CHAPTER V.

Henry went back to the hall-entrance with a face that told of the long, hot and fatal. Not many minutes before, it had been fiery and glowing, and his face now was a dull, ashen, lifeless, like a man who had been struck by lightning. He was leaning against the door, his head bowed, his hands clasped in prayer. He was alone in the hall, the door closed behind him. He was alone in the hall, the door closed behind him. He was alone in the hall, the door closed behind him.
