CHAPTER XXIV.
WITHIN DOORS.

Garrett was for a moment taken at a disadvantage by the suddenness of the unexpected onslaught, and did not recover himself till his face had grown purple under the other's fierce grip. But in a moment his own savage nature was fully roused, and, with a furious oath gurgling through his compressed throat, he dealt Stephen a tremendous blow on the arm which held him, which deprived him of its power, and made him quit his hold; then, like a wild beast, he flung himself on his assailant, and they were locked together in a deadly struggle the ferocious character of which words can scarcely depict.

Garrett was much the stronger of the two, and after half a minute of the exercise of a brute strength on the part of both, which their inflamed passions made savage beyond description, Stephen was borne back into a large chair, where he lay almost entirely at the other's mercy. And it seemed as if, in the fury of the moment, Garrett meant to destroy him; but all at once, with a scornful laugh, and a last violent shake, he threw him from him, and walked a step backward.

"What fools and idiots we are," he cried, with a bitter laugh. "Why should we fly at each other's throats in that fashion? Our peril is little if we stand by each other. We are ruined only if we ruin ourselves. In the fiend's name, what tempted you to seize me?"

"Because you threatened to betray me," answered Stephen, sullenly, for his experience in Garrett's hands had taught him he was no match for him physically. "Only because you talked of leaving me in the lurch," rejoined the other. "Don't try that on again, I would advise you, for when my devil's up as you roused it just now I don't always stop in time. But come, let us act sensibly, and meet our common danger together."

"I was wrong, Garrett; I admit it," replied Stephen, whose discomfiture had really cowed him. "Passion got the better of me. Let us forget it, and, as you say, we must to each other. Fill me out a glass of wine, and take one yourself. Then let us consider what is to be done."

The wine was poured out and drunk, and in this way the outburst of passion passed over. But the feeling which kindled it was not and could not be eradicated. Necessity alone compelled Stephen Gibson to stifle his rage—necessity produced by a consciousness of the danger in which they both stood. Could he have got clear of his position by sacrificing his accomplice he would have done so without an instant's hesitation. But the latter had shown him how dangerous it would be to attempt this, and how vain the effort would prove. He felt himself now utterly within the meshes of that web of fraud and deceit, the weaving of which he had consented to assist in, long years ago, and, appalled by the realization of this, his passionate nature had prompted him to assault the man before whose temptation he had so easily fallen.

In that assault he was made to feel his powerlessness only the more, and with inward gnashing of teeth was compelled to simulate a pacific disposition, while in his heart he could have crushed Garrett beneath his feet.

Not for one moment was the latter deceived by the pretended reconciliation. Nathan Garrett read the heart of Stephen Gibson as if were an open book, and quite understood how gladly he would destroy him, but for the bonds of guilt which linked them indissolubly to each other. They were united not by natural attraction or personal regard, but by the strong and sure bonds of necessity. Their connection was now as vital as that of the Siamese twins. Let either out the ligatures which hold them together, and both would be destroyed.

Knowing this, and knowing that he had just made Stephen Gibson sensible of it, Garrett smiled quietly as he sipped his wine and enjoyed the victory he had gained. Nay, he was satisfied with it, for his evil nature desired no higher bond of union.

Mr. Weir has received a further supply of new Canadian silver coin, which is to be distributed to the public at par.

BREAKFAST—EPPE'S COCOA—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Eppe has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctor's bills.—Civil Service Gazette. Made simply with boiling water or milk.
