN REFUGEES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration regarding a case which is gathering interest by leaps and bounds. It has been on his desk since 1975 at least.

An hon. Member: Boloney.

Mr. Alexander: I am referring to Federico and Ingrid Luchsinger, refugees from Chile. Apparently these two people are now before the Security Advisory Board without any opportunity of rebutting false, incomplete or wrong allegations. What is of even more concern is that I want to know how it is possible for the minister to give these people six ministerial deferments prior to the time that he found something wrong whereby the matter should be referred to the Security Advisory Board.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member fails to stress that they are here under ministerial permit; in other words, they are here because I said they could be here. We got the report on security and as ministers responsible in this area we think we have a responsibility to the Canadian public to check it out. The Security Advisory Board is one more opportunity for the facts presented in this particular case to be screened so that I can decide what weight to give to the representations made.

The hon. member said that on no less than five or six occasions I indicated it was all right for them to be here. Now they are seeking landed immigrant status. Because they are seeking that new status, I thought it was appropriate to check it out. That is exactly what is being done. It is not as though they are going through some tribunal. In fact, this is an organization which is in a position to help me determine what weight should be given to the evidence advanced.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I find this whole procedure quite offensive. I find it a denial of natural justice because we are talking about a procedure at trial wherein people have no opportunity to rebut false, incomplete or wrong allegations.

Is there no procedure whatsoever whereby these people can give their side of the story, which I believe is equally important, in order that the minister will have all the facts, rather than just some of them, to come to a truthful determination about this matter? Does the minister not think that suggestion warrants very serious consideration?

● (1500)

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is going to put this couple in a unique position that is not available to anybody else without residence in this particular country, suggesting that everyone who goes through this procedure, be they abroad or in Canada, should have this particular access. I do not think that is appropriate.

I have an obligation to protect the security of this country. I have received representations and I want to know what weight to give this particular evidence. I have put it before a security board composed of three gentlemen of unquestioned reputation to help me determine what weight should be given to the evidence that has been advanced. This is one of the fairest systems available.

An hon. Member: Nonsense: what about Chile?

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member over there screams about Chile. I would remind him that we took 7,000 refugees from Chile.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBLE ATTACHMENT OF CHILD TAX CREDIT TO REDUCE ARREARS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Hare (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business). In view of the position of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that the $200 child tax credit cannot be attached for back rent by the Winnipeg Housing Authority, which is 75 per cent funded by the federal government, will the Minister of National Revenue take the position that the $200 child tax credit cannot be attached for income taxes owed to his department by taxpayers who are in arrears?

Time Allocation

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the 1978 income tax year, I have no discretion whatever. Any tax owing is deducted from any refund. In years previous to that I do have discretion and I have indicated the intent to exercise that discretion in favour of the taxpayer.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—REQUEST FOR EXPANDED REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very brief point of order and I direct it to the government House leader. I have asked him about this several times in the past. I refer to the unanimous vote of this House and a reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, in an expanded way, of the reconstitution of the subcommittee on penitentiaries. I noted that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) was in his seat a moment ago. I wonder if he has succeeded in tracking down this elusive gentleman in order to give me an answer on the re-establishment of that subcommittee?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had a discussion with the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and we both agree that it would be appropriate to have a reference provided to the committee in accordance with the expression of opinion of the House of Commons.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALLOTMENT OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-42

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 75C, I move, seconded by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen):

That, in relation to Bill C-42, an act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, not more than one sitting day shall be allocated, if necessary, to the further consideration of the report stage of the said bill and not more than one sitting day shall be allocated, if necessary, to the third reading stage of the said bill; and

That, not later than 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business in each such sitting, any proceeding before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the report stage or third reading stage, as the case may be, of the said bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Peters: Are we going to trust him with our emergencies?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should be rising on a point of stupidity rather than on a point of order, for I have seldom seen such an unwise move on the part of the government so far as the procedures of this House are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): However, since the motion has been presented seriously by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie), I feel there is a point of order that must be raised.

Standing Order 75C says, in part:

A minister of the Crown who from his place in the House at a previous sitting has stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 75A or 75B in respect of proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration—

How in the world can the motion that the minister read out to you be fitted into those terms? The motion is not exactly as it was in the notice he gave yesterday, but I do not quarrel with that; it is along the same lines. The motion is in two parts. It proposes, first of all, a limitation of debate on the report stage. Mr. Speaker, where has the minister been? Does he not know that the report stage debate ended last night? Now he proposes in a motion that there be granted to the report stage, if necessary, not more than another day.

An hon. Member: More delay.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

Mr. Gillespie: You didn't look at the motion yesterday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I looked at the motion yesterday and I thought it was stupid then, and the government House leader knew it before it was even proposed. The fact of the matter is that the debate at the report stage is over. If someone tries to argue now that there are three recorded votes to be taken, I would reply that no further debate is permitted before those votes are taken. After those votes are taken there has to be a vote on the acceptance of the report of the bill, and no debate is allowed there. But what Standing Order 75C refers to is debate. There can be no more debate, and therefore I suggest that that part of the motion is a nullity and completely out of order.

● (1510)

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the other part of the motion which proposes that there be not more than one day allotted to third reading. That is where we are, at the brink of the third reading stage. However, the Standing Order says "that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 75A or 75B in respect of proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration". Third reading stage is not under consideration. We have not started it.

Those of us who were involved in the proceedings of the committee that drew up these rules, even though we did not like them, knew that the whole idea was to find a means to end debate at the request of the government when that debate was going on too long. In this case we are back to old C. D. Howe himself. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) knows, if and when the question is before the House he will have an opportunity to debate whether it is a wise move or whether it is similar to other moves. The point the hon. member is raising now is one of a point of order to the effect that the motion ought not to be put for some reason or another and that we ought to proceed to the calling of the question in this way.

With respect to the hon. member's second point which he is on now, I would like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to address two problems that I have. The first point is that while the hon. member is perfectly correct—and the point has obviously occurred to the Chair as well—that the effort of the motion to cover a stage which has concluded in terms of discussion is now redundant, nevertheless at the time the notice was given the stage was still before the House and the notice is required. Therefore, since the notice was required at a time when the stage was before the House, the notice had to include that stage.

In the interval the stage terminated, making the motion redundant. Presumably the House now has to insist that the motion conform to the notice or be in the same terms, otherwise I am sure that the complaint would be that the motion differs from the notice. It seems to me that there is a trap and that the only cautious way to conform to the Standing Order, having given the notice at a time when the stage was in existence, is to at least put the motion forward in the form which conforms to the notice.

I would also like the hon. member to address the second point, which is this. The language of Standing Order 75C says particularly:

—an allocation may be proposed in one motion to cover the proceedings at both the report and the third reading stages on a bill—

Obviously, the only time that that can be done is at the report stage, because if it is done at the third reading stage, the report stage is already finished. Since two stages can be included in one motion, and those two stages are the report stage and the third reading stage, I would like the hon. member to discuss how else that could be done in terms of that language than on a motion of the kind that is in front of me now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the situation has changed since yesterday. Yesterday we were still debating the report stage and, therefore, it was possible for that debate to be carried on or for an attempt to be made to cut off that debate. But that debate is now over and you, sir, have admitted that that part of the motion proposed by the minister is redundant, a nullity and out of order. The only portion of the motion that can be considered now is the portion which relates to third reading.

I do not see how the notice of yesterday, which is now in a different situation and therefore has in it something that has gone by the board, can apply to today's situation. Today we are at the point where third reading is about to begin. It is not possible for the minister to say that agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 75A or 75B at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration. It has as yet not been under consideration at all. I do not see how the minister can rely on the fact that yesterday we were still at the report stage to claim the right to present a motion covering two stages.

As for the right set out in the Standing Order—and we had this raised on a point of order in another instance this session—to move a motion covering two stages of debate, there are not now two stages of debate. The report stage of the debate is over and we are about to begin the third reading stage. I submit that the attempt to do that goes beyond the provisions of Standing Order 75C. If the minister had given notice the day before and sought to move that motion yesterday, or if the report stage had not been completed last night, I would have to agree that the motion is in order. However, we are in a new situation. We are at the point where the only debate left is the third reading debate. It has not proceeded, and I submit on that basis the motion falls.

If you, Mr. Speaker, find it in order—and frankly I do not see how you can, sir, because I think that there is a clear case for our side—the question will also arise—and I think that we should know before we get into what is involved—as to what is a sitting day. That phrase "a sitting day" occurs in a number of places in this Standing Order. It has been determined on a number of occasions that a sitting day for a government item consists of the day from the moment orders of the day are called, and it has to be all of that day to meet the definition of "a sitting day". Today, however, when orders of the day are called there will be three recorded votes on the report stage amendments, so it will be an hour later before we start the debate at third reading. I would say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that a sitting day will have to be decided by you if it works out that way.

There is also the little problem of what we do about moving from report stage to third reading stage, since it requires unanimous consent on a day on which a vote has been taken; but here I am probably getting into the stupidity of the proposal rather than the fact that it is out of order. It seems to me, apart from the fact that the whole matter would have gotten through more quickly if the whole motion had not been proposed at all, that the motion is a flagrant abuse of Standing Order 75C, that the minister is trying to move under 75C a closure motion on third reading stage before debate has started, when the Standing Order says very clearly that it has to relate to the impossibility of achieving agreement with respect to proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration. We have not reached that stage yet, so I contend that the minister has no right to present this motion at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—and I will hear other hon. members—has not dealt with the matter that is so central to the argument. The Standing Order says that the report stage and the third reading stage can be contained in one motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But the report stage is over.

Mr. Speaker: The second point which the hon. member was arguing, if I understand him correctly, is that a motion cannot be put before the House dealing with a stage that has not yet begun and is not under consideration at the time. If I were to accept that argument then, in fact, we could never entertain a motion which dealt with both report stage and third reading. Obviously, the only time that that application can be made is when we are at report stage which, and in and of itself, says that we have not begun third reading yet.

Since the language of the Standing Order says that those two stages can be part of one motion, if I were to accept the hon. member's argument, I would have to accept that we cannot implement that paragraph of the order. As the hon. member knows, we implemented that paragraph just recently to cover both the report stage and third reading of a bill.

I would like the hon. member to deal with these points before I give the floor to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you are quite right that not long ago on another bill a motion was made when we were still at the report stage to cover both the remainder of the report stage and third reading. It is also quite true that I raised a point of order in that regard and that you overruled me. So it is established that when we are at the report stage of a debate it is in order to move a motion covering it and the third reading stage. But we are not at that point. The report stage debate is over.

● (1520)

Mr. MacEachen: You should read the order paper. It says "Resuming consideration of report stage"—order No. 42.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend must not have been here last night either. He says we are resuming consideration. All of us know that that debate ended and no motion at all can revive that debate.

Mr. MacEachen: No. There are three votes to be taken and also concurrence of report stage, and you say it is over?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yet the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources proposes in his motion that a day be allotted—he says "not more than one day"—to a stage that cannot be debated at all and can last only a short while.

In reply to your direct question, Mr. Speaker, I do not think my contention rules out the possibility of using Standing Order 75C with respect to third reading, but it does rule out the possibility of using it before third reading is started unless we are still at report stage. That is the gist of rule 75C. As a matter of fact, it is even the gist of the old 1913 rule of closure. You do not close things off before they have even started. There has to have been at least some debate.

In the situation where you have report stage and then third reading, the debate is going on. Although I did not like the position, I accept it as a ruling that when you are at the report stage you can present a motion covering both stages; but the report stage debate is over and I submit, therefore, that at this point one has to act as if only the third reading stage of the debate was left.

So far as third reading stage is concerned, we are governed by the language of the Standing Order which says that a motion can be moved only if it was not possible to reach agreement "in respect of proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration." It is on this ground that I feel this motion is contrary to the provisions of the rule and is a flagrant abuse of it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before I hear the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), the thought occurs to me, as I am sure it has to other hon. members, that in the circumstances, since the notice which was given yesterday was in order, since the motion which is put forward today may bring some difficulties with it because it now refers to a stage on which discussion is finished, although votes remain, the notice having to be in the form it was yesterday and the motion having to conform to that notice, and since discussion on that stage of the bill finished last night, the obvious solution would be to require the deletion of those portions of the motion today which relate to a stage that is now finished.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: That is a possible solution that I will have to consider.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the rules of the House are there to protect the government once in a while, and quite appropriately so. They are also available to protect members of the House and certainly, although the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did not raise the matter, the rules ought to be strictly construed.

It is axiomatic that if you agree the rules are here to ensure that the rights of parliament are not trampled upon, then the Chair has to come to grips with the fact that the motion presented today is substantially different from the notice of that motion given yesterday, aside from the foolishness of the motion in the first place, and the absolute foolishness of moving it today in view of what happened in the House leaders' meetings yesterday, on which I cannot elaborate. That is the first point I want to raise.

The second point is that I want to support what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre regarding his interpretation of Standing Order 75C. I agree with the statement made by Your Honour, and agreed to reluctantly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, regarding the construction to be put upon the ruling you made on another day. At the time at which that notice was given and the motion argued in the course of third reading, I want to emphasize as best I can that the circumstances were so different as to be the difference between night and day. This underscores the foolishness of bringing forward a motion to close yesterday, after notice was given but before the motion could be argued today, one of the stages with respect to which the notice applies having been dealt with by the House. It is finished, by agreement.

Mr. MacEachen: Not at all. We have four votes to call.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There was agreement, Mr. Speaker, to such an extent that the whip of this party sent notice to all of us that the vote would be deferred until today. That is the position we are in. That matter in concluded.

Surely, sir, when a motion is made in two parts which some would be prepared to construe as being possible under the rule—that is, that a motion can cover two parts—if one part of that motion is a nullity, I argue that the whole motion is a nullity.

I think Your Honour must address yourself to that point as well. There is no half loaf in this matter. Either the motion is valid or it is not. If it is a nullity, then this motion, which was unnecessary in the first place, does not stand before the House and ought to be ruled out of order. That is the third point, Mr. Speaker.

Fourthly, I think in this situation perhaps the time has come for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to come to his senses and tell us how much time he really wants to deal with this bill. Now that we have dealt with report stage, now that it is completed and we are going to have votes in a few minutes, he may find that we do not have the anxiety he seems to have to delay the debate another two days. Perhaps the government should take quite seriously the admonition given them about bringing forward this kind of motion in the first place.

Mr. Cafik: Make it a House order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The deputy House leader of the government interjects and says "a House order". Of course, if we can agree there could be a House order. The government has indicated in their motion a period of time within which they would like this matter to be completed. I wonder if we can have this matter discussed to see if we can complete it within the time suggested by the order. I think there is a certain matter of consultation that ought to go on that obviously has not taken place in this case. I have come to the conclusion that for political purposes alone the government is conspiring to delay this piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have obviously a number of rather difficult choices to make. It occurs to me that we are getting into a situation that has a number of ironies. If I accept the theory that report stage of this bill is over—

An hon. Member: That is a fact, not theory.

Mr. Speaker: If I accept that argument, it would seem to me that what remains are some votes ordered by the House. If I accept that position then I presume that if I do not let this motion go ahead at this time, the third reading of the bill begins today without consent. Because the position is that we are not dealing with report stage and third reading on the same day because the contention has been put forward that report stage is finished.

If that is the case, then I would think the sensible thing for the Chair to do would be to accede to the arguments, strike down this order, call the votes that had been ordered and then call third reading of the bill after orders of the day, which means that third reading would then commence. That does not put it under a time allocation order but at least it begins the debate. That would seem to me to be a sensible course.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to that matter I presume that it was never the government's intention not to deal with Bill C-42. If this solution you have put forward is acceptable to the government, it is acceptable to us and has been acceptable to us for some considerable time. We are not anxious to delay the bill. If you do accede—

● (1530)

Mr. Pinard: The Speaker said he would recognize two hon. members. Why is he speaking again?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —to the argument put forward by this side, namely that the motion put by the government is a nullity for a number of reasons, then I undertake with you, and through you to members on the other side, that we have no objection whatsoever to starting third reading debate immediately after the bell; and if hon. members now say they want to enter into discussions with respect to the appropriate time, that, of course, is what we have wanted the government to do for some period of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, yours is a very difficult task indeed and sometimes, as it is the case today, we unintentionally make it still more difficult.

Mr. Speaker, through this point of order I should like to call the attention of the House and the Chair to the fact that yesterday the minister gave notice of his motion before the debate on Bill C-42 could continue, as reported in Hansard on page 4281. Anyone examining his statement on the allocation of time to consider the report and third reading stages of Bill C-42 might wonder whether the time thus allocated refers only to the time spent debating the motions at the report stage, or also the time spent voting on the various motions. As I understand it, the minister stated: "Therefore, I wish to give notice that a minister will move, at the next sitting of the House, that not more than one additional day be allocated, if necessary . . ."—this "if necessary" is very important—"to each of the said stages of the said bill". That is why I keep asking myself this question: When the debate came to an end yesterday, the minister or the government might have demanded that the question be put forthwith. Then, Mr. Speaker, would the issue which has been raised today after the minister moved his motion, as currently drafted, have been raised? I suggest not.

On the other hand, if the time allocated under yesterday's motion must include the necessary time for voting, I suggest that the motion as drafted warrants the use of the expression "report stage". This issue should be referred to our Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization for the purpose of preventing the repeat of a situation similar to that which is occurring today. Be that as it may, I think that the report stage will be over only after the vote is taken, because the motion does not determine whether the time allocated is only for the particular debate. The text refers only to the time allocated for the report stage. But in my opinion the report stage is not over as long as the question has not been put. That is what I wanted to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker. The time has now come for a decision, and such decisions are generally fairly wise.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Bail them out, Alastair!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would draw to your attention that there have been four statements from the opposition benches on this point. I would hope that before a decision is made you would permit those of us who disagree with the point of view that has been put by the other side to make our points.

An hon. Member: What is stopping you?

Mr. MacEachen: I am not particularly interested in making the procedural argument if we can reach some other conclusion.

Mr. Clark: Smile, Alastair.

Mr. MacEachen: Yesterday morning there was a discussion with party representatives in which an attempt was made to secure an agreement placing a particular time limit on the remaining two stages of the bill. I am not going into the details of the discussion because these are not usually divulged, but it was necessary for the minister, before he gave his notice, to tell the House that that attempt had failed and that it was not possible to reach an agreement. It is for that reason that the minister gave notice yesterday that he would move a motion today providing two additional days maximum for the bill.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), quite apart from his arguments, which I do not accept, has been forthcoming. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has said "I want to get the bill through quickly." I would say that if we can reach an agreement now for a House order which would provide that we could dispose of third reading not later than six o'clock tomorrow evening, which would give hon. members quite a bit of extra time, then I would suggest to the minister that he ask the consent of the House to withdraw his motion.

If that is not agreeable, I will have to argue the point of order and attempt to show what seems to be obvious, that we are still at the report stage of Bill C-42. There has been a fundamental fallacy argued today that the only part of a stage of a bill that is consequential is the discussion. We all know that discussion is important, but perhaps more important than the discussion is the decision.

There are at least three decisions to be taken. There is a decision to be taken on the concurrence of the report stage of the bill. If the report stage has disappeared and no longer exists, why do we have order No. 42 on the order paper reading: "Resuming consideration of report stage of Bill C-42"? Why is it there? Why is it recorded in the official record of the House, namely Votes and Proceedings, that votes have been deferred on the report stage of Bill C-42? If it is decided by some imagination that reality does not apply any more, and if we say the report stage is no longer before us, then it would be open to an hon. member to get up when you, sir, call the votes and argue with you, Mr. Speaker, that the report stage has disappeared. Because if you accept the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that is exactly what will have been ruled.

It seems to me that these are the arguments that we would want to make. To show that there is a procedural foundation for our position, I wanted to make that statement. However, if it is the wish of the House, as has been expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, to agree through a House order that we will finish third reading not later than the end of the day tomorrow, then with the consent of the House we will withdraw this motion and make a House order bringing that about. That seems to be in the spirit of the suggestion which was made.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the minister feels badly about the position which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has put him in. If I were in the position of the Deputy Prime Minister, I would feel badly too. Following along the acknowledgement that he has made about the offer in terms of time, the acknowledgement of the offer I made to discuss this matter privately—but he has chosen publicly, and that is fine with me—I do not know whether it will take that long. If that is what the minister is interested in, we in the official opposition are prepared to agree to six o'clock tomorrow. I assume it is the intention of the minister, and our agreement is based on this, not to delay consideration of the bill further and to follow along the suggestion made by Mr. Speaker that we begin third reading of the bill immediately after the vote is taken. I notice the government House leader is nodding his agreement.

• (1540)

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, to both questions.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He has answered yes, to both questions. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this may be one point you do not have to decide. For once, sweet reason prevails.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it would be unfortunate if we were denied the opportunity of hearing your ruling on this point of order. I notice that Your Honour is smiling at that. One has to be careful in these statements on the floor in referring to discussions that have taken place off the floor, but I think it is open to me to say to the Deputy Prime Minister that he knows I offered at twelve o'clock today to agree to the very proposition he has made, namely that there be no closure motion but instead we accept a House order to end debate by six o'clock tomorrow night. If he had gone along with that, we would have saved this three quarters of an hour's discussion.

Mr. Pinard: Why didn't you say so yesterday morning?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I said it to the Deputy Prime Minister by telephone at noon today and it still stands. We are prepared to agree that the third reading stage end by six o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I personally do not see any reason why everybody should relieve you of the responsibility of making that decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If we are going to decide this by way of an order at the present time, obviously it will take the consent of the House to make an order. Any hon. member who does not want to consent to it is, of course, in the position to do so and I will have to come back, I suppose, and make a decision. Before I know that this resolution can be tried, I do not know how I can continue to hear argument on the merits of this position we were in a moment ago. There has been a suggestion now by the leaders of all the parties of the House—

[Translation]

Judging from the last intervention of the hon. member for Bellechasse, I think he agrees to settle the problem in the proposed manner. The hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, thank you for inviting me to finish my remarks. What I wanted to convey a moment ago was that in my opinion the report stage is not over as long as the question has not been put, even if it is deferred. That is how I see things. If the House agrees that the minister should withdraw his motion, I would be in full agreement because it would prevent us from wasting two hours which we could spend on the study of the bill. We will have the same amount of time for debate and I think we will have made a smart move and that in future we will think twice before deferring the vote, particularly on such a sensitive question. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago, I was hoping that the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) would indicate in his remarks that in his mind the motion, as regards the time allotted to report stage or third reading, also includes the time needed to hold the vote. Otherwise it should be clearly stated that it concerns only the time allotted for debate and that there will be additional time for voting. I would like this matter to be clearly defined so that we would at last know exactly where we stand on this matter. However, if the House wishes to continue in the direction that has been proposed, I will not object and neither will my party.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I see two other members rising in their places, but I have a proposal before me which requires the unanimous consent of the House. I have a proposal to withdraw a motion from consideration and to introduce another order of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why there should be unanimous consent to allow the minister to withdraw this motion. He is a member of the government. He is a cabinet minister and he introduced it. He talked to his House leader and he knew that this arrangement could have been made before. He just wanted to make a big show in Toronto showing how brave he is with a closure motion. He is asking a lot by asking the House to allow him to withdraw after putting the motion forward. In order to save you the difficulty, Mr. Speaker—because it will be a difficult ruling no matter which way you go—I will agree to unanimous consent being given. However, I think this is an abuse of the minister's powers.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. I just want to make a couple of points. Initially, and I am sure the Chair will agree, we would not be in this procedural wrangle now if there had not been a call for the actual votes to be taken.

The second point is whether or not those votes would have been deferred. Because the question of intent and attitude has already entered into some of the arguments before you, I would like to point out that it was the minister's action which called for recorded votes over the objection of members of the opposition. That is the first point.

On the question whether the votes should be deferred or not, again it was the attitude and the expressed wish of the minister that those votes be deferred. In effect, the minister is the author of his own predicament. I hope he will learn his lesson.

There is a very brief argument I want to make to Your Honour, because if you do not make a ruling now, you will have to make it at some time in the future. This hassle or determination of the meaning of this particular rule is going to come before you again if it is not decided by you now. If the report stage has not been concluded, which is the argument of the Deputy Prime Minister, how did the House move on to Bill C-38? We could not have proceeded to move on to Bill C-38. There was no adjournment motion. Bill C-38 was called by the Chair because obviously the debate on the report stage was over. There is no other way.

Mr. Speaker: We obviously can chase this argument around all afternoon. The point in the final analysis comes to this. I can wrestle with a very difficult procedural decision, but the longer the House reflects on it the more it will realize that in the procedural decision there may be no winners, that in the situation we are in I can come down on one side or the other of a particular finding.

The fact is that the finding that is essential to victory on one side may in fact be self-defeating on another argument, and similarly on the other side. Accordingly, I happen to celebrate the fact that the House has drawn itself to this position. I hope all hon. members join me in that position.

That being the case, there has been an application for consent upon the condition that an order be made dealing with the termination of third reading by tomorrow at six o'clock, and that the present motion standing in the name of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, seconded by the Deputy Prime Minister, be now withdrawn.

Mr. MacEachen: On that point, Mr. Speaker, I am not being quarrelsome but I just wonder if it is necessary to ask for withdrawal. I wonder whether the motion has been put. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised his point of order before the motion had been put, and if it had been put there would be no ruling. I am not worried but I would just draw that to your attention.

● (1550)

Mr. Speaker: As a matter of fact, the point is well taken. The motion was read by the Chair, but before the question was put the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quite properly raised a point of order and we began deliberation on it. In any case, the motion is not now before the House. What is before the House, by the consent of the House just given, is a motion by the President of the Privy Council, seconded by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that all questions necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of this bill be put tomorrow at six o'clock—

Some hon. Members: Or before!

Mr. Speaker: —not later than tomorrow at six o'clock, and that the House launch upon consideration of the third reading stage of the bill later this day immediately following the deferred report stage divisions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 708, 1,028, 1,032, 1,128, and 1,129.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

TRAINING EXERCISE—N.B.

Question No. 708—Mr. Jones:

1. What was the reason for the 24 hour stop just south of Fredericton, New Brunswick during a training exercise involving the 2nd Battalion in October, 1974?

2. Have new four-wheel drive vehicles since been purchased and if so what was the total cost?

3. What was the total cost of the original plans to purchase the four-wheel drive vehicles?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence):

1. There is no record of a 24-hour stopover south of Fredericton in October, 1974 by the 2nd battalion of any regiment.

2. Yes. $51,773,088.

3. $67,960,000.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

MEDICAL SERVICES

Question No. 1,028—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the estimated cost to the government of its share of the amount paid by provincial governments for payments for medical services received by Canadians while in foreign countries?

2. Has the government considered a per diem tax for Canadians returning to Canada to cover medical expenses incurred while in a foreign country?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned:

1. In 1977-78 the estimated amount paid for out-of-country services was $20.8 million for services covered under the Hospital Insurance Program and $5.5 million for services covered under the Medical Care Program, for a total of about $26.3 million. The federal share of such costs under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977 comes to about 50 per cent, or approximately $13.2 million, taking into account both cash contributions and the value of tax points transferred to the provinces.

2. No.

2. The Government of Canada was informed of the possibility of Mr. Lévesque being awarded a decoration by the French government but was not asked to agree to it. In November, 1977 the Canadian government reminded the French authorities of Canadian practice regarding the granting of foreign awards to Canadian citizens.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES SUPERANNUATION

Question No. 1,129—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

Motion No. 5 (Mr. Symes) negatived.

Energy Supplies

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology) moved:

That Bill C-42 to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now, by order.

Mr. Speaker: By order, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gillespie moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the third reading debate on this important bill I want to deal with a number of points that were raised by members of the opposition at report stage.

A number of major issues are involved. The first is whether Canada may be faced with an emergency and whether Canada should take action now to deal with that emergency. It was quite clear when listening to hon. members opposite that they have a very relaxed attitude to this question of a possible emergency, and I think we have seen evidence of that relaxed attitude throughout this debate. Yesterday we had a chance to bring this debate to a conclusion through agreement.

Mr. Lawrence: A week ago today.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member says it was a week ago today but he and his party filibustered this bill for five days. The Tory party took five days of precious House time at report stage. They took five days to go over a lot of ground that we went over in committee. I think that is scandalous and I think it is irresponsible.

When the House leaders met yesterday it would have been possible to come to the agreement which we were subsequently able to do in the House this afternoon. It would have been possible to do that yesterday and there would have been no necessity to move closure. I have no regrets that we moved closure and time allocation. I think this is what brought them to their senses.

Throughout this debate we have witnessed a party that says there is no emergency now. They say: "We do not really have to worry about any emergency for weeks or months to come. Forget Iran. Do not worry about multinational corporations and how they are going to reallocate crude oil supplies. We do not need a bill like this. There is not going to be any emergency."

As I have indicated, that relaxed attitude pervaded the behaviour of the official opposition throughout. It was best exemplified by their attitude last week when we spent five days on report stage, three of which were spent on one of their own amendments. They said that amendment was needed in order to give parliament time to consider the important question of a national emergency—a national emergency which the Government of Canada would declare. They wanted to remove the provision which requires parliament to deal with the declaration of an emergency in three days. In other words, they wanted the energy supplies allocation board and the whole mandatory allocation and rationing system to be left in a position of some uncertainty. That is the only interpretation that can be put on their remarks unless one adopts the interpretation of the House leader of the official opposition when he said: "You do not need approval of parliament after three days' debate because you can move closure". He was saying we could use the power to move closure and require only two days' debate, whereas in the bill the government has provided for three days and a certainty of conclusion of the debate.

It was apparent that the opposition was not interested in bringing this matter to a conclusion until they were forced to by the political backlash when the country became aware that they were spinning the debate out. I think the country was aware that this bill went through the House once before. There was something like eight days' consideration in committee and eight days for second reading once before. This time we had three days for second reading, five days at report stage, and eight to twelve meetings of the committee. It was clear that the attitude of the opposition to this bill, as to the possible emergency—indeed, probable emergency if one listens to many of the experts on energy matters—is very relaxed and they are not anxious to see the bill passed before the House is dissolved. They would leave Canada without the power to deal with an energy emergency during a dissolution of parliament. I believe that is downright irresponsible.

This is not surprising when we think about the attitude of the opposition toward energy questions. It has been their record on energy for the length of this parliament. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has never interested himself in energy policy questions. He has taken the view: "We will let Alberta decide; maybe Premier Lougheed will have an idea. I will not say anything; I will hang back and let others do it for me." He is incapable of putting Canada first, Mr. Speaker. Why else would he have ducked the important question of pricing? Why else would the Leader of the Opposition continue to repeat banalities with respect to Petro-Canada? He would like to get rid of it. The Leader of the Opposition has not been prepared to talk on the hard energy policy issues. He has abdicated any responsibility for energy policy questions.

One way that he might be able to justify that inactivity is to say that we do not need this bill because there is not going to be any emergency. It is surprising to us but, when we think about it, still consistent with the position of the opposition party when they take this relaxed attitude toward the necessity of providing legislation and powers to deal with an emergency. It is surprising that they would be prepared even at this late date to say: "Let the multinationals do the job. Let Exxon look after Canada; we do not need Petro-Canada. We are prepared to go with the multinationals to sort out Canada's problems." That position was put forward by the official critic for the Conservative party.

I am going to deal with the International Energy Agency and the Importance of Petro-Canada being part of the standing group on emergency questions at the International Energy Agency. The first amendment we dealt with a few moments ago was opposed by the official opposition. The official opposition did not want Petro-Canada to be the watchdog for Canada at the standing group on emergency questions in the International Energy Agency.

● (1650)

I talked about the opposition's relaxed attitude. That is something we have seen emerge in this debate, evidenced by their saying "let the multinationals do it" and their not being prepared to face up to pricing questions. As well it was evidenced by their opposition to Petro-Canada and the whole attitude toward the importance of getting this bill through and getting it through quickly.

Another issue in the debate, part of the official opposition's position, was that the government was asking for too much power. The official opposition said there was no emergency and that there would not be an emergency. Therefore, we could take all the time we wanted even though we will be facing an election without the powers to deal with one.

Let us look at some opposition charges. Most of those charges seem to be based on taking at face value a particular presentation made to the committee by the Ontario government, a presentation which examination has proved was based on a whole series of false premises and assumptions. It was one of the most shoddy pieces of work ever presented before a parliamentary committee. It was not based on any objective seeking for the truth. It was based, as I indicated in a public statement, on some misguided effort to try to embarrass the government. One can only speculate why the Conservative government of Ontario—perhaps itself in some difficulty with energy questions in Ontario—would take this moment to try to shift the limelight away from themselves and place it on us. As a result of that shoddy piece of work and inept presentation on the part of the spokesman for the Ontario government, upon examination of the case it seems the Ontario government has come out very much second best.

I regret the official energy critic for the Conservative party, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), has identified himself so quickly with some of the remarks in that presentation, arguments which suggested that through this bill the Government of Canada could bankrupt the gas transmission distribution system in Canada. That was the position of the Ontario government. However, the testimony placed before the committee clearly indicated that there are measures, protections and appeal mechanisms which can prevent any kind of arbitrary move. I believe that case has been made and made convincingly. I wait to hear whether we will still hear that again from the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

The leader of the debate from the opposition side showed no readiness or willingness to look at the way the powers which the government was seeking in this bill could be controlled by parliament or how those powers would be made available and published in the form of amendments to allocation programs or orders dealing with mandatory allocation.

I believe it was the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) who put his finger on it best when he said that it was quite clear that the amendments introduced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and supported by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, the energy critic for the Tory party—which did not come to a vote because after a while I suspect the Tories became embarrassed by the nature of them—were designed to subvert the intentions of the act. If these amendments had been accepted by this House they would have so cut and emasculated—to use the words of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in some of his remarks—the administrative process that it would be impossible to deal with the emergency which this particular bill is designed to cope with in the event an emergency comes about. God hopes it does not, but let us be safe rather than sorry.

That has not been the attitude of the official opposition. As I have indicated, the position of the official opposition is to recognize no urgency. They do not recognize that the administration is complex or that it will be dealing with hundreds of thousands of separate transactions. It will be dealing with particular regions, and regional aspects differ from place to place in this great country. There is no recognition that priorities may be changed through the advice of the provinces. There has been no recognition that certainty is needed in the administration of emergency measures. The Tory opposition closed its eyes and stuck its head in the sand when it came to deal with this bill. Its intelligence has been covered up because it has been buried in the sand.

I have indicated that there is a provision for parliamentary approval after a declaration has been announced. There is provision in the act which requires that orders and amendments to orders be tabled before parliament so that Canadians may know what the emergency supplies allocation board is doing. I would be the first to recognize that there are very significant powers associated with this board. But when one is dealing with an emergency and something as strategic as energy on which our whole economy depends, surely it would be foolhardy not to provide the necessary powers and flexibility, and indeed, as we have, the necessary process of parliamentary approval, so that the job can be done.

There was a charge of a degree of unfairness somehow or other introduced into the administrative process, and no recognition that this possible unfairness could be redressed. Answers to those charges were also placed on the record and set out in detail during committee stage.

In the balance of my remarks I would like to deal with the International Energy Agency and the part it may have in triggering the need by the Government of Canada to declare an emergency under the terms of this act.

I am looking at the clock, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call it five o'clock and resume my remarks on this important aspect of the bill after the adjournment.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HERBERT—BILL C-232—RETENTION OF POSITION ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before dealing with the order of business which according to the order paper will be called today, we might attempt to complete discussion on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on March 16 and give hon. members who have indicated their interest in this matter an opportunity to express their point of view.

As hon. members are aware, on March 16 the hon. member for Vaudreuil raised as a point of order the fact that Bill C-232, to amend the Holidays Act, having been considered at report stage and debated at the third reading stage on March 13, 1979, ought to have retained its precedence on the order paper and remained at the beginning of the list of private members' business, public bills. Some members from both sides have already expressed opinions on the issue. Unless they have something new to add, I hope they will not repeat the contribution they have already made. I will give priority to those who have not yet contributed to the debate. Following this discussion, I hope to make a decision this afternoon.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, speaking strictly to the point of order, I believe the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is entirely out of order. According to the customs of this House, after having been debated for an hour in the House, a private member's bill automatically falls to the bottom of the list. I do not intend to speak long. Some of my colleagues will also have something to say on this bill.

I wish to give Your Honour a precedent. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) presented Bill C-208, referred to as the Heritage Day bill, which also was a bill dealing with the Holidays Act. It was handled in exactly the same way as this bill has been handled. First reading was given October 15, 1974, page 374 of Hansard. Second reading was given on March 18, 1975. At that time the motion was put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, presumably because the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville was not in attendance. That can be found at pages 4215 and 4216 of Hansard.

The bill was reported from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and amended to "National Heritage Day" on April 22, 1975, page 5079 of Hansard. Third reading was debated February 13, 1976, pages 10944 to 10951 of Hansard. One hour was allotted to that private member's bill. The time expired and it went to the bottom of the list. I suggest if Your Honour does otherwise today, you will be setting a precedent since this has never happened.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will also be brief. First I want to correct a misunderstanding I had when I made my preliminary comments. I thought at that time we were still at report stage, but we were, of course, at third reading stage of that bill.

I wish to present an argument to your Honour with regard to the order in which this bill should stand, namely at the bottom of the list of private members' bills, and take its turn. To accept the suggestion that this bill remain at the top of the list would give no opportunity for any other bill to have second reading. In other words, if there had been an inclination, as I suspect there may have been, to carry this particular bill and read it out each time, we would never have reached order No. 9, No. 13 and, most important, No. 16 standing in the name of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

I feel we should not be deprived of the opportunity to present our bills, each of us in our turn, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon) and the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle). An opportunity should be given for each of these bills to have second reading and not be pre-empted by having a bill which has been dealt with at second reading and report stage, at the suggestion of the mover of that bill, remain at the top of the list to the detriment of other bills.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation, and I know that you or some member of the House will correct me if I am wrong, the long-standing tradition has been that we simply do not have enough time to deal in a sensible and fair way with the large number of private bills presented by private members in this House so that each one has a full hearing and reaches its logical conclusion with an eventual vote. Obviously there are not enough hours in the day, days in the week and weeks in the month to do this with the very large number of private members' bills that are presented.

Every year there is a draw made. That is an eminently fair way of handling it. That draw picks out the priority for each of these private members' bills. They are then presented to the House in that order of priority. From time immemorial it has always been the gambit of the government in power, no matter what its political complexion may be, that those private members' bills rarely come to a vote.

Let us not be mealy-mouthed about it. The position is that nine-tenths of the bills are embarrassing to the government. That invariably results in most bills being talked out. That is the parliamentary phrase for people saying one thing while really not wanting it to come to a vote.

I have no strong views one way or the other on the merits or demerits of the hon. member's bill because I have not looked at it that carefully. However, I do know this. Those bills have been proceeded with quite regularly on the basis of the draw. Once a member's bill is talked out, not having reached a vote in the private member's hour, it automatically goes to the bottom of the list. To all intents and purposes, that means it is dead for that session. We really have not whined, complained or belly-ached about that in the past. Most members realize that that is the rule of the game before getting into it. I have had a private member's bill on the list for two years. It has not been reached. It is so far down the list this year that I know darned well it will not be reached.

Quite frankly, it is an effrontery for another member who enters into that course of action, knowing the rules, traditions and practices, and because of some actions of members on his own side or perhaps members on all sides of the House the bill is talked out, for some extraordinary reason to think he is aggrieved and therefore wants another kick at the can. He wants that bill left at the top of the list so that next time it can come up again. That is basically the appeal that has been put to you. Let us not clothe it in parliamentary terms; let us put the stark, naked facts in front of the House. Somebody feels he has been aggrieved because his bill has been talked out.

If you take it upon yourself to change the system, Mr. Speaker, I suggest you are opening up a hornet's nest. I do not know on what grounds the Chair could change this rule; there may be something hidden in the depths of the green book which gives you that authority, but I doubt it. If the Chair does have such authority it has never been cited. I suggest to you, Mr Speaker, that if you do exercise it on this occasion there are likely to be 347 bills on the list of private members' bills in respect of which the same appeal will be made. In such a ridiculous situation, the government itself would be obliged to step in. I am not saying this in any partisan way. Usually, no matter which party is in power it is in that party's interest to see a private member's bill come to a vote. If Your Honour establishes a precedent simply on the basis of a private member's bill having been talked out, then every member is going to be appealing to you and demanding that his bill come to a vote. My suggestion is that this would prove more embarrassing to the government than it would ever be to any opposition.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I commence with the well known words that "I had no intention of taking part in this debate". That happens to be true. I see an argument on both sides. I suspect that the argument which wields most strongly against the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is that it has been done before the way it has been done this time. But the remarks just made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) did prompt me to get to my feet. He tries to argue that if Your Honour allows this bill to be at the top of the list the same arguments will be raised with regard to 200 or 300 other bills on the order paper. I would remind the hon. member that this bill has already been given second reading. It went to committee, got committee approval and came back at the report stage for third reading.

It is certainly true that if the Speaker allows this bill to stay at the top of the list, then any other bill which gets committee approval and comes back here would be entitled to the same treatment. But it does not follow that all the bills which were talked out on second reading would have a case for being put at the top of the list.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, regardless of the stage which the bill has reached in the parliamentary process, it is still a most discriminatory proposition that it be given preferred treatment to the detriment of every other bill introduced. I do not understand how the hon. member can feel he has the right to make such an appeal against a practice which has been followed, without exception to the best of my knowledge, during the 22 years which I have sat in this House. Nor do I understand why the House is using 15 minutes of the private members' hour to discuss a procedural matter of this kind. I do not believe it ought to be before the House regardless whether the bill in question has progressed to third reading stage. The whole proposition is contrary to the practice and precedents of the House and it is an affront to every other member here that we should even be discussing it.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the last hon. member who gave his point of view indicated that no precedent or procedure could justify the request made by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). But to date there is no precedent either of an hon. member's private bill at the third reading stage which has been ignored in favour of other bills at the second reading stage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) on the same point of order.

[English]

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said no precedents had been given. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary was absent from the chamber when I spoke but I did cite a precedent—Bill C-208 presented by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). That is the point I made. He is changing the precedent which was set in the case of that bill, and I should like the hon. member to recognize that point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is why I allowed the hon. member to have the floor, so that he could make that correction.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, there are in fact Standing Orders which govern the proceedings of the House. If hon. members complain about the large number of so-called private members' bills and the fact that the House cannot deal with all of them during a single session, I agree with them. That is a shortcoming which a parliamentary reform should correct. However, Mr. Speaker, there is a Standing Order which is quite clear and which establishes an order of priority for private members' bills.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Which Standing Order?

Mr. Pinard: Standing Order 20. One may or may not agree with its provisions, Mr. Speaker. One could also be in favour of a parliamentary reform. I, for one, am all for it. However, until such time as those good wishes become reality through everyone's co-operation, I feel we have no choice. We are bound by Standing Order 20 which, in this instance, determines the order of precedence of private members' bills. Such is not the case for government bills of public interest; Standing Order 20 applies to private members' bills we are dealing now. If the Standing Orders of the House did not prescribe that order of precedence, there would be no problem.

Standing Order 20(1) is very clear. Unless otherwise provided, and no other provision is mentioned, the day to day precedence, and here we are not speaking of going from one session to another, on the order paper of private members' business shall be as follows: first, third reading and passage of bills. Then follows a list of business in which second reading of bills ranks quite low. That is the situation. Hon. members may have personal feelings about it. Wishes can be expressed that the House update its procedure and hon. members be given more opportunity to study public bills during the hour set aside for private members' bills. All sorts of reforms can be suggested. But until such time as they are accepted, regardless of how acceptable they may be, we must respect the Standing Orders of the House. That is very clear.

If Standing Order 20 did not prescribe that order of precedence, specifically for private members' business, the problem would not even arise. So, reading that Standing Order, I wonder whether we should apply it or not. If we must, we must, though I admit that this may be hard to accept for those hon. members whose bills have yet to be discussed. But we must ask ourselves what the intention was of the legislator or whoever conceived of this rule. Why, at some point, was an order of precedence prescribed for private members' bills? The only logical argument I can find is that it was doubtless presumed that once a bill had been discussed on second reading and, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out, reported from committee, it would probably take very little time to pass third reading, and thus this would in fact do little to hamper other bills that have reached second reading. That is the only logical argument I see which could have prompted the person or persons who drafted rule 20 prescribing an order of precedence, but they undoubtedly wanted precisely not to allow it to be said that during private members' hour nothing ever gets passed, bills are systematically talked out. Once a bill manages to pass second reading without being talked out, then let us give it priority and pass it—for once a bill is not killed on second reading. It passed the committee stage. Hear, hear! Then it is passed on third reading, and we go back to the other bills on second reading most of which do not go beyond the second reading stage because they are talked out.

Mr. Speaker, that is the rationale I see behind S.O. 20.(1). If a bill has passed all stages and reached third reading it would be unfair to say: Although you were not killed on second reading, you will never see the light of day because there are a multitude of other bills before you. There is a rule which says you have priority, you have gone beyond second reading in committee, you go first. You are going to be passed on third reading, and then we are going back to other bills.

That is the only rationale I see behind the rule. Once again, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I will say that my argument might seem very academic, it applies to this case but we are bound by the rules. I am not suggesting I agree with the procedure as it exists; what I say is that we do not have a choice. The procedure exists, it must be applied until it is changed. I would agree to having it changed eventually, but in the meantime, I respectfully submit that we do not have any choice and the rules must be applied as they exist.

● (1720)

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, not only is the argument of the parliamentary secretary academic, but it is also terribly unfair to private members of the House of Commons who have little enough opportunity, as the parliamentary secretary knows, to have matters considered.

I know that the Chair is mindful of the precedent cited by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) with respect to Bill C-208 standing in the name of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). From looking at Standing Order 20, one could make the argument, if one confines one's eyes to that which appears in Standing Order 20(1) only, that certainly there is an order of precedence established as follows: "Third reading and passage of bills". If that was all the Standing Order said, I would have to agree with the parliamentary secretary, but it goes on. There is another paragraph on the next page which may have escaped him. The marginal note says "On adjourment or interruption". I am going to quote that paragraph because it applies to what we are dealing with here. It says this:

After any bill or other order in the name of a private member has been considered in the House or in any committee of the whole and any proceeding thereon has been adjourned or interrupted, the said bill or order shall be placed on the order paper for the next sitting at the foot of the list under the respective heading for such bills or orders.

The paragraph refers to the foot of the list, not the head of the list. It refers to the foot of the list under the respective heading for such bills or orders. There is nothing in that paragraph which relates it back to those headings which are set forth in Standing Order 20(1) for the purposes of precedence. The paragraph is at least equivocal with respect to that matter. I think it goes much further than being equivocal. However, it is at least equivocal, and if that is the case, I think the ordinary rules and traditions of this House ought to apply, particularly in view of the precedent with respect to the bill which stood in the name of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville.

There is another reason why that precedent ought to apply, aside from its existence, and why that interpretation ought to govern in this matter, and that is because of the fact that there are extremely few opportunities for members of this House to have matters of importance to them—not just to one or a few members, but matters which are important to a great number of members—considered by the House of Commons. I say, with respect, that the precedent with regard to Bill C-208 in the name of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville is important and ought not to be disregarded by the Chair.

Fairness is also important, as is the tradition of the rights of members to express themselves. Also important is the principle that, if there is any doubt at all with respect to how the Standing Orders should be interpreted, they ought to be interpreted in favour of permitting the House the widest possible latitude and fairness; and I think they ought to be interpreted in favour of other members rather than the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), who has had almost unprecedented opportunity with respect to private members' matters compared with opportunities of other members on matters which they feel are important. With respect, I think the Chair ought to protect that right.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I have just two points to make. I agree with all the previous speakers about the problem of lack of time in private members' hour. I will not argue that point at all. However, I do not think that is the issue at this point.

I think only one new point has been raised. I made an oblique reference to it in my initial remarks, at which time I was well aware of the bill in the name of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) and the position in which it found itself after one hour of debate. The difference is that the situation was not contested at that time. In fact, if hon. members remember the circumstances, there was a good reason why it was not contested. The hon. member himself was happy to see that his bill did not come back for another debate in the House at that time. I think that point is not particularly relevant. The point is that it was not contested.

I am contesting now. I am suggesting that a ruling be made. I do not want to continue the debate any longer. I am asking that Your Honour indicate whether you feel under the circumstances that Standing Order 20(1), to which we have already referred, shall be the order of precedence, under which circumstance I would expect that a bill which is at the third reading stage and which has been debated should fall into the list of those bills which are at the third reading stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to thank hon. members for their contributions to this debate and for trying to enlighten the Chair.

[English]

The decision I have to make cannot be based on sentiment. It has to be based on the Standing Orders, on precedents, on practices and on traditions, and by making an off-the-cuff decision I would not make this institution progress.

I am not ready to accept some of the arguments which were put to me. I will single out two of them. One was the argument of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates). It is not because we are dealing with private members' hour and because the time for debate is limited that we should not attach the same importance to points of order or questions of privilege as we do in other debates or at other times. In that sense I feel that this point of order is an important one and we might lose more time than we should—but I must say that once we have started a debate on such a point of order, it is better to carry it through to its conclusion and make the decision which can be useful to the House and to this institution in the months and years to come in order to save a lot of time.

● (1730)

At the same time the other point made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), trying to corner the Chair about the fact that we may be faced with all kinds of subsequent points of order from 264 members, is something I have to eliminate from my mind. As I said, I have to base my decision on the Standing Orders and precedents. When this point was raised I took the opportunity to examine it, and two questions came to my mind. The first one was to examine the practices and precedents. One of these precedents has been raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). I have many other precedents which I could enumerate to hon. members if they have the patience to listen.

On April 7, 1967, Bill C-46 was debated for second reading and it appeared as No. 11 on the list of private members' business but the next time it appeared on the order paper was April 10, and it was listed as No. 171. It was then identified as follows:

House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-46, an act to amend the Parliamentary Secretaries Act.

It was proposed by the then hon. member for Carleton, Mr. Bell. This is one indication whereby a bill, as was the practice, left a priority place on the order paper and was moved to the end of the list.

Also there are Bills S-6 and S-7. Both of these bills appeared on Thursday, February 13, 1969, as respectively Nos. 1 and 2 on the order paper. They were debated as reported from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. On March 25, when they reappeared, they were at the end of the list as Nos. 6 and 7. Bill S-6 was an act respecting the Canada Trust Company. Bill S-7 was an act respecting the Huron and Erie Mortgage Company. Of course, they were Senate bills.

On March 13, 1969, there was Bill C-101 appearing in the name of Mr. Lind. The constituency name was not mentioned. It was an act respecting London and Midland General Insurance Company, and it appeared as No. 1 under private bills. It was moved after it had been debated in committee of the whole. It appeared subsequently on October 22 at the end of the list as No. 5. It was listed as follows:

House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-101—

This bill was debated once at that stage, and the next time it appeared on the order paper it was at the bottom of the list.

Also Bill C-208 was mentioned by the hon. member for Red Deer and I will not refer to it too much. It was on top of the list on February 13. I have the list of private members' bills for Monday, February 16, 1976, where the same bill has been moved down to No. 8.

Finally there is Bill C-242 which was the first item under public bills, "an act respecting relief to non-smokers in transit, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs." It was presented by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) with amendments, from the committee. It was debated on Friday, June 4, 1976, and on Monday, June 7, it appeared as No. 42 and read as follows:

Resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Robinson, seconded by Mr. Francis, for the third reading of Bill C-242—

Also there is Bill C-29, and perhaps there are others. That completes the list of precedents which indicate to me that the practices and traditions of the House have been well established. But it still remained in my mind whether or not this practice developed without being questioned, or corresponded to our Standing Orders, so I felt I should go deeper into the matter and examine the Standing Orders more thoroughly. This brought me to a new Standing Order which was accepted by the House on Tuesday, June 14, 1955, which reads as follows:

After any bill or other order in the name of a private member has been considered in the House or in any committee of the whole and any proceeding thereon has been adjourned or interrupted, the said bill or order shall be placed on the order paper for the next sitting at the foot of the list under the respective heading for such bills or orders.

That is more or less the same standing order we have now. There is an interesting comment which has been written in relation to that new Standing Order. It reads as follows:

The practice in regard to private members' business is not consistent. Under the present Standing Order 15(4) bills are dropped to the bottom of the list after being debated on a Tuesday or a Friday but under the present Standing Order 110(2) a private bill considered in a committee of the whole on the said days remains at the top of the list for consideration at the next sitting.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

In order that a uniform principle may be established, this new section proposes that after any bill, motion or order in the name of a private member has been considered at any sitting, it shall be placed at the foot of the list of bills or orders under its respective heading on the order paper.

If I read this well, I can identify an intent by the introduction of that Standing Order to permit a bill reported from a committee of getting some kind of priority upon report but, not keeping that priority further than the possibility of being debated and being put before the House once, after which it would be treated just as any other private member's bill or order.

So I decided to examine more attentively the present Standing Order. We are faced with three Standing Orders which concern us at this time. Standing Order 18(1) reads as follows:

All items standing on the orders of the day, except government orders, shall be taken up according to the precedence assigned to each on the order paper.

It is very clear that Standing Order 18(1) singles out private members' business.

Standing Order 20(1) reads as follows:

The day to day precedence on the order paper of private members' business, except as otherwise provided, shall be as follows:

When the hon. parliamentary secretary referred to Standing Order 20(1), he missed the three or four words "except as otherwise provided".

● (1740)

[Translation]

When the parliamentary secretary read Standing Order 20(1), I wonder if he forgot to mention that that clause reads as follows:

—except as otherwise provided—

In my opinion, those words leave the door open to the possibility of an exception which might be defined elsewhere in the Standing Orders.

[English]

The fact that Standing Order 20(1) includes these words "except as otherwise provided" certainly means that somewhere in the Standing Orders there must be a provision whereby there can be an exception. I believe this exception is found immediately under Standing Order 20(2) which says:

After any bill or other order in the name of a private member has been considered in the House or in any committee of the whole and any proceeding thereon has been adjourned or interrupted, the said bill or order shall be placed on the order paper for the next sitting at the foot of the list under the respective heading for such bills or orders.

My first conclusion was that, although there is a list of priorities for private members' business on the order paper, this priority should not and does not exist for a time longer than necessary to bring that order again before the House for debate.

I did look into the precedents to see if the words "respective heading" for such bills or orders, which appear in Standing Order 20(2), met the interpretation given by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) in the way that his bill, even after being debated for third reading, should have stayed at the top of the list under the heading "Private Members' Bills—Third Reading Stage", and would have a priority over "Private Members' Bills—Second Reading". After looking at all the precedents, the practices and the standing orders in time past, I found there was never any list of private members' business or orders under such headings. I would find it very difficult to conclude that the point raised by the hon. member is a valid one.

I feel that the words in Standing Order 20(1) "except as otherwise provided" are strong enough for me to base my ruling on the exception which is indicated in Standing Order 20(2), and on the practices which have been followed in the House in years past. I cannot find, therefore, any basis for making a judgment which would create some kind of special class, that has never existed, for the bill of the hon. member, maintaining a permanent priority at the top of the list because it has reached a certain stage.

At the same time I think the point raised by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), and mentioned by other members, is very valid; perhaps not sufficient for me to make a decision on that basis, but still it certainly would be a discrimination against other members, because in no way could we get ourselves out of the situation where a bill would be reported back to the House from a committee and be the subject of a report stage debate, or the subject of consideration at third reading, if there was opposition, to the completion of the debate during the full session. With the practice of limiting the debate to one hour, the bill could remain on top of the list and prevent all other members from benefiting from the possibility of debating their propositions to the House under whatever heading, public bills or otherwise.

In any case, after examining all these points, I agree that the standing order is not very clear. It may be clarified in the future, but on the basis of our practice, the precedents, and my interpretation of the Standing Orders, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that whatever was done in placing the hon. member's private bill at the bottom of the list was the right course and a valid practice, and we should now go to the consideration of Bill C-209 which is at the top of the list.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, this has been a very interesting and probably useful procedural discussion. Unfortunately, some of the discrimination we have been talking about may occur as far as the bill of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Siddon) is concerned. I wonder if there might be a feeling in the House that the hon. member be given the 60 minutes that he was entitled to expect to receive if this discussion had not taken place. Otherwise we put him in the position in respect of his private member's bill of not having the 60 minutes he could anticipate, but rather some 12 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: I only speak on my own behalf. I have nothing against allotting an hour to consider the hon. member's bill, but not today. Given the discussion we have just had I would suggest that the necessary steps be taken to give priority to this bill next when private members' public bills are on the order paper and that for now we simply call it six o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In reply to the point raised by the hon. member, I did indicate on the occasion of a previous ruling that the House should look into this matter of points of order and decisions on procedural questions raised during the time for private members' business, as well as look at the alternative of having these points brought to the attention of the House and debated at some other time, perhaps between six and seven. No decision having been made on this, we have to follow the past practice.

If I understand the hon. parliamentary secretary correctly, he is suggesting that we might call it six o'clock and that priority be given to this order of business at the next time such order is under consideration. Is there unanimous consent to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 5.50 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT, 1979

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks this afternoon I dealt with some aspects of the bill before us, and I pointed to the incredible complacency which the official opposition has shown with respect to this bill. They have taken the position right from the very start that there was no emergency, that there would be no oil emergency, and that it just could not happen here in this country. There may be a revolution in Iran and shortages of oil, but it is just not going to affect Canada and there is no reason why we should prepare against this eventuality.

Against that complacent, short-sighted, irresponsible attitude, the opposition has also taken a relaxed attitude with respect to the process of this bill. They have felt that they could eat up valuable time in the House as they have done. We spent over one week on the report stage, which in itself is quite unusual particularly as we dealt with many of the same amendments in the committee stage and disposed of those amendments during that stage.

However, they reintroduced these amendments, particularly amendment No. 2, on which we spent three days. We spent another day or so on three other amendments introduced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) which, as the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) pointed out, if they had been accepted, would have subverted the very intention of the bill itself. They would have removed power from the emergency supplies allocation board and emasculated the ability of the board to deal with an emergency in Canada created outside of Canada by a revolution in Iran, by events in the Middle East, or by OPEC actions which might be related to the recent events in the Middle East.

Canada has solemn treaty obligations under the International Emergency Agency which the official opposition has never faced up to. Those solemn treaty obligations require us, as a nation, to institute demand restraint policies and programs in the event that the International Energy Agency, through its emergency oil-sharing arrangement, decides that there has been a reduction of 7 per cent in the consumption of the member countries or for any one particular country—and that is important—or any one identifiable region within any one particular country.

If consumption of oil is reduced by 7 per cent as a result of a shortfall of supplies, which could mean a reduction of imports in any one country or any region, then the international energy emergency oil-sharing arrangement could be activated for all 19 members of the International Energy Agency. As hon. members know, we are now very close to that number. At the present time the shortage as a result of the revolution in Iran is equivalent to about 5 per cent of world oil consumption. Having gone from zero to a 5 per cent reduction in the few months since Iran cut off production in late December, it does not seem to me that it requires any great stretch of the imagination to see how, if that could happen in three months, it is quite possible we could be faced with a situation where reduction in world consumption would be close to 7 per cent, or that it could be in any one country such as, for example, Japan, which is a very exposed country. If that one country were exposed, it would have the right, under the articles of association of the International Energy Agency, to ask the agency to apply the emergency oil-sharing arrangement. As a country, we would have to comply with these treaty obligations and Canadians would want us to do so. The only way it could be done, however, is with the powers given in this bill. That is why it is so important to the government that we proceed with dispatch.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

The bill was introduced for second reading debate over a month ago, and I submit it has received more than sufficient attention. Indeed, it has been subjected to a great deal of delaying tactics. As I pointed out, when one looks at the history of the opposition with respect to energy measures, that is not surprising. They have never regarded a policy position on energy as important for Canada. Historically they have taken the view that we could let somebody else decide—perhaps the province of Alberta. That has been the position of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). He has not addressed himself to any one of the series of important energy questions.

In this debate we have once again seen that complacent attitude. It has been manifested by the energy critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). He has taken the attitude which in an energy crisis would be to say, "Let the multinationals do it. Let Exxon decide what is best for us." On this side of the House we are not prepared to accept that kind of an attitude.

I have gone over the reasons for the bill, Mr. Speaker, and the possibility, indeed the increasing probability, of having to use the measures in the bill in a shorter period of time than one might have speculated even a few weeks ago.

Hon. members will have read in the press about the situation in the United States and the measures that President Carter will be placing before Congress. Congress will address those measures very shortly as they consider how to deal with the important demand restraint obligation they have. They are looking at the possibility of closing down service stations on Sundays and, if that is not sufficient, they may have to close them down for whole weekends as well. One can see the series of events which could be triggered by this kind of move and which could impact on Canada.

There are significant powers in this bill, Mr. Speaker. There is no question about that. It contains arbitrary powers. It is our contention that that is the only way to deal with an emergency which this bill is designed to take care of. These powers are, in one form or another, conditioned. They are necessary to discharge the purposes of the bill but they can only be used in an emergency. They can only be used to achieve these ends.

There are a number of built-in safeguards and controls. For example, parliamentary approval will be needed for the declaration of an emergency and the authorization of the mandatory allocation program as set out in clause 11(3). The mandatory allocation program will lapse each year. It can be authorized for no longer than a year and, at the end of that year, it will automatically lapse and have to be initiated by the government again. That measure will have to be placed before parliament. Approval will have to be sought and given before the mandatory allocation program can continue after one year. There are significant safeguards built in to the mandatory allocation program and the declaration for emergency energy purposes.

Similarly, the orders and reports are provided for in the bill. Orders with respect to the mandatory allocation program and the amendments to that program and the energy supplies allocation board, which is the administrative board, must provide monthly reports to the minister during an emergency as set out in the bill. It is also set out that any approvals with respect to the mandatory allocation program or amendments to it must be set out and laid before parliament for its information.

If a rationing program has to be introduced—and let us hope it never will—it, too, must be laid before parliament.

There are provisions with respect to environmental concerns, such as sulphur emissions, which provide power for the minister to reduce the environmental standards in particular, exceptional circumstances. In those situations there is provision for public hearings and a report on sulphur emissions. There are a number of other built-in provisions, safeguards, and controls in the bill which contains significant arbitrary powers.

The emergency oil-sharing arrangement of the International Energy Agency will depend for its administration and implementation largely on the multinational oil companies of the world. That is why we have specified in an amendment that Petro-Canada, the Canadian national oil company and a major policy instrument created by this government, should be attached to the standing group on emergency questions, which is the senior executive body of the International Energy Agency concerned with the administration of worldwide emergency programs. That particular group is advised by the International Advisory Board which is made up of multinational oil companies.

The emergency group will issue its instructions for implementation of the program to the office of the International Energy Agency allocation co-ordinator. He will be served by a secretariat and industry-supported advisory group. That secretariat will be working with multinational corporations; that industry supply advisory group will be composed of multinational corporations.

I have taken a few moments to outline the particular arrangement. It is important for Canadians to understand that the multinational oil companies will be the key to the administration and the implementation of any emergency oil-sharing arrangement throughout the world. That is why we believe the Canadian policy instrument, Petro-Canada, as part of Canada's representation, should be associated with the executive body which will be making decisions. In that way we can be sure that decisions which are taken are not taken just for the benefit of others but are taken for the benefit of Canada.

We were reminded recently of how an international company thought it would decide what was best for Canada; it took a decision that was best for somebody else. I am referring to the Exxon diversion of oil from Venezuela. The official opposition has taken the position that maybe the international companies do not always perform in the best interests of Canada. In this connection I am referring to remarks made a few nights ago by the hon. member from Northumberland-Durham. Maybe right now they are not looking after our best interests but this is not the time, he said, to introduce Petro-Canada to look after Canada's interests. He implied that we should continue to be happy and accept the decisions of international companies—"let them decide what is best for us."

That stand is not acceptable to the Canadian government. But that position is consistent with the position of the Leader of the Opposition who, as recently as last Sunday morning, in a broadcast on CBC radio stated that if he were to form the government and become Prime Minister, he would take action against Petro-Canada, the policy instrument set up to deal with Canadian energy priorities. On earlier occasions he has talked about winding it down, getting rid of it, selling parts of it, or in one way or another emasculating it, but he has now said more than that. He has said that Canada does not need an energy policy instrument like Petro-Canada and that he would get rid of the policy instrument function. I believe his words were, "We would move out of the policy instrument area."

The Leader of the Opposition has not faced up to the fact that over 90 per cent of this strategic industry is controlled by foreign corporations. I do not think he has even faced up to the fact that the oil industry is a strategic industry for Canada. I suggest he has ignored the question until it is now too late. One has seen the unseemly scrambling that the hon. member has gone through recently trying to put together an energy policy which has been described by the critics as a pathetic effort. It has been ridiculed by those who are familiar with the energy situation in this country.

I commend the Energy Supplies Emergency Act to the House of Commons and to the Canadian people. I would like to conclude by saying that while I recognize the official opposition do not agree with the government's position on energy questions, or on this particular bill, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said in his remarks during debate in this House that the Ontario government does not support this bill. He went on to imply that the Alberta government does not support this bill. He went further than that and said the Canadian people will not support this bill. I do not think he has a very good understanding of how the Canadian people see the energy situation right now.

I issue a challenge to him. If he and his party believe that, let them have the courage of their convictions, let them vote against this bill. This will be an honest position for a party which has shown so little interest in these questions. After having voted against the bill, then I would suggest it might be a good time for us to turn to the Canadian people and say, "Here is the issue. The opposition has made it quite clear how it feels about it. You know how we feel about it. You choose."

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am one of those incredible members of the opposition. However, I find it even more incredible that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) took virtually all of his speech to condemn us. One must certainly ask the question why a Liberal government, which has governed for some 16 years, at its moment of death can find nothing to say about energy policy. It could only condemn the opposition party which was not in the position to put forward policy and govern the nation in the past.

I will come to those points which the Minister of Energy is unable to read. We can demonstrate quite clearly what the critics, my leader, and what our spokesman have said on energy policy. One thing we will underscore this evening is that this government is in the position of a wounded animal, backed into a corner, and the only thing that it can think to do is to fight whoever is there, irrespective of where the obligation of responsibility lies.

We have an emergency crisis in this country. It is not brought about because there is no energy supply, it is brought about because there was no policy supplied. We have to ask the question: where was the minister when OPEC was formed some seven years ago? Did he just wake up in the last few days or weeks and discover that Venezuela was not exactly the most stable nation in the world? Did he just wake up and somehow find out that Saudi Arabia or Iran might not be nations we can depend on in the long term? How was it that the pipeline, encouraged by members of this party for a long time to be extended with greater capacity from Sarnia to Montreal, extending it from Montreal to Quebec City with a natural gas pipeline that would sweep the breadth of the country from sea to sea, was never heard of by the government side of the House?

And so as a member of this incredible opposition I can only say I find it more incredible that the Minister of Energy can find nothing to do, when it was his responsibility to introduce policy, but blame us for not having any policy. That, sir, shows he operates in a vacuum. There is a tingling sound when he shakes his head sideways which rings over here, and gives me a clear indication that what I am saying is valid.

The minister claims we spent three days holding down one of the amendments at report stage. He never made any mention as to the merits of the amendments; he took some other interesting positions. This is a government that dreams up emergencies and hopes to find an excuse to write legislation. While the minister is talking about a potential emergency he did not tonight, or at any time previously, demonstrate that an emergency existed. What he is talking about is a potential emergency.

What about other resources? Is this the way in which this government will write legislation? What happens then to British Columbia's forest products industry? What happens to Saskatchewan's potash industry, and what happens to Ontario and Quebec's mineral wealth, or the fisheries of the Atlantic region? All of these are potential areas of emergency, and from the government's thinking there should be an emergency bill for anything that can be a potential emergency.

Mr. Gillespie: You mean wait for the House to burn down before calling the fire department?

Mr. Malone: That is right. We will wait until the House is burned down. This House could burn down—

[Mr. Malone.]

Mr. Jarvis: Your house has been burned for ten years.

Mr. Malone: There is no danger of this House burning down, the minister could not get up enough heat to do that.

The minister has faulted us for using up the time of the House, claiming this afternoon in his usual spokesman-like way, that we were the party that throughout report stage held up the measure. I took a look at that during the lunch break. Here is the data.

• (2030)

Mr. Gillespie: Where is it?

Mr. Malone: If the minister can control his energy, the data is coming. Here is the data. I do not mind taking the time to give this to the House. Conservative members spoke 29 times. The other parties combined spoke 24 times, 75 per cent by the Liberal party. If the situation was such that there was no need to talk, that there was concern about a filibuster, and if the bill was so good, how come 75 per cent of all the time used by those other than members of this party was used by members of the government party? Certainly they have to address themselves to who is doing the filibustering.

As members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, surely it is our obligation to do an analysis and a critique in order to try to make better legislation. If it is not an obligation, then I ask the next question. What is this government up to now that it is somehow trying to change the whole format of parliament so that we cannot give analyses or critiques? Surely the minister knows this. If we look at this bill and analyse it in terms of other major pieces of legislation, it has not taken up as much time as most other major pieces of legislation that have come before this House.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that the opposition claims the government is seeking too much power. That is not just our position. There are members on the government side who make the same claim. They say that this bill seeks too much power. In fact there are members of the cabinet who are on record as saying the same thing.

Mr. Gillespie: Who? Name them.

Mr. Malone: I am asked to name these people on the government side and in the cabinet who say the government is seeking too much power. I do not mind responding, because we had passed in this House in January, 1974, an almost identical bill with virtually no changes except for a few clauses that were not substantive. I would like to share with members opposite what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) had to say about the legislation being put forward at that time. What the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources does not wish to do now is listen, after having asked me to name them. Here is what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said about the legislation:

> What is involved in this bill? It is a reach for power, dictatorial power, power which only a real socialist would love, power which only a real socialist could appreciate, power to take away the freedom of the individual.
> MR. DRURY: Price and wage control?

MR. HORNER (CROWFOOT): Price and wage control would be nothing compared to the rationing and complete control that this bill could bring about.

We on this side need not feel alone, that somehow we are the only ones who think the bill is wrong. We note that in his opening remarks the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said:

—the fact that the minister in charge of energy for Canada has been attempting for at least the past four months to create a feeling of crisis within Canada on the energy question.

That is exactly what we are saying today. They are trying to create the illusion that somehow there is a crisis. Do you know what that crisis is? It is the election. Here they are again with the same reasons as in 1974. What makes me so happy about this situation is to know that our party has the support of a cabinet minister who feels the same way about this legislation. With regard to the opinion of the government about the government, it says this about the need for the bill in 1974:

They failed to gather appeal across the country so attempted to create an issue in the hope they could go to the country and win an election on some short-term policy they had devised.

What they did in 1974 is what they are doing in 1979. Do you know what this is? It is government by carbon copy. What they thought worked once might work again. A government that is short on policy stoops to trickery hoping that somehow the tricks might pull it through. I find it interesting what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said about that bill:

Are there no clauses in this bill which are negotiable with the premiers?

A few moments ago we heard the minister classifying that point as unimportant.

This has been the trouble about the chess game we have been watching. The federal government has made up its mind as to its intentions and said ho-hum to the provinces and their desires. Is this a fair attitude to take if the first ministers' conference is to be carried on in a proper spirit so as to devise ways of meeting the energy crisis which could develop in Canada should the Arabs shut off the oil being delivered to the five eastern provinces?

Even one of their own ministers back in 1974 was expressing the same concerns that we are expressing now. The concern specifically was that there is not a stability with those people importing oil to the eastern part of this country. For a long time the need has been there to bring western petroleum to the eastern markets. There has been a lead weight around the ankles of government members to move in such a direction.

As a member of parliament from a western province, I remember the anguish that was felt across the prairie communities when we wanted to sell our oil to the eastern markets but could not because the price of oil from Venezuela was $1 per barrel cheaper than bringing it through a pipeline from the west to the east. We are now in the awkward situation where our party still wants to extend that pipeline. Irrespective of the noises we hear from the other side, my leader's policy is that Canada will become self-reliant in energy.

All this government wants is some kind of emergency legislation in case the countries it deals with are too shaky. It wants to be able to cope somehow, shape up or handle them. The present oil shortage is not an accident. The oil shortage on the Atlantic coast is government policy.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources can point his finger at the official opposition and say that we are alone in condemning certain aspects of this bill, or that we are alone without policy. I say to him that the editorials in the major newspapers throughout the country in the past few weeks simply do not subscribe to that fact. I wish to quote from the Saturday, March 10, 1979, Globe and Mail. The editorial has a beautiful title, "Tyrant in Ottawa". This bill should not be called the energy supplies emergency act. It should be called the emergency tyrant act. I quote the first paragraph:

The energy supplies emergency act is a bill produced by the federal government under false pretences. It is a bill rammed through a committee of the House in the early hours of yesterday morning in the face of heavy protest from Conservative members and an informed and bitter attack by the province of Ontario—

● (2040)

Well, I guess the opposition does not matter to the government. As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said, socialists do not like opposition. I guess the premier of Ontario does not matter either, because they not listen to him.

It goes on to say:

It is a bill which has been damned in a letter by Premier Lougheed of Alberta to Prime Minister Trudeau. It is a piece of tyranny, with the tyranny handled by amateurs and all the professionals shoved aside.

Apparently that did not make any difference to them either. In other words, the whole question of energy is now to be left up to bureaucrats. And who is to decide when there is an emergency? That is to be left to the government. But this is a government that creates emergencies. It creates an emergency whenever it thinks an election is coming around. That is why we end up in this unsavoury situation; at election time the government choses to attack personalities and parties rather than to produce policy.

The editorial goes on to say:

It is a bill which the Liberals intend to flourish during the election as a substitute for energy policy they have failed to develop during the seven years since the Arab boycott . . . It could force pipeline companies to build pipelines that will bankrupt them, run railroads, take over trucks, throw out environmental safety protections, invade every energy field in Canada including your kitchen. There is virtually no appeal from its decisions. Those who disobey are subject to fines up to $20,000 or two years in jail or both for every day on which they commit an offence.

Just moments ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources virtually admitted that this was a bill designed to meet a potential crisis. Well, if it is meant to deal with a potential crisis, why do we find locked into this legislation all the power, all the control that the government assumes it needs—the right to fine people $20,000 or put them in jail, when the bill does not even define what will be regarded as a crisis? They have not shown that a crisis is at hand.

Toward its conclusion the editorial speaks about the government in these words:

It has no energy policy, it has only a piece of paper which would feed its appetite for authoritarian power.

Is there not a similarity between that editorial and what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said about the government—I just love that line of his when he said:

What is involved in this bill is a reach for power, dictatorial power, power which only a real socialist would love, power which only real socialists could appreciate, power to take away freedom from the individual.

Surely you cannot have it both ways. You cannot both condemn and embrace and have the same motive in mind in both experiences. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce should stand in his place and tell us whether or not he is a part of the socialist thinking he embraces, or whether he wants to find time in the opportunity left to him between now and six o'clock tomorrow to let us know that he does not like the power which is being sought in the legislation before us. I challenge him to do so.

In case the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should get the impression that we are alone in our condemnation of the government let me refer to another editorial, this time from the Toronto Sun—I am deliberately picking eastern newspapers because it is important to note that the papers in central Canada are not of the opinion the minister would have us believe they are. I quote from the Sun of Tuesday, March 13:

In negotiations with the provinces, Trudeau has never been able to 'con' the premiers out of control of their energy resources. After all they are guaranteed by the BNA Act. It is one thing Trudeau would change if he got his hands on the constitution.

Well, this bill looks like the first hint of the direction we are going to take. An hon. member asks for the source. Well, the source was just given.

An hon. Member: Aren't you the expert?

Mr. Malone: For the benefit of the hon. member who interrupted I would like to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I consider him to be an expert as long as we can use a definition from mathematics—an "X" is an unknown and a spurt is a drip under pressure.

I should like to turn to some of the comments made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He said the opposition would have left the country exposed without the power to handle an emergency. The truth of the matter is that he has not been listening to our party's policy. Moreover, even if that were the case, surely the first thing which must come to mind is the question: where has the government been while the situation was developing? How dit it happen that a country like ours, which has all the energy resources it needs, should be called upon to deal with an energy emergency bill such as the one before us? The truth is that members opposite have been fast asleep making Rip Van Winkle look as though he just took a nap.

The minister made another comment. He said our leader had not addressed himself to the question of energy. If that is the case, how is it that a headline in the Montreal Gazette says: "Clark's New Energy Plan Means Self-Reliance"? The article goes on to outline five points made in a speech by my leader in Montreal calling, among other things, for an immediate increase in capacity from Sarnia to Montreal. Did we hear today in the minister's speech anything about a bigger pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal? No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman took 40 minutes telling us there might be a crisis. He did not spend any time telling us what we might be able to do about it.

There was another point my leader made. He said he would extend the gas pipeline from Montreal to Quebec City. Did the minister say anything about that? No. He said there might be a crisis down the road.

My leader further said he would explore and exploit further sources of energy, such as oil sands, and rely on other forms of renewable energy. But the minister did not say anything about that. He just said there could be a crisis somewhere down the road and he wanted power to handle it in case what might happen did happen. Mr. Speaker, as long as they never do anything, as long as they just talk about what might happen, what might happen will happen, and as long as this government is in power that is the only reason for the bill before us. The non-doers bring about what is likely to happen.

An hon. Member: How are you going to vote?

Mr. Malone: We are going to vote for the fact that this government happens to be there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: In other words, this ought to be called a Liberal emergency creation bill. That is the only reason it is here.

An hon. Member: Yet you are going to vote for it.

Mr. Malone: The minister said all the critics condemned our opposition. Well, here is an interesting comment. The first reaction from the oil companies has been very favourable. The press has commented favourably. The oil companies are favourable. So it seems only the government was born with lead in the soles of its shoes.

Just so that the minister does not go unchallenged I will draw attention to various aspects of the Progressive Conservative policy on energy—I will just read the headings, without going into the substantive text.

• (2050)

Mr. Gillespie: Tell us about pricing.

Mr. Malone: The minister would like to hear about pricing. I will answer him directly. Yes, we should have some.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Malone: Now that the laughter has subsided, I want to speak as an Albertan and tell the House that it was only four years ago that the government drove more than one-third of the private Canadian-owned oil companies out of my province and into Montana and other places. Hon. members opposite talk about prices, but they made 22 flip-flops in terms of oil policy, and independent Canadian companies said they could not stand the frustration any longer and left Canada. What is the hollow echo from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? He asks, "What about pricing?" I ask him, what about our oil companies? He condemns us and damns us. He is thumbs down on the Tories because he says they want to take away Petro-Canada, and they do not believe in Canadian companies. What does he substitute for a Canadian company? He wants a government company, and that is not the same thing as Canadians owning oil companies.

Big government and big multinationals give us no more sense of security, because that means big power. What the government drove out was far more than one-third of our small independent drilling companies, mostly located in Alberta, although some were in Saskatchewan. Any time the minister wants to challenge that, the people who have left can back it up. They would be very willing to come and be witnesses any time the minister wants to refer this subject to a committee.

Mr. Gillespie: Tell us about pricing now.

Mr. Malone: I answered the question on pricing. What the minister has not understood is that when we drive companies away, we are left to the pricing of multinationals. The minister opposite ought to know very well that he has to take a good portion of the blame for what happens with pricing when he removes competition and leaves it to multinationals to establish prices.

Mr. Boulanger: We have the best price in the world, and you know that.

Mr. Malone: The best price in the world is for Liberals. You can get them free.

Mr. Boulanger: I wonder if you are a Canadian or not.

Mr. Malone: I will just go through a few more policy pronouncements by my leader. My leader would establish a Canadian council of environmental and resource ministers. That would be foreign to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources because if there is a council of resource ministers there cannot be confrontation politics. There has to be co-operation, and as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce says, socialists do not like to co-operate. They like to have dictatorial powers.

Another major point is increased supply. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would like to increase our reliance on foreign supplies. What we actually have is an imaginative government seeking ways to stay in power. It is not an imaginative government seeking ways to solve the energy problem but simply an imaginative government trying to apply artificial resuscitation. It is pumping its own chest in order to give the illusion out there in the nation that we have an impending crisis and that, because of that, we have to have an emergency bill.

Editorial after editorial has condemned it. The one I have here is dated Friday, March 16, 1979, and it states:

> It is good for Canada that Lougheed won so strongly. Mr. Trudeau, a classic case of one who has misused parliamentary majority for dictatorial purposes, now has a revitalized Alberta which will oppose his plans to take over (steal?) the energy resources that rightly belong to the provinces.

Mr. Gillespie: Source?

Mr. Malone: That is what we are talking about with this government.

Mr. Jarvis: It is based on a Horner speech.

Mr. Malone: The article goes on to say the following:

> Trudeau's new Emergency Energy Act seems more a ploy to centralize power than it does to ensure that all Canada will have adequate energy. Otherwise the government would devise a 'policy' instead of take-over legislation.

That paragraph is very important.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Where is it from?

Mr. Malone: What we have lacked is policy. What we have is the illusion of an emergency.

Mr. Boulanger: Who signed that?

Mr. Malone: I would sign it. I would write it and sign it.

Mr. Boulanger: You don't mean that, do you? Are you for Canada or Exxon?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member just read what is purported to be an expert source, but he did not give us that source. In fairness, I think he should put the source on the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Under the rules of the House he has to.

Mr. Leggatt: Jack Armstrong.

Mr. Malone: I would like to refer to another editorial, this one from the Toronto Globe and Mail.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): What was the last one?

Mr. Malone: The last one was the Toronto Sun, which could lead us into a whole new discussion of sunset laws. This government would do well to learn about them in order to cut government spending. It would do well to use a little solar energy and to have a little imagination to brighten up the lives of Canadians without having to talk about emergencies and crises and without dividing provinces one from another. The government has the attitude that somehow it cannot put something forward unless there is an enemy hidden in the closet.

If hon. members will permit me, I would like to go to another source, the Toronto Globe and Mail of Tuesday, March 20, 1979:

> The act hands the government the stand-by power to take control of everybody and everything that has anything to do with petroleum, petroleum products and their alternatives within Canada.

Does that not sound just like the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he said that all that pack of socialists opposite want to do is grab power? When the minister was speaking in the debate on an identical bill in 1973 he put his finger on the key question. I trust that he stands by what he said and that he will condemn this government and say, "I do not want to sit with them any more"—and join the Social Credit party or the New Democratic Party.

This article goes on to say the following:

Using this board under this act the government could eliminate rights of hundreds of thousands of Canadians. It could do everything from rationing the gasoline you may use to compelling a pipeline company to build a pipeline that would bankrupt it. Persons committing offences under this act, and under the regulations that will be approved by cabinet (not by parliament), would be liable to fines of as much as $20,000 or two years in prison—

Then the article goes on to this very interesting part:

Because the opposition parties opposed the hasty and unconsidered and unnecessary establishment of such powers, the government has imposed closure.

Closure to get closure.

In the true arbitrary tradition of Canadian Liberal governments.

Mr. Boulanger: Explain to me what closure.

Mr. Ellis: Something that should happen to your mouth.

Mr. Malone: The best closure this House could have would deal with the oral cavity on the other side.

Mr. Boulanger: I am proud to be a Canadian but not with a guy like you.

Mr. Malone: I do not want to hurt unduly hon. members opposite, but they have the opinion that somehow we on this side of the House are the only people opposed to this bill and that we have no policies. I outlined some, but they were not listening. I mentioned a number of press articles which say that there is every reason to be opposed. I also note that a member of the cabinet has said that this kind of legislation is dead wrong.

Mr. Boulanger: Name him.

Mr. Malone: The hon. member asks me to name him. He is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Boulanger: That's a lie.

An hon. Member: Back off.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite says that what I said about the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is a lie. If he says that, he is also saying that what is recorded in Hansard at page 8763 back in 1973 is also such. Therefore I will be raising a question of privilege when I am finished my speech, and asking that the hon. member make a withdrawal.

I would like to put on the record comments made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce at that time. He said, and I quote:

—passing the bill before us would do nothing to create harmony among the ministers attending the conference; rather, it would interfere with the good will necessary if we are to meet the difficult situation which may develop in the coming winter.

[Mr. Malone.]

The minister later said:

It is headed for confrontation, particularly if we as legislators in this parliament do not caution the government and make it clear that the allocation bill we are being asked to pass represents a reach for power not granted to any federal government except in time of war.

● (2100)

Let me underscore what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said. He said that they were asking for power not granted to any other federal government except in time of war. Now members on that side would somehow like to point their fingers this way and say we are the only ones who oppose this. The fact of the matter is that, nestled in their own nest, is someone who pointed a finger and said virtually what we are saying at the present time. Then the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce went on to say the following:

Section 109 of the British North America Act provides for provincial ownership of mineral resources, and this was part of the making of this country of ours when it was put together under the British North America Act. This may have been a mistake, but we came together with that provision. What kind of a government do we have here that wants unilaterally to break that provision? I am not suggesting that Lougheed will not allow some changes, but I am saying that this government through this Bill C-236 wants unilaterally to break that agreement which eventually brought ten provinces together to make this country of Canada. We have heard a lot of talk about the fact that this Prime Minister is the one who wants to keep Canada together. He has not suggested that lately, because if he did no one would believe him.

I should like to give one final quotation because the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tonight very unfairly accused us of being people who somehow held up this bill. The truth of the matter is that if we analyse the data it simply does not document that fact. I would like to put on record what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said, as reported at page 8765 of Hansard dated December 14, 1973. When he referred to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) he said:

I suggest he has no interest in hardly anything other than the promotion of the French language in Canada. That is about the extent of his interest.

Certainly that would not be the position of our party. We do not take a position like that. But somehow a man who felt that way about the government went and joined them.

We have received today a complete, unadulterated misrepresentation when the minister indicated that we have no policy. We could smother the government with policies. The government has attempted to create among Canadians the image that there is an impending crisis just around the corner, yet we have had a vacuum of policies and directions as to what we ought to do and where we ought to go. The government introduced Petro-Canada because it wants to nationalize. It put in an emergency measure bill because it wants socialistic style power. The government is attempting to get control for the love of embracing control.

Since the formation of the OPEC nations seven years ago, we have not had the establishment of an energy policy which would mean that Canadians relying on Canadian resources would have the energy they need. Instead of policy we have had confrontation. As a Canadian and as a member of Parliament I want to say that I am getting very, very tired of the fact that the government cannot put forward any kind of a position without first finding an enemy. I know why the bill is here. It is here to try to divide one part of Canada from the other. It is here to try to divide the producing parts of the country from those in need of energy. It was designed as a pre-election issue. That was the claim of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he spoke in 1973 before the 1974 election. Today we have simply a repeat of style, not a repeat of need. The government knew that for seven years OPEC nations were made up of unstable governments. It has known for a long time that there was a need for increasing the supply of resources to the far side of Canada.

In conclusion, let me say that today the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tried to leave the illusion that somehow my party filibustered this particular bill. In truth government members spoke virtually as much, in terms of combined opposition or other parties, as our party did. The Liberal party used as much as 75 per cent of the combined speaking time used by the other parties in the House. Is ten minutes of a Liberal member's time any longer or shorter than ten minutes of a Conservative member's time? Time is an absolute factor which does not change. The only difference between Liberal speeches and ours is that theirs makes one numb on both ends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I should like to deal with the question of privilege I mentioned. The hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) made a statement a few moments ago that I lied in giving a quotation. I ask him to withdraw that statement for the goodness of some parliamentary conduct. I hope the hon. member at least has the decency to recognize that, when we speak in the House, we do not need people on the other side acting like chickadees in fermented chokecherries. I hope the hon. member comes forward with a complete and absolute withdrawal.

[Translation]

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I have here the Harrap's English-French dictionary. At the English word "lie", we find "mensonge" in French. When I said "lie" in English, I wanted to say to the hon. member that he was telling a white lie, that what he said was without any malice. You said that it was a minister who made a certain statement in 1974. At that time, he was not a minister, but a member of the Progressive Conservative opposition. I am not therefore accusing the hon. member of being a liar; I am simply saying that he made a white lie or that he misinterpreted the facts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not believe that the explanation given by the hon. member is acceptable according to the rules of the House, whatever interpretation he wants to give to the word "lie" or "mensonge" or "liar". These words are not parliamentary and should be withdrawn.

[English]

I agree completely with the request of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone). The words "lie" and "liar" are unparliamentary and should not be used. If the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) wishes to withdraw, it would be appreciated. Even his explanation is not acceptable in the manner he has made it.

[Translation]

I think that the hon. member should recognize—order, please. I think that the hon. member for Mercier is able to speak for himself and does not need the help of all his colleagues. I am trying to be serious. Certain members may find this funny, but I believe that the procedure of the House and the decorum that must be maintained in this institution apply to both sides, whether the member involved is a friend or simply another parliamentarian. The hon. member for Mercier.

[English]

Mr. Boulanger: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As a typical and honest parliamentarian and as a typical Canadian, proudly and with great pleasure I take the word "lie" off the record. As a true Canadian and a true parliamentarian, I apologize as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the exchange between the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) and the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) ended quite properly as Your Honour requested, although it reminded me of the classic story of the hon. member who asked Mr. Speaker if it would be all right if he called an hon. member across the way an s.o.b. Mr. Speaker assured the hon. member that he would be out of order. So the hon. member said, "I won't say that then. I just hope when the hon. member gets home tonight his mother comes out from under the porch and bites him!"

The New Democratic Party supports this legislation as inadequate as it is. I want to assure you and the House of that. However, the more I listen to the minister the more I worry about whether he is going to support it.

If you have ever seen a reluctant dragon, surely it is the minister and this government. They feel very sensitive about being called socialists, or of being accused of instituting socialist measures, particularly when all they have really done, sir, is implement a measure they were trying to implement back in 1973 and 1974, and which they did implement in a minority parliament. However, they had to do it most reluctantly. I suspect that the majority of the Liberal caucus have had to be dragged kicking and screaming in on this one. They are sensitive about Conservatives accusing them of being socialists. If that makes them socialists, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what it makes us. If that is socialism it is a disgrace to real socialism, that is, democratic socialism.

The minister has gone through a lot of exercises on this legislation, and I have come to the conclusion that the hurrier he goes the behinder he gets. He accused the Conservatives of conducting a filibuster, and then he took an hour to make his third reading speech. We thought he had made his points on second reading and in the debate on motions at the report stage, but then he capped it off with a dumb closure motion, when the Tories obviously had already caved in and chickened out. The whole exercise was totally unnecessary as we probably could have saved a day or two in any case.

In 1973 we had something of an energy crisis. We heard a great deal about it from all sides of the House and, of course, from all over the world. We were reminded very forcefully at that time about our vulnerability in the supply of oil. Although it was referred to as an energy crisis then, and to some degree it is now, both occasions have given us the opportunity to re-examine our dependence on foreign multinational oil companies, and to re-examine our dependence on other producing countries.

During the previous energy crisis the NDP had the balance of power in Ottawa. We forced—and we take credit for it and pride in it—the Liberal government to set up Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation. That government really did not believe in it. There has never been a Crown corporation set up by any so-called private enterprise party in which that party believed. The Liberals did it, however, on occasion to bail out some bankrupt friends, or as a last resort, desperation effort, but not because they believed there was any intrinsic value in a public corporation that is publicly and accountably owned and controlled by the public through its parliament. They really did not believe in that, but they did that because they had no other choice. They could not rely on the private sector, the multinational corporations, to serve the interests of the Canadian people, or to put the interests of our nation ahead of their own corporate interests. That was the case then and it is the case now.

Since then, however, the Liberals have not used Petro-Canada as an instrument of national policy as the situation then and now demands. While the government has been paying some lip service, has made some gestures, and has gone through some motions in respect of Petro-Canada, the Conservatives on the other hand say they will scrap it if they form the next government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: I am glad to hear some one or more of them indicate agreement. There are arguments for and against private enterprise, and arguments for and against public enterprise, but surely even when we think we are winning the argument, or losing the argument, there are times when we are faced with a situation in which we grudgingly have to admit that when a multinational corporation can endanger our nationhood and undermine the security of petroleum supplies in our country, the arguments for public control and public enterprise in the interests of the nation as a whole have to outweigh the arguments for private enterprise. I use that word advisedly because they are not private, they are very ingrown and select; they are more than private, they are nation states in the costumes of private free-enterprise corporations.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

This is an obsession against some kind of public endeavour, at a time when Petro-Canada is the only major oil company in Canada not foreign owned. It is the only major endeavour—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: I see the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) shaking his head. I know what he is thinking. He is thinking about those little, minuscule independents drilling holes in the ground, carrying out geophysical surveys and what not. I have been very closely associated with them and I know that when it comes to international petroleum operations, other than Petro-Canada, we do not have a private corporation in the petroleum industry that is Canadian owned. The ones we have do not count for anything in international petroleum circles. The major petroleum operations in this country are not Canadian. They operate under the direction and in support of their head offices in their home countries. They cannot do otherwise, and I do not blame them for that.

If you or I, Mr. Speaker, were the head of Esso or the Canadian sector of Gulf or Texaco we would not act any differently, particularly if that is what we were paid to do.

Those who did not learn from the history of 1973 are re-living it again in 1979. Social unrest in Iran has resulted in Canada being denied over 100,000 barrels of oil per day which we normally import from that country. There is nothing new about that. If one thinks back to 1958 and to 1963 one will remember a couple of revolutions in Iraq, the fourth largest oil producer. There were warnings sounded then, warnings from people in the private enterprise oil industry in North America. This has occurred in country after country, either violently or peacefully; unrest and revolution.

Exxon, the giant that owns Imperial, announced it would divert 25,000 barrels of oil per day, a piddling amount in the total picture, that had been coming from Venezuela for allocation through Esso to Canada. If Esso, the child of Exxon, was a good Canadian corporate citizen, and if Exxon had any thought about having its child act like a good corporate citizen in Canada, the problem would not have arisen in the first place. But they, quite naturally, are going to protect their own interests, the interests of their customers in the United States, and the interests of the United States before they will consider the interests of the customers of their child in Canada.

The behaviour of this multinational oil corporation headquartered outside our boundaries is quite natural, and I have never been under any illusions in that regard, but perhaps my friend from Battle River has. It is the very nature of the animal.

What it means is that Canadians, whether it was through the minuscule Canadian companies or whether it was through this parliament and the government, were left helpless, gasping for air. It meant that the Canadians in Atlantic Canada and eastern Quebec would have their oil supplies cut, not by some Canadian oil company—it was not western Canadian oil—but under the direction of a foreign corporation headquartered in

New York, and coming from another country, so that it could make sure that it fed its customers in the United States.

What kind of response did we get from the federal government? It called on Imperial Oil to deal directly with Venezuela and restore our oil supplies at least to their previous level. Imperial Oil, under instructions from Exxon, thumbed its nose at the government and said that it would only restore part of our oil supply. For once the government got a little tired at being pushed around. The Tories said, "No, leave it to the private sector; they will look after us, they won't leave us in the lurch."

Imperial Oil said that it has been an expensive job looking for oil, but under successive Liberal and Conservative national governments in Canada, Imperial Oil has had nothing to lose but the Canadian taxpayers' money. At the end of 1978 Imperial Oil owed the people of Canada, and still does, $600 million in deferred taxes. They had to go to such trouble, labour and expense to find oil that they owe us $600 million in deferred taxes.

Between 1968 and 1978, Imperial Oil—this good, free enterprise corporation, with Canadian unity and confederation at heart—earned $2.2 billion in profits after taxes in Canada. Out of that, Imperial Oil paid $1 billion in dividends. Since 70 per cent of Imperial is owned by Exxon, 70 per cent of that $1 billion went to Exxon. In other words, in that ten-year period Exxon received some $713 million from Imperial in Canada, which really means from the people of Canada.

To show its gratitude for its good fortune in being able to make money in a private enterprise paradise under Liberal governments and Tory governments, Exxon cut off our oil supplies from Venezuela. In the books of private enterprisers, called Liberals and Tories, that may sound like good, corporate citizenship to them, but it sounds like an outrageous betrayal to me.

The Tories say that the solution to the problem is to give the oil companies more handouts and let them sort it out. We have been doing this since the 1920s when Turner Valley was blown in. We have given them handouts and we have let them sort it out. They have taken the handouts, and they have sorted it out all right, but they have sorted it out for themselves, not for Canada and Canadians.

This system has not worked before and it will not work now. The fact that Texaco, Shell, and Exxon have reacted favourably to the Conservative party proposals tells us something. Apparently, according to the proponents of the so-called private enterprise sector or multinational corporate enterprise sector, private profit and private control are more important than the needs of Canada and Canadians in Canada.

Now is the time to expand Canadian control of the oil industry. Petro-Canada should be the sole importer of oil. When the minister refused to accept the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), I worried about whether or not he himself would support this bill. Petro-Canada should be given the mandate to be the major oil company in Canada to serve all of the interests of Canadians from the time the oil leaves the ground until the time it reaches the consumer.

These so-called private companies will still be able to function. We will not object to them making a reasonable profit, but we will insist that they pay a reasonable tax on those profits and not allow it to be deferred. They could handle the running of the fuel oil into Aunt Minnie's basement tank, and we will hire their expertise for exploration and drilling. We will even hire some of them to run the Canadian-owned public corporation.

By way of illustration, if I should live long enough that the Parliament of Canada under a New Democratic Party government nationalized Canadian Pacific Limited, and if I live long enough to be the minister in charge, the first person I would hire to run the operation would be Ian Sinclair, the president of CPR. He knows how to run a railroad. I would simply give him a different frame of reference in which to run it.

Mr. Leggatt: A lower salary, too.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, we could not continue to pay him $336,000, but he might do it for less. I would be hiring his knowledge and expertise on the understanding that he operate under the terms of reference laid down, and I am confident he would do a darn good job for us. We have found this out by experience in other parts of Canada, as other countries have found out by experience.

The whole history of multinational corporations in at least 20 countries around the world should have taught us a lesson. If one considers what has happened in western European countries, Middle East countries, southeast-Asian countries, South American countries and African countries, that in the main knows the multinational oil companies—the big seven, the Seven Sisters, which used to have their private red light district and for which, as my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) aptly put it, the Conservative party has been pimping for a lot of years—they have now been relegated in many of these countries to being nothing more than the hired help. They and their technology, staff and equipment are used to do the job for publicly-owned, publicly-controlled corporations, whether they be in producing nations or in importing nations, whether it is Venezuela, Iraq, and now Iran on the one hand, or whether it is France, Italy or Norway on the other hand.

● (2130)

Those countries, of a wide variety of political stripes, made the decision many years ago that they could and would no longer leave the control and destiny of their petroleum industry in the hands of corporations whose head offices were in the United States, London, Amsterdam or Geneva. Surely that is what we are faced with. We were faced with it in 1973, and we are still faced with it in 1979.

The minister, his party and his government reluctantly bring in legislation which the official opposition claims is socialistic. They are trying to be half pregnant. They do not really believe in Crown corporations. One has only to look at what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is doing with the support of his colleagues in trying to privatize our airports, our nationally-owned railway, and Air Canada. They do not really believe in it. They only set them up in the first place to bail out their privatized friends who had gone bankrupt; now they will write off $1 billion or $3 billion and turn them over to their private enterprise friends again. Any dummy could be a private enterpriser with a deal like that.

Once we have written off the debt and start making a good return on the investment, making some profit and providing service to the people, it would seem to me that is the time to keep the corporations in public ownership. As soon as all the risks are gone, however, they are to be handed back to private enterprise and private enterprise laughs all the way to the bank.

What the Conservatives fail to realize is that the world is running out of oil, whether that takes 50 or 100 years. To leave control of those precious resources in the hands of foreign companies whose objective is to maximize profits in the shortest possible time, does not make much sense.

The squeeze that Imperial Oil put on us under instructions from Exxon to divert some of our oil supplies, could be a blessing in disguise. It demonstrated the inherent dangers of foreign ownership and control. It is a blessing because, if nothing else, even this private enterprise government, implementing Conservative policies, has had to go back to what we forced them to do in 1973 and 1974 in bringing in this legislation.

If we heed the signals that we have had for the second time, we will take control of our resources. I doubt that this government or, Lord help us, a Conservative government, will heed the signals. If we were to heed the signals after the many bitter lessons we have had, we would take control.

We continue to let the multinationals squeeze us in many other sectors of the economy, not just energy. Foreign ownership of Canadian industry is growing. That is a further betrayal of our Canadian nationhood. This party is committed to an industrial strategy based on Canadian control, Canadian ownership, both private and public, of our rich resources. This will not only gain self respect for us and strengthen our nationhood and national unity, but I am confident it will also gain us the respect of other nations.

Canadians are frustrated when they see themselves hewing wood and drawing water for foreign corporations, knowing they have the intelligence, the resources, the capacity, the ability and the money to develop an economy owned by Canadians and working for Canadian needs as well as the needs of all human beings.

What would Canadian control do? Instead of exporting raw materials and the processing jobs that go with them, we would export some finished products. That would not only create jobs in Canada for Canadians but would also reduce the need to import finished products, which need has contributed to the economic mess in which we find ourselves.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

We continue to export hundreds and thousands of barrels of oil to the United States. I know we have reduced our exports substantially over the years, but we need to tell our United States friends that we will help them whenever we can, but first and foremost we will see that Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the 49th parallel to the Arctic Islands, have their needs fulfilled. If we have anything left over, and after we have assured our own needs for decades ahead, we will be a good neighbour and help them, but only then.

As a Canadian I find it embarrassing to watch the spectacle of our limited oil and natural gas resources going across the border, leaving this country in the hands of some multinational corporations intent on making a fast buck while Canadians in five other provinces pay the ransom for their energy needs to corporations in other countries. Surely that is demeaning. Surely we should and could have completed the construction of a pipeline to transport crude oil and natural gas to Halifax and Cape Breton Island, and surely we could extend it to Newfoundland. Why should people in those areas feel part of confederation when they are discriminated against? It is no wonder that so many Canadians, not just in Quebec, are disenchanted.

Any country which calls itself a nation retains and maintains its economic destiny in its own hands. It does not leave it in the hands of corporations outside its borders, or in the hands of other countries.

We wish that the government had brought in a bill even stronger than this one, a bill that would have made Petro-Canada a national corporation operating in the interests of the country and the people, a bill that would have allowed Petro-Canada to allocate supplies to the private sector in refining, and allocate supplies to the private sector through their pipelines. We would not object to them making a reasonable profit, but we would have control. We would be able to secure supplies until such time as we had the political will, because the other attributes are there, to supply Canada first with what the Atlantic provinces and eastern Quebec need—gas, oil, and other refined products. How can we sit here as elected representatives and not agree that that is what we must do? It is not fair to expect, let alone to ask the likes of Imperial Oil, Shell or Texaco to do it for us. That is not what they are here for, Mr. Speaker. That is not what they came here for in the first place, and they are honest about it. They make no bones about it. They are here to exploit a resource and to make the maximum number of dollars. That was the first and only reason they came. They did not come here and say that they would help Canadians to get a secure petroleum supply from St. John's to Victoria. That is not why they came here.

● (2140)

This mythology from the days of the oil magnates of the 1920s which says "Imperial serves you best", or "trust Texaco", that somehow or other they will do it for us, at best is an illusion held by members in the Liberal and Conservative parties, and at worst a betrayal that members of the Liberal and Conservative parties have participated in for over 50 years.

The Liberals have governed the longest and have been the most guilty. Every once in a while they try to recover and repent.

An hon. Member: Just before an election.

Mr. Benjamin: They only half repent, and they do that just before an election. The problem is their half repentance is just before an election and it has meant most times their survival. That is the other problem. I have a great deal of admiration and respect for my friends in the Liberal party.

An hon. Member: Better a live dreamer than a dead duck.

Mr. Benjamin: I do not agree with 90 per cent of what the Liberals do and say, but they are pretty good guys. But they place their own survival on their death bed repentances in last gasp desperation efforts to survive. That sort of thing has been placed ahead of what is best for our country and for our people. I hope that the Conservatives do not believe that the Liberals all of a sudden have gone wild eyed left wing radicals with a bill like this. If that makes them wild eyed left wing radicals, it must make the Conservative party left of centre as well.

The Liberals have always bragged about being in the middle and going down the middle of the road. They still do not understand or realize that all the action takes place in the middle of the road. You cannot have it both ways, and that is what this government is trying to do. It is trying to maintain a multinational control over our petroleum resources. We hear it said, "Leave it to them", but only when we get into some kind of an emergency, which on the surface appears temporary. Then we hear it said, "maybe we will have to step on some toes." But never mind, Gulf will still send $28,000 to the Tory party. One cannot expect a Conservative member of parliament to kick Gulf around. Imperial Oil was a cheapskate; it sent only $2,700 to the Liberals a few years ago.

An hon. Member: I wonder why.

Mr. Benjamin: Canadian Pacific—PanCanadian Petroleum—which serves us in so many ways, sent $3,600 to the Grits, but CP Hotels sent another "thou". This illustrates that when a political party of any complexion or stripe goes through these kinds of exercises—more for the purposes of their own survival than in the best interests of our nation, people, and resources—surely that is some kind of betrayal of the honourable and worth-while profession of politics.

I have said that about my friends in the Liberal party. My friends in the Conservative party have been no better, in fact they have been worse. They started out like gangbusters against this legislation. When they realized the faux pas they had pulled off, evidenced by the temporary public mood, they acted like a stud horse, which is turned into the pasture. It sniffs the wind to find out where the mares are, and whichever way the wind blows that is the way to go. In other words, it is one thing today and something else tomorrow. We usually shift those kinds of animals to the slaughterhouse; they might make good dog meat. But they cannot have it both ways either. They cannot say at the beginning of a debate that this legislation is socialistic and dictatorial, etc., etc., and then all of a sudden fold up like a bunch of let-out balloons—

An hon. Member: Paper tigers.

Mr. Benjamin: —starting as of last night. Not only are they paper tigers but they have not been able to meaow as loud as the minister has.

Surely this is an opportunity for this parliament in some reasonable, unanimous way, to take hold of this part of our rich resources to say, "They are ours". We should say that we will hire Imperial, Texaco and Gulf to do whatever job we need done to suit our needs. But everything must be ours, to own and control. This will make everyone feel proud to be a Canadian. This will do as much for national unity and confederation as a lot of other things the Liberals and Tories try to talk about. It is pride in our nationhood, in our capacity, in our own resources and what we can do, instead of sitting around kissing the backsides of foreign companies and foreign countries and having foreign investment. This is just like a hound-dog sitting on a cactus with needles up its backside, howling. All we need to do is to get up and do it ourselves.

We will support this legislation. We hoped the government would have accepted our amendments to make it more meaningful and stronger. I hope it is not a temporary aberration on its part. I hope it is a permanent policy whether or not the Liberals are in government or whether they win the next election. Surely that is a direction in which every political party in this country worthy of being called a Canadian political party has to go. We may use different methods. We may have different ideas about how to do it, but surely there can be no argument about what we have to do as a nation. We must take control, direct and own our own resources. If we do any less than that we cannot survive as a self-respecting sovereign country.

I hope the Conservatives will complete their conversion on this short road of opposition, and support the legislation as well, despite whatever inadequacies there are in it. I hope this government will act on it and use it. No longer should Canadians be embarrassed in front of one another, or in front of people in other countries. We can do it even better with more than this kind of legislation, but let us make do with this for now.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in the debate on third reading of Bill C-42, an act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada.

At the federal-provincial conference on the economy held in October, 1978, the first ministers agreed on several points. Among those was energy about which they recognized that all regions of Canada had direct interest in achieving greater self-sufficiency in the field of energy and the early development of large projects, particularly in the areas of heavy oil, oil sands and hydroelectric power.

Since the beginning of 1979, Mr. Speaker, two events have shown the federal government has neither progressed toward self-sufficiency in energy nor seriously entertained the development of major projects, yet at the same time mortgaging the energy future of this country. The two events to which we are referring are these: the incident caused by the multinational Exxon and the introduction of emergency legislation, Bill C-48, that followed the National Energy Board report on natural gas in Canada. The first revealed the vulnerability of our foreign oil supplies while the second showed the fragility of our gas reserves. Today I want to shed light on those two events. In each case we want to describe the event, underline its significance, determine the role played by the federal government and come to a conclusion. We will also deal with the relationship between those two events which at first do not seem to have an apparent affinity. In short, we propose to show the results and the effects of the lack of planning by this government in the field of energy.

On February 28 last, the National Energy Board released its report on natural gas. The report, as many others, made the headlines and was forgotten. Yet it contained conclusions and recommendations likely to influence Canada's future and turn into an election issue for the Liberals during the coming campaign.

For the general public, which is not familiar with "energese", the data and figures supplied by the report are of marginal interest. We shall therefore attempt to hold the debate in the vernacular while explaining the bearing of the report on the eve of an election. We shall dwell at greater length on the conclusions with regard to exporting our surpluses of natural gas and the eventual shortage of hydrocarbons.

The mandate of the National Energy Board is given on the first page of the report, and reads as follows:

To find out the views of the industries concerned, the provinces and general public on matters of supplies, demand and surpluses (of natural gas).

In order to do so, the members of the board undertook a 26-day flash-visit across Canada starting on October 11, 1978. They visited successively Calgary, Vancouver, Halifax, Quebec city and Ottawa. In all, the board received 89 briefs from both public and government organizations, and the gas industry. This industry submitted by far the greatest number of briefs.

We must first conclude that the board visited very few cities and in too short a time since it passed through five cities in 26 days. How could it really investigate all the pros and cons of the issue? Moreover, only two relatively major groups truly defended the point of view of the public.

In the first place, the recommendations or conclusions of the board attempt to please everyone. In a few words, what it is saying is that there are exportable surpluses, but not as many as the industry would wish. We have schematized them, Mr. Speaker.

Canada has a natural gas surplus of two trillion cubic feet which could be exported over the next eight years. Second, proven remaining reserves in traditional areas amounted to 66.1 trillion cubic feet at the end of 1978, which represents an increase of 4.7 trillion cubic feet since 1976. Third, exports to the United States could be increased by 25 per cent. There could be natural gas shortages in Canada starting in 1992. The board anticipates that the opening of new markets in eastern Canada could represent about 180 billion cubic feet in 1990, providing this gas is competitively priced. Revenues of $4.3 million a year from the sales of gas surpluses are expected during the next eight years. The demand for natural gas on existing markets will increase by about 3 per cent a year between 1978 and the year 2000.

The board is not infallible in its estimates, far from it! In its 1975 report, it came to three main conclusions about natural gas: first, the possibility of a natural gas shortage during the seventies; second, a restriction of exports to the United States, and third, a restriction in the expansion of the natural gas domestic market.

There has not been any gas shortage, exports to the United States have continued and only the conclusion concerning the restriction of the domestic market expansion has been proven valid.

With such a record, we must show some caution in accepting the conclusions contained in this report. We must admit that the task of estimating natural gas supplies and surpluses while attempting to predict eventual shortages is a rather risky and complex science. We kept reminding ourselves of that premise while we analysed the conclusions of the report. As we have already stated, such are the conclusions dealing with an exportable surplus of natural gas and with an eventual shortage which held our attention.

In reading that conclusion we realize that the board tried to sit on the fence. It tells us that two trillion cubic feet of natural gas could be exported to the United States, which is indeed only one-fifth of the demand made by the oil industry. Nevertheless the board mentions that there is a surplus. How can we explain that before February 28 last there was no exportable surplus and that overnight we have some?

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—JOBS LOST THROUGH BANKRUPTCIES—WAGE CLAIMS OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, on March 12 I posed a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) on the so-called bankruptcy bill, S-14, which was reintroduced from the Senate on the basis of a previous bill. I have a particular concern about this bill and there is a special reason for it; I am afraid I reacted rather suddenly and strongly.

● (2200)

A couple of Christmases ago I happened to be working in my office on Christmas eve, late in the afternoon, and suddenly I found I had a group of very distressed workers on my hands. They had just been told their company had gone bankrupt; they had expected their Christmas pay and they had nothing to go on. They were very upset and uncertain about what to do. I have never forgotten that experience. Fortunately, the Unemployment Insurance Commission came up rather nobly. The men helped each other to a certain extent, and though it promised to be a bleak Christmas, especially for the children, they managed to make it through. That sort of thing leaves an indelible impression.

I should like to make it clear at the start for the benefit of the minister, a good-hearted man who has the interest of the workers and ordinary men at heart, that by and large there is a good deal in this bill which is of merit. But there is one particular area with which I am particularly concerned.

I pointed out at the time I asked the question that the bankruptcy of companies for which they work means a serious loss every year to the workers of this country. Something like $4 million in wages is lost in this way every year. Such losses concern people who are least able to protect themselves.

Parts of the bill which have merit include the provisions for the consolidation of our bankruptcy laws, clarifying existing law, and dealing with both consumer and commercial interests within the framework of one piece of legislation. Provision is also made for delegation of responsibility to the provinces, and for the imposition of a personal liability on directors in certain circumstances. Other parts of the bill relate to receiverships and the position of insurance companies.

Then we come to the part which concerns the protection of various elements in a company. This is what is of most concern to me and, I believe, to many others. It would reduce the preferred claims of the Crown, that is, the tax man, with a view to increasing the return to ordinary, unsecured creditors. That is good. It also grants to wage earners a priority over unsecured creditors up to $2,000 in unpaid wages, plus an additional $500 for various fringe benefits. That is not bad, though it could be improved.

What concerns me is that it gives preference for first claims on assets to secured creditors ahead of ordinary workers. Although there is an important place for secured creditors when businesses do not work out well, the people who need protection most, those who are least resourceful, are the ordinary workers. I have considerable sympathy for unsecured creditors, many of whom represent small companies, whereas secured creditors are often bigger firms such as bankers and security companies which arrange the principal financing.

● (2205)

Workers have no control over the business of their employers. They have no control over what happens to them or their jobs. They often have few cash reserves and a great deal of primary responsibility for their homes and for the welfare of their children. One thing which also concerned me about the Christmas eve incident was the fact that the workers went to their union and asked for help, and the union did not seem to show much interest or offer support or even consolation. I do not think that is typical, but it certainly can happen, and it was very unfortunate.

Since I raised this subject I have noticed a great deal of support for my position. This support has come from my colleagues in all parties. A former minister, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), originally put in the provision that workers would be served first.

Mr. Orlikow: What happened to that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) for his question. I share his concern that workers be able to recover their just wages.

In the earlier version of the bankruptcy bill, Bill C-60, which was introduced in this House on May 5, 1975, wage earners were accorded a priority for wage arrears up to $2,000 over the claims of secured creditors. The subject matter of Bill C-60 was referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which received briefs and heard witnesses. Groups from business and the professions objected to the proposed wage earner priority on the ground that commercial lending and financing would become uncertain if secured creditors were deprived of their protection. It was pointed out that this provision, if enacted, would make it difficult for small, labour-intensive firms to get financing to stay in business and to continue to offer employment. So the Senate committee recommended that that provision be deleted.

Bill S-14, the bill now before the Senate, however, does give wage earners the status of preferred creditors, that is, their claims of up to $2,000 in wages and up to $500 in pension and health and welfare contributions follow those of secured creditors but take precedence over other creditors.

Together with directors' personal liability for unpaid wages and contributions, employees' protection under the bill is considerably improved. A number of commentators on the new legislation have suggested, for further protection, a funded insurance scheme to protect wage earners in cases of bankruptcy and insolvency, and the new bankruptcy legislation authorizes the Superintendent of Bankruptcy to gather additional information which will help evaluate both the problem and the need.

At the present time there is information about unpaid claims against bankrupt estates, but there are three types of claims about which there is no accurate information because there is no statute requiring disclosure of the information necessary to assess the aggregate amount of wages in a given year. These are receivership liquidations, realizations under Section 88 of the Bank Act, and mechanics' lien claims. With this fuller information it will be possible to see exactly what is involved in an insurance scheme which would provide protection for wage earners and avoid the distress the hon. member for Halton has described, and which all of us have encountered at our constituency offices.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—FUNDING OF PROGRAMS FOR TRAINING OF NATIVE TEACHERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, a week ago, on March 13, I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) whether he could see his way clear to finding the money to make up the loss of funds for the native teacher training programs which have been such a tremendous success in Manitoba. The programs have been operating for a number of years out of Brandon University, of which my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), is the chancellor.

I want to demonstrate the need for these programs by quoting from two studies. One such study was reported in the Winnipeg Free Press on March 17, 1979. It summarized a study which was done by Verna Kirkness for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It was a report on the education of Indians in federal and provincial schools in Manitoba. I should like to refer to a couple of the illustrations contained in the article. It reads in part as follows:

● (2210)

Seventeen per cent of Indian students in Manitoba fail Grade 1, a recently released study on Indian education reports . . .

Ms. Kirkness reported that 30 per cent of all Indian students are at least one year behind in school for their age . . .

Only 10 per cent of Indian students attend high school—

Then, according to the article, she went on to make recommendations on how to deal with these very serious problems. One of the recommendations is that schools with Indian students should hire native teachers.

[Miss Nicholson.]

The study was conducted jointly by the Native Council of Canada and the native employment division of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission into the educational status, among other things, of Metis people and non-status Indians. It reads in part as follows:

Approximately one half of the Metis and non-status Indians surveyed had completed nine or more grades of schooling compared to three quarters of the general Canadian population.

In other words, 50 per cent more of the non-native students complete grade 9.

It continued:

The figures for Grade 13 or more—some post-secondary to completion of university degree studies—show that the natives were much less likely to take higher education. Two and one-half per cent of Metis and non-status Indians and 26 per cent of Canadians completed 13 or more grades of schooling.

One of the reasons is that there are so few native teachers. When the New Democratic Party was the government of Manitoba, it decided to do something about that. They established a number of programs operating in and out of Brandon University. There was IMPACTE, the Indian and Metis program for training and education. There was the BUNTEP, the Brandon University Native Teachers' Education Program. Also there was the Winnipeg centre operating in the core area of Winnipeg. These programs were very successful. As I indicated in my question, over 300 people have been certified and graduated with an education degree from these three programs.

What happened? The programs were funded jointly by DREE, that is, the federal government and the province of Manitoba. In 1977-78 they had between $2.8 million and $3 million for these programs. In 1978-79 they cut back approximately 20 per cent to $2.4 million. This year they were cut back again to $1.99 million. The IMPACTE program was for status and non-status Indians south of latitude 53. It had programs in Brandon University, Swan River, Dauphin and Camperville. The Camperville program has gone.

The BUNTEP program operated north of the 53rd parallel or in unorganized territory. It operated at The Pas, Fairford, Oxford House, Norway House, Cross Lake, Island Lake, Peguis and Split Lake. The program at The Pas has been cancelled and the student population was reduced by 15 per cent.

The program at the Winnipeg centre is under attack also. The special mature program was to help train native people in courses other than teaching. It had 25 to 30 students, and now it has been cut to 15 to 16 students. Approximately 300 people, almost all natives, have graduated as teachers. They are working in the core area of Winnipeg. They are working in many of the schools around the province. The reports I have been able to get from school superintendents are that they are doing superb jobs. They know the native people come from the same background.

● (2215)

For the usual supposed reasons of restraint, the provincial government, which was only paying 40 per cent of the program, cut back 20 per cent last year and proposes to cut back another 20 per cent this year. What I am urging is that the minister find the money to continue these programs. The department spends a great deal of money, and not many of the programs it has have shown the same kind of positive results in finding useful and dignified employment, which is not only good for the people who have graduated, but set an example for the whole native community. I urge the minister to find the money to carry on and, indeed, to expand this program rather than have it cut back, as it has been in the last two years, and in all likelihood it will be cut to virtually nothing in the next couple of years.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has raised several questions regarding the effect of provincial restraints or cutbacks on federal-provincial cost-sharing agreements for education of native teachers at Brandon University in Manitoba.

At present, as the hon. member has mentioned, there are three such programs available to Indian people in the province from this very distinguished university.

First, there is the project for the education of native teachers, known by the acronym PENT. This program is given at the university and is sponsored by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Frontier School Division, which is a provincial body. Funding for this program is 75 per cent from the federal government and 25 per cent from the province. I understand this program is operated on five-year cycles of ten weeks per year. It is open to paraprofessionals, that is, teachers' aides who receive certification as fully qualified teachers on graduation from the five-year program.

This program has been in operation since 1971, I understand, and has had four graduating classes to date. I am very pleased to announce that provincial funding will not affect this program in any way. Both the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Frontier School Division are continuing their sponsorship, and a new group of students is expected to enter this program this summer.

A second program that is being offered by the University of Brandon at the present time is the Brandon University North Teacher Education Program, or BUNTEP. This program is sponsored by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and by the province of Manitoba under the Manitoba Northlands Agreement. It is offered, as the hon. member has said, at various centres or communities throughout northern Manitoba. Indian and Inuit affairs provide classroom space or professor accommodation wherever possible, if the program is located in an Indian reserve community. However, we are not directly involved in the funding of the program. I understand this is a full-time, three-year program.

Having regard to restraint by the provincial government, it does affect this program and it will reduce the total enrolment in the program to 90 students from the current 105. This is a relatively small reduction and we do not expect it will affect any Indian communities where the program is now operated.

Finally, there is the regular entry teacher education programs offered by the University of Manitoba as well as Brandon University. I can assure the hon. member that the Indian and Inuit affairs program of this department will continue to sponsor students to enter these programs as we have done in the past. I would also like to assure the hon. member that provincial restraints will have no effect on this program as the province does not sponsor Indian students who are attending the two universities.

Through these programs the Manitoba region of Indian affairs has more than 200 registered Indian student-teachers enrolled. This is a very important part of our post-secondary education assistance program in this department.

There are two points that have to be made. First, in respect of the program that is being cut back, it is not funded by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; it is DREE that is the contributing federal sponsor. The second intervention I must make—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired.

POST OFFICE—REASON FOR DELAY IN UNLOADING MAIL AT GATEWAY PLANT—WITHHOLDING OF DELIVERIES BY BULK MAILERS IN TORONTO

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on March 2 I rose to ask a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne). I found his answer, as his general performance in that of his department, unsatisfactory. The previous day the minister made a statement in the House that qualifies as a national joke to the effect that 95 per cent to 97 per cent of Canadian mail is delivered within one or two days. That statement must have had Canadian consumers rolling on the ground with glee, because anybody who has ever spent 14 cents for a stamp knows that that does not happen.

The question specifically related to two occurrences at the Gateway plant at Mississauga in Toronto. One situation was that some 60 tractor trailer loads of mail sat unloaded at that plant for upwards of 48 hours. I asked the minister if he would explain that. Secondly, I asked him why officials at that plant had been requesting at least one large bulk mailing operation in Toronto to delay its deliveries to that plant for a period of up to a week because they were too busy to handle it.

The response from the bulk mailers, which I did not include in the question, was that they would be happy to delay it and store it on their own premises provided the Post Office would certify it as delivered to the Post Office as was undertaken by that commercial mailing company to their clients. The Post Office said that they could not do that, so the bulk mailer went ahead and delivered it to the Gateway plant where, presumably, it was tossed in a corner for a week or more.

The reason for this is that there is a heavy rush by the bulk mailers in this country in an attempt to beat the postal increase of April 1, and it is a pretty logical rush. If one has a choice of lousy service for 14 cents apiece or lousy service for 17 cents apiece, it does not take a genius to pick lousy service for 14 cents.

The Postmaster General's answer to my question was to the effect that he did not know anything about that but that he wanted to reassure everybody that Ontario was now under the direct management of the Deputy Postmaster General and that everything would be just dandy. The only thing that I can think of which is worse than that would be that if he promised to take personal charge of the postal service in the province. There is no information in the minister's answer generally for Canadians about what is happening in the Post Office, but Canadians do know a few things about the Post Office.

Canadians know that over the last ten years and as of April 1 this year rates will have virtually tripled. They know that the deficit will not only have tripled once but tripled three times. It is virtually nine times higher than it was when this government came to office, a government which has given us eight Postmasters General. They know that the Crown corporation, a Conservative policy that was adopted by this government—but, as usual, they got the words right but not the music—is being tried and that it is falling to pieces because the government does not know how to put it into effect. The consultation with unions that was promised when they began to implement that policy has just not materialized. The unions themselves in recent days have been forced to advertise, telling the public that the kind of Crown corporation that is being proposed does not solve the difficulties which face the Post Office.

Canadians know something else. They know that change in a postal service is possible. All they have to do is look at the United Kingdom where there was a $614 million deficit just four years ago in 1975. Three years later, last year, they made a $734 million profit. Obviously, the British post office includes such things as telephones, telecommunications, a bank, and a data communications service. If one removes those departments, the British post office still made a profit last year of over $80 million.

We are not suggesting that the government make a profit of $80 million, or even eight cents. We would be happy if they just lost $80 million instead of over $500 million. That would make Canadians very happy. Their response to that kind of news about successes in Britain is to produce expensive memos and distribute them to everybody in the Post Office at the supervisory level and above. Here is a copy of one produced last year, "a calm team backgrounder" which consists of justifications for the lousy performance of the Post Office. That is their response; not a change, just a justification for incompetence.

We on this side of the House would like to hear any kind of an answer, any kind of sensible proposals aimed at reducing the bureaucracy and the cost, and which would improve the service and labour relations in that benighted department of a benighted government, the Post Office.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in taking up the cue of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker) who wants some sensible answers, he will get a sensible answer when he asks sensible questions. I never sat through such a platitudinous, boring speech, full of clichés, as befits his former profession, and not based on fact. First of all, he was talking about the deficit. He should come to the transport committee and find out that the Post Office deficit is not $500 million as is being spread by the Conservative party in this House, but will be about $275 million next year. This will come out at a committee meeting if the hon. member ever gets there to ask a question.

● (2225)

I want to talk about the exact complaint of the hon. member. I am getting fed up, and I am sure the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) is fed up, coming into this House day after day listening to the complaints from members on the other side in the Conservative party who are trying to second guess hard-working men and women who are trying to operate the Post Office. If they want to talk about matters of policy let them talk about general financing for the Post Office and other kinds of labour relations. That is fine. I am sure the hon. member has a spy out at the Mississauga plant who sees 60 trucks lined up with mail and therefore says something is wrong and that the delay is one week, that people are not getting their mail.

If he had done his homework he would have found there is a good answer to that. He answered his own question. A lot of bulk mailers are trying to beat the mail increase that is coming into effect on April 1. The Post Office does gear to peak periods. It is like the Toronto Transit Commission. The hon. member is from Toronto and he should know something about gearing for peak periods. The Toronto Transit Commission does not have a full staff of bus drivers, train drivers and streetcar drivers around the clock. They gear to peak periods, and the Post Office does that. What is happening is that a lot of bulk handlers are trying to take advantage of the cheaper rates. That is normal. We are trying to come to grips with that particular problem. What happened is that the hon. member gets a tip off from some friend who works in the Gateway plant or some spy that he has out there, and then gives this as an example of the deteriorating mail system. Every day we have to come here and listen to this.

The majority of bulk mailers have agreed and complied with staggering hours for phasing things in, but some of them wanted to take advantage of the fact that the rates will be going up on April 1. That is the reason there were 60 trucks. I forget the figure the hon. member mentioned, but they were only there for 24 hours. The delay did not concern first class mail as implied by the hon. member's irascible question, but was second, third or fourth class items where a delay of 24 hours would be quite acceptable and quite within the norm. He has questioned the fact that the Postmaster General stated that 95 or—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

NEED FOR POLICIES TO IMPROVE AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL INDUSTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, as is my wont, I rise today, the first day of spring, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity related to Canada's horticultural potential, as symbolized by the daffodils from my riding of Esquimalt-Saanich which are available in the lobbies to all hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In view of the fact that this government has failed to develop programs and policies that provide equity and equality in the area of trade and tariffs for agricultural producers, and has failed to develop programs and policies that ensure growth and development throughout the entire Canadian food system, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the government move immediately to implement and amend the tariff motion to provide much needed tariff measures for producers this season, 1979, including commodity by commodity surcharges and surtaxes, and that measures be introduced to ensure a greater degree of self-sufficiency in the Canadian food system, thereby reducing the reliance of Canadian consumers on imported food supplies.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SECURITY CLEARANCE FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS—WITHDRAWAL OF CLEARANCE IN CASE OF PETER TREU

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General who has over-all responsibility in the area of security and security clearance.

My question arises out of the release, after many years, of Cabinet Directive No. 35 governing security in the public service, of which the minister will be aware. The directive requires parties to be told that they are suspect and be given a chance to defend themselves. In the case of Dr. Peter Treu, he was not advised of the withdrawal of his security clearance. Why was Dr. Treu not told of the doubts of the government respecting his loyalty and his rights of review under Directive No. 35?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman has indicated, this is a matter which touches more closely the responsibility of the Minister of Justice.

I would indicate that Cabinet Directive No. 35 which was published by the McDonald inquiry last Friday has been declassified for some time and, as was indicated in the House, is the subject of very intensive review within the government. Undoubtedly the government will be announcing its position relatively soon.

● (1415)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I know that the directive is in existence; the Solicitor General does not have to tell me that. I ask him, why was Dr. Treu denied the rights that were included in this particular directive? I ask him, specifically, if the matter is now under review, and since he has particular responsibility in this area, whether or not the odious provisions of section 6 of the existing directive, particularly subsection C, classifying as unreliable a person who is bound by close ties of blood or affection to persons living within the borders of foreign nations as may cause him to be subjected to intolerable pressures, will be deleted, because hundreds of thousands of Canadians are of eastern European descent or other ethnic descent and this would apply to them.

This provision has the effect of denying them the right of advancement or employment in the public service. Will that provision be removed, and will the Solicitor General undertake to give the commitment right now that it will be removed from the directive?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the first part of the hon. gentleman's question, in effect, repeated his initial question. I indicated to him that I would take notice of the representations in that question.

With reference to the second part of the hon. gentleman's question, it follows upon a motion under Standing Order 43 which I believe was introduced previously by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River and gave the impression that, indeed, people of eastern European origin would in some way be deprived of access to superior posts. That is completely inaccurate. There is no question that the provision the hon. gentleman referred to is followed with the utmost discretion. It is not at all meant to be discriminatory in any way. When the question was last raised, there was an indication that that was one of the provisions being reviewed very closely indeed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the reason I want this commitment from the minister is that we have had an example of the way in which the government arbitrarily deals with the Official Secrets Act, as in the case of Dr. Treu. That case is an example of a person not receiving his proper rights from this government.

I ask the minister if the government is now revising this directive. Can the minister, as a matter of principle, give a commitment and an undertaking, now, that such directive will follow the principles of natural justice, that employees will have the right to be advised of removal or denial of security clearance and will have a reasonable right to answer charges of unreliability or disloyalty? Apparently in Dr. Treu's instance this was not the case, notwithstanding the directive.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, of course the government is interested in protecting the interest of all Canadians, especially with regard to their civil rights, and to guarantee that those civil rights are respected through access to the courts, which is a principle we all want to fight for.

With regard to the question about Dr. Treu, the hon. member knows very well that the matter will probably go before our civil courts. I therefore should refrain from making any statement which could, no matter how little, influence the attitude of the courts.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF "ROLE, TASKS AND METHODS OF THE RCMP SECURITY SERVICE"

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General based on the release of the same document, a document concerning which he knows I made inquiries about in April, 1973, in a series of questions put to the government and answered by the Prime Minister. At that time it was considered against the national interest to release it, but through the courtesy of the McDonald commission we now have it.

My question is based on a letter dated February, 1976, from the head of the security service of this country to Mr. Robin Bourne in which General Dare says:

> When I discussed the criteria used to investigate the Parti Québécois and its members with the Prime Minister, he stated that the Security Service of the RCMP does not have a mandate to conduct these inquiries unless they fall within Items A to F of the "Role, Tasks and Methods of the RCMP Security Service."

I asked for that document to be tabled about a year or two ago. Now that we have Cabinet Directive 35, can we also have tabled the document entitled "Role, tasks and methods of the RCMP Security Service" so that we can be provided with full information with regard to these matters?

● (1420)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the hon. member's question in 1973, I will be pleased to review Hansard and find out exactly the context of that question and what reply was made at that time.

With reference to the publication of Cabinet Directive No. 35, as the hon. member knows, that document has been declassified for some time. I am thankful that now the hon. member has received a copy via the McDonald inquiry. In terms of his question with reference to the correspondence exchanged between General Dare and Mr. Bourne, I will be pleased to review that correspondence and make such reply as I deem appropriate in due course.

Mr. Nielsen: The Solicitor General very adroitly sidestepped the question as to whether he was willing to table the document entitled "Role, tasks and methods of the RCMP Security Service" which I asked to be tabled one or two years ago.

My next question is this. While Cabinet Directive 35 deals with criteria to be applied to security in the public service of Canada, it does not deal with the criteria to be applied to deputy ministers and heads of agencies to which the secretary to the cabinet, Mr. Robertson, directed his memorandum of December 27, 1963. I would expect that those criteria would at least apply to heads of agencies and deputy ministers. Can the minister inform the House whether he is prepared to table any document in existence describing the criteria that are applicable to heads of agencies, deputy ministers and, indeed, cabinet ministers with regard to security clearance?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the documents related to the procedures in security clearance used by the RCMP, the hon. member knows full well that is a matter that comes within the terms of reference of the McDonald inquiry. Those documents have been made available to the McDonald inquiry for their study and subsequent report.

In terms of the applicability of the criteria under CD-35 to a deputy minister and senior heads, that is a matter that comes within the purview of the Prime Minister or the President of the Privy Council and therefore I will refer it to them for further information.

EDUCATION

FUNDING OF PROGRAMS AT POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Canada's post-secondary institutions are entering into a serious decline, as illustrated by the fact that in the coming year student tuition fees in the maritime provinces will exceed $1,000. It is now being

Will the minister consider the possibility of an early meeting with the Council of Ministers of Education to discuss what measures are necessary to ensure that Canada continues to have the efficient and progressive post-secondary education system which is so essential for any modern country?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have been meeting with the Council of Ministers of Education for the past two years on this subject. One matter which they are very concerned about, and so am I, is the legislation which I presented for the reform of the Canadian student loans administration. I wish the hon. member could convince his colleagues to give speedy passage to that legislation, because it is members of his party who are preventing it from receiving speedy passage through the House.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, not many people involved with universities will believe that the question of loans is very important in the whole problem. There have been reports from almost every institution regarding the effect the shortage of funds is having on education, scientific research and library facilities.

Will the minister not only meet with the council of education ministers but consider meeting with the Association of Canadian Universities and Colleges and organizations representing the faculties which are so vitally concerned with the whole problem of university education?

● (1425)

Mr. Roberts: Unlike the hon. member, I do think the issue of student loans is a very important one and so do the members of each of the provincial governments which have been pressing this legislation on the House. I have met with all the bodies the hon. member has mentioned with the possible exception of the faculty members, with whom I would be pleased to meet at any time.

CONCERN ABOUT CUTBACKS IN EDUCATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. Last week, in Vancouver, the Prime Minister agreed to meet with the National Union of Students to discuss their concern about the effects of the cutbacks in education by the federal government.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether the necessary arrangements have been made, or will be made, so that the representatives of the 400,000 students can make plans for the kind of meeting they hope to have with the Prime Minister?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I have not discussed the matter with the Prime Minister so I cannot really be helpful to the hon. member, though I will draw the hon. member's representation on this point to his attention.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT HAS TAKEN DECISION ON TAKEOVER OF NORDAIR

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Can the minister tell us whether he has reached a decision about the offers received a few days ago for the sale of Nordair?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. We have been looking at many propositions in relation to the shares of Nordair, and of course we shall want to take into full account all the representations which have been put forward to me or to Air Canada. I expect we shall be able to make a decision very soon.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Would the minister tell us whether his decision will also take into account the recommendations of Quebec and Ontario which, according to the information we have been getting at our offices, would like to have a strong regional carrier for the greater well-being of each of those provinces?

[English]

Mr. Lang: I can assure hon. members that we will take every representation made to us into account and give appropriate weight to each one.

LOTO CANADA

TICKET SALES IN DRAW NO. 12

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker my question is addressed to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport): it relates to Loto Canada. Early in March, Loto Canada attempted to boost lagging ticket sales for draw 12 by issuing to wholesalers hundreds of gold pouches containing $5 cheques and instructing wholesalers that retailers were to receive one $5 gold pouch for each 25 tickets purchased.

Can the minister confirm that, since Loto Canada decided that retailers could keep these $5 cheques even if they returned for a refund the tickets they had ordered from Loto Canada, it is clearly possible for retailers to put in last-minute orders for tickets they know they cannot sell, simply in order to collect the $5 gold pouches?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the pouched $5 cheques to which the hon. member refers are part of Loto Canada's usual incentive program, though in a different style, designed to assist our retailers in selling.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Perhaps hon. members opposite who are laughing do not have the same low opinion of the retailers in their constituencies as the hon. member seems to have. I believe the corporation has taken every precaution to avoid abuse and I expect our retailers will handle this in their usual competent way.

Mr. Beatty: I am afraid the minister is handling it in her usual incompetent way. I have another question to ask. On October 5, she signed an agreement with the provinces. Part of that agreement provided that total prizes offered would be no more than 50 per cent of gross sales and that advertising and promotion costs for all lotteries in Canada would be limited to 4 per cent of total gross sales.

Is the minister aware that in the opinion of the provinces Loto Canada is already in default of this agreement signed as recently as October and, if so, what action does she propose to take to remedy the situation?

• (1430)

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, if that is so, I suppose it must have to do with the definition of what the media purchase would be in consideration of the 4 per cent figure. If, indeed, Loto Canada is in excess of that, I believe over a period of a year it would appear that we would be on a proper percentage basis. But there is no doubt that the books of Loto Canada would be open for such a discussion, provided all the provinces' lotteries were approached in exactly the same way. I think we could have a mutual auditing of books on this matter.

Mr. Beatty: It would be interesting, also, to hear the minister's comments with regard to total prizes offered and whether or not she has any doubt whatsoever that Loto Canada is in default of the agreement she signed with the provinces.

On Monday, when she spoke to the press, the minister attempted to justify the special deal with Miracle Mart by drawing an analogy to a car dealership which had some employees who did not sell properly. The minister indicated that those people would be, and should be, put off the payroll. How does that analogy apply to Loto Canada's lagging sales, and does the minister intend to put some people at Loto Canada off the payroll?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I am very impressed with the hon. member's concern about our retailers and wholesalers, because his leader would put all 30,000 of them out of their jobs.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mrs. Campagnolo: In the matter of Miracle Mart, Loto Canada is obviously servicing an area which previously was not served well. There is no possibility of detracting from the sales of the existing retailers, and I think the hon. member should be just a little more careful in the way in which he demeans our wholesalers. There are 187 of them across the country and they are providing an extremely good service. The merchandising program entered into represents a normal business practice in any other type of corporation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISPOSITION OF BOYCOTT LEGISLATION—EFFECT OF PROVISIONS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House of Commons whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was expressing the position of the government when he said that Ontario's anti-boycott legislation is costing Canada trade and then when he went on to say, and I quote him exactly, "We certainly don't want to lose trade with Arab nations"?

Is it the position of the Government of Canada that the central preoccupation of the government in relation to boycott legislation must be to avoid losing trade with Arab nations?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on the latter point, the Leader of the Opposition must know that it is the policy of the Government of Canada—and I believe this view is supported by the Canadian people—that this country should trade with all nations except those which have been embargoed by action of the United Nations. That is the policy we have followed.

With respect to the more fundamental question which I believe underlies the concern of the Leader of the Opposition, I would tell him that it is obviously the policy of the Government of Canada to deplore and disapprove of boycott clauses which would in any way affect the human rights of Canadian citizens. That is quite fundamental to our policy; it is the basic principle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: There have been differences of opinion as to the way in which a government ought to deal with such boycott provisions. The government of Ontario has taken a certain course of action about which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has made some comments presumably based upon trade information within his possession. So it is not really a question of opinion or policy; it is a question of fact based upon information available to the minister. We have taken what I think is a reasonable position by putting before the House a boycott bill which we will call just as soon as possible.

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, one fundamental question the Deputy Prime Minister skated away from is whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was expressing the position of the government when he expressed those views as a minister. I would like the Deputy Prime Minister to come to that.

I would like him, also, to tell us now when he intends to introduce into this parliament, so that we might amend it, the anti-boycott legislation which we consider inadequate but which has been introduced into this House of Commons. When will it be before the House? Is it a priority bill? Does the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that the statements of his colleague make it a priority bill now, even if it was not before?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on two occasions in this House I suggested that I was prepared to bring forward this bill and have it passed in a single day with the agreement of the parties. Now the Leader of the Opposition tells me he opposes the bill and wants to make amendments. Obviously, that arrangement could not possibly be carried forward, under his conditions, in one day.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons we are interested in a debate is so we can hear from all of the ministers as to their differing views on boycott legislation. However, certainly we consider this legislation, as it is framed, to be inadequate and we have amendments we want to propose. We will propose them expeditiously; we will debate them expeditiously. We cannot give the Deputy Prime Minister a time limit to allow him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Can you give us your amendments?

Mr. Clark: Oh, yes.

Mr. Lang: Will you show us your amendments?

Mr. Clark: We do not propose to allow the government to impose closure in advance on this piece of legislation, as it has tried to do on others, but we do propose to give the government a reasonable opportunity to bring forward a bill which we will debate within reasonable time limits.

Acting on that guarantee, I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister will now give us an indication as to when that bill will be brought forward so that we might amend it and so that we might have a national policy on boycott practices by foreign nations, instead of having to rely upon provincial policy which is condemned by the responsible federal minister.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to underline what the Leader of the Opposition has said. I made a proposition to the House on two occasions, indicating that I would bring forward this bill provided the House agreed to pass it through all stages in one day.

Mr. Lawrence: Rubber-stamp it.

An hon. Member: We are not your backbenchers.

Mr. MacEachen: I am glad to say that the New Democratic Party has agreed to that proposition. Today, the Leader of the Opposition has rejected it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the last recorded word in this House of Commons with respect to the position of the New Democratic Party is that it would deal with that bill quickly. We intend to deal with that bill quickly. When will the government bring it forward?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite respond to headlines. They ask about House business on a Wednesday because there happened to be a headline story relating to the international boycott. Tomorrow is the normal day on which we deal with House business.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow I will tell the hon. member the business for the future. But I am unhappy and disappointed at receiving a statement from the Leader of the Opposition that he is not prepared to pass this bill with the same speed and the same concern as the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): John Roberts looks pretty worried about that answer.

PENITENTIARIES

PROGRAM FOR WIVES AND MOTHERS TO VISIT INMATES—CRITICISM OF CUTBACK

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It concerns the program of the John Howard Society for visitations by wives and mothers to the inmate population in various prisons in Canada. That program costs the federal government some $27,000 a year.

In view of the fact that the government is spending some $250 million on prison construction, can the minister explain why it is cutting back the very modest amount of money which allows wives and mothers to visit inmates? Is this part of the continuing government policy of cutting back on all services to women?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will take the information advanced by the hon. member and the point he has made as a representation and consider the matter in the spirit in which it was advanced. I will be pleased in the very near future to announce to the hon. gentleman the course of action I propose to take with exact reference to his representation.

Mr. Leggatt: I am a little surprised that the minister was not aware of this, because it has been covered in the press; but I appreciate the possibility it may be restored and I am sure these people would be very happy.

My supplementary question is as follows. Part of the recommendations of the subcommittee on penitentiaries dealt with the question of increasing visitation rights for inmates. This House unanimously accepted the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that a further reference be dealt with in a variety of matters which affect the prison system. Can the minister now tell the House what the terms of that reference will be, whether we will receive a reference and whether there will be limited travelling privileges for the committee in the event that the reference comes forward?

Mr. Blais: That question, generally, was asked yesterday of the House leader. I am reviewing the terms of reference and undoubtedly will either be making an announcement to the committee or tabling the order of reference before the House.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT CHAPLAINCY SERVICE WILL NOT BE REDUCED PENDING STUDY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General and it concerns the chaplaincy service in the penitentiaries. It is my understanding that as a result of a meeting yesterday of the Inter-Faith Council and of the senior management committee of the penitentiary service, a further study will be undertaken of the chaplaincy service within the penitentiaries.

Can the minister give us his assurance now that during the time that study is being conducted there will be no cutbacks or lay-offs in the penitentiary service of either full-time of part-time chaplains?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had the pleasure of meeting with the Inter-Faith Committee. An undertaking has been given to them that there will not be any cutbacks with regard to full-time personnel; but in terms of the part-time positions, certain positions were identified that could be subject to redundancy. I want to reserve my position on that until I check the facts further, but I would advise the hon. lady that we will do everything within our power to alleviate any uncertainty that is presently felt among the chaplaincy staff.

I might point out, as well, with regard to the further study to which the hon. lady referred, that in no way can it be interpreted as anything but an attempt to provide additional precision in terms of the function of the chaplaincy service, in view of some rather major changes that are taking place at present within the penitentiary service.

Miss MacDonald: Can the Solicitor General table the terms of reference of that commission's study so that we will know whether or not it fits in with the recommendations of the subcommittee's report; and also perhaps he could give us an indication of the cost of this other commission, so that we will have some idea of whether or not the cost of this commission will be greater than the proposed cutbacks in the budget of the chaplaincy service?

Mr. Blais: The point is very well taken, Mr. Speaker. I have undertaken to provide to the hon. lady the information she has requested with regard to the terms of reference. I expect they will be ready within a short period of time. It is, of course, a priority.

The study will not be addressed solely to the question of staffing; it will also be addressed to the function of the chaplaincy service. It is a timely study, and therefore the hon. lady should not leave the impression that somehow the additional study will relate only to the question of staffing. If that were the case, of course, she would be quite right that the money spent would far surpass the saving we had originally envisaged in the cutbacks in the chaplaincy service.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROJECT ON HOME SECURITY AND SAFETY

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Did the Solicitor General authorize a project whereby house to house surveys are being conducted in many Canadian communities, designed to elicit information on home security and safety and, if so, will he explain the purpose and extent of such project and where the information will be stored?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the ministry for which I am responsible has been engaged for some time in a large number of programs dealing with crime prevention. As the hon. gentleman fully recognizes, we know that active policing is not sufficient and we have to provide information to the Canadian public so that they themselves can prevent crime by taking such security measures as are needed in order to reduce the level of crime.

We have been engaged in that program for some time, it is an ongoing program, and we have a number of contracts with volunteer groups and police forces throughout the country to accomplish that purpose. The hon. gentleman would have to specify directly the areas in which the survey to which he refers are being conducted, so that I could provide him with additional information.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, it is not the information being given to the people that causes me trouble but, rather, the questions being asked. Is the minister aware that questions are asked which do not relate to security or safety of homes, but which deeply intrude into the privacy of the individual; that is questions concerning education, type of employment and whether or not the householder keeps weapons on the premises? How does the minister justify this type of questioning?

Mr. Blais: Again, as I have indicated, a large number of programs are being conducted now in terms of crime prevention. I would have to look at the questionnaire to which the hon. gentlemen refers so as to better inform myself of the nature of the questions being asked and the replies solicited.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISPOSITION OF BOYCOTT LEGISLATION

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the Arab boycott bill. If the Leader of the Opposition changes his mind and agrees to a one-day debate on the bill, will the House leader still be prepared to bring it forward on that basis?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): We would not want to see a flip-flop of that magnitude perpetrated again by the Leader of the Opposition. I have already stated the case three times in the House, and it still stands. Today, it was rejected by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Paproski: Okay, coward.

RAILWAYS

CIRCULAR ON RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport: it has to do with the production of a document entitled "Can Canada really export one and a quarter billion bushels of grain a year by 1985?" It talks about what is being done and what still needs to be done and the whole thing is directed to showing what is still needed, which indicates that little or nothing has been done.

However, I am very much impressed by the expenditure of thousands of dollars in advertising in advance of a possible election, and I will direct my attention and that of the honourable and amiable minister to the last paragraphs of the document. The title reads "What you can do if your closest rail line is proposed for abandonment." It goes on to say:

> You can fight for unprotected branch lines several ways, starting right now. Here is what you can do:
> 1. Form a local retention committee . . .
>
> 2. Study the reasons why the Hall commission or PRAC recommended abandonment. You may find an important mistake or you may find the situation has changed.

The next paragraph is a good one.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize that hon. gentlemen opposite recognize that this a balloon of falsehoods. The next paragraph—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It reads:

3. Let the western arm of the CTC know you plan to defend the line . . . .

4. The western arm of the CTC can deny an application for abandonment for five years or so.

I ask the minister this: Has not the hon. member for Meadow Lake, over and over again—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —pointed out the fact that the closing of the Shellbrook to Spiritwood line was dangerous? Did not almost every municipality support that? Does he now indicate that his heart is softening as the election approaches and that that railway line will be preserved? Second, will he also say whether a similar situation prevails with respect to the Dalmeny and Laird line?

● (1450)

What further demands are necessary in order to get this minister to act, rather than the fear of an election?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. gentleman suggests that a good deal of the ad has to do with what remains to be done and then suggests that this proves that nothing has been done, I have to listen attentively because, in terms of an expert on doing nothing about branch lines, five years as prime minister was the right hon. gentleman's record: he did nothing at all about branch lines in those five years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: I mean, Mr. Speaker, not one tie, not one rail line replaced and not one yard of ballast went in. We have at this point in time secured as permanent and part of the network for all time to come, 80 per cent of the rail lines in that western Canadian area about which, when he was prime minister, he left five years of doubt and do-nothing—and that is his record.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, he may also have missed the point when he referred to the Spiritwood line. I am sure if he had really talked it over with the hon. member for Meadow Lake he would know that my friend, the hon. member who is going to represent Meadow Lake—our whip on the government side—long ago put the case about Spiritwood and, in fact, long ago the Prairie Rail Action Committee recommended that the line to Spiritwood be made permanent. We acted immediately to make it permanent and it is now on the list for rebuilding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, we have cleared away one thing. The line between Shellbrook and Spiritwood, due to the activities and action of the hon. member for Meadow Lake, will be preserved. When he talks about the facts during my administration, let me say that we did not have to abandon lines, and we did not. It all started with the present government. We have got that preserved, and we would not have got it if there had not been an election facing us.

What about the Dalmeny to Laird line? What is going to be the attitude on that? I know the hon. gentleman has taken a recent course in physiognomy and he smiles.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about that line? Is it going to be preserved or is it not?

An hon. Member: Smile, Otto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is true that I ordinarily save my smiles for private time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —but I have to laugh out loud when I witness the party of the clap supporting the right hon. gentleman for doing absolutely nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I really ask you how the right hon. gentleman can say that we protected the Spiritwood line in order for the election to occur, when that was done a year and a half ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: When Mr. McIsaac and I went up to Paradise Hill—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —we started moving with the line as well.

An hon. Member: What did you do up there?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What happened up on Paradise Hill?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Is that another branch line?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Tell us what happened on Paradise Hill?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would like to preserve the balance of the question period, if I might.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as far as the Laird line is concerned—and the right hon. member asked me specifically about the Laird line—I recommend that he visit the rail retention committee and read the ad again. If he will follow it, he will find he can go before the CTC, make his argument and be heard there. That is what the ad is about. He has not read it. I hope all farmers read it and we finally get the final decision on the remaining lines, and at the end of this program, along with our $800 million rail rehabilitation program, we will have preserved lines throughout the prairies. We will be rebuilding them and all doubt that the right hon. gentleman left behind him all over the place will have been resolved and removed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR DISPUTES

RECRUITING OF SCABS TO CROSS LEGITIMATE PICKET LINES

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it is pretty hard to follow someone who has been talking about Paradise Hill, particularly when you are interested in speaking with the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I would like to ask the minister if he is aware that a very bitter labour dispute is taking place at the Boise Cascade plant, in Kenora, and that the offices of employment in Thunder Bay and Winnipeg are recruiting scabs to drive trucks and transports through legitimate picket lines who have to be prepared to travel in convoy with OPP escorts? If the minister has knowledge of these posters that ensure danger pay and other unusual compensation, does he condone the UIC offices being used to support management in this labour dispute where mercenaries can only add to an already explosive situation?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, one of the more difficult times we have during the course of a strike is in trying to remain neutral in the situation. As a matter of fact, there is a tendency to lean in favour of those who are working at a plant or, at least, are out on strike because we indicate to individuals, when the employer says he needs employees—and I mean those who may apply for the jobs—that the plant is on strike and that if they do not accept the particular proposal to go to the plant that is struck, they will not be cut off from unemployment insurance benefits. We also indicate we will not bring anybody in under mobility grants. But employers and employees pay into the program, pay the cost of it, and I think we have an obligation to both sides. I will concede to the hon. member that it is a very difficult time to try to remain neutral.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I have read a lot of ads for employment, but I never read one before in which the department itself indicated that there was danger, danger pay being paid, that a high price would be paid, and which would involve bringing the people out by airplane and they would be driving in conditions where the police would be the escort. I would ask the minister if he does not think that this type of operation, where obviously the persons being hired are mercenaries in a battle, is not in keeping with our normal employment practices.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest, with respect, that if we did not put that kind of information down so that the individual who might be applying for the job would not be aware of the conditions, we probably would be justifiably criticized for not saying so. It is a very difficult thing. I think we have an obligation to point it out and, as I said, no one is penalized if he refuses to take the job under those circumstances.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INDICATIONS OF REDUCTIONS IN INDIAN EDUCATION FUNDING—REQUEST FOR REVIEW

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In his absence, perhaps I might put it to his parliamentary secretary.

In view of recent indications by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that there would be reductions in Indian education funding—and concern has been expressed by bands throughout the country—and in view of the representations which have been made by the Robinson-Huron chiefs at a recent meeting with the minister, has the minister had a chance to review this matter with his cabinet colleagues and Treasury Board so that these funds might be restored for native education programs?

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is true that some of the secondary education programs of the department have been cut back in the restraint period, but due to representations made by members such as the hon. member for Algoma the minister will be reconsidering the allocation of education funds. I hope the announcement regarding the allocation of those funds will be made within the forthcoming week.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

PROCUREMENT PLAN FOR ALASKA HIGHWAY PROJECT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister, affectionately known as the pipeline czar. I would remind him that he beat his breast in order that we pass the pipeline bill and gave us every assurance that everything was all right with regard to the United States. As a matter of fact, his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, stated on February 20, 1979, in reply to a question from one of the Liberal members:

I want to emphasize once again that there is no difficulty with the United States Administration. It remains as committed to this project as it was when the Prime Minister and the President announced it some time ago.

As a matter of fact, a similar statement was made just recently. However, the United States Administration has found that the plan for procurement is obnoxious. I ask the pipeline czar, how could the Secretary of State for External Affairs be so wrong; and has he on his desk, for signature, that procurement plan?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there was nothing wrong with the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would repeat the statement today, on behalf of the government, by saying that the government of the United States is still committed to carrying forward this major international project.

What the hon. member is referring to is a procurement plan that must be submitted by Foothills Pipe Lines and approved by the minister. That plan has been circulated confidentially to the United States and provincial governments. The object, of course, is to maximize economic benefits to Canada.

It is not surprising that there might be some concerns expressed by the United States about our procurement plan. These concerns will be discussed by the pipeline commissioner who is presently in Washington. I assure the hon. member that the procurement plan that will be approved by the minister will be in accordance with the agreement with the United States and with the law that was passed by parliament.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the minister's enthusiasm and optimism has certainly been exaggerated. As a matter of fact, his credibility is showing.

The Canadian people would like to know all the facts. Can the minister give me the assurance that he will stand in his place on Friday of this week—and no later—in order to make a statement on motions outlining the entire scenario, the facts and the pros and cons with respect to this pipeline, so the Canadian people will know the whole truth and not just that part of it which comes to our attention by way of press comments every now and again. Will he give us an opportunity of hearing the whole story?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should be asking for the whole story and complaining about a lack of facts. Last night I appeared before the standing committee dealing with northern pipelines. I made an opening statement and I answered all the questions that were put to me by members of the committee. If the hon. gentleman had been on his toes and off the mark—

Mr. Alexander: Will you answer the question?

Mr. MacEachen: —he would have been there and taken advantage of that occasion.

Point of Order—Mr. W. Baker

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—REQUEST FOR MEETING OF HOUSE LEADERS TO DISCUSS BILL C-32

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is with respect to business of the House. It deals with a specific piece of legislation and is a matter which arose out of the question period today. During the course of the question period today I indicated the position which our party would be taking with respect to this bill. I want to say to the minister that it would be appropriate perhaps if we met with respect to the carriage of this bill. Given the amendments which we feel should be put to the bill, not to destroy it but to strengthen it, it is worthy of that kind of meeting. Since the matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the matter arose in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday I recognized the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on a point of order during which he developed some inquiries about House business related to a reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Today the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) at the end of the question period is raising by way of a point of order a further question about House business.

If the House wishes to proceed this way and ask questions by way of a point of order about House business at the end of the question period, I am prepared to be directed by the House. However, I think that we must be careful because what has been reserved as a point of order on Thursdays after the question period occurred yesterday and is occurring again today. I just do not want to encourage the House to drift to a point where at the end of the question period every day we ask questions about House business under the guise of a point of order. Therefore, I would want to be very strict with what we are doing here.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I share the Chair's concern with respect to this situation. However, I think that it is important that the government House leader and the House know that it is our intention to strengthen that bill—because this interest engages the attention of members on all sides of the House—and that we intend to bring amendments forward within the period of time to strengthen that bill. We want to strengthen the prohibitions in the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Surely the hon. member is indicating the intention of his party in respect to a piece of legislation. We have even drifted away from the usual Thursday point of order. I think that we are getting into what may be a debate on the bill with regard to anticipating a measure. I do not know if there is a question in the hon. member's point of order, but if there is he should put it forthwith.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of debating. The government is trying to leave the impression that the opposition parties are not interested in Bill C-32.

Mr. Cafik: That is right.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The opposition parties asked questions in the House as to when the government would be bringing in the Arab boycott bill. Thus far we have had nothing but fencing from the government House leader.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely we have drifted far beyond the point of order. I do not know if there is a response from the President of the Privy Council.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is a response. I can understand why the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) should rise at this point in order to extricate his leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Are you going to let this go, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MacEachen: I outlined to the House during the question period, when he and his leader asked me questions, the policy of the government with respect to the bill and the proposition which I had put to the House for the third time, which was accepted by the New Democratic Party, namely, that the bill would be dealt with in all stages in one day, and that proposal was twice rejected today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is nonsense.

Mr. MacEachen: That is the situation. If they want to ask me again tomorrow I will give the same answer. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton talks about strengthening the bill. The bill in its present form has received the approval of Canadian Jewish leaders, and I wonder why the hon. member should feel that he can improve upon their view.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in relation to the business of this House and when this House might be in a position to deal with a bill which we think can be improved substantially. We believe that this bill is urgent, particularly since the responsible minister, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), has made statements now which call into question the seriousness of the commitment of the Government of Canada to effect protection against Arab boycott provisions.

What we are trying to determine from the minister is whether he is prepared, in light of the new urgency caused by the statements of his colleague, to begin immediately conversations with an eye to discussing when this bill can be brought before this House and when we can have discussions among members of all parties. I see the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) and the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), who are very much interested in this legislation and who do not want to see it cast aside. We have a number of amendments that we think will recommend themselves to members in this House, not simply on this side of the House.

What we want to know now from the Deputy Prime Minister and the House leader of the government is whether the government will be prepared to allow this bill to come forward so that it can be debated in the normal way with amendments introduced by the opposition and debated by the whole House. Is he prepared to have a meeting today with the other House leaders to discuss the timing of the introduction of that legislation? If he is, we are prepared—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If we are prepared to entertain this kind of discussion under the guise of a point of order at this time, I will have to recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and other members who want to put a position before the House on their feelings with respect to a particular piece of legislation.

That is a change from the House practice. This is a point of order that we have regularly entertained only on Thursdays at three o'clock. I do not want in any way to extend the practice at the present time. I think it would be better for the House if I do not permit a reply to the last point and if I do not see any other members.

If I am to allow this exercise to go on, however, as though it were a point of order, I will have to have a general round of presentations of positions to be taken on this bill and I see no reason why positions should not then be taken on any other bill.

This is not a point of order unless we entertain this kind of point of order every day after questions. Since we have spent ten minutes on it and put some positions forward on the bill under the guise of points of order which are not points of order except as we deal with House business on Thursdays, I think the prudent thing for the House to do is to terminate the discussion forthwith and carry on with our regular routine proceedings.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe in all honesty that I have a question of privilege since our party has been referred to two or three times. In one instance there have been two different constructions put on what I said on behalf of our party.

It is true, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said, that the exact word I used in the House was that we were prepared to deal with this legislation "quickly". I meant by that—and I made it clear later to the government House leader—that we are prepared to deal with it in one day. I say again on behalf of our party: we are prepared to deal with Bill C-32 in one day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 155, 176, 603 and 1,011.

I should like to let the House know that we have taken the liberty of making a correction to question No. 1,244 in the name of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) who asked:

Who invited President de Barre, President of France, to Canada?

We have taken the liberty of making the correction and referring to the "Prime Minister of France" rather than the President of France. This has been corrected in the French language in Hansard. It is the same question that was published in the Charles Lynch chronicle yesterday.

AIR CANADA—LEGAL FEES AND EXPENSES

Question No. 155—Mr. Joyal:

During the 1975-76 fiscal year, did Air Canada pay for the legal fees and expenses incurred in the proceedings instituted by Mr. Hugo Tremblay, Mr. Louis-Philippe Ally and Mr. Serge Joyal in cases No. 500-05-009-646-769 and No. 500-05-001-542-766 before the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, District of Montreal and, if so, what was the total amount involved?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: Air Canada operates on a calendar year and as both actions commenced in 1976 there were no fees incurred in 1975. There were fees paid relative to these proceedings in 1976 but Air Canada considers financial information regarding specific legal matters as proprietary.

DEFINITION OF "PRIVACY AND PROTECTION"

Question No. 176—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,945 of the Third Session of the 30th Parliament which showed the name of M. Ball as a Member of the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group of the Department of the Solicitor General and listed him as being in charge of privacy and protection (a) what is a complete definition of the term "privacy and protection" as used in this regard (b) with whose privacy and whose protection is Mr. Ball concerned and what are the specific job designations of such persons in the case of government employees?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General):

(a) and (b) "Privacy" refers to responsibilities concerning the compilations of the annual reports to parliament required by the Protection of Privacy Act including liaison responsibilities with provincial governments, and "protection" refers to the physical protection of designated persons such as cabinet ministers.

NEW FEDERAL BUILDING—RIMBEY, ALBERTA

Question No. 603—Mr. Schellenberger:

Due to the state of repair of the present building, is the government considering the feasibility of a new Federal Building in Rimbey, Alberta, that will house the Post Office?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The government is not considering a feasibility study for a new federal building in Rimbey, Alberta, at the present time.

The Post Office is currently leasing space in Rimbey, after having exercised an option extending the tenure to 1985.

MR. ELDON BLACK

Question No. 1,011—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Eldon Black appointed an Under Secretary of State for External Affairs and, if so, on what date?

2. (a) What is a description of his duties in the field of security (b) is this the only service he performs for the Department and, if not, what is a detailed description of his other duties?

3. What are the details of his previous experience in matters of security?

4. Was this appointment made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and what are the names and job designations of all persons recommending or in any way dealing with his appointment?

5. Was the Prime Minister involved, directly or indirectly, in his appointment and, if so, in what way?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Mr. E. P. Black was appointed Deputy Under Secretary of State for External Affairs as announced on August 3, 1978.

2. The appointment of Mr. Black reflects the greater need for involving senior management in co-ordinating responsibilities of the department in the intelligence and national security fields having an international dimension; it is an indication of the importance the government attaches to the protection of Canadian interests in this respect. The government's support for international efforts to combat terrorism is a good example. Mr. Black's appointment does not involve any departure from existing policies.

3. Mr. Black has held a variety of posts in the foreign service where security matters were of relevance. His posts abroad included Moscow, London and Paris; he has been Director General of the Bureau of European Affairs at External Affairs in Ottawa, and, previous to his present appointment, spent two years as assistant deputy minister at the Department of National Defence.

4. Mr. Black's appointment was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the advice of the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

5. No.

MR. RAYMOND BARRE

Question No. 1,244—Mr. Jones:

1. Who invited President Barre, President of France, to Canada?
2. When and for what purpose?

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Prime Minister of Canada, the right hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau invited the Prime Minister of France, Mr. Raymond Barre, to Canada.

2. The invitation was originally extended in 1974 to the then prime minister of France, Mr. Jacques Chirac, and was subsequently renewed following Mr. Barre's appointment as prime minister. The purpose of the invitation was to underline the importance Canada attaches to its relations with France.

POINTS OF ORDER

DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra) Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order. I would remind the parliamentary secretary that a number of questions remain unanswered. While I can in no way claim the record for the number or age of questions, I have one at least that has been on the order paper for four months. The reason that I bring that question up particularly is that it concerns accountable advances as published in the public accounts this year to, amongst others, members of parliament.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

With the danger of an election being imminent and the fact that many members, particularly from the other side, will not be available to collect from after the election, I wish the parliamentary secretary would attend to question No. 560 very quickly.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago I was promised by the then parliamentary secretary that I would get some answers to my questions. He gave me one the next day but I have not had any since. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would take notice thereof and expedite the answer.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just had one answered today.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am back on this subject again. As I mentioned earlier this week, I have had a starred question on the order paper since October 24. I have had another question on the order paper since 1977. I have had other questions there dating back to 1978. I should like to point out, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) mentioned when speaking on the same subject the other day, that when he was Speaker of this House he was in a position—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we ought to correct the record on that subject very quickly. If the hon. member and his colleagues are urging that there is some role which the Chair ought to play in respect of the answering of questions or in inferring or imposing any obligation upon the government to make responses, that is a very new departure from my understanding of the practices of this House. If it is to be advanced as a theory I would be very pleased to hear it.

It is my very clear understanding, and I hope it is the clear understanding of the House, that the obligation upon the government to make answer to any question is not in any way a procedural obligation. It may be a moral obligation, or it may be a political obligation, but it is not a procedural obligation which the Chair can enforce in any way, shape or form.

Before that obligation may be assumed by the Chair in any respect such would have to be argued, and it would be a considerable departure from the practices both in the time that I have been in the chair and the time that the hon. member's colleague to whom he just referred was in the chair.

Mr. McKenzie: Thank you for your explanation, Mr. Speaker. But who can we turn to? It is absolutely ridiculous that starred questions have been on the order paper since 1977. This is a question about whether members of the government are allowed to use MOT telex to send out political messages. It does not cost any money to get that answer. This is a deliberate stall on the part of the government. The only reason they are refusing to answer the question is that the answer might embarrass some of their members going into a federal election.

We have to turn to somebody, Mr. Speaker, about a flagrant breaking of the rules like this. It is absolute nonsense that questions dating back to 1977 should still be on the order paper. I should like somebody to instruct the parliamentary secretary to give some kind of explanation why they are refusing to answer question No. 179.

Mr. Lang: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) has just raised a point of order. He is able to rise in his place every day, according to our procedures, and make the kind of accusations that he has just made. Each day the questions are called and each day the question is put whether the remaining questions shall be allowed to stand. At that time any members who have any grievances about the way they have been treated in respect of questions are able to say so.

There has never been any authority in the Chair to compel answers to questions, either written or oral. There is no adjudication that I know of that could be made, for example, on whether an answer had in fact been made, if that power or authority did exist in the Chair. So there is a sanction upon the process of answering questions. It is a political sanction and the criticism that the hon. member now raises is one that has to be answered in the public domain, but there is no procedural authority in the Chair to compel answers to questions.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in relation to the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), I had thought that he would have withdrawn his question because some time ago in this House he expressed impatience that it had not been answered. He said that because it had not been answered he would refer the matter and the question to the RCMP, and had done so.

● (1520)

Later in this House I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) whether there had been a report. The Solicitor General reported that the RCMP had investigated the matter and there was nothing to it at all. He had his answer. If he still wants his original question to be answered, I suppose I can oblige him, but surely he has already used another procedure, followed another route. He has had his answer yet he persists.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to questions Nos. 580 and 581 standing in my name. I submitted those questions on November 16. Over a month ago the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Andres), in answer to a similar complaint of mine, said I would have an answer soon. These are questions which are important to all Canadians. They are in regard to the government's propaganda wing, namely the Canadian Unity Information Office, and have to do with the cost to the Canadian taxpayers.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is in his place, and this is of some interest to him. I think that Canadians have the right to know the cost and the other information I am seeking in these questions. I say to the parliamentary secretary that I hope before this parliament is dissolved the government will see fit to answer questions Nos. 580 and 581.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on this point again. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) stated that I posed a question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) about question No. 179 concerning the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) using the DOT telex. I never posed any questions to the Solicitor General at all. I asked the RCMP to investigate whether there were any infractions under the Criminal Code. They told me there was none. That in no way answers my question whether the hon. member for Assiniboia has the authority to use the DOT telex or whether government members have the privilege to use the DOT telex to send out political messages. The Minister of Transport is confused. I posed no questions at all to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago you said that we could bring up this issue of unanswered questions on moral or political grounds. I do not think that the government has failed to answer my questions for those reasons; I think it is more incompetence than anything else.

I have had some 16 questions on the order paper since November 1 starting at No. 446 through and including No. 463. These questions have to do with the amount of money paid in the constituency as legal fees by the government. I point out that I asked a similar question in 1973. At that time I needed to ask only one question, namely how much had the government paid in legal fees in my constituency. The parliamentary secretary of the day listed all the departments, and about two months later I received a complete and full answer. I believe I asked the same question in 1975. At that time the government decided that I would have to define each and every department and Crown corporation that I wanted to know about. I did so and I received a complete answer to every one.

I raised the same type of question on November 1 last year. I have received about half a dozen answers, five of them nil returns. I received one from CMHC explaining legal fees they have paid to various people, but it was not stated how much. I am curious about the incapacity of the government to answer that type of question. The government was formerly able to answer such questions without any problem. It seems its competence is sagging. Could the parliamentary secretary restore some image of competence to the other side?

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I join those who seem to be voices crying in the wilderness on this side of the House when it comes to asking why questions have not been answered. The first six pages on the order paper contain questions of mine which have been outstanding in some cases for up to two and three years. When I raised this point earlier the parliamentary secretary told me the reason is that it takes time to compile information, etc.

However, may I very quickly draw attention to three or four of these questions to show they are not ones it would take a lot of time to answer. Questions Nos. 7 and 8 concern a letter marked confidential sent by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to all Liberal members of parliament telling them how to explain to the public why he and other members of the cabinet were using government aircraft at public expense. I asked why that letter was not sent to other members of parliament as well.

In another question I asked how many members of the Canadian Transport Commission and their wives had passes on Air Canada. I would not think it would take two to three years to tell us how many there were and who they were.

In question No. 9 I asked about the fingerprinting of public servants. I asked why this practice was going on, how many people had been fingerprinted and so on. I would not think it would take between two and three years to answer that question.

In question No. 10 in regard to Goldfarb and Associates of the city of Toronto, pollsters for the government and the Liberal party, I asked how much business they had received from the government over a certain period of time. Surely it does not take a year to two to get this information.

Finally I mention question No. 5 concerning the Prime Minister's office. In this question I asked about the $86,000 spent on purchases for his office. I asked for a breakdown of the items he purchased. It has been two and a half years since I asked that question. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is in the House as I raise this point of order. I challenge him to tell us why he will not let the Canadian people know upon what it was in the way of $86,000 of public funds that he spent furnishing his office. If the Prime Minister cannot comply, has the parliamentary secretary got the intestinal fortitude to do it for him? Surely the Prime Minister, on the verge of an election, owes the Canadian people some kind of an explanation. He should not be hiding the truth on all these questions from the Canadian people in the hope they will not realize that we have the worst government in the history of this country.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the matter raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), the question has been answered. It has been answered repeatedly in general terms to the effect that information as to spending under my department, the Privy Council office, on furnishings in my office, and for that matter in my house, which come under the Department of Public Works, is available to the public. Expenditures are tabled and they are known. The hon. member has just quoted a figure. Officials of my department come before the parliamentary committee on estimates any time they are asked and they answer all and every question put to them. The hon. member is obviously trying to get the floor once again on this spurious point.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall).

Mr. Cossitt: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Leeds on a question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that the Prime Minister has completely misquoted what I said. I think it is my duty, under a question of privilege, to point out to him that question No. 5 has not been answered, regardless of what he says. I challenge him again—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member is using a question of privilege simply to disagree. That is not within the ambit of a question of privilege.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this question of the failure on the part of the government to answer questions properly placed on the order paper. It would seem that courtesy at least would suggest that if the question is improper or causes too great an expenditure for the government in gathering information, a brief private conversation or a note sent across the floor of the House indicating the trouble the government is having might in many instances avoid complaints from members from time to time about failure to answer these questions.

Like other members, I too have questions that have been on the order paper for two or three sessions. Indeed, I have one that has been on the order paper for about five or six years. I hope it will be answered shortly.

My questions are relatively simple. They involve the financial relationship between Canadian National Railways and Cast steamships. I asked how much money was being earned. One cannot get this information from the corporate balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways, nor can we get it from Cast. I asked questions about MAGI, the Metropolitan Area Growth Investments group in Halifax, later known as Mainland Investments, now defunct. The question was put on the order paper three sessions ago. It asked for the names of the board of directors, a relatively simple thing. The question was put on the order paper so that much of the misinformation, rumour and indeed vilification with regard to that organization being spread around eastern Canada could be straightened out. It was put on to serve peace, order and good government. It has not been answered.

• (1530)

It is a disservice when the government does not indicate to the individual member why it will not answer a question. Of course, the government does not have to answer; I am aware of that. In my case I have questions Nos. 151, 169, 170, 171 and 173. I will not go beyond October of last year. Any one of those questions could be answered, not at a cost of $3,000 or $4,000 as is sometimes suggested, but with five or ten minutes of political or moral will to do so.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to take a particular look at that. If there is a reason why the government does not want to or is not in a position to answer, it should at least have the courtesy to send a note so that a member might rise in his place and ask for unanimous consent to withdraw the question.

I am quite prepared to withdraw one or two of these questions. I just do not understand why they have not been answered.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, two issues are involved, a matter of procedure and a question of fact. Concerning the question of procedure, I would like to draw your attention once again to the wording in the second part of Standing Order 39(1) which states:

—but in putting any such question—

—that is a question on the order paper—

—or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same; and in answering any such question the matter to which the same refers shall not be debated.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Standing Orders allow hon. members to place questions which are not urgent on the order paper and it is forbidden to comment on them except as far as providing explanations required to understand them. We have witnessed in the House recently an obvious violation of Standing Order 39, which forbids us to make petty politics about non-urgent questions, since certain members who have complained that their questions have not yet been answered have taken this opportunity to try to score political points, suggest all sorts of inaccuracies and make insinuations which are eventually denied in most cases, two, three, four or five days later, and we never hear about the replies given to the questions about which someone had previously complained by rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker, our Standing Orders provide for a written order paper, and not an oral one like that which we have been given today and in the last few weeks. As for the facts, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members about something which is quite simple and easy to understand. In the last few years, it has become the practice to ask about 2,000 questions during a session.

It is nearly impossible to provide complete answers to each of these 2,000 questions during one session. In practice, we can reply to about 40 per cent of questions placed on the order paper during one session, and during the summer recess, we succeed in replying to 45 to 50 per cent more questions, which means that on the average, 90 per cent of all questions are answered during the session. This is based on the record of the three previous sessions, and especially of the last two sessions when I was myself parliamentary secretary. In view of these circumstances, I say that it is unfair for opposition members, and especially members of the Progressive Conservative party, to suggest to the public—and certain reporters seem to rise to the bait—that we have things to hide on this side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is mere coincidence that yesterday I approved an answer to a question put by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones), and which was supplied today. In a press article that appeared yesterday, Charles Lynch stated that question would never be answered. The question itself was erroneous in asking the rationale behind the Government of Canada's invitation to the "President of France", Mr. Barre. Everybody knows Mr. Barre is the French Prime Minister. Not only did we not hesitate to supply an answer to the hon. member, even though certain quarters believed we would never do so, but we even had to correct the questions on occasions.

So our record speaks for itself. Over the last sessions, of 2,000 average questions on the order paper, 90 per cent were answered, and if the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) was more sensible and more serious in his questions, if instead of monopolizing two or three pages of the order paper, as he mentioned today, he limited himself to less stupid questions, and I see Mr. Speaker you are losing patience, which is normal after the number of interjections from the other side, but I know you will give me just the same an opportunity to conclude my point. If the hon. member were more sensible in the number and validity of his questions, his colleagues probably would not have to complain that we do not have the time to accumulate all the information needed to give them complete questions. The abuse is on the other side, because there are indeed irresponsible people there putting questions that are costing taxpayers a fortune, since we have to answer questions as they come in a proportion of 40 per cent during the course of a session.

If you allow me, Mr. Speaker, I would like in conclusion to call your attention to the practical fact that as of March 21, as of today, of the 1,331 questions that appeared on the order paper during this session, 42.2 per cent have already been answered. This is more than the average of earlier sessions, because the average is 2,000 questions per session and to date there have been 1,331.

Mr. Speaker, the facts speak for themselves. The interventions of opposition members truly represent an abuse of our Standing Order 39 and they are denied by the facts. I respectfully submit that Your Honour should put an end to this abusive practice of suggesting falsehoods while we on this side of the House are making every effort possible to do some research, obtain all necessary information and give opposition members the most complete answers possible as quickly as possible. In conclusion, it should be clear, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the House have nothing to hide and that we do all we can to provide complete answers as quickly as possible. It has been our policy in the last years and it still is, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my name was mentioned a few moments ago. I made a statement the other day. I stand by my statement. At the time I was Speaker, there was an unlimited question period. The hon. member who just sat down should be made aware of what this House did at that time. Question period was unlimited. It ran to one and three quarter hours to two hours on occasion. I simply asked at that time and indeed directed that hon. members seeking information put questions on the order paper. Prior to that time it was extraordinary if more than 200 or 300 questions were put on the order paper per session.

The hon. member can say anything he wants, but in 1962 a small number of Liberals on this side and others in the opposition in a matter of five months compiled 1,500 questions for the order paper. The parliamentary secretary can state his statistics now. We say, so what? It happened a long time ago and it was even greater in those days. Let him not complain and let him not laud his assiduity in trying to reply to questions.

Members were asked to put questions on the order paper so that we could get on with the question period. I also hoped that government ministers would answer those questions so that they would not become a device for hiding questions and answers. That was the purpose and it was clearly understood. If a question went on to the order paper, a prompt answer was expected and it was received.

Mr. Speaker: I will be quite happy to go back to a situation where we have an open-ended question period and only 300 questions on the order paper, and I will guarantee that they all get answered.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Careful!

• (1540)

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not intend to spend a long time on what has already gone on too long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: But I do want to say this. In his response a few moments ago the parliamentary secretary said that some of the questions put down by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) were stupid—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: —and that others were unreasonable. I am sure that at one time or another all members believe that some questions are unreasonable or stupid, just as they believe some answers are unreasonable or stupid. But that is not the issue. The issue is this: does any one member of the House have the prerogative of making such judgments and of saying, on the basis of intuition, that some questions are unreasonable and stupid?

I would therefore like to move that the judgment he made be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for determination as to whether the parliamentary secretary has the sole privilege of determining on that basis whether questions should be answered.

Mr. Speaker: The question before the House is whether the remaining questions on the order paper should be allowed to stand. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cossitt: On the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) a moment ago, the parliamentary secretary, referring to certain questions I had asked, made what from his point of view was a value judgment that my questions were stupid and unreasonable. I feel it is an infringement on the privileges of members of this House that one man sitting over there should have the right to say who he thinks is stupid over here and who he thinks is unreasonable, and edit the answers to questions accordingly. If that is what the government is doing in dealing with these questions, I think it is a shocking admission and a breach of privilege.

In answer to one specific question, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) intentionally misled the House a few moments ago; he said a question had been answered, when he knows it has not.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Leeds would prefer that I did not hear the last remark he made. If I did, as he knows, I will have to ask him to withdraw it.

Then I have to say we cannot allow our proceedings to continue with that remark on the record. The allegation that a member has intentionally misled the House is unparliamentary and I must ask the hon. member for Leeds to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Cossitt: I would certainly be prepared to withdraw it provided the Prime Minister is prepared to say it was unintentional. Otherwise, I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made a statement which is clearly unparliamentary. Such a statement is clearly unparliamentary according to precedent. The statement to which I refer is the statement by the hon. member for Leeds that the Prime Minister intentionally misled the House. Now, the House cannot continue with that statement on the record. The hon. member has to withdraw it.

An hon. Member: Withdraw or get out!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Once again, before invoking a practice which I would follow only with deep regret, I have to tell the hon. member for Leeds for the third time that he has introduced into the record an expression which is clearly and unequivocally unparliamentary. The allegation by one member against another that he intentionally misled the House is clearly unparliamentary. The House cannot proceed in the face of that kind of disorder and I have to ask the hon. member for Leeds to respect the practices of the House and withdraw that expression.

Mr. Cossitt: I regret very much that I believe what I said and I cannot speak any untruth.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: With the greatest regret, therefore, I have to name Mr. Cossitt for his disregard of the directives and the authority of the Chair.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I understand the obligation which normally rests upon the leader of the House when an event of this kind occurs, that is, to move a motion to have the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) suspended from the service of the House.

In this particular case, because we are under a time limit for the debate on Bill C-42, I propose to defer moving a motion until the debate has been concluded; I will possibly move it tomorrow if, in the meantime, the hon. member for Leeds does not reconcile himself to the requirements of the rules.

I want to make it perfectly clear that in the circumstances it would be most unfair, for example, to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), who is prepared to speak, if we were now to embark upon a motion—the bells could ring all afternoon—which would effectively close off the time remaining in this limited debate. Thus I intend to let the matter rest with the assurance that if in the meantime there are no further developments I will certainly support Your Honour's decision by making a motion at the appropriate time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in my view, the position is clear. If the government House leader feels it is his duty in the circumstances to move a motion, the matter cannot by its nature be allowed to rest. I am concerned that what we have here is only a subterfuge whereby members opposite are prepared to allow the Chair, in their judgment, to suffer under a disability for 24 hours. This matter is debatable. It is important. I think Your Honour will find in the book you are researching now that action must be taken immediately. The government House leader has a responsibility to take action at once. The motion is put and the government House leader has to specify an appropriate length of time in accordance with his judgment. Then the House has an opportunity to debate the issue. We can comment on the length of time.

It is not proper for this matter to be allowed to rest. After all, it is not simply a question of the convenience of the House leader; it affects the House of Commons as a whole. My hon. friend has the right to have this matter adjudicated with respect to his conduct and I do not feel it is proper for any reason or in any circumstances that the issue be allowed to lie over 24 hours or for any other period of time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the few words I wish to utter are along the lines of those just spoken by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), except that there is another thought to which I should like to give expression.

First, I would point out that you yourself, speaking from the chair, said the House cannot continue until this matter had been resolved. I believe that is a position from which Your Honour cannot retreat. What happens when a member refuses to obey the Chair is that parliament is brought to a standstill, and I do not see how we can let the matter lie over until tomorrow. Someone has borrowed my fifth edition of Beauchesne. I prefer to quote from it in tribute to those who produced it, but I still have at my desk the fourth edition. On page 118 the words are quite clear:

● (1550)

In case the offending member does not explain and persists in remaining in the House, a motion shall forthwith be made, preferably by the leader of the House, "that Mr. . . . member for . . . be suspended for . . . days from the service of the House."

The key word is "forthwith" and it seems to me, therefore, that regardless of all the good reasons the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) may have for suggesting that the matter lie over until tomorrow, that is not possible.

The other thought I should like to express I address directly to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). He can believe anything he wants. He can continue to think anything he wants. But as a member of the House of Commons I suggest that he has a duty to this House to see to it that it operates according to its rules and procedures.

I appeal to the hon. member, as a member of the opposition and as one who, like him, is often offended by what we get from the other side of the House, to respect the request that I now make to him, and which Your Honour had to make under the rules, to offer, even now, to withdraw the offending words. He can think anything he wants, but in terms of the record as an older member of this House I make my appeal to him that he respect its procedures.

Mr. Speaker: I think the situation has been well summarized. The use of the words in an allegation by one member that another member of the House—any member of the House—had deliberately misled the House is clearly unparliamentary and clearly out of order. Even if there were any doubt about that—and there certainly is not in my mind—there cannot be any doubt about the request of the presiding officer, the Speaker, at any time to require the withdrawal of an unparliamentary expression once the Speaker has so found. At that point if there was any doubt about there being disorder in the use of the expression itself, there certainly can no longer be any doubt about disorder existing when any member of the House refuses to obey the clear directive of the Chair.

It seems to me that on two counts we have severe disorder in the House, and the matter has to be resolved. It has to be dealt with now, and I do not think there is any basis upon which we can do it as a matter of convenience. I respect as well what the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) is saying to the House, that it is not by directive of the Chair that he act. He acts at all times and in all circumstances, as any member of the House of Commons, upon his own initiative, and in expressing his position to the House he was making a declaration of his intentions.

However, whatever is to be the resolution of this—perhaps the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), in response to the intervention by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), will make his case crystal clear—it is not a question of the Chair controlling what a member feels or thinks. It is only the manner in which he expresses it which has to be observed in order to safeguard the proprieties of the House, and that must be done at all times. Therefore, it is only the manner of the expression that the hon. member for Leeds is asked to withdraw; but in the face of his refusal to do that, I think we have to clear the matter up in whatever way it is going to be cleared up, and it has to be done now.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I took the course I took for the reasons I mentioned, one being that we are under a very restricted time limit on this particular bill and, second, that possibly a cooling off period should be permitted so that the hon. member for Leeds could reconsider his position and remove from me and other members of the House the duty of taking on what at best is a very unpleasant responsibility, namely, putting a motion to have an hon. member suspended from the service of the House. I should add that, as you have underlined, Mr. Speaker, the decision whether a motion be put is that of the leader of the House in these particular circumstances. I recollect that on one occasion the Speaker of the House did name an hon. member, and no motion was forthcoming from any member asking that the offending member be suspended from the service of the House. That is my recollection.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that?

Mr. MacEachen: I cannot give the right hon. member the precise date, but I will do some research and assist him later.

The action I am asked to take on this occasion stems from the respect which must be shown to the presiding officer of the House if our business is to be conducted with decorum and, particularly, with the respect of the Canadian people. Today, probably for the first time in the history of this parliament, the Canadian people are witnessing the presiding officer asking an hon. member to withdraw an offensive expression, and it seems to me that it is very important that the Canadian people—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It has happened before.

Mr. MacEachen: Not on television. I am saying that this is the first time the Canadian people will have an opportunity to witness what occurs in the House of Commons when the Speaker requests an hon. member to withdraw an offensive remark.

Mr. Lang: And he refuses.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member has refused.

Mr. Cossitt: Why is the truth offensive?

Mr. MacEachen: Three times Your Honour has asked the hon. member to withdraw. We all know that the remarks he has made are offensive. They are unparliamentary, and they cannot be accepted by anyone who respects the rules and procedures of this House. It is no wonder that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with his experience and his respect for parliament, has asked the hon. member for Leeds to withdraw and to save us from this difficulty. It is no wonder that I have delayed putting a motion to save the House from this difficulty, and I can only deplore the fact that when he rose to speak the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) did not join both of us in asking the hon. member for Leeds to withdraw.

I therefore move:

That Mr. Cossitt, the member for Leeds, be suspended from the service of the House for the remainder of today's sitting.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that the motion is not debatable, but it is interesting that the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) was allowed to debate the motion.

Mr. MacEachen: The motion was not put then.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): By reversing the procedure it is very interesting that the Deputy Prime Minister was allowed to debate the motion, but that the House is not.

Mr. MacEachen: You spoke.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I hope that when the Canadian people view this they see the unfairness of the position with respect to the debate of this motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question has been put. It is not debatable. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. MacEachen), which was agreed to on the following division:

URANIUM REFINERY IN SASKATCHEWAN

Motion No. 1—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all documents relating to the establishment of a uranium refinery near Warman, Saskatchewan, or elsewhere in the Province of Saskatchewan, by Eldorado Nuclear Limited, and copies of an agreement between the government and the Province of Saskatchewan or their respective agencies.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, Eldorado Nuclear Limited has stated that the documents concerning the establishment of a uranium refinery in Saskatchewan deal with the purchase of the Warman site and with environmental studies now under way. The terms of the agreements concerning the land purchase are privileged for business reasons. Under the circumstances, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This is a most outrageous answer, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask that this motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

MEASURE TO CONSERVE STOCKS

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-42, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or markets disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in light of what has just happened, I will cut my intervention short so that other hon. members may also speak before six o'clock.

In my intervention last night at ten o'clock, when the debate was adjourned, I was wondering how I could explain that while we did not have any surplus for export before Febuary 28 last, we ended up overnight with an exportable surplus. It is quite simple, Mr. Speaker. The board changed its formula to determine whether there was a gas surplus. Before declaring a surplus for export, three different tests must be met. First, current supply possibilities; second, current reserves; and third, future supply possibilities.

By changing the formula for the second test the minister did a magic trick. In fact, the old formula was this: there is surplus of gas for export if proven reserves are equal to 25 times the projected Canadian demand four years hence. The new formula provides that proven reserves must be equal to 25 times the current demand instead of the one projected in four years. The anticipated requirement in four years from now is greater that current demand since it normally grows 3 per cent a year, and the difference between the two results is the new surplus. So it is by being less exacting that the board has declared a new surplus.

By juggling with the figures and doing a magic trick, he ended up with a surplus. This surplus, let's face it, is more on paper than in the Canadian soil. Why then talk about a fictitious surplus? I want to come immediately to the crisis in Iran and the Exxon case. In 1974, when the Arab oil producer countries imposed an embargo, the Canadian government adopted Bill C-236 on allocation of energetic resources in a crisis situation.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Six years later, Canada is forced to pass another emergency bill, in this case Bill C-42, to cope with another similar crisis. This section will deal with the circumstances that led the government to introduce Bill C-42 and its subsequent amendments, its impact on Canadian corporations as well as its general ramifications. We want to emphasize that if Canadians are forced to accept this bill, that is mainly because of the incompetence of this government. It did not have enough presence of mind to plan and develop a long-term energy policy following the 1974 crisis. So they did not learn from 1974.

Two incidents particularly in recent months prompted the federal government to introduce Bill C-42. First, the internal crisis in Iran which temporarily stopped the oil exports of that country. For Canada, that meant the loss of 100,000 barrels a day, or 20 per cent of our oil imports. That loss was nevertheless made up from our reserves and additional oil purchases from other suppliers. But the crisis was not over by a long shot. Second, the multinational company Exxon decided unilaterally to divert to the United States 25,000 barrels of oil a day from Venezuela earmarked for its Canadian subsidiary Imperial. Under the pressure of the federal government, Exxon was to come back in part on its decision and divert only 10,000 barrels a day instead of 25,000. But the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) was far from satisfied with such a concession by that multinational.

So the state of crisis had materialized. On February 19, the government introduced Bill C-42 in the House of Commons. On March 13, it went even further with a series of amendments to that bill, and the day after, that is on March 14, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources ordered the Crown corporation Petro-Canada to undertake direct negotiations with Venezuela for the purchase of oil, thus shoving aside the intermediary company Exxon. We are wondering at this time whether it was not a well orchestrated scheme by this government to strengthen its control over provincial natural resources. And all that in a state of emergency that is too often induced.

Let us say that by and large this bill gives the governor in council the authority to declare a national emergency in case of an acute shortage of oil supplies. The government could then allocate available reserves on a priority basis and even, if necessary, issue rationing coupons.

The crisis Canadians are facing is more a question of management than supplies. Indeed, the government had six years to cope with another eventual crisis to make Canada more self-sufficient in energy, but it chose not to deal seriously with the problem, although the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources says the contrary in a press release dated February 15 last.

Mr. Speaker, what could the government have done during those six years if it had shouldered its responsibilities? First it could have invested in research. The energy reserves available to us require a high degree of technical know-how to develop. That is the case, for example, of the oil sands. The government did very little to help research in general, and in this area in particular. The last budget speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) clearly showed this. Second, extend the gas pipeline into eastern Canada. The National Energy Board, in their February report, stated that our oil dependency can be reduced. They indicated that national gas sales to the potential eastern Canada market could, and I quote:

—reach 180 billion cubic feet in 1990 and 225 billion in the year 2000. In this way oil imports could be reduced 20 per cent by slashing foreign purchases by 80,000 barrels a day in 1990 and 110,000 barrels in the year 2000.

We are waiting for the pipeline extension, first to develop a long-term energy policy. Canada has an urgent need for a well co-ordinated policy in energy matters. We must seriously consider possible alternatives for renewable energy sources, for instance, solar energy, wind energy and so forth. We must know where we are going.

But during those six years, the government procrastinated. They preferred the old Liberal way out, taking on more powers supposedly to meet an emergency situation created by the government themselves in order to get a strong central government. So we are now asked to give the federal government legislative powers to order and control the allocation of foreign energy supplies we still depend on by reason of this government's inaction. Are those dictatorial powers needed? A recent editorial in the Globe and Mail concluded this was not needed at all, and this raises serious doubts. Why, therefore, give extra powers to build a pipeline we already need now anyway? Why wait for an emergency?

At the latest federal-provincial conference on the constitution, the premiers discussed at length the scope of the phrase "overriding national interest" in the context of national resources. They could not reach agreement on its meaning. The legislation now before us uses a similar term that is just as much controversial. It is the expression "periods of national emergency". The definition given in the legislation is not precise and is rather vague. It would be quite easy for the government to declare a national emergency when it suited it. The government is a specialist in national emergency matters! One has only to remember the declaration on war measures. We must not forget that we are legislating on delicate ground, Mr. Speaker, since natural resources fall within provincial jurisdiction. If the government cries national emergency too often, it could find itself stuck with serious jurisdictional problems vis-à-vis the provinces which themselves are also jealous of their jurisdiction over natural resources. Mr. Speaker, those are the brief remarks I had to make.

Energy Supplies

[English]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canada, along with the rest of the world, is in the midst of an energy revolution, a revolution not of our making but one in which we are very deeply involved nonetheless. Energy, especially petroleum, is the life blood of the industrial economy. When we have seen, as we have in the past five and a half years, an increase in the price of petroleum on the world markets of 700 per cent, we know that that massive increase can only affect our lives very deeply.

Petroleum and its products affect us in every way, from consumer goods to industrial production, to the heating of our homes, to clothing ourselves and to our leisure. This type of massive increase is one which has shaken the world, particularly the industrialized world but not forgetting the third world which in a sense has been crippled even worse than we have. It called for new and innovative actions by every society. We in Canada were not completely unprepared for that OPEC crisis, that increase of 400 per cent in a few months and, as I said, 700 per cent over five and some years.

● (1650)

This government, the previous government, the Diefenbaker government and the St. Laurent government had all taken some measures in the energy field. The Tories are proud to refer to the Borden line. Indeed, it was an important decision in 1959 when that line was established. We think it was an important decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I remind the Tories who say "hear, hear" that it was also a decision by the Diefenbaker government which prevented the line from going eastward from Sarnia to Montreal. There may have been reasons for that at the time. I find it a bit strange when the Tory leader earlier this month was reproaching this government for not having built the Sarnia line sooner when he knows it was his predecessor, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who adopted the minority report of the Borden commission which, I repeat, prevented the line from going farther east.

They did, however, have this policy. It was undoubtedly important to the growth of resources in Alberta. It meant moving oil into the protected market of Ontario It is worth remembering that the oil could move because of previous Liberal policies which had built the pipeline and which in the late forties and fifties had passed legislation and adopted policies resulting in the TransCanada and Interprovincial pipelines without which the Borden policy would not have been possible, if we would not have had the pipeline to move oil from Alberta to central Canada.

There were all these policies in the past. Mr. Pearson's government created the Ministry of Energy, Mines and Resources to replace the ministry of mines and technical surveys, sensing the importance that energy would have in decades to come. The then minister of energy, mines and resources, Mr. Macdonald, published in the month of June 1973, "An Energy Policy for Canada" which laid the groundwork for many of the steps which were going to be taken later in the more recent paper by the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) published in 1976. Those steps permitted this government within the weeks of the OPEC crisis to issue an energy statement which in reality constituted a base, and a very solid one, for the following half-dozen years up to the present time.

Rather than talk about Liberal energy policy and the particular role this bill has in that over-all policy—and I realize that if I talked about it once again there would be the sceptics who would say it was not much of a policy, it was not very good and so on. The most carping and constant criticism we have heard from the Tories, and many of the outside commentators who support them, has been to the effect that we really do not have an energy policy, that Canada was caught short, that it did not have any coherent and logical plan to deal with the energy revolution.

One would think after that constant, carping criticism about having no energy policy that five or six years after the OPEC crisis and some three years after the new leader of the Conservative party was chosen they would come up with one. What happened, Mr. Speaker? We waited and waited and we always got negativisms. In the present debate it is always no; it is filibustering, it is dragging your feet, trying to stall, trying to do nothing. However, at one point the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had to come forward with a policy. He had begun to speak about it, you will recall, in his celebrated world tour. He told the Japanese that the Progressive Conservatives would swap oil sales for jobs. He went on to Israel and pledged Israel Canada's surplus oil.

He went to Montreal on March 6. Having promised it to the Japanese and having promised it to the Israelis, he thought he should promise it to the Montreal people as well. All this surplus oil was being distributed by the new discovery of energy by the Leader of the Opposition. It was being pledged in various ways in exchange for various commodities; votes in the case of Montreal, but other commodities in the case of Israel and Japan.

The trouble was that we were exchanging something we did not have. We do not have any surplus. There is no surplus oil in Canada; there is a shortage of oil. Thanks to the policies of this government, dependence on foreign oil has been reduced from some 50 per cent at the beginning of the decade to the remarkably lower figure of 29 per cent this last year. However, we are still dependent on foreign petroleum resources to the tune of 29 per cent of what we consume.

The Leader of the Official Opposition promised this "surplus" energy in various places. I repeat, there is no surplus; there is a great shortage of oil. There still is. What the government is doing to continue to make progress from a dependency of 50 per cent to 29 per cent will continue. However, for the time being we cannot trade that "surplus" for other commodities because it is not there.

Nonetheless the leader of the Tory party, having made these energy statements in Israel, Japan and then Montreal, felt that he would have to explain somewhere where the energy was going to come from. He made a speech in Montreal on March 6 where he said, and I quote:

That policy will have five main elements.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, after years of saying there was no Liberal energy policy, that the government had no energy policy, at last we were going to have an energy policy that would be coherent, complete and satisfactory and it had five elements. I will read them as they appear in the text of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition which I have before me.

The first element is a program of conservation. Our aim will be an average growth and demand for energy of only 2 per cent per year.

We do not see how he is going to do that. It is worth noting, as indeed the Financial Times did, that when you say you are going to implement a policy of 2 per cent growth per year you have to wonder what is going to happen to your economic growth. I quote from the Financial Times of March 12:

How, for example, is he going to cut the rate of growth in the demand for energy to 2 per cent a year from the average of 5.3 in the past? Because Mr. Clark has promised—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Trudeau: I continue quoting:

—Mr. Clark has promised a Progressive Conservative government would achieve average real growth of at least 5 per cent over its initial four-year term of office. This is a reasonable target but a speed-up in the pace of economic growth also means an acceleration in energy demand if the pattern of the past means anything.

● (1700)

So here is the first difficulty with respect to his undertaking to reduce growth in demand to 2 per cent: it does presume we shall be in a very slow growth or no growth economic situation, and I can tell the country and the House that that is not the Liberal position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We do believe there must be a program of conservation, so in this sense the first of the Tory policy elements is only what we have been saying for seven or eight years. There must be a policy of conservation. In fact, the policy put forward by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources attached a great deal of importance to that factor in his 1976 statement. And he has been rewarded with success, as we all have; energy demand was growing at a rate of about 6 per cent a year, a rate which has been reduced at the present time to 3.5 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This was achieved in various ways which are well known to the House. We launched a public information program which was one of the most imaginative in the world. We applied tax incentives to energy conservation equipment and sales tax was removed from several items contributing to energy conservation. We established guidelines for the motor vehicle industry, we gave assistance to home owners in installing home insulation, and so on—measures which were not always supported by the opposition.

We developed a new and more efficient energy building code and through intensive consultation with a number of energy task forces we have developed targets. These targets, which were established from 1973 to 1980, have led to a 7 per cent improvement in energy efficiency over the 1973-1977 period, right on schedule for a 12 per cent improvement in energy efficiency by 1980. This is what we have done about energy conservation, not to bring the rate down to 2 per cent immediately, although this might be something to which we can look forward in the medium or longer term future. Right now it is 3½ per cent. Those are the measures we have taken.

Now listen to what the Leader of the Opposition is saying he would do to reduce growth to 2 per cent. I am quoting:

Specifically we would give tax incentives to encourage better home insulation, energy efficiency equipment and other conservation practices.

For ten years, or at least for seven, they have been saying we have no energy policy. At last they come up with one whose first element is an exact copy, except for the 2 per cent, of the Liberal policy. I am still reading from the speech of the Leader of the Opposition.

The second element is to develop Canada's energy sources. Specifically our goal would be develop the tar sands, gradually substitute gas for oil and give much higher priority to renewable energy technologies.

This must be great news to Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Elect the Tories. They will have an energy policy. They will develop Canada's energy sources, support renewable energy technologies. Well, only last July, over and above what the government has been doing in connection with other energy technology—and I am sure some members of this House have visited certain of these projects; I did myself in Prince Edward Island not so long ago, for instance—the minister of energy announced in the House last summer a $380 million policy for the encouragement of renewable energy technologies, particularly solar and biomass. So that is one find of the new Tory theologians. The second is to develop the tar sands—Syncrude, Mr. Speaker. We put $300 million into it several years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We did it. Not only that, but we put in place tax incentives which indeed, relative to world prices, have made other tar sands projects possible. The government is projecting possibly one million barrels a day by 1990; the Leader of the Opposition wants to be a bit original so he talks about 900,000 barrels a day by 1990. But how is he going to do it? Would his approach be different from ours?

What have we done? We introduced budgets in 1976, 1977 and 1978, when there were two, which have created the conditions under which these new tar sands projects could go forward. Admittedly some of them are not moving as fast as we would like, but many of them will go forward, at least in the experimental stage, at no cost, or hardly any cost, to the companies themselves. The cost will fall on the Canadian taxpayer. What the companies are waiting for now—and some of the leaders of those companies have talked to me personally—is for Alberta to make up its mind on its tax regime, on its royalties. The companies have got from the federal government as much by way of concessions as they feel is reasonable. Now it is up to Alberta.

Do we hear the Tory leader asking Alberta to stop dragging its feet and finally get moving so that these projects might go forward? No, we don't hear anything from him along those lines. We hear general noises about the goal being to develop the tar sands. So much for the second element, which, as you see, Mr. Speaker, apart from putting a little bit of pressure on the government of Alberta, is exactly the same as our policy.

I am quoting again:

The third element is to begin immediately to expand the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline so that the total oil needs of Montreal area refineries can be met from Canadian crude oil supplies.

Well, here we have it. It was promised in Israel, it was promised in Japan and now it is going to Montreal. The trouble is, we don't have it. The Leader of the Opposition intends to build a pipeline without having the oil to go through it. Who is going to pay for that thing? How do you pay for a pipeline, how do you cover expenses, how do you cover devaluation, if you are not using the line to capacity? Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition does not realize this, but it doesn't only mean expanding the Sarnia-Montreal line; it would also mean expanding the Chicago-Lakehead link and it would imply getting together the resources to put in there. Because, once again, we are dependent on foreign oil to the tune of 29 per cent of our needs.

This raises another problem which I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would like to be informed about. I refer to the question of the Portland-Montreal pipeline.

[Translation]

The National Energy Board put it very clearly. If we do not transport enough oil through the Portland-Montreal pipeline, that pipeline will no longer be profitable and become obsolete. The National Energy Board suggested very clearly that it would be dangerous to carry more than the 300,000-odd barrels which now flow daily in the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline. Indeed, if—as I just explained—we do exceed that quantity by a wide margin it would mean that we can rely on a permanent, sufficient oil source which we do not have now in Alberta and it would also indicate that Montreal would not be fed by the Portland pipeline. Then, what would happen? We would then depend, that is Montreal and eastern Canada, on the oil to be discovered and developed out west or perhaps in northern Canada, but at prices, as we know, that are not economical for the time being. But once that pipeline is extended from Sarnia to Montreal, once its volume is increased and more expensive oil starts to flow from the tar sands, there is no doubt that two things will ensue: first, the Montreal pipeline will become obsolete, and second, we will not pay competitive prices. In other words, we no longer will be able to go to Mexico, Venezuela or elsewhere and tell them: Sell us oil if you have some at a better price.

The second consequence is that we will be stuck with non-conventional oils coming from the tar sands, which could become costly, and we would no longer have the option of going out to world producers for competitive prices. What would be even worse is that, if we had enough oil in western Canada to meet the needs of the east, we could not reverse the pipeline from Montreal to Portland in order to send supplies to eastern Canada, Halifax, St. John and so on.

But all those consequences are naturally of little if any importance to the Leader of the Opposition who would have us start immediately to increase the volume of the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal, even though we have no oil to ship through it.

● (1710)

[English]

The fourth element is to begin immediately—this Leader of the Opposition is always "beginning immediately"—the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline. He is going to begin immediately the planning and construction of a gas pipeline from Montreal to Quebec City and also to discuss the extension of that gas pipeline to the Atlantic coast. What is new about that, Mr. Minister?

Mr. Gillespie: Nothing.

Mr. Trudeau: Petro-Canada has already fostered an application before the National Energy Board for such a pipeline. In February of last year the federal minister produced great charts showing that that was one of the projects which the Government of Canada was fostering and which apparently was forgotten by the official opposition until some time earlier this month in the Montreal area when the Tories had to think up a policy. They repeated, once again, our policy. They said the Liberals had no policy for ten years, and now the Tories come up with five new elements. So far four are the same as ours with the exception of the Sarnia-Montreal line, which we built. They talked about it after having prevented it at the time of the Borden line; and now they want to expand it but they have no oil to put into it.

So what is new in the fourth element? It begins with the word "immediately". We have not said that. An application will be made in the usual way. We will make sure that gas is available, that pricing is right and that the cost of the line can be amortized. We would certainly want to build it to Three Rivers first—because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) believes in developing his area—and then on to Quebec City and then farther eastward. So what is new? The Tories would begin immediately, but let me read on from the very same speech at the very same page.

—to begin immediately the planning and construction of a gas pipeline from Montreal to Quebec City. In so far as we are concerned, we are ready to undertake that extension unless more stable sources of supply are found through either discoveries on the east coast or long-term exchanges with the United States.

They would begin immediately unless more stable sources of supply are found on the east coast or through long-term exchanges with the United States. I do not know what they are going to exchange with the United States. Maybe the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) can tell me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The United States does not have any gas of the kind the Leader of the Opposition is talking about to sell us. They do not have any gas to sell us, so that means he would begin immediately. Why put in the qualification about long-term exchanges with the United States—or maybe Japan or Germany? I am not sure. He referred also to discoveries on the east coast. If the Tories are going to look for new discoveries on the east coast, they had better start supporting Petro-Canada because that is what it is involved in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In this context "to begin immediately" is just about as clear as every other resolve the official opposition takes in such important matters as energy.

Let me deal with the fifth element of this great new Tory policy. The fifth element is to re-establish a council of resource ministers. The Tories say such a council was established by the Diefenbaker government and was a model of federal-provincial co-operation. The council has been meeting through the decade with regard to mines. It has been meeting with regard to energy. The federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has just convened a meeting with his colleagues. Was it November or December last when we were asking for a discussion to negotiate a price pause? An increase was going to come in January. Hon. members recall that. This House was shocked, and so were the provinces. Hon. members opposite did not want to talk about it. The official opposition would re-establish a council of ministers of energy and resources. They did not even want to talk about a price pause, so the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources finally talked to Alberta and said that there would be a joint announcement of a price pause. Some of the other provinces went along.

Another reason that it is passing strange to talk about re-establishing a council of resource ministers is that on at least half a dozen occasions in the past half a dozen years we have met at the first ministers' level to discuss the very question of energy. Hon. members know how many times we have got together to discuss that and particularly the very difficult subject of pricing. I want to come to that.

I have gone through the five main elements. In the words of the Tory leader, they are the five main elements of a new energy policy, and we can see that in every respect it is a copy of Liberal policy except for a few particulars where the Tory policy is so wrong that it is ridiculous.

The Leader of the Opposition does not talk about pricing, he does not talk about Petro-Canada, so perhaps it is worth while talking about those two things and also about the problem of allocation, which is dealt with in the bill we are now debating at third reading. With regard to pricing, this country knows what is going on now. It has been going on since the spring of 1974. In the early winter in that period I called the premiers together, and we had debates which were to go on for years and years between the producing provinces, especially Alberta and Saskatchewan which wanted world prices, and the consuming provinces, especially Ontario and the five easternmost provinces which wanted no price increase at all.

That was probably about the most basic element of our policy, because when the world was hit by a fourfold and then a sevenfold increase in the price of petroleum, Canada had the means at its disposal, if it adopted the right policy, to amortize the shock. It had the means to cushion the impact of that massive increase in prices. It was there at our disposal, if we could only reach agreement. I need not tell hon. members of this House the story because they know it. We did reach agreement of a kind. The first time it was pretty unanimous, although some money had to be paid in compensation because the producing provinces did not get the price they wanted. Since then the federal government has had to arbitrate in the starkest terms between the Tory leader of Alberta, Premier Lougheed, and the Tory leader of Ontario, Premier Davis, who had diametrically opposed interests, policies and views.

• (1720)

Where is Joe, the question is asked. Where was he and where is he now?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am not alluding to his absence from the House at this particular moment, Mr. Speaker. I am convinced that he had some other important engagement and I am not making a point of it at all. But what I want to know is how you can talk about an energy policy, even if you are going to copy the five points of the Liberals, without saying anything about prices, which is really the only big, difficult and important question in Canada. How can you talk about an energy policy in those terms?

If Canada were now paying the international price for heating oil, the cost per household would be $179 a year higher for Nova Scotians, $203 per household more for Quebeckers, $173 more per household for Ontarians, $124 more for British Columbians, $261 more for Albertans. And there is a paradox here, because in our lower price for energy, lower than world prices, we are saving people in the prairies, who because of the extremely cold winters there have to buy more heating oil, more money than we are saving households in any other province; and the reason for that is that we have a pricing policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is because we have a pricing policy that Canadians are not paying the international price for gasoline, that they are paying a lower amount. What would they be paying if we did not have this pricing policy, if we melted into the background, as does the opposition when it comes to pricing? The price of gasoline in Vancouver would be $1.18 a gallon instead of 92 cents, in Toronto it would be $1.24 instead of 97 cents, in Montreal it would be a $1.20 instead of 94 cents, and in Halifax it would be $1.28 instead of $1. The Canadian average would be a $1.20 instead of the existing 94 cents. That is for heating and for driving your car on business or for pleasure.

Individual Canadians should also realize that not only do they benefit as individuals or as families but that industrial production, which means jobs, benefits from this federal pricing policy. Because if Canada had a trade surplus of $3.5 billion last year, if you consider that 34 per cent of all energy consumed goes to Canadian industry, you realize that our pricing policy has meant that Canadian products, Canadian manufacturing industries and Canadian workers have all benefited from this lower price, which is not the policy of the producing provinces but the policy of the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Another point which has been omitted from the five elements of the Conservative energy policy is Petro-Canada. I was going to say that they did not mention it because either they have no policy on Petro-Canada or they have a negative one. I was just given by one of our members something called the Tory quiz which I think it might be worth while repeating. I do not know why it is postmarked "High River, High". It reads:

What would the Tories do with Petro-Canada? Check one:

(a) wind it down—Joe Clark, Calgary Albertan, November 3, 1976.

(b) review it—John Crosbie, Calgary Herald, March 24, 1977.

(c) make it more active—James McGrath, Hansard, April 22, 1977.

(d) find a role for it—David Crombie, "Watson Report", November 15, 1978.

(e) put it in the hands of Canadian investors—Joe Clark, CBC "News Magazine", January 8, 1979.

(f) give some of it away, but not all of it—Allan Lawrence—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I see the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) is smiling. He has cause to smile because I think in the end that is what the Tories will end up doing. They will put a mark on (f) because they are beginning to realize that Petro-Canada has become indispensable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In the light of actions taken by the multinationals, particularly Exxon, in the light of a point to which I will come in a moment, perhaps some of the slowness of the producing provinces to let things come on stream, it was necessary to have an instrument like Petro-Canada.

When we created it in 1975 in the House and it began to operate in 1976, the Conservative party was opposed, and it has been opposed from the start. Nevertheless, we did it then in response to a very clear and obvious world trend. It was that government to government and national oil company to national oil company was increasingly the way in which petroleum was going to be traded in the markets of the world. We saw this with the expropriation of some of the great multinationals in the Middle East; we saw this with the creation of national oil companies in countries such as Venezuela, Nigeria, Belgium, France, Italy, Great Britain, Holland and Mexico, you name it. They were all creating national oil companies. The only major industrialized country which did not have its own national oil company and which was an oil producer was Canada. Of course, the United States is the exception because all the multinationals are there; they are American companies and, as we have seen recently with Exxon, they know how to protect their people.

We saw this trend and we thought it only natural in a country like Canada, where even to this day 95 per cent of the supplies of oil and gas are controlled by seven big corporations which are foreign owned and controlled. We do not say shame; we say this is the way the cookie crumbles and the story develops, that this is the way the exploration took place. We just say it would be a shame indeed if, at this stage in the history of the art and knowledge of the energy revolution—I repeat the word again—this country had not set up and did not support vigorously a national oil company such as Petro-Canada which is owned and controlled by the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: That national oil company, owned and controlled by the Canadian people through the Government of Canada, has embarked on many projects which have to do with conservation, with exploration and with development, and it is so important that it is inconceivable that one would not think of making use of it. Petro-Canada has entered into joint venture operations with Canadian independent energy companies such as Sulpetro. If we opposed that, we would end this opportunity for Canadian independents.

We saw that Petro-Canada could develop our northern resources and offshore resources. Today, Petro-Canada is responsible for about 50 per cent of our northern exploration. We saw Petro-Canada as the agent of Canadians and of the Canadian government to help work out joint operations with Mexico, Venezuela, and even China to secure new energy supplies. This House knows and the country knows how quickly the government and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources rose to their feet when we had to deal with the problem of possible oil shortages or changes in pricing or supply and demand, particularly in the wake of the Iranian crisis.

● (1730)

The minister was in Mexico and in Venezuela just months ago. In the one tour I took in the western hemisphere, Mr. Speaker, Mexico and Venezuela were two of the three countries to which I went. The opposition is always reminding me about Cuba. They can remind me about Cuba, but they should also remember Venezuela and they should also remember Mexico and the undertaking to deal with them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Petro-Canada has launched exploration projects in the Arctic islands worth $80 million in co-operation with Imperial Oil, Gulf and Panarctic. It is involved with Chevron off the coast of Labrador where gas has been found. It is involved in a gas liquefaction project in the Arctic and with EastCan of France to drill off the coast of Newfoundland. It has acquired an interest in other projects, and I mentioned the 15 per cent interest in Syncrude and the 45 per cent interest in Panarctic, another step in our energy policy. We should not forget that this was created under the Pearson government, assisted by Mr. Arthur Laing of Vancouver in setting up Panarctic, and that was a very forward step in the middle sixties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Petro-Canada has a $6 million interest with Polargas in pipeline research. In all these projects we are working closely with the multinationals, whether they be Gulf, Imperial Oil, Mobil or Shell, to develop our energy resources. We are not going to turn our backs on that kind of co-operation. We know this is a big game and that the big leagues are playing. We just want to be one of the significant players, particularly when there is a confrontation or a division of interest, as there must be when these multinationals are involved. These multinational corporations are by and large good corporate citizens, but sometimes they do have conflicts of interest, a subject which as been of such importance to the opposition. When a conflict of interest exists we want a Canadian player to be there, and that is Petro-Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is just one other subject I would like to talk about before concluding these remarks. I realize I have gone some distance now from the five-point energy platform of the Tory party. I am not very concerned that they will steal the rest of if from us. They are always looking for ideas from this side, but I do not see how they can make up their minds on pricing. I am not afraid they will steal our policy on that, because it would mean either hurting brother Lougheed or brother Davis, and that is not going to happen. They just will not stand up and be counted, and I can predict that with certainty.

On Petro-Canada, of course, they have so many positions, as we say. If they steal anything they will be stealing it from some of their members, again on other members' backs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: On allocation, which this bill is dealing with directly and which goes not only to the roots of our energy policy but which has to do with the notion of the country as such, I want to say just a few words. We on this side of the House take the view that the constitution, quite correctly, put management and ownership of resources in the hands of the provinces. It was not always thus, as we know.

[Translation]

I said on other occasions that the constitution had undergone many changes in this respect, that the New Quebec area in particular, the whole northern part of Quebec starting from the La Grande River, if I remember right, was given to the province of Quebec by the federal government whose property it was until 1908 when Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, the then Liberal Prime Minister, had a resolution introduced in the House which was implemented in 1912, in effect doubling Quebec's territory, giving it all those resources until then part of Rupert's Land, in other words Canada.

The Government of Canada did the same thing for northern Ontario. It did the same thing for the province of Manitoba, which it created out of nothing with federal lands in 1870, as well as with Alberta and Saskatchewan which it created out of nothing with federal lands, Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories in 1905. And even more, it gave them explicitly what they did not have until 1930, namely jurisdiction and ownership over natural resources. So we see a change in the constitutional history where the federal government not only delegates powers but hands over to the provinces considerable resources in the form of territories, minerals and resources of all kinds. It is a laudable change because it enabled the provinces to develop, to have real autonomy, to make them more concerned with the development of their territories, the orientation of their economy and so on. But I believe it is important at this stage in our history, Mr. Speaker, to remind Canadians in general, and perhaps certain provincial premiers in particular, that no province can have absolute ownership without sharing all its resources on its territory.

If the Government of Canada gave large pieces of its territories to Quebec, Ontario and the western provinces, it is because under the constitution it was keeping certain fiscal powers, certain powers with respect to trade and commerce, with respect to other emergencies as the one we are discussing today, certain transcendental powers so the federal government may, when the well-being of all Canadians is at stake, intervene to make sure all Canadians can benefit to some extent from those resources which in fact belong to everyone.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the premiers and the opposition party in particular will not be fond of this theory. But I appeal to all Canadians, Quebeckers, Ontarians and Albertans. I ask them to think of what this country would become if one province could have not only absolute control but absolute ownership of its resources without any consideration for sharing, by way of taxes or otherwise, with the rest of the country. What would be the consequences, Mr. Speaker? What would happen if an individual born in the maritimes moved to Alberta? He would automatically become entitled to share in the Heritage Fund which is worth about $4 billion now, or the entire budget of Nova Scotia.

What happens to the individual who was born and raised in Alberta, who studied there, who worked there and who, all of a sudden, wants to leave Alberta to work, study, marry, find a job or pursue his career elsewhere? Is it not obvious that by doing so he loses all benefits issuing as birthrights as an Albertan? Is it not obvious that a province could become so rich that an increasing number of Canadians would migrate there to enjoy those benefits which would be denied them by a central government capable of redistributing these resources?

• (1740)

[English]

This kind of country would be inconceivable. It would not be possible. Immigration posts would have to be set up at the present time at the Alberta border because—

An hon. Member: Ah!

Mr. Trudeau: I am talking about the hypothesis where the federal government would not be able to share in the resources as it is doing now. I know that the hon. member in the back bench is so bloated with himself that he cannot understand.

I am sure that this is not the position of Albertans, even if one considers the negotiations that we have had with the Alberta government over the past several years. They have agreed in this instance. They have accepted prices which would be less than world prices because they see—not because we have legislation with a revolver clause in it—that it is best for Canada. I respect the premier of that province too much to think that he is only agreeing to lower than world prices because there is a revolver clause in the federal legislation. He is agreeing because he shares a view of Canada which we all have to have—that the resources of this country belong to the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The constitution says that the resources shall be managed by the province, that the ownership will reside in the province. But it also gives the federal government many rights on those resources, whether it be through taxation power, trade and commerce power, or peace, order and good government power. What I say, and what I said at the first ministers' conference on the constitution in February, is that we are prepared to discuss these powers to limit their exercise, but we will never give them up totally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If hon. members of this House followed those debates in February, they will know that the premiers of several provinces, supporting each other, were trying to put this government in a position where it would no longer have the power to redistribute wealth across the country except in cases of crisis and emergency or where the peace, order and good government legislation had to be applied in all its force. I have a quotation from one member of the opposite side who said in this debate: "Well, you could always use the War Measures Act". We do not want to be forced to use the War Measures Act to make sure that the resources of this country go to the benefit of the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I can understand the premiers trying to protect their jurisdiction as much as they can and trying to reduce federal jurisdiction in these matters in these debates, as we saw in February. They are elected and their job is, first and foremost, to stand for the people of their province. They are not elected to think of the over-all scheme of Canada. It is nice when they do, but they do not always do so in their hard bargaining. But we have to think of the good of all Canadians. We have to think of the common good—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I hear groans again from the Tory party. I can understand that because of what happened after the February conference. Their leader went to Alberta and when asked about the premier's constitutional stand on resources, he said something to the effect: "I stand with the premier, and the provinces must have the resources". They have the resources now. That is not what the premier was asking for. He was not asking for jurisdiction over resources because he has jurisdiction. He was trying to limit federal jurisdiction over trade and commerce and over other powers which permit us to make sure that those resources can be for the benefit of all Canadians. On that, Mr. Speaker, the Tory party and the Liberal party are different and we will remain different.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I see that the Tory party, which condemned us for not having any policy, has finally come up with a policy themselves. It is a vague copy of ours, but they missed the most important point, to wit: that we are elected in this House to look after the common good of all Canadians, not that of only one or other of the provinces—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —whether they are led by Tory premiers, NDP premiers, Social Credit premiers or Liberal premiers. We will continue to do our job. We will continue to press forward with this legislation, which is our way of discharging our duty to all the people of Canada, so that they know that if any emergency arises or the common good is disrupted there will be a federal government empowered by this parliament to act for the protection of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that even though the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has had an hour to speak the way that he has, at least he has given me ten minutes before the House rises to attempt to rebut. Of course, now the Prime Minister is leaving the House.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Your leader isn't even here.

Mr. Lawrence: I had hoped that I would have been able to stand this afternoon and welcome the Prime Minister back into the House after his absence. I gather that he has not been feeling well, and certainly we can all appreciate that.

An hon. Member: Do you still think that?

Mr. Lawrence: I would have been pleasantly surprised to welcome him back here this afternoon to take part in third reading debate of a bill that has been before this House for two and a half weeks, because I would have wondered why he could not have appeared at an earlier time. It may well be that the debate has not gone the way that he expected it would go. It may well be that because of the rather political stance and the lack of anything constructive from his minister in this particular debate, he felt that he had to bail the minister out by appearing at this late stage.

That, sir, is one theory and it may be correct. The other theory may be that before the Prime Minister himself could hurry off to Toronto to appear on a national television show tonight, he felt that at least he should appear in the House of Commons. I refuse to welcome the Prime Minister back under those circumstances. I have never heard a more barren, naked speech in my life, one designed to divide this country, than the one I have just heard.

● (1750)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: I ask you to search your mind, Mr. Speaker, to see whether there was one constructive proposal put before the House this afternoon by the Prime Minister in the first supposedly major contribution he has made on energy in this House for a number of years. There was not one constructive approach.

I do not mind his dwelling as he did on my leader's speech made before the chamber of commerce in Montreal a week and a half ago, because no one on our side before or since has indicated that speech was the be-all and end-all.

Mr. Gillespie: It surely was not.

Mr. Lawrence: Certainly it is our intention to bring forward a number of policy decisions. In fact we have already done so.

The Prime Minister made a great deal of saying in his speech that a few weeks ago the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) made no mention of a pricing policy. The answer to that is very simple and we have stated it many times. To my certain knowledge we have been stating it for at least nine months. The Conservative pricing policy is that we want to see energy prices—oil and gas prices—in this country move toward world prices. It is as simple as that and we have said it many times.

It is fine for hon. members opposite to smile and haggle. If they do not disagree with it I wish they would stand up and say so.

The Prime Minister pokes fun at us in regard to such matters as energy conservation. He claims we have said exactly the same thing as the Liberals. He said that we want to see energy conservation at a 2 per cent rate whereas they want a 3.5 per cent rate. He implies that is a minor exception. It is not a minor exception, Mr. Speaker; it goes to the heart of the question. We are using the 2 per cent figure because, first, we believe it is right; second, we believe it can be reached; and third, the research on the question was done for us by the government's office of energy conservation. I should point out that the chief of that office resigned in disgust because his bosses, the federal government, were doing absolutely nothing to reach that goal.

Thanks to the long windedness of the Prime Minister, I do not have time to go through these policies one by one and explain all the major differences.

Underlying all these matters and the point that was emphasized by my leader, by me and by just everyone on this side of the House when we talk on energy policy inside or outside this House, is the one thing that can save us from these grossly increasing foreign price increases, the one thing that can save us from being dependent on the Ayatollahs, the Venezuelans, the Mexicans or the Saudi Arabians, the one thing that can save us—

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Is Exxon.

Mr. Lawrence: —and not leave the maritime area hang out to dry the way the government has left them, the one thing that can fight and beat the multinational companies on their own ground, is for Canada to be energy self-sufficient—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: —for Canada to utilize its own energy resources to take up the slack where these people have left us dependent on offshore oil.

It is fine for the Prime Minister to talk about what happened ten years ago, but he does not have to go back that far. Since the last OPEC crisis—we are into another one now and will have more if these people are left to their own devices—this government has done absolutely nothing at all. We now export more oil than we did in 1976 when the last bill expired and the government took no steps to replace it. That is a shame, especially when more than one-third of the country has been left by the government to hang out to dry and now we are dependent on Mexico, Venezuela, Iran and Saudi Arabia.

If this minister and the Prime Minister, instead of gallivanting around the world, would spend half the time, half the energy, half the money attempting to develop our own energy sources and our own domestic honest-to-goodness delivery system in this country, that would be a far better attitude.

This is the crux of all the speeches we have been making. Certainly we have a stand on Petro-Canada. Every one of those quotations fits in exactly with what we intend to do with Petro-Canada. All the government wants to do is replace big business with big government. We want to give the average Canadian the chance to take part in Canada's immense development of resources and, by golly, we are going to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: The government may not have faith that we can utilize our own resources, and because of that lack of vision they are not going to bring it about. They are not going to achieve that because of the petty, divisive, quarrelsome attitude displayed by the Prime Minister this afternoon. We are never going to achieve an objective until that objective is laid out. Our objective is that we in Canada meet our energy needs with our own energy resources.

If we have to put cash programs in place—and we think now that because of the lethargy and complacency of the government this will be necessary—to develop oil in the tar sands, by golly, we will do it.

If we have to expand our pipeline capacity immediately so that we can use Canadian energy reserves for the maritime provinces, then, by golly, we will do it. We should not leave the maritime provinces to hang out to dry as the government has.

I do not have enough time this afternoon to go through the idiotic, negative, sneering, divisive comments of the Prime Minister point by point, and I regret it very much. The country has a right to expect a lot more and a lot better from him.

I see you are looking desperately and anxiously at the clock, sir. I see it is six o'clock and, therefore, I conclude with these points.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, March 20, it is my duty to put the question.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

AWARDS TO CANADIAN RECORDING ARTISTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity relating to the Juno award presentations to Canadian recording artists last night in Toronto, which represented a true celebration of the success of Canada's popular musicians and composers and contrasts with the cheap politicization of this historic event by the Prime Minister of Canada who, knowing full well of the live coverage given these proceedings across Canada by CBC, chose to exploit a Hall of Fame presentation in honour of Canadian music great, Hank Snow—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae).

NATIONAL REVENUE

DELAYS IN PAYMENT OF TAX REFUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in view of the evidence of lengthy delays in the payment by the government of income tax refunds and child tax credits, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House deplores the delays in sending out income tax refunds and child tax credits which carry with them the inevitable conclusion that these delayed refunds are intended to coincide with the calling of a federal election.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers).

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SURVEY ON HOME SECURITY AND SAFETY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgency.

In view of the fact that the Solicitor General's department survey, which he said yesterday is "in terms of crime prevention", is being conducted by telephone callers whom householders cannot prove to be authentic, eliciting information related to home protection which should be known only to householders, yet could be given to anyone bent on housebreaking or other crimes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That the Solicitor General immediately stop this type of telephone survey which can aid and abet crime rather than prevent or control it.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO DURATION OF BILINGUAL BONUS PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of urgent necessity.

Several months ago the government introduced its budgetary cuts and decided to go back on an earlier commitment towards bilingual public servants and put an end to bilingual bonuses. After meeting with officials of the Public Service Alliance yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board announced that he will postpone this curtailment. To prevent this respite from being restricted to the duration of the electoral campaign, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey):

That the House unanimously urge the responsible minister to inform the House immediately, or at least before the coming election, of the program's duration.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the introduction of this motion at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION THAT BILINGUAL BONUS BE MAINTAINED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important and current matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Furthermore our employees will be proud to see that there is a member in this House who is interested in their fate.

In view of the fact that a few weeks ago I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 drawing to the attention of cabinet the serious effects resulting from the abolition of bilingual bonuses, thus penalizing 40,000 employees and taking a backward step in the expansion of bilingualism in Canada; considering that a newspaper published today reports that a meeting between union leaders and the President of the Treasury Board makes us hope that bilingual bonuses will be maintained for at least a few months; considering that the matter is too important—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Bellechasse wants to move a motion, he should do so now.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I see that you are as expeditious as I am.

Considering that the matter is too important to become a partisan issue, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House urge the President of the Treasury Board to do his utmost to maintain bilingual bonuses in the civil service as well as in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the introduction of such motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REMARKS OF MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE AND MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in view of statements made yesterday by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) on a Toronto radio program to the effect that Saudi Arabia does not discriminate against Israel and Arab nations generally do not discriminate against Canadian Jews, and in view of a quotation attributed to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) in yesterday's Globe and Mail that Bill C-32 of this House has more substance than Ontario's anti-boycott legislation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL OF POSTAL RATE INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas postal rates in this country should not be increased without prior approval of parliament, and whereas further increases are imminent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That no further postal rate increases be put into effect without prior approval of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

ATIKOKAN, ONT.—DISPOSAL OF NUCLEAR WASTES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to move the following motion. In view of the announcement by AECL that it will proceed with test-drilling in the Atikokan area in northern Ontario for disposal sites for nuclear wastes, and because of the concern of area residents that this may be the first step in making their area into a nuclear garbage dump, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources instruct AECL to halt this test-drilling until a public hearing into the matter has been held for the residents of Atikokan.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

MARKETING BOARD FOR WOOD PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

The Southern New Brunswick Wood Co-operative has expressed concern for a number of years about the prices that its members have been receiving for their wood. They have now stated their intention to establish a marketing board. I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this House instruct the Department of Agriculture, which has great knowledge about such matters, to provide the wood producers of this region with all assistance necessary to reach their goal.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DISPARITY BETWEEN WAGE INCREASES AND CONSUMER PRICE INCREASES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the governor of the Bank of Canada said in his annual report what we have been saying in this House for some time—that weekly wages are falling behind consumer prices. He said:

—it does not seem realistic to expect them to accept—other than very briefly—increases in their money incomes that fall far below increases in consumer prices.

In view of the fact that the rate of inflation is heading for double digits by next month if the present trend continues, and in view of the fact that wages in the past year as a result of the AIB controls have fallen behind consumer prices, on a composite index, at an annual rate of approximately $666, I ask the minister what the policy of the government is, in the absence of any guidelines with respect to wage earners whose incomes are falling behind consumer prices.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I presented my budget in November, I said that the rate of inflation would go down in 1979. In fact, the predictions are still to the effect that the rate of inflation for this year will be lower than last year. I think that the present rate of inflation, while a bit high, will go down during the year.

● (1415)

Labour and management will be well advised to make sure that there is not a new round of large wage increases which will lead to big price increases, which will put us back into the position we were at in 1974. I think that Canadian workers and managers understand that. They realize that we have regained, through moderation, our competitive position in world markets. That is why, for example, in the last quarter of 1978 we had a Canadian utilization of manufacturing capacity of close to 90 per cent. We have seen a big increase in employment in Canada. That is because Canadians are willing to be responsible in order to have a better economy.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps I can ask the minister if he agrees with the statement of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I ask him to address himself to that, especially in light of forecasts for the current year. For example, the Conference Board of Canada anticipates that consumer prices will increase by 8.4 per cent, as opposed to 8.3 per cent for weekly wages.

In light of these very alarming statistics, and the fact that wage earners in this country have been held down while prices have been allowed to escalate, does the minister agree with this statement by the governor of the Bank of Canada? If so, what does he intend to do about it?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should realize that at the time of the budget in November we reduced taxes for Canadians through indexation and other measures in order to allow the workers to have more take-home pay. We reduced taxes to the tune of $1.5 billion for Canadian workers. Therefore, their situation will be better and they will have more disposable income.

There are some good signs in the Canadian economy at this time. We see this all over the place, according to the press. If workers and managers continue to show the same moderation as they have shown in the past 12 months, we can have very good hopes for the future.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, we can draw little comfort from what the minister tells us, because what the governor of the Bank of Canada is talking about is the current situation, not the one that prevailed last fall when the minister was predicting an annual rate of inflation of 4.5 per cent, which is now up to 9.2 per cent.

Is it the policy of the government to allow wage earners in this country to catch up to the rate of inflation? If not, what is the policy of the government? For example, has the minister met with the chairman of the National Commission on Inflation to discuss guidelines with that commission which up to this point in time has no guidelines, or is he going to leave it to the judgment of the commission to decide what is inflationary and what is not? I repeat, is it the policy of the government to allow wage earners in this country, who are falling behind, to catch up?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in order to be fair, the hon. member must recognize that Canadian workers have had much more rapid salary increases than their U.S. or foreign counterparts. I think that in the last six or seven years there has been a great improvement in the position of Canadian workers. It is our hope that in 1979 they will continue, as they did in 1978, to take their responsibilities fully so that we may continue to strengthen our competitive position, increase substantially our exports, and improve our economic situation as we have done, to the extent that in February there were 400,000 more working Canadians than last year.

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—ANNUAL REPORT OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Robert de Cotret (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. I quote from a statement of the governor of the Bank of Canada in his annual report:

—a major downward adjustment of the exchange rate was undoubtedly necessary in order to help correct the large deficit which had emerged in Canada's international trade in goods and services.

If this downward adjustment was so undoubtedly necessary, why did the government spend billions of dollars in order to try to moderate that downward adjustment and really turn it around?

● (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): We have explained many times that this change in the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar was determined by the marketplace. We have intervened regularly in order to maintain an orderly market. At this moment the view is, I think, that the Canadian dollar has reached a more reasonable level because in the last few months we have considerably improved the Canadian economic performance. That is why the Canadian dollar has stabilized.

Mr. de Cotret: I fully recognize that the minister and the government have allowed the market to operate freely despite the fact that they have pumped billions and billions of dollars into this operation. Now that the dollar appears to be on a very modest upward trend, is the government still intervening in the marketplace either to moderate that upswing or, as is more likely for political reasons at this time, to support the upswing in the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Chrétien: The policy with regard to the dollar remains the same; it has not changed since I became minister. The intervention of the governor of the Bank of Canada is to make sure that the market operates in an orderly fashion. Further, I should like to tell the hon. member that we have not lost billions of dollars: we have exchanged Canadian dollars for American dollars, or vice versa, and the government has lost nothing.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

CALL FOR ROLLBACK OF UNJUSTIFIED PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Goldfarb Company, well known to the right hon. gentleman, produced a report which was printed in the Toronto Star showing that some 70 per cent of the people in metropolitan Toronto have been forced to change their eating habits because of the soaring cost of living.

Considering that this survey follows a metro-Toronto council report which shows that some 350,000 people in that city alone are living below the poverty level, will the government change its mind and take concrete action to roll back the unjustified increases which have taken place recently in the prices of bread and chicken, in order to bring some relief to the thousands of Canadians who need it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member alleges there have been unjustified increases. By whom, Mr. Speaker? By the farmers? By the marketing boards? By the retailers? If the hon. member has some evidence of excessive increases, we would like to look into it.

Mr. Broadbent: If the Prime Minister had paid attention to the questions which have been asked in the House for the last few weeks, he would know.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a supplementary question to ask, will he please direct it.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the Minister of Agriculture has himself acknowledge that the price of bread went up out of all proportion after the government removed the subsidy, and that the price of chicken rose to three times the level the farmer was receiving during the past year—these are two specific instances to which I am directing attention—would the Prime Minister follow up what he has just said, confirm the facts I have stated and then take action to see that prices are rolled back?

Mr. Trudeau: I hear the Minister of Agriculture saying he never made the statement just attributed to him by the hon. member.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party has been told repeatedly in the House that the average basket of food for a family of four today is costing the average worker at least three or four times less, in hours worked, than it did 10 or 15 years ago. This is a clear indication that Canadians generally, and workers in particular, are paying less for their food, in terms of hours of work, that they did 5, 10 and 15 years ago.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister should know that workers' salaries went up by only 6 per cent last year, while food prices, according to the AIB, went up by 21 per cent: according to another government agency it was 16 per cent. So food prices in terms of current prices are clearly outstripping increases in wages.

● (1425)

Considering that he has rejected subsidies on bread and milk, considering that he has rejected rollbacks, and considering that his own Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was reported on Sunday to have rejected a food policy—

Mr. Allmand: Nonsense.

Mr. Broadbent: —is the Prime Minister now saying that the government has no plans at all either in the short run or in the long run to reduce the cost of living?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question is full of false allegations that the government has done nothing. The Minister of Finance just finished indicating the cuts in taxes, direct and indirect, this government has brought down in the last several years.

Just a very short time ago this House brought in a child tax credit amounting to $200 per year per child. We just increased supplementary incomes for old age pensioners. We reduced tariffs barely a week ago. In the memory of the opposition, all this is nothing. They want to know what we did tomorrow. They will know tomorrow what we will do. It is absolutely incorrect to say that we are not in every way helping people in middle and lower income brackets through tax cuts, subsidies and other measures. The question of the hon. member is based just on forgetfulness with respect to the actions which have been taken in this very House under his very nose.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST TO PROMOTE BILINGUALISM BY PAYMENT OF BONUS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the policy espoused by the Prime Minister since 1968 has been to encourage bilingualism within government services dealing with the public from different regions of the country, does the Prime Minister still believe, in view of the upcoming election, that we should continue to work together so that bilingualism in Canada can flourish and that we may counter opposition to this policy, which, in my opinion, can bring great harmony in Canada and make this a great and beautiful country, one where the quality of life meets the highest standards?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member expresses exactly the government's feelings when he speaks of the importance of harmony in this country, which has been and continues to be, in our view, a major aspect of this bilingualism policy. Need I also remind the hon. member that in order to provide greater guarantees, not only have we passed legislation and implemented policies in this regard, but we have also introduced in parliament a bill to incorporate, to enshrine, so to speak, in the constitution this language egality policy so that in future no government could dodge this rule which, as the hon. member pointed out, is the very basis of harmony in our country.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. In view of the context in which we live and bearing in mind the intention of the government of reducing its expenditures to avoid having to increase taxes and levies on the taxpayers, but also bearing in mind the importance of the policy whereby all Canadians, regardless of their language, can communicate with the federal administration no matter where they live in this country, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he would be willing to grant a bilingualism bonus in the public service and the administration of the House of Commons, and to recommend its permanence to the President of the Treasury Board in order to ensure the survival of bilingualism and harmony in our country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the objectives mentioned by the hon. member are also ours. The question is whether or not the bilingualism bonus is the best way or method of achieving that objective. May I be allowed to remind the hon. member that some people who receive the bonus have never had occasion to use both languages. Might I also remind him that a large number of people decided to reimburse the bonus to the government because they felt either that they did not deserve it or that it was not the most efficient way of promoting the goal we both pursue.

That is why the government announced last August that it would review the whole matter, put an end to the bonus and seek other ways of pursuing the same objectives. Discussions followed on that question and many others, and I think the hon. member will be happy to know that the President of the Treasury Board advised me that, following talks with the leaders of the Public Service Alliance and various unions yesterday, discussions are progressing well and both parties hope to find a formula other than bonuses through which to attain our common objective. Whether we succeed or not in doing so is another matter but, in the meantime, we are allowing ourselves a period of several months before altering the present system.

● (1430)

INQUIRY AS TO DURATION OF BILINGUAL BONUS PROGRAM

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister on the same subject. I learned yesterday that the minister had decided to maintain the bilingual bonus. The Prime Minister realizes this announcement is made on the verge of an electoral campaign, whether we like it or not, and I say this in all objectiveness; however, I suggest Canadians would like to know the exact terms under which the bilingual bonus is maintained. I believe this is in the interest of Canadians and I am banking on the honesty of the Prime Minister when I ask him whether he can tell us how long this bilingualism program will be extended.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as for an announcement made on the verge of an electoral campaign, I would simply remind the hon. member that he and his party were complaining last August that I was announcing cuts on the eve of an electoral campaign. Obviously, in the mind of the hon. member and of many people in this House, we have been on the verge of an election for a year now. However, Mr. Speaker, this cannot prevent the government from governing and trying to save money, as was so aptly stated by the hon. member for the Social Credit Party, and this should not preclude the government from bettering its system for the promotion of bilingualism, which is the aim of all government members.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

It seems to me that my question is very simple and the Prime Minister knows quite well that today he could inform hon. members and the public about the duration of his program. In view also of the fact, as the Prime Minister is well aware, that about a hundred teachers are to be laid off on April 1, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he is prepared to reassign those hundred teachers since the program is to be extended, and I simply ask him to tell us for how long will that program be maintained. My question is quite clear, and I hope the Prime Minister will give me as clear an answer.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, no doubt the question is clear, but it is irrelevant. We were dealing with the bilingual bonus. The hon. member, under the guise of a supplementary question, is now asking me about the French teachers. That answer is not the one asked by the hon. member—

Mr. La Salle: Answer my question.

Mr. Trudeau: But that was not the hon. member's initial question. Now he is asking another question. I take notice of it and I will seek an answer to it. I am not aware of the state of negotiations in that respect.

LOTO CANADA

CARE AND SECURITY IN DISTRIBUTING TICKETS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Yesterday, when I put a question to the minister regarding the distribution of tickets by Loto Canada, the minister replied that the distribution was being done by Loto Canada "in their usual competent way."

Can the minister confirm that last Friday Loto Canada lost 3,800 tickets, worth $38,000, when they fell off the back of a truck as it was leaving Vancouver airport, that none of the tickets have since been recovered, and that Loto officials have no way of telling whether one of the $1 million prizes which may be claimed after the draw comes from among these lost tickets? Is this the standard of care and security that Loto Canada maintains when they are distributing tickets "in their usual competent way"?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, it certainly indicates the vast research that the member goes through every day. It is the care and concern of the Brink's company that lost that bag, not Loto Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: That makes it all okay then.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: That is most reassuring.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask the minister a question about some of her vast research every day. May I ask the minister whether, with regard to the Miracle Mart deal which was entered into by Loto Canada officials, the minister is prepared to offer Loto Canada tickets to other large retailers? Are they prepared to offer deals on exactly the same terms as she has offered them to Miracle Mart, namely, that she would bypass the wholesalers and send them directly to the retailers at wholesale prices?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I have just been reading another of the factually inaccurate interviews given by the hon. member at various and sundry times in order to downgrade, if he can, the sale of Loto Canada tickets.

I note, also, that he is inaccurate again in the amount of the commission that is paid to the retailers. He mentions 45 cents a ticket and he has not noted that it has gone up to 80 cents. But then, of course, that is like his research into the Brink's truck, which of course is indemnified. I find it passing strange that, regardless of what the hon. member says, he tries continually to downgrade the competence of the wholesalers and retailers of Loto Canada tickets, some of whom are in his own constituency and one of whom gave an interview this morning, if I am correct, saying that the hon. member was incorrect in the statements he made concerning the wholesalers in his own area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLICY RESPECTING OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in view of the increasing importance of offshore resources to Atlantic Canada, can the Prime Minister assure the House that it is still government policy to retain Canada's legal rights over these resources—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): —while maintaining the willingness to share generously with the provinces the management thereof?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thought the Prime Minister made that abundantly clear in his speech yesterday afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Poor Dionne.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER WILL MAKE STATEMENT IN MISSISQUOI ON FREEZING OF SALARIES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): In view of the current situation, Mr. Speaker, I feel I have a most interesting question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In his annual report which was tabled yesterday, Mr. Bouey, the governor of the Bank of Canada, stated, and I quote:

> —it does not seem realistic to expect them to accept—other than very briefly—increases in their money incomes that fall far below increases in consumer prices.

It is because the right hon. Prime Minister came to Cowansville and told the people in my riding, "Do not vote for Grafftey, because his party intends to freeze your wages, while the Liberal party refuses to impose a wage and price control program", that I want to ask him the following question: Will the right hon. Prime Minister come again to my riding to make a similar statement?

[English]

TRANSPORT

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the Federal Court's decision that the injunction sought against the Wheat Board by the farmers is invalid because the purchase had already been made, did the minister agree to the purchase of hopper cars, and was his consent required under the legal set-up of the board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been raised before and it was explained in the House at the time of the original application by the Wheat Board when they were intending to purchase the cars. I indicated at that time that my consent was not required and that the board had their own authority in this matter.

● (1440)

I had advance knowledge of their consideration of the matter, and of course I realized they had discussed the matter with the elected advisory committee of producers. After public reaction about the hopper cars, I was concerned that they review the matter. The Wheat Board went back to the advisory committee, looked at it again and concluded again that the right thing was to go ahead with the purchase.

Mr. Masniuk: Mr. Speaker, could the Wheat Board purchase locomotives, cargo ships and terminal facilities without consulting the farmers whose money they use?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I just informed the hon. member that they indeed consulted the farmers. The hon. member may have overlooked, as he overlooked the earlier answers, that there is an elected body of advisers to the Wheat Board who were elected toward the end of last year; it was the first year of their term. They were consulted. Beyond that, as to what they can or cannot do in precise legal terms, I suggest the hon. member should get legal opinions from his own advisers.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED LAY-OFFS AT WESTINGHOUSE PLANT IN HAMILTON

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns the announced plans by Westinghouse Canada that it will close its switch-gear plant in Hamilton, Ontario, laying off 700 workers.

Could the minister tell us whether his department has received from the company any notification of this plan and how it fits in with the much heralded industrial strategy or one of the several industrial strategies announced by the government?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, personally, I am not aware of the intention of Westinghouse. The department may well know about it. I will make inquiries and report to the House.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear that the minister has not been informed of something which affects so many workers in a key industrial area of Canada. The sectoral report on the electrical industry indicated that the decentralization of plants, which is supposed to have been one of the reasons Westinghouse is planning on closing its central plant in Hamilton, is one of the critical problems in the Canadian electrical industry and the number of small plants is one of the reasons the electrical industry is no longer internationally competitive.

My supplementary question is: How is this kind of activity on the part of a key company in Canada compatible with the long-term interests of our country as an industrial trading nation?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I really have nothing to add in answer to the hon. member's supplementary question other than that I will look into the whole problem.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SURVEY ON HOME SECURITY AND SAFETY—GUN CONTROL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a question. It arises from the questions put by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary and the hon. member for Red Deer yesterday referring to a survey by the Firearms Advisory Council.

I listened very carefully to the minister's answers. He said that he could answer only if he knew some of the questions. Some of the questions are: "Do you keep any weapons in the house? If so, why do you have weapons? Do you keep handguns in the house?" This research is costing $292,400. The minister said:

—as the hon. member knows, the question of gun control is one of high sensitivity.

Therefore, I should like to ask the minister: Is this survey, which is costing almost $300,000, done in reference to the enforcement of the gun legislation or in reference to crime control in Canada? If it is done for crime control, will this information be fed to all law enforcement officers in Canada?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, basically, the hon. member is asking two questions. One was asked by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary; it related to the survey following upon the implementation of the gun control legislation. The other one related to a different study relating to the impact of the media advertising campaign on the reduction in the crime rate. That was the one the hon. member for Red Deer asked yesterday.

Referring to the survey being conducted with reference to gun control legislation, it is in order to ascertain what impact the gun control legislation has; how effective the gun control legislation is; what impact it has in terms of reducing the rate of criminal activity involving firearms; and what reaction there is among gun owners in terms of how they are increasing their own standards in handling guns and ammunition.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, one of the most important things arising from the answers given by the minister is very simple. If a person answers the question, "Do you keep any weapons in the house?" some of the weapons may be restricted and some may be prohibited. I am not endorsing anyone breaking the law, but if innocently—and ignorance of the law is no defence—someone answers that question by saying, "Yes, we keep handguns", and they have not registered them, will the information be turned over to the police, after a voluntary answer given in an investigation costing almost $300,000, and will those people be charged? Is that what the minister is up to? I agree with him that this problem is very sensitive, particularly in rural areas but also in urban areas.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that when a survey is being conducted relating to public reaction to any program, one of the essential conditions attached to the survey is that any information obtained is kept strictly confidential.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I can assure the hon. member, as well as the hon. member for Red Deer whose questions yesterday indicated some concern in this regard, that any information sought relating to any survey conducted under contract with my ministry is kept strictly confidential.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INVESTIGATION OF PRICE INCREASES BY NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, as the minister responsible to parliament for the National Commission on Inflation, regarding recent increases in the retail price of bread.

Will the minister ensure that this new commission will investigate immediately these increases to determine their causes and whether they are justified in light of the facts? If they are not, will the commission immediately enter into discussions with any level of distribution found responsible, with a view to having them reduce these prices to a more appropriate level?

Mr. Broadbent: A good idea, Herb.

NATIONAL REVENUE

BOEING CONTRACT—INVESTIGATION INTO POSSIBLE INCOME TAX EVASION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. In the matter of the Boeing Corporation's admitted double payments to a Canadian agent or agents, can the minister tell the House if the special investigations section of his compliance directorate, or any other section of his department, has done or is now doing an investigation to determine if there has been income tax evasion?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot provide the hon. member with that information.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the minister to divulge the name of anyone, but surely Canadians have a right to know if taxation department sleuths are investigating this case or, alternatively, if the minister's department is doing nothing or, worse yet, if the case is embarrassing to the government and they are stonewalling it deliberately.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, it might well be that some unethical payment has been made by a company to someone. Obviously, the income tax department would be concerned if that recipient was failing to report the income. But if the hon. member is suggesting that Revenue Canada is conducting an examination of a specific citizen or corporation, and that I should be disclosing it in the House, then I think he should consult the law, because he is wrong.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR REPACKAGING FOOD ITEMS NOT UP TO LABELLING STANDARDS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Do officials of his department expect struggling retailers, who are not processors and who are not responsible for the size, grade and weight of packages, to remove, regrade and repack at their expense such items as raisins, eggs, potatoes, etc., where they do not meet certain standards? Must retailers be subjected to such harassment, rather than getting at the source of the problem which is the processor?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the principal area of enforcement is with the processors and the manufacturers, but the inspectors in my department have the right and responsibility to enforce the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act, and other legislation under our department, anywhere in Canada, including the retail level. But we try to concentrate on the processing and manufacturing level.

• (1450)

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of State (Small Business). Trying to get at the problem is like trying to collect the proverbial feathers which have been scattered to the four winds.

Would the minister tell the House if his department has had any input into that particular program to avoid the build-up of a huge bureaucracy, which seems evident to the people in the country—a system which might be popular with the NDP or a country where the state is supreme? Has his department had any input into this particular program and, if not, who speaks for small business?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, with all those feathers flying around, I am not quite sure what it is that the hon. member is driving at. The hon. member should know that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has the responsibility of enforcing the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act.

EMPLOYMENT

YOUTH—UPGRADING OF SKILLS THROUGH MANPOWER TRAINING COURSES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the minister responsible for the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission.

In view of the fact that many young people who are being encouraged to upgrade their skills through Manpower training courses in community colleges for a particular type of employment are finding it very difficult to obtain a position because they lack the necessary practical experience, I would like to ask the minister if he is aware of this and, if so, what plans does he have to overcome this problem?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, in his usual courteous manner, was kind enough to give me notice of this question. The fact of the matter is that we were concerned about young people taking training and then finding no job opportunities at the end of the training or, having taken the training and jobs being available, having no experience.

With respect to the latter part of the question, we embarked upon a co-operative education program with the provinces where funding, although it is on a very small basis at the present time, is taking place to give young people the opportunity to move into the work force while taking the training. With the second aspect we are very carefully monitoring, together with the provinces, the jobs that might be available at the end of training programs to see that people are not wasting time in training for jobs that do not or will not exist in the near future.

AIR TRANSPORT

UNITED STATES OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED AIR CANADA BARGAIN RATE FLIGHTS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Transport in a position to make a categorical statement to the House relative to the conditional suspension of the Air Canada air fare proposal which has been objected to by the United States authorities?

Can the minister now assure the House that the conditional suspension has been lifted, and can he assure Canadian passengers who have subscribed to this lower air fare package that they will be able, in fact, to fly at the low rate effective next Tuesday?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the course of action is very much in the hands of the United States, so I can only report where they stand in relation to their power to suspend or not suspend certain tariffs which have been filed by Canadian air carriers.

As I understand the American position at this moment, they did register a conditional note in relation to the fares filed by Air Canada, but they do not want these to take effect at this stage. Therefore, as I read the situation, the early part of the Air Canada lower fare season will certainly come into effect without impediment if the Americans do not change their position and take different action. At the same time, they have reserved the right to observe what happens to fares which may be filed by American carriers. Hon. members will know that the Canadian Transport Commission has been allowing certain of these fares similar to the Air Canada fares to come into effect when filed by carriers from the United States.

The American note also indicated that they would await the outcome of the discussions between Canada and the United States before taking any further action. Since those discussions are due to start in several weeks, it seems obvious that the first several weeks of the Air Canada program will be all right. Whether the rest of the program will be all right, obviously will depend on the conclusion of those discussions. I have no reason to doubt that they will be all right.

Mr. McGrath: A little more smile, Otto.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I can only assume from the minister's answer that the suspension has not been lifted. Having regard to the fact that the United States has stated that their suspension will not become effective unless the Canadian authorities unreasonably take action to suspend or otherwise deny a bona fide competitive fare proposal of any United States carrier, and given the fact that there have been nine or ten cases wherein the Canadian authorities have, in fact, suspended applications by American carriers, has there been any change in position relative to those nine or ten proposals put forward by the American airlines?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it would be my contention that we have not taken any unreasonable action in relation to filings and, therefore, I have optimism about the effectiveness of these Air Canada fares. The truth is that certain fares filed by American carriers in the past six or eight months were subject to suspensive action by the Canadian Transport Commission, and that led to the request by us for discussions with the United States about how to handle these filings in our two countries before our two regulatory agencies. I think we requested those discussions last September or November, but only now have the Americans agreed to having them and they will be held in April.

In the course of looking at the Air Canada fares, the Canadian Transport Commission indicated that certain parallel and similar fares filed by air carries from the United States would indeed be allowed. In other words, they would no longer be suspended and, therefore, they can go into effect. I am sure that the Canadian Transport Commission is ready and willing to look quickly at additional fares which may be filed by American carriers.

CANADIAN UNIVERSITY SERVICE OVERSEAS

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MAINTAIN INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible for the Canadian International Development Agency, CIDA. CIDA, as the parliamentary secretary knows, is currently reviewing its funding arrangements with CUSO, the Canadian University Service Overseas, an organization which is heavily dependent on CIDA's support for generating its own volunteer resources.

My question is: Since CUSO has contracts with many foreign countries and a large pool of committed talent offering its skills at very low salaries, does the parliamentary secretary recognize the need to continue providing government assistance to CUSO to maintain the infrastructure upon which this volunteer talent depends?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government never doubted that the services rendered by CUSO in developing countries are extremely valuable. To give a more direct answer to the hon. member's question, I must simply say that the Canadian International Development Agency is now reviewing very carefully the budget of CUSO, and the minister who is accountable for that agency will announce the decision which will be made in due time.

[English]

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there were some press reports which were slightly misinterpreted in that they said the duties carried out by CUSO were not in fact very dependable. I believe those press reports were not completely accurate.

If there is a favourable report from the investigation under way by CIDA and the government that CUSO is a dependable organization and that the duties carried out by CUSO are necessary, would the government then confirm that it would be continuing the financing and contracting for that operation?

[Translation]

Mr. Duclos: Mr. Speaker, I think the duty of CIDA is not to base its judgments on reports from La Presse but on real facts. I think the budget of CUSO will be judged on its own merits.

AGRICULTURE

BRUCELLOSIS CONTRACTED BY PACKING PLANT EMPLOYEES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture, if I could get his attention, please. I know that the minister has lost a lot of weight and that "Lean Gene" can move quickly nowadays.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: My question concerns brucellosis, which is a very serious disease carried by cattle. The Canadian Food and Allied Workers' Union has reported that seven workers at a Canada Packers' packing plant in Lethbridge have contacted brucellosis because they have been working at slaughtering diseased animals. The union blames federal inspectors for not enforcing the regulations. Has the minister had a chance to investigate this incident in Lethbridge, Alberta? If he has, what are the results of that investigation and what protection does he have to offer to the workers in the plant?

• (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we know there is a possibility that this can happen. I do not have the final results of all the investigations, but we are very concerned that this should happen. If a person has a cut on the hand, or something like that, when they are actually doing the slaughtering, there is a possibility that they could contract the disease, but the occurrence is infrequent.

I feel that our controls are quite strict. I am aware of the situation, but I do not have the results of the investigation before me at this time and I do not know if they are finalized.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the fact that the union claims that federal inspectors have not been enforcing the regulations for the past several months, and that because of that the workers have contracted the disease, is the minister contemplating any change in the regulations? Is he satisfied that there are sufficient funds so that there are enough federal inspectors to make sure that incidents like this do not occur again?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are very concerned about whether this should ever happen. We do not want it to happen. I am not in a position to prejudge at this time whether our inspectors were properly enforcing the regulations.

I am sure the hon. member knows there is a certain responsibility on the workers themselves to comply with the regulations. These are being adhered to, according to my understanding. If someone was forcing the workers to do something against the regulations and the union contract—they are fully aware of this—I would be very concerned. I will report to the hon. member as soon as I have the final details.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might deal with the business of the House generally. Yesterday there was a discussion in the House between my friend and myself about the Arab boycott bill, C-32. The question was whether the government was going to let it die on the order paper or whether it would be called as a matter of urgency, as the minister said, to be dealt with in one day.

I think I should say through you, Mr. Speaker, that I have written a letter to the government House leader which I delivered to him this morning with a copy to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It set forth a proposal whereby the bill could be dealt with in one day using committee of the whole proceedings of the House and limiting debate on second reading, so that amendments could be put, with notice of these amendments being given to the government well in advance of the date. In the letter I suggested the bill be called next Tuesday. I wonder if my friend has had a chance to comment on that, given the urgency of this bill. I think my proposal would meet his requirement of dealing with it all in one day. The government would decide whether they wished to vote against the amendments as they see fit, but at least the House could consider the matter which is of some importance. If he would deal with that, I would be extremely grateful.

While I am on my feet perhaps I could ask if it is his intention to designate next Monday, March 26, as an allotted day. There was some discussion about that but it has not yet been done.

Could the minister also tell us the business for today as well as for next week, as far ahead as he can see in the circumstances?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked me about the business of the House for today which I indicated earlier would be Bill C-49, the Bank Act extension, to be followed by the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. I should like to confirm that next Monday will be an allotted day.

The hon. member raised a question with respect to Bill C-32, on foreign economic boycotts. I am delighted to see in the letter written to me that the opposition has totally reversed the decision taken yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition who on three occasions refused to agree that the bill could be dealt with in one day. If I may borrow a line from the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I have never seen such a conversion since Saul on the road to Damascus.

In any event, having registered that point, I should like to deal specifically with the request of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) transmitted to me earlier today and which I received at 1.20 p.m. Dealing with it directly, and I hope positively, I should like to quote briefly from the point made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. In referring to Bill C-32 he said: "We believe that this bill is urgent".

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. MacEachen: Then he went on to say: "What we are trying to determine from the minister is whether he is prepared, in light of the new urgency" to deal with this bill.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Come on, now. You bootlegged a whole speech yesterday and you are doing it today.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has proposed that we deal with this bill next Tuesday under certain conditions. I am prepared to call the bill today. I have in my hand the order which reads as follows:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, the first item called under Orders of the Day in this sitting shall be Bill C-32, an act to provide for the reporting of information relating to foreign economic boycott requests;

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

That the said bill shall, after having been read a second time, be referred to a committee of the whole; and

That, no later than 9:45 p.m. this day, all questions necessary for the disposal of all stages of the said bill shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) says "gagging again". This is the proposal received in the letter, Mr. Speaker!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton added that he would like some assurance that we could get into committee of the whole. We on this side do not intend to prolong second reading debate, probably one speaker will suffice for us, and then we are prepared to go into committee of the whole.

We are ready to go forward today, Mr. Speaker. Despite the urgency asserted yesterday by his leader, the hon. member suggested next Tuesday. If it would be more convenient for the hon. member we would also be prepared to wait until next Tuesday, but we are ready to go ahead today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is a great day when you have to write a letter to the government House leader to get him off his butt.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am rather glad I wrote that letter today because the government has finally been forced to bring this matter to a head. On behalf of this party I am prepared to consent to that motion if it is put. That will allow us to deal with it all in one day, today being a long day. That was my intention in choosing Tuesday, so that we would have a full day. That is quite appropriate. I thank the minister for suddenly coming to life and realizing there is a problem in this country and that this government has failed to deal with it.

Mr. MacEachen: What a conversion! Where is Joe for the flip-flop?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the proposal now being negotiated on the floor of the House is in line with the position we have taken for a long time, namely, that this bill should be dealt with in one day. If my friends to my right had taken that position yesterday instead of the one they took, we could have agreed to this bill going through yesterday. At any rate, today's proposal is in line with the position we have taken all along. We are prepared to agree that this matter be dealt with today and that the rules proposed be made into an order.

● (1510)

As I listened to the statement made by the government House leader, I did not hear him include the suggestion that has been made, namely that at second reading there be only one speaker per party and that speeches be limited to 20 minutes. It seems to me that that ought to be included in the order or in the understanding.

It is also a fact that in the letter which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) wrote to the government House leader, there was a suggestion that, if necessary, there would be a readiness to cancel private members' hour. This matter might not take all day, but if we have the understanding that having gone into this matter today we not have a private members' hour from five o'clock until six o'clock, it would help us deal with this matter satisfactorily. At any rate, what I am saying is: yes, we agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain very clearly my party's position in relation to this issue. As the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada in the House, I think I have always contributed very positively to the proper consideration of the bills which are introduced in the House to enable all hon. members to express their views. A few moments ago I heard the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) talk about the road to Damascus. Mr. Speaker, I for one am not a convert to this position.

I agree about the activities which are necessary if the House of Commons is to administer our country properly. I have said it and repeated it and I will repeat it again. There are 264 of us here, mandated by Canadians to administer the business of the country. Mr. Speaker, if I cannot express my views, I will forget all about it. But if you allow me to express them, I would like to explain very openly to my hon. colleagues of the House the way we see things and say that we are willing to work to allow parliament to be truly effective. As the President of the Privy Council said, we have before us Bill C-49 dealing with banks. The purpose of the bill is to extend the present Bank Act. I for one am not ready to allow it to pass without saying what I think about it. That is also true of my colleagues. This is the third time such a thing happens. We will have to come to a conclusion about all this.

Moreover, Bill C-32 on boycotts is another important bill which should not be passed hastily, but rather considered very seriously so that parliament and then the government can implement it. The bill should be efficient. We also have before us, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-38 on the excise tax. This is a very important bill, Mr. Speaker. I think we should take time to study it seriously and make the necessary amendments so that the legislation which will be part of our statutes is efficient. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am ready as are my colleagues to accept to limit the time we deal with this bill. I agree with that but I want leaders of the House to come to an arrangement; I do not want us to be taken by surprise or on short notice.

I would like the President of the Privy Council to take into consideration the remarks I am making now. I think however that we, not me but others, are bright enough to come to an honest and serious settlement and that Tuesday could be a day allotted to the opposition, as the Leader of the Opposition announced. I understood he said yes. I understood March 26 would be an opposition day and I am quite willing to accept that on behalf of my colleagues but I would like parliament to be expeditious. Not that I want to have innocent parliamentarians ready to accept anything whatever the conditions may be. I would like the people of my country to get the impression that we are responsible, that we take enough time to study such and such bill but not too much; I would like that we come to a practical conclusion so that the administration of my country be the best of all democratic countries on this human earth.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It has been proposed that an order be now made. The introduction of the motion to which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has referred would require the consent of the House. Does the President of the Privy Council have the consent of the House to present the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones). Order, please.

Does the President of the Privy Council have the unanimous consent of the House to present his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: There is no consent for the presentation of the motion at the present time. Order, please.

An hon. Member: Who said no?

An hon. Member: You know who said no.

Mr. Paproski: Roberts said no.

An hon. Member: It was Len Jones.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: Roberts said no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Roberts: It was your member.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise very often in this House on this type of question, but when the question whether there was unanimous consent was raised, a gentleman who is normally my friend in this House, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), shouted out—and I am sure it was recorded—that I withheld unanimous consent. That is a falsehood. It was a colleague of the hon. member who shouted out, and I would stake my seat on it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Poor fellow.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski).

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of privilege. First, I think it was a very cheap shot made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts).

An hon. Member: Come on!

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Paproski: —to even say that. Second, I believe it was—I think everybody else in the House saw it—the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) who got up and said no.

An hon. Member: It was the hon. member for Edmonton.

Mr. Paproski: The Secretary of State can say what he wants, but I heard him say no also.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Secretary of State by way of a question of privilege has taken the opportunity to make sure that the record reads correctly. I think that matter is now finalized.

Further on House business, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am still putting a question to the government House leader with respect to House business. It has not been granted that we do what was proposed a while ago. But since there is nothing in the world to stop the government from calling order No. 32 when government business is called today, may I ask if the government House leader will call that bill, knowing as he does that from the parties in the House there will be a readiness to facilitate it. In other words, will he take the chance, which I think is worth taking, that if he calls the bill, which is the minister's right, it will be through all stages today?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to get an agreement from all members of the House to facilitate the passing of this bill today. The leader of the Social Credit Party has asked for further consultations on this bill. The sensible thing to do now is to revert to the regular business and have those consultations, with a view to dealing with the bill next week. It may be that after a period of reflection on the part of those who may have some doubt about dealing with this bill in one day they will come to a different conclusion.

I have been interested in this bill, as has been evidenced since last January, but we have a great number of competing bills that have to be dealt with. It was in an effort to give this particular bill special attention that I attempted to secure an agreement to pass it in one day. That agreement has not been forthcoming. I doubt very much if it would be practical at this stage to try to pass it today or tomorrow without that kind of agreement. The hon. leader of the Social Credit Party again nods his head in approval.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the government House leader for the statement he has just made. I look forward to the consultations with him.

In the fuss that developed, I do not know whether my friend designated next Monday as an allotted day. If he did, I did not hear him. Did he do so? I just want to make sure.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did. I can understand why the hon. member did not hear me; he was reeling under some of those verbal punches I gave him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIONNE (NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI)—OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—DISALLOWANCE OF QUESTION ASKED DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the question period. It concerns a question I put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with regard to offshore mineral rights.

I suspect that you, sir, misunderstood the question or possibly did not hear a part of it, because I specifically referred to offshore resources. In your intervention you refused to allow the Prime Minister to reply to my question on the basis that he had dealt with that subject yesterday in his speech. I submit to Your Honour that the Prime Minister did not refer yesterday to offshore mineral resources, and more particularly to resources off the Atlantic coast.

It is true that the Supreme Court has ruled with regard to west coast resources and it is true that there was an agreement signed between the federal government and the governments of the maritime provinces. However, the government of Nova Scotia has since done a flip-flop on that question. Newfoundland has not agreed to the agreement with regard to the management—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): —of those resources. Last week the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark)—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot allow the hon. member to get into a debate. If in fact I misunderstood the nature of his question, as the House well knows the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a speech yesterday on resource policy. If I was under the impression that the nature of the question was one that was covered by the Prime Minister and I made an error, I will be only too happy to rectify that if I can. I will look at the text of the question, and if the hon. member's contention is right, I will try to see to it that he is able to put that question at the first possible opportunity.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADMISSION OF ENTREPRENEUR TRAINEES

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-469, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976 (admission of entrepreneur trainees).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, this bill fills an important gap in Canada's immigration policy. Immigrants who have come to Canada and established successful businesses and are ready to expand often feel they will be best served by bringing relatives from their own country to help their business to grow. They have more confidence in, and a better relationship with, relatives. Such arrivals do not take existing jobs from Canadians but in fact may add new jobs. My bill will establish a new category of immigrants, entrepreneur trainees, who come to Canada and will eventually earn landed immigrant status.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING INCREASED PENALTY FOR AIR CHARTER TOUR OVERBOOKING

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-470, respecting inclusive air charters.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to discourage operators of inclusive air charter tours from overbooking or otherwise failing to provide the accommodation that is advertised as part of the tour. At present, a tour operator has nothing to lose by gambling, for instance, on the number of hotel rooms available at a destination. The customer is only reimbursed for the value of what he does not receive, not for any inconvenience that results from being stranded. The bill would impose a penalty of three times the value of any part of the tour omitted, payable to the customer.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ADULT OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-53, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 598, 832, 1,164, 1,199, 1,200 and 1,208.

AIRPORT REVENUE FROM CONCESSIONS

Question No. 598—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. In (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977 (d) 1978 to date, what was the total amount of revenue collected by the government from all (i) types of concessions operating at government airports (ii) airlines operating at or flying enroute through government airports?

2. For the same years, what (a) were the names of the concessions (b) were the names of the principal shareholders (c) was the time limit for each contract and, in each case, were there any renewals without tender and, if so, how many and for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport):

Revenues Collected ($000)		1974/75	1975/76	1976/77	1977/78
1. (i)	Concession Revenue	34,429.0	39,097.0	43,888.9	50,771.6
(ii)	Landing Fees etc.	31,529.1	31,899.1	43,920.2	47,105.5
	Terminal Charges	9,315.1	9,784.5	13,460.7	14,624.4
	Enroute Facility Charges	3,357.0	2,395.0	3,437.0	3,497.0
	Ticket Tax	7,109.0	53,731.0	71,135.0	77,290.0
	Air/Ground Radio Service	3,619.0	2,218.0	2,586.0	2,210.0
	Rentals	14,856.0	16,145.5	18,180.3	17,769.2
	Other	4,631.6	5,051.6	4,689.9	3,871.8
	Total	108,845.8	160,321.7	201,298.0	217,139.5

NOTE: The revenues report collections from users of these services. The records of Transport Canada do not readily identify the user of the services. "Air-Ground Radio Service" and "Enroute Facility Charges" are revenues collected from users operating in Canadian airspace who may or may not land at Canadian airports.

2. (a) (b) and (c) The information requested is not readily available and to provide an accurate reply would entail a lengthy and costly examination of the records and accounts of each government airport, which costs in manpower and time would be excessive and prohibitive.

MULTICULTURALISM

Question No. 832—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Since 1968, did the Ministry of State for Multiculturalism finance projects in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what were the projects (b) what was the (i) total amount (ii) amount in each case (c) what were the areas?

2. Is the Ministry planning to do so in the near future and, if so (a) what will be the amount (b) in which areas?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)):

1. Departmental budgets and records are not maintained by electoral districts but rather by program or by region. However, officials undertook a special review of all the multiculturalism grant files by federal constituency for fiscal year 1977-78 and for the current fiscal year up to February 15, 1979 and it was found that no grants had been awarded in the constituency of Richmond.

2. The amounts granted to any region depend on the number and nature of projects submitted from the region which are evaluated according to the objectives and criteria of the departmental programs concerned, the need of the applicant and the available resources. It is not possible to indicate in advance which projects will be financed in any given area.

CUSTOMS BRANCH MONITORING SYSTEM

Question No. 1,164—Mr. Friesen:

1. Does the Department of National Revenue have a complaint monitoring system which covers the Customs Branch and, if so, on what date was it put in place and what is a description of the system?

2. For each month since the monitoring began or since 1976, how many complaints were registered against customs officials and/or the regulations at (a) the Douglas Border Crossing, British Columbia (b) the Pacific Highway Crossing, British Columbia (c) Vancouver International Airport (d) the Windsor—Ambassador Bridge and Tunnel, Ontario (e) the Niagara Falls—Rainbow Bridge, Ontario (f) Toronto International Airport (g) Mirabel International Airport, Quebec (h) St. Stephen, New Brunswick?

3. What is the estimated number of vehicles passing through the above points each (a) day (b) night?

4. What are the three most common complaints?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)):

1. Yes. A complaint monitoring system was implemented in August, 1978 and includes all complaints replied to by the department's field operations branch since April 1, 1978. The system produces semi-annual reports showing complaints first by work location and secondly by one of the following six classifications: conduct of officer, delays, secondary/enforcement/examination, facilities, official languages, clearance of goods.

2. In the complaint monitoring system, Pacific Highway and Douglas are shown as Pacific Highway; all three bridges in Niagara Falls are grouped as Niagara Falls, and Toronto International Airport includes both terminals one and two.

	April	May	June	July	August	September	October	November	December	January
Pacific Highway	5	1	3	3	2	5	4	1	10	1
Vancouver International Airport	3	0	0	3	5	2	4	2	3	3
Windsor Bridge and Tunnel	0	2	4	3	0	3	3	0	0	1
Niagara Falls	0	3	1	1	1	2	2	0	1	1
Toronto International Airport	6	4	6	3	6	4	8	5	6	9
Mirabel Airport	0	2	1	2	6	3	5	1	1	1
St. Stephen, N.B.	0	0	1	0	0	1	1	0	1	0

3. Statistics on vehicles and flight arrivals are not kept on a day/night basis. The following figures are averages for a 24 hour day. The average number of passengers processed is also included.

	Vehicles or Aircraft	Persons
Pacific Highway	4,491	10,520
Vancouver International Airport	31	2,857
Windsor Bridge and Tunnel	18,287	39,677
Niagara Falls	7,126	18,892
Toronto International Airport Terminals One and Two	115	15,824
Mirabel	25	2,234
St. Stephen, N.B.	2,057	4,599

4. The three most common categories of complaint are:

(1) Conduct of officer

(2) Secondary examination/enforcement

(3) Clearance of goods

SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE

Question No. 1,199—Mr. Herbert:

Was a study made of any per capita variance between the Province of Quebec and the rest of Canada of spouses allowance net payments and, if so, to what were such variations attributable?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: no formal study was conducted on Spouse's Allowance per capita variance between the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada. However, information indicating this variance does exist: average amount of allowance being received each month by recipients of the Spouse's Allowance pension.

	*Based on OAS population $	Based on SPA population $
Quebec	7.06	157.40
Canada	5.42	152.20

The fact that the average per capita SPA payment in Quebec is higher than the national average per capita SPA payment indicates that SPA recipients in that province have relatively less income from sources other than Old Age Security.

* Total Old Age Security population in January, 1979, 2,125,165

GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Question No. 1,200—Mr. Herbert:

Was a study made of any per capita variance between the Province of Quebec and the rest of Canada of guaranteed income supplement net payments and, if so, to what were such variations attributable?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: no formal study was conducted on Guaranteed Income Supplement per capita variance between the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada. However, information indicating this variance does exist: average amount of Guaranteed Income Supplement being received each month by recipients of the Old Age Security pension.

	*Based on OAS population $	Based on GIS population $
Quebec	66.29	104.89
Canada	56.11	103.16

The fact that the average per capita GIS payment in Quebec is higher than the national average per capita GIS payment indicates that OAS recipients in that province have relatively less income from sources other than Old Age Security.

POINTS OF ORDER

DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was going to rise yesterday but something happened during the course of points of order and I was not able to draw this to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. I am glad to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young) answering today. I am hopeful that I will have more success with him in getting responses to my legitimate, important and urgent questions on the order paper.

The fact simply is this. I have to persist in bringing this matter to the attention of the parliamentry secretary in order to get a response to these important questions. I refer to questions I placed on the order paper with regard to the use of government aircraft by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and members of the cabinet during the two-month period prior to the byelection. The parliamentary secretary will know that I am referring to questions Nos. 207 and 208 which read as follows:

Has the Liberal Party of Canada paid for the use of any government aircraft in the period August 16 to October 16, 1978, in connection with the byelections held on October 16, 1978 and, if so, in what amount for each trip?

[Mr. Horner.]

Did the Prime Minister or Members of the Cabinet, during the period August 16 to October 16, 1978, make use of government aircraft and, if so, what was the total cost and what was the destination, on each occasion?

I keep raising this matter because as each day goes by we get closer and closer to a general election. The problem is this. If the government persists in not answering these questions before the general election, there can be only one conclusion: the government would be embarrassed by revealing that information. In the interests of protection whatever remains of the reputation of this government, I ask the parliamentary secretary to try and get the answers to those questions and to others that I have placed on the order paper.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to questions I have had on the order paper for three sessions. A period of two or three years has elapsed and there has been no attempt to give me any type of answer even though individuals from the department have contacted my office for clarification of some of the questions I asked.

I wish to underscore what the previous member stated to this chamber. It is obvious the government is very touchy when it comes to questions about passes for travelling, not only when they relate to members of the cabinet but also when they affect presidents of Crown corporations and commissioners. My purpose was to find out how often persons in these positions have travelled on special passes issued to them. I reinforce the appeal made to the parliamentary secretary by the hon. member in the hope of having these questions answered before an election.

● (1530)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) knows how easy I am to deal with and how disposed I am to provide answers to these questions. I may say I have never been embarrassed by any of the answers I have had to bring forward. I have relayed the concerns expressed on this matter to my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), and I am sure we will do our best to make these answers available as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANK ACT AND QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND OPERATION TO APRIL 1, 1980

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-49, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be now read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill I am now introducing is short and very straightforward. The purpose of it is to extend the powers of banks incorporated under the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act to April 1, 1980, by amending section 6 of those pieces of legislation. Under the present legislation, Mr. Speaker, the powers of banks to operate as banks would expire on March 31, 1979.

[English]

Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, has been under consideration by committees of the Senate and the House since November of last year, although the bill was presented in the same form to the House of Commons in June, 1978. An extension of the present Bank Act is necessary because there is not sufficient time between now and March 31 to permit a careful examination of the committees' reports, and to consider any changes that should be made to the proposals in Bill C-15 in response to the committees' recommendations.

I share the disappointment of various members of the House and of the many interested parties who have indicated their desire to have the revised banking legislation enacted as soon as possible. However, I do feel that the decennial revision of the banking legislation should not be carried out without careful review and extensive consultation.

The parliamentary committees have devoted a great deal of their time to examining this important and extremely complex legislation. Interested parties have had every opportunity to submit written briefs and to be heard by the committees. The entire revision process, which began in September, 1974, when the then minister of finance invited interested parties to submit briefs on the subject, has been time consuming but most worth-while. While it has become evident that revised banking legislation cannot be enacted before March 31, 1979, I would hope that it will be passed as soon as possible thereafter.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the members of the committee on banking affairs who worked very attentively on the revision of this legislation. I would also thank the members of the Senate committee on the same matter.

I had hoped to get the report of the committee a little sooner, at the beginning of the session. We had planned in the fall to introduce it in mid or late February which would have enabled us to pass it before the end of the session. Unfortunately circumstances and the work of the committee of the House did not allow them to report to me before Tuesday of this week. I am going to examine immediately the reports of the two committees, both of the House and the Senate, and I hope to move amendments to Bill C-15 and come back within a few weeks. That is why I hope Bill C-49 can be passed without much controversy because it is a very consequent piece of legislation in view of the circumstances.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it was touch and go whether we would go on with this bill today. I was anticipating that in the present circumstances we might either go on with the boycott bill or with the bill which has already been started, Bill C-38, the exicse tax bill, which is a matter of much greater interest to most members of the House. However, Bill C-49 is before us and, as far as I am concerned, I hope we will stick to its provisions which call for an extension of one year of the Bank Act.

I should like to go into a little more detail, though, with regard to what has happened and why we find ourselves in our present situation; I believe this could be instructive not only to ourselves but to all concerned. What does one do when the House has to consider a decennial revision of the Bank Act in the context of significant changes and developments affecting the economy and industrial activity in this country? I took part in the previous revision of the Bank Act which began in 1964 and finished in 1967. For that reason I feel no compunction of conscience should the study of these revisions provoke any adverse comment from anyone except those who think that, having once proposed something, it should be considered for five minutes and then accepted.

I recall that back in 1972-73, as finance critic for the opposition I recommended to the then minister of finance, Mr. John Turner, that he should convince his cabinet colleagues to appoint a royal commission on the subject of banking and financial institutions in this country. The Porter commission, which was appointed in 1959 or 1960, reported about 1964. That commission did very good work.

We are not legislating now for the past but for the decade to come—the coming two decades as far as our banking system is concerned. The subject matter we reviewed in the sixties and that w' ich we are reviewing in the seventies are as different as chalk from cheese where banking and related matters are concerned. The evolution of business activities, business techniques and so forth has been such that we are no longer in the same field. There was always a constant danger of limiting one's thinking to what had gone past. I accused the committee several times of legislating back to the use of quill pens or for the manufacture of horses' collars when everybody is using automobiles.

As a result of strong representations made in the committee by myself and others, a general consensus was reached that we would legislate for the present and for the future. However, we did not have the material, studies and testimony from all sides we would have required. Therefore, I fault my old friend John

Turner for not setting up that royal commission so that we could have the benefit of a good report, which might have taken three years to present. It would have served the committee in the other House as well as ours. Incidentally, the committees finished their studies approximately three or four days apart.

● (1540)

There was a great deal of consensus among the members who attended, members of the official opposition and the government party. Rarely did we see members of the New Democratic Party; I do not think they attended more than four or five sessions. Possibly they attended a few at which witnesses appeared, but beyond that and with respect to the preparation of the report we did not see them. We did not see others very much either. On the other hand, people did get to know the subject. The committee considered Bill C-57 last June and set a schedule for testimony during the fall months. That schedule was interrupted. I think the parliamentary secretary will agree that it was interrupted because the government decided to put the session to an end and start a new session.

I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will agree that the committee did lose about a month of momentum as a result of that. That was a consequence of a government decision. Perhaps that decision was made for valid reasons, but that was one of the consequences. We did hear all the witnesses. The committee split into subcommittees to hear testimony. Questioning was full and we received a good reaction from the public.

As far as the recommendations of the committee were concerned, the report took a little longer, I think because members decided to be extraordinarily careful. Some sixty recommendations were made. I will not go into the subject matter of the recommendations; I think that would be irrelevant.

The question now is why we are extending the Bank Act for one year. There will be some rather difficult consequences. There will be competition from foreign banks and uncertainty on the part of Caisses Populaires. There will be delay in the setting up of the proposed Canada payments association. There will be some difficulty with regard to some Caisses Populaires and credit unions. There will be other uncertainties which have not been resolved. The Senate report and the report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs each have about 60 recommendations, in addition to which some time before Christmas the government presented some 70 technical amendments.

Some of them were not so technical, but the bill has to go back to square one, and even if the committees had reported in mid-February there was no way the government could have considered the two reports. I do not think the Minister of Finance has a closed mind on this subject, but whichever government carries out the redrafting of the Bank Act will have to consider the recommendations of the committee of the other House and ours on the subject, what the act should contain and particularly certain definitions which will have some rather far-reaching consequences. All this will entail some deep rethinking. Once the thinking has been completed there will have to be legal drafting and translation. Then there will be the introduction of a bill and debate at second reading, which there has not been in this House.

If there were to be a second reading debate on a bank bill in this House, I am sure it would be long and wide-ranging because every member of this House feels that he is the most inspired critic of the banking system, depending, of course, on when he had his last conversation with his favourite bank manager about the size of his overdraft. Then there would have to be consideration in committee. That consideration would not necessarily entail public hearings, but there were public hearings with respect to the previous proposed revision.

The Canadian Bankers' Association represents those organizations most affected, and it made appearances. I think perhaps there were some others, but the list was much smaller than on previous occasions. After the committee stage there would be a report stage. The previous bill was some 360 pages long and affected five different acts. In fact, it set up one new act, the proposed Canadian payments association act.

There would have been no way within six weeks of sitting time, even if we had dedicated all our sitting time to consideration of the Bank Act, that we would have concluded our business in time, passed the bill at third reading, had it go to the other place for consideration and had it in place in time for the banks to take the necessary positions so that as of April 1 they could have carried on business. That was just not in the cards, and in this regard I am glad to see that the government has not chosen, for example, October 1 next, but instead April 1, 1980. I think that is a realistic date under any circumstances because consideration of the Bank Act will have to fit in with many other matters which have to come before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Once being seized of a matter a committee cannot set it aside or have part of its membership consider other matters.

I had to laugh at the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) today when he alleged that the opposition House leader reeled under the shock of his observations. The man who is most responsible for the horse and buggy pace of this House with regard to legislation is the present Deputy Prime Minister. Since 1976 he has consistently refused to refer certain matters of procedure which Mr. Speaker has indicated should be considered and on which there has been general agreement on both sides of the House that they should be put into practice at least for a trial period to see how they work. However, unless and until we get rid of the self-inflicted hair shirt constructed by the predecessor of the Minister of Finance when he was government House leader back in 1969 that standing committees consider legislation and estimates at the same time, there will be no way to consider legislation other than to go from the House to the standing committees.

The finance committee has its plate way overloaded, what with the estimates from five departments and, usually, not the majority share but a very large proportion of the legislation that comes before this chamber. Surely to goodness we have several options open to us to change the procedure whereby committees could be freed of the entanglements of a number of representations.

I will not go into the whole picture, but suffice it to say that we are working under a system that was thought to be copied from the British back in the 1960s. They carried it for a short while and then tossed it into the can because it was not worth it, and now they are well away from it. The same with this particular bill. I hope that if in due course we have to do this again, if we have to do it with other pieces of legislation that have sunset clauses or make a major impact in the House, we will have special legislative committees to deal with them. Members can move from committee to committee, but committees cannot move from committee to committee, nor can you shift legislation from committee to committee if there is an overloading.

All right, we have reached this point and the question is: Is it to be recommended to the House that the Quebec Savings Banks Act be extended to March 31, 1980? In my view it is and it always was. Even when I participated with the then parliamentary secretary to the minister of finance in setting the date of March 31, 1979, I was told that I did not think it was being realistic. I admit that, like everyone else, I was expecting an election in the interval. We set this date over a year ago and I expected there would be an election but that we would take care of the situation by an extension of the bill in the interval. The events overtook the calendar.

I am not going to fault the present minister. I will say there were two reasons. First of all, I think the former minister, Mr. Turner, was unwise, or it was unfortunate that he was unsuccessful if he tried to convince his colleagues to set up a royal commission on banking. Second, I would fault the minister's predecessor, Mr. Macdonald, the former member for Rosedale, in that he refused in 1976 or the beginning of 1977 to refer the contents of the green paper to the committee on some imagined ground that there would be a possibility of two debates. I am sure there would not have been. It would have shortened the debate and we would have cleared away a lot of the underbrush; and who knows, at this time we might already have had a new Bank Act on the way to being implemented, one that is in position for the banks to carry on. It seems to me it is as clear as that.

I will not hassle any particular person while using the benefits of 20-20 hindsight, but I am going to say that my colleagues on the finance committee worked endlessly from Monday nights all the way through to Friday mornings sitting three and four sessions a day on Tuesday and Thursday and Wednesday afternoons, in order to accommodate the testimony of the interested public, and particularly to consider the massive material and to formulate the recommendations they have made.

I was glad to co-operate with them and to work with them, and I know the same may be said of the other place. You develop a sort of kinship and the satisfaction of working with your colleagues on both sides of the House to achieve a document which was unanimous in so far as those persons present and voting for its acceptance were concerned. It was a genuine effort at consensus.

I will say this: We are not going to claim that we are the greatest geniuses in the world—some of our provisions can be criticized by any number of people, depending upon their vested interests and their particular viewpoint—but, on the other hand, considering it from here, within our time limitation I think we can be justifiably proud of the work done by many of our colleagues, those who were there regularly as well as those who came sporadically to fill in and to make special contributions when they were particularly interested; and the same may be said of those on the government side.

Similarly, we worked well over a year on the revision of the Income Tax Act. Members develop, I think, the quality that is required by intelligent individuals who are out to achieve a certain purpose in trying to put forward the best possible package for their colleagues to consider. This we hope we have done and we commend it to the government.

I do not want to go into any particular phase of the bill and I hope no one else will. At present the question is simply: Do we extend the Bank Act until March 31, 1980? To me that is the pertinent subject. I hope we can do that and I am ready to go on to Bill C-38.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that the pertinent subject was whether or not we would extend the Bank Act for another year, he managed to spend considerable time talking about a number of other subjects, which he had every right to do because they related to the question of what is going on at the moment in the finance committee and the recommendations that have been made by that committee to the government on the Bank Act.

I want to indicate to the minister that we will not give him any trouble with the extension of the Bank Act, because we realize that the revisions to the Bank Act which have been recommended by the committee, and to which we in our party have taken exception and filed a minority report, will not, of course, be discussed in the short life which is left to this parliament. If I may say so, the shorter the life, the better, so far as we are concerned.

Be that as it may, I want to make some comments with respect to the recommendations of the committee on the Bank Act, to put on the record what are our objections to those recommendations and what are our concerns with respect to the policies of the government and the policies that have been recommended by the committee.

There are three principal objections that we have to the recommendations that have come forward from the committee. The first objection we have is that we do not agree with and do not accept the argument or the premise that foreign banks should be allowed to incorporate in Canada.

● (1600)

Our second major disagreement with the committee is that we do not think incorporation should take place outside of parliament. We think incorporation should continue to be something which is authorized by a special act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest the hon. member should return to the terms of the bill rather than the committee report.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, with great respect, I hope Your Honour will allow me exactly the same latitude allowed the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Our third concern respecting the policy in the Bank Act is that we are concerned banks should be seen as instruments of public policy. As such they should be required to make full disclosure and have limitations placed on their profits.

It seems to me these concerns are great. I do not want to take a lot of time debating them or their merits. I want simply to indicate to the government that it would not be possible to bring the Bank Act before parliament without my party exercising, by every means at its disposal, its opposition to those three principles.

We should have a democratic Bank Act, one concerned with the role of banks in the entire economic picture of the country. It should be concerned with guaranteeing the rights and controls of parliament. It should be concerned with the need for full disclosure of information, particularly in the area of foreign loans and loans to countries which are not democratic and are imposing great hardship on their citizens. These matters should be incorporated into the Bank Act. Also we are concerned deeply that the whole question of bank profits should be discussed and considered by the government. We know the limit on interest rates was abandoned in 1967, but since that time I suggest profits have gone too far.

When the government wants to get a piece of legislation through, for example Bill C-14, the unemployment insurance bill, it does not have a great deal of trouble marshalling the votes needed in committee. It is highly ironic. The government did not consult with anyone. It did not consult a number of witnesses. It did not have separate unions, each making a deputation to the committee and going through in great detail what their concerns were.

The government went through that report very quickly, but when it comes to legislation such as the Bank Act, the borrowers and depositors protection act or the competition bill, the government has failed to act. It should have brought in legislation in 1974 or earlier to deal with the problem of competition. It should have brought in legislation and stuck with it to provide information and protection to borrowers and depositors, the people taking out mortgages and loans. It should have provided protection and information on being able to pay off loans and mortgages early without paying an extra sum or penalty fee to the banks or trust companies in question. That type of legislation for the protection of Canadian consumers admittedly would have cost the banks and financial institutions some money and trouble. A competition bill would not have been to the liking of our large corporations because it would have broken some of them up and forced them to compete with each other, something they are not used to. But that type of legislation does not get the attention of the government. It does not get the drive and determination of the government. It does not get the determination of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The government is prepared to listen to objections, concerns, deputations, and to be lobbied, compromised, whittled away and whittled down so that there is no competition bill before the House at the present time. Also there is no borrowers and depositors protection act or a democratic bank act at the present time. When the government wants to get legislation through which affects the little people in the country, it can do it as quickly as it wants and it does it as quickly as it wants. It imposes closure and everything else. But when it comes to matters affecting the financial institutions, the government dawdles, delays and meanders its way through the legislation, and there is no clear indication of its public policy and determination.

The government is making a major mistake. It has allowed itself to avoid some very important political and economic questions and decisions which would work to the advantage of Canadian consumers. We are concerned about the Bank Act currently before the committee. We have a minority report which the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) filed. It is before the House and the press. The government knows our concerns. I do not think our concerns are limited to my party; I am sure they are the concerns of others.

There is not a consensus in the country to allow foreign banks to take over. Certainly there is not a consensus to allow banks to withhold critical information and not be subject to profit controls, particularly when it is known that their profits last year were $1 billion. A good deal of the reason for the massive increase in profits simply is the spread banks have been allowed to charge their customers, the difference they have been allowed to collect between the Bank of Canada rate and the rate they are charging their customers. Something should be done about that. Something should be done about the question of foreign ownership in Canada. The method proposed by the government will have the opposite effect.

Returning to Bill C-49, we are not opposed to the extension. If anything, we would like to see a longer extension because of the discussions which might be necessary to get the government to change its mind. We are concerned on behalf of the consumer about the lack of legislation in the financial field. We do not think the consumer has enough information or protection when he goes to a bank or trust company. We do not think there is enough competition in the Canadian marketplace to give the consumer the sovereignty he deserves. The government has had five years to act, but it has not produced the type of legislation which will protect consumers. Now it comes to us and says that it needs another year to revise the Bank Act. The government has a lot to learn. The economic questions, the questions facing Canadian consumers, are most important ones. It is time for the government to come home, to look at these problems and give them the attention and the commitment that they require.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as I said this afternoon during the debate on the business of the House, I do not want to delay unduly consideration of the various bills that the government wishes to put forward in this place. However, Bill C-49 which is now before us is the exact replica of other measures requesting the extension of the Bank Act for another year which were presented to us in 1977. I remember there was a debate at that time. Finally, the bill was adopted and the Bank Act was extended for a year.

In 1978, the government introduced another measure, Bill C-16, to extend the act for a specific period through clause 1(6) which reads:

(a) if parliament sits on at least twenty days during the month of March, 1979,—

We are now in March, 1979—

—the bank may carry on the business of banking until the first day of April, 1979, and no longer;

Subsection (b) reads as follows:

If parliament does not sit on at least twenty days during the month of March, 1979, the bank may carry on the business of banking until the sixtieth sitting day of parliament next thereafter, and no longer.

Mr. Speaker, I imagine that with Bill C-49 the government is giving notice to the House that parliament will sit on at least twenty days during the month of March, 1979, and that, consequently, it must introduce a bill to extend the Bank Act in our country. Mr. Speaker, the content of Bill C-49 is strangely similar to that of Bill C-16 which the House passed in 1978. It contains exactly the same provisions, which means that the chartered banks could keep operating whether parliament is dissolved or not.

Mr. Speaker, it will come as a surprise to no one that the member for Bellechasse objects to the powers chartered banks are given to translate into money the nation's credit. I find it extraordinary that we should have on top of the public monetary system, a parallel monetary system. If this sort of thing can go on, it is simply because Canadians are not aware of the way our monetary system operates in Canada, which is not surprising.

About a week ago, I met a brave 59-year old public servant who works at Statistics Canada and has always dealt with figures. I will not name him, even if I remember his name, but he told me this: How is it that, at 59 years of age, I still do not know exactly the nature and the operation of our monetary system, why the dollar exists? He is not the only one, Mr. Speaker. A great many Canadians get up in the morning to go to work and earn dollars. They do not ask themselves, during the day, who created the dollar. But still it was created somewhere, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian dollar had its origin neither in heaven nor in hell; it was created somewhere and it is important to understand its role. Some hon. members, who may have nothing better to say, will think and say, in jest: "Ah! those social crediters always think and talk in terms of dollars".

Mr. Speaker, at my age, with all the years I have behind me, I can prove that as a Canadian citizen I have not worked only for money. The large family that I gave to my country, the acres of land that I cleared for cultivation so they would produce to feed the population of my country clearly show that for my part I did not work only for money. I must however admit that the monetary system of my country has a role to play, and this system, and this is a great matter of concern for me, should be under the sole jurisdiction of our government through its institutions. I have never accepted, Mr. Speaker, and I do not accept today that the credit of our country should be controlled by private institutions for their own benefit and that we, Canadians, should be left to fare as best we can by borrowing right and left at excessive interest rates. We are burdening our children with many years of debt to pay for the services that we need today when they will themselves have to pay for other services in 30, 40 or 50 years.

Where are we going, Mr. Speaker? The Canadian parliament must ask this question. I shall try to answer it, and if I am wrong, since we are 264 members of parliament, there will certainly be someone intelligent enough among the 263 others to show me why I am wrong. Mr. Speaker, the credit of the nation is created by someone. First of all, what does the word credit mean? This is important. Before laughing at those who use this word, we should first try to understand what is the real credit of the nation. Who creates it? Mr. Speaker, to my mind, the word credit comes from a latin word which means "I believe, I have confidence".

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I have confidence that a sufficient number of my fellow citizens are able through their work and their intelligence to produce the things I need for myself and my dependants. Their credit means that there is a large enough number of my fellow citizens able to produce the essential services that I and my dependants need, whether they are my wife, my children or others. I have confidence that our activities in general can produce the services required to meet my daily needs. Mr. Speaker, to my mind, this is what credit really means.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if that true credit is made up of our daily activities why could the government not have an institution capable of monetizing credit, making it tangible with dollars, so we can exchange those services and those things among ourselves? Why do we have to go and beg a private institution legally incorporated under a law of this parliament, the chartered banks legislation, allowing us under section 72 to monetize the credit of this country?

● (1620)

The rest of the Bank Act I do not quarrel with. Mr. Speaker, banks operate very smoothly. They keep exemplary accounting. They have extraordinary employees. Indeed, I have a son-in-law who is the manager of a branch in one of our banks and is doing a great job. He earns his living like everyone else and I am proud of him. I never discuss his work, Mr. Speaker. As far as the present legislation is concerned, he is like everyone else working, he is part of the system. It is not people that I quarrel with. It is the system. Mr. Speaker, it is with the discretionary power the chartered banks of this country are given. What does section 72 say? I would like all Canadians to remember that extraordinary power. I will quote so as not to make any mistake: cash and secondary reserves. It means the law determines that banks have to keep in cash and secondary reserves at the Bank of Canada a quantity of bank notes as safeguard. Section 72(1) says:

> The bank shall maintain a cash reserve in the form of notes of, and deposits in Canadian currency with, the Bank of Canada, and such reserve shall be not less on the average during any month than an amount equal to
> (a) twelve per cent of such of its deposit liabilities as are payable on demand in Canadian currency; and
> (b) four per cent of such of its deposit liabilities as are payable after notice in Canadian currency.

Mr. Speaker, that is the law as it stands. The purpose of Bill C-49 is to determine whether we are going to continue to maintain that discretionary power to create money. It does not matter if it is just figures in a deposit account with chequing privileges.

This week with my colleagues I met young people from the Canadian Forum, students from all parts of the country. I was invited, like my colleagues, to make a speech before them. I was invited to tell them if I really believe that the Parliament of Canada controls the administration of our country. Honestly, I had to tell them that, unfortunately, the Parliament of Canada does not control the administration of my country because of the fact that, as we know, there are three official powers under our constitution, but there is also another power, a super power that is not our constitution but that transcends the three powers that I shall enumerate. First, the legislative power, we the 264 elected representatives assembled in this House. We are here to legislate, to pass laws that will guide our action, the action of Canadians throughout the country and our day to day activities so that we shall respect each other and not be deprived of our rights by the abuses of others. This is what is called the legislative power.

To implement the measures passed by the legislative power, an executive power is obviously needed. We cannot all be part of it. So the executive includes the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), one of the senior ministers, who is particularly responsible for matters directly concerning our pocketbooks and this is why we call him Minister of Finance. And there are other ministers, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott), responsible for the implementation of legislation and for taking in our pocketbooks the money needed to implement the laws passed by the Parliament of Canada. He is responsible for the implementation of those laws at the national revenue level. His name is not important. Then the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) responsible for the implementation of laws passed by this parliament to allow each Canadian to benefit from social legislation, old age security and welfare in co-operation with the provinces. This is why it is called the executive. There is also the judiciary responsible for ensuring a standard of justice in the administration of laws. And if an individual, if a Canadian considers that his rights have been infringed upon he is entitled to go before the courts and, until now, I have confidence in the integrity of our courts and the administration of justice.

There might sometimes be offences about which no truly proper decision can be made because there is no evidence. It is also human that there might be decisions which are not entirely faultless. It is not for me to mention particular cases, Mr. Speaker, but I must say that I have confidence in the judiciary, and I consider it my duty to say so. But on top of all that, something which is not provided for in the constitution, there is a super power that I call the monetary super power, and that super power does not care about our constitution, it does not care about anything we might say in this House, because it is completely above any legislation we might adopt, it does not care about the constitution and what we might think, just as a bandit does not care about the law.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I say that Bill C-49 to extend the Bank Act is very important. I do not want to blame anybody, but I do not understand why it does not attract more interest, because it is the key. I would like to prove what I am saying. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, when I am finished I would ask that the table I have in my hand be included in today's record. I would be very pleased, but it is your decision. According to the act presently in force, according to section 72—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Does the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) have permission to include in today's Hansard the document to which he is referring?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered.

[Editor's note: The document referred to above is as follows:]

Albert goes to the bank to make a $1,000 cash deposit. He is immediately credited $1,000. The bank legally can make the immediate operations that follow. It lends $880 to John against a promissory note or in the form of a line of credit, after setting aside a $120 cash reserve (12 per cent on $1,000). Those $120 will serve as liquid legal reserves with the Bank of Canada to guarantee the $880 loan made to John.

LET US CARRY ON THE PROCESS OF CREDIT EXPANSION:

Operation No.	Cash	Per cent reserve	Legal reserve with Bank of Canada	Credit legally available for lending	Bank asset	Per cent interest	Interest	Total profit (principal + interest)
	$	%	$	$	$	%	$	$
1					1000.00
2	1000.00	12	120.00	880.00	880.00	13	114.40	994.40

Since on $0.04 the bank would make no more profit, it is assumed it would not go any further than that amount.
Total interests collected: $732.85
Total gross profit, principal + interest: $8240.47
Net profit (gross profit less 9 per cent interest paid on deposits: $743.96) $7496.51
The $1000 therefore were expanded by a $7507.62 amount bringing profits to people not owning it!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I wish to thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and also all my colleagues for allowing me to include this table.

This table is questionable, yet it was prepared with honest intentions and if they can prove that I am mistaken, I then agree. Yet, as shown in this document, Mr. Speaker, if I go to the bank to deposit $1,000 in bank notes, like the one I have right here, created by the Bank of Canada because the other banks in Canada are not allowed to print them any more, only the Bank of Canada has this privilege. Then, if I go to the bank, it does not matter which one, and if I deposit $1,000 in bank notes, according to the law, the bank must deposit in its legal reserves at the Bank of Canada the amount of $120 and it may immediately create a deposit of $880 for another Canadian. Therefore, the bank would pay interest on the $1,000 I have deposited and it will receive interest on the $880 deposit that the law allows it to create.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. Chrétien: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. Minister of Finance on a point of order.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I see that the hon. member has with him the document to which he refers. According to the Standing Orders of this House, he must table this document. Maybe he should also table his $10?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am most happy with the reaction of the Minister of Finance. I have had to make sacrifices in my life, when I needed these $10 and did not have them, when as a child I had to buy a three-cent stamp in order to be able to mail a letter to my mother and did not even have that much money, even though I was working 16 hours a day. Today, thanks to Providence, which has enabled me to come and sit in this House to speak out before my country in its highest forum, what I feel and what I wish for the future of our young generation, if the Minister of Finance wishes me to table my $10 bill with my document, I will agree to his requet and I would also like the bank note serial number to be recorded for posterity.

Mr. Speaker, why am I saying that? It is because we have reached a turning point in our history and that we find ourselves in a rather disturbing situation. Today, I was reading this article and I could perhaps table it but I will not ask for that because I would not want to try your patience, Mr. Speaker. I will just quote from the La Presse of March 22.

Portfolio managers do not know where to invest their money.

These people have problems with money because they just have too much of it. They do not know where to invest it. Yet on the other side the Minister of Finance is worried by a lack of capital needed to run our economy. He calls on the Japanese, the Swiss, the Germans. Yet, those Germans, who are people whom I like, were precisely those same people who were defeated twice, during World War I when I had members of my family fighting on the battlefields; these Germans who were again defeated during the last world war. They have finally been defeated and Canada participated with the allies in that war, which means that we won. But how come then, if we were among the victors, how come we have to kneel down before the vanquished in order to get loans, in order that they grant us the means to go on administering the country?

Mr. Speaker, those are questions we must very seriously consider. I am not accusing anyone in particular, neither this government nor the governments before, but we must absolutely think about this. Bill C-49 gives us an opportunity to fully consider, at the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, all the provisions of Bill C-15, Bill C-57 and another, the number of which I do not know, when it is put forward again.

Mr. Speaker, if this question was not important, Bill C-57 would have passed last year. Bill C-15 would now be ready for reporting by the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic matters. The members of that committee, however, are tremendous, and I commend them for that. They study the bill clause by clause, whether to consider allowing foreign banks to establish subsidiaries in Canada, which committee members are not ready to do—and I am in a position to know since I am a member of that committee—they are not ready to allow everything without a good look. All members of the committee—and the interim report that has been presented will prove it—want to be absolutely sure, as members of the House and as members of the parliamentary committee, that not one recommendation in that report will have been made without due consideration.

Mr. Speaker, we must get off the beaten path. I propose to prepare a minority report. Perhaps hon. members will find that funny and will not take it too seriously. But we ought to be careful. Other people will be here when we are gone. Other people will read our decisions. They will analyse our debates and if we cannot take our responsibilities and propose basic amendments to Bill C-15 or to any other bill that will follow, we will be recognized as people who have been unable to assume responsibility.

Sometimes Canadians ask us "What do you propose to do?" So I tell them, as my leader, Mr. Caouette, has said so often in the House, that it is high time that the Canadian government gave our national bank—I see that my colleague over there is listening to me very carefully; actually, I am convinced that he shares our view—the Bank of Canada, the sole responsibility for cashing the nation's credit, that the chartered banks be called upon to ask the directors of the Bank of Canada for the necessary credits to serve the public sector, and that the Bank of Canada serve the needs of the public sector, with an accountability very similar to what it now has. I know that some frivolous people will say that will create inflation.

Mr. Speaker, what is the difference between putting $50 million in circulation through loans from the private bank system or through the Bank of Canada? What is the difference? The government and the departments could agree to reimburse the loans at a given annual interest rate and that rate would certainly be lower that what we are paying now. That has to be said time and time again, maybe some will say: You are always repeating the same thing. That is true! That is because we have a good memory. That is because we believe in the philosophy we advocate. The sun rises every morning. When it does not, when it is cloudy, people get concerned. It always does the same thing. I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) smiling. I know that deep down he is saying to himself: That guy is not all that stupid. I am telling things as they are.

Mr. Speaker, I wish that for once we could stand up and analyse our banking system. I ask the Minister of Finance, who is present and whom I respect, that he consider seriously, with his advisers, introducing an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act so that this institution can play its true role as maker of the currency in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to note that Canadians can produce everything that is reported in statistics or earned in the gross national production of Canada, but we are too stupid to design a tool to measure values and exchanges so that we are compelled to borrow abroad. I asked some young people this week at a Canadian forum what was the difference between a $10 bill and a $2 bill. They replied intelligently that the figure 2 appears on the $2 bill and the figure 10 appears on the $10 bill. This is all the difference. They are only figures that appear on coins, bank notes and cheques. Our entire monetary system in Canada is made up of figures. There is certainly a serious shortage of figures in Canada if we have to borrow figures abroad and pay stupid interests on them.

Mr. Speaker, this is what I wanted to suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I know he is a very busy man. The devaluation of the dollar which would be one of the consequences of the Social Credit system would lower the value of the Canadian dollar, according to us. I know he is concerned about inflation, another consequence of the system suggested by my party. If the Social Credit Party of Canada assumed power, we would experience inflation and the dollar would devaluate. If our system advocated the distribution of a better credit system in our country, there would be unemployment. We have unemployment, devaluation of the dollar and inflation, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to be spiteful because I know the Minister of Finance has enough problems. However, in all frankness, I would like to ask him at least to consider seriously our proposals and with his officials to try by all possible means to implement them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think there is unanimous consent to amend the motion so that Bill C-49, an act to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be now read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I agree, Mr. Speaker, and I will cut my remarks short precisely to allow for the passing of this bill at all stages. But in concluding I would ask the Minister of Finance whether he would readily accept, at least to consider very earnestly, all the proposals we have put forward so that we might come to an agreement with a view to monetizing the credit of Canadians and put them all to work so that all those who are idle today may contribute with their energy and talent to increase our gross national product, which would be needed to put ourselves in a better position with regard to world trade and the countries competing with us now.

Mr. Speaker, I have made those remarks in all sincerity, just as I now appeal with all my heart to the Minister of Finance so that at long last serious consideration might be given this matter in coming months, and the next parliament might be truly composed of representatives who are bent upon attacking a regime which makes its authority felt throughout the land instead of serving the people.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, March 19, 1979, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie (for the Minister of Finance):

That Bill C-38, to amend the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I was speaking when the debate was adjourned at ten o'clock last Monday night. I wanted to come back to a particular point in that bill, more specifically clause 16. Now, if hon. members are willing to consider one aspect of the bill, I do not know what the subject will be of the order to be made on clause 15, but with regard to clause 16 we do know what I was opposed to, as well as my colleagues as I said the other night: that is, one of the provisions of Bill C-42, the act on the allocation of energy resources in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I shall be coming back to this over and over again, that is, to that particular point, and I shall take the government House leader to task on this point. We get closure more and more often.

[English]

I am glad to see that the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has entered the House because my remarks in this instance will be addressed to him. I want to tell him that notwithstanding his jocular attitude this afternoon there is one aspect of his leadership of this House which is absolutely regrettable, which is a total minus quantity. As I said earlier this afternoon, it concerns procedures and changes of structure in this House required for the consideration not only of legislation but a variety of other matters.

For instance, there is the matter of the adjournment debate upon which there is agreement. There are a number of other areas where there is total agreement. Either through lack of vigilance or through lack of militancy the government House leader has failed to respond. I hear the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) say "lack of time". No. There would be no debate on the matter; there would be agreement. But the committee has not met except to elect its executive, since 1977. I have been twice elected as vice-chairman. I have been chairman of that committee. The former member for Eglington has been chairman. The present minister for intergovernmental relations is the last chairman of that committee. I maintain that the committee should be meeting regularly to receive suggestions from hon. members, from the Chair and from the leadership with regard to the rules and practices of this House. To date it has been as worthwhile as that proverbial army which gets paraded up and down, up and down and cannot fight worth a damn. It has done absolutely nothing.

The hon. member may ask what this has to do with Bill C-38. Well, it has to do with this damned fool provision in the statute which deals with a negative resolution. I remember that when the hon. John Turner was minister of justice, before he became minister of finance, he brought down the act dealing with statutory instruments. We then saw for the first time the definition of affirmative and negative resolutions and the procedures for enabling them to be dealt with in this House or the other place. It was stated then that we would soon amend our procedures. That was over seven years ago.

So with Bill C-42, we get closure by statute. We are allowed five hours of debate when dealing with a negative resolution. Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough, and notwithstanding that we are being offered a 3 per cent reduction in federal sales tax, I would personally be prepared to vote against this bill on that ground alone because I think it makes a travesty of the proceedings of the House. I hold the government House leader totally responsible, because a long time ago a reference should have been made to the committee on this subject and the necessary procedural changes made so as to allow parliament to be master of its own rules. Here we are being told we must behave in the House according to a statute, and to my mind that is totally wrong.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

CANADIAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds) moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all minutes of meetings, telegrams and letters having to do with any negotiations between the Department of the Secretary of State and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews for the years 1976, 1977 and 1978.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on January 24 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Daudlin) advised the House that the correspondence and documents which I had requested and which give details of negotiations, etc., about public grants between the government and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews was, and I quote "too voluminous and would be inordinately time consuming and costly to prepare". I was absent on that date and I therefore extend my thanks to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) for requesting that my motion be transferred for debate, because there is obviously a difference of opinion on the matter.

At the outset I wish to make it absolutely clear that I am in full agreement with the aims and principles of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, an organization which had a very distinguished record under one of its former and very distinguished presidents, Dr. Richard Jones. I should emphasize that this is not the same man as, nor is he any relation to, Mr. Peter Jones, to whom I may refer in the course of my remarks and who has just resigned as president of the council.

It is a mystery to me why the government should seek to hide from public view a legitimate request for information concerning a matter which involves the expenditure of public money. In the last year alone this amounts to about three-quarters of a million dollars. How could such documents be so time consuming to produce? How could copies of such documents be so costly to prepare? I can only view this as a method of trying to cover up something which the government does not want made public. I can only view it as an attempt by the government to whitewash whatever it is that it does not want people to know. If this was not true, then the government would simply say to the House at the conclusion of my remarks today that it is quite prepared to produce all these documents on this matter in order to clear the air completely as a result of the numerous questions which have been asked.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) recently answered some questions I have had on the order paper since October 18 of last year, and in answer to question No. 294 he certainly severely misled the House—although I am absolutely certain it was not intentional on his part—when he stated, and I quote: "The accounts of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews are, of course, audited annually by the council's own auditors".

According to information I have, that is a complete misstatement of fact. To prove this, I draw attention to a copy of a letter which I have in my possession written by Yale and Partners, auditors for the city of Toronto. I think only one sentence of this letter needs to be read: "We have examined the combined balance sheet of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews". Therefore, the Secretary of State was wrong in saying that a full audit was conducted; there is certainly a tremendous difference between the examination of a balance sheet and a full audit. I think the minister well knows that fact.

I am surprised that the government should try to make political capital out of the fact that a member of the opposition questions the expenditure of public money, since that really is one of the many and very important reasons we are here in this House. The Secretary of State has sought to distort the entire issue through such means as issuing a press release containing incorrect information and, in effect, trying to paint me as someone who is besmirching public servants and who also apparently is opposed to Christians and Jews. I do not intend to tolerate and do not think any member should tolerate such uncalled for nonsense.

Here I would like to set the record straight on one point. An unfortunate error appeared in a Canadian Press story dated, I believe, February 28, 1979, which stated that I said outside this House that certain members of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews had paid kickbacks to members of the Department of the Secretary of State in order to receive grants. I did not at any time make such a statement with regard to members or the executive of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. On being advised of this error in the Canadian Press story, I immediately asked that a correction be made.

I admit that I did demand on that date—and I still do—an examination, an investigation and an audit by the Auditor General of Canada with regard to this whole affair. I did state that in my view the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews should welcome such an audit in view of the allegations of kickbacks which were flying around Parliament Hill, so that the air could be thoroughly cleared for all concerned. This is far different from the unfortunate report attributed to me that members of the council were supposedly committing illegal acts or engaging in illegal activities which, as far as I know, is absolutely not the case.

My request for a correction in the Canadian Press story stands as a matter of record. That request was made to the local representative of the Canadian Press in Brockville, Ontario, to the desk editor in the city of Toronto and to officials at its bureau here in Ottawa. As a result of the questions I raised and as a result of pressure from other sources as well, the government agreed to what the Secretary of State called an independent audit which, I understand, has been going on for a few days. I find it extremely strange that the minister has been unable to answer my order paper question or to make public by means of a statement the name of the auditing firm which is conducting the audit, which is supposed to be independent. I find it extremely strange also that the facilities of the Auditor General of Canada were apparently not used.

What does the Secretary of State think such an audit will show? Surely he does not think it will provide an answer to the questions I have raised in the House and which have been raised by many persons elsewhere as well. For example, I refer to outstanding order paper question No. 1,295 which I placed to obtain answers which will certainly not be shown in any audit and which are very pertinent to this case.

For the record, I would like briefly to paraphrase some of these questions. Did any directors receive bonus payments from the council at any time in the last three years, and did such payments come from government funds? What were the amounts of the cheques issued, who received them and what were they for? I have been told that they came directly from government grants and were supposedly for overtime work performed in connection with Open House Canada. Why did Air Canada issue a pass to Mr. Peter Jones, the ex-president of the council who resigned a week or two ago?

In case there is any doubt in this regard, I would like to quote from a letter, a copy of which I have on my desk, dated June 6, 1978, addressed to his colleagues, in which Mr. Peter Jones said: "Once again I would like to attend each regional annual meeting and have been assured that I can have an Air Canada free pass in order to do this.". Is it the policy of this government to give out free Air Canada passes to all charitable organizations, just to certain charitable organizations or just to this particular charitable organization?

Why did Peter Jones recently resign as president of the council? I would like to quote from a letter written by him, dated January 28, 1978, and addressed to all regional directors. I have a copy of this letter on my desk as well. It contains the following paragraph:

> I am frankly unhappy that it could be said of us that the council and its staff are taking money from the federal government and doing nothing in return. No question that we have done everything that we could. Legally we are in the right. Morally I am not so sure.

What is the moral principle of which Mr. Peter Jones is not so sure? Why were such prominent Canadians as John Fisher, Joel Aldred, Alex Geddes and others thrown off the executive of the council, and why was the Ottawa regional office suddenly abolished overnight?

Referring to Mr. Geddes, a very respected businessman in the city of Toronto, I would like to quote from a letter dated January 26, 1979, to Messrs. Lockwood and Ronson, co-chairmen of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. I have a copy of this letter on my desk as well. In doing so, I point out that Mr. Geddes was a member not only of the executive committee but a member of the finance committee of that organization. Here is one paragraph:

● (1710)

You may recall that I was concerned about financial control, not only of the day to day operations with reference to the cost of programs, TV commercials and other activities, but especially the proper control and full accounting of the various government grants that have been received by the council in the last two years. I still don't know the total of funds received from government grants, but would guess it is somewhere in the order of $750,000. I think proper reports should be made regarding the use of each grant.

Here is another paragraph:

I was also concerned about the capital reserve of $950,000 that the council had two or three years ago. What is the amount of this reserve today and what happens to the interest income from it?

Incidentally, speaking of that capital reserve, I have a copy of a financial statement issued by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews which shows that this reserve of $950,000 had, for some unexplained reason, diminished as of November 8 of last year to $746,000. Obviously some of this money could have come from government grants and I cannot see why the Secretary of State should object to the asking of such obvious questions.

It could also be asked of the Secretary of State why he seems so totally unconcerned that the balance sheet of the council dated September 30, 1978, did not show the amount of money received from the Government of Canada—in other words, the taxpayers of Canada; nor does it show how it was dispensed, despite the fact that the sum involved, by the Secretary of State's own admission in answer to an order paper question of mine, ran to $767,000 in 1978 and $304,000 in 1977.

Mr. Peter Jones had admitted that he received a 4.5 per cent mortgage on his home from the council expiring May 13, 1981, and a loan reported to be interest-free in excess of $9,000 also received from the council. I have asked the legitimate question, which the Secretary of State has so far refused to answer, as to whether such funds came from government grants. Perhaps he cannot answer the question if all government grants go into the same bank account as other grants, because then any amounts removed for any purpose from those accounts such as those I have named would be partially public funds; and I believe that under the circumstances it should not be the intention of any government to donate money for a specific project that even in part ends up financing a home or a loan for a private individual.

Why has the Secretary of State refused to confirm or deny that a meeting of regional directors of the council was held in Toronto last year at which the president, Mr. Peter Jones, instructed regional directors present on ways he thought they could avoid paying income tax to the Government of Canada on bonuses or on honorariums received? If this happened, it is reprehensible on the part of the government to ignore it. And why have such men as Gerry Yanover, legislative assistant to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), Paul Hellyer, journalist Max Keeping and numerous others severed their connections with this organization?

No, Mr. Speaker, the audit being conducted will not show the answer to these questions. It will be a whitewash covering up errors on the part of the government of a most serious nature, and perhaps to some extent a cover up which may have been, not dishonesty, but bad management on the part of Peter Jones, president of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

I would also like to mention that the CBC taped an interview with me and William White of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews which was scheduled for broadcasting on Monday, March 5, a week or two ago. This broadcast was never allowed on the air and I was offered the flimsiest excuses by the CBC as to why the broadcast did not go on as scheduled. Surely the Secretary of State, whose department is directly responsible for the CBC, had nothing to do with censorship of this kind, and I would ask him to give a full explanation to the House in this regard.

In the past few days a Mr. Dennis Flack has been in Ottawa on different occasions claiming to represent the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. I might mention he is a former paid employee of the Liberal Party of Canada. I have been told by various sources, including members of parliament, that he has been attempting to call on both MPs and members of the cabinet. I understand, for example, that he did manage to see the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid) who, incidentally, raised this whole subject on the order paper before I did a year or more ago and before he was made a minister, and it is interesting to note that his own government would not even answer him. I do not object to Mr. Flack exercising the democratic right of lobbying, but it brings up the point as to who paid his expenses when he was here. I believe the Secretary of State should investigate this as well.

Referring back to the reported meeting in Toronto last year where Mr. Jones allegedly instructed regional directors on how to avoid paying income tax, I wonder if the Secretary of State is willing to determine from the Department of National Revenue whether the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews issued T-4 slips for such sums of money before the required deadline of February 28. I have been told that such slips were not issued, and while this may or may not be correct, I certainly think it should be clarified.

In conclusion, I feel there is no justification for the government not to agree now, in the absence of the Secretary of State, to having whoever is representing him here in the House rise and state that the government has had a change of heart and that all documents, correspondence and anything pertaining to the negotiations between the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and the Government of Canada in regard to government grants be made public; in other words, that the original request which I made on the order paper be granted. Surely the Secretary of State, who is usually a reasonable man, or his representative will now rise and offer to clear the air by allowing the necessary documents to be made public without further delay and in the interests of all concerned.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest this afternoon to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) in the hope that he might do something more than the left-handed attempt to extricate himself from the innuendo and subterfuge which he used to taint both the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and the Department of the Secretary of State in this matter.

It would only be appropriate if I pointed out to members of the House the method whereby this matter has come forward. The hon. member opposite has become expert in raising this matter on a number of occasions by motions under Standing Order 43, implying thereby that something terrible was happening and making unsubstantiated and unsupported allegations that something terrible was happening, but not following them up with any question, notwithstanding the fact that following these motions under Standing Order 43 there were periods of weeks in which the hon. member had the occasion to follow up on these allegations and put questions. But no questions were put, leaving the innuendoes and the allegations to be picked up by the public at large with no opportunity being given to answer them.

I sat here on a number of occasions in the absence of my minister hoping and waiting for the hon. member to rise in his place and put his money where his mouth is by asking questions which I would have been prepared to answer. But the questions never came. What was left was innuendo and the suggestion that something must be wrong. Again today the hon. member stood in his place and suggested that all kinds of things must be happening because he has not had a response to his questions.

● (1720)

On January 24 I rose in my place and indicated that there would have to be substantial costs, time and effort beyond what should be reasonable to answer a question of this type. The hon. member indicated that he was not satisfied and implied that there was something to be whitewashed and covered up. Now the hon. member says that the article was wrong. I assume this is the first time he has said this. I have seen no other occasions. I have seen nothing in Hansard. I assume this is the first time the hon. member has stood up and indicated publicly in the House that in fact the newspaper article was wrong. He has left from the time of the newspaper article until now the impression that it was not wrong.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to point out that in this House I am not able to rise and correct newspapers. I can rise and correct Hansard but not newspapers.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes a point. I could research for him and provide documentation where on a number of occasions members from both sides of the House have used an opportunity in the House to rise and indicate that they have been misquoted outside the House. Surely the hon. member is not suggesting that that has not been done or the opportunity does not exist. Had the hon. member used the opportunity of a question or a motion under Standing Order 43 to suggest the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews in fact was being blamed for something they ought not be blamed for as a result of a misquote, I am sure all members of the House would have been happy to see him rise. But that did not happen.

I find it passing strange, after having disclaimed that he had made any allegations of kickback, that the hon. member would say immediately that the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews should have been anxious to respond to all the allegations going around on the hill that there had been kickbacks. By whom were they made if not by the hon. member? Yet the hon. member said that he did not say it. In the same article he is quoted as supposedly trying to disclaim that he had said anything but "Of course, I don't have any information". The hon. member has not disclaimed that it was true.

I suggest this procedure has been used very effectively by the member: to have no information, to have no background knowledge, but to make unsubstantiated allegations and then suggest through the smokescreen that something terrible must be happening.

In anticipation of the audit showing that everything was on the up and up and correctly done, the hon. member has sown seeds to suggest the audit will bring forward nothing. Even if it comes forward and proves there was no malfeasance and nothing to support the innuendo left by the hon. member, he is sowing seeds to suggest it will prove nothing, that it was a whitewash.

I respectfully suggest that almost from a sense of paranoia the hon. member thinks that not only is the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) against him, but also his agencies because they did not choose to use an interview between himself and some other person. It is ludicrous.

I and other members of the House find it particularly distressing that any hon. member should—and I use the word carefully—carelessly and with a self-confessed total lack of truth in effect vilify members of the public service. The hon. member is disclaiming now that he intended that, but it was the effect. He talked about cause and effect. That was the effect of what he left in the open press. Also it is distressing that he should vilify members of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews by making the allegations which he now disclaims.

On March 6 the Secretary of State told members that he had received a request by telegram from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, both protesting against the irresponsibility of these statements and asking that an independent audit be made of their activities so that it could be shown the allegations are baseless. It is on record that the council is doing what it can to dissociate itself from the type of allegations which have been made. In light of those requests and the immediate affirmative reaction by the Secretary of State, it should be obvious to all hon. members that the council is not only acting in good faith, but is satisfied its activities place it above this particularly odious type of suspicion. Of course, the audit will find that members of the Department of the Secretary of State at all times have carried on negotiations with the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews in an irreproachable manner. It will establish once and for all that the activities of the council are faultless regarding the use of government funds.

Despite the time and costs involved, research is being undertaken with all dispatch to provide ultimate proof that all parties are beyond reproach in this unfortunate incident. I should like to advise the hon. member that when the results are produced, and as they are being produced by the department for the independent audit, they will be made available to him.

They will be placed before the House, at which time I am satisfied all members will see they had just reason for having confidence not only in the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews but in the Secretary of State.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is upon motion No. 13 in the name of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps it is not a point of order, but I would like to congratulate the government on showing one of the few honest moves it has made in the House by being willing to make public information which should have been made public months ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, seeing that this matter has been concluded, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 5.29 p.m. the House took recess.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-38, to amend the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear an hon. member suggest that this bill should pass without further debate. He probably realizes, as do other members of the House, that more has been sneaked through in this bill than with most pieces of legislation. It is a complicated bill. The fact that we will deal with it in committee of the whole gives members an opportunity to deal with specific clauses. It is an omnibus type of bill that does a lot of things to a lot of people.

I want to deal with one clause tonight which concerns the implementation of an increased air transportation tax and ultimate conversion to user charges. We have here a classic example of the application of the user-pay concept without "user say". We have a situation where the airlines are being asked to pay for the services provided by the Department of Transport, some of which are required, some of which are extravagant, and some of which are not needed.

I do not think anyone would argue that airlines and passengers who use them should not pay for the realistic services and facilities provided. The government is asking for more than that, however. In effect it is asking the Canadian travelling public to pay for the mistakes of overbuilding and extravagance of many airport facilities in this country. The Air Transportation Association of Canada has argued for some time that they have not had any meaningful input with regard to the facilities they require. The Department of Transport builds without meaningful consultation and, as a result, there is a constant conflict of opinion about the services that are provided and the services that are needed, and who is to pay for them.

The Air Transport Association of Canada represents the vast majority of airlines in this country—85 per cent or 90 per cent of them. It states that they are the victims in this process and, by virtue of the fact that they are the victims, they have no choice but to hand the cost on to the public. They contend that they are the captive tenants of a monopolistic landlord. In a bulletin dated February 22, referring to the air transportation tax and its conversion to a user charge, the association had this to say:

Airline passengers in Canada will shortly be paying a tax which will be typically $15 per flight—

That is an increase from the $8 we presently pay—almost 100 per cent.

The bulletin continues:

—following the government's budget announcement that it would increase the present tax by nearly 100 per cent. This unwarranted and abusive treatment of the airline traveller has taken place at the same time as the Task Force on Tourism has strongly recommended government measures to reduce the cost of travel.

In addition to the monstrous increase in the tax, the government has stated its intention to convert the tax to a user charge to be levied upon the air carriers under the Aeronautics Act. The estimated yield of the new tax rate is approximately $150 million annually.

The major air carriers affected have carefully considered the matter and state they are unable to absorb such an amount into their cost base or their market expectations, and are therefore firmly opposed to the planned conversion of the tax.

The carriers will not willingly be parties to a conversion device which would hide from parliament and the public the consequences of the government's reluctance to pare the costs of the DOT bureaucracy and instead contribute significantly to further increases in air travel costs.

In essence, that lays the groundwork for the points I wish to cover tonight. This government has been on a building binge and now it wants to implement a scheme of cost recovery. It will collect from the carrier, but in turn the carrier will collect from the passenger. I contend that users should not have to pay for the grandiose schemes, the Taj Mahals, the overbuilding, and art work, and all the unnecessary frills included in today's modern terminal buildings.

We hear a lot about restraint, Mr. Speaker, but we have to ask ourselves whether restraint has been a part of the over-all managerial plan of the Department of Transport. When we look at the estimates we have to answer in the negative. No fat has been trimmed in the estimates of the Department of Transport, particularly in connection with air transport administration. The deputy minister of transport took a great deal of pride in saying that the detrimental effects on the continuing operations of the department were minimal, that there was very little disruption to the job security of Transport Canada employees.

We all remember that in the restraint program it was proposed that $200 million be shaved off the operations of DOT, some $130 million of which shows in cutbacks in program expenditure and $70 million of which is incorporated in this legislation. This is the first time a suggested saving has led to the imposition of a further tax.

The department has reduced the person-years requirements by a mere 87 persons for air administration. Some 13,000 person-years are involved in the operations of the air administration of the Department of Transport so we have not seen any real evidence of cutbacks in the operations of the air administration branch of the Department of Transport. Again I ask why the travelling public should have to pay for the failure of the administration to make reasonable cutbacks. We know there has been a growing bureaucracy. We know many of the programs could have been shaved, but why should the travelling public be asked to pay for the mismanagement of the department?

I should like to quote some passages from the 100th Annual Report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978. It contains an in-depth audit of the Department of Transport, and at page 503 there is the following statement:

Our audits disclosed serious deficiencies in the systems and procedures the department used in acquiring capital assets in the projects we examined. Five of the projects did not achieve a reasonable standard of 'due regard for economy.'

This is the conclusion of a person this House holds in high regard, whose integrity cannot be questioned, and who has done a very objective and in-depth analysis of the situation. Perhaps it is no wonder that in a rather unique statement, certainly not something one would be very proud of, the deputy minister of transport suggested the Auditor General stick to auditing rather than criticizing the department. He said that he warned the Auditor General. J. J. Macdonell, against claiming too much management .erritory. Deputy Minister Sylvain Cloutier said the Auditor General runs the risk of turning himself into a management consultant or adviser, rather than sticking to the job he is supposed to do—auditing.

One of the duties given to the Auditor General by this House was a mandate to examine whether public funds were being spent on behalf of the Canadian people having due regard to economy and efficiency. The Auditor General is clearly within his mandate in making those kinds of judgments and assessments. Someone has to protect the public purse. Parliament has lost control; the Auditor General pointed that out. The government has lost control. Surely we need someone who can examine in an objective way whether the principles of accounting and good management are adhered to. It is unfortunate that a senior public servant would lash out at a man who is attempting to protect the public purse and ensure that some of the deficiencies within the management and control systems of the Government of Canada are upgraded, improved, and made more effective.

The Auditor General identified several other serious deficiencies within the Ministry of Transport. I refer here to the capital cost overruns which he cited. Here again are clear examples of the failure of the Ministry of Transport to provide a reasonable standard of due regard for economy and efficiency. The construction of the Calgary airport is one example. Its costs escalated from $57 million to $127 million, which is two and a half times the original amount. The comments which the Auditor General made confirm my remarks that there has not been meaningful consultation with the people who will be using such terminals. At page 506 of his report, in reference to the Calgary International Airport the Auditor General stated as follows:

> The air carriers expressed strong reservations as to the immediate need for, and concern about the cost of, new terminal facilities.

This is a very important statement. The airlines were concerned about the cost of the new terminals and that they did not need that sort of facility at that time because they knew that eventually someone would have to pay for it.

At page 507 the Auditor General says:

> In our opinion, the Department of Transport did not give due regard to economy in the Calgary airport project.

The concerns expressed by the air carriers were not disclosed. The Auditor General goes on to say at page 507:

> The Department did not reach agreement with the air carriers on user-pay cost-recovery charges until just prior to the opening of the new terminal.

Further on in the same paragraph he says:

> In our view, reaching an agreement on cost-recovery charges prior to the start of construction was essential to ensure concern for economy and discourage any unjustified user demands.

The users, in this case the airlines, did not have an opportunity for meaningful input in the construction of that facility. The Auditor General examined the costs of the Calgary airport. I wonder what would have happened if he had examined the costs of the Mirabel airport which have escalated dramatically. It is costing now in the order of $1 million per week in terms of its operational deficit. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a clear example of mismanagement and irresponsibility on the part of government and of the people in charge at the Ministry of Transport. That is why we are being asked to approve a bill which will give MOT the authority literally to double the airport tax.

At the same time we are creating a huge airport revolving fund so that some of these white elephants can be hidden and so allow the spending spree to carry on. In that connection the Air Transport Association of Canada has this to say:

> This cross subsidizing group of 23 airports would be able to generate about $100 million yearly from its own cash flow. This would pay for most capital expansion, and make the group effectively independent of parliamentary appropriations.

They go on to talk about ministerial powers as follows:

> The Canadian commercial airline industry is alarmed and deeply concerned that the minister's power to make charges under the Aeronautics Act is not counterbalanced by any regulatory body.

It is not counterbalanced by any regulatory body because if there were a meaningful regulatory body wherein there could be the opportunity for the airlines, in this case the users, to have some meaningful input and negotiations to work out the type of user fees, and to have some input in determining what is the best kind of facility to build, and where it should be built, we would not have nearly the problem we have in terms of meeting the cost overruns and in terms of meeting operational deficits.

The Air Transport Association of Canada says it believes that legislative amendments should be considered that would subject the minister's powers to make charges to the same tests of fairness and reasonableness applied to air carriers' fare proposals. In other words, they are saying that they have to go before the CTC any time they want an increase in fares. There is a check or balance there. There is no check or balance here on the minister in charge, or on the bureaucracy who initiate the kind of user fees that they deem necessary with which to pay the bill.

We should look briefly at the impact of these increased charges. In addition to the impact of the airport user charge, which we have known it as, there are also some very significant increases being implemented at the same time over an eight-year period respecting landing fees, general terminal fees, the en route North Atlantic fees, and almost every service that is provided.

I have a breakdown of the cost of landing a Boeing 747 in Toronto. These figures are based on October 1, 1978, data. I put these figures on the record so hon. members can be apprised of what it costs to land a jumbo jet. The particular example I will give is of a transoceanic flight with a full passenger load. The costs include the en route North Atlantic fee in the amount of $130; the landing fee amounting to $1,596; the general terminal fee assessed at $267; security charge for 429 passengers at 20 cents per passenger amounting to $86; and the fuel throughput charge for 22,000 gallons at 1.5 cents per gallon, amounting to $330. Then we have a provincial fuel tax on 22,000 gallons at three cents per gallon, which amounts to $660, and a transportation tax, 429 passengers at $8, which amounts to $3,432. When you total all those together, and it does not take into consideration the rental of the airline space for counters and so on, it works out to $6,501 to land a 747 with 429 passengers aboard. Those are the rates effective October 1, 1978.

The impact of the transportation tax at $15 per person will change that $3,432 figure to $6,435. The immediate 30 per cent increase which is going to be imposed on an annual basis over an eight-year period when these new landing fees are going to be implemented, will increase that $6,500 figure to $9,604. Those are the kinds of increases about which we are talking.

The principal element in the plan is essentially to allow domestic landing fees and related fees to rise at a rate of 30 per cent on an annual basis to about six times their present level over an eight-year period. That is the goal of the department. We are looking at something that is very significant.

I can point out as well that the general terminal fee will be increased at the rate of 25 per cent effective April 1, 1979, 50 per cent effective October 1, 1979, and 100 per cent effective April 1, 1980. Therefore we will have a doubling of the terminal fees which will parallel this particular measure. At a time when we are talking about cheaper air fares in this country with the airlines being asked to trim the frills, cut the fat, and provide a more efficient operation, we have some of the basic ingredients of the cost of air travel provided by the government being increased dramatically.

I talked about the commercial passenger and the impact that this measure will have upon the traveller who lands in Toronto, Montreal, Edmonton or Calgary. There is another impact which I am sure the government and the minister have overlooked. Air travel in some areas of the country is the only mode of travel. I talk here particularly about the north.

I have a letter from the Yellowknife Chamber of Commerce. In addition to having an exchange of correspondence with me, I am sure they directed the same correspondence to the minister. I quote from their letter of December 13:

As you are aware, the majority of Northwest Territories communities are served solely by air, and because of this the federal tax on air transportation is unfair to Northwest Territories residents. We often have no choice but to fly, and are therefore stuck with a tax that we have no choice but to pay. At least in southern centres this tax is "voluntary"—one need not pay the tax if an alternate to air transport is used.

At present, the air transportation tax from Northwest Territories airports is gaining approximately $480,000 per year for the federal treasury, and a total of $900,000 per year can be expected after the proposed increase. This must surely represent the highest per capita revenue from any province or territory for this tax—largely because we have no choice but to fly.

Because this tax increases the cost of an essential service in the Northwest Territories, and is therefore unfair, the Yellowknife Chamber of Commerce strongly urges the repeal of the air transportation tax in the Northwest Territories.

I thank you for your consideration of this matter and hope that we can look forward to your interceding on our behalf to have this tax removed.

Yours truly,
Fred Richinger

I have, as well, a letter from the Northwest Territories Association of Municipalities which says essentially the same thing. I quote:

Eighty-two per cent of our population and ninety per cent of our municipalities have no choice but to use aircraft for year round access to communities other than their own.

The north has received little benefit (proportionate to our geographic size) to compare with the federal subsidies enjoyed by Canada's transportation network; i.e. seaways, highways, canals, railways, airlines, shipbuilding and airport facilities.

This form of tax is regressive in that it applies to all users regardless of their means. In Canada's north air travel is not a luxury but the only means of transportation available to the majority of us.

That is essentially the thrust and the feeling of those who will be faced with this abusive tax. It will be more harsh for them because they have no alternate form of transportation. Travel by air is certainly not a luxury as far as they are concerned.

I said at the outset that we are concerned about our tourist trade deficit. The Air Transport Association of Canada made reference to that in their submissions which they have made public. I wish to place on record some quotations from the government's own report by the sector task force on the Canadian tourist industry. We all know there is a huge deficit in our tourist trade. Many attempts are being made to try to turn that deficit around.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and other federal government departments are devising ways and means and coming up with all sorts of schemes to attract more tourist trade to Canada and to prevent our tourist dollars flowing outside the country. On the other hand we have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the Department of Transport imposing their user-pay program which is generally going to militate against that desire. It really is an uncoordinated approach.

It is not the first time this government has adopted that kind of stance. It has happened many times. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is devoted to overcoming regional economic disparity. At the same time the Ministry of Transport is imposing user-pay because it does not feel transportation is an instrument for overcoming regional economic disparities. The two departments are working against one another. It is time the government got its act together.

I will quote from this report because it is very significant. If the government followed the advice that its own study has revealed, it may be able to get its act together and work toward reversing or at least abating the current tourist trade deficit. I quote from page 28 of the report:

Apropos the Canadian Transport Commission, the task force recommends that existing CTC policies should be reviewed to ensure that, whilst these regulations govern all air travel within, to and from Canada, prominent importance is given to air transport as a vehicle to increase and improve tourism travel to and within Canada.

No one would argue with that, I am sure.

Discussions should be held with all interested parties concerned with those regulations of a potentially restrictive nature.

● (2040)

Then we get into the user-pay policy and the airport user tax. I quote again:

The airport user-pay policy makes air transportation in Canada non-competitive with that of the United States and is detrimental to Canadian tourism development.

Nothing can be clearer than that, and this report was published before the minister brought down his budget.

I quote again:

The industry is in general agreement with the principle of the necessary functional requirements being paid for by users whenever economically justifiable. However, governments should assume all costs related to social and/or regional development of facilities. Airports can be classified as full-recovery, partial-recovery or nil-recovery.

These are important recommendations. Living as we do in a country which is widespread and sparsely populated, we should consider them very carefully. If that recommendation were adopted we could expect a greater measure of fairness and equity, particularly for people who reside in isolated areas such as the north.

I quote again:

Anything in excess of necessary functional requirements should not be paid for by the users, for example, art work. The users must have a very strong voice in what are defined as functional requirements. All users, including carriers, concessionaires and the travelling public, as well as the general public, should share the burden of paying for functional requirements. The existing CTC policy should be reviewed to ensure that while the regulations govern all air travel within, to and from Canada, prominent importance is given to air transport as a vehicle to increase and improve tourism travel to and within Canada. Discussions should be held with all interested parties concerned with those regulations which are of a potentially restrictive nature.

Sir, that is a good summary of the situation we are now facing. I repeat, users of airport services should be prepared to pay their fair share. They should be prepared to pay for the services needed to provide efficient and safe air transportation. But they should not be asked to pay for the government's bungling, mismanagement, waste and incompetence. Nor should the travelling public be asked to pay for the expensive tastes of the ministry and the bureaucrats.

I submit that this tax imposes a penalty which will hurt the tourist industry and the Canadian traveller. This detrimental approach of attempting total cost recovery should be thoroughly re-examined and this measure should be withdrawn.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House tonight covers a number of important items. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has talked about one of them, namely, the airport tax. I should like the minister to give us a fuller explanation with regard to the manufacturing sales tax cut.

As we all know, the tax was cut from 12 per cent to 9 per cent in the budget last November. A lot of optimism was expressed at the time that the decrease would be passed on to the consumer. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) has told us many times that his department is monitoring this situation, that CSIP was monitoring it, that the AIB was monitoring it, and that all would be well. As recently as a few days ago, however, the minister told us that his study was not yet complete, that the monitoring process was still continuing. I should like him to tell us tonight what kind of investigation is being carried out and whether it is, in fact, nearing completion. Who is being surveyed? Will the minister undertake to table the report in the House when he receives it, if there is time before an election, so that the Canadian people may see it?

I ask this because when it was introduced last fall the sales tax cut was worth about $1 billion to manufacturing companies and a great deal of concern has been expressed by consumer associations and related groups that it is not being passed on. I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette on November 24 just after the budget was introduced. Some Montreal retailers were quoted as saying they doubted very much whether the cut would be passed on—they believed it would be absorbed in the pricing structure between the wholesaler and the consumer.

Montreal retailers say it is doubtful consumers will see lower prices in the wake of last week's cut to 9 per cent from 12 per cent in the federal sales tax.

The cut, a part of Finance Minister Jean Chrétien's budget, affects the tax that manufacturers pay to the government as they sell their goods at the factory gate—usually to a wholesaler.

By the time the retailer gets the goods, the federal sales tax is included in the price. So retailers say they would lose money if they cut prices on inventory purchased before Chrétien's budget announcement.

They add they would only cut prices if their competitors did so and forced them to match prices.

So retailers in Montreal were suggesting that consumers might not reap the benefit which was intended for them by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

There are other statistics which lead one to suspect that the sales tax cut is not being passed on. A couple of days ago the Globe and Mail said corporate profits had gone up by 46 per cent in the last week of 1978. We are not against people making a fair profit, Mr. Speaker, but we cannot help wondering whether the reason, or part of the reason, for this tremendous increase in profits might not have been companies retaining the advantage of the tax cut. Then again, a few days ago the industrial price index for manufacturing was released. The increase was 11 per cent or a little more, the highest recorded in a number of years. That figure is for February and it is very high, especially when one considers that inventories must have been largely depleted by February, that the sales tax must by then have been removed from those inventories to the extent of 3 per cent, and that the reduction should have been reflected in the selling price.

In my opinion the Minister of Finance has been a lot stronger than the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in trying to defend the validity of the cut. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said about a week ago that the CPI showed that in January the price of clothing had dropped, or, if it had not dropped, that it had levelled off. This, he indicated, was evidence that the cut was fulfilling its purpose. I pointed out to the minister that the manufacturing sales tax does not apply to clothing, food, drugs or heating fuel, so he had to think of another argument. When the minister speaks tonight I would like him to give us a few more details about what evidence he has that this sales tax cut is being passed on to the consumer. That is really all I am asking.

● (2050)

In his budget speech last November the minister said:

I estimate that the cut in the sales tax will reduce the increase in the consumer price index by one half of one per cent.

Back in November the consumer price index was at an annual rate of 8.7 per cent. The latest increase in the consumer price index, which was February over February, was some 9.2 per cent. There has been an increase of one half of one per cent in the consumer price index since the minister reduced the sales tax. On the surface it appears that the sales tax has not been passed on. I admit to the minister that all the arguments I am giving him are superficial, general, and global, because we in the opposition do not have at our disposal all the facilities, money and staff required to investigate properly whether the sales tax cut has been passed on to the consumer as it should have been. That is why I want to know what kind of study is under way, who is being surveyed, what the evidence is, and what proof the government has that the sales tax cut is being passed on to the consumer as it should be. That is the first and principal point I wanted to make in the debate tonight.

As has been said by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and by the hon. member for Vegreville, this bill includes a number of items besides the sales tax cut, which is by far the major item in the bill. There is an increase in the airport tax. People flying within Canada and outside will find that the transportation tax will go up to 15 per cent as of April 1. Like the hon. member for Vegreville, I do not think that type of tax is proper. It is a user-pay tax. People using airport facilities have to pay a tax when they take flights regardless of their ability to pay.

The ways and means bill before the House today includes a number of other measures. It includes the elimination of a special tax on private aeroplanes, the elimination of a tax on motorcycles, and the elimination of a tax on boat motors. It deals with non-commercial aviation fuel.

The bill also includes excise tax schedules for diesel fuel and gasoline, measurements of which are now being converted from the old imperial system to metric. It includes other things which I think are perhaps inconsequential. With the exception of the air transportation tax I think they are really not too important to the average Canadian, but things like the change to the metric system should be scrutinized closely in order to make sure that companies do not take advantage of the switch from the gallon to the litre in order to up their prices by a penny or a fraction of a penny.

I think some items in this bill would cause hardship for a number of people. One specific item has to do with storm doors and windows, which previously were exempted from tax when the government reduced the tax on building materials some time ago from 12 per cent to 5 per cent. The tax on storm doors and windows was removed, and the bill before us re-imposes a 5 per cent tax on storm doors and windows.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have here a telegram sent to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), which says:

The Quebec Provincial Wood Industry Association, representing the interest of the 450 door and window manufacturers of Quebec, strongly protests against the imposition of the 5 per cent tax on materials exempted since 1975.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that the government's decision is unfair. There has been no consultation with the firms involved and no reason has been advanced to justify that change. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the government will go back on its decision and abolish the tax on windows and doors.

[English]

A number of industries, some of them being small companies, could be affected in a very negative way by this bill.

There is only one other point I want to make in my brief remarks. I think it is very important. Within the bill is a form of closure. I believe that was referred to by one hon. member who spoke previously in the debate. Clause 16(4) at page 12 of Bill C-38 states:

A motion taken up and considered in accordance with subsection (3) shall be debated without interruption for not more than five hours and, on the conclusion of such debate or at the expiry of the fifth such hour, the Speaker of the House of Commons or the Senate, as the case may be, shall forthwith, without further debate or amendment, put every question necessary for the disposal of the motion.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

As I understand it, this refers to various orders in council which are referred to in clause 15 and in the schedules on pages 11 and 12 of the bill. I hope the minister will be prepared to answer questions in the committee of the whole and to tell us why this form of closure is included in the bill.

Mr. Paproski: Again?

Mr. Nystrom: Again. It is very similar to the closure in the energy bill we debated a few days ago. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) moved a motion to remove that terrible provision from that bill, and we supported that. This bill also imposes automatic closure. We will be allowed only five hour debates on motions to implement certain things. Without really ragging the puck, I hope the Minister of Finance will respond to that matter, either when he speaks later or certainly during the committee of the whole stage.

My main point is that I want to see some evidence that the 12 per cent sales tax on building materials which was reduced to 9 per cent—which amounts to about $1 billion—has been passed on to the consumer. The government says it is studying that. I want to know what kind of study it is and who is being surveyed. I want to know what kind of evidence there is that that money is indeed being passed on.

The second thing I want to know is why the government is imposing this additional tax on people using our airports. Third, I want some explanation as to why the government is legislating closure in Bill C-38.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), and I concur in the statements made by both those hon. members. I hope not to get into the points they raised because they were very well made by both hon. members. I will attempt to confine my remarks to the parts of the bill which deal with energy, cars and trucks.

This bill is a result of the budget of November, some four and a half months ago, and this is the first time we have debated it. We see that the most important part of the bill, the reduction of the sales tax, is something that the government cannot explain. The government is unable to tell us whether the benefits are getting down to the people whom the sales tax cuts are supposed to benefit, that is, the consumers. Members of the House have asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) whether these sales tax cuts will get down to the consumers, and he told us we should have confidence in the marketplace. It is the government that has set down these policies and it is the government that should be accountable for them and responsible for how these policies operate.

I agree with the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) must respond in the House on his policies. When he states that the consumer price index should be down by half a point because of the cut in the sales tax, he should tell us whether or not that is the case and whether he is making the studies to show that corporations, which are in the business of competing and are also in the business of making profits, are passing these cuts down to the people who should benefit from them.

I have had an ongoing discussion with the Minister of Finance regarding solar equipment and whether he would be in favour of granting a tax credit for putting it in place so that people could take advantage of it. I see in the bill that the excise tax on solar water heaters has been removed. This is a starting point, although a very small one, and we are concerned about the conservation of energy in this nation. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has been telling us all last week that a crisis would be imminent if another country were to cut off oil supplies to Canada, and that the government should be concerned about alternate forms of energy and how they can be put in place. One of those alternate forms is solar water heaters. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) stated that solar heat is one of the most promising areas of energy conservation in this country, and I agree with him.

In the government document entitled "Energy Futures for Canadians" the following statement is made:

> The penetration of renewable resources to the extent shown would be a noteworthy accomplishment since most of the renewables lack any significant organizational, financial or market base at the present time. To establish so large a market for the renewables, individually and collectively, in so short a time presents Canadians with a major challenge, but one which has a high priority. By the year 2000, renewables would be contributing as much as imported oil at that time, or more than four times the energy currently supplied by nuclear power in Canada—a prodigious undertaking in 20 years.

These are very fine statements, but that is all they are, statements, because with the present policies in place there is absolutely no way we can achieve that use of renewables which is stated in government policy to be likely to take place by the year 2000. What we need is a policy which will encourage people to use solar equipment.

For example, a collector for a solar water heater costs $800 or $900, depending on whether you place the collector on your roof or on a pedestal. Then you must add pumps or controls, and this will add another $600 to the cost, making it around $1,500. Then you have to instal these facilities. Perhaps a number of people would be able to instal them themselves, but most would not, and when it is done totally by the commercial people it adds another $500 to the cost of the installation. So we are looking at an investment of some $2,000.

The government has removed the excise tax on equipment which, I suppose, would come from the United States and be developed here in Canada. That excise tax may save the consumer some $30, $40 or $50 at the most, but that is not a sufficient incentive for him to instal a solar water heater in his home. What we need is a tax credit which I have announced in the House to be the policy of the Progressive Conservative party. I fully believe that if the government were prepared to offer such a tax credit we would have a sufficient usage of renewables to reach the goals announced in the government's study, and thus would save a good deal of oil and gas which are becoming more and more expensive.

Also, as regards solar water heaters, we find that not all the equipment is made here in Canada. For example, the heat exchanger must be brought in from the United States. The reason for that is that the Canadian market is not sufficiently significant for Canadian manufacturers to go into the business of manufacturing these heat exchangers. The only way in which that could come about would be if greater consumption of those products were encouraged in Canada. As I said, in my opinion there is only one way to do that. Also, we must have a co-ordinated policy to develop more high technology necessary to develop the renewables, particularly the solar panels and collectors, so that we set down policies which encourage Canadian manufacturers to take advantage of them.

I was interested in the figures which showed that our higher technology and manufactured imports in 1978 amounted to some $29.3 billion. We have exported higher technology equipment worth $20 billion. That means we had a deficit in 1978 in the higher technology products of some $9.1 billion. I think that speaks for itself. It means that the government has a long way to go to encourage more research in this country to develop the kind of technology which must be made available to the consumers of those products. It is necessary if we are to promote such things as solar water heaters in our homes.

As I understand it, the excise tax is a tax on luxuries. I do not want to get back to the subject of renewables, but the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) pointed out that what the government is doing through the bill is to designate transportation as a luxury because it is putting a tax on it. As has been stated by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), we have a deficit of some $1.7 billion in the tourist trade in this nation. Surely he must have something to say about the user-pay concept that is in the bill and the increase in the landing tax. I would be interested to hear the Minister of Finance explain the reasoning behind that provision in view of the fact that we are concerned about decreasing our tourist deficit.

I referred previously to research and development which are so necessary to increase some of the high technology items needed in this country. Some months ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced this great program called PUSH which was to assist in the purchase and use of solar energy items, and I assumed that this would include solar water heaters in government buildings. He announced that in the years 1979 to 1984 he would make available some $125 million for the government to purchase solar energy and renewable energy items for government buildings. We find that even though the minister is still bragging about this program the department has now decided that the first $25 million, which should have been made available this year, will be only $1.5 million. We will be watching very closely whether the department is serious about this program or whether it is just another big announcement, using big figures, so that the people of this country will be made to believe that something is being done to help in these higher technology areas. But, in fact, nothing is happening.

When we talk about the use of energy and the conservation of it, we find that the minister removed the tax on solar water heaters and in the next clause he added on the tax to storm windows and doors. Surely this makes no sense. I cannot understand why the minister would do that. It cannot amount to very much money. I know people in the country are concerned about the conservation of energy in their homes and that they will be buying those materials anyway. It is beyond me why the department and the minister would attempt to save energy by removing a tax in one clause and adding it on again in the next. I want to question the minister on that in committee.

The last area I should like to speak about is the removal of the federal sales tax on trucks and cars. This tax was placed in a budget some years ago, and now the minister has decided that it was insignificant to the saving of energy and that it should be removed. We are all purchasers of new cars and trucks, and we welcome that move. But by announcing it one night, the minister has placed a number of dealers in situations where their inventories on hand are open to $200 to $300 per car, and more per truck. Dealers have had to advance sales on their inventories, and now they find the price of those cars and trucks must come down because consumers are demanding it. Thus they are caught with these inventories. If a dealer had 30 or 40 cars on his lot, which many of them did at the time of the budget, this could amount to anywhere from $5,000 to $10,000 which he must absorb himself. I am referring to an average small dealer.

Many dealers wrote to me and indicated that the tax cut should have been made retroactive so that they would not have to absorb it. They are the whim of the Minister of Finance as he adds on taxes and takes taxes off. No one seems to worry about the small businessman who must absorb these losses, or perhaps losses of sales because he is incapable of absorbing them. I have received a number of letters from dealers in my constituency. I know members on both sides of the House of Commons have received those letters. It is another question the Minister of Finance should answer when asked in committee. He should be asked whether he is prepared to deal with this loss for small businessmen.

There are a number of items in this bill which affect small businesses and individuals. We will be very interested in the answers the minister brings forward in committee.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that it is over four months since the budget of November 16. One must spend quite a bit of time refreshing one's memory on what was said at the time. It is interesting it took the minister over four months to get his bills before the House. I know the minister is a senior one in some people's books. We look to him to correct the errors we find in certain areas of legislation when ministers such as the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) are powerless to give people the relief they need in certain cases.

Essentially Bill C-38 covers three major areas: the air transportation tax, the gasoline tax, and the sales tax. I noted especially that the minister said in his budget speech he would repeal the special 10 per cent excise tax on marine engines over 20 horsepower and private aircraft, and the 5 per cent tax on motorcycles. He said that they were having an adverse economic effect. Also he indicated that the contribution of these taxes to energy conservation has been minimal. I guess the minister finally found out what taxpayers were telling members of parliament, at least on this side of the House. Regardless of the taxing policies of the Liberal government, people require boats which have more than 20 horsepower engines. One cannot move a ship which weighs hundreds of tons with a tiny motor. One requires an acceptable size motor. I suppose efficiency is related to the relative size of the motor and the vessel being moved. It should not have come as any surprise to the minister that the contribution of these taxes to energy conservation had been minimal.

As far as the tax on private aircraft is concerned, perhaps the minister realized finally that there was quite a business being done in Canada in private aircraft, and that quite a number of Canadians were being put at an extreme disadvantage whether they were flying for pleasure or not. I suggest the minister found another problem which he did not tell us about in his speech, that is, not only was it the adverse economic effects and the minimum contribution to conservation, but also the government was having trouble with collections and the enforcement of collection of some of those taxes. There is nothing like tax avoidance to make the government realize that perhaps it was not a good idea to have such a tax in the first place.

We all applauded the reduction in the general sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. I noticed with interest that the tax is referred to in several places in the bill as a consumption tax. Every time the subject of consumption tax has come up in various debates, it is interesting the government was always quick to point out that consumption taxes are regressive ones which should not be used. The government pointed out that they are hidden taxes, that they weigh hardest on people in the lowest income brackets, and that somehow they are wicked, regressive, and should be avoided.

Everyone realizes that there is retail sales tax on every purchase made in Canada. It is the tax everyone can see when he makes purchases. It is only when the government is making a change in a tax such as this, and when this kind of debate takes place, that Canadian consumers realize the 9 per cent consumption tax is included in the retail price before they pay the retail tax.

Even though the government says that consumption taxes are not very good because they are hidden, it is fair for us to note that every once in a while this government does not mind collecting hidden taxes, which in this case were 12 per cent and are now 9 per cent. If things are collated we know what kind of effect this hidden tax has on the tax of everything we buy. We expected when this tax was reduced to 9 per cent that there would be some sort of reduction in the rate of inflation or the rate of increase in the prices of goods that we buy.

Of course no consideration was given to the inventories on hand when this reduction was introduced. There were countless millions and billions of dollars in inventory around the country on which the tax had already been paid, because the nature of the tax is such that it is paid at the manufacturing level. This inventory had to be sold, and there was no immediate reduction for those business people who had old stock. This had the effect of delaying the benefit to consumers until that inventory was used up.

I hope there is some evidence of a slight reduction in the cost of goods which consumers buy, but I have not heard anybody exclaiming, "Oh, isn't that nice, this item is 3 per cent less than what it cost when I bought it a week ago or a month ago." Certainly there has been no evidence from the monthly bulletins put out by StatsCanada that there has been a reduction in the rate increase in the price of goods. I hope that we will see something along this line soon.

There is another aspect of the consumption tax which I wanted to mention briefly. It is an aspect which the government applies through the Income Tax Act, and it does not look upon it as a consumption tax. I am referring to the Registered Retirement Savings Plan. I know that we are not debating the Income Tax Act, but I would like to make a comparison between what the government calls an income tax and what is actually a consumption tax.

If a taxpayer in Canada finds that he does not need to spend all of his disposable income in the year in which he receives it, he may contribute it to a Registered Retirement Savings Plan. Within the limits set out in the plan, the taxpayers' contributions are deductible when calculating his or her income tax for that year. The amount which is contributed to the RRSP, together with the interest, is exempt from tax during the time it is a registered plan. When the taxpayer reaches the age of 71 the plan must be deregistered, or it may be done earlier should the taxpayer decide that he needs the money for consumption purposes. When his or her contributions are taken out of the plan, for the purposes of income tax it is considered income for the year in which the plan is collapsed.

Because this plan is covered by the Income Tax Act, the government looks upon it as an income tax. I suggest, however, that in fact this is simply another kind of consumption tax because a consumption tax is levied at the time the item, whatever it may be, is being consumed. Therefore, if this money is taxed when the taxpayer decides that he needs the money for consumption purposes, I suggest that it is in fact a consumption tax, regardless of what the government would like to call it.

There is a very dangerous aspect to this Bill C-38. It is a reference which I have found in several places, and particularly in some of the motions shown in the budget papers. Of course, those motions have been inserted in the bill, but I think it is easier to find them in the budget papers. For instance, motion No. 5 reads:

> The said act be amended to specify the time period within which any amount owing to Her Majesty . . . shall be payable—

Motion No. 15 reads:

> Subsection 31(2) of the said act be amended to provide that the governor in council, on the joint recommendation of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue—

Suffice it to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are several such examples in the motions. As a matter of fact, here is another one. Motion No. 7 reads:

> Authority . . . for the Minister of National Revenue to pay such persons as the governor in council may by regulation prescribe—

What we are finding again is more government legislation by regulation rather than by an act of this parliament. I cannot recall the numbers, but it seems to me that in 1978 there were well over 3,000 orders in council issued by the government. Those orders have the same effect as legislation, but they are not subject to the scrutiny of the House or the other place. Such legislation, which gives to the cabinet, the government and the governor in council, the powers contained in it, may be used by the government any number of times and may have far-reaching effects on the taxpayers and the people of Canada. It is a very serious trend.

During the same period that the Government of Canada was passing, I believe, 3,360 orders in council, the government of Great Britain for the same period passed less than 24 orders in council, and they have the courtesy to ratify their orders later by bringing them into the House.

Bill C-38 is not a very big bill. It seeks only to put into legislation about a page of the minister's budget speech. Yet there are at least three instances where the governor in council is authorized to make regulations over which we, the members who are debating the passing of this bill, will have no say.

I have heard this argument put forth in this House for all the years in which I have been here. It is a situation that is getting worse, not better. More and more power is being taken away from this House in this way and through other means. We no longer find, for instance, that the major announcements are made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House. The Prime Minister usually decides that other fora are more suitable for his purposes. In fact yesterday we were treated to the first speech by the Prime Minister in this House for five months. The Prime Minister is expected to be just that, the Prime Minister, and to give this House the benefit of his views.

● (2130)

I suppose in the past there has been some justification for the Prime Minister going elsewhere because he might think his message would be more readily disseminated. For the last year and one half, since the introduction of live television broadcasting of the proceedings, and especially in the last two weeks or so when they have been broadcast across the country by satellite, there could be no excuse for him further deteriorating the powers of this House by making major announcements outside it. I am getting a little off the topic, Mr. Speaker, but when I think about what legislation like this is doing to the powers of the House, I have to reflect on what is happening through other forms of erosion.

I have covered the areas I wanted to comment on briefly before the bill goes to committee. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) covered the matter of the increase in the air transportation tax on passenger travel. I hope a serious examination of the effects of the reduction of the sales tax will be made in committee to see whether changes can be made. I hope there will also be close examination of the ever-increasing powers granted to the governor in council by legislation such as this which leaves many important decisions outside the legislation and in the hands of a small group of Canadians, through order in council, decisions which will have an effect on all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the other speakers on this bill. They have had very little to say. I have very little to say either, but since that has not deterred them it will not deter me and I shall make my few remarks.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) addressed some of the broader issues of sales tax and commodity taxes. I know he is partly motivated in that by the responsibilities he shares with me on the finance committee and the time he spent in the last session looking into the question of commodity tax reform. He made the observation, with which no one can argue, that the commodity taxes are hidden taxes and inflationary taxes, in the sense that they make prices higher than they would otherwise be. The other side of that coin is that without the commodity tax system in Canada, income taxes would have to be raised by something like 28 per cent to produce the same amount of revenue for the government. That would have an effect not necessarily as directly inflationary but in its own way it would be an unacceptable alternative. Although it is inflationary it seems to be an unavoidable tax and one that cannot be readily converted to extra points in the Income Tax Act.

I was very happy to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was able to reduce the sales tax by 3 per cent in this bill, a substantial reduction, which had some immediate impact on retails prices. We know that the over-all impact of a reduction of federal sales tax does not show as readily as a reduction in the retail sales tax which is added to the price of goods at the consumer level. It is obvious that in a competitive market the reduction in the federal sales tax will have some impact on prices. Indeed, the consumer price index reports in the months following the introduction of this measure showed a considerable impact. Some of the movement of prices in the months following this tax change, which have been lower than they would otherwise be, was indicated by Statistics Canada and other sources to be attributable in part to the reduction of the federal sales tax.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra expressed some regret about the length of time it takes for this parliament to deal with budget legislation. I want to second that. I agree it is regrettable that it takes so long to put budget bills through. It is true they begin to take effect on budget night, but unfortunately certain sectors in the community, private citizens and corporations, are reluctant to act on resolutions that have not become legislation approved by parliament. This problem has become particularly acute since the Department of National Revenue began to increase the amount of assistance offered to taxpayers in the way of interpretation of the impact of legislation and proposed transactions on taxpayers.

Proposals were recently approved by parliament which permit taxpayers to present a proposed transaction to officials of the Department of National Revenue and receive some sort of ruling for their comfort in entering into the proposed transaction. When a budget like this comes along offering many good things to stimulate economic growth, taxpayers have sought the guidance of a ruling from the Department of National Revenue but have found that the department is not in a position to give them the comfort letter or ruling on a proposed transaction until the legislation is passed.

In my constituency a company wanted to buy equipment to do research and development work so that it could take advantage of the incresed incentives offered. It asked the Department of National Revenue for a ruling and was told, quite rightly, that the department does not rule on resolutions, only on legislation. Officials of the department cannot take it for granted that this bill will be passed.

Another case was referred to me today by a chartered accountant. His client proposed to purchase some Dome Petroleum warrants or participation shares in the Beaufort Sea project. These interests were made very attractive under the budget bills, and taxpayers interested in taking advantage of them are entitled to some assurance that when they put their money on the table the promised tax credits will be forthcoming. The Department of National Revenue can give no such assurance until the House deals with these budget bills.

I should like to see more respect on all sides of the House for the impact this problem has on corporations and individuals. It is certainly not a government responsibility to get legislation out of the House; it is a government responsibility to bring legislation into the House. Any member of the House of any party can claim responsibility or be given responsibility for failure to get the legislation out.

● (2140)

I have been urging that a method be found for bringing budget bill legislation to a head, because all parties agree that economic uncertainty is present in the Canadian economy. On this side of the House we feel that the economic uncertainty that exists is not totally justified. The performance of the economy has been good and businessmen are entitled to have a justifiable measure of confidence. The incentives that are offered in this bill do not have their fullest impact until the measures become law, and who knows when that will be?

There are rumours that there may be an election in the weeks or months ahead. If these budget bills do not become law before the election, will they become law after the election? I say the government will be returned and its commitment to this legislation will continue. One cannot blame a businessman ready to put his money on the table for wanting the certainty of an act of legislation to rely on so that he can invest with certainty and apply to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) and to his officials for the kind of ruling that this government has recently begun to make available to taxpayers with very good effect.

Let me turn to some other provisions. I have already referred to the welcome reduction in the sales tax from 12 per cent to nine per cent. This is very far from the kind of reform that the government has under consideration for the commodity tax of Canada.

The finance committee, which I referred to earlier, has already spent some time in the past session looking at the fundamental problems that exist with the excise and sales taxes in Canada. In particular we have looked at the arbitrariness of the present sales tax act which is 56 years old. It has none of the kinds of provisions such as rights of appeal, rights of review or of statutory determinations which exist in more contemporary legislation. I know all members of this House would welcome legislation to update the Sales Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act. They may remain inflationary, as the hon. member indicates, but they can be much fairer and clearer than they are. They can be designed in a way to be much more helpful and stimulatory to the taxpayers of this country, in their operations in the economy.

I urge the House to deal rapidly with this legislation and to try to get as many of the budget bills enacted as possible. None of us in this House—however much we might try to exploit the existing atmosphere of uncertainty in some parts of this country—want that atmosphere to be perpetuated by the activities of members of parliament and by political partisanship.

I close my remarks by urging members of parliament to come to terms with this important bill. I ask them to try, if possible, in the weeks ahead to pass it, to deliver it into the hands of the economic community, and to deliver to the Minister of National Revenue the means to begin to issue definitive comfort letters and rulings to interested participants in the economic life of Canada.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this debate on Bill C-38 and to have the opportunity to give a critique and an analysis of this particular legislation which is now before us. I hear government members applauding the bill. It is quite normal for them to want to support their own piece of legislation, but I want to say that it is the role of the opposition to define, in the concept of the British parliament, and to give a critique of that legislation. My role tonight is to point out some of the specific weaknesses in the bill and if the government wishes it can as a result, make some amendments, and improve the bill.

I wish to comment on a remark made by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) who just preceded me. I may not be quoting him directly but I believe he said that the commodity taxes are hidden taxes and are inflationary. He went on to rationalize that that was okay. By what I believe is very close to a direct quote he said that if they were removed, income tax would have to be increased by 28 per cent. I have never heard of a response so shallow as that particular response. If we follow the reasoning given by the hon. member for York Centre, we can ask the question, where will the line be drawn on taxation? I now cite some figures in this respect. In 1960, in terms of revenue as a percentage of the gross national product, all governments in Canada took 25.1 per cent. In 1968 that figure had increased to 34.4 per cent, and by 1974, at the start of the thirtieth parliament, the figure had risen to 39.8 per cent. I will now turn to expenditures. In 1950 22.1 per cent of the GNP was spent by governments. By 1968 when this government first took power 33.7 per cent was being spent of our total GNP by all governments in terms of taxation, and by 1974 the figure was 37.9 per cent. As recently as 1977 the figure was 41.1 per cent.

Consider a pie of a certain size. If one continues to increase the percentage that government takes from that pie, that much less money is left for the private sector. In other words, the larger the percentage of gross national product that comes from government expenditures, less is left for the private sector.

The hon. member for York Centre says revenues were needed so certain taxes were added on. I fail to understand this thinking. It would seem more logical for the government to stop and consider how it could bring stimulus into the economy so as to get the free enterprise system working. This would eliminate the need for a heavy overburden of government increasing taxes and working toward the objective of a dominated government society, which we appear to be working toward in Canada today.

Let me take a look at some of the specifics in this bill which do just that. For instance, airport tax has increased from $8 to $15 per person. In the first place Canada is probably one of the last nations in the world—next only to the Soviet Union—that should discourage air traffic. Canada is a country with a large land mass. It has tremendous resources, some of which are found in places where roads, railways and boats cannot go. To discourage aircraft travel, whether by light plane or commercial aircraft, is demonstrating a disincentive to the construction and the building of this country. However, if we were talking about a country such as Belgium which is a small country with a dense population, and if for some reason because of air traffic density the government in its wisdom said that air traffic should be limited, this would be quite proper. But to limit air traffic in Canada by taxation policies does not seem appropriate.

We could extend beyond the particular part of the clause in Bill C-38 and talk about the whole excise tax area and bringing light aircraft into Canada. The whole discriminatory concept against air travel has as its bottom line that this government does not believe that the airplane services the free enterprise system of our country. We have an unimaginative government. Otherwise, we would open up the concept of air travel, making it freer to travel.

On one hand we have an opinion that has been expressed in this House, one in which I concur, by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) that Canadians should travel and tour more in Canada. That is an opinion to which most Canadians would subscribe. However, we cannot take that position and on the other hand put in the way economic roadblocks which have objectives exactly opposite to that. I find it hard to believe that the government thought it necessary to increase the airport tax on the travelling public from $8 to $15. This is one of the last nations in the world that should put roadblocks in the way of air travel.

I now move to another portion of the bill, the reduction of sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. On the surface that tends to sound very musical to the ears of most people. However, the Department of Finance, which ought to be schooled in economics and the ramifications of their recommendations, should know that when they make a recommendation to reduce sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent, somewhere they catch businessmen in the middle of the year. Car dealers across Canada would love to have this election come for no other reason than to vote against this government on that particular clause. I will tell you why.

A car dealer in my constituency managed to get out of that situation into which the government had put him. He had some cars on the lot at 12 per cent sales tax and others, the same kind of cars, at the 9 per cent sales tax. In order to get out of that, it cost him $12,000 out of his pocket. That is what he spent to bail out this government for not having foresight in terms of a taxation policy.

When you do not make the sales tax retroactive to a fiscal year, all you do is box in those people dealing in major commodity items. They have to pay out of their pockets in order to bail out the government. If the government is going to reduce sales tax, it should give some kind of warning, and the various sectors of the industry will applaud that. It would be widely accepted across the country. However, when you come in with the axe because an election is coming soon and you want some goodies in the candy bag to hand out, and you reduce the sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent, the result is that the private citizen has to bail out the country.

Another part of this tax that leaves us in a real quandary as to what direction the government has been taking is in relation to building materials. In this country we have a shortage of housing and one of the highest levels of unemployment of any of the industrialized nations in the world, except for Italy. We must recognize that many factors flow out of the field of housing. First, it stimulates a tremendous number of sectors of our economy such as the lumber industry, concrete industry, electrical wiring, plumbing, skilled, unskilled and professional people.

The government somehow leaves on the books the concept of having a 5 per cent building tax. Some years ago the tax was 12 per cent. It was dropped a little bit, then some more, and now finally it will be 5 per cent. A bureaucracy is always needed to look after this. Throughout the building materials industry there is extra paperwork. There is just as much paperwork with a one per cent tax as a 90 per cent tax, and just as much administration required for a 5 per cent tax as a 75 per cent tax.

If the government wants to pare some of the administration and take off some of the overburden in the business community, the best thing it could have done would have been to wipe out in total the tax on building materials. It would have given a stimulus to the housing industry. That is the kind of imagination this country needs. It is something that should have been looked at in the last budget.

There is an appalling conflict of position in Bill C-38. It talks of a reduction in tax in terms of solar heaters. It is a good idea and no one in this House would argue with it. However, it slaps a tax on double-glazed window glass and storm doors. Somehow in the political ramifications the government gives the impression it wants to move toward energy saving devices. It picks something that has a musical ring to the public and says it will remove the tax on solar heating. While the public is looking in that direction, it sneaks behind and slaps a tax on storm doors and windows. Are ministers serious about energy saving or not? If they were, they would look at it from a broad perspective and not go on this teeter-totter adventure by taking it off with one hand and putting it on with the other. While Peter is giving, Peter is also taking, and Paul does not know if he is on a Ferris wheel or a pogo stick.

One of the most important parts of this legislation is also one of the greatest frustrations I can express about virtually every piece of legislation brought forward by this government. Clauses 15, 16 and 17 of the bill contain regulatory changes that can be changed by order in council.

I notice it is very close to ten o'clock. Perhaps in one sentence I might point out that in 1978 this country, through the federal government, had 3,970 orders in council. Not a single one was referred back to parliament. By contrast, there were about 15 orders in council in Great Britain and every single one was referred back to parliament. What we end up with is government by regulation, in other words, another attempt to thwart the parliamentary system. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—REDUCED INSURANCE PREMIUMS FOR NON-SMOKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I raised a question in the House asking what the government had done or would do to encourage the Canadian insurance industry to offer discounts or premiums to non-smokers who were physically fit. The answer I received was unsatisfactory because, as I learned later, my question was addressed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) whereas it should have been addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

Recently I received a substantial discount on my automobile insurance premium because I had not been involved in any kind of car accident for more than five years. Included in my premium notice was a reminder to all those who totally abstain from alcoholic beverages. This group of drivers is also a low risk group and, in consequence, they receive a significant reduction in their premiums. So the principle is well-known in the insurance industry: low risk groups get a break in their insurance costs. Safe drivers and non-drinkers of alcohol are among those in low risk groups.

However, according to a study done in the U.S.A. by a company known as Farmers' Insurance, non-smoking drivers have an accident rate which is one half that of smokers. It is not difficult to understand why smokers who drive may have more accidents; the act of lighting a cigarette, cigar or pipe can be distracting, as can the butting of smoking materials or the brushing away of ashes from clothes and car cushions. On the basis of this study, the Farmers' Insurance Company in the U.S.A. decided to give non-smokers a good discount on premiums. Mr. Speaker, if proper surveys were carried out by the Insurance Bureau of Canada I am sure it would be found that non-smokers are safer and better drivers and should therefore be rewarded by having to pay less for their premiums.

So far, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken only of automobile insurance premiums. But the same principle applies to life insurance. The Occidental Life Insurance Company in the U.S.A. is offering discounts of between 10 per cent and 20 per cent on life insurance premiums to policyholders who exercise regularly. I am advised that, to qualify, a person must sign a statement that he or she is a non-smoker and has done some form of aerobic exercise such as jogging or swimming for a least 20 minutes three days a week for the preceding year. To the best of my knowledge, these progressive measures being followed by some insurance companies in the United States have not been adopted in Canada.

The Government of Canada knows that smoking is a serious threat to health and that it interferes in varying degrees with normal daily activities. Again, the government actively promotes and encourages citizens to follow a regular exercise program. Participaction has contributed a great deal, in my view, to raising the average level of robust good health in Canada. Now is the time to go for additional pay-offs, additional, that is, to feeling better, working more effectively and enjoying life more. The extra pay-off should be applied to insurance costs. Low risk groups should have their premiums reduced, and what better opportunity is there than on the basis of the evidence which has been produced as a result of studies in the United States?

That is the background for my question. I wanted to know what the minister has done to convince the insurance industry in Canada that this is a logical course to follow. What will the minister do in this regard? Non-smokers are now a majority in this country and it is about time they stopped having to pay extra premiums which have been incurred by those who are smokers.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have this opportunity to respond to the hon. member's question. It is not often that we non-smokers see questions raised in this way.

About two years ago an official of the Department of National Health and Welfare raised with the Canadian Home Office Life Insurance Underwriters Association the possibility of offering a reduced premium to their non-smoking clients. At that time it was pointed out that non-smokers make up approximately 70 per cent of the total population of Canada. Shortly afterwards one Canadian company offered a reduced rate on fire insurance, which is between 20 per cent and 25 per cent less than the standard premium. The same company also provides automobile insurance at a rate which is about 15 per cent less than the standard premium. No other Canadian company offers these reduced rates.

The question of reduced life insurance rates for Canadian non-smokers has also been explored with the industry. Canadian statistics on morbidity and mortality, as well as United States statistics, particularly those used by at least one American insurance company, seem to indicate that non-smokers are good risks and that it might be logical to offer them a preferred rate. This has not yet happened in Canada, although departmental officials continue to discuss the matter with the industry with the aim of obtaining the same life insurance benefits for Canadian non-smokers as those enjoyed by our American neighbours south of the border.

One can hope that the competitive requirements of the insurance industry will eventually produce the kind of premium reduction suggested by the hon. member.

TRANSPORT—AUTHORITY OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD TO PURCHASE GRAIN HOPPER CARS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, as a non-smoker I also endorse the physical fitness concepts of my good friends opposite. I am looking forward to the conclusion of this parliament so that I can start jogging.

My question deals with a question I asked on February 12, 1979, of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), after the Canadian Wheat Board purchased some 2,000 hopper cars using Canadian Wheat Board or, in essence, farmers' money.

The question was whether there was any limit to the number of hopper cars the board could buy, and the minister said that because there is authority, of course there was not. Then I went on to ask him if there was therefore any reason why the Canadian Wheat Board could not also purchase engines to pull trains, repair tracks on which grain is hauled, and repair terminals, ports and the like. The minister's response to me was as follows:

> The answer to that question is no, Mr. Speaker; and, of course, it is completely out of the context of any reality to put it, except perhaps to create worry.

The minister went on to say:

> They may save as much in demurrage charges at that time or in the ability to make spot sales in the annual cost of these cars, and that is the reasoning they employed.

I was not satisfied with that answer because I did not believe it. Today the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk) put virtually the same question, and he received a very different and conflicting answer. Today the minister said that the board has its own authority on this matter. I am referring to the "blues" of this afternoon's question period. The minister said that the Canadian Wheat Board went back and concluded that the right thing to do would be to go ahead and make purchases. I wrote a letter to the minister to ask about this, and I will quote a paragraph of the letter I wrote to the minister, as follows:

> So that I might be precisely informed as to the specific authority that grants the Canadian Wheat Board the power to make the above said purchases, I would be pleased if you would cite the regulations or statutes that grant the Canadian Wheat Board the right to take such action.

I have now received a response which reads in part:

> In reply to your letter of February 12, 1979 regarding Canadian Wheat Board authority to purchase hopper cars, this authority is contained in section 4 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, Chapter 12, as amended.
>
> The following paragraphs of section 4.4 are the pertinent to this matter:
> Paragraph (a) empowers the board "to buy, take delivery of, store, transfer, sell, ship or otherwise dispose of grain"—

The fact is that they could buy the engines and build the railway lines, and build anything else in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian Wheat Board to enable them to sell, ship or otherwise dispose of grain. This provides me with a very interesting perspective in view of the fact that a week ago I met with the president and executive of CP Rail who stated that CP is no longer sure they can pay $800,000 per rail engine, and that grain trains often use as many as four of these $800,000 engines.

The fundamental question is not with regard to the 2,000 hopper cars. What I would like to hear from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) tonight is this: we want some assurance, as we go through the list in this letter, a portion of which I read, stating that since they purchased 2,000 hopper cars and that the Canadian Wheat Board says it would like to have 10,000 hopper cars, they can no longer give an assurance that they can afford to purchase the engines, and noting the fact that some railway lines handle nothing but grain, what guarantee can he give to the farming community that after they have seeded the grain, fertilized it, used pesticides and herbicides, then harvested it, stored it and hauled it to the grain elevators, the Canadian Wheat Board will not use up all their money to improve the transport system without paying the farmers?

[Mr. Malone.]

I should like to quote a section of the Revised Statutes of Canada relating to the Canadian Wheat Board Act. The pertinent paragraph in the minister's reply reads as follows:

> Paragraph (d) empowers the board "to acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property . . .". Legal officers consulted were unanimously of the opinion that personal property includes such items as hopper cars.

Why could it not include any other item? It was their decision that it included hopper cars. In his answer to me the minister said that obviously they could not purchase the engines or fix up the rail beds or the ports. I do not believe that answer because of the different answer he gave today to the hon. member for Portage in which he indicated that the Canadian Wheat Board can use its money in any way it deems fit so long as it is for the purpose of buying, selling, shipping or otherwise disposing of grain. This is the first time in Canadian history that the Canadian Wheat Board has used farmers' money for any other purpose than to pay demurrage charges which occur on the west coast usually because of strikes or because of the unfortunate scheduling of ships coming to port.

We are now on the threshold of a change in how farmers' dollars are used. What I would like to know from the parliamentary secretary this evening is what assurances he can give us, clearly and simply, that the farmers from this day henceforth, when they make a sale of grain, will get even $1 back, and that somehow in the judgment of the Canadian Wheat Board it will not be necessary to use that money to fix up some rail lines or to buy some more hopper cars or engines to pull the grain, or to fix up the grain drying facilities, or a whole host of other expenses. If that act is to be interpreted in the loose way it is drafted, it cannot be left simply to the judgment of the elected officials of the Canadian Wheat Board. There must be a distinct difference between making policy direction decisions and decisions which relate to the actual dollars that go back to the farmers' pockets. I should like the parliamentary secretary to address himself to that second point.

● (2215)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I find it most surprising that a member opposite should show such a lack of confidence in the Canadian Wheat Board and I find it even more surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member should imagine that the Minister of Transport, any other minister or any other member of this House would know by heart all the sections and subsections in the statutes of Canada which fill at least 30 library shelves.

What surprises me even more, Mr. Speaker, is that if the hon. member had indeed listened to the answers the minister gave today the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk) he would probably not have to quote from the letters he wrote or even the statutes of Canada.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to quote in turn, the way the hon. member did, the answer the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) gave today to the question by the hon. member for Portage, on exactly the same subject when the minister indicated with respect to the purchase of 2,000 hopper cars by the Canadian Wheat Board, and I quote:

[English]

—indicated at that time that my consent was not required and that the board had its own authority in this matter. I had advance knowledge of its consideration of the matter, and of course I realized they had discussed the matter with the elected advisory committee of producers. After public reaction about the hopper cars, I was concerned that they review the matter.

The minister went on to say that the Wheat Board went back to the advisory committee, looked at it again, and concluded again that the right thing was to go ahead with the purchase.

[Translation]

With respect to the second point, Mr. Speaker, about farmers and the funds necessary to operate the Canadian Wheat Board, the minister clearly indicated they too have a word to say in the decisions of the Canadian Wheat Board, and I would like to quote from the answer the minister gave in this House today as follows:

[English]

—that there is an elected body of advisers to the Wheat Board who were elected just freshly toward the end of last year, the first year of their term." They were consulted, but beyond that, as tc what they can or cannot do in precise legal terms, the minister suggested that the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk) should consult his own advisers.

The decision of the Canadian Wheat Board must be taken in the context of what the federal government has accomplished over the past few years to upgrade the grain handling and transportation system. The government has already purchased 8,000 hopper cars for grain movement at the cost of $260 million.

[Translation]

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the government constantly reassesses the need to purchase additional hopper cars. However, it must make sure these are absolutely necessary before allocating public funds for that purpose. That precaution is particularly important in this period of government restrictions.

To get the most out of the cars used for hauling grain, Mr. Speaker, we see that improved efficiency in the past three years shows one third fewer cars were required in 1977 to haul the same amount of grain as was moved in 1974.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—STEPS TO IMPROVE CAPE BRETON COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister, in his answers to my questions of March 15, for giving the people of Cape Breton such hope, and especially for assuring coal miners and the unemployed that they could expect a positive answer from the federal government on the question of opening a new coal mine at Donkin outside the town of Glace Bay.

● (2220)

The minister mentioned that the past help given to the coal division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation is a sign that the Cape Breton mining communities can anticipate good news about Donkin. That is how I interpreted his answer to my supplementary question. I want to tell him we all appreciate that help. Despite some mistakes, Devco's coal division has done a better job for the miners than its predecessors, Dosco and Hawker-Siddeley, which fed at the federal government from the 1920s until they abandoned Cape Breton in the mid-1960s.

In passing I just want the minister to know that if the Liberal government has listened to the late MP, Mr. Clary Gillis, in 1947, it would have nationalized the mines in Cape Breton earlier. If it had adopted his plea for a national fuels policy then we all would have been better off in Canada and we would not have had to wait until the end of the 1970s to get some adequate measures with regard to coal reserves in Cape Breton.

The drilling measures carried on in the last two years have been very encouraging. In the words of the late Devco president, Mr. Bob Matheson, "The coal that was drilled in front of Lingan and No. 26 indicates that Lingan, instead of having a lifespan of 17 years, probably will be able to continue viably for 25 years and this automatically extends the life expectancy of No. 26 as well because it is on the same front."

A paper written by Mr. W. Potter, geologist, on the results of the offshore coal drilling program of 1978, had this to say in paragraph two: "Three holes were drilled at Donkin to examine the quality of the coal found during the 1977 program and to assist the feasibility study for a proposed new mine. The geological resources for the four seams, that is Point Aconi, Lloyd Cove, Hub and Harbour, are two billion tons." Reserves were also found that hopefully will see a new mine at the Prince mine site on the north side.

We all realize that having such a large amount of coal does not mean that present mining technology or the economics of extracting the coal are all favourable. Certainly the coal has been proven to be of good quality for thermal use, if not for coke oven use in a steel plant. Therefore the demand of the Nova Scotia government and its power commission play a crucial role in determining the beginning date for the tunneling operation that must procede the actual extraction of the coal. There is every indication from the premier of Nova Scotia and his minister of mines that they are anxious to get the Donkin mine started as soon as possible.

The minister of mines, Mr. Barkhouse, who is also chairman of the Nova Scotia energy council, sent a telegram to the minister in charge of Devco, Mr. Lessard, on February 27, which in essence urges the federal government to open Donkin. This is good news but before a final announcement of a starting date for opening Donkin can be given, the contractual price demanded by the Nova Scotia Power Commission, as well as royalty rates and length of contracts, all have to be negotiated between Devco and the Nova Scotia Power Commission. The present royalty paid to Nova Scotia government is 25 cents per ton. Is that going to be constant for the life of the Donkin contract?

When does the province intend to build the third and fourth stages of the generating station at Lingan? The first two stages which will produce 300 megawatts of electricity at a cost of some $180 million are due on stream by 1980. They will burn some 800,000 tons of coal. The next two stages or, if there is only a third stage, will produce an additional 300 megawatts and burn another 800,000 tons.

The accelerating price of crude and bunker C oil, which all the evidence shows will go much higher, is a special incentive to use coal-fired thermal plants. Given the insecurity of foreign oil supplies, security of supply from having coal at the back-door, so to speak, is another very important reason for going ahead without further delay. It will take some four to six years to develop a mine producing some two million tons a year from Donkin. The federal promise of last year should now be confirmed, and Devco and the Nova Scotia government should start negotiating immediately.

There is no good reason that I can see why the Donkin mine cannot be started by June or July. There is every indication that this will prove to be a good investment for the federal government and the Nova Scotia government, as we try to limit imports of foreign oil. Millions and millions of dollars of oil compensation payments by the federal government will be saved. Our country's serious balance of payments situation will be helped. The desperate unemployment problem in the construction and in the coal mining sector of Cape Breton will be greatly alleviated. These are the major important economic and social benefits that will far outweigh financial costs involved.

● (2225)

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words about Devco tonight. I am sure that the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) shares my pride and that of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) in the solid record of achievement of Devco.

Devco is an excellent example of the courage and determination of Cape Bretoners and what they can achieve when backed by a committed federal government. It should be widely recognized and appreciated that Devco has turned the Cape Breton coal industry around, that, for example, the Lingan mine is recognized by mining experts around the world as the most productive advancing longwall coal mine in the world.

The hon. member has raised the question of the proposed new Donkin mine. Let there be no doubt as to this government's commitment to do everything possible to develop a viable mine near Donkin. It was this government that spent over $10 million to finance the coal exploration which proved the reserves necessary to support a new mine. It is this government, through Devco, that is paying for the feasibility study of which the hon. member speaks. It is this government that committed itself in principle almost a year ago to proceed with a new Donkin mine if it is shown to be feasible.

The engineering consulting firm which Devco engaged to do the feasibility study on the Donkin mine proposal is now in the final stages of writing its report to the corporation. The report will be a rather lengthy document of up to six volumes, and as soon as it is ready the corporation will make a copy available to the minister and review the document with him.

One volume of the report will be an executive summary and this volume will be the first released. The hon. member may be assured that we shall keep him advised of the progress of this matter.

The hon. member expressed concern as to whether or not the final federal decision will be made before, during or after the election campaign. This is a most difficult question to judge. As the hon. member knows, there is much work involved in evaluating a report of this size. He knows as well that no technical report can replace good policy judgment even though those reports are an essential part of decision making. He knows too that Devco must prepare its plan for development for government approval.

I can only assure him that the government will move with the same determination it has demonstrated in the past and that a decision will be made as quickly as possible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

REASON FOR DELAY IN ACTING TO AVOID POSSIBLE OIL SPILL FROM "KURDISTAN"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of some urgency to Canadians.

Given the presence of two actual and one potential environmentally dangerous hazards arising out of the Kurdistan incident, and in view of accessible, dedicated, knowledgeable and highly competent professional advice, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House call on the Minister of Transport, the Minister of the Environment, and the Deputy Prime Minister to explain on motions later today why it took up to six days to decide on a course of action with respect to the stern section, and on the Prime Minister of the country to explain why the Nova Scotia government was not fully consulted in the decision-making process.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON "KURDISTAN" INCIDENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 refers to the same subject matter. It relates to the shipping and environmental policies and methods of this government in the matter of the Kurdistan which, as the House knows, is an oil tanker in distress off Chedabucto Bay.

Since this vessel, with her engine-room sound and intact and steam in her boilers, could, as so many crippled vessels in the past, have proceeded under her own power or with minimal assistance to a suitable port; and since the Minister of Transport, who had ultimate authority, delayed and dithered for several days while drift ice closed in and complicated matters, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the minister or his acting minister, today on motions, make a statement setting out the reasons for the indecisiveness and confusion which has paralysed this government, years after the Arrow disaster in the same area underscored the necessity for coherent plans, legislative authority and automatic decision-making powers to act expeditiously in matters such as this, and to assure the House, Mr. Speaker, that under the guidance of the Minister of Transport, the Kurdistan is not making due progress toward Cerebus Rock for a repeat performance.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED CLOSING OF WINNIPEG POSTAL STATION—REQUEST DECISION BE REVIEWED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is admittedly a very local issue, but judging from the number of telephone calls to my constituency office from residents of my area, as well as from the adjoining area of Winnipeg South Centre, it is one of urgent and pressing concern. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I move:

That this House urges the Postmaster General to review the decision to close Postal Station D in Winnipeg, it being the view of this House that the service provided to the residents of that part of Winnipeg should be continued.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be introduced for debate in the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

TIMING OF DECISION TO SALVAGE OIL TANKER "KURDISTAN"

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It is now nine years since the Arrow disaster in the Strait of Canso off the Nova Scotia coast. I have two or three questions I would like to direct to the minister. Precisely when in time were the minister's advisers able to determine the integrity of the hull and the engine-room of the oil tanker Kurdistan and decide that it could be salvaged in a reasonably safe operation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as soon as it was possible to investigate the stern section, that fact was ascertained. I cannot tell the hon. member when they reached the conclusion that it was indeed safe. I was first given a preliminary indication of that in a briefing three mornings ago. At that stage, further examination was still going to take place. I am interested in finding out why the hon. member is interested in exactly what happened at what stage of the process.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, six days is too long to gamble on an environmental hazard created by the wiles of the ice-packs in the Cabot Strait and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the weather, particularly at this time of year.

Why did the government have to wait? Why could it not deal with the legal problems with more dispatch? Is it because neither the minister's department nor the Department of the Environment have adequate statutory authority to deal with matters of this nature with much greater dispatch? Was it a technical, or a legal problem that caused the undue delay?

Mr. Lang: It was a combination of things, Mr. Speaker; but I do not grant for a moment that there was undue delay. It was a very serious decision to take, to allow a vessel which had suffered any kind of mishap to come alongside the Canadian coastline with a cargo of oil on board.

We wanted to be sure on the technical basis that the risk was small. We also wanted to have complete protection from a legal point of view in relation to any possible costs and damage even though it was small. Experts in relation to this kind of contract came together from quite a few different places in the world, experts who had been associated with a similar event in Rotterdam and the like.

The question of negotiation and the extent of liability which we would insist upon were important questions on which I wanted to be satisfied. In the meantime, however, it was not as though the time was being lost. The vessel was put under tow. At first, while there was a question about the adequacy of the stern to survive the seas, it was being moved in an outward direction toward deeper water. When it became apparent that salvage was distinctly possible, and having regard to winds in any case, the direction of the tow was changed: it moved toward the Port Hawkesbury destination. When the critical point was reached where it would have been necessary to turn either out to the sea or in toward the bay, the decision had already been made.

• (1115)

Therefore, while the legal matters did take some time, it was not as though time was lost. I hope the hon. member will agree with us that in making a most serious decision involving an element of risk it was necessary to be sure as to the size of that risk and be completely protected from the legal and financial points of view.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Forrestall: The minister's response is totally inadequate, of course. Six days is far too long to gamble on ice and weather conditions in the Guif of St. Lawrence, and the minister knows it.

May I direct a final question to the Acting Prime Minister, whoever he may be today, and ask whether in his view it would be worth while, once the formal investigation into this matter has been completed, to refer this whole question to an appropriate standing committee of the House in order to determine whether the existing statutory authority available to the Minister of Transport and to the Minister of State for the Evironment is adequate to enable them to cope with disasters of this nature with much more dispatch than we have seen in the last week?

Mr. Lang: Obviously, in the course of examining the alternatives available to us we have begun to draw some conclusions about our powers and the exact legal situation in a variety of very difficult circumstances. I would think that, as a result, we would be coming forward in due course with some changes.

I do not think we needed a different set of powers in the situation which actually faced us, but as we reviewed alternative circumstances, when we were not sure what those circumstances would be, I was concerned about the extent of our powers and I will want to propose some legislative changes.

ICE SURVEILLANCE CAPABILITY IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might direct some supplementary questions to the born-again Minister of Transport. The same ice conditions that are compounding the threat to the tanker Kurdistan have caused the entire CN ferry fleet to be stuck in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, with 317 passengers stranded on three ships. A fourth, the Frederick Carter, left port this morning only to be caught in the ice a short time later.

Where is our ice surveillance capability? Why would these ships leave port, knowing that the wind has not changed, knowing full well they will be stuck in the ice, knowing full well we do not have the ice-breaking capacity to free them? Why would the coastguard allow this to happen?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Essentially, I think, because of the hope in each case that the trip might be completed. A good deal of our ice-breaker strength is, of course, in the vicinity. These vessels are helping in every way they can. Obviously, there are people waiting to board the ferries, and if there is any chance at all I am sure they move out.

I have not inquired into the exact circumstances of the departure of each vessel, which is probably what the hon. member has in mind. After all, this involves a judgment by local management and those who operate the vessels, no doubt in response to the needs of people who want to make the crossing.

Mr. McGrath: I am astounded at the minister's reply. One of these ships, the Robert Bond, with 60 passengers aboard, has been stuck in the ice since 2 o'clock last Monday. Surely the Canadian coastguard has some jurisdiction. Surely it must have weather data at its disposal; it must have knowledge of ice conditions. After all, ice is not unknown in the Cabot Strait at this time of year: perhaps the minister does not know that.

Why has this situation been allowed to arise? Why has it been allowed to get worse, with people stranded at Port aux Basques and Sydney, with another ferry leaving this morning? Surely the coastguard must have some jurisdiction here and, if not, why not?

Mr. Lang: The coastguard is certainly in operation in connection with this exercise. The Labrador and the St. Laurent are there, hard at work in an effort to free these vessels. I cannot understand the hon. member's logic. He is critical of the fact that passengers are stranded at Sydney and Port aux Basques. At the same time he is critical of the fact that vessels move out when we should know that at this time of year there is ice in the strait. Is he suggesting that we cancel service cross the strait at certain times of the year because there may be ice? I think that is a rather ridiculous suggestion.

I suggest that the right thing is to rely on the judgment of the people who are operating the vessels and who expect that, with coastguard help, they may be able to get through. When, suddenly, very difficult winds trap vessels which are ordinarily capable of managing the ice, obviously there is a difficulty. But I do not think the hon. member has any solution, unless he wants to build airports at each end as well.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, we are not dealing with a hypothetical situation; we are dealing with ice which has been there since last Monday. One ferry has been stuck since last Monday, yet CN continues to accept passengers, knowing the weather has not changed and knowing ice conditions are still the same. Ships are still allowed to leave the port, knowing full well that a short while after leaving either Port aux Basques or Sydney they will be caught in the ice.

What does the minister intend to do about it? Does he intend to put in place some kind of ice surveillance capability which would say to CN, "Sorry, you cannot leave today because the ice has packed in, the wind is not changing and you are going to be stuck"? Why does the Canadian coastguard not provide that kind of service?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I suppose one thing I can be sure of is that if passengers were not allowed to board a vessel to make the crossing because somebody said there was ice out there, and then because of a sudden change of winds, vessels were able to move across that strait, the hon. member for St. John's East would be criticizing the failure to move those passengers.

The fact is that, at least as informed as I am, wind and ice conditions can change very quickly in terms of whether vessels can move through, and that can happen between the time of departure and the time of arrival. As I say, I am not an expert on whether these vessels should move out to sea.

Miss MacDonald: You sure are not.

Mr. Lang: The hon. lady for Kingston and the Islands says I am not. I said I am not; therefore I have some trust and faith in the captains of the vessels and the operators of the system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

THREAT OF OIL POLLUTION TO FISHERY AND BEACHES IN TOWING "KURDISTAN"

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Environment) and it relates to the Kurdistan incident.

In view of the concern expressed by fishermen in the Canso Strait area that the federal government has allowed the stern section of the oil tanker Kurdistan to be towed towards Chedabucto Bay, and given the discovery of a new oil slick in the area, can the minister explain why the towing commenced, given the dangerous ice conditions in the bay and the real threat of pollution on the beaches and in the fishing grounds? Many of us fear that the value of the cargo is taking precedence over safety of the environment.

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, environmentally, all factors were evaluated. A number of other ports were evaluated as well. In the view of my officials who are on the scene, as well as in the view of Environment Nova Scotia, the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Transport, the route to Port Hawkesbury, with all of the conditions which the salvor would have to agree to, was the safest one to take.

It was the view of our officials that with the appropriate icebreaking equipment on hand, there really was no environmental risk or, at least, that the risk if any was really very minimal.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, in light of that answer, I wonder if the minister can explain reports in the media this morning that the plans to tow the tanker to Port Hawkesbury have been abandoned because officials of the oil industry say it is too dangerous to move it through the dangerous ice conditions in the bay for unloading at Hawkesbury. I would like the minister to inform the House whether this is true or not.

In addition, given the past experience of the Arrow oil spill disaster, can the minister explain why it has taken so long—over six days—to determine what course of action to take? It seems to me that this is an indication that the government is not well prepared.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I am checking on the validity of those press reports. It is my understanding that all appropriate arrangements have been made for the stern once it arrives at Port Hawkesbury. I think my colleague, the Minister of Transport, explained very clearly, in an answer he gave earlier to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, why it took six days. Those six days were not all lost by doing nothing. It took some time for both the stern and the bow sections to be in a position which would allow a decision to be made.

● (1125)

If the hon. member will recall, the weather conditions were absolutely awful in the whole area and a lot of danger was involved. If the decision had been taken to tow the vessel into deep water, they would have been bucking severe weather conditions. There is a possibility it could not have been done, two lines could have broken, and so on. So the decision was made that the best possible solution was to attach tugs to both the stern and the bow sections and try to nurse them along in the best way possible until a decision was made. Now a decision has been made and we are just waiting for the fog to clear at Chedabucto Bay so that the stern can be brought safely into Port Hawkesbury.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, again I worry about the safety aspects, since the reports say that a new oil slick has been sighted. If the government intends to proceed to tow the stern into the bay, then indeed the fishery may be in danger.

My final supplementary is this: The minister says that all the legal ramifications and the insurance problems explain the six-day delay in coming to a decision as to which way to tow the stern. Surely the minister would agree that, in light of the Arrow incident, his department should have had regulations in place so there would not be this delay in terms of determining liability and what the insurance results would be.

Mr. Marchand: I do not think there was really any serious delay. As far as the advice being given by my officials is concerned, it had nothing to do with the legalities: these were being negotiated by Transport Canada. The advice that my officials gave was based on environmental grounds and we agreed finally with the decision, which was agreed to by all parties concerned, that the safest thing to do environmentally was to go into Port Hawkesbury.

I would say to the hon. member that there has been some oil-stained ice observed in the vicinity, or north of the entrance to Chedabucto Bay. It is oil-stained floe ice which we feel came into that area from the original site where the tanker Kurdistan broke up. We do not have a complete evaluation of it yet, but since we found it yesterday there have been a number of surveillance flights over it. To the best of our knowledge, there is really no danger at this point. This is not a slick; the officials are calling it oil-stained ice. There is no environmental danger observed. But we hope we will be able to get people on site and not just rely on aerial observations. We will be able to bring people on site today to observe exactly the condition of these oil stains, and if any clean-up action has to be taken, we have plans and equipment and it will be taken once we have made the evaluation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL CONTRIBUTE TO ESTABLISHMENT IN QUEBEC OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that a few years ago the federal and provincial governments set up an organization to study the possibility of establishing a guaranteed annual income plan in Canada and considering that it has become a question of current interest at the Quebec legislature, would the minister tell the House whether there has been some kind of agreement with the Quebec government and, as a result of such agreement or negotiation would the federal government be expected to make a financial contribution under that new policy?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, of course no member of the federal government nor any official has been consulted or advised of that plan about which I only know what I heard by mere chance on television late last night and what I read in the newspapers this morning. I am therefore waiting to see what suggestions will be made to us.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

If his remarks have been correctly reported by the media, Quebec minister Marois intends to apply to the federal government in general and the Department of National Health and Welfare in particular for a contribution to the implementation of this program. Could the minister advise the House whether, together with her officials, she will look carefully into these proposals and report to the House before any agreement is finalized?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I have with me the papers which the hon. member is referring to. There is a picture of Mr. Marois with several mikes in front of him. The caption reads: "Minister Marois will soon write Miss Bégin". I am therefore waiting to hear from him. The minister makes statements on TV, but he does not speak to me. If and when I receive a document, I shall look into it. I must say, however, to the hon. member—who is certainly already aware of it—that we are not paying supplements to workers who are being paid wages.

Poverty is such in Canada even today that we are trying to pay a supplement to those Canadians who are the most vulnerable. The Quebec government has just cancelled the increase which social welfare mothers were supposed to get. It is somewhat ironic that it now seeks supplements for people who already hold good jobs. But we shall certainly look into these proposals. We have just reviewed our estimates, and under the Canada Assistance Plan, $575 million are earmarked again this year for Quebec. We intend to wait and examine the situation.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another supplementary.

In view of the study conducted by the health and welfare department on the establishment of a national guaranteed minimum income scheme, reports of which were distributed to members, does the minister intend to pursue this line in order to achieve these objectives which would, in my view, help fight poverty? I am thinking only of the national level, disregarding the position of the provinces in this matter.

Miss Bégin: It is very difficult in the present climate of economic restraint in Canada and in each of the provinces to speak of a universal guaranteed annual income scheme—which would be the ideal—unilaterally funded by the federal government, for the simple reason that it would cost $7 billion. I have just received estimates in this regard. However, it is possible to implement selective programs aimed at the most vulnerable and needy groups, such as children living in poverty, and that is why we will continue to adopt such measures as the child tax credit.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

"KURDISTAN" INCIDENT—LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY OF MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for the Environment and it concerns the Kurdistan incident. I hope the minister will agree that having a spotted oil slick of some 35 kilometres in length, the proposal to take one part of the vessel containing tons of oil and sink it in deep water, and the proposal to tow the other section into port constitutes creating a potentially serious environmental hazard.

Setting aside weather, ice and fog conditions—none of which are unexpected in that particular location at this time of year—may I ask the Minister of State for the Environment what his legislative authority is to take action? What act of parliament gives him the authority to act? What action has the minister taken under that authority?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —the reason for my rising after discussion at this moment with the Minister of State for the Environment is that, by and large, much of the authority in relation to the incident is in the hands of the Minister of Transport. There is a variety of pieces of legislation, including those in relation to shipping and those in relation to pollution. I would need to ask the member more specifically what action he would have liked to see us take; then I could recite whether we had authority to do it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, that is absolute nonsense. My question is directed to the Minister of State for the Environment. With respect to Canadian coastal waters, including the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the west coast and the Beaufort Sea, is it not a fact the Minister of State for the Environment, despite the potential for serious environmental threat, has absolutely no legislative authority to take any action, except the Ocean Dumping Control Act which the minister knows full well was never designed to handle a situation like this?

Is it not true that the sole authority in this situation rests with either the Minister of Transport or, I presume, in the Beaufort Sea the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development? Despite the environmental hazard, is it not a fact that this minister has no authority to act whatsoever by way of legislation of this parliament?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the hon. member is getting indignant about the thing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: What is a little oil here and there?

Mr. Marchand: I do not know why the hon. member is waxing indignant about whether I have legislation under my authority or whether the legislative authority is in the hands of another department.

An hon. Member: Who speaks for the environment?

Mr. Marchand: He knows full well that the Department of the Environment does not have regulatory authority over every department of government. The hon. member knows that. He is a lawyer; I am not. I do not see any reason why the Department of the Environment should have all kinds of regulatory powers. We have a lot of advisory powers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand: As long as I am satisfied—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand: Some members laugh, but I am sure they would not want me, in the Department of the Environment, to be the pollution czar and run every environmental aspect of every government department, including provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand: Provincial governments have some authority, too. That is why we work together with them. We work together with other departments and with the provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: To answer the minister's question, I would feel a lot better knowing that this potential environmental threat was not in the hands of the Minister of Transport. That is one reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: If the Minister of State for the Environment is content to play that advisory role, then is his position that the responsibility for the Ocean Dumping Control Act should rest with a ministry other than the Department of the Environment?

Mr. Marchand: No, I did not say that, Mr. Speaker. There are certain acts of government that we administer directly, one of which, as the hon. member knows, is the Ocean Dumping Control Act. The Environmental Contaminants Act and the Canada Water Act are others. We have some of them; but in certain situations I am sure the hon. member does not want me to have all the authority relating to pollution under the Transport Act.

Mr. Jarvis: In this situation, I do.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, if it will make the hon. member feel any better, now that the reorganization legislation is going through we in my department are examining all the legislative authority we have. At some point we will bring forward an omnibus bill which will address some of the deficiencies located in some of the legislation we have at our disposal.

I repeat that I do not want to put myself into the position of being a pollution czar, having all regulatory authority in this country to handle every situation. Certainly there must be regulatory authority left with the Department of Transport, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and other governments. We will have in my department the capacity to make sure that the environmental legislation brought forward through the various departments is adequate and meets the requirements we have as an environment department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROGRAMS FOR DEPRESSED AREAS OF CANADA

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister responsible for DREE. Over the years, complaints have been lodged by some very responsible people, in and out of the House, respecting the accomplishments and the method of administration of DREE and other developmental programs designed for depressed areas of Canada. I think the remarks this morning of Mr. Daigle, the leader of the Liberal party in New Brunswick, make these objections gilt-edged and the source of criticism now has become impeccable.

• (1140)

Will the minister responsible for DREE advise this House whether he has any intention of changing some of the directions in which DREE has been going ineffectually, and will he now consider the objectives promoted by those who have suggested criticism to him by representation both by way of governmental and independent sources of advice?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I know nothing of the criticisms or suggestions Mr. Daigle may have made this morning. Of course, I shall look into them with interest, as I always do into whatever suggestions come to me from both sides of the House, as well as outside groups and the provincial governments with whom I have always co-operated closely.

With regard to the possibility of changing the present policy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to reflect those proposals, suggestions and criticisms, I can assure the House that I am always willing to do so; I always consider that possibility and indeed the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has shown through the years that it can adapt to constantly evolving circumstances. I can assure the House that we shall continue to do so in coming years. We will continue to adapt to changing situations because that department must in fact take advantage of opportunities as they come along.

[English]

Mr. McCain: The press report this morning says that Mr. Daigle also said that if present federal policies continue for a few years, New Brunswick will be in the forefront of the national unity debate looking for a way out or a much better deal, in the same manner as Quebec. I think this emphasizes the seriousness with which those who need this deparment and its effectual administration treat it and its present non-political approach.

Will the minister agree to meet with the responsible authorities and interested parties in that area of Canada where DREE may be applied, and particularly in New Brunswick, to set down new guidelines for more productive and effective expenditures of money for the purposes for which it was developed and which are so badly needed?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I hope one is not going to read the comments of the hon. member as being critical of the provincial government of New Brunswick because, in effect, what DREE has been doing in the last few years is responding to requests, suggestions and proposals by the provincial Conservative government of New Brunswick. If this gentleman feels this is not proper and what we have done for New Brunswick should not have been done, I think the first one to be blamed would be the provincial government of New Brunswick itself.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

POSSIBLE DANGER IN USE OF CHILD VACCINE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns the recent recall in the United States of a large amount of a common child vaccine, D.P.T., after the death of four babies to whom it had been administered shortly before. These deaths are not necessarily related to the vaccine.

I would ask whether the minister has been in touch with her officials and the United States administration in respect of this matter, and is any action indicated?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire and report to the House as soon as possible.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

PROPOSED CHANGES FROM IMPERIAL TO METRIC SYSTEM

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that on March 17 the minister's department published in the Canada Gazette proposed regulations under the Weights and Measures Act providing for mandatory changes from the Imperial to the metric system after June 30 in the retail trade in respect of piece goods, and after December 31 of this year in the retail trade in respect of floor coverings, household textiles and wallpaper, and in view of the fact that there is considerable disagreement in the trade regarding conversion to metric, can the minister advise whether he has had consultations with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to discuss the use of mandatory regulations, or is it the minister's own decision that the government should proceed by regulation rather than legislation, and thus deprive parliament of the opportunity of a free and open debate?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not have these consultations personally. They were held among officials of my department and other concerned departments. In view of the representations by the hon. member, I will take a second look at this matter, to see whether his complaints are well founded.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I would direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I hope he was not leaving because he anticipated a question on this subject.

In the March 3 issue of the Ottawa Journal, the minister is quoted by a distinguished member of the parliamentary press bureau as having said that Canada will have to slow down in its conversion to the metric system to get more in line with the U.S. Would the minister advise this House whether he has agreed to the mandatory imposition of the metric system by regulations drafted by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or has he perhaps abandoned his love for the democratic process through which parliament debates and decides questions of importance to the general public?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, let me answer the last part of that question first. I certainly have not abandoned the democratic process. I have always been prepared to participate fully on the subject of metrification and on any other subject, but in the past I was prohibited by the party I formerly belonged to from participating in debates—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: I am not prohibited in any way now, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: With regard to a comparison of conversion to the metric system as between Canada and the United States, in some instances we are ahead and in some instances we are equal. But in every instance in moving toward modernization of our industry, I would rather lead than follow, because if you follow you are naturally behind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: I would like to think that Canadian industry would be world leaders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

IMMIGRATION

OPPORTUNITY FOR WOULD-BE IMMIGRANTS TO ANSWER ADMINISTRATIVE OBJECTIONS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In light of the fact that his department is contesting in the courts the right of the Canadian Human Rights Commission to question or review the activities within his department, I would ask the minister if he can assure this House that refugees, whether resident or non-resident, who apply to be allowed to stay in Canada shall first of all be told the nature of the objections to their staying in or coming to Canada and, secondly, will they be given a clearly open and personal hearing so they can present their answers to such objections?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was at the committee last night when I made a rather comprehensive response to the church group which came before us with a splendid brief. I indicated that the giving of reasons was something I would pursue. I am having that checked into to determine the best way of doing it.

In so far as personal hearings are concerned, of course, a refugee has the opportunity to make a presentation, to answer questions, to look at the transcript that is prepared and to make any corrections and, for that matter, to make any additions. He has the opportunity to do that in the presence of counsel before the matter ever gets to the refugee status advisory committee; and then, if turned down there, a special review within the department is carried out. Also, subsequent to that there are Immigration Appeal Board proceedings.

● (1150)

An hon. Member: Another hearing.

Mr. Cullen: What is being sought by the New Democratic Party now is another hearing. I am indicating that it then goes back to the Immigration Appeal Board, which makes a determination on whether there are reasonable grounds for believing that a full and open hearing should be held.

I have written to the chairman of the Immigration Appeal Board asking her to look at the representation made by the church group to determine if more cases could be heard. We are all interested in cutting out frivolous cases, because they work to the disadvantage of legitimate applicants. I have asked Miss Scott to look into that aspect.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. To move from the general to the particular, will the minister state whether Mrs. Luchsinger will be given such an opportunity to appear before the Security Advisory Board and present her side of the case, as suggested by Mr. John Carson who is a member of the advisory committee and who recommends such action?

Mr. Alexander: That is my position.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, there is always someone around to take credit. The Security Advisory Board was established so that I could refer to it evidence that is presented to me and ask what weight should be given to that evidence. I think they have handled about five cases. At the present time, they are trying to determine a proper and a regular procedure which may very well involve calling in the individual.

I am not saying this is so in the Luchsinger case because I think there is some confusion here. Mrs. Luchsinger is not applying for refugee status. She is here on a ministerial permit and wants landed immigrant status. She is not a refugee. She travels on a German passport, so she is not a refugee from Chile. She can go back to Germany any time she likes. She is here under a ministerial permit and is seeking landed immigrant status: I think that should be made clear.

[Mr. Brewin.]

As far as a personal appearance is concerned, I will be discussing that question with the Security Advisory Board. I think it is a little early to do so now. I have asked Mr. Carson, Mr. Cadieux and Mr. Justice Noel to look at the procedures to determine what would be best.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

ASSISTANCE TO PERSONS REQUIRING TOOLS IN METRIC MEASUREMENTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Metric Commission and concerns the assistance program for tool conversion. Some time ago I raised a question regarding assistance of this type for farmers and other individuals.

In light of the fact that the program is now in place to aid employees requiring metric tools, will the department give consideration to broadening the program to assist farmers, carpenters and small owner-operators of local garages and businesses who will also have to convert to the metric system?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, my information is that they already enjoy some benefit. I should like to take the question as a representation and take it up with my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is very close to this question of metrification and is very interested in all its aspects.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

McINTYRE REPORT—ALLEGED HARASSMENT BY MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, having received no response to questions placed on the order paper on February 19, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a question respecting a report of Judge Leo McIntyre to the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia in relation to his commission's report of alleged harassment of a doctor by the RCMP.

Could the Solicitor General tell me what action, if any, he intends to take as a result of this commission inquiry. If he does not intend to take any action himself, is he going to refer the matter to the Minister of Justice, to the McDonald commission, to the attorney general of Nova Scotia, or what will be the final result as far as action is concerned?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the hon. gentleman's question on the order paper, unfortunately that has not been drawn to my attention. I would have preferred that the question be answered in that particular context.

The report of Mr. Justice McIntyre was made some time ago. Its details are not fresh in my memory, and I hope the hon. member will permit me to refresh my memory and provide him with an answer in the very near future.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the Solicitor General is doing that, would he also indicate in his response, in due course, whether any members of the force who were involved in this harassment with the knowledge of their superior officers of the circumstances which later came to light in the commission's report, were promoted?

Mr. Blais: Of course, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

INCREASE IN COMPENSATION FOR BRUCELLOSIS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Because of the importance of the increase in compensation for brucellosis, can the minister state whether he has an announcement to make today.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am in a difficult position, Mr. Speaker. I should like to be able to announce it, but by government regulation it will have to wait for a couple more days.

TRANSPORT

UNITED STATES OFFICIAL'S POSITION THAT AUTOMOBILE SHOULD BE REINVENTED—MINISTER'S VIEW

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. A few days ago, President Carter's Secretary of Transport, appearing before the relevant subcommittee of the House of Representatives, said, in relation to the slaughter on the highways, environmental problems and fuel consumption, that it was his position the automobile should be reinvented. In light of this very serious proposition, I should like to know if the minister shares his views.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have been very concerned about safety problems related to automobile travel, and also pollution and energy conservation. As a result of some vigorous initiatives by the federal government, working with the provinces, we have introduced many safety features which have produced a far better record in terms of accidents, injuries and fatalities than we had before or that anyone had predicted.

In addition, working with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, we have introduced guidelines for automobile manufacturers so that they will have to make significant changes over the next few years, producing lighter weight cars and more efficient engines in order to lower gas consumption on a per mile basis. This is bound to have an important impact on the manufacturing industry.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Some years ago, the federal government held talks with officials in the state of New York and with federal authorities in the United States on the possibility of Canada-U.S. co-operation in a publicly-built car in order to set standards for safety and the environment in particular.

Is it possible that now, in view of the declaration of the U.S. Secretary of Transport before the subcommittee a few days ago, that these negotiations could be reopened in relation to a publicly-built car in order to set performance standards?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am always willing to enter into discussions which might promote safety or energy conservation. We take certain initiatives ourselves, of course, and no doubt the United States benefits from them. Just recently we agreed to the investment of significant funds in the development of prototype electric vehicles and the solving of some problems in relation to that type of power for vehicles. I think this is the kind of initiative which is important. Of course, I am always delighted to share this with the United States, as I am sure they are to share their initiatives with us.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICAL CARE PLAN—REPRESENTATIONS FROM NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of the continuing controversy surrounding Canada's magnificent medicare plan.

Has the minister received any representations on this controversy from the government of New Brunswick and, if so, what was their purpose?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram from Premier Hatfield this morning, asking me to convene a meeting of all health ministers and all finance ministers, and putting the blame on doctors for the eventual erosion of medicare. He wants a federal-provincial meeting right away, which surprises me enormously since two years ago the federal government, to be flexible—as we were asked to be by the provinces—gave them bloc funding with fantastically generous payments. These cost-sharing payments will be close to $6 billion this coming fiscal year.

● (1200)

If they cannot put their house in order when they are given the administration of medicare, I do not know how we can do it for them.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT TO HIGH RATE OF INFLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the very nimble Minister of Finance and the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the extraordinarily complacement remarks made yesterday that the rate of inflation is a little high. With, now, five years since the last election and with the rate of inflation running at about 9 per cent annually, I ask the minister what has happened to the fiery desire of his leader to wrestle inflation to the ground?

What has happened to the assurances given by the government some four years ago that by now we would have a rate of inflation of 4 per cent? Why is the Minister of Finance now almost accepting the current rate of inflation and saying that it is a little high?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we do not accept the fact that inflation is at a normal level. We are trying to reduce it as quickly and as effectively as possible. Despite the decline of the Canadian dollar in relation to the American dollar, our rate of inflation is lower than that of the United States. However, I do find that it is too high. I would like to reduce it, and I have made predictions that the rate of inflation will be declining to the end of the year.

Most economic spokesmen say that inflation will go down during the year but not as low as everyone would like to see it. Everyone would like to have a zero rate of inflation. It seems to me that because of world conditions at this time, and with increases in the price of oil and other pressures coming not only from internal sources but from external sources, it will be very difficult to reach the goal we have in mind and achieve a very low rate or even a zero rate of inflation. I am quite sure that by the end of the year inflation in Canada will be lower than it is today.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, we have had a succession of assurances and predictions from successive ministers of finance, yet what we have is a state of affairs where the rate of inflation is around 9 per cent and Canadians are now borrowing money to maintain their standard of living.

Does the Minister of Finance and his colleagues say nothing more than "Zap; you are frozen at a rate of inflation of 8 to 9 per cent"?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we said that we are having a problem with inflation. We decided to go back to the marketplace. It is a problem that is afflicting not only Canada but everybody else. It would be unrealistic for anyone to say that we can cure inflation just by wishing that inflation would go away.

I have said many times that Canadians over the last year have shown a lot of responsibility; that we have regained our competitive position in world markets and that the competitive level in Canada is such that the increase in unit costs is lower than that in the United States. We have extended our external markets and we put 400,000 Canadians back to work in the last year. Despite the fact that the Canadian dollar is weaker than it was a year ago, the inflation rate is lower in Canada than it is in the United States. That is not a bad performance.

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED

Question No. 225—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Were environmental studies commissioned by Eldorado Nuclear Limited on the Warman area as a possible site for a uranium refinery published in the form of an environmental impact statement in the Spring of 1978 as originally announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and, if not, on what date (a) will they be published (b) will there be public hearings on the findings?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Eldorado Nuclear Limited reports as follows:

No.

(a) mid-1979;

(b) ENL anticipates there will be public hearings on the findings.

POSTAL SERVICE—FREDERICTON, N.B.

Question No. 723—Mr. Howie:

Will the Post Office Department be extending postal services in the Fredericton, New Brunswick area such as mailing counters or sub-post offices?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General):

Canada Post is reviewing an application for a new sub-post office in the Fredericton mall. Other than this, there are not any firm plans to extend postal counters or sub-post offices in the Fredericton area.

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES PURCHASING POLICIES

Question No. 1,236—Mr. Beatty:

1. Is the information about the purchasing policies of the Department of Supply and Services maintained on a constituency basis?

2. In 1978, by constituency, what was the total amount spent by the Department for the purchase of supplies?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Supply and Services):

1. Information about the purchasing data of DSS is not maintained by constituency.

2. Data by constituency can be provided, however, by using special postal code cross reference information supplied by the Post Office. Purchasing information requested is targeted for April 1, 1979, using this method.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—DELAY IN ANSWERING ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The parliamentary secretary was doing so well; he answered six questions just yesterday, which was incredible. Now all of a sudden the number is reduced to three. At this speed we would be here for another two years before all the questions on the order paper are answered.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-38, to amend the Excise Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in being able to participate in this debate on Bill C-38, to amend Canada's excise taxes. I might say that it does seem a little late in coming. The Liberal government has always prided itself on being good administrators of the economy and of matters in the House. Nevertheless the budget speech from which this bill emanates was made November 16. It is now March 23 and we have just started debate on the bill. That is a period of four months between introduction of the bill and debate and is a sad commentary on the way the government has managed House business. It is the power of positive failure. I think the people of Canada are catching on to this attitude.

Bill C-38 does three main things. It revises the airline tax, the gas tax and the sales tax in some complicated jargon. I will comment on some of the amendments which the government has made.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has been quite vocal in the House, in fact laudatory, of his policy of making users pay. The bill before us increases the airline travel tax from $8 to $15. This is almost a 100 per cent increase. It seems to me that the government has again been guilty of some bad management. Not only has it over-built some airports, but it has faced some very high cost overruns in the contruction of those airports. Other hon. members and myself have mentioned the cost of overruns associated with the Calgary airport and Mirabel airport. The construction costs for Calgary International Airport escalated from $57 million to $127 million, more than double the amount of the original estimates.

The Auditor General said at page 506 of his report:

The air carriers expressed strong reservations as to the immediate need for, and concern about the cost of, new terminal facilities.

It is one thing to have a user-pay policy, but it is another thing to make the users prisoners of government policy. It would be all right if users had a choice between that method of transportation and another method. I could then see the rationale for the Minister of Transport's policy of user-pay. However, in a country like ours where air transport is becoming increasingly important and perhaps even mandatory if Canadian citizens wish to see the country and carry on business, for the government to construct facilities which the airlines did not want in the first place and for which users of airlines must pay—because of the Minister of Transport's policy—is making people prisoners of a taxation system from which they cannot get out. If people had an alternative it would be another matter, but many of us do not have that opportunity.

Again I mention the construction costs of the Mirabel airport which escalated to the fine tune of $600 million. It strikes me as somewhat ludicrous that the government continually wants to justify the construction of that airport. I now find that when you fly Air Canada from Ottawa to Europe, instead of going to Mirabel which is 100 miles away, you go to Toronto which is 300 miles away. Obviously Air Canada is not crazy about the idea of using Mirabel even though we have this $600 million bill before us plus $1 million a week operating costs.

● (1210)

The government was not able to explain that not only was it costly to over-build the airport, but there would be the additional cost of operating that airport. Now the Minister of Transport through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) wants to apply the user-pay philosophy so that the public who are now obligated to use those facilities have to pay twice.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) made some very useful observations in his speech yesterday. I simply want to repeat some of them. I quote from page 4431 of Hansard:

> I have a breakdown of the cost of landing a Boeing 747 in Toronto. These figures are based on October 1, 1978, data. I put these figures on the record so hon. members can be apprised of what it costs to land a jumbo jet. The particular example I will give is of a transoceanic flight with a full passenger load. The costs include the en route North Atlantic fee in the amount of $130; the landing fee amounting to $1,596; the general terminal fee assessed at $267; security charge for 429 passengers at 20 cents per passenger amounting to $86; and the fuel throughput charge for 22,000 gallons at 1.5 cents per gallon, amounting to $330. Then we have a provincial fuel tax on 22,000 gallons at three cents per gallon, which amounts to $660, and a transportation tax, 429 passengers at $8, which amounts to $3,432. When you total all those together, and it does not take into consideration the rental of the airline space for counters and so on, it works out to $6,501 to land a 747 with 429 passengers aboard. Those are the rates effective October 1, 1978.
> The impact of the transportation tax at $15 per person will change that $3,432 figure to $6,435. The immediate 30 per cent increase which is going to be imposed on an annual basis over an eight year period when these new landing fees are going to be implemented, will increase that $6,500 figure to $9,604. Those are the kinds of increases about which we are talking.

It costs the airline passenger more to travel. He not only has to pay the extra $7 for the privilege of using the airport facilities, but the extra landing fees. The figures presented to us yesterday by the hon. member for Vegreville do not include the cost of purchasing and maintaining the aircraft and paying the cabin crew and ground crew. Because the minister has over-built the air terminals and because those overbuilt air terminals cost more to maintain—

Mr. Mazankowski: And the aborted ones like Pickering.

Mr. Friesen: As the hon. member for Vegreville says, and the aborted ones like Pickering. All those costs are written into the extravagances of this government. Now the minister wants user-pay. Frankly, the passengers have been used. It is no longer user-pay; it is the used who have to pay.

[Mr. Friesen.]

The bill also deals with gasoline tax. I remember the time about four years ago when we increased the tax on gasoline to be paid to the federal government to ten cents a gallon. The then ministers of finance, two ministers ago, said that much of that tax would ensure conservation of our oil reserves. The excise tax on light aircraft and outboard engines was being imposed in order to help conservation.

Now we have an entirely new tack. Parenthetically, we worried at that time about the government policy that the ten cent tax would be refundable to businesses, fishermen, logging companies, farmers and so forth. We wondered how much of a bureaucracy that would involve, how many people would be hired to count the receipts submitted by those people, how many people would be required in national revenue to tally the receipts and make sure the deductions are legitimate.

Members receive a lot of representations asking why the tax is ten cents a gallon. Rather than increase the tax ten cents a gallon for a few, why not make it five cents a gallon for everyone and cut out a lot of the bureaucracy? Again the government does not pay attention. The argument is conservation; we are going to save energy.

Clause 14 includes a schedule which indicates a special imposition for those with cars that use non-leaded gas. I thought the additional gadgets on these cars were to be pollution control devices. Canadians were encouraged to purchase cars which use that kind of gas. In clause 14 there is a new category, and I quote:

1. Petroleum products, namely,
   (a) gasoline, premium, no lead.....1.3 cents per litre;
   (b) gasoline, grade 1.....1.2 cents per litre;
   (c) gasoline, grade 2.....1.1 cents per litre;
   (d) gasoline, no lead.....1.1 cents per litre;
   (e) diesel fuel.....1.0 cents per litre;—

The government says it wants to encourage economy. It wants to encourage the use of anti-pollution devices on automobiles and then taxes those who co-operate with the government. I wish to quote from a letter I received from a constituent dated February 14, before this tax was added:

> Why is it that the person who operates a pollution controlled vehicle has to pay more for his gas? Don't you think the users of regular grade gas should pay the shot for polluting the atmosphere? I see no great problem for the government to reverse the tax to encourage the use of pollution controlled vehicles. If this is not done soon I will remove the controls from my vehicle so that I too can enjoy cheaper driving. I know that the gas companies claim that the higher price is to pay for new equipment, so it is up to the government to make the ones who are doing the polluting pay for this lopsided public nuisance. I would like some kind of an answer on this subject.

Although I have written to the minister, I do not expect an answer that will satisfy my constituent or myself. Last week I spoke to another constituent who had just come from the garage after having the anti-pollution devices dismantled on her car in order to be able to use regular gas.

People who purchase cars that use unleaded gas which is required for the anti-pollution devices are being punished three times. First, they have to pay more for the car. They have to pay more when they buy a new car. I suppose they have to pay more for servicing, too, because of all the extra gadgets on it; and now they have to pay more for the gas they use. The minister of the environment is calling for a reduction in pollution. Mr. Speaker, the minister of the environment has an office in those new buildings in Hull and his department is pumping raw sewage every day into the Ottawa River.

● (1220)

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Friesen: That is the kind of leadership we get from this government. Here, in the bill before us, unleaded gas costs more, by reason of a tax, than other gas.

An hon. Member: Read subsection (d).

Mr. Friesen: I did. That applies to unleaded, unregular gas, but if you use a premium gas you pay more tax on it than on any of the other classes. I believe the government needs to readjust its vision with regard to these matters although I have little hope of that happening.

When the Minister of Finance made his speech last November, he said, among other things:

> In my view, the special 10 per cent excise tax on marine engines and private aircraft and the 5 per cent tax on motorcycles are having adverse economic effects. The contribution of these taxes to energy conservation has been minimal.

I guess that jargon is the minister's way of saying the tax did not work. I wish he had put it as plainly as that. He probably could not police the application of the tax—he had no way of collecting it properly. He could not handle the administration.

I have one final comment and it relates to the reduction of the sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. Again, this was a good idea badly handled. As the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) told us last night, one automobile dealer in his riding said he was able to handle it because he had two sets of cars on his lot: one part of the inventory he had bought before the tax reduction was introduced and the other part consisted of cars he had bought afterwards. So there were different prices on what were virtually the same cars. He bailed out of it at the cost of $12,000 to the business and I suppose his loss will be deductible as a business expense.

But what about the customers who suffered? What about the loss of sales? Since the government took so long to bring down a budget in the first place, and since it has taken so long to bring down the resulting legislation, surely administrative changes could have been made so that the car dealers, the furniture dealers and businessmen across Canada could derive a decent advantage from the decision made by the minister and not be punished for the government's bad management.

I do not expect many answers to these questions from the government side. After all, they have not been forthcoming in months past and I do not look for any help from them this time. At a time when they are trying to bail themselves out before an election, I look for more band-aids; I do not expect any solutions.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to state my views on that famous Bill C-38, and Act to amend the Excise Tax Act. This bill would implement the excise tax ways and means motions tabled in the House by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on November 16 and on January 25 last. This bill would implement the terms of the budget affecting in one way or another the Excise Tax Act. However the bill does not particularly affect Quebeckers and Canadians. For that reason, I do not wish to spend too much time analysing that legislation. I will therefore criticize the bill while explaining the legislation at the same time.

In the first place, the provisions deal with the transportation of an individual by air. The government wishes to increase the tax it collects on the price of tickets from passengers travelling in the taxation area, that is in the North American zone, including the United States, except Hawaii, Canada and the Miquelon Islands. The tax would be raised from 8 to 15 per cent, the ceiling being $15 instead of the current limit of $8.

The tax levied on international trips was to go up from $8 to $12 during an undetermined period of time before reaching the ceiling of $15. However, the government has elected to combine both phases in one single operation. The purpose of that tax is to make users of those services pay for maintenance costs of national airports. The government thus hopes to increase its revenue by more that $72 million for the 1979-80 taxation year. Such a step is surely advisable, but before triumphing we should make sure what is the percentage of the cost effectively paid by users.

In addition, the government is amending clause 21 in Part III of the legislation dealing with the excise tax on cosmetics, jewellery, radio sets, etc. Thus, it is proposed to increase the tax on gasoline for cars as it is delivered at the service station, whether it is operated by the producer or somebody else. The gasoline is normally taxed when delivered by the producer to the independent retailer. However, when the producer also operates the service station, the legislation now provides that the payment can be deferred until the gasoline is sold to consumers.

● (1230)

The new legislation will therefore streamline the procedure. The government also proposes that persons seeking repayment of the special excise tax on gasoline or the federal sales tax on taxable items are entitled to the same scheme as taxpayers who are permit holders under the act. Because of this change, any person making a false statement for the purpose of obtaining repayment or failing to reimburse any overpayment, would be liable to the same penalty as any taxpayer who holds a permit as a retailer in similar circumstances.

The purpose of the third subclause is to provide for an excise tax exemption in the case of gasoline or aviation gasoline which is sold to a person to whom a bulk permit has been issued for use by this person. When the holder of such a permit uses these privileges for purposes other than those described in this subclause, the permit holder must pay the special tax as any other taxpayer. Bill C-38 deals with the general reduction of the sales tax imposed on all manufacturers by the Canadian government. As hon. members doubtless know, this tax imposed on November 16, 1978, was lowered from 12 to 9 per cent on all goods sold by manufacturers and wholesalers who are permit holders and on all imported goods.

Clause 4 confirms these policies. However, the government maintains the 12 per cent sales tax on imported and domestic wines. The purpose of subclauses 2 and 3 is to provide that the consumption or sales tax in the case of goods produced or manufactured in Canada for use by the producer or manufacturer be payable at the time the goods are used or appropriated for use.

We could state again here the opposition our party made to the reduction of the federal sales tax during the debate on the budget in November of last year. As a matter of fact, the reduction which the government proposed was only 3 per cent, while our own party proposed the complete elimination of the federal tax. What is more, since foodstuffs are goods of primary necessity, the consumer should benefit from a full exemption of the sales tax, so that have-nots may eat better for less money.

In Bill C-38, there is a tax of only 5 per cent imposed on food. It states that the governor in council . . . and I quote:

—may make regulations exemption any class of small manufacturer or producer from payment of consumption or sales tax on goods manufactured or produced—

The purpose of this amendment is to exclude from these benefits all firms which are not provided for under this clause, including larger corporations which publish printed matters for their own use, so that they may not be eligible for the exemption on their printed matters, unless the value of such printed matters is great enough to warrant an application for a licence.

Once again I see in that bill an invitation to favoritism since the department staff will determine what groups can benefit from the tax exemption on gasoline and aviation gasoline. How easy, what a splendid opportunity for bribes, Mr. Speaker! In addition, tax reimbursements resulting from the Tariff Board decisions cannot be made until the year after the taxes were paid. At the present time taxes are simply carried over to the following year. The new act would extend the reimbursement period to a four-year period. In fact, clause 9 would change clause 8 mentioned above and apply to any reimbursement of the special excise tax on gasoline or the federal sales tax on all taxable goods. Clause 10, Mr. Speaker, stipulates what penalties are incurred by whoever does not respect the provisions of the act. Finally, the Excise Tax Act is amended by cancelling the special tax of 5 per cent on big motorcycles and the special tax of 10 per cent on marine motors of over 20HPs and aircraft belonging to individuals or companies.

Repeal of sections 10 and 12 of schedule I cancels the excise tax on those items. That tax had been justified by invoking the energy crisis. Today, when the government passes Bill C-42 to conserve energy, to allot oil supplies, it cancels the special tax on luxury cars that burn a lot of fuel. That attitude proves again the lack of planning this government has shown ever since it came to power. The other clause amends section 12.1 of schedule I of the present act, to take metric measures into account. In addition, clause 13 proposes that some consumer goods be completely exempt from the consumption or sales tax, such as solar water heaters and devices designed to convert sound to light signals for use by the deaf in telephones, door bells, timers for stoves and other similar goods. This last measure will give the deaf greater access to the technologies that can allow them to lead more normal lives despite their handicap. It also exempts from this federal tax all thermal insulation. Thermal material and rolls will continue to benefit from the exemption provided they meet the requirement of a thermal coefficient that is superior to 2.4 per inch.

The exemption on thermal insulation materials would be allowed only if the sheets or boards had a total thermal resistance of not less than 3. This clause abolishes the special provision for hard-sided trailers which were taxed on only 75 per cent of their selling price, which meant that the rate of the federal sales tax was actually 9 per cent. Therefore, the government acted dishonestly in leading Canadians to think that the general reduction of the federal or consumer sales tax to 9 per cent would allow this exemption to continue. However, we cannot take it for granted that the manufacturer will pass on to consumers this 3 per cent reduction. It has indeed been shown on several occasions that the federal sales tax reduction is only partially passed on to consumers wishing to buy a hard-side trailer. The government is thereby increasing the housing costs of people who often purchase these types of homes because they cannot afford a single family dwelling. This policy could be detrimental to some Canadians. Through this clause, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is putting an end to the federal sales tax exemption on double windows, double doors and other such items. The government says: "Since glass is not as efficient for energy conservation as walls, the exemption has not achieved the aim initially envisaged."

Is the minister encouraging Canadians to build homes without doors or windows, because such things increase the loss of energy from dwellings? Schedule IV of the bill contains a chart on metric equivalents which must be respected to convert Imperial measures into European measures. It gives the excise tax on Imperial and metric measures of gas.

Finally, a clause gives the governor in council the right to simply repeal by order part II of the bill if he deems it obsolete. No matter what kind of legislation is passed and accepted by parliament, it is always the minister who has the final word. It is called the governor in council, but in fact it is the minister who decides. If he decides in his great wisdom to simply repeal the legislation passed by parliament, that is up to him, and there is a clause protecting him. That is indeed provided for in all bills. That is why I often say that there is no use debating a bill for a week, two weeks, a month, two months, when we know in advance that two or three weeks after the minister can stop or restrict the application of the legislation. Clause 17 explains the procedures the members must go through in order to review the order made under the preceeding clause.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) explained during his speech last Monday that the practice adopted by the government whereby it introduces regulations greatly restricts the debates following the tabling of the order abrogating this amendment to the Excise Tax Act. Since we do not know now when the government will withdraw the legislation that it hopes to pass today, why does it want to restrict uselessly and illogically the length of a future debate? The hon. member for Edmonton West concluded his speech in the House by saying:

> Here is another closure motion. Are we going to get this as a regular practice in every bill, that it will be provided that there shall be a motion for some consideration by parliament, that parliament will be able to debate that motion for three, five, ten or 20 hours, and then it will be brought to an end? What an easy way out for a government to take. We will be told ahead of time, by statute, how long parliament shall debate any question.

In view of this statement made by the hon. member, I would simply like to say that when we pass legislation according to the procedure followed by this parliament, we always wonder how long this legislation will last before senior officials decide that it is no longer useful. Mr. Speaker, I believe that when the government wants to make important changes, it should simply have to come before parliament and ask that clauses giving the government authority over parliament be withdrawn. This is something that I have never been able to accept.

Once again, we are considering a bill which will give supreme authority to senior officials since we all know that they are the ones who control all the actions of parliament. This is understandable since a minister who has just been appointed to a department certainly does not have the knowledge required if he does not have the help of his officials to compare all the legislation affecting his department. Moreover, I believe that it would be difficult to ask a minister to tell his officials what to do. Most often, it is the officials who tell the minister what to do. This is why I say that, finally, when we abrogate legislation passed by the government, it is the senior officials who have decided in all their wisdom that it was time to abrogate this legislation or to amend it according to their wishes.

When we see departmental officials acting like this, we always say: It is for the good of the citizens! It will create jobs! However, since these decisions are made by senior officials, their interest lies in creating jobs in the public service to increase their army. This is why in the last several years we have seen government expenditures soaring to 41 per cent of the gross national product when we know that for many years the GNP has increased on the average by 4 per cent a year.

In addition to that increase, we still have to pay for more civil servants, 41 per cent of that same increased product. Then, Mr. Speaker, you no longer wonder why it costs so much to administer this country. Why does it cost so much? Because we have too many unproductive jobs, and I have always said in this House and I maintain that productive jobs are in manufactures, industries, in other words industrial jobs. Let us have those, but office jobs are unproductive jobs that eat away the revenues of this country. And today the emphasis is on office jobs and industrial jobs are entirely forgotten. As long as the government fails to take its responsibilities, as long as it leaves the country's administration to a bunch of senior officials against whom it can do nothing because it needs their work and their help, I believe we will continue to pay for the administration, and that is what is happening right now with airports, Mr. Speaker.

Just think that on top of the taxes people were already paying for airports the government is going to charge another 15 per cent to the people who already paid a lot for a ticket, not to improve transportation but to pay for the airport deficit. I do not know if the minister even thought about making a little investigation to find out whether it might be possible to reduce administrative costs before continuing to empty the pockets of Canadians.

With a small population of 22 million or 23 million and budgets running to $57 billion with a deficit of $12 billion, we are spending $69 billion to administer 22 million people, Mr. Speaker. That is not normal. So they simply say that they have to raise general taxes. They are going to make the user pay. But he already does, Mr. Speaker, and he is paying a lot more than he should. Let us take Air Canada, it is understood that deficits are paid by the government, but private airlines serve an entire area. We have already asked the government in the House to assist such small private airlines, but we have to pay.

I live in a region where private airlines operate and if such airlines at least received small subsidies to help them a little. However, the large state airlines are heavily subsidized and we have to pay to make up the deficits incurred by Air Canada. We are people who pay for the chief who travels in a Cadillac while we go on foot. It is the same thing. I think that if the government instead of taking such a step today had tried to help smaller lines, it would not take much to get those lines to improve their service. Air Canada gives excellent service. Small wonder! With all its millions and its deficits we have to pay, and especially with the type of airports like Mirabel we build for it! Now we say we may have made an error! There were no good enough bureaucrats to knew beforehand that such a white elephant would not have enough customers. If they could have built that airport in marble they would have done so. Now we ask passengers to pay for all that, to pay for the government's stupidity.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-38 gives us an example of maladministration by this government. Once again they want to take money where there is none, namely the users' pockets, but in the same breath they also supply the big monopolies with terrible exemptions. Of that there will be plenty, because big monopolies are protected. Anyway, we will see legislation come forward to show us how monopolies operate, to show us the two major parties competing to save the monopolies. Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by saying simply that we do not agree with all the clauses, especially when it comes to imposing an extra 15 per cent users' tax.

• (1250)

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise two matters. One involves the changes the government has been making over the years in terms of insulation and energy saving devices, whether they be solar or otherwise. The government has not done anything to encourage the entire energy industry. Whether it be solar, wind or any other type of alternative energy, the government has not done anything at all. I think such help would have been a great advantage in developing the energy industry, and we would have been farther along the road in terms of the development of the forms of energy currently used, such as thermal, nuclear and hydro.

Now the sales tax on solar equipment is being removed. We have known for a long time that we would have to look at solar energy. We are only now part way along the road to removing some of the tax on the energy industry. As I understand it, it will be applied only to a limited number of companies under exceptional circumstances. Thus there will be no easing of manufacturing costs in developing new types of solar energy.

One thing the minister has done indicates the bureaucratic mind of his department better than any other example. I am referring to the matter raised last night by my colleague regarding windows. Suddenly the officials have decided, after a long period of time when we said people should instal bigger windows in their houses, that big windows are a heat loss factor and perhaps a tax should be placed on them. If the officials were only a little smarter, they would realize that if another pane of glass is added the "R" factor would be increased. Instead of using double seal glass, one could use triple seal glass, with three panes, which would result in the same "R" factor as one would from the best insulation.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before lunch I had mentioned the fact that the government never seems to be well informed about changes that are taking place in manufacturing. We are continually plagued with the application of taxes for purposes other than that of raising money. With this change we find a tax on windows in the hope that people will curtail the size of windows in their houses as an energy saving measure. I suggest that if we were to adopt the newly designed thermal panes with triple glass we would find they would save more energy in that they are rated with an insulating factor of between R-9 and R-12.

In this field of solar energy and energy saving devices we have been plagued by a lack of knowledge on the part of the department regarding the use of much of this equipment in an experimental way. We are continuing to tax those who want to experiment with various types of energy saving devices such as solar equipment. We write into the bill a provision to reduce the tax on some solar equipment but we keep it on other equipment that may have been used in the past for air conditioning and is therefore more of an energy using device than energy saving. As the industry changes, heat pumps and things of that nature may turn out to be energy saving devices when used in some installations rather than energy wasting.

It is probably safe to say that since the last war we have been receiving letters from the jewellery industry which has been plagued with exceptionally high taxes. There was a luxury tax on jewellery during the war as well as other taxes and in many ways that has continued. The 10 per cent tax added to the 12 per cent tax makes it a very heavily taxed industry. For those manufacturers who make money, there is an additional 40 per cent income tax.

The industry has pointed out to the minister that there is a demand for jewellery in Canada. This government is often accused of being opposed to matrimony; they have been opposed to the marriage structure per se. My colleague would point out very readily that a spouse in this country is an attachment that costs money, not one that provides money. An old age pensioner with a spouse obviously does not receive as much pension and allowances as two people just living together.

The jewellery industry is interested in the matrimonial business but few people are buying jewellery. The industry is subject to a sizeable tax which realizes only a small amount of money. Few young people in this country have not thought of buying jewellery, mostly in connection with a wife to be or a wife already acquired, so much of the industry is involved with matrimony.

About 250 jewellery companies employ 5,600 production workers and 1,500 salaried workers. It is 90 to 95 per cent

Canadian-owned and most of the small, private companies operate in both the wholesale and retail markets. The distribution arm of the industry employs about 11,000 people.

This small industry is subject to an excise tax of 10 per cent on top of the 12 per cent federal sales tax. As well, there is the manufacturing tax and all the other taxes. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) has pointed out that between $2 million and $4 million worth of jewellery is smuggled into this country. That is almost equal to the drug industry. The industry is opposed to smuggling because, first of all, it gives it a bad name and, second, it does not allow it the total business which would be available without smuggled gold and silver.

I am interested in seeing the consumption of gold, whether in gold bullion coins or jewellery, climb to the point that it will ensure the operation of gold mines in Kirkland Lake. For that reason I should like to see smuggling stopped and our own jewellery industry enjoy the increased business. For every job in gold mining, 14 secondary jobs are created.

I do not know whether the minister will do anything about this in the future, indeed, I do not know if he is going to be the minister in the future, but I should like whoever is minister to give consideration to this industry. It is a long time since the last war and the luxury tax on jewellery should be eliminated by now.

When people travel to other countries, they sometimes receive gifts they do not know the value of and get into trouble with the law when they try to bring them home. They are often law abiding people who just do not understand all these taxes.

We would like to finish this bill today, Mr. Speaker, and clear the platter of all those things that have been hanging around for some time.

I would be remiss if I did not join with those people who have been diligent in examining the changes made in this bill which, in effect, rewrite the rules of the House. Quite often our rules are modified in light of changes that take place, with the object of attaining more efficiency and assuring the protection of members. For the past 20 years each parliament has lasted about two and a half years and it is quite possible the changes will be more frequent. Since most members cannot participate in this type of debate, it therefore seems to me it is an abuse for the government to write a change in the rules of the House into legislation. We have seen four or five such bills.

● (1420)

I have some advice that I can give to the next minister of justice. I say to him fire whoever it is in the department that is writing these bills. Otherwise our Standing Orders will be rewritten but there will be no need for them; instead our Standing Orders will be coming from legislation and every time we look at the legislation we will find a different set of Standing Orders under which we must operate.

The rules of parliament, the precedents of Beauchesne, Knowles, May and others who have established them in years gone by have been written after conditions have developed that have made it advantageous for people to make the changes. These changes are always made with someone saying: "Do not go too far; we still want some rights". Perhaps they should be curtailed but people still want to know what their rights are. Surely even the majority should sympathize with that position. In a democracy no one can say before an election which party will be the government or which party will be the opposition. The rules are written in fairness to both sides.

I would like to see the minister remove everything from clause 16 on. There is absolutely no reason why clause 16 or anything after that should be there. If you want to table the report in parliament, that is fine, but I do not think even that is an absolute necessity. What will we be appealing, Mr. Speaker? We will be appealing the landing tax, the tax on solar energy and tax structures, I suppose even to the extent of whether we like them. If we do not like them, we can change government and the new government will put in different ones.

If it is stated in the bill that 50 members must agree it should be done, it is not a change in the constitution. It is not a major change in the democratic process of the nation. It is not a matter of whether Quebec can secede from the country or of getting rid of the Senate. This is a tax matter. We are saying that 50 members must sign for an appeal. Sometimes it would be impossible to find 50 members in opposition. I can remember when the Liberal party did not have 50 members. Even if they all signed the document, nothing would happen. But they figured they were an important bloc of the day. They considered that they were so important, even with only 50 of them, that they should be the government.

There is absolutely no need for a motion of this kind to be written into a bill. If we want any legislation in parliament to be subject to appeal, we should write a section into the Standing Orders, and we would be able to appeal in an orderly way. That has not been done because members of parliament would not agree. Maybe there are 20, 30, 40 or 50 members here today, and perhaps there were 50 members here yesterday, but it is not likely that 50 members will look at the clause or give any consideration to it. A vote will be taken at the end and the members will be called in, they will not have the faintest notion about this section, but they will pass it.

I suggest that when we write into bills limits for debate, limits for appeals, and limitation on the time in which appeals can be made in allowing parliament to consider any piece of legislation, that is changing the law. That is making a new rule book, Mr. Speaker. We do not have an umpire to make a decision. We do not ask the Speaker of the day to be the umpire. We make the rules and the Standing Orders and establish how they are to be enforced.

Under this piece of legislation and under the last two or three pieces of legislation that we have passed there has been a structure allowing for closure, closure long before a debate is held and closure long before anyone thinks about whether there is any reason closure should apply. It is possible that one day there will be a government with such a small minority there will be a question about closure. On the other hand, it is possible that a government will be elected with so large a majority that they would not consider dignifying closure with making the motion.

There are many things that may happen within the competence of the Standing Orders, the procedures and the precedents that have been established by the British parliament over the last five hundred years and by the Canadian parliament in its one hundredth year. All these precedents have a purpose. They were designed to maintain democracy, allowing a government to govern and the opposition to make their position known and to be prepared to form the government if that is necessary.

I firmly believe that this minister is democratic. Some of the ministers who have introduced legislation are not—for instance, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and several other ministers. But I am sure this minister is willing to use the democratic process. He is well aware that there are disadvantages to a democracy. It means you have to hear the other fellow and also that you must listen to him for longer than you want to. But he is also well aware that maybe he will be the other fellow next year or in the future. Therefore he does not want to hamstring the system so that it is inflexible.

It is a disgrace that civil servants who think that they have reached the stage of being untouchable can write this kind of closure legislation and that we are stupid enough to pass it. No member of parliament should support this bill with this kind of a clause in it. In my opinion it would be in the interests of the minister to withdraw clause 16 of the bill when we reach it.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in connection with this particular legislation will be very brief. However, I wish to make a few remarks in the presence of the minister after hearing the excellent speech of my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

I wish to lend support to the proposition put forward by members of the opposition generally with respect to the growing tendency on the part of this government to introduce in various pieces of legislation provisions by which parliament is being downgraded, the rights of individual parliamentarians are being diminished, and there is the process we find creeping into more and more legislation whereby, with respect to legislation before the House, the rights of parliamentarians are determined in advance by way of closure.

I want to remind the minister that we have had this provision brought to our attention in legislation before the House now on three consecutive bills. It is not because of a unique or unusual provision in the bill that is required by the nature of this legislation. A similar provision was included in the referendum bill, a bill dealing with the constitution of this country. The rights of parliamentarians are being stomped upon by this government, ostensibly because it is a matter that will be dealt with only in times of emergency. The bill in fact covers a very wide ambit of constitutional change. The rights of parliamentarians are being curtailed. We are limited in the amount of debate we can have. That goes to the very root of our constitution, the very basis of our country.

• (1430)

The next piece of legislation the government came forward with was the bill dealing with petroleum allocation, the so-called energy bill. What do we find in that legislation? In the event the government determines that we have a perceived or apprehended energy shortage, not a shortage de facto, there is a provision in that bill to limit debate in this House on such emergency to three days.

The next piece of legislation the government brought forward dealt with the Excise Tax Act. As members on this side quite rightly point out, the tendency of this government is to downplay parliament, to diminish the rights of each and every member, including those on the government side. Here we have a similar kind of provision. It has the effect of limiting debate with regard to particular orders filed under clause 15.

I hope and trust the minister will address himself to this provision during the course of committee of the whole. There is a growing concern not only in this House but by editorial writers and indeed the people of Canada that this government has come to the conclusion that the rights of parliament should be curtailed on each and every occasion where it may be inconvenient for the government to explain or to bring a matter before parliament.

Mr. Chrétien: There is a debate.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am glad the minister acknowledges the fact that in parliament we will have an opportunity of debating this bill. Do hon. members know what kind of debate the minister is talking about? He is talking about five hours. After redistribution we will have more members in this House, 282. If we take off 24 or 25 for cabinet positions, there will still be a substantial number of backbenchers, approximately the number of independent members we now have, those who are not members of the cabinet. Let us assume there is a matter of some interest to the majority of the members of the House. Divide the number by half and you get how many may possibly participate in the debate.

Mr. Kempling: Three minutes each.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: My colleague says three minutes each. The way this place operates, by the time we went through the various procedures we may possibly get a quick word or possibly only one word from each member. On a matter of substantial importance, debate can be curtailed by this government which has a ridiculous tendency to impose closure on legislation in advance of the debate commencing.

This is not the first time I have spoken on this point. I spoke on the other bills as well. If the government ever finds the time to bring forward the referendum bill, which is of great importance to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) and others, I will speak on that as well. I spoke on the energy bill with regard to this matter and I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), as I now ask the Minister of Finance, just what criteria—

Mr. Chrétien: Let's go to the clause.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know the minister is nervous, embarrassed and ashamed of this bill.

Mr. Chrétien: I want to debate it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to debate it too, but I want to make reference to part of the bill which I consider to be regressive in terms of parliament. I cannot understand the mentality of the government and the Minister of Finance in bringing forward legislation of this sort and defending it. I bring this to the attention of the minister now so that the minister can think about this and cogitate before we reach the provision in question. I want him to think about what position he will take with regard to this provision. I consider it to be a regressive principle within this bill.

Mr. Chrétien: Let's go there.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If the minister will acknowledge now that he is prepared to withdraw this provision from the bill, I will be glad to sit down. Is that what the minister is saying? What does he want to do? I want to know whether the minister is prepared to withdraw this provision. If not, maybe he can keep quiet and leave the heckling to his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

If the minister is the parliamentarian that he holds himself out to be, if he likes, understands and appreciates parliament, he will not have anything to do with this kind of provision in this kind of legislation. I am going to sit down now because I am anxious to see where the minister stands in relation to parliament.

Mr. Chrétien: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If the minister insists on applauding, I will carry on. I am always encouraged when I get a little applause. This is a serious matter and I want the minister to take it seriously. This kind of provision is creeping into more and more legislation brought forward by this government. It is time for the minister to reverse this tendency and move an amendment in committee of the whole to withdraw this very unfortunate provision in the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

On clause 1—

Excise Tax Act

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could elaborate on this clause. Perhaps he can give us some background as to who is responsible for initiating this clause.

● (1440)

Perhaps at the same time he could attempt to justify his position. How can he agree that the air transportation tax should be almost doubled, particularly during a difficult period of restraint? He is asking Canadians generally to exercise restraint. He is asking labour and industry to exercise restraint. Yet here is a service being provided by the federal government in respect to which the fee is virtually being doubled. The increase certainly far exceeds the rate of inflation in this country, notwithstanding the fact that the rate of inflation is very high.

I am sure the minister heard my remarks yesterday when I read into the record some of the innumerable deficiencies which the Auditor General had noted in his last report in connection with mismanagement, failure to control and cost over-runs for which the Minister of Transport is responsible. The increase in tax represents an attempt to recover those losses, to pay for the waste, the extravagance and the mismanagement which has gone on.

I would also draw attention to the adverse impact this measure would probably have on our tourism account. Yesterday I quoted the government's own report, the recommendations of which run directly counter to government policy. I pointed out that air transportation is a necessity in many of the remote areas in this country, not a luxury. In many cases it is the only mode of travel available and the doubling of the tax will have its greatest impact upon those who rely solely on air transport.

I am sure the minister has been caught in a squeeze. I do not think this is his idea. If it is, I should like him to say so. I think he has been painted into a corner by the Minister of Transport, who has lost control of his department and cannot exercise the kind of management which it needs so badly. It is all very well to talk about user-pay, but the minister tells us that the true principle of user-pay is not being applied. I should like him to elaborate. Is it the intention to attempt to ensure full cost recovery in all cases where government services are provided? The situation now is that the cost of providing man-made facilities and other services relating to the travelling public is the highest in the western world. It is certainly higher here than it is in the United States.

There is at present a dispute going on between Canada and the United States about air fares. Surely in a period of deregulation, Canadians and people generally in North America associate deregulation with cheaper fares. In this case American airlines have been prevented from bringing in cheaper air travel between our two countries. This whole scenario is wrapped up with the cost recovery scheme of the Minister of Transport.

I should like the Minister of Finance to tell us who was the originator of this proposal. Was it he, or was it the Minister of Transport? I believe the hon. gentleman is carrying the can for the Minister of Transport. Does he agree with the statement of the deputy minister of transport who roundly criticized the Auditor General for calling attention to cases of inadequate cost control and poor financial management within the department?

The deputy minister of finance criticized the Auditor General and suggested that he should mind his own business. Yet the Auditor General is the custodian of the public purse; he is the financial caretaker, the watchdog on behalf of Canadians generally. We in this House have lost control over the public purse by reason of the present committee structure and the closure rule. The Auditor General is now the only one equipped to carry out this task, and he has pointed out that the Minister of Transport has mismanaged the affairs of the department—that there has been waste, mismanagement and failure to consult effectively with the users of the services provided.

I should like the Minister of Finance to make his position clear because we are placing ourselves in a strange situation: on one hand we are attempting to redress the imbalance of our tourist account, while on the other we are imposing heavy penalties on the air travelling public.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the airports are running up operational deficits which the Minister of Transport wants to reduce by increasing the tax which is specifically allocated for the administration of those airports. I am in a difficult position because the hon. member is arguing about the management of the Department of Transport, its philosophy in terms of air operations and so on. I am not the Minister of Transport; I am the Minister of Finance. The hon. member asked me a question and I answer, yes, the Minister of Transport wanted me to increase the tax in order to cope with the problem of the deficit in airport operations.

I will concede that what is proposed represents a high increase. But there will still remain a huge deficit of $123 million in the operation of the airports so the amount which would be raised would certainly not be sufficient to operate the expensive and elaborate system we have established. Of course, when you travel in Canada you have the advantage of the best airports anywhere. We have fine airports in Vancouver, in Winnipeg, in Montreal, at Mirabel, in Halifax and so on. We have a very good system but it is extremely expensive, and in order to pay for part of this operation the Minister of Transport has asked me to increase the tax. The hon. member asked me who was the promoter. It was the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Mazankowski: Has the minister satisfied himself that cuts could not have been made within the operations of the ministry which would have produced the same amount of money, $72 million, as this tax is expected to generate in the first year of its operation? Further, the Minister of Transport has served notice that landing fees and fees for associated service related to the movement of aircraft are going to increase by six times over the next eight years, at a rate of approximately 30 per cent a year. Is the minister not concerned about the impact this will have on the travelling public and the impact it could conceivably have of further aggravating our tourist trade deficit?

● (1450)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think at all times the government has to be preoccupied with increases in the cost of many services. I am not aware of any admission by the Minister of Transport that those costs will increase six times in the next ten years.

Mr. Mazankowski: They will.

Mr. Chrétien: If that is the situation, I have the impression that that is too much, and I think we have to make sure that we live within our means. That is one topic I have been talking about since I was president of the treasury board. We have to reduce the level of increase in the expenditures of the federal government. The hon. member cannot deny that the year before I was president of the treasury board the increase in the level of expenditures of government from year to year, 1974-75, was 25 per cent and that during my tenure I reduced it to around 10 per cent. That was less than the gross national product. However, this is a constant battle we have to keep fighting, and I am pleased that the hon. member subscribes to the principle that we have to control our expenditures.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, the minister obviously is not advised. The officials who are with him at the table apparently are not in a position to advise him. The fact is that with these increased revenues there will be upwards of $90 million in surplus operational revenue for the operation of our 23 major airports. What may or may not be intended is to use the enormous operational surplus to pay off debts for white elephants like Mirabel and Pickering and to make up for the mismanagement and bungling at Calgary. That may very well be. Indeed, it seems quite obvious that that is what is happening. Because of the movement of these funds into a single revolving fund, the minister's colleague, the Minister of Transport, is effectively removing from us in this chamber any real ability to scrutinize the fund and what is being done with it.

Leaving that to one side, the surplus in operational revenue will approach $90 million within the next three to four years. The question of my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville, is whether the minister is satisfied with this type of rip-off of the Canadian traveller, not to mention our capacity to continue to attract tourists to our country to try to offset our account deficit on that side of the ledger. Does the minister not think that this is in fact a rip-off, and is he not prepared to direct himself to the question of whether the generation of operational surpluses of this magnitude is unjustified and uncalled for?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I have explained that the total operation of airports is in a deficit position. The hon. member referred to major airports, but we have to provide some services in isolated areas. Even with this tax increase there will still be a deficit of $123 million.

Mr. Forrestall: That is a deficit on capital and everything else, not the operational surplus.

Mr. Chrétien: It is for the total operation. The Minister of Transport appears in other fora. He appears in committes of the House and defends the policies of the Department of Transport. This measure is a move by us to increase a tax. I am not the minister who should be called upon to respond regarding the administration of airports. I have to take full responsibility for this tax increase, but I am not in a position to debate airport operations. I am not the Minister of Transport, nor do I want to be.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I am not asking the Minister of Finance to assume responsibility for transport in this country, although God knows he probaby would do a better job than the job being done by his colleague. That is not my point. Surely the Minister of Finance has some responsibility to scrutinize the formal requests which come to him from his colleague to increase their departmental capacity to garner revenues. That is what we are talking about. We are not talking about running airports at all. We are talking about whether the generation of a potential surplus from operational revenues at the expense of the travelling Canadian public and tourists is in keeping with practices which are acceptable to the Minister of Finance.

Will we have full user-pay? Will the Minister of Finance direct himself to that simple question? Is he prepared to direct the Minister of Transport to direct VIA Rail to operate cost effectively? Is that what the minister is talking about? Is that what he is trying to tell Canadians? Let him justify with one single reason, if he can, the right of the Minister of Transport on the backs of Canadian air travellers to have an operational surplus upwards of $90 million. As the minister knows, we do not pay the capital cost of operational profits. We never have. This will be an artificial profit to offset, behind the back of parliament, the whims and fancies of an already well demonstrated inadequate Minister of Transport.

There are 101 reasons why the Minister of Transport should resign and go to the Senate along with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. There are 101 reasons, and I am citing one $90 million reason. Please! Surely we are entitled to some explanation.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has heard that we have a surplus, but we do not have a surplus. After this increase in taxes there will still be a deficit of $123 million in the operation of the airports of Canada. If I accepted the theory of full recovery, the tax increase would have to be threefold. We had to balance that. We decided to reduce the deficit. This tax increase will reduce the tax deficit by $72 million. There will still be $123 million which will have to be paid by the treasury directly from the consolidated revenues of Canada. The hon. member assumes that there will be a slush fund that the Minister of Finance can use, but that is not the case. This will make up just part of the deficit. Canada has a small population, and distances are long. Transportation is quite expensive, and there is no miracle. The money we spend is the money we collect. If we do not collect it one way we have to collect it another way, unless we cut services.

The opposition transport critic argues that the Department of Transport has too many officers and provides too much service and that the minister could have cut even deeper than he did. He can argue that.

Mr. Mazankowski: No. The Auditor General says that, not me.

Mr. Chrétien: Nobody has denied the fact that there is a deficit in the operation of our airports. We are not meeting that deficit. We do not want to hurt travellers too much. We do not want to hurt tourists who come here. This is a question of judgment. It is one of the pleasures and responsibilities of the Minister of Finance not to be in agreement at all times with all people. This afternoon I have to increase one tax, but this is the first time in a year and a half that I have increased taxes. I have reduced taxes since I have been Minister of Finance. In the last budget I reduced personal income tax to the tune of $1.5 billion. I reduced sales taxes to the tune of $1.2 billion. It is true that I am now raising $72 million, but I cannot be accused of being a minister who has increased many taxes. The hon. member would like to blame the Minister of Transport for this increase, but by the nature of my job I am responsible for tax increases and I take full responsibility. I never try to wash my hands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, as I understand the increase in the transportation tax for air passengers, the revenues produced will go into a revolving fund to be used for the airport deficit and perhaps to build airports. Clause 1 would allow the conversion of this tax to a user charge, and therefore the House of Commons would not have the authority we have today to discuss such a charge in the committee or in this chamber. The minister will then have the power—as it says here that the cost will go up six times and the Minister of Finance himself said that this is too much, with which I agree—to use this charge to increase the moneys he will get to offset the deficit. My concern here is that as I look at airports across the country, I see overbuilding at a number of airports and underbuilding at some others. I can quote examples of overbuilding, such as at Mirabel which cost $700 million and now has a deficit of $50 million a year, and at Calgary airport which cost $138 million and will probably have large deficits for a number of years. Then we can look at airports like the airport at Fort McMurray, and the Edmonton airport, both of which have the same number of landings as Calgary or Mirabel but are not large enough for the number of people going through them. The people there are hoarded through the airports.

• (1500)

Mr. Chrétien: Which airport in Edmonton are you referring to?

Mr. Schellenberger: The international airport, the only one under federal control. People there are hoarded through in long lines in the basement. The area for people arriving from abroad was built in the times of the old Vanguards with 70 passengers. Now sometimes two 747s land at the same time and people getting off these planes have to line up in rows almost city blocks long, waiting for their turn to get to the customs area. This is not fair to these people.

We are now asking parliament to give the minister authority to change this tax to a user-charge, and therefore parliament will no longer have the authority to question it. I am concerned about this change to the user-charge. What is the reason for it, and what guarantees will parliament have that there will not be overbuilding in some areas and underbuilding in other areas, such as I have outlined?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to add to the comments of the hon. member. We are discussing of course clauses 14 and 15 dealing with the system as introduced in that legislation to allow the automatic transfer following a debate in the House, because the whole matter could have been done under an order in council, but the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) suggested that the House should have an opportunity to discuss it under a negative resolution. The whole matter could have been dealt with through an order in council, but the Minister of Transport, being a fine democrat, wanted to give hon. members an opportunity to hold a debate. Apparently, they would rather have left the whole matter in the hands of the Minister of Transport. If the House unanimously agrees that it be done through an order in council, we could discuss the matter at length when we reach clauses 14 and 15. I was very pleased to see——that we were ready to let parliament discuss that for five hours. Apparently now they would prefer not to debate it at all. We are very pleased and consider ourselves fortunate to be debating it on a negative resolution which was not in existence before. I am surprised that both the Conservatives and members of the NDP are so traditionalist in these matters. It is annoying, or perhaps surprising, that I always find myself defending the British system.

In the British House of Commons there are all sorts of regulations permitting bills to be passed in one or two days, allowing time allocation and closure with no problem, but when I want to implement the British tradition, being the good French peasouper that I am, I find those Anglophones opposite opposing me. It is unbelievable. I do not know what is wrong here. I am proud of being the product of bicultural Canada. But let us wait and see what happens when we are on clause 14.

An hon. Member: Triculture.

Mr. Chrétien: Or tricultural Canada, if you prefer. I will be able to debate that provision when we come to that clause.

When the hon. member talks about big airports and overbuilding, I am reminded of the time when I was a backbench member of parliament and was travelling to Edmonton in 1967 because, as the hon. member knows, the hon. member for Vegreville is almost my member of parliament because my family on my mother's side is from there. So we were going to Edmonton in 1967.

An hon. Member: And they vote Conservative.

Mr. Chrétien: I think they vote Liberal, but sometimes they find themselves lonesome, just like the Tories in my riding, who feel terrible. So in 1967 I visited the Edmonton airport for the first time and I noticed that nobody used that airport which was some way away from the city; everyone wanted to use the downtown airport. Everyone referred to the international airport at Edmonton as a white elephant. Now we find that it is used a lot. The same thing will happen probably at Mirabel.

When I visited the international airport at Edmonton in 1967, the airport had been empty for the previous ten years and it was the topic of conversation. The bureaucrat who had recommended its creation had some wisdom, but no one at that time realized it. It is probably the same thing with Mirabel. It is probably one of the most efficient airports. In fact it is so efficient that it looks empty because passengers just go through it and are out within minutes.

An hon. Member: There is nobody there.

Mr. Chrétien: The Russians came to see it. They would like to have the same thing.

With regard to this negative resolution, my friend, who has a funny name for his riding anyway—

An hon. Member: Wetaskiwin.

Mr. Chrétien: We will debate the resolution when we reach clause 15, and I hope we will reach it soon.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, the minister, in his usual effervescent manner, has attempted, quite successfully, to diffuse some of the very important issues we are trying to raise.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He gave me the hiccups.

Mr. Mazankowski: He spoke about his maternal foundations in the constituency of Vegreville.

Mrs. Holt: I am from Vegreville too.

Mr. Mazankowski: And now we hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has the great distinction of coming from Vegreville also. The only problem is that she was led astray and became involved with the Liberal pack. That is really unfortunate.

The minister, as my colleague from Wetaskiwin pointed out, has referred to the proposal to increase landing fees and other related services six times—that is a fact and the minister can take my word for it because this is common knowledge in air transportation circles and in the Ministry of Transport.

I am surprised when he says that we have the services. They have to be paid for and, if we do not get them here, we get them elsewhere. I am surprised at him taking such a stand. He is an enterprising person and he knows that competition is keen. He is a competitive person, and the fact of the matter is that if charges of this magnitude are going to be imposed, we will clearly be in a very unfavourable position relative to our counterparts.

For example, the basis of the information I have is provided by the Air Transport Association of Canada which, incidentally, represents some 90 per cent or 95 per cent of all airline revenue in Canada. They point out that the landing fees of a DC9—that is landing fees only, not en route service charges, navigational charges, and an assortment of other charges—are approximately $45. At many U.S. points that charge is only $20 to $25. At the end of the eight year program, that charge will be over $200 in Canada, or more than that per passenger in landing fees alone. A Boeing 747 landing at Vancouver from Toronto would be paying about $1,800, or $4.50 per passenger. The same aircraft landing at Kansas City with about the same passenger volume would pay $200, $400 in Chicago, and $800 in Seattle, which is one of the highest charges in the U.S.

When we take that into consideration relative to the impact on our tourist industry, can the minister tell us whether he agrees with the statement in the report of the sector task force on the Canadian tourism industry? It is indicated in that report that the airport user-pay policy makes Canadian air transportation non-competitive with that of the United States and is detrimental to Canadian tourism. The Minister of Finance is in charge of the over-all economy. He is interested in bolstering the dollar. He is interested in revitalizing the economy. Does he agree with that statement?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with a tax increase, yet we are debating transport policies which are the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Transport. Of course I want the tourism deficit to diminish. At the same time we must pay for the services we are providing, which is always the dilemma we face. The hon. member should know that if we do not have any landing fee or any taxes, we will have to collect it in another way. If we do not collect it one way, we will collect it another way. Of course I do not want to increase the $10.7 billion cash requirement this year. I am glad to see the hon. member has the same preoccupation as I on that. I hope he will talk with his leader who has been promising, if his party should form the next government, to cut back taxes to the tune of $6 billion on top of the $10.7 billion deficit which exists at this time.

Mr. Mazankowski: Also we are talking about cutting out waste.

Mr. Chrétien: When we provided various cuts, every member opposite double talked about those issues. They rose and asked why we did not give a subsidy for this or why we cut the subsidy for that. Also they asked why we were not increasing a certain subsidy. Of course it is easy when one is a member of the opposition. But because of that double-talking, hon. members opposite will not have a chance at trying their hand at running the government. Some months ago I thought opposition members had some chance, but they have fumbled it. They became crazy and talked about stimulative deficits. Even the financial critic indicated that it was to be an instant deficit, but I call it a phantom deficit. He indicated that it would be there for a month only. We keep our books for 12 months, so there cannot be a deficit for one month. That is why Conservative members lost their chance at finding the facts. If hon. members have some good facts, they should go before the committee and explain them to the minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: We have some good facts.

Mr. Chrétien: They should give the minister some help. I require the help of hon. members opposite in those fields. In fact, I require the help of everyone. I want to make sure that government expenditure will not increase. I appreciate the good work of the hon. member. He is trying to keep the operation of airports as healthy as possible. But we cannot deny that there is a deficit of $193.7 million in the operation of airports. With the imposition of this tax it will be reduced by $72 million, and I will be left with a deficit of $121 million. If hon. members would like to give me some tips about from where I can get this $121 million, other than cutting programs in the Department of Transport, I would be interested in hearing them. There is nothing I would like to add to the list of people and programs which should be cut in the Department of Transport.

Mr. Mazankowski: When the minister speaks of stimulative deficits and what not, I should like to remind him that he is four-fifths wrong and one-fifth right. If he is looking for suggestions of areas in which the fat might be cut, or where better operational efficiencies and financial management control can be injected, I invite him to read the report of the Auditor General. The minister is a good friend of the Auditor General. He knows the importance of the Auditor General. He does not have to take any advice from me and we do not have to go to committee.

Just to dwell on that point for a moment, the minister knows well that when we were considering the estimates on transport, we had the minister before the committee for a couple of hours, or three hours at the most. The structure of the committee system does not give us the opportunity to deal with these specific issues and to challenge some of the spending programs of the government. Thank God for the Auditor General! The minister should review the facts clearly. If he did so, he would not be as eager to accept the recommendations of the Department of Transport. If the minister looked at the facts very carefully and analytically, I am sure he would tell the Minister of Transport to clean up his act. That is what we are suggesting the Minister of Finance should do.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to participate at this point, but now that the minister has made an unnecessary and rather shoddy political intervention, I felt it was only right to rise and bring the minister back to the provision with which we are dealing.

If the Minister of Finance does not want to answer the question, that is one thing, but I am sure he is anxious to get the bill through. The Minister of Finance should let the committee and the country know whether he agrees with that method of dealing with this overwhelming deficit brought about—and I am not being partisan here—in large part by the bungling and incompetence of the Department of Transport under a succession of Liberal ministers. Can the minister give an assessment as to whether this particular tax is counterproductive in terms of international tourism? Does he think that we have gone far enough in this connection and that we must look in terms of the over-all operation? Perhaps this is one instance in terms of taxation policy in which we will do ourselves more harm by increasing this particular tax rather than having it borne by general taxation.

Does the minister think there is something to be said as to how he justifies the imposition of this tax? The minister admitted that it will have a detrimental effect on tourism and travel in Canada. That is what we want to hear about. We do not want to hear partisan political flim-flam. We want to deal with the bill. We want to get down to the nub of the problem before us. The Minister of Finance should be concerned with fiscal policy. Does he have any ideas respecting what level of taxation will cause a serious problem to Canadian tourism? Is this particular tax getting to the point where it will discourage people from utilizing air services and travelling by air in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this is of course a matter of judgment. Taxes must be paid in every airport. I am told, for instance, that the tax in the United States is 8 per cent with no ceiling provided and that it can reach a higher amount than in Canada. Moreover, had I not been concerned about the level of taxation for tourism, I might have urged the Minister of Transport to recover the full $193 million, but I did not do so. Of course, this is a matter of judgment.

We decided not to exceed $72 million, and this may be somewhat too high. I would have preferred not to have any increase. I would certainly not have wished for an increase, because I recognize that this can be an additional cost for those who visit Canada. However, I believe that in general, most air travellers in Canada are not tourists. They are for the most part foreigners and businessmen who travel by plane in Canada to conduct their daily business and not necessarily as tourists. This is why we did not exceed $72 million, because I believe that if I had insisted that we should recover the full $193 million, this would have had a very negative effect.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I think the answer of the minister underlines one of the problems we have in terms of fiscal and taxation policies. It is obvious the minister has had no input into this particular tax and has not given one bit of consideration to the over-all taxation levels. He is simply the errand boy with respect to this particular taxation. He has not been consulted and is here as the spokesman for the Minister of Transport, saying that in fact this particular provision has nothing whatever to do with whether we are going to have a deficit. He simply carries out the orders of the Minister of Transport and that minister has his own little theory about the user having to pay.

● (1520)

An hon. Member: And he smiles.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Yes, physiognomy was the term used in respect of the Minister of Transport who has the ability to smile. I simply say this, without smiling at all, that it is an interesting admission the minister has now made that, as far as he is concerned, he has little control over the level of taxation or this element of taxation by the government, and he is simply here as an errand boy to carry out the philosophy of user-pay which has been imposed as a burden on him by the Minister of Transport. It is interesting to note that the minister feels this has nothing to do with taxation, but results from the Minister of Transport's theory which will be inflicted upon all the people of Canada who use the transportation facilities of this country. Those are the people who will bear the burden of this philosophy. It should be remembered, no matter what kind of rhetoric the minister may indulge in during the course of the election campaign, that this is the policy of this government. I think I have made my point.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

An hon. Member: On division.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Consumption or sales tax of nine per cent.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I think we have reached page 4 of the bill and that clause which states:

There shall be imposed, levied and collected a consumption or sales tax of nine per cent on the sale price of all goods—

This represents a reduction in the sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent, which we on this side of the House welcome. However, we on this side of the House have frequently raised points regarding the application of this tax in respect of stock in the hands of a dealer as inventory, on which the dealer has been forced to pay the tax at the higher level and must therefore absorb the 3 per cent differential. This has amounted in many cases to a great deal of money and has imposed severe hardships on the dealer, particularly small dealers caught in the position of having rather large inventories.

It is interesting to note that in the ways and means motion tabled in the House on the evening of the presentation of the budget it was made clear that the new rate will apply to sales by manufacturers and licensed wholesalers on goods sold or delivered to purchasers and on goods imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption after November 16, 1978, and that the reduction in the general rate does not have a termination date. That statement generally will be interpreted as meaning when the product is sold to the retail customer, and that is the point with which we take issue.

There are precedents to show that when sales or excise taxes have previously been reduced or removed, funds have been reimbursed to dealers with inventories or stock on hand at the time. I believe there was a precedent in 1958, another in 1974, and it seems to me there was another in 1961 when an excise tax was removed. Inventories in the hands of dealers at the time were subject to remission by the Government of Canada.

We believe the application of this particular measure is very harsh on some dealers, particularly dealers in automobiles, large industrial equipment dealers, dealers handling refrigerators and a host of other items. I do not think the Minister of Finance, being a great supporter of small business and small enterprise, and a believer in the private enterprise system and in the importance of small enterprise to this country, would think otherwise than that a remission should be due and forthcoming to those people who have been left with inventories on hand at the time of the introduction of the budget.

With that in mind, Mr. Chairman, I should like to introduce an amendment as follows:

That clause 4 of Bill C-38 be amended by striking out line 39 on page 4, substituting therefor the following:

"Goods which had not by November 16, 1978, been delivered to the final retail purchaser."

I have this amendment in both official languages and I will make copies available to members on the government side.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I have written many letters in this regard. I have a great deal of sympathy for the suggestion by the hon. member. We have reduced the tax on almost all items taxable in many fields and it would have been almost impossible for the government to reimburse everyone affected. I have recognized the situation in the letters I have written to automobile dealers, and they are the ones who have raised the most flak. I have been in touch with them and have received some communications. We felt that if we did this for the automobile dealers we would have to do it for everybody else. When we did this previously it was in respect of one exceptional case when there was a reduction on one item, namely, trucks. That was easy because it was easily definable and there was no other sector involved. Sometimes we must have rough justice when a variety of items are involved. We have to keep everybody under the same umbrella in the same circumstances. In these circumstances every aspect of the tax is reduced from 12 per cent to 9 per cent and, unfortunately, it is not possible to make a distinction.

I appreciate the efforts of the hon. member, but I cannot accept this proposition which would in effect increase the deficit of the government by some $351 million. I am sure the hon. member will be shocked to find that he might be personally responsible for increasing the deficit to the tune of $351 million. I had to give him that explanation and I am sure he did not think it would involve so much money. Under the present circumstances I cannot accept the amendment, a move which would cost the treasury more than $351 million.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, in attempting to justify or explain his position, surely the minister is not telling us that he expects the poor dealers to pay the 3 per cent tax differential. Surely he is not suggesting that they should pay that 3 per cent, but that is exactly what is happening. Having regard to automobile dealers, when the tax was reduced the retail price was reduced automatically, and the dealer who was stuck with the product on his lot had to reduce his price accordingly. Surely he is not suggesting they should pay the $350 million.

• (1530)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, by this time I think most of the dealers will have sold their inventory, otherwise they would be in bad shape. There is always a problem from one day to the other when the tax system is changed. In previous budgets that raised taxes, those people who already had inventory paid less tax than those who bought later, but they never suggested that they would make too much money and should return the money to the government. When taxes were increased the person who had goods before the budget made a profit through having paid less taxes on them.

It is too late now. The budget was presented on November 16 and the inventory has probably been depleted by this time. We cannot make a distinction between car dealers and other dealers. If we were to accept this proposition it would cost the treasury $350 million. It would be irresponsible to add that much to the deficit of the government.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, I have a few things to say about this provision. The minister knew when the motion was put in the budget that this was going to cost the treasury $350 million. New automobile models had just been introduced, so surely the officials knew inventories were at a high level in anticipation of Christmas sales. I say this was a cynical move. The ministry knew this $350 million would be swallowed by the retailers. Some of the large ones can write it off through taxes, but the small and medium-sized retailers had to swallow a good portion of it, and so it is a direct loss to them. I say the minister and his officials were totally irresponsible and they should be censured for acting in such a cynical way. I see some of the officials at the table smiling; they would smile on the other side of their faces if they were in the business.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, I want to add a few words. I suggest the government was most incompetent and irresponsible. If it was the intention not to allow dealers to take advantage of the reduction in tax on the stock on hand, then it was a cynical move and a burden on hundreds and thousands of dealers across Canada.

There is some ambiguity in the provision covering this proposal in the ways and means motion. The part dealing with the general sales tax reduction states that the new rates will apply to sales by manufacturers and all licensed wholesalers on goods that are sold or delivered to the purchaser as well as goods imported into Canada or taken out of a warehouse for consumption after November 16, 1978. To the uneducated eye that provision means that the dealer could have the benefit of the reduction on stock on hand. That is in the publication put out by the minister as an explanation of the ways and means motion. When clarification was sought by the thousands of dealers upon whom a great financial burden is imposed they were told that a bill would be introduced which would specify that the provision does not apply to the stock on hand at the time of the budget.

I want to support the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Vegreville. It reflects what appears to have been the minister's intention at the time of the budget. Perhaps the problem arose as a result of an oversight on the minister's part, but if he had the honesty and the courage to stand up and admit that he was wrong, we could at least dismiss it as another instance of incompetence. I would like to know what the minister feels about the burden he has placed upon the hundreds and thousands of dealers, small businessmen and taxpayers in this country, who have been severely punished through this incompetent provision. I strongly support the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Vegreville.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, first of all I wish to rise on a point of order. You could perhaps see if the amendment is in order, because indeed it is not covered by the ways and means motion. Therefore the motion may not be in order in its present form, but I will give you a few minutes to think about this. I would like you to look at this question of procedure. As for the substance, I would like to say—

[English]

The hon. member referred to the hundreds of thousands. There are not hundreds of thousands of car dealers in Canada.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Hundreds and thousands.

Mr. Mazankowski: Tens of thousands.

Mr. Chrétien: Or tens of thousands. There are about three or four thousand.

I should like to make two points, Mr. Chairman. Some years ago we reduced the sales tax on building materials from 11 per cent to 5 per cent in exactly the same way. In one day the tax went from 11 per cent to 5 per cent and no one was reimbursed.

Second, I am not an expert on how car dealers operate, but I know there was a shift in price because of the models and many of the inventory—

Mr. Mazankowski: You are absolutely wrong.

Mr. Kempling: That is wrong.

Mr. Chrétien: Now the opposition seems to argue that I should not have cut taxes. When the tax is changed from day one to day two, the situation is just the same as if the electricity costs for the garage went up. In that case they do not go to the municipality and ask to be reimbursed. When there are other cost increases from day one to day two, that is part of the system. I think some of the costs can be absorbed. I know of dealers who had some special deals with the industry because of their inventory. They had to absorb some part of the cost in the inventory they held, but if it stimulates demand then they can get it back through the number of cars sold because the tax is somewhat lower. The theory is that if taxes are reduced somewhat, the number of sales increases.

The Chair can look into the procedural point, and perhaps the best way to dispose of it is to face the reality that we cannot afford to lose $350 million. We knew that, and I faced the flak. I replied to the 300 letters I received quite candidly and frankly saying I could not do anything. Those correspondents accepted that better than hon. members opposite.

• (1540)

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Perhaps before continuing we should formally propose the amendment. In answer to the concern an hon. member had as to the acceptability of the amendment, in my opinion procedurally it is quite acceptable. There are many provisions for that in Beauchesne's fifth edition at citations Nos. 526 and 527 where it says that reductions can be made in committee so long as the existing tax is not increased. Therefore, the amendment is acceptable. The question is on the amendment, moved by Mr. Mazankowski:

> That Bill C-38 be amended by striking out line 39 on page four, and substituting therefor the following:
> "Goods which had not by November 16, 1978, been delivered to the final retail purchaser."

Mr. Towers: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister realizes that sometimes repentance is good for the soul. There is still time for him to repent because of the error, and perhaps gross misjudgment, he has made. I make this statement with regard to the timing of the proposed taxation. Perhaps the tax should have been changed to coincide with the change in models, namely, from one model year to another. This does not necessarily apply only to the automobile industry, it applies through the whole system including such things as fridges, stoves, etc.

New models usually come on the market in the months of August, September and October. If the government, and the minister, had chosen that period of time to make the change, there would not have been that high inventory on tap with which these small dealers were caught.

I want to explain to the minister something of which he may not be aware. Canada relies to a great deal for its financial stability on the small towns across the nation. I am speaking of small towns with populations of 6,000, 5,000, 4,000 and less. It was the dealers in these small towns who were caught in the middle by the change in taxation at that time of the year. In many cases they have nothing to say as to the number of cars or other products they have on tap at that time. Companies send out products as soon as they are available. It is possible that orders had been placed a year previously. These dealers were then caught with a high inventory of new models. If the minister can see his way clear to make some adjustment to these people, it will be of real benefit to the small business people who form the backbone of the Canadian economy.

I realize that dealers in large centres can absorb this loss much better than in smaller centres. It is the smaller dealers in small centres who are caught. I hope the minister will repent and give some consideration to this request. I would ask him to be fair to these people who are hurt so badly by the timing of his legislation.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, I enter this debate because I come from a small riding with 40 small communities, all of which have two or three small dealerships in each community. I have received letters from each one. I suppose it would take me 15 minutes to put them all on the record. I will not do that but I want to be sure the minister understands that there are communities in this country which have dealerships in them run by people who are not rich. These people operate small businesses. Total income for the year for these people is possibly $15,000 to $20,000 on which their families must live. Because of this decrease in tax at a time when their inventories were large, many of those dealers have told me privately that they have lost between $6,000 to $10,000 this year.

I have a letter from an international truck dealer in which it is mentioned that because of the lowering in tax there is a difference of about $1,800 on one unit. If he has 10 units on his lot, although at the time I think he had six or seven units, you can understand the kind of loss he would face in his income.

This amendment asks that consideration be given to those dealers who had units on the lot in stock before November 16, 1978. One of the dealers said:

> The problem relates to the removal of federal sales tax on trucks of 16000 G.V.W. and larger as announced in last week's budget.
> It is my understanding that the tax removal only applies to those units manufactured after the budget date. You will realize that dealers having large inventories will stand to lose considerable by having to absorb the amount of tax. It is my considered opinion that all units unsold and dealers inventory should be exempted.

This is exactly what this amendment does.

I have another letter from a small dealership in the city of Wetaskiwin. He says:

> I would like to go on record that in no way can the dealer be expected to absorb the costs of this tax. You can be sure the customer will be insisting on a rebate and rightly so, but not at the expense of the dealer.

Consumers who visit a dealer following the tax decrease mention car prices should drop between $300 to $500. They would look at various cars and ask the dealer if he had knocked down the price. In order to keep his customers the dealer had to answer, "Yes, because of the budget last night the price of vehicles has dropped". But he had to refer to the 10 or 20 vehicles he had on his lot and say; "I am sorry, you will have to buy one of these cars in stock at the old price until I get rid of this stock." In view of that, the prospective purchaser would go to Edmonton or perhaps another larger centre where a dealer sells thousands of cars per year. These larger dealers can put any loss sustained over a much greater volume. The loss does not harm them in the same way it does a smaller dealer.

The minister should show some compassion to the small dealers and accept the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Vegreville.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, the minister in the course of his reply clearly misunderstood what I had been talking about. I said hundreds and thousands. The minister is trying to argue what is a very weak case for him on this particular provision. I am satisfied the minister came into the budge with a statement, realized his error afterwards, and has had to backtrack and make explanations ever since when he realized the full implication of the provision. I wish the minister would get up and admit that that was the case.

The minister tried to suggest that we are only dealing with car dealers. I have to concede that car dealers are an example of independent Canadian businessmen who are most seriously affected by this particular revision. These businessmen have inventories of equipment and goods to be sold to the public, worth quite a substantial amount of money. Naturally people in that particular industry are the ones who will feel the pinch of this rather inept dealing on the part of the federal government with respect to reduction of tax. We are not just talking about car dealers. I hope everyone understands that. We are dealing with retailers of every description who carry goods to which the manufacturers sales tax applies.

● (1550)

Budget night was a great night for the minister with the red rose in his lapel, the new shoes, and his hair combed. It was a great television production. I recall it vividly. He was surrounded by his sycophants who applauded every time the minister raised his hand to give the signal. A lot of people made the mistake of believing the minister when he said there would be a 3 per cent reduction.

I have learned never to argue with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, not because she is right but because it is just too much trouble. She is a good friend of mine. I will not say more because I know she does not want to interrupt the thrust of my argument.

When the minister makes a presentation in terms of budgetary matters, it is extremely serious when he conveys an impression to Canadians, including consumers and dealers, that a particular tax provision will become effective on the date of the budget. If the minister understood this all along, he should have clarified it in the course of his remarks, indicating that it would not take effect until some time down the road. The implication in the budget papers and the general statement left a distinct and clear impression.

I pointed out the provision in the budget papers, that this would apply effective that date on all sales which took place after the budget was brought down. The parliamentary secretary agrees with me. I appreciate that because the minister would not do it.

Mr. Martin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I was not agreeing. In the context the hon. member was assuming, I was merely making it clear by nodding my head that the minister did indeed in his budget speech make it quite clear, and he has asked me to give notice that no claims will be entertained for refunds of tax in respect of goods on which the 12 per cent tax has been paid. That was in the budget speech of the minister on November 16. It was made abundantly clear there would not be rebates for inventories on hand.

Mr. Mazankowski: That's flim-flam.

Mr. Martin: That is standard practice with increases and decreases.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I have to agree with my colleague from Vegreville. It falls in the category of flim-flam. It is the opposite to the truth. If a legal expert reads the documents put out with the budget papers, the notice of ways and means motion and so on, he can come to only one conclusion. I quote from the budget papers:

> The new rate will apply to sales by manufacturers and licensed wholesalers on goods sold or delivered to the purchaser, and on goods imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption, after November 16, 1978.

It is plain and simple. It says everything. However, we find later that it does not apply to sales by manufacturers to dealers after November 16. We have been talking about car dealerships. A car dealership is classed as a licensed wholesaler. Any car dealer would have no difficulty in concluding that it would apply to sales made after that date.

Mr. Martin: By the manufacturer.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: By the manufacturer and licensed wholesaler. I am talking about dealers generally.

Mr. Cullen: You are always wrong.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister says I am never on the side of wrong. That is the distinction. I want to hear the parliamentary secretary explain himself out of this. There has been some great confusion. The parliamentary secretary cannot dispute that on the basis of the volume of mail received by members of parliament regarding this provision. I know there are many dealers in his constituency who are very upset about this provision. I am sure if at all possible the parliamentary secretary would vote for the amendment put forward by my colleague from Vegreville.

Mr. Martin: I believe the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is quoting from page 22 of the document "Notice of Ways and Means Motions". It is important to read the two paragraphs that pertain. The hon. member is referring to sales by manufacturers, and yet the problem that was raised earlier by the hon. member for Vegreville and others relates to the problem faced by retailers. The paragraph from which the hon. member was quoting reads:

> The new rate will apply to sales by manufacturers and licensed wholesalers on goods sold or delivered to the purchaser, and on goods imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse of consumption, after November 16, 1978.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

A further paragraph in that same section reads:

> In accordance with standard practice, no claims will be entertained for refunds of tax in respect of inventories of goods on which the 12 per cent tax has already been paid.

I am sure the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is aware that the tax becomes payable when the goods leave the manufacturer's shop. The tax has obviously been paid by retailers on the stock they have on hand. It is made abundantly clear there will be no consideration of a claim on their part covering those inventories on which a higher rate of tax has already been paid. That is clear as a bell to all of us. I am sure it will be clear to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar as he applies his expertise and takes a closer look at it.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I am in full support of the amendment moved by my colleague. I appreciate that it has been recognized as constitutional by the Chair. The parliamentary secretary made a statement that intrigued me, that it was according to usual or standard practice. I did not think this government was bound in any way by what is standard practice because, with regard to the operations of this House, it has departed so far from the standard practices and principles of the House that we hardly recognize them any more. I could explain that if I had the time.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

SECOND AND THIRD REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I thank you and my colleagues very much. I have the distinct honour to present the second and third reports of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being four o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, and private bills.

I might draw the attention of the House to the fact that the first three items on the order paper under private members' business, notices of motions, were called and allowed to stand at the request of the government, on March 19, 1979. In accordance with the ruling of the Chair on December 5, 1977, and in conformity with Standing Orders 19(4) and 49(1) these items can be stood a second time only by unanimous consent. If unanimous consent is not forthcoming, they will be dropped from the order paper.

Mr. Herbert: To save time, Mr. Speaker, I will put my remarks into one package. Each member is allowed to put on the order paper one notice of motion at the start of a session and there is a draw for the order in which the motions are listed. These motions were put on the order paper on October 27 last year in the order of the draw. If members are serious they should be prepared to proceed with their motions when they are called. It is for that reason, and because leaving motions on the order paper makes it confusing for other members who are not then aware of which motion should be called on any particular day, that the first three motions on the order paper which are not to be proceeded with should be dropped today.

Furthermore, the following motions—and maybe I am moving a little ahead of the parliamentary secretary—Nos. 21, 22, 24, 25, 26 and 27 which also are going to be passed over today—should be listed as having been called for the first time, in other words, allowed to stand at the request of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I gather from the hon. member's remarks that the first three items will be dropped as I have just mentioned. Therefore, items Nos. 7, 9 and 19 stood at the request of the government will drop. Further, as notified by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), items Nos. 21, 22, 24, 25, 26 and 27 will stand at the request of the government.

DEPARTMENTS AND FEDERAL AGENCIES OF NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA

ADVISABILITY OF PROVIDING ONE ADDRESS AND POSTAL CODE

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of providing one address with one postal code for all federal government departments and agencies in the cities of Ottawa and Hull and in the National Capital Region, namely:

Department or agency,
National Capital Region,
Ottawa—Hull,
Postal Code,
Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the contents of this motion might have been dealt with in another way, but I feel I have a duty to put this motion before the House to allow the government to consider the initiative referred to in the notice. There is no need to explain that a number of departments having moved to Hull, there seems to be some confusion within departments as to their postal addresses.

I attempted for a few years to awake departmental awareness to this, and it seems this was not one of their priorities. Confusion ensued and today, looking at the postal address of some federal department buildings, we find addresses such as Northern Affairs, Terrasses Chaudière, Ottawa, Ontario with an Ottawa postal code. It is a well known fact, Mr. Speaker, that Terrasses Chaudière are located in Hull, Quebec, rather than Ottawa, Ontario. The answer I got was that naturally the postal code was an Ontario one because, as you know, postal codes are allocated by provinces.

My point is, Mr. Speaker, that for 50 years the good citizens of my constituency, Hull area, have been waging an uphill fight since 1917 to get their fair share of the moneys spent within the National Capital Region. I do not say this to be critical. I simply want to emphasize the problem we are now facing to present a reoccurrence of such a situation in the future and to avoid offending people and municipalities within the National Captial Region.

I am well aware that this is a new development and that the bureaucracy has perhaps not had the time to get used to life on the other side of the river. However, I believe that the government could have shown more foresight and provided a single postal code for the National Capital Region. This could have included all municipalities within this area. As a matter of fact, its boundaries are described in a document which provides for the Act on the National Capital Commission. I believe that this would enhance the pride of people who live in the national capital and I also believe that it would reflect the sense of belonging to the National Capital Region of all those who live on both sides of the river. We must not forget that the Hull area has been part of the National Capital Region for a long time. I therefore believe that we are entitled to the same privileges.

I know that it may be because of a historical accident that Ottawa was chosen by Queen Victoria in 1857 to be the capital of Canada. We must however recognize, as the premiers did in 1969 in Toronto, that the region of the national capital on both sides of the river makes up the real national capital of Canada. It is with this in mind, Mr.

Speaker, that I ask the House to agree to this motion, which I am sure does not call for a lot of speeches and which would please people on both sides of the river.

Some may object to this and say: Of course, the postal code is an Ontario postal code and Ottawa is in Ontario. I know all that. However, I do not like the idea of an Ontario postal code being used on the Quebec side for federal departments because the federal government, Mr. Speaker, does not belong any more to the people of Ontario than to the people of Quebec.

The federal government represents Canada as a whole and the National Capital Region is supposed to represent what Canada should represent. This is why Queen Victoria, when she chose the Ottawa area as the capital of the Province of Canada, as it was called at the time, because of its central position, between Upper and Lower Canada, and because it reflected the two major ethnic groups of that new country. Furthermore, the policy of the government has always been to encourage acceptance by every Canadian of the whole area as the capital of the country. This is my request, Mr. Speaker. I know that hon. members will support everything that is done in the National Capital Region, as they did for many years. I think that if we do not do this simple thing, it might create some problems which we would not like to discuss. I think that it is an administrative issue and that it can be easily done since the National Capital Region is unique. Not only is it unique in Canada, but considering everything that has been accomplished in the capital and that have been paid for by all Canadians, it reflects the origin and the spirit of Canada.

● (1610)

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to draw your attention to some anomalies in the National Capital Region which might be corrected very simply. I refer particularly to various administrative decisions that approach stupidity. For instance, when I heard recently about the moving of the manpower centre in Place du Portage. That Manpower Centre would be moved elsewhere, in the new city core, on St. Joseph Boulevard, but the building not being completely finished it would be moved temporarily in some sort of dead-end in the building on Fontaine Street where traffic is very light, where people normally going to work do not have to go by, basically very far from any traffic.

I think the Manpower Centre should be located in the heart of the city where people pass by or can go in every day as in the case of all other large Manpower Centres in Canada. I find that disastrously stupid and I say that in this case at the Manpower Centre the decision is made by Montreal because being in the province of Quebec even if you see parliament and the federal buildings every day, Montreal is the place where the decisions are made in this case, namely the Manpower Centre.

I hope we can make the civil servants taking those decisions aware of that so as not to cause any prejudice to the people in the National Capital Region.

I think we have suffered enough for years and are still suffering from overgovernment, we are suffering enough from overtaxation, I hope that federal government through its bureaucracy by the means we can use will stop causing us prejudices, at least we will have a few prejudices less to suffer. I also heard all sorts of rumours, Mr. Speaker. I am told the Government Printing Office is being abolished. I find it quite odd that the printing of the debates and everything that comes under the House of Commons should be done here in Ottawa on Wellington Street in the Metropolitan building.

So I do not understand why things like that are done as that is taking away employees from the Government Printing Office itself. They are being brought on Ottawa's side and the others are told: In a few years, you will not have much to do because parliament as such will take over the distribution and the printing of its material.

In my opinion, the Canadian Government Printing Office certainly has specific functions to fulfil. One of those is undoubtedly to print what parliamentarians thrive on day after day, the literature with which hon. members provide us and the committee reports. I find it very funny that, living in the National Capital Region, we often find that decisions seem to have been taken without consulting one department or another. It might be a good idea to be more orderly to avoid causing any detriment to anyone. The postal code is one of those. It would be so easy to reach an agreement with the provinces of Quebec and Ontario on a new form of postal code which would satisfy everyone.

If Ottawa is displeased that its name is linked to Hull, and if Hull is displeased that its name is linked to Ottawa, we can easily find a compromise and speak of the National Capital Region of Canada. It would be much simpler to have a distinct code which would be neither a Quebec nor an Ontario code, but a special code for buildings located within the National Capital Region. This would extend beyond Hull to other municipalities, towns and cities where federal government buildings are located.

I think I have summarized briefly what I wanted to say. I felt it my duty to bring this important matter to the attention of the House and urge our leaders to act through the bureaucracy. We often do not have much to say in the way the bureaucracy does things because, as the saying goes, members of parliament move on, the bureaucracy remains. We sometime have the feeling that some people spend their time seeking solutions to simple problems and, in the process, complicate them to an extraordinary degree. That is therefore why, in the name of simplicity, in the name of Canadian unity, and in the name of all my constituents in the national capital, I urge hon. members to provide a greater degree of autonomy because this is the beginning of something bigger.

Mr. Speaker, the National Capital Region is in the process of losing all it has gained since 1867, for the simple reason that the powers of the federal government in the capital of Canada are very limited. If that trend continues, Parliament Hill will soon be just about the only place where the federal government will have a say. That, to my mind, is inconceivable because by building up the area on both sides of the river the federal government wanted specifically to develop a distinctive region where all Canadians might see the achievements of this country, in a given spot, from every point of view, whether it be culture, administration, museums or anything else. I am sure my hon. colleagues will avoid, by rejecting this motion, having all those small powers, that are ours and those of the federal government, disappear further. That is why by accepting this motion I am sure we will continue to keep or to indicate that we want to see the federal government keep a bit more autonomy, that autonomy which is now gradually being eroded, and those powers it was intended to have in 1867. I do not have to give a history lesson, however it was in 1857 that Queen Victoria decided to make Ottawa the capital of Canada. She did not say the capital of Canada but the capital of the Province of Canada which was the union of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, considering that Ottawa as such would have some powers, for example the same powers as the provinces because it was the capital of the Province of Canada. Some unforeseen historical events occurred, the Fathers of Confederation divided Canada into provinces and the capital of Canada was divided in two without any power, nor any jurisdiction over its development, over road construction or over education, because the Queen had indirectly given those powers to the capital of Canada at the time, except that it is reported in our history that apparently nobody ever realized it.

Anyhow, I think it was my duty to point out to this august assembly that anomaly which I hope will never occur again. Each and every one of us is proud of his or her identity, and I am sure that a member from one riding would not want to be mistaken for a member from another riding. We are proud of what we have, we are very proud to belong to the National Capital Region. Since 1917, the people from western Quebec have been very attached to the federal government, which has been our bread and butter and will continue to be so.

In view of all the reasons I mentioned, I trust that hon. members will quickly adopt this motion which will give the same identity to all those who live in the National Capital Region. And if it is adopted, we will be able to say, as some visitors have shouted from one side then the other: Long live the free capital region of Canada!

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) decided today to cancel two or three of my colleagues' motions on the order paper, and in view of the fact that there is no quorum in the House, I move that this House do now adjourn.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO WOMEN ENGAGED IN COMMERCIAL SQUID FISHING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, last year some 350 women who were involved in catching and harvesting squid in Newfoundland were disqualified for benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. There would appear to be a case of discrimination on the basis of sex, since the only two women who qualified for benefits have Christian names of Georgie and Francis. I would therefore move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, with the consent of the House:

That this House directs the Minister of Employment and Immigration to review all cases where unemployment insurance benefits have been denied to Newfoundland women engaged in commercial squid fishing, to ensure that women who catch and harvest squid are treated the same as their male counterparts for the purposes of qualifying for unemployment insurance.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPRECIATION TO HEADS OF STATE INVOLVED IN ACHIEVING MIDDLE EAST PEACE TREATY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on an important matter on this historic date for all mankind. I move, on behalf of Canada whose devotion to peace has been proven over and over, seconded by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), the following:

That this House expresses its deep appreciation to President Carter, to the Prime Minister of Israel and to the President of Egypt at having been successful in producing a treaty which this House had hoped for as expressed in a resolution on March 7, and, furthermore, as the heads of these two countries have received the Nobel Peace Prize, and as each of them has spoken warmly of President Carter's contribution, that an award of the Nobel Peace Prize to him would be welcomed not only by Canadians but by peace-loving people of all mankind.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words to associate the government and myself personally with this motion. The right hon. gentleman is, I am sure, expressing in very fine terms the feelings not only of the government and of the opposition parties but of all Canadians. This is one of the most important steps that has been taken in recent times in bringing peace to the Middle East.

● (1410)

I want to say that not only do we, as a government, associate ourselves with this motion, but that the government through me have already communicated with President Carter, President Sadat and Prime Minister Begin to indicate our support for this step and our admiration for the courage shown in these very difficult times. These steps are, indeed, very important.

I might add, Mr. Speaker—this might be of interest to the House—that Prime Minister Begin himself telephoned me a few hours ago, saying they had been engaged in very difficult negotiations for about an hour and a half yesterday and that one point remained to be resolved this morning. It was resolved successfully, upon which he immediately telephoned me to inform me of this step which would be taken. I thought I would add this personal bit of information to the welcome motion by the right hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues, I would like to add the support of all members of my party across the country to what the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have said. All people in the world are indebted to the courage and imagination of the leaders of the three states concerned. The action they have taken will not only bring peace to the Middle East in the short run but, hopefully, will lay the foundation for a much more durable peace which will not only be of great benefit to the people within that region but, indeed, to everyone in the world.

S.O. 43

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, we must applaud the event which is now taking place in the United States, namely the signing of a peace treaty between two Middle East countries. This bodes well for the future in that part of the world. We must hope and wish that no future action will be taken to counter the tremendous efforts of these two countries and the United States to make this treaty a reality.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by Mr. Diefenbaker and seconded by Mr. Jamieson.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The House will, I am sure, want to observe that there could scarcely be a more fitting way to celebrate the thirty-ninth anniversary of the right hon. gentleman's election to parliament which is being celebrated today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

ARREST OF LOGGERS ENGAGED ON B.C. GOVERNMENT PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the arrest by officers of the federal Department of Fisheries of several loggers working in the Queen Charlotte Islands on a project approved by the government of British Columbia and operating within the jurisdiction of the British Columbia department of forests. I ask leave to move, seconded by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the Minister of Fisheries to cease and desist from these arbitrary arrests of loggers working on government-approved projects; and, further, that the minister immediately enter into discussions with the government of British Columbia regarding any matters now in dispute, instead of harassing workmen who are merely carrying out the duties assigned to them by their employer.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

ALLEGED EXCLUSION OF WOMEN FROM GOVERNMENT'S EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister and, I am sure, many hon. members know, an important meeting of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, representing more than 165 women's groups across Canada, was held in Ottawa this past weekend. Central to their concerns at this meeting and over the past few months has been the deteriorating situation with respect to employment for women.

The Prime Minister, myself and others in this House had a discussion in January concerning the strong statement made by the chairman of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women with respect to the deliberate exclusion of women from the government's employment strategy, particularly the one announced last September by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. There was a follow-up meeting of the six advisory councils later in January which endorsed Madame Rousseau's concern and accusation.

Can the Prime Minister indicate the steps he has taken to consult directly with the National Advisory Council or provincial bodies to come to grips with the specific problems which have been raised by Madame Rousseau and other members of the council which very much affect working women today?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to meet with representatives of the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women. My colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, has also examined the representations which were made.

I would like to inform the hon. member that of the several hundred thousand jobs created last year, something over 60 per cent of them went to women. The record of the job creation program of the government and of the Canadian economy during the last year has been quite positive. More jobs were created for women than for men during the course of last year.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that the Prime Minister did not answer, because he was so definite in refuting the comments made by Madame Rousseau. I am not sure whether the Prime Minister is well informed on this matter, but I would like to ask him specifically about the recent cutting back of the Outreach program, which affects many thousands of women across Canada. I refer him, also, to the impact of changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act which affect women disproportionately compared with men.

What action has the Prime Minister taken in consultation with the Minister of Employment and Immigration with regard to reviewing these decisions and reinstating—until there is a full statement—programs which are directly affected and which help women become more fully and equitably participants in the marketplace?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am astonished that the hon. member does not want the minister responsible for the conduct of government policies with regard to the status of women to answer questions. I do not complain that his leader is not here to ask such important questions.

I can say that at all levels the insinuations of the hon. member are not correct. I can indicate, for instance, that at the level of order in council appointments we have doubled the number of women appointed over the last three or four years. As the minister just stated, jobs in the private sector are being created in greater numbers for women than for men. I think the accusations of the hon. member are not informed and are calculated only to demonstrate his own ignorance.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Prime Minister is so defensive on this question. I would like to direct a final supplementary to him. The papers presented by the Department of Finance last fall admitted that the first ministers' meeting predictions on the participation rate for women were very inaccurate with respect to the rate of the increase in participation. However, no new figures, in terms of economic planning for the future, were put on the table.

Can the Prime Minister indicate whether he has examined those figures, whether he has asked for a new set of figures, and whether they will be published so that we will know what kind of over-all planning is being undertaken by the government with respect to the involvement of women in the government's long-term employment strategies?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the figures quoted by the Minister of Justice were that 60 per cent of jobs go to women, as opposed to 40 per cent to men. It is, therefore, astonishing that the hon. member would not think that this is a satisfactory response.

CHANGES TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT AFFECTING WOMEN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I will direct my supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In a letter to the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women on February 14 last, the Minister of Employment and Immigration indicated that a disproportionate number of women would be discriminated against under the 20-hour provision in the recent changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. This has caused women to appeal to the Human Rights Commission. Is it the intention of the government to review the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act specifically with these amendments in mind to ensure that the provisions of the act as it now stands are not discriminatory against women?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the House that the Human Rights Commission was set up by parliament under the policy of this government. We awaited support on this matter to see what action would be called for.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I commend to the Prime Minister the statement of the chairman of the Human Rights Commission when he appeared before a committee of the House in connection with this bill. If the Prime Minister reads that statement, he will know exactly what the views of the Human Rights Commission are.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue and ask if he can tell the House why 350 women involved in catching squid in Newfoundland—

An hon. Member: Squid?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, squid. The hon. gentleman would not know one if he saw one.

An hon. Member: He's a squid himself.

Mr. McGrath: Can the minister tell the House why 350 women involved in catching squid in Newfoundland were disqualified from the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, notwithstanding the fact that men involved in the same kind of work had no problem in receiving benefits?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, as is frequently the case, the hon. member is in error. Three hundred and fifty women have not been disqualified. A number of cases are being examined in accordance with the law, by virtue of the remittance by the Minister of Employment and Immigration of the question to our department.

By the end of April we expect to have a final answer on this problem. This is not an easy question which can be resolved on an emotional basis; it is one on which we, as a department, have to follow the law and render our decision in accordance with the law. Each case is being analysed on its own merits and we will be giving a decision on each case. But I can assure the hon. member that it is not a discriminatory policy; it is a matter of our being obliged to follow such matters as whether the women in question were fishing on their husbands' boats, whether they were actually fishing, or whether the squid had been delivered to them on shore for drying.

All these are matters we are taking up. I met with the representatives of these women on Friday, and I can assure the hon. member that we are very sensitive to the problem and we will be making an equitable and fair decision.

Oral Questions

HEALTH AND WELFARE

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON FUTURE OF MEDICAL CARE PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. With reference to the dismantling of medicare in Ontario and in other provinces which is now under way in Canada, on Friday the Minister of National Health and Welfare said in the House:

If they cannot put their house in order when they are given the administration of medicare, I do not know how we can do it for them.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister, since these sentiments were again repeated by the minister yesterday afternoon on a television program, whether he could indicate to the House if she is now stating government policy on this fundamentally important matter.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, government policy is known not only to the hon. member but to everyone in this country. The government's policy is that this government brought in medicare. It brought it through parliament under Mr. Pearson's government and it was proclaimed under my government. It is a policy which makes Canada the leading country in the world in terms of medical support systems provided to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Our concern in this debate which is going on is particularly for the people who are most in need of medicare, the old people, the young people, the new family formations, those who have no great economic means to support themselves. The principles laid down by this government are directed specifically to protect these people.

As the hon. member knows, under the constitution we cannot legislate directly in that matter but we will support medicare to the tune, I think, of something like $5 billion this year. We do that conditionally upon the provinces applying the principles of universality, accessibility, and so on. This is a repetition of government policy. The hon. member asks what our policy is: that is our policy.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister was correct when he said it was the federal government which brought in the legislation. Of course, the Liberals promised it in 1919 but, as the Prime Minister knows, it was first brought in by the NDP in the province of Saskatchewan.

I should like to get at the important substance involved, at the crucial matter, considering that the minister indicated in the House on Friday and in the television interview program yesterday that the government was not prepared to take its responsibility and to ensure that the provinces live up to their commitment to enforce the accessibility and universality principles.

● (1425)

Since the Prime Minister told the House some two weeks ago last Friday that the refusal to live up to these principles "would lead the federal government to operate sanctions of some kind", could he tell us what he has done in the meantime to live up to that commitment? Specifically, did he get in touch with Premier Davis of Ontario to give some force to the sanctions to which he referred in the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member is incorrect in quoting the minister as having said that she was not prepared to defend this system. I heard her in the House say exactly the contrary: she said that we were committed to this program, this policy, and that we would see to its application.

Since the question was raised in the country by some of our members and by some members of the hon. member's party, the minister has been asking her officials to look into the various instances where there might be some infringement of the various principles, the conditions under which federal funds are granted to the provinces. I have not had a report on that yet. I know the work is being done and I know it will be a matter of going to the provinces and saying that they must make sure these principles are adhered to; and here are some examples—if there are some—where the money the federal government is paying is not serving for the benefit of the people who are on medicare and need assistance. Then we will discuss a friendly and amicable solution with the provinces.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, since section 26(2) of the Established Programs Financing Act gives the federal government specific authority, as the Prime Minister is well aware, to ensure that provinces live up to this commitment, and since the Prime Minister promised the House more than two weeks ago—and he used the term—that the federal government would use sanctions of some kind to ensure universal medicare remains the right of all Canadians, would he give us a specific commitment?

For example, if the province of Ontario has not established, within three months at the very latest, universal medicare, will the federal government do what the Prime Minister suggested two weeks ago and apply sanctions of some kind? In short, will he speak for Canada on this important matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, you will recognize that the very form of the question is hypothetical: if the province of Ontario does not do certain things. I can tell the hon. member that the minister, her department and the government are concerned with this matter. Indeed, they are looking at possible infringements of the four principles under which federal participation is granted. But the hon. member knows and I know that we cannot legislate in this matter. We have to act in co-operation with the provinces.

I do not think the hon. member is serious when he is suggesting that the first sanction we rush into some two weeks after he has raised the question would be to cut off funds, not to the province of Ontario but to the people who are receiving medicare.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not say that.

Mr. Trudeau: He must have some—

Mr. Broadbent: You mentioned sanctions.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member is asking me to take sanctions.

Mr. Broadbent: You said that you would take sanctions two weeks ago.

● (1430)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is getting a little excited. If Your Honour wants to recognize him, perhaps he will have a supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER MEASURES WILL BE TAKEN TO STABILIZE PRICE OF BEEF

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I will direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the price of beef went up 9 per cent in January and another 10.8 per cent last month, could the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House if he is considering short term measures to rectify this situation, since beef is an important part of the Canadian diet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member as well as all Canadians, I believe, know that the price of beef is subject to a cyclic variation that the government tries to temper through imports and exports, but these price variations are cyclic and current prices in fact compensate for the fact that a few years ago prices were extremely low and that therefore Canadian producers were not getting adequate income. Consumers who took advantage of that situation must now pay a little more so that beef producers can restore normal production which will ensure stable prices in the future.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his reply. Because of current high beef prices, beef producers have of course increased their production. But since this beef will not get to market before two or three years, could the Prime Minister tell the House if he would favour hiking import quotas to give Canadian consumers access to beef at prices they can afford?

Mr. Trudeau: As far as quotas are concerned, Mr. Speaker, the government does not plan any change in policy. The hon. member will himself recognize that by opening our doors wide to imports we would harm Canadian producers because this would again lead to a drop in beef production with the result that, in a few years, Canadians would once more have to pay higher prices.

We would rather put Canadian producers in a position to stabilize their income in future; we feel that this would lead, not to wide-ranging cycles, but to more stable prices both for producers and consumers.

Mr. Allard: I have a last supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid the right hon. Prime Minister did not get my question quite right. I said that it was only a short-term solution, and that we could discontinue these imports as soon as supplies are back to normal in Canada. It would be just on a short-term basis, so that Canadians might obtain the necessary foodstuffs they need.

Could we not revert to the compensated discount system, as we did once in the case of milk, so that consumers might continue to eat normally in spite of the higher prices?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I did understand the hon. member's question, but I suggest he may not have understood my answer.

Producers have incurred considerable losses over the past few years. Some of them were even compelled on occasions to slaughter their stocks because they just could not get for them prices as high as their expenses. It is therefore normal that producers get incomes which are somewhat higher to compensate these past losses. And I can assure the hon. member that this is the way to make sure that both producers and consumers are more equitably treated in the future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISINTEGRATION OF SOVIET SATELLITE OVER CANADIAN TERRITORY

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Based on NORAD information concerning Cosmos 315, has Canada officially notified the Secretary General of the United Nations and the launching authority, in this case the U.S.S.R., of the return of Cosmos 315 as we are required to do under Outerspace Treaty No. 6, article 5?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that I did not arrive in Ottawa until a few minutes before question period and do not have an up to date answer. My instinct would be to tell the hon. member that this has probably been done.

I am sure the hon. member is right in his statement about the requirement. However, this is not a nuclear object and there may be some distinction between the two. In any event, I will make inquiries and get the answer as soon as possible.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PAYMENT BY SOVIETS FOR DAMAGE CAUSED BY DISINTEGRATION OF SATELLITE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence who has reason to know these treaties very well.

I would point out that because of Canadian failure to comply with the outerspace treaties, our claim for costs for last year's satellite crash was seriously impaired. In spite of our reduced rates for the U.S.S.R., they appear to be in no hurry to pay. Could the minister inform us whether the Soviets have indicated that they will accept our "over half-off for cash" invoice for last year's damage?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker I am, of course, not able to answer that, since it is being handled by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am not trying to pass the buck, but that is really where the responsibility lies.

The costs involved are costs which are incremental to our normal costs of operation. I think these negotiations are going on and I understand they will take some time. As to any similarity between the last incident involving Cosmos 954, and Cosmos 315, there is actually no connection whatsoever.

NATURAL RESOURCES

MANAGEMENT OF AND ROYALTIES FROM OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the increasing importance of offshore resources to Atlantic Canada, would the Prime Minister assure the House that it is government policy to retain Canada's legal rights over these resources, while maintaining a willingness to share generously with the provinces the management thereof and the royalties arising from those resources?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the House was reminded by the hon. member the other day, we did sign an agreement a couple of years ago with the three maritime provinces indicating that the benefits of these resources would eventually accrue essentially to the provinces, but that the matter of ownership would not be decided at that time.

We felt that the honourable and efficient way of solving the problem was to say: Let us not get down to constitutional squabbles. Let us just make sure that the people of the maritimes benefit from these recources, and make sure the administration is carried out in a way that will be beneficial not only to the people of the maritimes but, indeed, to all Canadians.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

That is our policy, it was our policy and it remains our policy. We discussed it again at the first ministers' conference in February, and I believe we are making some progress.

COMMUNICATIONS

CANCELLATION OF COMNAT PROJECT—COST TO GOVERNMENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. What damages will the trans-Canada telephone system be claiming from the government for the cancellation of the COMNAT project last year, prompted by the Auditor General's investigation into this example of government ineptitude?

I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, because the contract will be classified as a "non-consumed contract" by the Auditor General and probably the cost will never be made public. What information can the minister give the House on this matter?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, this contract had been entered into under considerations and increased use of telephone service within the government. After a number of months, it was realized that the flow of telephone service was not as extensive as forecast, but discussions between the parties to the contract have allowed us to annul the contract. I cannot give the amount which is involved, but it is minimal.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, it may be minimal by the standards of this government, but I understand it is several millions of dollars. Does the minister intend to compensate the telephone companies for the damage they undoubtedly will be claiming, by allowing them to raise their rates the next time they appear before the CRTC?

I would like to ask the minister, as well when, after the waste of several years' time and the cancellation of this contract, this government will be getting on with the necessary business of providing a better government telephone network?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I would refer the hon. member to what the comptroller in his report said about the contract. I think he will find there that all the operations have been examined to his satisfaction.

As for the telephone companies, my information is that they are not claiming any compensation.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INVESTIGATION BY COMMISSIONER OF CASE OF JAMAICAN WOMEN

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice in relation to the seven Jamaican women who were attempting to have the Chief Commissioner for Human Rights investigate allegations of discrimination. I believe the Minister of Justice is aware of the recent decision that indicated the commissioner could, in fact, proceed with his investigation.

Is the minister aware of this decision and, in light of its importance, can he indicate to the House that he does not intend to place any further roadblocks in front of the commission and there will be no continued harassment of the chief commissioner in terms of his duties?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there has never been any harassment or anything of the sort vis-à-vis the commissioner or the Commission on Human Rights. A bill was proposed by this government, approved by parliament, and we set up the Human Rights Commission which has the full support of the government.

As to the specific case to which the hon. member refers, I suggest if he reads the text of the judgment he will find that it does not lead to the conclusion he has reached.

● (1440)

NATIONAL REVENUE

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS FOR WOMEN SQUID JIGGERS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue: it is somewhat supplementary to a question raised by the hon. member for St. John's East.

In view of the fact that the women squid jiggers in Newfoundland which were mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's East are not in the situation of being wives working for husbands but are women squid jiggers doing exactly the same job as men squid jiggers, can the minister tell the House why it takes five months for his department to make a decision with respect to the work being done by these women when, in fact, the men squid jiggers merely have to fill out the forms to become eligible for unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows absolutely nothing about the subject. He does not know a great deal about what is going on in the nickel industry in Nickel Belt, but when he starts getting into the subject of squid jigging and the problems that surround these women with regard to the taxation aspect of their enterprises, he is really out of business.

I suggest to him, as I stated earlier, that my department, at the request of the Department of Employment and Immigration, is studying each individual case on its own merits. I met with these ladies, we discussed the matter and the mood was amicable. The problem is somewhat complicated and I can assure the hon. member, as I did the hon. member for St. John's East, that we are treating each case equitably and fairly and a decision will be rendered at an early date.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister is trying to put a nasty piece of business on the backs of the women squid jiggers, and in view of the fact that after his meeting with these women the mood was anything but amicable, can the minister stand in this House—and I am not asking him about nickel in Nickel Belt—and say that these women will no longer be handled in the discriminatory manner in which his officials have been handling them for the past five months?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, what can one say in answer to that foolish question? We are not treating these women in a discriminatory fashion. I have already said this. These matters are complicated by the fact that we must operate within the law: a concept which the hon. member may not bother to understand.

If for instance, the women are squid fishing with their husbands on their husbands' boats, then by law they are not eligible for benefits. If by chance the women are receiving squid on shore and are drying them as surplus to the requirements of the men squid jiggers then they are not entitled by law. Each case, as I have suggested, must be examined. The matter has nothing to do with discrimination. I can assure the hon. member, whether he cares to believe me or not, that these cases are all being handled with complete fairness.

BROADCASTING

CABLE TV—APPLICATION TO CRTC FOR INCREASED SUBSCRIBER RATE

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Communications. In light of recent reports that the Maclean-Hunter Cable TV Company has applied to the CRTC for approval of a monthly subscriber rate increase from $6 to $6.50, and in view of the fact that the rationale offered in the reports submitted with the application was that the company's net return from revenue had slipped from 19.3 per cent in 1976 to 18 per cent in 1978—still a rather good investment level, by any standard—would the minister advise this House if she feels that a breaking of the $6 ceilling for cable rates could in any way be justified?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must know that these questions are thoroughly examined by CRTC and that the CRTC examines revenues of cable companies or broadcasters to establish the rates that should be charged for the service. I am in no position to make a statement as to whether or not an increase of 50 cents per month, or even $1 or $2, is justified. The CRTC alone looks after these matters.

Oral Questions

SMALL BUSINESS

NUMBER OF BANKRUPTCIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Minister of State for Small Business. Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs' statistics show the bankruptcy rate in Canada to be still on the increase. The department reported 1,981 bankruptcies for the month of January, 1979, compared to 1,587 for January, 1978. This represents a shocking increase of 24.8 per cent in the bankruptcy rate.

Considering that a large number of these bankruptcies, are small businesses that are not only being stifled by excessive and costly government intervention but are the victims of the gloom and doom and economic uncertainty brought about by the bankrupt economic policies of the federal government, will the minister take serious note of this drastic economic development and assure Canadian small businesses that measures will be taken to stem the spiralling rate of bankruptcies?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the gloom and doom and unsubstantiated rubbish which emanates from the opposition is probably the major cause for the lack of morale among small businessmen. Until the hon. member and others are prepared to tell us how many corporate formations took place in the last five years, the fact that bankruptcies are rising—while regrettable, under difficult circumstances—really does not tell the whole story.

It is true that there were more bankruptcies in the last two years than any of us would like to see. It is also a fact that over the past four or five years a great many more businesses have been created than in any previous five-year period. It is in those first five years that any business faces its greatest difficulties.

I think the hon. member should simply express his regret about those bankruptcies and not attempt to colour his remarks with editorial opinions about gloom and doom. I suggest that it is the gloom and doom emanating from his side of the House that is causing a lot of our problems in this country.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the minister that the gloom and doom is certainly very evident in the eyes of the Canadian public, and that this will be indicated when the next federal election is called.

The minister is aware, I am sure, that one of the serious problems is the fact that many of these small businesses are unable to secure financing at adequate rates. I know that the minister is very concerned about this, and I am wondering what he can do about getting money released under the Small Businesses Loans Act at special rates for these businessmen, because if they were able to get this money they would be able to stay afloat. I am wondering what the minister's position is on that proposal.

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, thanks to modifications in the Small Businesses Loans Act, double the amount of loans were made in 1978 over 1977. The rate is increasing again this year and I expect that it will be double again by the end of 1979. The Federal Business Development Bank loaned over $600 million last year, which was well in excess of the money loaned the previous year.

I can assure the hon. member that the instruments of the government provided for small business in the way of loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Federal Business Development Bank Act are being taken up with great enthusiasm. There is a lot of optimism out there, contrary to the gloom and doom which the hon. member is trying to purvey.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

RESPONSIBILITY IN DEALING WITH POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Environment). On Friday, the minister claimed that he did not want to put himself in the position of becoming the environment czar and having the responsibility for handling all pollution problems such as oil spills, threatened oil spills and similar occurrences threatening the environment.

Since care of the environment is the responsibility of his ministry, why does the minister want to shun that responsibility and pass it off to other ministers?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question very clearly last Friday. The hon. member knows what I said, that I did not want to be looked upon as the pollution czar in which, for example, I took over the regulatory functions for pollution control and environmental management of the Department of Transport, where I took over the environmental management of the Ministry of Energy, Mines and Resources, or the regulatory environmental functions of the Ministry of Indian Affairs, and so on.

I made it very clear that I was happy enough as Minister of the Environment and being able to advise the various departments of government on the kinds of laws that they should pass which would be consistent with the environmental standards we would all like to see for this country. I do not think that I should be running every department of government.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, is the minister saying that he does not believe that in matters of pollution and matters affecting the environment, he should not have an overriding authority in connection with other ministries? If he is going to leave it to them, how can we be assured that other ministries will fulfil the environmental responsibilities which are basically his?

● (1450)

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, by working with other government departments we give advice as to what we want by way of legislation. We do it that way. I think it is preferable to my taking over the whole regulatory function. For instance, the Department of Transport exercises control over aspects of pollution. In my opinion, it would be ridiculously cumbersome for me, as Minister of State for the Environment, to take over those kinds of powers. The regulatory functions relating to environmental matters, pollution control matters and transport should stay as they are.

I said I will make sure, as Minister of State for the Environment, that the kind of laws passed will be consistent with the objectives that we hold in the Department of the Environment.

URBAN AFFAIRS

REVIEW OF AHOP PROGRAM IN ST. JOHN'S—ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT OFFICE AT CMHC

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Mr. Paproski: Is he here?

Mrs. Pigott: Could the minister tell us whether an arbitrator has been appointed to review the AHOP situation in St. John's, to which the minister committed himself during debate in committee of the whole? I ask him, what steps have been taken to establish a permanent office at Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to handle the complaint of poor quality housing?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, following discussions in the House when Bill C-29 was introduced, a meeting was held between counsel for the people concerned and a representative from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. After this meeting, a formal answer is expected from counsel for the people concerned, and as soon as we receive this answer a decision will be taken as regards the appointment of an arbitrator.

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I am concerned about another situation, in the city of Penticton, B.C. It is a report—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mrs. Pigott: I have a further question on a quality problem which has occurred in Penticton, B.C., and is reported in the paper. Through lack of insulation, people have fallen through roofs and broken legs. These people were alarmed to find that the units were sold by a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation inspector. I ask the minister whether or not it is still possible for a CMHC inspector to inspect buildings which he himself builds and sells?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have more details on this matter before making any comments. Obviously, the remarks of the hon. member seem rather strange to me. I do not want to comment on them before having a detailed knowledge of the matter. It is a frequent occurrence that hon. members from the other side of the House display only a part or an aspect of a case in order to make it look disgraceful, when actually there is often a very rational explanation about the matter.

INCOME TAX

VANCOUVER—REPORTED DISALLOWANCE AND PROSECUTION OF DEPENDENCY CLAIMS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue about Vancouver news report of last week which indicated that millions of dollars are being lost by Revenue Canada in a so-called "rent-a-relative" tax racket. It was reported that an investigation of 2,300 dependency claims in the Vancouver area has revealed that over half needed further checks and nearly 1,000 could not be verified, resulting in many disallowances and prosecutions.

Is the minister aware of this problem, and what action does he contemplate to solve it?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of National Revenue and Minister of State (Small Business)): Yes, Mr. Speaker, regrettably we are aware and we have prosecuted a number of cases. I gather that in Vancouver, while the preliminary report shows claims for $364,000, $268,000 were proved false and as a result 10 to 12 persons have been prosecuted. I gather also that in other parts of the country some one-third of the claims have been shown to be false. We are alert to this problem and we are taking action wherever evidence is brought forward.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, has the minister considered consulting with his senior minister, the Minister of Finance, to see if the rules concerning dependency claims could be simplified so this problem will not occur all the time and will not force the minister into the role of an inquisitor?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I think the rules are equitable. They involve proof that the dependant is indeed a dependant. Once that has been established, the law provides for a deduction equal to that provided for a Canadian supporting a dependant. The difficulty arises because the dependant is in a foreign and distant place and whether the evidence is valid or not is more difficult to ascertain. I do not think the rules need to be changed. I think it is simply that our officers must remain alert to the possibility that some cases will be fraudulent.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROPOSAL THAT $8 MILLION INITIALLY INTENDED FOR GASPÉ PENINSULA BE USED TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT AND PROMOTE TOURISM

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Over a year ago, the minister signed an agreement for tourist development with the province of Quebec of which $8 million were to be given to the riding of Gaspé. In view of the importance of the tourist industry in the Gaspé Peninsula, and the fact that nothing has yet been done since that agreement was signed, would the minister be willing to take urgent steps so that those millions of dollars can be invested in the Gaspé riding in 1979 in order to fight unemployment and also have some tourist development?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, yes, we did sign that agreement almost a year ago and not much has been done in that first year. One of the reasons, I am told, is that the Quebec tourism, fish and game department had not included those amounts in their budgets nor planned to proceed with those plans during the current fiscal year. But it has been confirmed that for the new fiscal year which begins in a few days, those amounts have been taken into account, and we should now see more activity in that field; I hope this will happen and can assure the hon. member that we shall keep a close eye on the situation.

FUTURE OF CRDC IN DEPARTMENT

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Could the minister give some logic and reasoning to the House for his decision to end the involvement by his department in the CRDC and disband an organization which is the voice of the rural people in this country.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give several reasons. First of all, I had to conform with the instructions of the cabinet advising us that the department commitments had to be reduced; we do not have 50 or so programs which can take cuts; we have only a few to which those budgetary cuts can apply. However, I must say that in the case of the Canadian Rural Development Council, in view of the work it has done, the many recommendations I have received and the many reports I now have for study, consideration and implementation, it will certainly be kept busy for at least two years. We also kept the Atlantic Development Council and shall certainly have the opportunity in the next few years of setting up again, when the situation justifies it, a council to advise us again on the new policies that can be applied within the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. In closing, I can assure the hon. member that we had to resign ourselves to making that decision, but that it was no easy task.

FISHERIES

INTENTION OF DEPARTMENT RESPECTING PROSECUTION OF LOGGERS FOR VIOLATIONS OF FISHERIES' REGULATIONS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. Recognizing the fact that the area involved on the Queen Charlotte Islands is only about 40 acres out of a much larger tract of timber, could the minister indicate whether it is his department's intention to take the 15 loggers to court who are charged with violations under the minister's fisheries' regulations?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, because of a motion raised, I believe, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I will give some information.

Some time ago—I think it was in late January—the B.C. forest service and the fisheries department agreed that in an area on the Queen Charlottes, because of the type of slope, logging was a hazard for spawning grounds and that operations should cease. For some reason which I have yet to understand, the B.C. forestry service gave the go-ahead and we were not informed of their decision. However, when this decision was brought to our attention, we asked the company concerned to desist operations and to fell timber in another site. Our request was not complied with.

We tried to reach the B.C. deputy minister to discuss the issue. We attempted to do so on five or six occasions and we were unable to get an answer. Last week, I suggested a meeting at the highest level; I suggested that my deputy and myself, if necessary, go to B.C. to discuss this issue. The British Columbia government said that next Tuesday—that is, tomorrow—would be soon enough. Meanwhile, we have no alternative. There is a law that was passed unanimously by this House. The fish habitat must be protected, and we simply had to apply this law.

• (1500)

We do not want confrontation. We realize that water cannot be for the exclusive use of fish; that it is necessary to make some accommodation, and that is what we have done. I am afraid that in this case there was some unreasonableness, but I do not think it was on our side.

EMPLOYMENT

OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN UNDER AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The original publicity about the Affirmative Action program of the minister's department indicated that 23 staff-years would be allocated to this program. According to the minister responsible for the status of women in the speech he made in Montreal on Friday, that number is down to 20. In the minister's estimates, it seems to be down to five persons at head office and nine out in the regions.

Will the minister do what he can to beef up this program so that a real effort can be made by the government to persuade industry in the private sector to go along with the concept of Affirmative Action on behalf of women seeking employment?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It was this department that took the initiative and established Affirmative Action with that specific idea in mind. Second, we have supported Canada Works projects where people have got together to do some polls, investigations, studies and make reports indicating the attitude of the employers in a particular region. I do not have the figures at my fingertips. I will certainly look at the hon. member's representation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish the minister would square this faith in his program with the cutback he is making in personnel. My supplementary question relates to the fact that frequently—and we had it again today—statistics are being quoted about the number of jobs being created. It is asserted, as was asserted today, that 60 per cent of those jobs are for women.

Is it not a fact that those jobs include cases where a housewife phones up for someone to do a day's house-cleaning and a whole lot of personal service jobs of that kind? In view of the fact that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Even for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I have a little difficulty relating this as a supplementary to his first question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The relationship is between Affirmative Action, which is to get jobs for women, and the need for the government do to something in order to achieve just that. Will the minister do what he can in his or in other departments to get these statistics put on a proper basis, so that we will know how many women are actually getting lasting and permanent jobs?

Mr. Cullen: That, of course, is the objective of the department. I apologize to the House for being late today. I was meeting with the Canadian Railway Labour Association. I am sure some understanding will be afforded me for not being in the House earlier. I left there at twenty minutes to three and ran all the way.

Order Paper Questions

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning House business. I realize that an announcement was made on Thursday, but there is some uncertainty with regard to Bill C-32. Since today is an allotted day, is it the intention of the government to proceed with Bill C-32 tomorrow and go through committee of the whole stage clause by clause on that bill?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, when we discussed this question last week, I said that it was impossible for the government to secure unanimous consent to have the bill pass the House in all stages in one day, and that before deciding on or announcing any further steps I would have discussions with representatives of the parties, as had been suggested and indeed advocated by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). Before I make a move in that direction, I will be talking to representatives of all parties.

Mr. Paproski: On the same point of order, what is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: The House leader may want to address himself to tomorrow's business at some time later this day, but here again we are getting into the practice of asking the question following question period about what is today's business or tomorrow's business. That is something that has customarily been done once a week. I do not think we have to change that practice unless we have some direction from the House.

WARRANTS REFUSED BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Question No. 605—Mr. MacKay:

Were warrants requested pursuant to Section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act, refused by the Solicitor General after they were recommended by the RCMP and, if so, how many?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Information concerning warrants issued pursuant to Section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act will be contained in the Solicitor General's report to Parliament early in 1979, however, statistics with respect to refusals are not required.

AGRICULTURE—UNINSURED LOSSES

Question No. 1,095—Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra):

1. With reference to the uninsured losses due to damage to buildings under the control of the Department of Agriculture detailed at page 9.60, Volume 1 of the 1977-78 Public Accounts of Canada, for what reason was the loss of $44,208 unexplained?

2. What is the explanation for the loss?

3. In what locations did the losses take place?

4. Did the Department undertake procedural or structural changes to ensure that such an incident does not recur and, if so, what were they?

Hon. Eugene Whelan (Minister of Agriculture):

1. The location, identification of buildings and estimated cost of damage sustained is all that is required to be reported for the Public Accounts of Canada.

2. (a) Drying and threshing shed—estimated loss $19,208. Several persons who gained access by force were syphoning gasoline from a semi-tractor trailer unit stored in the building.

(b) Incinerator building—estimated loss $25,000. Incinerator overheated.

3. (a) Research Station—Scott, Saskatchewan.

(b) Quarantine Station—Grosse Ile, Quebec.

4. (a) Yes. Increased security has been initiated to help prevent further occurrences of break and entry.

(b) Yes. The new facilities will be constructed in accordance with current National Fire and Building Codes of Canada.

ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCERS—CONSTITUENCY OF OXFORD

Question No. 1,151—Mr. Halliday:

1. For the fiscal year 1977-78, how many (a) beef (b) dairy (c) poultry (d) pork (e) egg (f) corn producers in the Constituency of Oxford (i) applied for assistance (ii) received monetary assistance from the Department of Agriculture?

2. For the same year, how many persons in the Constituency (a) applied for a loan (b) received a loan from the Farm Credit Corporation?

Hon. Eugene Whelan (Minister of Agriculture):

1. Departmental records and accounting systems are not maintained nor designed to provide information by constituency. The information requested could only be obtained by conducting a manual search of a large number of producer files.

2. Farm Credit Corporation advise that statistics are not maintained on a constituency basis. Oxford county consists of two field areas, which results in an overlap into Brant county. However, based on the foregoing, the answer is:

(a) 120.

(b) 110.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—CONDEMNATION OF CONTINUING GOVERNMENT WASTE AND MISMANAGEMENT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its continuing waste and mismanagement, and its failure to implement management and administrative procedures that will ensure that the taxpayers' funds are spent efficiently, effectively, and according to the will of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will be aware that, since this is the final day in this period, steps will be taken to finalize some aspects of supply this evening. That will result in the House being asked to deal with two supply bills this evening. As has been our practice in the recent past, I hope the House will proceed, as we have done recently to the satisfaction of hon. members, to have the bills distributed now, notwithstanding the fact that they will not, of course, have been read a first time and will not be read until some time much later in the day. This practice has taken away a great deal of the difficulty of the supply process in the manner in which we conduct it at the present time, giving hon. members the opportunity to see the bill earlier in the day.

This, of course, is an unofficial action and awaits first reading of the bills which will take place only after today's debate is concluded. The government, in an effort to co-operate with this practice, now has available sufficient copies for distribution. May I assume it is the desire of the House that that be done forthwith?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will note that at 9.45 o'clock this evening every question necessary to dispose of proceedings on this motion shall be put forthwith, in accordance with Standing Order 58(10).

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the interim report of the royal commission on financial management and accountability, known as the Lambert commission, begins with a 200-year old quote by Thomas Paine:

Government, like dress, is a badge of lost innocence.

These words, as the author points out, reflect the free spirit of mankind that grudgingly concedes that, while governments may be a necessary evil, healthy suspicion of and constant vigilance over their activities must be maintained.

Government must have money and resources to operate and to do the things we ask of it. While no one loves the tax collector, Canadians certainly recognize that taxes are the price they pay for the provision of goods and services that they ask government to provide.

They give these funds to government in trust and ask that they be spent efficiently and effectively and on programs which they have approved through their elected representatives. That, sir, is the essence of our Canadian democratic system of government and therefore, when the taxpayers' money is misspent, wasted in an effective and inefficient manner and when the elected representatives have little or no say in how that money is to be spent, then our very system of democracy is undermined. That is why we have chosen this motion for discussion on this the final allotted day in the current supply period.

I am certain that when historians look back on the Trudeau years, it will be the gross mismanagement and resulting maladministration and waste that will stand out. It will be that, Mr. Speaker, which will define the place in history of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). No government in Canada's history has taken so much from the taxpayers of Canada and spent it so wastefully. No government in Canada's history has disparaged and downgraded parliament in the way this government has. No government in Canada's history has failed so miserably to achieve the goals it set out for itself.

We all recall, that, when the Prime Minister first took office he was dedicated to achieving the twin goals of a just society within a strong and united Canada. This Prime Minister, we were told, was the man to end separatism and create one strong Canada. Five years later he even declared separatism dead. But as we know, that obituary, like the obituary to Mark Twain, proved to be a gross exaggeration and today there is a government in Quebec dedicated to tearing this country apart. Tearing it apart? Perhaps that is an exaggeration. Perhaps, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lalonde) would have us believe, they are only four-fifths dedicated to tearing the country apart. Or is it one-fifth?

We all remember the other goals of this Prime Minister in his quest to achieve a just society for Canada. He said that he would end regional disparities in this country. He created a Department of Regional Economic Expansion, spent hundreds of millions, indeed billions, of dollars, yet today regional disparities are, if anything, worse than they were before he set out to cure them.

The Prime Minister set out to cure unemployment. He said that everybody who wanted to work should be able to work. Yet despite these lofty declarations of intent and innumerable job-creation programs from LIP to Katimavik, the fact of the matter is that during this government's term of office unemployment, save for a few perturbations, has steadily increased to the current level of 8.2 per cent. In France, a nation of 50 million, there are riots because unemployment is approaching one million. In this country we have had an unemployment level of a million Canadians for months and months and we have less than half the population of France.

The Prime Minister said he would not tolerate excessive inflation and indeed he committed himself to a wrestling match. To aid him in this fight he not only utilized the Department of Finance and the other departments of government, but in addition created five different outside boards and commissions to help him—the Prices and Incomes Commission, the Food Prices Review Board, the Anti-Inflation Board, the Commission for the Study of Incomes and Prices, and lastly the National Commission on Inflation. The current rate of inflation is 9.2 per cent. When this wrestling match started it was less than half that.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, when talking of this wrestling match with inflation we must never forget that it was this Prime Minister who said price and income controls would never work, that he would never introduce them. Then, with the election safely out of the way, he turned around and did exactly what he said he never would do. He will be remembered for that deception perpetrated on the Canadian people. He will be remembered for all of his failures. He fought inflation and failed. He fought unemployment and failed. He fought regional disparities and failed. He fought separatism and failed—failed miserably.

Well, Mr. Speaker, is it fair to ask how all these failures arose? I think it is. Indeed, we and the Canadian people have been asking regularly and these are the kind of answers we have been getting. At various times the Prime Minister has blamed his manifold failures on just about everybody and everything. He has blamed the weather on occasion. He has blamed international economic situations on several occasions. He has blamed provincial premiers for his failures in economic areas, his failures in energy policy, and, of course, his failure to drive separatism into the grave and keep it there.

But lately he has been making the most ridiculous accusations he has ever made. He has started to blame all of these failures of public policy on the Leader of the Opposition (Mr.

Clark). If one were to believe the statements the Prime Minister has been making, it is Joe Clark, the Leader of the Opposition, who is responsible for the disunity in the country, the falling dollar, the fact that eastern Canadians still do not have a secure supply of oil, and indeed just about every other problem facing the nation. Only a bankrupt government and a bankrupt Prime Minister would stoop to that level.

These most recent attacks on the Leader of the Opposition may be very entertaining to Liberal partisans, but they are fooling nobody. We know and the Canadian public know that the blame for this mismanagement, these monumental failures, rests right on the shoulders of this Liberal government and in particular this Prime Minister. The fact is that the present Prime Minister is the least able manager of any Prime Minister in Canada's history. It is widely accepted that this cabinet is the weakest in Canada's history. As a cabinet maker, the Prime Minister is a bust. Part of the reason is that he is a very poor judge of people. As Douglas Fisher stated in a column in the Toronto Sun on March 21, 1978:

> Who was Mr. Trudeau's first senator? Bobbie Giguere! Who picked Jean Dubé, Stanley Haidasz, Warren Allmand, Bob Stanbury, Tony Abbott, Jean-Jacques Blais, Jean-Pierre Goyer, Pierre Juneau and Jack Horner for the cabinet? Who chose Yves Pratte to head Air Canada and later placed Bryce Mackasey in the chairman's position at the airline?

The column goes on to list other such disastrous appointments and then Mr. Fisher points out:

> Surely any leader who can be so robustly against wage and price controls, even as a freeze device and then take them up 15 months later without a quibble of candour, has demonstrated how various is his judgment.

But, even if these individuals are better than most people give them credit for being, they really have not had a chance to show it. The Prime Minister, because of the manner in which he has managed his cabinet, has almost destroyed cabinet government as it has been known to most Canadians. I wonder how many people realize that since the right hon. gentleman took office there have been 191 cabinet changes; that is, the 34 cabinet positions have in total been occupied by 191 different people. This means that on an average each cabinet minister has served in five portfolios and remained less than two years in any one particular cabinet post. Anybody in his right mind knows there cannot be anything else but mismanagement and maladministration when the chief executive officer of an organization changes with that kind of frequency.

At the deputy minister level, changes have been almost as frequent. Vitally important portfolios, like industry, trade and commerce, energy, mines and resources and even finance have seen their deputy ministers change with far too much frequency. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has had four deputy ministers in the last four years—Jack Armstrong, Gordon MacNabb, Marshall Cohen and now Ian Stewart. Is it any wonder that the government has no coherent energy policy? If a private sector organization went through such managerial changes it would be in deep, deep trouble, and if not bankrupt, on the verge of bankruptcy. Mr. Speaker, if we want to know why this government has failed so miserably to achieve the goals it has set for itself, we need look no further than how this Prime Minister has built his cabinets and how he has managed them.

● (1520)

That mismanagement is undoubtedly the root cause of the grossly inadequate financial management and control this government has exercised over taxpayers' money. Hon. members will recall the observation of the Auditor General in his 1975 annual report, and I quote:

> The present state of financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

That was said in 1975, and the government did absolutely nothing in response to that highly critical statement regarding its management capabilities. The Auditor General was moved in his 1976 annual report to state, and I quote:

> Based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies and Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control of the Government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore, it is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

It is hard to conceive of a more damning statement of gross mismanagement. It is hard to conceive of what words an auditor could use to be more damning in his criticism. An audit of that kind delivered to a private sector company would result in the immediate resignation of all senior executives and, very likely, shareholder suits directed against the board of directors.

What was the response of the government? Essentially nothing. The government did accept one recommendation of the Auditor General. A Comptroller General was appointed, but the government refused to give the Comptroller General any legislative authority to perform his function and to get to the root of the problem. As we predicted during the Comptroller General debate, the evidence is mounting that this lack of legislative authority has resulted in several attempts to prevent the Comptroller General from doing his job. There have been several attempts to undermine the huge and important task he is called upon to fulfil. My colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), will have more to say about that in this debate, but that basically has been the total action taken by the government.

The failure of the government to achieve its goals resulted in a new ministry last fall, the Board of Economic Development Ministers, but as yet I have not talked to anybody or read anything about just exactly what this group is going to do. Clearly, the members of the board seem more determined and concerned about putting a good face on this government prior to the coming election rather than restoring proper management.

The specific examples of waste and plain spillage of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money as a result of the failure of this government to administer properly its position of trust are really too numerous to list, even if I had the whole day. The Post Office Department alone would require a day of debate, especially when we realize that in the last ten years the number of pieces of mail delivered by the department has increased 20 per cent and that the staff has increased by 50 per cent. The Post Office Department is running a $350 millions deficit. In spite of all that, it still cannot deliver mail on time and frequently does not deliver at all.

We could spend a day talking about the $3 million ill-considered and poorly planned Loto Canada spillage which the minister responsible tried to claim was an example of good management. The money wasted by this government on airports like Mirabel, Pickering and, yes, even Calgary, is worthy of a day's debate.

The money wasted and squandered by Crown corporations like Atomic Energy of Canada Limited in its Argentina deal deserves at least a day of debate, and we certainly could have a day of debate on the money wasted by the Department of Public Works on excessively high cost office space in Ottawa and Hull. There is not time to deal with them all. There is not time left in this parliament to do justice to debate on examples of waste and incompetence on the part of this government, but my colleagues who will be speaking later in the day will try to deal with some of these and others.

Anyone can understand mistakes, but ten years of continuing waste and mismanagement of incredibly damning audits by the Auditor General and no evidence of concrete action taken to rectify this—to use the words of the Auditor General—"particulary serious situation" are things the public do not understand and will not forgive.

Closely related to these gross failures in management is the disparaging and cynical view of parliament that this government and particularly the Prime Minister take. As the Lambert commission points out in its interim report, and as the Auditor General has pointed out on several occasions, parliament has lost control of the public purse and, indeed, the government probably has as well.

No Prime Minister in history has had less respect or less regard for this institution, parliament, than has this Prime Minister. Hon. members will recall that famous quote to the effect that we members of parliament are nobodies when we get 50 yards from the Hill. That statement might have been made in a fit of pique, but the evidence shows that that indeed is the view of the Prime Minister. He genuinely believes that the House of Commons has no right to interfere with government, that we do not have competence, that we are nobodies and therefore, by implication, that those who elected us are not very smart either.

The fact that this is the view of the Prime Minister is reflected in the manner in which closure is used by the government with such increasing frequency. Just last week there was evidence of the government's writing closure into legislation. Such is the enthusiasm of this government for closure that we had the ridiculous spectacle last week of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) moving closure on a debate which had ended.

Without complete parliamentary oversight and parliamentary authority over spending by government, we do not have a parliamentary democracy, not in any real sense. The rule changes introduced by the Prime Minister soon after his taking office removed the last vestiges of authority parliament might have had over the spending habits of this or any government. But the Prime Minister has not been satisfied with just eliminating parliament's authority with regard to spending. He was not satisfied just to change the rules so that parliament could no longer alter even a nickel's worth of the government's spending plans. He has gone to extraordinary lengths to prevent parliament from even knowing about or being aware of government spending.

In this respect I refer to the way in which spending estimates are cooked and manipulated to disguise their true magnitude. I have dealt with this subject in this House before. I have dealt with the manner in which this government disguises its true spending. I have pointed out the flimflam and basically dishonest bookkeeping which successive presidents of the Treasury Board have utilized in an attempt to lull the Canadian public into believing that the government really does have a handle on spending and that it really is reducing the amount being spent.

I have pointed out how, through the use of Crown corporations, vast sums of money—billions which belong to the taxpayers of Canada and which we in the House of Commons should be examining and authorizing the expenditure of—are being spent, amounts which not only do not receive parliamentary authority but which also are not even presented to parliament for its information. Starting in 1968 the government changed the rules regarding the presentation of estimates so that loans repaid were no longer listed on the revenue side but showed up as negative expenditures. If the government used the old and proper accounting procedure, spending estimates this year would be $244 million higher than the estimates presented. This year, the government is presenting spending estimates of an incredible $52.6 billion. Even more incredible and frightening to anybody who cares about the economic welfare of the country is that our $12 billion deficit is some $2 billion more than the entire spending of the government when this administration took office.

However, that is not the whole story. That $52.6 billion does not include $1.5 billion being spent by Petro-Canada. It does not include several hundred million dollars being spent by the Export Development Corporation. It does not include the several hundred million dollars being spent by CMHC. It does not include moneys being used to subsidize Syncrude production. That is some type of revolving fund. It does not include moneys being spent on airports because the airport revolving fund has been taken out of the spending estimates. Mr. Speaker, the actual spending is several billions of dollars higher than this government has declared to the public. This disguising, this hiding of public sector spending from the elected representatives of the Canadian people—that is, from us in the House of Commons—is a classic example which demonstrates the utter contempt that the Prime Minister has for parliament and our parliamentary, democratic system.

I could quite easily spend an entire day talking about the ways in which Crown corporations are used to abuse parliament, but I want to bring to the attention of the House just one of the more recent examples. When spending estimates were tabled last spring by the then president of the Treasury Board, the current President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras), he assured the House and the Canadian public that spending would be restricted to $48,800 million, not a cent more. Later in the year when the Liberals anticipated an election and wanted to look fiscally responsible, they reduced that figure by another $500 million.

That target proved impossible, so what did they do? They directed CMHC to sell over $400 million worth of mortgages from their portfolio. This CMHC did at a loss of millions of dollars to Canadians, a loss which does not show up anywhere in the bills, a loss which is not admitted. It is impossible for the House to determine what loss was involved in that sale.

Then the government had the colossal gall to list in Supplementary Estimates (A) receipts from this sale of $365 million as a negative expenditure. They sold the assets and listed the receipts of these assets as a negative expenditure. Can you believe that, Mr. Speaker? If that is not flimflam, if that is not book cooking, what is it? The fact of the matter is that by that little procedure they disguised spending by $700 million and they were then able to stand up and say: "We have achieved the target we set." I say, hogwash. They achieved no such target, they cooked the books.

Mrs. Pigott: That is right.

Mr. Andre: That is not the only way they cooked the books. It is interesting to note what they have done with the amendments to the family allowances program which resulted in the claim of a $690 million reduction in expenditures. Do you know how that happened, Mr. Speaker? They listed the tax credit as a negative revenue. They said they spent $690 million when in fact their cash requirements went up. The new program is costing them more money than did the old program, but they are claiming a reduction of $690 million in expenditures. If that is not flimflam, what is it? That kind of book-cooking, that kind of manipulation, in the private sector would result in the financial officers of any company going to jail because of their distortion of the true financial picture by some $730 million. Yet here we have the government doing it all the time.

If you wonder why we have so many Crown corporations, Mr. Speaker, you need look no further than that example for the reason. Crown corporations give the government enormous flexibility to create the kind of impression they want to create. If they want to disguise government spending, they push it off on to Crown corporations. If a public issue or problem breaks out and they cannot come up with a solution, they create a Crown corporation, give it a fancy title and offer this to the public as an example of how responsive they are. If the Crown corporation does something which is perceived to be positive, the minister is up front taking the credit; but if the Crown corporation fouls things up, the minister claims ignorance and denies any responsibility.

The classic example of that is AECL. When AECL sold a reactor to Argentina, the then minister of energy, mines and resources, Donald Macdonald, was saying that this is an example of how wonderful Crown corporations can be in the energy sector. When it turned out that we were going to lose tens of millions of dollars on the deal and we had to pay a bribe to get the contract, you could not find a minister who would admit to having heard of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

The fact that members of parliament not only do not have an opportunity to approve Crown corporations' spending programs but are not even given any information about these programs is precisely the thing about Crown corporations that this Prime Minister likes. That explains why, during the period 1970 to 1975, three-quarters of the current 400 Crown corporations were created—300 Crown corporations in a five-year period. So what, you might ask; if they are doing a good job, why not let them? The fact is that they are not doing a good job, as the Auditor General pointed out. In his 1976 report he stated:

> In the majority of Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control is weak and ineffective.

This is a terribly damning statement. What did the government do? The Privy Council did a study in which they recommended some changes to the Financial Administration Act and said a bill would be placed before parliament in the fall of 1977. A month ago I asked the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) whether he intended to live up to that promise and introduce the bill. His answer was precise and succinct: he said no, he had no intention of doing it.

The fact that the Auditor General points out that Crown corporations are mismanaged, the fact that there are over 200,000 people employed by these Crown corporations, representing basically a second civil service beyond the control of parliament and probably beyond the control of the government, the fact that these Crown corporations control assets of over $30 billion, and the fact that more and more of the public are demanding that this government do a better job of managing its resources, had not affected this government one whit.

Crown corporations are too convenient a tool to hide and disguise government activities, and even if they are wasting millions of taxpayers' dollars, the government does not intend to do anything about it. Deception has been so much the way of action of this government that it cannot seem to comprehend that openness, honesty and full accountability to parliament is the only way that proper management of the taxpayers' resources will occur.

I could go on and on with various examples of mismanagement. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that last fall the government announced $500 million worth of cuts. We have taken another look at that list. They have backtracked and flip-flopped on 15 items representing $165 million. So they have flip-flopped on $165 million worth of so-called cuts last year.

The government is now in possession of an initial copy of the Lambert commission report. The commission has reported and the copies are being printed and should be made public in a few days. If they are not made public, it is because the government does not want the public to know the recommendations which the Lambert commission made.

The commission recommends changes in the way that cabinets and deputy ministers are appointed and moved around. It is recommending changes in the manner in which this government is organized. It is recommending an enhancing and an upgrading of the role of parliament to ensure that the people's representatives can find out what the government is doing as well as exercising authority over it. It is recommending changes in Crown corporations and the way in which they are handled. It is recommending changes in the Treasury Board and in other central agencies of the government. In essence, what the Lambert commission is doing is making recommendations for very widespread changes in the manner in which this government has been operating. In making these recommendations the Lambert commission is stating implicitly that at present the government is maladministered and grossly mismanaged.

Lest hon. members on the other side get the wrong impression—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Five minutes.

Mr. Andre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank members of the House. I will take two more minutes. I did not want to give the impression that I am in receipt of an advance copy of the Lambert commission report because I am not, but I do have a general inkling of what it contains. Indeed, one can get that message from the interim report. If I look forward with anticipation to the report of the Lambert commission, it is because it will be recommending precisely what my party has been recommending for quite a period of time.

● (1540)

If there is any doubt about that, I would refer hon. members to the debate which took place in February of 1978 when we allotted an opposition day to this subject. We laid out in specific detail the necessary changes to restore democratic control in the government's spending processes and to ensure that proper management and effective control of taxpayers' money is the rule rather than the exception.

As I indicated in my opening remarks, the government administers taxpayers' money in trust. A position of trust demands the utmost in care, efficiency and effectiveness, and that the money be spent in accordance with the wishes of the democratically elected representatives of the people. The government has failed to honour this trust. It has failed miserably, and in the process it has wasted enormous amounts of money, and perhaps even more seriously, it has wasted ten or 11 years which could have been put to better use.

Basically the Lambert commission is recommending that everything the Prime Minister has done in regard to managing the affairs of Canada be changed. That verifies our view that this is the most poorly managed government in Canada's history. I urge the House to support this motion so that Canadians will get their long overdue opportunity to express their opinion.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) for introducing this motion before the House today. Let me indicate at the outset that we intend to support it.

I should like to comment on approximately three or four matters. First, I will give some evidence of government mismanagement and waste. I will make a few comments in general about government spending and the practices of various governments across the country. Also I should like to comment a little on the entire area of corporate waste, which we sometimes forget about.

A portion of the motion reads "to implement management and administrative procedures that will ensure that the taxpayers' funds are spent efficiently". The hon. member for Calgary Centre referred to Crown corporations and the fact that there are approximately 400 of them in the country. Also he referred to the lack of authority parliament has over them. Perhaps a solution which should be thought about by parliament is the one which was introduced by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) when he was premier of Saskatchewan a long time ago. At that time they struck in the legislature a committee on Crown corporations. Part of the practice of the legislative assembly in Saskatchewan is that an annual report of every Crown corporation is referred to the appropriate committee before the house recesses or before the house closes for the year. In that way members of the legislative assembly have a direct input into what Crown corporations are saying and doing. For at least the commercial Crown corporations, such as Petro-Canada, Air Canada, AECL and various other ones, perhaps this procedure should be implemented into the rules and regulations of this House. Regardless of party or regardless of government, it would give all of us a chance to give some input to the directions and priorities of Crown corporations.

In terms of the entire area of waste, there is a lot of evidence concerning government waste and mismanagement. All one has to do is look at several Auditor General reports. They show the whole litany of bad decisions, waste and mismanagement listed year in and year out. One can look at examples in the city of Ottawa where federal government buildings are sitting empty. I am glad the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) will be replying. Perhaps he can comment on this area as well.

I have before me a copy of an article which appeared in the February 24, 1979, edition of the Ottawa Journal. It is entitled: "Vacant space will cost $167,000 a month". It refers to the moving of certain public servants across the river. I am not commenting upon the policy of government buildings being decentralized out of Ottawa to Hull or other places; I am commenting upon the lack of good management—that there should be a tremendous waste of buildings already available. I am commenting upon the fact that there should have been better planning and phasing in of the program so that taxpayers' funds are not wasted in such a manner.

There are other examples of government waste. I should like to refer to one which has been localized and raised in the House before. It is an ad which appeared in a small weekly newspaper in my constituency. I believe this ad has appeared in every weekly and daily newspaper in Saskatchewan recently. The one I have in my hand appeared in a weekly publication known as the Foam Lake Review on March 14, 1979. It is an ad which could be almost labelled a political one, except that it is paid for by the Government of Canada. It is in the name of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) of Transport Canada. The ad is entitled: "Can Canada really export 1¼ billion bushels of grain a year by 1985?". The ad refers to the tremendous achievements of the government in the last few years by building export capacity for the movement of grain. I should like to know how much such an ad costs.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It pretends to be an article.

Mr. Nystrom: As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has stated, it looks like an article. There was another such ad in Vancouver. It referred to saving thousands of dollars on car fuel over the next five years if one could. It was in the name of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), the honourable czar of energy. There are various ads of that sort. I see the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) smiling. He is really very ashamed about this.

What about PRAC? PRAC was established by the Minister of Transport to look at rail line abandonment in the prairies. I should like to quote from the ad wherein it refers to PRAC. It reads as follows:

> You can fight for unprotected branch lines several ways, starting right now. Here is what you can do:
> 1. Form a local retention committee. Co-operate with other retention committees on the same rail line.
> 2. Study the reasons why the Hall commission or PRAC recommended abandonment. You may find an important mistake or you may find the situation has changed.

Many mistakes have been made by the Prairie Rail Action Committee. The ad continues:

> 3. Let the western arm of the CTC know you plan to defend a line. It will be alerted that people are interested in saving a line and want a hearing.

The minister could be saying this in press releases and in speeches. One can go back to the fact that most of the lines should not be abandoned in the first place. It continues:

> The western arm of the CTC can deny an application for abandonment for five years or so. The western arm of the CTC can also recommend to the Minister of Transport that a line should be added to the permanent network, guaranteed into the next century.

The Minister of Transport can add lines to the permanent network.

One must remember the cost of such ads to taxpayers. This type of thing makes Canadians very, very cynical about government, the management ability of politicians, bureaucrats and public servants. That makes me very sad because I do not think Crown corporations, governments or public servants are any less capable of managing money than the private sector. I do not think they are any less capable of planning the economy than the private sector. It is ads such as this which lessen the credibility of government as an institution. They lessen the credibility of people who are involved in public life and manage the funds of the country. It is nothing less than a blatant political ad. The government is sticking its hand and greedy fingers into the pork barrel in an attempt to be re-elected in a few ridings in western Canada.

An hon. Member: That is the way to do it.

Mr. Nystrom: I wish the hon. member opposite would rise to his feet and say that this is the way the government should go about doing things for the country.

In a debate of this type we should look at the priorities in managing money which the government has set. It is not only that the government wastes money, but we should look at its priorities. It is willing to give millions of dollars to professional hockey teams for rinks, but when a small town wants to build a rink for amateur sport, suddenly it meets the government's restraint program head on. I ask why?

• (1550)

Then look at what is being done about medical research in this country. Again, this has been cut back. When we look at the problems the native people have, and problems in respect of Indian housing, again we see that we are running into restraints. I think that is mismanagement of government funds.

Millions of dollars are being handed to the pulp and paper industry in spite of the fact that these companies are making profits and are not broke. Still they are receiving over $200 million in public funds. I think that is mismanagement of government funds.

When I look at the gifts the government opposite gives the huge corporations I am reminded of the fact that this government has probably borrowed more money abroad than any government in the past in order to prop up the falling Canadian 85-cent dollar, about which the government boasts sometimes. It is now printing a new $20 bill which is not worth much more than the dollar of a few years ago. This government has borrowed billions of dollars to defend the falling dollar, and we are now paying all kinds of interest on that borrowed money. At the same time this government is deferring corporate income taxes. That is money this government could use to reduce this huge deficit, money that could be used to build up the economy in this country, making it much stronger.

I notice that corporate deferred taxes have gone up $1.6 billion in the third quarter of 1978 compared to the third quarter of 1977. I understand these deferred taxes now stand at some $12.3 billion as of the third quarter of 1978. These are deferred taxes. I am sure that if the poor people in this country, such as those women working in the squid industry in Newfoundland, wanted to defer a few bucks in taxes it would not be long before the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Abbott) was demanding that they pay these few bucks to the national revenue department.

These are the things I think we should be noting when we are talking about government mismanagement of funds. We should look at this government's priorities to see whether it is governing for the ordinary, little person in this country. I think we should also be futuristic and think about the way this government is planning the economy. Just think of all the types of priorities this government has. If we look at these priorities in hard terms I think we must conclude that the government is wasting all kinds of money and is not planning the economy.

We should look at a number of different areas, for example grain handling. The Wheat Board has said that if we had put more money into boxcars we could have sold an extra $350 million worth of grain this year alone. We could have done that if we had adequate rolling-stock. We have seen many reports that say that if the government had a proper program in respect of nutrition to inform people about the foods they are eating, we could save hundreds of millions of dollars each and every year in terms of hospital bills that are escalating so rapidly in this country.

There are many other things one could point out. I think of the money wasted in relation to our human potential, particularly when I look at that vast reservoir of unemployed in this country, the result of a lack of planning in our economy. I look at the fact that we as a nation import more manufactured goods per capita than any other industrial country in the world. Surely to God we can do more processing of our raw materials in this country, for example, by upgrading the nickel in Nickel Belt and the Sudbury basin. By doing this we could be providing jobs for Canadians. I think that is one of the most condemning features of this government's lack of ability to manage and plan our economy in a proper way.

We should look at the food picture, something about which I am very interested in terms of agriculture and the consumer. We are becoming less and less self-sufficient in the production of food. If we had proper government management of the economy we could be producing a lot more food in this country. Some 70 per cent of our strawberries, for example, are being imported along with some 30 per cent of our cabbages, 44 per cent of our onions and 24 per cent of our cherries.

Many of these things that are imported could be produced in this country. I look across the way and see my good friend, the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand). I do not have the clipping with me, but that environmental czar over there said about a year ago that if we could use the energy that is wasted in this country we could produce an extra $2 billion worth of fruits and vegetables. He said that we could do that if we had proper planning of resources for the Canadian people.

In fact, if we discount grains and oilseeds we find that in 1978 our net deficit in the production of food amounted to about $1.6 billion. We are only about 90 per cent efficient in the production of beef. Just think of our very small population and the huge acreage we have in Alberta, Saskatchewan and other provinces for the production of beef. If we had proper management of the economy we could be more than self-sufficient in the production of beef in this country.

These are some of the things we should be looking at when we are considering a motion such as the one before the House today, and this brings me to the second part of the subject I wish to discuss. I do not think it is just the government across the way that does not know how to manage things. I got the impression from the Conservative party that it was a super manager and would get rid of government debts. I got the impression from members of that party that they would cut back on government spending. I used to believe them as I am basically a person who believes everything everybody tells me. I always believed that people were telling the truth. Perhaps I was naive in thinking that they would not mislead me. I did a little bit of research to see whether the Tories have a monopoly on prudent government spending, small deficits and proper management and planning. That is not what I found at all. I think this House should know some of the facts.

I just noticed in the paper on Saturday that Premier Lougheed had added another five our six members to his cabinet, and with 29 cabinet ministers in the province of Alberta he has the largest cabinet of any provincial government. In terms of a small Tory management team, again this is an indication—

An hon. Member: Tell us about Barrett.

Mr. Nystrom: Barrett had a much smaller cabinet than that.

An hon. Member: How many people are there in Alberta?

Mr. Nystrom: The population of Alberta is something under two million. The population of Quebec is over six million and the population of Ontario is well over seven million, yet Alberta still has by far the largest provincial cabinet in this country.

Let us look at numbers in respect of public servants. The province of Saskatchewan has 1.8 per cent of its people in the public service. In Nova Scotia, 2.3 per cent of the population is in the public service. In that Tory bastion of Alberta I am told that 2.4 per cent of the people are public servants, and in Tory New Brunswick the figure is 3.4 per cent. I understand that the national average is 3.3 per cent. This shows that the government that is a socialist government is the one that knows how to manage. Saskatchewan is by far the best managed province in this country.

Let us have a look at capital spending. When Tories hear the facts they cannot face them and they leave the House, like the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) is now doing. Let us have a look at per capita spending. The hon. member for Calgary Centre talked a lot about government spending, but which province in 1976 had the lowest per capita spending in the country? Was it the province of Ontario or the province of Alberta, or was it a Tory province at all? The answer is no; it was the province of Saskatchewan. It spent $1,436 per capita. Alberta had a per capita expenditure of $1,657, with Ontario spending over $1,700. All the other provinces had per capita expenditures that were higher, including Tory Ontario.

Let us look at government debt. Everybody knows that Saskatchewan for years was a very poor or have-not province. It was a province that always received transfer payments from the federal government. Let us look at government debt because we often get lectures in this House by Tories about how they would get rid of debts if they were in power. The lowest per capita provincial debt in this country is not the debt of a Tory province, and not that of the province of Alberta, but rather the province of Saskatchewan with a debt of $980 per capita. The province of Quebec is second with a per capita debt of $1,803. Alberta, with all its wealth and immense potential, its heritage fund and everything else, has a per capita debt of $1,880; in other words, twice as high as the per capita debt of the province of Saskatchewan. Then there is wealthy Ontario with a per capita debt of $2,059. In poorer provinces such as Newfoundland, the per capita debt is $3,000.

• (1600)

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Tory New Brunswick is very, very bad. In Saskatchewan, however, one-seventh of every cent goes toward paying off the debt of the province, whereas in Ontario eight cents of every tax dollar goes into paying off the provincial debt. We must put into perspective the fact that the Tories are very, very poor when it comes to managing the taxpayers' money. I am not quoting the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) or the hon. member for Edmonton Centre or anybody else in that party; I am merely quoting the facts as they are stated by statistics Canada with regard to the various provincial governments in this country.

The third area which I would like to talk about in the three minutes I have left is corporate waste. We talk a lot about government waste, but there is also corporate waste which in many cases, I think, is more extravagant or, at least, as extravagant as the waste by the government of this country.

I remember CEMA and the great debate about the egg marketing agency a few years ago. People hit the roof because a few million eggs had spoiled. The spoiled eggs represented about one half of one per cent of the eggs produced in this country. It amounted to about one day's production by all the hens in Canada. If a company had a margin of error of less than one half of one per cent, I am sure that many people would say that they had a very efficient board of directors.

Waste and Mismanagement

There are many cases of corporate waste. For example, I have a report commissioned by the Food Prices Review Board called the Mallen report. The report discusses the waste in the retail food system of our country and how Canadians are paying more than they should because of the fact companies are so wasteful. The report also discusses excess capacity. They said, for example, that the average excess capacity increased the price of food by some 3.7 per cent. In Sydney, for example, people are paying—

Mr. McKenzie: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: One of the Tories is terribly upset. I wonder if anybody has a valium tablet.

Mr. McKenzie: I will cover it when I am on my feet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: More, more!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I will take but one minute, and I thank the House for giving me the additional time. I was talking about—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I hear someone telling me that there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. I hope that you, sir, will take note of the fact that to the speaker of the Conservative party who moved this motion, we gave unanimous consent. I want the House to notice how ungracious certain members in the official opposition appear to be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. That is a matter which is beyond our control.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in support of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I must say there was unanimous consent, I think, to allow the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) to continue his speech for a few minutes. I respect your decision, but I would like to add a few remarks on the motion presented by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). It is a pity, Mr. Speaker, that once in a while—in fact, often—we have to introduce motions such as this one to make the public aware of the carelessness and incompetence of the government which has been in power for almost ten years.

On November 29, 1977, in a motion I introduced in this House, I mentioned particularly the lack of foresight and leadership on the part of the government. Naturally, when I said steps had to be taken to get the economy going again, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned among other things a few very important points, namely the weakening of our industry as a result of the flooding of the Canadian market with imported products, foreign products, inadequate funding to create employment in the economically weak areas and particularly the very high interest rates we have to pay on borrowings by federal, provincial and municipal governments and school boards.

The two hon. members who spoke before me talked abundantly of the waste of this government. I refer to the fact they forgot to mention—I hope they simply forgot to mention—the shameful waste that we have been witnessing and the fact that every day we are paying over $17 million—$17.9 million, to be more specific—in interest on this country's debt. And we of the Social Credit Party of Canada are convinced that it is a shameful waste because the Bank of Canada could readily be used to create the necessary credit and thus be indebted to ourselves rather that to foreigners. So, except for us, this government and the opposition forget to talk about those important things particularly trying to show the people of this country the mismanagement of this government in face of the constant waste going on day in and day out.

Mr. Speaker, during that motion I introduced in November, 1977, I asked and still ask on behalf of the people of my riding, the people of Rimouski and the people in the Gaspé area in general, the government at that time to take immediate steps to ensure the freedom and security of workers, farmers, mothers and people in general. I also urged the government to create jobs for young people coming out of our universities or CEGEPs with big, beautiful diplomas, with big, beautiful parchments but who face nothingness—we have no job. Mr. Speaker, those people have courage and will, they want to earn a decent living. They face the incompetence of the government, unemployment, welfare and misery.

Mr. Speaker, as the incompetence of the government apparently became its trademark and as regional disparities are increasing, it becomes more and more difficult to find jobs in some areas. After the budgetary cuts, those same areas are also unnecessarily affected by those drastic measures, namely the less favoured areas, as I said earlier.

● (1610)

When I spoke last October 17 in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the rate of unemployment in my area was 15 per cent; in Quebec, only the Abitibi-Témiscamingue area had a higher unemployment rate, and only by a few decimal points. Today, Mr. Speaker, even if our area is represented in cabinet, even if all the neighbouring constituencies are Liberal, the rate of unemployment has, sad to say, climbed to 21.2 per cent; this is the highest in Quebec and comes right after the Corner Brook area in Newfoundland where the unemployment rate is 24.3 per cent. It is therefore important to remind everyone of this situation, Mr. Speaker. I always make a point of recalling this situation because I feel we must remove these economic disparities if we want Canada to develop in harmony. It is most discouraging to note, however, that the gap between rich and poor areas has again widened.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to come back to the relevancy of today's motion which concerns government waste. The latest example of this, and probably the most inexcusable, is certainly the famous $23 million contract with General Instruments to launch the notorious and short-lived Loto Select. Once again, the federal government did all it could to go over the heads of the provinces and do what it wanted while interfering underhandedly in an area of provincial jurisdiction. In addition to the financial losses caused by the cancellation of this contract, there was also the arrogance that this government showed toward the provinces. But the provinces no longer tolerate this type of interference and are showing an ever more united front, so the government had to backpedal and the Canadian taxpayers, that is all of us, now have to pay the piper without having danced to the tune and to suffer from the incompetence of the government opposite.

Mr. Speaker, on October 23 last, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) asked to be allowed to make a very small additional loan of $17 billion for so-called operating expenditures. The financial requirements of the government reached astronomical proportions at the same time as all sorts of things were done to save $4 billion by cutting back very important existing services. During that time, the Bank of Canada exhausted its reserves to support our drowning dollar, which has been trying to surface for several months already, but to no avail, Mr. Speaker, since the dollar stayed at 85 cents and floated between something over 85 cents and 84 cents, to the great satisfaction, it seems, of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner).

The government has also invested in all sorts of programs of doubtful need and effectiveness. We could talk, for instance, of all the commissions on prices that we have seen. We have had the Prices Review Board, the Anti-Inflation Board, the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, and finally, the National Commission on Inflation. I would like to know the cost of establishing and dismantling all those commissions, which have been totally ineffective and, in any case, never had any real power.

What about real estate resources? We now have more office space than we need because the public service will curtail its expansion and even cut back staff in some instances. It will even be worse with a Progressive Conservative government since that party intends to cut 60,000 government jobs. Also, the government decentralization will also affect the surplus of space. The government has shown a complete lack of foresight. I hope it knows where it is going. In any event, the final verdict belongs to the people and it will come soon.

I also want to mention the propaganda war going on between Quebec and the federal government which both want to promote their view of federalism. We spend large sums of money in advertising not to promote federalism as is but rather to promote Trudeau style federalism, a centralized and dictatorial form of federalism where the provinces are only the pawns of the central government. There again, we do not know how much that will cost us. This debate strikes me as sterile. Instead, the government should apply itself to making concrete proposals to the provinces, at least to prove to Quebec its willingness to come to terms. While the Pepin-Robarts report has gone to gather dust on shelves somewhere, both DREE and the Department of Supply and Services are going ahead with their little publicity campaign in Quebec, simply because the provincial government made a campaign of its own to get people involved in its OSE program. It seems to me those federal funds could be better invested. I know many unemployed workers in my riding who would be very happy to know the Canada Works program has more funds at its disposal.

Another example of inconsistency comes to my mind, that of the child tax credit. Anyone who has the right to claim that tax credit will have to fill out a separate tax return; this means that in a family where there is but one wage earner, that is the father, the mother will have to fill in her own tax return. And talk about the problems of separated couples and the income of dependent children! Revenue Canada will have to check over two million additional tax returns, that is the tax returns themselves, checking the return of the wife against that of her husband, and all the appended slips and required vouchers. Now that is another costly administrative chaos. In addition, a large number of those returns will surely not have been filled in properly. Can you imagine all that paper work, all that red tape in order to reduce family allowances!

Mr. Speaker, when ordinary folk have to tighten their belts because inflation is eroding their pay cheques and unemployment constantly threatens a large number of workers in this country, we must react quickly and use public funds to solve urgent problems and so improve the lot of our people and foster human dignity in this country.

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this motion because I am concerned that members opposite are continuing to ignore the genuine progress that is being made in the area of management efficiency by this government. I am concerned because, in the rush for public attention, facts are being overlooked and much evidence is lost in the mud of political rhetoric.

I want to take the next few minutes to review for hon. members some of the initiatives that have been undertaken and to discuss some of the actions now under way. I will discuss the continuing program of restraint in spending and in the administration of the government operations, as well as draw attention to the IMPAC studies under way by the Comptroller General. I will comment also on the government's restraint program.

● (1620)

As far as administrative measures are concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the members of this House that a program of administrative restraint was introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) when he was president of the Treasury Board on March 25, 1976. This program has been carried through vigorously both by my predecessor, the present President of the Board of Economic Development Ministers (Mr. Andras), and myself, and I am pleased to report to you the following achievements of administrative restraint during the first nine months of fiscal year 1978-79.

In keeping with the new Treasury Board guidelines on office accommodation, the government in consolidating and reducing its over-all use of office space. More than 82 accommodation requests were received by the Treasury Board during the last year and the space requested was reduced by more than 20 per cent. As a result, government reduced its actual inventory of office space by about one million square feet with a concomitant saving of about $7 million in annual rent.

In keeping with government policy to conserve energy, Treasury Board has issued new guidelines for the acquisition of motor vehicles. As a result, the purchasing trend of a few years ago, which was made up mainly of full-sized sedans and station wagons, has been completely reversed. Compacts now account for 55 per cent of new purchases, while full-sized car purchases dropped to 3 per cent in 1978. Apart from the obvious savings in energy consumption, the reduced purchasing price that can be attributed to this changing mix in the government vehicle fleet is of the order of $1 million per year.

With respect to broader energy savings, Treasury Board, in co-operation with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, has instructed departments to observe the necessary caution of energy consumption. As a result, the government energy bill last year was reduced by $31 million. Reflecting these measures of prudent housekeeping, Ontario Hydro reported that the city of Ottawa was the only major city in Ontario to use less electricity in 1977 than the year before. A good part of the credit goes to the federal government, according to Ontario Hydro, for cutting down its consumption.

In a further attempt to conserve energy while supporting public transportation, government no longer provides all of its employees in city core areas with free parking. In 1978-79 this policy, which is now in effect throughout most Canadian cities, produced revenues of $1.4 million.

In the broad area of office equipment, government savings last year were some $3 million as a result of better tendering procedures, limiting choices and further restraint in acquisitions. Similarly, with respect to office furniture, expenditures have been reduced sharply over the past years and are now stabilized at around $5 million per year, compared to $7 million per year before the restraint program took effect. Meanwhile new policies have been put in place to maintain the newly established ceiling of $5 million.

Waste and Mismanagement

To cut down on the number of employees that were engaged from temporary help agencies, Treasury Board last year instituted a new policy whereby such employees cannot be hired for more than eight weeks and all contractual arrangements with the agencies would be conducted by the Department of Supply and Services. These policies have resulted in a much better utilization of existing public service staff while reducing government expenditures on outside help by millions of dollars.

Whereas newpaper articles last year quoted figures of $25 million for temporary help, these expenditures for the first nine months of the current fiscal year were $6.6 million for the national capital region and about $4 million for federal offices elsewhere in Canada.

First class air travel by public servants has been reduced by 90 per cent since 1975.

With respect to electronic data processing, government expenditures, expressed in 1974 dollars, have remained virtually constant at a level of some $210 million per year. In keeping with government policy, the services of the private sector are used extensively and are expected to reach $49 million in 1979-80 out of total expenditures of about $380 million.

New policies and more stringent reporting mechanisms have been introduced with respect to such expenditures as hospitality, conference travel and essential membership fees, with the result that the newly established expenditure codes for these items will enable close scrutiny and year to year monitoring.

In keeping with our general determination to improve administrative practices throughout the public service, Treasury Board has implemented over the past year new policies on the management of large capital projects, improved reporting requirements for contracts with individuals, more stringent guidelines on permissible fees and stricter control on contracts with retired public servants.

In addition to this broad range of administrative measures, Treasury Board has given new impetus to the government-wide program of incentive awards to reward those employees who make specific suggestions to improve the efficiency or effectiveness of their programs. I am pleased to report that the net effect of this rejuvenation has been demonstrated by savings of $9.7 million during 1978. These savings constitute a 300 per cent increase over the average annual savings of past years. These initiatives have brought about a sharply increased awareness among public servants of the importance of administrative restraint. This has resulted in a saving of some $75 million through these measures during the past fiscal year.

This is not the only area where public servants have shown a greater awareness for economy and efficiency in their departmental activities. Another obvious one relates to the office of the Comptroller General of Canada. Not long after the appointment of the Comptroller General the government announced that his office was undertaking a project with the acronym IMPAC—"Improvement in Management Practices and Controls". The objective of IMPAC is to work with departments to identify needed improvements in the area of management practices and controls and to develop action plans to implement these improvements. IMPAC would also provide government with an overview of the current state of management practices and controls across the public service and thus provide the basis for fact-based statements about the quality of such practices and controls.

Initially the IMPAC survey was to include the 20 largest departments of government and cover 70 per cent of the budget and 84 per cent of person-years. Subsequently a further 11 organizations have been added to the survey and the totals are now 76 per cent and 90 per cent respectively.

The IMPAC survey is being conducted by teams composed of more than 40 experts from the office of the Comptroller General and is co-ordinated by a small secretariat of five persons. The survey covers the major portion of the management cycle, from planning through the various administrative and control mechanisms to audit. It is based on a questionnaire prepared by the office of the Comptroller General prior to the start of the survey. The findings of the survey form the basis of discussions between the Comptroller General and the deputy minister of the department involved. The result of the survey and these discussions will be an action plan prepared by the department to bring about improvements in its management practices and controls, where the need for improvement has been identified in the survey.

At the present time the surveys of 13 departments are completed; the remaining seven of the first group are more than half finished. Action plans are being concluded in three departments. It is expected that all the action plans of the first group of 20 departments will be agreed to by December, 1979, and those of the other group of ten departments by April, 1980.

There are already visible results from the IMPAC survey. Often when the teams arrive at a department they find that the major needs have already been identified and corrective action is under way. Some of the action plans resulting from the IMPAC survey will take a number of years to implement fully, and although there should be an immediate improvement in management practices and controls across government, some major projects will not be completed for a number of years. The Comptroller General will be reporting progress to Treasury Board and ensuring that the momentum now under way is maintained.

Finally Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw attention to the government restraint program. The government announced its restraint policy in 1975 as part of the anti-inflation program. Spending is linked to growth in the GNP. This policy is applied to all spending including budgetary outlays, loans, investments and advances. Furthermore, the government committed itself to a target in advance of the fiscal year. In every year beginning with 1976-77, the first full year of the program, the targets have been set at or below the growth of the GNP. In every year the government has held actual spending well below the targets.

In both the 1976-77 and 1977-78 fiscal years, actual spending was held more than $1 billion below the announced ceilings, for growth rates of 10.4 per cent and 7.1 per cent respectively. Hon. members are aware that for 1978-79, the fiscal year just ending, the original ceiling of $48,800 million was reduced by $500 million as part of last August's spending cuts. When the public accounts come out later this year, I am confident they will show we have come in well under that ceiling. That means spending growth in 1978-79 will be less than 9.5 per cent.

For this coming fiscal year, 1979-80, $2 billion was cut from originally forecast requirements last August to give us a target of $52,600 million. I announced the details of the government's planned spending within that total when the estimates were tabled on February 19. That represents an increase of 8.9 per cent over 1978-79 spending.

The distribution of that increase among the various types of federal spending provides an indication of just how firmly the government has acted to control spending growth. About 58 per cent of the total budgetary growth is accounted for by transfer payments to individuals and other levels of government, subsidies and assorted other transfer payments. Another 43 per cent of the net growth is caused by the rising cost of the public debt. This means that estimates for operating and capital expenditures of government departments and agencies are actually lower than they were in 1978-79. In addition, I would like to note that departments, within those reduced budgets, still have to absorb the effects of inflation.

Control of public service growth is also part of the restraint program and the government's record is just as impressive. Here are the facts Mr. Speaker. In 1976-77, the first year of the program, traditional growth rate of authorized person-years was dramatically reduced to 1.3 per cent. In both 1977-78 and 1978-79 this growth was held to only six-tenths of 1 per cent. For 1979-80, largely as a result of the spending and public service reductions announced last August, there is an absolute reduction of 6,685 person-years. That is 2.1 per cent lower than last year. At that point, the size of the public service will be approximately the same as it was four years ago.

The record of the government is exactly the opposite to what is suggested by the motion before us, and knowing the sound judgment of this chamber, I am sure it will have the good sense later this day to soundly defeat the motion.

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to rise and speak on a global matter until I heard the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) tell us about this period of restraint which the government in its self-worship has imposed upon the Canadian people.

I should like to remind hon. members that they are busy spending $1 billion a week and creating a deficit of $1 billion a month. We have been told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that the national deficit has now increased by $1.2 billion over the estimates for the fiscal year 1979 in this "period of restraint." The Minister of Finance has further advised us that in fiscal year 1980 we will carry close to a $13 billion deficit. If this increase in the rate of deficit continues, the 1983 deficit will be close to $16 billion and the aggregate deficit between 1979 and 1983 will be $70 billion. So much for restraint!

In addition, this government has utilized $4.2 billion of United States funds in reserve to support the sinking Canadian dollar, an amount which represents about 90 per cent of the foreign reserves available in September, 1977. We have negotiated two foreign lines of credit to supply more reserves for foreign currency and by November 1, 1978, drawings in these credit lines amounted to $2.4 billion. Again, so much for the restraint expressed by the President of the Treasury Board.

Further, between 1968 and 1978 federal spending will have quadrupled, going from $12 billion to $50 billion. So much for the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he requested national air time on August 13, 1969, to discuss the economy, on which occasion he said we would be on the road to disaster if nothing was done to bring spending under control. Yet the hon. gentleman talks about restraint.

During the Prime Minister's three years of "restraint", federal spending increased by $14.3 billion, or 44 per cent. This increase amounts to $226.50 per Canadian and represents an amount larger than the entire federal budget for 1968. I am talking simply of the increase in spending during the "period of restraint."

The gross public debt is now running at about $6,700 per Canadian worker and at about $3,000 per Canadian—an increase of 87 per cent in nine years. On that same August night of August 13, 1969, the Prime Minister told us that deficits were to become a thing of the past. Mr. Speaker, the gross public debt today amounts to $67.1 billion and total government spending as of January, 1978, was $50 billion. Yet the President of the Treasury Board stands in his place and enumerates "tinkertoy" items of restraint in an effort to disarm criticism.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I had intended to deal with a more global aspect of the problem which faces us. Once again we are engaged in a debate on waste and mismanagement. It is entirely possible that the Canadian public is numb, because in the aggregate the figures are overwhelming; it is difficult to relate to them. Just two weeks ago a reporter asked me why I was so upset about the possibility of $22,000 in postage being wasted by one of the departments of government. The reason I get upset is that I know how hard it is to save $22,000. I know how hard it is to pay back $22,000 when you have borrowed it from the bank. I also know that between $22,000 and $50,000 of capital can create one new permanent job. So I get angry when I see such a sum wasted. I know what an additional $5,000 a year could do for many people at the low income level.

There is deep and widespread concern that this parliament is not representing or serving the people properly. No doubt the introduction of electronic Hansard and the electronic media is accelerating the concern that something is seriously wrong. Only last Friday in the Ottawa Journal, Mr. W. A. Wilson wrote a column headed "Feeling of Malaise Grips the Nation". He spoke of the "Me first" syndrome. He talked of a sense of public responsibility that seems to be missing. Few good examples are being set by political leaders, business leaders and professionals. In Mr. Wilson's view the political process does not bear upon the sort of malaise that is affecting the nation. He pointed out that in the debates on universal suffrage at the turn of this century it was feared that full democracy would lead to such heavy demands that the system would collapse. Although this has not occurred, Wilson states:

Groups within the political process discovered the art of creating public appetites and then built their hold on power by satisfying them.

● (1640)

While on this malaise which is of increasing concern to many people who want to see freedom survive and an improved quality of life evolve, I refer to a series of articles by Norman Macrae, the deputy editor of London's The Economist. These articles are entitled "Ailing Democracies may be Terminal Cases". Mr. Macrae points out that voting democracies have some serious challenges ahead. One of those challenges is public sector imperialism. Power has passed to what Solzhenitsyn, in his warning to the western world, called the "political bureaucrats" and the "official bureaucrats".

Macrae pointed out in his articles that these two groups now spend a higher proportion of gross national product than did the priests, kings, nobles and capitalists during their own peaks of power. I suppose the problem we face is one of human nature, for it seems that every time we allow a particular group to have power, it is certain to develop ways of keeping its own bureaucracies growing. In his articles Macrae also pointed out, and I quote:

The concentration of spending power in the hands of bureaucrats has been sanctified on the supposition that there are lots of services that can more efficiently be produced by state monopoly than by the market.

Macrae also said, and I quote:

In the past few years, it has become probable that none of these now exists.

He pointed out, and I quote:

Productivity per man in the civil service has sometimes declined during the past two and a half decades by over 90 per cent while productivity in the market sector has more than doubled.

We have an example of that here at home. The Auditor General's report of 1978 states that the public service and the federal civil service is at a productivity level of about 65 per cent when the least we should expect is an 85 per cent level. The rate is 20 per cent less than should normally be expected. Of some 330,000 man-years, 20 per cent is 66,000 man-years. On just a quick calculation, if we want a dollar measure, that adds up to something in the order of three-quarters of a billion dollars. That is an unproductive burden on those involved in real work.

Our challenge as parliamentarians is to reverse the incentive aspects which are built into this system. At present it is not in the interest of the bureaucracy to be productive, for its status and comfort are measured by the size of its budget and the person-years of departments.

[Mr. Huntington.]

In addition, bureaucrats work in an information environment where problems are committed and studied but seldom solved. Bureaucracies live on unsolved problems. For instance, since 1969 there has been a total of 26 royal commissions appointed by this government. In the public accounts of 1978 the cost of six commissions and studies or reports came to over $5 million. I have not been able to obtain the figure for the cost of studies over the last decade.

Another serious aspect of public concern, as I sense it, is that the interests of parliamentarians seem to be above those of the people and that this institution has become a top down—not a bottom up—institution of democracy. That has become dramatically evident in the last decade. Parliament has gone completely contrary to the popular will on such issues as capital punishment, bilingual policies, communications policies and the use of the Unemployment Insurance Commission as a welfare and wealth distribution scheme instead of protecting the insurance aspects of its purpose. That alone this year is another $5.3 billion burden which should really be a self-supporting program.

The inability of parliament, through fear or its shrug attitude, to do anything about the problems within the civil service and the mismanagement and anarchy within the Post Office is a challenge which has been with us for the last five years. The situation today is no better than it was five years ago. I suppose it is fair to say that there is lack of leadership in this institution because we are caught up in the "Me first" syndrome, and we are not offering the leadership which must come from the top. We have failed so far to get the system under control and to deliver an efficient, economic and effective use of the tax resource, which comes solely from those engaged in real work. This concern exists in all free countries, not just here, and because this institution does not react as it should we call for direct democracy. We see the Prime Minister and some of his wise men from the west calling for this great direct democracy, which is symbolized, in most people's minds, by proposition 13 in the state of California. Just as an aside I would like to say that when the Prime Minister and some of his hypnotized followers speak of direct democracy, the farthest thing from their minds is the example of proposition 13, which has the force of law.

I am new to politics and have trouble relating to the art, which really serves only the short-term, election to election needs of political power. To me there is a serious flaw in a system which fails to look beyond the next election in planning the use of its resources wisely. I note that there is nothing in the proposed constitutional changes and entrenchment of rights which moves to correct these flaws. Where do we see a right for the taxpayer to be guaranteed a balanced budget? Where do we see entrenched a right for the taxpayer to be guaranteed efficient, economic and effective use of the tax resource?

I have also been reading Reginald Whittaker's book "The Government Party", which is an exposé on the organizing and financing of the Liberal party from the years 1930 to 1958. It really boils down to the fact that the art of political power in Canada, as perfected by the Liberal party, is the art of patronage and building and controlling a bureaucracy. The last decade has seen the use of these instruments of political power rise to the point where the rank and file Canadian can no longer contain his disgust for politicians and the system. Patronage does not serve the poor. It does not distribute wealth, as the Prime Minister loves to imply with his quote "From those with means to those with no means". Patronage redistributes wealth on a constituency basis, with the beneficiaries being the middle class. It ignores minorities.

The building and use of the bureaucracy as a root of political power in the last decade has now arrived at the point where its cost is overwhelming those responsible for the production of wealth. The increasing workload on members of parliament caused by civil servant buck-passing, indifference and, at times, sheer arrogance, is becoming truly alarming. This issue is not limited to the Canadian civil service. It seems to be a wide issue in the western world and is very well reported on in a book from the United Kingdom entitled "The Disobedient Civil Servant". So I say again that we are dealing with a phenomenon which is not limited to our own country but, nevertheless, one which must be addressed in a serious way in this House when we are debating the mismanagement of our resources.

We must ask whether parliament, which sits over this bureaucracy, can survive as a form of government capable of continuing to protect and serve man's freedom and man's quality of life. Can the member of parliament improve his performance and serve meaningfully a public which feels increasingly isolated? In the role of watchdog over supply, can the member of parliament accept the full role of a director elected to represent the shareholders of Canada? Our record is tragic, and the neglect of our overview and watchdog role with regard to the nation's tax resource is a disgrace.

The introduction of television into the House now delivers the challenge of these questions squarely onto the desks of members of this House. Can we react to the warnings of Solzhenitsyn and Norman Macrae of The Economist of London, England? I think we can. I think we have to move in a substantial way to improve the committee system of parliament if we are going to manage the tax resource properly.

I offer the following suggestions. First, the public accounts committee should be given a permanent director with the right to hire and/or call on research staff as required on particular subjects. The committee should be given a permanent committee room with office facilities adjacent. The committee should perhaps be reduced to 14 members or less with parliamentary secretary pay and status. The chairman should be from the opposition and should be given the proper status for his responsibilities. The function of the committee should be to conduct audits, and it should study and report on government-wide issues. Perhaps the committee's proceedings should also be televised.

• (1650)

In addition, and parallel to that committee, I should like to suggest that there be put in place a permanent expenditure committee with a permanent director, a budget and the right to hire or call on research staff as problems require. It should be given a permanent meeting room and office facilities, perhaps adjacent to those suggested for the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. It should be made up of 14 members or less, members should have parliamentary secretary status and pay, and the chairman of that committee should also be an opposition member. Its function should be to examine and review the criteria supporting the spending process.

In view of the fact that we now have 400 Crown corporations, I think that a permanent Crown corporation committee should be set up with an act supporting the function of that committee. Its object should be to review the objectives and the use of resources by Crown corporations. Again a permanent director should be appointed with a budget to hire or draw on research staff as required for the subject matter at hand. Again these facilities should be co-ordinated with those suggested for the public accounts committee and the expenditure committee. The parliamentary secretary pay and status should also apply to members of that committee.

With these suggestions, if we could put a view on the spending process at the beginning and also at the end and examine the activities of Crown corporations which also have a spending capacity based on a public resource which creates a contingent liability, we could start to get the essentials of this process under control.

I should also like to draw the attention of members to Votes and Proceedings of Friday, March 23, and the substantive report which members of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts submitted to the House in their third report dealing with the reorganization of the form of the estimates, marrying that form to the public accounts so that we can have audit trails from a vote appropriation all the way through to the reporting of the fact in the public accounts. We are also calling for an informational system in the form of the estimates, a summary volume and other volumes to follow which would provide the detail within each department, opening up and removing once and for all this aura of secrecy which seems to prevail around a poorly presented wealth of information which has not been organized in the proper form. I would commend to hon. members a reading of that third report because I think it is one of the more important reports that that important committee has tabled in this House.

As I listened to the President of the Treasury Board I came to the conclusion that only self-worship or the narcissism of this Liberal government prevents their recognition of the malaise that faces our people and our form of government. They have had an opportunity to correct the system in the last decade and they have not. We have heard of the extent of their restraint program and I have figures to show the infinitesimal effort that has been made in light of the magnitude of the challenge that has faced the government. They have delivered a debt which future generations will have to carry and which rests at $67 billion at present. The service cost on that debt is 150 per cent the amount spent by our Department of National Defence. This government, with its restraint program, has borrowed money to pay interest on loans and is spending $6,500 million a year servicing that debt when it spends only—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the two speakers from the official opposition, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) and the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). Perhaps it should be noted that at present the Government of Canada redistributes approximately 71 per cent of the tax money it collects to the people of Canada in the form of direct payments, such as CPP, old age security, family allowances, and the transfer of payments to the provinces for medicare and welfare.

In other words, out of the 100 per cent revenue which the federal government collects, approximately 29 per cent is spent directly by the government on the armed services, the Post Office and various direct contributions which the federal government makes. What we have seen in the last generation, that is in the last five, ten or 15 years, is a very large increase in the amount of money that is transferred to individuals and provinces, and a gradual decrease in the amount for which the federal government has direct responsibility. Some of us on this side of the House have concern over the fact that the federal government has less and less operating room as the amount of money it spends shrinks, whereas our non-discretional amounts increase.

The hon. member who spoke before me referred to the deficit and the increase in federal expenditures. What he did not say is that those increases are taking place in areas which I have already mentioned, that is, old age pensions, family allowances and transfers to provinces. If the hon. member is going to be honest and call for a cutback in government expenditures, he would have to call for that cutback in moneys that are paid out to the provinces and to individuals; but I have never yet heard the opposition call for a cutback in transfer payments to individuals or in old age pensions. Quite the contrary, they would like to have it both ways. They would like to appear financially responsible and at the same time ask for further increases in government expenditures.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from an article in today's Ottawa Citizen by Leonard Shifrin entitled "Strange Paternity of Politics". It reads:

> Since the Budget Control Act of 1974, the U.S. has treated tax expenditures—selective benefits provided to the tax system by way of deductibility of mortgage interest, a preferential treatment of capital gains, and so on—the same as direct expenditures. Every year Congress is presented with a tax expenditure budget as well as a direct expenditure budget, and the two are debated and passed together.
> The tax expenditure concept has been virtually ignored in Canada until Clark pushed it into prominence in his long list of selective tax cut promises. With the total cost of those promises now approaching $6 billion, the idea that tax spending needs to be watched as closely as direct spending is starting to take hold.

We heard just prior to my rising in the House two members of the official opposition who have gone up one side of the government and down the other regarding budgetary deficits. It appears from the article from which I quoted that there is a fear, not only among the press but among other people, that the official opposition, in their quest for power, has now brought out a program which would add a further $6 billion deficit to the existing deficit. I have heard no one in the House deny that the various programs outlined by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) would not in fact cost Canadians an additional $6 billion. Yet in considering an official opposition motion today, under which we are supposed to be discussing waste and mismanagement, the remarks of two members of the official opposition have been to the effect that we should decrease the budgetary deficit. I am not sure if hon. members have read the comments of the hon. Leader of the Opposition who has said exactly the opposite. In fact he has gone on record—

● (1700)

Mr. Huntington: You are misleading the House and you know it.

Mr. Anderson: I hope the hon. member is not disagreeing that the Leader of the Opposition said that they would increase the deficit from its present level. In fact, the finance critic of the official opposition, in trying to explain that position, said that it would be only a temporary increased deficit for perhaps a month or two. If the offocial opposition is saying that it can go into an additional $6 billion deficit and eliminate it in a month or two, perhaps this should be brought forward to Canadians. Not only many members on this side of the House but people across Canada wonder how a $6 billion deficit can be diminished in a month or two.

Hon. members opposite seem to feel that their position is rational, that we should be attacked as being financially responsible for the deficits we have incurred. Yet they will be more financially responsible by incurring even greater deficits. If hon. members opposite can marry those propositions together, God love them, because they will have to do so not in the House but before Canadians within a short period of time. Then the people of Canada will judge whether they can give out promises of $6 billion and at the same time attack the government for not being financially responsible. Until hon. members opposite marry those two propositions together, I suspect Canadians will do exactly what I am doing today. They will ask, "How can you criticize the present government for deficits when you are telling us that you will give us even greater deficits?"

The hon. member for Calgary Centre questioned the adequacy of the government's implementation of management and administrative procedures which will ensure that taxpayers' funds are spent efficiently, effectively and according to the will of parliament. Only a few weeks ago in the House I participated in a debate wherein, due to the fact that teaching facilities at universities for doctors, nurses and dental assistants were sufficient and that there were more rooms and class facilities than were being utilized presently, the Government of Canada decided to cut that program off. Obviously it was no longer needed. The classrooms which were built and the facilities which were put up were not being utilized fully at the present time. In the same debate I listened to the official opposition say that the Government of Canada should spend that money anyway since it is committed to the provinces, and that regardless of spending another $12 million, $15 million or $20 million, we should create additional classrooms even though the present ones were not being fully utilized.

I bring this matter up because it is very hard for some members on this side of the house to hear that we are being financially irresponsible, yet on almost every occasion when we say that funds can be cut from this or that area and we provide a rationale for it, usually we are criticized in ringing terms for not caring for the people of Canada. There are certain ways it can be done. For five years I have listened and the most criticism we have received is that various departments are not funded enough. Hon. members on this side will realize that day in and day out we are castigated because we do not provide money for worthy projects. One can say that on one hand, and then say on the other hand that the government should be more financially responsible, should not increase its deficit or its budgets. But one cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Paproski: When did you start becoming responsible?

Mr. Anderson: One cannot have it both ways. One must be financially responsible and say no, especially when considering the stupid argument regarding whether further classrooms should be built for dentists, doctors and nurses. It was the most ridiculous argument I have ever heard, that since we committed the money, whether it was needed or not, we should continue to spend it. That is what the official opposition does: they want it both ways, and they cannot have it both ways.

With respect to taxpayers' funds being spent officially, it must be obvious to all members that parliament has made many provisions by which the Government of Canada accounts to parliament for the funds which it has appropriated. The principal piece of legislation is the Financial Administration Act and the related regulations promulgated thereunder. Parliament is provided with many opportunities to review the government's financial operations, contrary to what has been said by some members today, both prospectively and retroactively. For instance, these opportunities are: the estimates tabled by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan); the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien); the statements of financial operations published monthly by the government in the Canada Gazette; and the public accounts of Canada prepared by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. De Bané) and tabled in parliament by the Minister of Finance. The estimates and the public accounts of Canada are reviewed in depth by committees of the House of Commons, and the budget of the Minister of Finance is debated in the House. Also there is the annual report of the Auditor General which is tabled in the House. This provides members with the opportunity, if they wish to partake of it, to review an independent opinion of the financial operations of the government.

It is no secret that we in this House are dealing with the main estimates in each of the standing committees at the present time. Hon. members have alleged that they are not given an opportunity of looking into departmental spending, yet last Thursday the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development met and we sat for 35 minutes waiting for a member of the opposition to show up and look at the main estimates of the department. Obviously members are busy, but we hear the same complaint month in and month out, year in and year out, that members do not have an opportunity to look into the estimates and spending of departments.

If people in Canada attended a standing committee meeting, they would wonder what we are doing. It is obvious to many members on both sides of the House that the time we have to look at the main estimates is not utilized very well. Often we wait 15, 20 or 25 minutes for a quorum to start proceedings. In many instances members do not discuss the main estimates but matters which pertain to their ridings. They use this procedure as a means of asking questions of departmental officials, as well as the minister of the particular department concerned. I do not disagree with the right of members to do so, but if they are before the committee to look at the main estimates and to question government spending, then I am sorry I have to say that the time is not being utilized well.

Also it is fair to say that the annual report of the Auditor General gives members of the House the opportunity to review an independent opinion of the financial operations of government, especially as it relates to the use of spending authorities according to the will of parliament. The forum for this review is the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I should like to refer to one matter which has caused me some concern; it has been discussed by members on both sides of the House. We now have an Auditor General who is totally independent, we have a Comptroller General and we have people who look very closely at the spending of government. I wonder if hon. members in the opposition have considered that it is all very well to look at the actual spending and the fiscal accounting operation of departments and their budgets but have concluded that there is an overstepping into the actual decision making about money to be spent by particular departments. From my own point of view, I have some fear that the more controls and the more watchdogs you have in respect of government spending, the more in fact you are questioning the decisions of the government to spend.

● (1710)

I am sure there will be several projects in the department for which I have concern, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which in years to come will come under criticism in reports of the Auditor General. We are in a devolution period in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. We are asking Indian people across this country to participate more in decision making regarding their own affairs, and this includes financial responsibility. However, with decentralization not only from Ottawa to the various regions across Canada, but decentralization of funds to Indian bands, with those bands making more decisions regarding their financial affairs, there will be the creation of additional conflict between the Auditor General and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I bring this to the attention of the House in the hope that at some future date we will not have so many watchdogs over the Government of Canada, this parliament and the various departments that no one will want to make a decision for fear the decision will be brought forward in the Auditor General's report, or in some other report, showing the financial administration carried out by them in disfavour.

I think it is fair to say that the government shares a healthy concern for adequate accountability which, I hasten to say, has not been brought about because of a malfunction of the system but rather by a desire to improve the existing system. To achieve this very objective let me remind members that the government established a royal commission of inquiry on financial management and accountability in the Government of Canada. The creation of this royal commission was announced by the then president of the Treasury Board on November 22, 1976. If I may quote him, he stated at that time:

—I wish to inform the House of the circumstances which led the government to establish a royal commission of inquiry on financial organization and accountability, and to comment on the terms of reference of that commission as laid down in the order in council which I have just tabled.

Hon. members will note that the mandate of the royal commission has two distinct but, in the government's view, closely interrelated objects: Financial organization, namely, the structure, systems and procedures whereby financial management and control are exercised and should be exercised at all levels and in all departments and agencies of the Government of Canada; accountability, namely, the structure, systems and procedures required to ensure the effective administrative accountability of deputy heads of departments and heads of Crown agencies to the government and, where appropriate, to parliament.

The first object of inquiry reflects the extent to which the government shares the concerns expressed by the Auditor General in his report to this House for the fiscal year 1975-76, as well as during his numerous appearances before the public accounts committee, that the highest attainable standards be met in the administration of public funds. The second object of inquiry reflects the government's determination that the complex of issues, both technical and political, raised in considering certain specific recommendations of the Auditor General be clarified or resolved as swiftly and as effectively as possible.

The president of the Treasury Board at that time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

[Mr. Anderson.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—CONDEMNATION OF CONTINUING GOVERNMENT WASTE AND MISMANAGEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. Andre):

That this House condemns the government for its continuing waste and mismanagement, and its failure to implement management and administrative procedures that will ensure that the taxpayers' funds are spent efficiently, effectively, and according to the will of parliament.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are back again with another motion with regard to waste and mismanagement. The only suggestion I would make is that this motion should have the word "duplication" added to it as, of course, duplication has been a specialty of this government. We in opposition have taken a responsible position over the years in dealing with waste, mismanagement and duplication, but we have been stonewalled every time by Liberal members and members of the NDP who are no more interested in restraint and cutting back on expenditures than in flying to the moon.

One of our first attempts with a responsible motion was on February 2, 1978, when we called for the formation of a special committee to be struck before February 28, 1978, to consider the enactment of sunset laws to provide for the termination of programs or agencies which had outlived their usefulness. This was a motion presented by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Of course, it was talked out by members of the NDP and Liberals who are not simply interested in a proper examination of government departments and their expenditures—it is a matter of philosophy—and also the adoption of new, flexible budget planning techniques to discourage unnecessary growth of department budgets. Of course, if anybody wants to find out whether we have any control of things he just has to read the Auditor General's comments, but I will get to that in a few minutes.

This situation of parliament no longer having any control of expenditures came about in 1968 when one of the first acts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was to change parliamentary rules so that there was no proper examination of expenditures. I will get to his comments about that in a few minutes.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), who has just spoken, said that we have a proper examination of the budget and the expenditures of these departments. What a ridiculous lot of nonsense that is. We do not have any control at all. There has only been an amount of $19,000 removed from budgets since 1969 out of the hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars that have been spent. There is no proper review in depth when we consider the miscellaneous increases to which the Auditor General has referred, without even considering the Auditor General's comments. He has said that he cannot even find out where the money is going.

We have heard a lot of reference to restraint, but that is not really the right word in many cases. We should be referring to the elimination of duplication, mismanagement and waste. I should just like to refer to a few of the costly luxuries and excesses of this government. Let me give these examples. A consortium of seven major oil companies cancelled a promising $60 million drilling program off the coast of Labrador in 1977 because Ottawa and Newfoundland were both seeking control over offshore minerals.

In Quebec, public housing projects worth $150 million were blocked for as long as four years because of disagreements between federal and provincial agencies.

The residents of some 20 communities in southern Manitoba were denied cable television for three years while officials in Winnipeg and Ottawa fought over the ownership of a certain type of cable equipment.

• (1720)

In 1975, the tax burden on the Brenda copper mine in British Columbia was more than double the rate paid by competing mines in the United States as federal and provincial attempts were made to solve this problem. There has never been any attempt by this government to eliminate a lot of this duplication.

A moment ago an hon. member in the NDP was exhorting me to tell the truth. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) referred to a great deal of figures earlier this afternoon with regard to provincial debt. He also referred to the Alberta debt, and the fact that the municipal debts and a great many other debts in that province have recently been reduced. The latest figures are not out for the provincial debt of Alberta. Therefore, there is no way that a member can quote figures in this House on the debt of Alberta. If anyone wants to talk about the debts of provinces, they should present the whole picture including the ways in which provinces transfer their debts. For example, some provinces transfer their debts to Crown corporations. There is no way that one should quote debt figures unless one goes into total detail.

Another example of waste by this Liberal government is the $4 million spent on the Task Force on Canadian Unity. There was no need for the appointment of this body at all. Every time this government feels that there is a crisis, they give a job to Jean-Luc Pepin. The members of this House and the Senate are elected and appointed to deal with the problems of this country. My leader took a responsible position with regard to this task force and proposed the appointment of a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to solve the problem. We do not need Pepin or somebody else to travel across the country at a cost of $4 million. Last year a joint committee sat through part of the summer and into the fall to deal with Bill C-60, the constitutional bill. Another such committee could have dealt with this matter. There might have been some travelling expenses, but I am sure that we could have saved from $3 million to $3.5 million.

When the government is responsible and controls its expenses, it shows up on the bottom line in the rate of inflation. Since the end of World War II, there have been only four governments which have had sound financial policies and controlled their expenditures. During these governments, there was nobody dying on the streets or starving to death because there was sound financial policy. I will refer to three, the Adenauer administration of Germany, the Eisenhower administration and the Diefenbaker administration. They had the best record of any governments since World War II right up to the period between 1957 and 1963. While the other two countries had an inflation rate hovering around 2 per cent, the inflation rate of the Diefenbaker government was between 1.2 per cent and 1.6 per cent. That is a very enviable record and I hope that we can return to controlling inflation again with a responsible government in this country.

With this government it is either total incompetence or deliberate incompetence. When one studies the statements made by the Prime Minister over the years with regard to—

Mr. Huntington: It is deliberate.

Mr. McKenzie: The hon. member says that it is deliberate. I would like to read some of the statements made by the Prime Minister because they are certainly very suspicious. He has stated:

You can never spend more than you have; otherwise you have endless inflation.

He did not mean a word of what he said because at the present time the government is spending $1 billion per month more than it takes in. The comments by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) this afternoon are absolutely meaningless. It can be covered with jam, meringue, honey and all the rest of it but with all his sweet words and sweet talk, the government is spending more than $1 billion a month more than it takes in. The Prime Minister identifies the problem and indicates that he knows what will happen, but he goes ahead and does it anyway.

The Prime Minister has also said:

I have never been able to accept any discipline except that which I imposed upon myself . . . I found it unacceptable that others should know better than I what was good for me.

That is the philosophy of an individual. It is not the philosophy that one looks for in a politician—a politician that will not accept discipline. I guess that is why the Prime Minister changed the rules in 1968, so there would be no proper parliamentary control over expenditures. That was one of his first acts as Prime Minister, because he has no use for this House at all. Here is another statement made by the Prime Minister:

Federalism must be welcomed as a valuable tool which permits dynamic parties to plant socialist governments in certain provinces, from which the seed of radicalism has slowly spread.

What on earth does he mean by that? That is a very, very strange statement, and it creates suspicion as to what this man is really up to. The Prime Minister has also said:

Indeed the experience of that superb strategist, Mao Tse-tung, might lead us to conclude that in a vast and heterogeneous country, the possibility of establishing socialist strongholds in certain regions is the very best thing.

Such a move would only create further suspicion. As one of my colleagues said, this is a very deliberate plot to bankrupt this country, this mad Liberal spending that we have.

I would also like to refer to the famous Liberal vanishing act which the Auditor General highlights every year. In speaking before the House of Commons public accounts committee in February, Canada's Auditor General, J.J. Macdonell, said that his department could account for only half of last year's $47 billion in federal expenditures. Macdonell told the House committee that reports his department receives on government spending are so confusing that it is a big gamble to certify government accounts at the end of the year. We hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni making statements to the effect that everything is under control. He read out statements to the effect that we would have proper accounting and what have you. There is no proper accounting at all.

Officials from Mr. Macdonells' office complained that the spending estimates contain too many complicated tables when simple written explanations would tell more. They criticized government spending estimates as containing too much distracting detail and not enough information on how much money each program actually costs. The Auditor General's department said that important facts about planned expenditures are virtually impossible for parliamentarians and taxpayers to get their hands on. This is exactly why we presented our motion on February 2, 1978, to have a proper parliamentary system with investigative powers and the power to bring witnesses in under oath. It would mean a sincere effort properly to examine expenditures.

Another example of duplication is the recently appointed National Commission on Inflation to replace the AIB, although some of the staff will be transferred over to the National Commission on Inflation and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. There are three different groups looking into prices, inflation and what have you. I do not know why we need the AIB or the National Commission on Inflation.

I would like to read out to hon. members the objectives of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which has a budget of $75 million a year and a staff of approximately 2,700 people. Their objective is to promote the integrity and viability of the market system in Canada. One of its subobjectives is to protect and promote the interest of consumers by working toward a fair, safe and efficient marketplace. With a budget of $75 million and a staff of 2,700 people, why is the Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs not investigating supermarkets with their price gouging? They are not living up to their mandate. Why do we need the AIB and the inflation commission? They are just window dressing.

When there is responsible government, it attracts investment. By attracting investment the employment situation looks after itself. The Liberal government likes to talk about the 450,000 jobs they have created. If the private sector could create 450,000 jobs with a Liberal albatross around their neck, imagine what it could do without the albatross. We would be well off in this country. I must emphasize that unemployment is costing us $8.5 billion a year. If things are so good, it should not be costing $8.5 billion to cover unemployment. This figure is broken down as follows: $4.5 billion goes to the Unemployment Insurance Commission; $2.5 billion is accounted for in lost taxes and $2 billion is allocated for welfare. Canada has a very serious problem on its hands.

● (1730)

I will give you an example of what can happen with a socialist type of government in power, like the one here in Ottawa, and like the one we had in Manitoba. I have figures here which I have read into the record before. An investment counsellor has gathered some devastating figures of the amount of money which moved out of the province of Manitoba when it had a socialist government in power. That government was the best friend Alberta and the United States ever had. Now that the socialist government is no longer in power, the economy of the province is starting to turn around. The province cannot do it alone. The government is doing a remarkable job since it has taken over, but it still has the Liberal albatross from Ottawa around its neck.

An example of what has happened since the socialist government was defeated in Manitoba is as follows. Finance minister Donald Craik said:

> Private investment in Manitoba during 1978 increased by 22 per cent, the highest increase of any province in Canada.

Mr. Craik went on to say:

> —he was "naturally encouraged" by the revised figures from Statistics Canada on private investment last year.

I will now cite national figures. In 1970 to 1972 direct investment abroad was $1 billion a year. For 1976 to 1978 it was $3.1 billion. Investors have no faith in this government and that is why they are taking their money elsewhere. The examples of the situation for Manitoba which I gave a moment ago are an exact duplicate of what is happening across the country. Investors do not put ads in the paper; they do not tell anyone; they just silently move away. If anyone wants to challenge the figures, he can come to my office and I will give him statistics that show the number of businesses and the amount of money that have left this country over the last three or four years.

Whether a country is being run properly is evidenced by the amount of money it can attract as investment. Canada attracts very little. Foreign investors do not look kindly on this nation. In 1970 to 1972 direct foreign investment in Canada was $2.4 billion. Today it is $0.025 billion and declining. We will have these serious problems with unemployment, and what have you, as long as we have socialist governments, which the Prime Minister says he wants to plant in different provinces, and as long as we have the socialist philosophy we have here.

If we ever have an election and this government is re-elected, we will have exchange controls. This government has repeatedly denied it will impose exchange controls. This government cannot control money leaving this country and it cannot attract money. People abroad are discussing the subject of exchange controls. In the March 16, 1979, edition of Myers' Finance & Energy is an article entitled "Exchange Controls Coming?" The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on many occasions have denied that exchange controls will be imposed, but they have no credibility at all. Their word means nothing. We have already seen that evidenced during the last federal election campaign concerning wage and price controls, and the other ridiculous statements made by the Prime Minister that he will control expenditures, which I have read into the record today. In the Myers' Finance & Energy March 16 edition it is reported:

> Just as obviously Canada cannot continue to tolerate this haemorrhage of funds.
> That suggests foreign exchange controls. That means permits to get money out. Just how stringent, liberal or temporary, remains to be seen. But controls, once started, could hardly be removed as long as this threat of Quebec's separation hangs over the country.

We have a double-jointed problem, Mr. Speaker. If the Canadian people are considering returning this government to power they will be faced with exchange controls. Government members can make all the statements they want denying imposition of such a thing but their word means absolutely nothing. Canada's situation is being analysed from abroad. I have given you the figures showing the amount of money which is leaving this country, as well as the little bit that is dribbling in. We cannot survive. The only solution which the government can come up with is either to print more money, borrow more money, or spend more money. Let me remind hon. members that in order to pay the interest charges on Canada's debt it costs Canadian taxpayers $23 million a day. But here we have the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Buchanan) and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni telling us how wonderful everything is and that they have everything under control.

In fiscal 1980 total federal spending, budgetary and non-budgetary, will reach $52.6 billion. This figure is up $4.3 billion, or 8.9 per cent from the $48.3 billion spending forecast in fiscal 1979. The $4.3 billion in planned spending increases is the largest dollar increase in spending since fiscal 1976, the year in which the 1975 federal spending restraint program began.

It is interesting to note that when the present Minister of Finance was the president—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): First I want to congratulate the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) for his motion which reads as follows, and I quote:

> That this House condemns the government for its continuing waste and mismanagement, and its failure to implement management and administrative procedures that will ensure that the taxpayers' funds are spent efficiently, effectively, and according to the will of parliament.

That initiative will give us an opportunity to explain to the people of this country the various government policies, the allocation of budgets, the cuts made in several departments, the various recommendations that were made in the last few years. The wording of this motion is very general and resembles somewhat the comments we hear more and more often. Those comments are heard in families not only in my riding, in my province, in this country, but I think those remarks or comments are heard all over the planet. Let me explain. I think we all heard it said that the man who asks his wife for more details about the management of the family budget occasionally has a few not always very flattering remarks to make to his wife. But that happens regularly in all families, as I was saying, not only in Canada but all over the planet. It is part of the reason why I congratulate the hon. member for Calgary Centre for pointing out that situation with his motion which allows the government to explain the various budget measures to improve that situation and the situations which were pointed out.

Mr. Speaker, this opposition motion has no originality whatsoever because after listening to all the speeches made by opposition members, I have yet to hear suggestions or recommendations as to the departments or Crown corporations which should cut their budgets or staff. We are still waiting for those suggestions or recommendations.

● (1740)

This afternoon, the minister spoke about his program, and I shall come back to that later on. This day gives us an opportunity to put things in perspective, and I am certain that if the opposition can make any positive and concrete suggestions to reduce the deficit further or to improve our management criteria, they will be greatly appreciated by the minister whether he receives them in this House or in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. The hon. member for Calgary Centre talked about the deficit generally, and also talked about deficits and inefficiency at the Post Office Department.

Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member spoke about this department in particular, I would like to remind him that if he had been there for the consideration of the Post Office estimates on March 5 last, when the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, he would know what the minister said about the situation in his department. At the staff level, it should be noted that it is in this department that cutbacks have been the greatest. The department lost 1,850 man-years because of the cutback program.

The minister also spoke about the efficiency standards which are now applied in the Post Office and mentioned some data collected quite recently, more specifically last January. The minister said that 93 per cent of items for local delivery, or 40 per cent of all mail items, were delivered in the 24 hours following their mailing and that 98 per cent of the mail was delivered within 40 hours. Moreover, in eight of the 22 postal installations covered in the survey, 100 per cent of the mail was delivered within 48 hours after its mailing.

I wanted to speak about this particular department in view of the comments made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre in his speech supporting his motion. I now come back to the deficit item of the budget. It is stated that the deficit amounted to $90 million for the year 1972-73. Thereafter, it increased yearly according to the various work agreements which were signed. In 1976-77, the deficit reached $578 million, but it went down by $19.5 million in 1977-78, and we expect a significant decrease this year even in the face of higher gas prices and wages under new collective agreements.

Mr. Speaker, I make all these comments to show how serious the hon. member really was in moving such a motion. I believe that the text of the motion is simply a pious wish aimed at blaming the government. The hon. member even said that he could criticize the activities of various departments all day, but I only gave the facts for the department that he chose himself and I am giving the answer that we received when we considered the estimates of the Post Office Department during the March 5 meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now continue to comment on what the minister said this afternoon. I have no intention of dealing with all the matters raised by the President of the Treasury Board this afternoon, but I will simply deal with his reference to efficiency standards developed in some departments, and especially the particular attention granted to 24 departments accounting for 80 per cent of total Canadian government expenditures.

Efficiency and motivation standards were also established for public service employees. There has been, as well, a first report of these efficiency standards and new policies put forward by the government to reduce expenditures and increase efficiency. It may be easy at some point to reduce expenditures, but increasing efficiency and productivity in the public service is another story. The minister made reference to the energy conservation policy established in every department. He also referred to the purchase of compact automobiles in all departments. I wonder if at the provincial level the same recommendations were given to employees. The minister also referred to higher than 90 per cent reduction in first class transportation. The minister has also informed us in February last of the over-all budget allocations. What was the increase in estimates over the last few years? If criticism must be levelled at someone or some department, figures have to be put in context. So just what was the increase or the growth rate in Canadian government expenditures over these last five years? The increase in 1975-76 was roughly 18.5 per cent, 10.4 per cent in 1976-77, in 1977-78 the growth was 7.1 per cent, in 1978-79 they went up 9.5 per cent, and for 1979-80, our estimates read 8.9 per cent of total expenditures. Comparing the current year with fiscal 1975-76, where the growth rate was about 18.5 per cent, the current 8.9 per cent shows a significant decrease, greater than 50 per cent.

It is very easy to blame the government for higher expenditures, but where do these increases occur? What is the allocation of resources for various functions? Hon. members certainly received the distribution of those expenditures and it must be noted that regarding the health and welfare of Canadians, a total $18.33 billion are allocated in the current fiscal year. Are opposition members claiming those national health expenditures should have been reduced? Those $18 billion, 35.5 per cent of total Canadian government expenditures, are transferred to the provinces. Those funds collected by the Canadian government are redistributed for the health and welfare of Canadians. From this amount, we go on to debt service, $8 million or 16.5 per cent of the total budget. Economic expansion, $5 billion, or 10 per cent, and $5 billion for defence. But if we now turn to the budget, I note that for my province, Quebec, a high percentage of expenditures come under direct assistance to individuals. I note, for instance, that under the various federal government programs, an amount of $1.35 billion is provided for equalization payments to Quebec. Now the province of Quebec can do as it wishes with these funds paid out by three provinces, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, to help the poorer provinces, in accordance with their needs and priorities, develop the economic sector they wish, their industry, for instance; but the provinces could also distribute the money among their residents if they wished. Under these equalization payments, Quebec gets 52 per cent of the total amount paid out by these three provinces. I do think we ought to mention it, especially in the context of a constitutional debate. I note that amount, Mr. Speaker, and the source of information is the C.D. Howe Research Institute as published in the periodical Accent Québec. It is a research and publication program set up by the C.D. Howe Research Institute of Montreal. We note here that the steering committee is chaired by Mr. Michel Bélanger, president of the Provincial Bank of Canada, and includes members of some New Brunswick universities, business leaders such as Alcan officials, but I will not list all the members of that board of directors. Research has been performed by the C.D. Howe Research Institute which has already published about ten booklets on taxes, expenditures in Quebec and in Ontario, a comparison of taxes and expenditures in those two central provinces. I refer to page one. It is pertinent and I think it should be stated, because I have never seen that excerpt in any newspaper. I quote: The central government has also paid a substantial amount of equalization payments to Quebec. The combination of its own revenue with equalization payments provides Quebec with a total per capita income higher than in Ontario. However, the level of per capita expenditures is higher in Quebec than in Ontario. Thus, in spite of the fact that Quebec is financially poorer than Ontario, it spends more per capita.

The following question should be asked: Does that higher level of expenditures indicate superior services, a greater need of public services or a less effective distribution of those services? The public also questions not only the Quebec government but all other governments about budgets and productivity standards within various departments.

Regarding these transfer payments to the provinces I was saying that one can wonder if cutbacks could have been made? And there again, Mr. Speaker, when Quebec expansion minister Landry criticized the federal government for having made these cutbacks, he said they would result in a loss of jobs for his province.

I have no intention of dwelling on that issue but I would like to deal with it in a more constructive manner than the member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard). He seemed to attack the Canadian government for its advertising budget designed to publicize the economic incentives offered by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which aims at informing Canadians on the purchasing capacity of the Department of Supply and Services. Yet what he does not tell us, for instance, is their support for the Parti Québécois which is revealed by the fact that the government of Quebec spends $24 million in advertising, a subject which I do not intend to deal with now and which has also already been raised by the Union Nationale party. We are dealing here with an amount almost similar to the one spent by the Canadian government for the country as a whole. So I am wondering who spent or invested greater and more generous amounts of money than we did. Are we really dealing at this stage with a waste of public funds? I put the question to the hon. member for Rimouski.

I now want to deal with the criticisms made by the NDP member who was calling for more severe review of the financial operations of Crown corporations. I must say that to a certain extent I share his opinion on the subject. This is why I have already introduced a private bill concerning the activities of CBC so that the appropriate committee might study its annual report a soon as it is tabled in order for us to have ample time to ask questions from this corporation. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to mention other important activities, namely the decision made by the Canadian government regarding the development of the aeronautical sector.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Peters: It being six o'clock, may I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At six o'clock the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) had the floor, and he has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, looking at the official opposition benches, one wonders whether a message has already been received.

The Conservative motion today deals with a problem which I am sure all Canadians know we have. It has been aggravated partly by the fact that the Liberal government has been here, in my opinion, much too long. There is always a tendency for there to be an over-expenditure of funds. Money is used for the wrong purpose when a government has been in power for a long period of time. In fairness I must say that even in the case of an NDP government the situation would not be different. I remember at one time meeting with cabinet ministers from across Canada, agriculture ministers, and finding that some who were members of my own party were more conservative in their attitude than others. In terms of dealing with waste and abuse this is a factor with any government which has been in power for very long.

Let us consider, for instance, this government which has been in power for many years. Very few cabinet ministers have not had lengthy cabinet experience. Those who have not had lengthy cabinet experience have had lengthy experience here as members. One such minister is the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Reid). Yet this government is not able to handle the very simple problem of Mrs. Dubé, who has been standing out in front of this building starving herself for 20 days. It is not able to solve her problem. Some hon. members say that her problem comes under provincial jurisdiction.

When Mrs. Dubé was in Quebec city and met the premier of Quebec, he told her that her problem was not his, that it was not something he could help her with, and that it was something that has to be solved in Ottawa. That is why she moved to Ottawa. She has been here ever since. The government has not been able to solve her problem or the problems of many other people. Mrs. Dubé's problem is simple. I understand that the ceiling in her basement was too low. Perhaps she will die on Parliament Hill. If we do not get around to having an election, there will still be 265 members here who cannot solve her problem.

It is no wonder that there is abuse of power. A number of things have been done as a result of the Gallup poll. One has been mentioned many times in this House. For partisan reasons the government has left office space vacant in the city of Ottawa by moving some operations to the city of Hull. This has cost hundreds of millions and will cost governments a considerable amount of money in the years to come. There may be some merit to this change. There has always been talk about solving Quebec's problems by giving Quebec more. However, there are now many office buildings in Ottawa which are empty. About one-fifth of Ottawa's office space has become vacant in the last five years simply because the government has moved some operations across the river. This was done to show the people of Quebec that they also have a role to play in our national capital. All the government has done, however, has been to confuse the people of the city of Hull who do not know what belongs to the province of Quebec, what belongs to the national capital commission, or whether Hull will be annexed with the city of Ottawa. I do not think this move has done anything for national unity, but unreasonable expenditures have certainly been made.

Hull is not the only place to which moves have been made. The government has decentralized. Veterans Affairs headquarters are being moved to Charlottetown. Can hon. members imagine anything less necessary than moving the pension commission or the headquarters of a department without moving services? No hospital facility is being moved, just Veterans Affairs headquarters, where records are kept. A move is being made to Prince Edward Island just so that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) will be elected forever. It means that if people from Vancouver are going to see the pension commission they will have a great time of it because they will see the whole country; they will travel from sea to sea. It may be nice for the old veterans who can make it, but many of them will not make it half way; they will not make it to Ottawa, and they will certainly not make it to Prince Edward Island.

● (2010)

What about the farmers wanting to talk about a farm loan? I read the other day in a press release of the Department of Agriculture that farmers will have to go to Camrose, Alberta, to see about a farm loan. We have put quite a bit more money into the Farm Credit Corporation, but for a farmer to get a loan now and to talk to a senior official, it will be necessary to go to Camrose, Alberta. I wonder if that will really happen physically. I wonder whether it will happen after the election. We would have to know whether a Liberal cabinet minister is elected in the province of Alberta, because otherwise it might be located in some other place.

Centralization is not saving us any money. It will cost a lot of money to people who are not able to provide the infrastructure services, but it will probably be able to provide the Liberal party with a few votes as they move agencies around the country. The other day I asked about moving the Department of Supply and Services to Matane, Quebec, because the cabinet minister was from that area. I made the crack that we are going to buy our pencils in Matane now rather than in Ottawa. To be fair to the minister, he came over to me privately, not to show up my ignorance but to point out that they only bought a few dollars worth of pencils in Matane, that they were still buying pencils in other places. If that is so, why do we bother with decentralization? Why do we bother with it if it will not bring some advantages to the minister and to his community?

Most Canadians are fed up with what they consider to be the waste of parliament. It was mentioned earlier today that we have no control over expenditures. Not long after this motion is passed or defeated, another motion will be put forward whereby we will approve millions and millions of dollars worth of estimates, most of which have not been considered by members. We have not made a change in $20 million or $30 million worth of estimates in the last ten years—my colleagues say, not even $20 or $30 worth. When we are in committee and we find that the government has misplaced, mislaid or misappropriated $20, it will probably be found, but when you talk about $20 million—no way!

Since we have changed the procedure on estimates, they now beautify the departments; they are a valedictory address to the individual department and to the people who work in it, and we are not able to decide as members of parliament what the expenditures are for. Since most of the estimates do not even go to the committees, they do not get even a superficial type of examination. The minister has indicated that we have now established a Comptroller General and that we have a new force in the Auditor General's Department. But parliament is asking someone else to make the decision for it.

Since I have been here members of parliament have been talking about horses on the payroll and the expenditures at Mirabel where we bought land which we are not going to use. When the threat of an election loomed, it was necessary for Toronto not to feel cheated, so we said that the land in Pickering should also be purchased. We will have an airport at Pickering, not because we need one but because we have to balance it with Mirabel where great abuses have taken place for the same reason, namely, to elect the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: These huge expenditures are not made for the people. The people in Montreal did not ask for that airport. They found it very easy to get to Dorval, and they found transport facilities to Dorval very good. Now every time I go to Montreal I hear dozens of complaints about how hard it is to get from Dorval to Mirabel or from Montreal to Mirabel, and anybody who has driven from Ottawa to Mirabel knows that they have not put up a sign telling you to turn off to Hawkesbury to get on to the Quebec side to get to Mirabel.

All these expenditures and extravagances have been made for one purpose so far as the public is concerned.

An hon. Member: Even the airlines did not want Mirabel.

Mr. Peters: That is true. The people who did not like it most were the airlines, and most of them are not satisfied even today.

A number of changes have been suggested by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and by the whips of the parties. Several weeks ago I heard the Liberal whip making a very interesting dissertation on changes that should be made to assist members of parliament to make more reasonable decisions on expenditures. Changes are talked about, but normally are overriden by the need to pass legislation, and therefore allowances are not made to members to participate in gaining an understanding of what are the expenditures of the nation.

I am pleased to learn today that the government has provided members of parliament with two bills. My colleague will probably be able to tell me what the expenditures in those two bills are. I looked at both of them and in one I found an expenditure of about $311 million, I presume. In the other one I was not able to ascertain what is the bottom line in the bill. As we approach March 31 we will be making an expenditure of something like $52 billion or $53 billion. Most of the items that will go into making up that amount have never even been discussed by members of parliament.

There is no machinery which allows members of parliament to make a decision about these expenditures, and for this reason the general public is very unhappy and dissatisfied, to the extent that an article appeared in a newspaper the other day which probably makes a lot of sense to most Canadians. It talks about one of the large supermarkets which has decided to forget all the hoopla, forget all the name items, forget about all the brand name labels like Trudeau, Clark and Broadbent, and choose a no-label party. There is a lot of merit in a no-label party because we have not spent a lot of money and time building the images. There are no brand names, no images to indicate to the Canadian public what will happen, and obviously after the election none of those things will happen.

All members are interested in controlling the expenditures. Proposition 13 in the United States is not dead in Canada. In fact it is badly abused in some parts of Canada. Today we heard a member from Manitoba talk about the joys of many of those abuses where you cut down on the services that are asked for by people, where you cut down on things to which Canadians have become accustomed. Eventually we will have to develop a mechanism, if this institution is to function, that will allow a scrutiny of expenditures before they are made. I believe the Standing Committee on Public Accounts has done a very good job, but it is dealing with accounts after the fact—accounts after something has been spent.

If one looks at some of the items we will pass later this evening, one will find that many of them are dollar items, not statutory items but transfer ones. The initial reason for putting those items down has changed. It has been decided that those moneys will be used for something else. It gives us an opportunity of knowing exactly why we are passing the moneys. We are passing items that are only a transfer from one estimate to another.

There are abuses in the expenditures. Some abuses which are taking place can be controlled and there are other abuses which cannot be controlled. Now that we have made the decision to spend money for the infrastructure across the river, what will happen? Now that it has been decided that we will not go into the business of bilingualism and will cut back on the expenditures of training people in a second language, whether it be English or French, what will happen to those large complexes across the river? Mr. Lévesque has indicated that he wants to operate those buildings. There are four or five buildings in Place Campeau as it is commonly called, or Les Terrasses de la Chaudière. What will happen to those expenditures if there is a major change in the attitude of the provincial government and they decide to operate them?

An hon. Member: Roll them over.

Mr. Peters: I am not sure—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has the floor. I suggest hon. members listen.

Mr. Peters: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure whether that comment was made in jest. Perhaps we will move the fence back a few feet behind the parliament buildings and annex it. Perhaps that will be the answer.

If the Governor General was not a friend of mine, I would continue this exercise. Seeing as he is, I will cease and desist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-42, an act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada—Chapter 17.

Bill C-49, an act to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.—Chapter 49.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—CONDEMNATION OF CONTINUING GOVERNMENT WASTE AND MISMANAGEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. Andre):

That this House condemns the government for its continuing waste and mismanagement, and its failure to implement management and administrative procedures that will ensure that the taxpayers' funds are spent efficiently, effectively, and according to the will of parliament.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I was taken by the words mentioned in the motion of the opposition, words such as "waste and mismanagement," and I thought I should at least address myself to some of them.

I find it interesting that there is such stress on waste, and I was rather surprised that one member of the opposition, when referring to the kind of "waste" this government has indulged in, referred to the commission on national unity. I cannot understand how any member of this House could in any way feel it was a waste, no matter what the cost, to send people across this country to deal with a question involving national unity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: I cannot understand for an instant why such hon. gentlemen as Mr. Robarts and Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin ever have any remarks of that nature related to them when they, as honest, true, and great Canadian citizens took on the task for this parliament.

● (2040)

I have no quarrel with the hon. gentleman who said that we members of parliament have a great deal of ability at our disposal and that we do indeed represent our constituencies. I agree with him completely. But quite often we have business here and we need the advice of experts. Experts are not always those who have honorary degrees, earned degrees, or professions. So it was necessary to take two gentlemen and a lady, all of whom we know well, and send them across the country, with others, to hear what ordinary souls had to say about unity. To use this as one of the examples of "waste" and extravagance on the part of the government is absolutely ridiculous and unacceptable.

There are other examples. I would like to go back to the days of another Auditor General, Maxwell Henderson. I remember well that during the period when he was talking about government expenditures, he was quite willing to accept that the budget in the Auditor General's office would go from $2.25 million to $4.25 million the next year, and to $6.25 million the following year, while government expenditures did not increase to that extent at all. That, however, was fair from the point of view that he should have the necessary funds to check government expenditures.

This august gentleman commented on something which it might have been more appropriate for the opposition to comment on, rather than them merely making remarks about the wastage on the unity commission. They could have mentioned that there exists inevitably some mismanagement in large corporations and in large governments, as Maxwell Henderson said. This mismanagement often occurs in mid-stream. It is easy in hindsight to talk about all the things which occurred, but the government is dealing with reality and what is occurring now. Some of the innovative changes in policy must be made at the moment. It does not necessarily mean that everything before that time was done wrongly. It means that changes were necessitated as a result of outside forces and forces which occur within the country. Maxwell Henderson recognized this.

The next Auditor General, of course, was J. J. Macdonell. He noted that the Treasury Board had acted on 55 of the 117 abuses singled out in the 1972-1973 report, and that another 33 per cent were under review. He said that the reason his annual report was so short was that so many of the faults he found in various departments get fixed, and therefore lose their materiality. Macdonell said that he was impressed by the people he met in government "lots of sincere, hardworking public servants", were the words he used.

Macdonell said that the average reaction when he finds fault with something is, "Good heavens, we must do something about that", and most times they do. It appears this attitude of co-operation and the low profile approach of Mr. Macdonell will be of great help to us in the future. Mr. Macdonell has quickly revealed himself as a superb professional who is bringing new prestige and authority to his office. He said that the public accounts committee should be delighted with this new report, that at last MPs have a chance to do something constructive. The committee will have before it a report which even notes how departments have mended their ways. That, after all, is what the exercise should be all about.

I would like to read a little note from the press concerning supplementary estimates.

> The federal opposition parties were caught napping. None of them showed up at the House of Commons committee meeting which was scheduled to hear Mr. Buchanan defend his department's spending estimates. That is hardly the close scrutiny of governmental spending the people of Canada expect from opposition members.

The opposition talks of mismanagement by the government. What kind of management has the opposition shown in the use of the public accounts committee when they do not even turn up to ask questions of the minister when he was prepared to answer them?

We do not get comments like these from everyone. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce has a vital interest in this country, and I believe that they are very important. Their comments are very important to the business community and are certainly good guidance to and good criticism of the government. This is what they said about the budget:

> The chamber labelled the budget as responsible, and commended Finance Minister Jean Chrétien for resisting the temptation to bring in a financially dangerous program of massive tax cuts. While expressing alarm at the government's cash requirements of $10.8 billion, the chamber said the fact that these requirements are being reduced by $1.3 billion from 1978-79 levels is particularly welcome.

Why can the opposition not give criticism of that nature instead of attacking the money spent by the task force in trying to find out what the Canadian public think of our dream, our rebirth and renewal of our constitution? However, the chamber does not stop there. Later on it says:

> The Canadian Chamber has agreed to support the Comptroller General in his initiative to establish financial control mechanisms in various federal departments. The chamber has offered to assist in the implementation of the scheme, and will help to secure the appropriate people for the assignment.

With an important step like that having been taken, we are talking like we are in the dark ages, as though everybody has sat by for ten years and done nothing. It just does not happen to be true, and the facts which I have read to you bear this out. Here are a couple more facts. Total federal government expenditures, as a percentage of the gross national product, have dropped since 1975. This is something which is rarely ever said publicly. It is almost as though it is a shame to admit that anything in line with a controlled industry has existed. In the fiscal year 1975-1976 government expenditures totalled 22.5 per cent of the GNP; in 1976-1977, 21.5 per cent; in 1977-1978, 21.0 per cent; 1978-1979 forecast 20.7 per cent, and the 1979-1980 forecast, 20.3 per cent. How is it that the opposition can presume that nothing has happened? This most certainly gives an indication of efficiency and effectiveness as the motion requests.

The federal government has reduced its expenditures by $500 million for 1978-1979 and by $2 billion for 1979-1980. What about the growth of the public service itself, which has reduced from 5.6 per cent in 1974-1975 to .6 per cent in the 1977-1978 estimates? All these facts seem to be ignored.

What do we talk about? One of the hon. members opposite, a member for whom I have the greatest respect, discusses the terrible plight of a person who is petitioning outside the buildings of parliament. It is not untraditional or unusual that an opposition member or I might not be able to do anything in a situation where the due process of law has been applied in the courts of our land. This person must either accept the judgment or search for higher authority to repeal it. It is ridiculous to expect a parliamentarian, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), or a member of cabinet to supersede a decision by the courts of this land. It must be remembered that justice stands holding the balance. I notice though that sometimes one eye is covered, but all of us must accept what comes from justice, all of us must accept that cruel lady, and the lady may have to accept that cruel lady as well. That does not mean to say we will not do what we can to defend an individual in trouble, but we must obey the laws of the land. I submit, whether hon. members consider it inappropriate for members of parliament, because it is parliament that is involved, not just the government, that it is certainly not an example of waste, inefficiency or mismanagement.

We seem to forget that in the first few paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister said that from projected spending for this fiscal year the government would be subtracting $500 million, and from the expenditures expected for the next fiscal year it would be taking away $2 billion. If hon. members opposite quarrel with those figures, or attempted to prove them incorrect, I could understand, but instead we end up with arguments concerning some incident which might occur on the Hill or in the other place, and using it as an excuse to condemn the government for almost everything that has occurred.

However, the end of the motion says something else, and I would like to address a few words in that regard. This is with respect to the concern about government spending according to the will of parliament. In the motion there is talk of waste, management, and expeditiously doing our work. It also questions whether we will do the spending according to the will of parliament. I will mention briefly some of the measures taken to provide improved disclosure of information to parliament.

In September, 1973, the Treasury Board published a guide on financial administration for departments and agencies of the Government of Canada. The guide is the policy of the government on financial administration in departments and agencies. It also provides directives and guidelines for a course of action for deputy heads to follow in discharging their responsibilities in financial administration, including the utilization of appropriation authority according to the will of parliament. The guide is designed not only to explain to managers their responsibility to control appropriations approved by parliament, but to provide useful direction for establishing the cost of program achievements or outputs to ensure that results attained would have the maximum effectiveness and efficiency in the use of public funds.

This guide directs that for any appropriations by parliament, the department classification shall be threefold; first, by activity element to make visible the cost of obtaining the output or benefits to be derived from expenditures; second, by responsibility centres to identify who is accountable internally; third, by objective of expenditure to provide a standard for identifying the acquisition of an asset and the utilization of those resources in producing benefits to the public. This hardly sounds like a government which has gone willy-nilly and not indicated ways in which parliament can be informed and cannot inquire into how the will of parliament is being followed through in the expenditure of funds.

These three characteristics of financial administration, which are emphasized in this guide, are financial disclosure, which is concerned with providing information to parliament; accountability displaying information by organizational components to identify financial responsibility; and control whereby only those with properly delegated authority can authorize the use of appropriations for purposes for which they were approved by parliament.

If we do not use these guides which are available to us and ask questions concerning them, and directly get into the government's business and its spending of funds, how can we sit here and talk about waste and mismanagement? We all serve on committees. Each of us has a responsibility. The guidelines are set out to make the information available to us.

On October 7, 1975, two years later, the Treasury Board's report on the study of the accounts of Canada was issued. This report set forth findings, analyses, and recommendations of the representatives of the Treasury Board, the Department of Finance and the Department of Supply and Services, and the terms of reference approved by Treasury Board. The 41 recommendations contained in this report were unanimously accepted by the executive, the office of the Auditor General and the public accounts committee. These are now being implemented. However, I still continue to hear charges that nothing has been done.

These recommendations focused on the manner in which information is reported, and addressed such items as the annual base of most parliamentary appropriations, including the need for any limitation on commitments applicable to future years, the vote structure used in the estimates, including the effect of allocations of costs between votes, cost recovery techniques and net voting, information reports, including the summary statements in the estimates, the Canada Gazette and, of course, the public accounts. Many of the recommendations in this study have now been implemented, and others are near completion.

We seem to be faced with a feeling that everything must be done, that somehow governments must take a big brush and, if white is beautiful, paint it white, and if black is beautiful, paint it black. It does not happen that way. We go through several shades of grey to get to either white or black. Things do not happen overnight. The sun rises and the sun sets. Some people seem to think that if they were in power, suddenly in one moment they could change it all and everyone would find it all correct. But they would find as many complications as this government has. The important thing is to react to whatever is happening and change policy in mid-stream as a result. There is always someone who says that the previous policy was no good. But it was good for its time, and change had to take place.

Of major interest in this context is the study of the form of the estimates. In the spring of 1978 the program branch of the Treasury Board secretariat, in conjunction with the office of the Comptroller General, formed a task force to study the estimates. The objectives of this study are to evaluate known criticisms of the estimates, to design a presentational format for the estimates which will assist in a better understanding and more meaningful discussion of the government's spending plans to consult with members of parliament departments, and others regarding the design proposal, and to develop plans, procedures, and guidance to implement an agreed upon approach.

Those words are most important in the kind of government which exists in Canada, not just the government per se on this side. It says "an agreed upon approach ." There are many people with expertise on the other side who can say what is required so they can better understand. They are invited to be part of that ongoing system which will make a more meaningful study of estimates possible.

A basic principle has been proposed by this task force. In its statement on the proposal of the progress of this work, the secretary of the Treasury Board recently told the public accounts committee that the role of the estimates committee is to communicate to parliament the level and the nature of the government's spending plans for the coming fiscal year as a reflection of government policies and priorities, and to foster the public understanding of the purposes and objectives underlying the spending plans.

The government and the Auditor General are in agreement that a prime means of facilitating accountability is through an information system which provides the bridge between the estimates and the public accounts committee. The end result will be consistency—
